20. Christ thus says: "If I, who am the head, must despise everything and cling to God alone, and thus enter into my glory through suffering, then the people who are given to me as an inheritance will also be such that they will rely on no place, no family, no name, except on this one thing, that they have God with me, to whom they can assign nothing, but must receive everything from him; who must become nothing, so that he becomes everything. This is what he says Matth. 24, 23.: "If anyone shall say to you, Behold, here is Christ, or there, believe it not." For a Christian man knows of no place, not even of any temporal thing, although nowadays the godless Roman popes with their flatterers condemn this opinion as heretical and show us Rome as the place where one must find Christ, by pandering to God's foolish desires. But he himself not only teaches us the opposite, but also shows it in fact, by letting nothing but Satan reign in Rome under his name, as everyone grasps with his hands, and the whole world sees.

(21) We have said in the foregoing that holy is that which is set apart and hidden, and only before the face of God; not that worldly sanctuary, of which nowadays only houses, garments, the clergy (clerus) are called holy by the popes in order to deceive the minds of men, but that which the Holy Spirit sanctifies with His anointing. So the saints are not the Jews, not the clergy (clerus), not a man who has any name, but only the one who is attached to God through faith, who has become partaker of his nature through the same, whose life is with Christ in the Lord.

God is hidden. To all others Christ gives the letter of separation in this and the following verses, saying: My delight is in the saints on earth and in the glorious ones, as if he said the word Ps. 101, 6.: "My eyes look for the faithful in the land, that they may dwell with me." Of this separation the Lord also says to the Jews, Mal. 1, 10. 11. "I have no pleasure in you, saith the LORD of hosts: for my name shall be magnified among the Gentiles."

22. but in this verse the same expression "pleasure" (voluntas) is used as in the first Psalm, v. 2: "He has pleasure (voluntas) in the law of the Lord." Similarly, he calls them "glorious ones" in spirit, since they are reckoned before men among the wicked and despised and full of disease, like their Head, Christ. But by faith they are sanctified, by faith they are also great and glorious in the eyes of God, for with a great courage they despise everything, good and evil.

But he says, "For the saints on earth," not, "For the saints in heaven," so that he may indicate that he is speaking of men on earth, and at the same time, so that he may strengthen and fortify those who believe in him with a certain promise, so that they may know, no matter how great afflictions they may have to suffer, that they nevertheless please Christ their Lord, but the adversaries dislike him. Therefore, this verse is a word of sweet promise, which stimulates and sustains faith, just as the following one is a word of severe 1) threat, which condemns unbelief.

(24) It is easy to harmonize our translation with this, so that the meaning is this: My God has done to my saints everything that I have willed and desired. But I have willed nothing else than that they should be like me, slain with me according to the flesh, and made alive according to the Spirit; which is marvelous in the sight of all, that it should be said, and that it should be so, that the dead should live, that those who are corrupted by shame should be glorified, that the unholy (profanati) should be holy. But by the Spirit he has fulfilled and executed this wonderful will of mine. Therefore, only in these saints, but not also in others, is my pleasure. For since it is said that I have all my pleasure in them, it is shown that I have no pleasure in the others. Thus it happens that he who believes is saved, but he who does not believe is condemned, because Christ has all his pleasure in those, but no pleasure in these.

V. 4 But those who go after another will have great sorrow in their hearts. I will not sacrifice their libation with the blood, nor take their name in my mouth. 2)

In this verse he describes and rejects the other generation, which is hostile to the cross, in which he has no pleasure, because it does not receive him, the head, because of the lowliness of its death, nor does it allow itself to be transformed into God through faith, so that it has God as its Lord with Christ, but struggles with the idols of its heart and with its works. Therefore, we must look at the Hebrew words, because their meaning cannot be rendered in Latin. And Jerome differs from our Latin translation and translates thus: Multiplicabuntur idola eorum post tergum sequentium ; non libabo libamina eorum de sanguine, nec assumam nomina eorum in labiis meis [There will be many idols of those who go behind; I will not offer their drink offerings of blood, nor will I take their names on my lips]. For this verse we have divided [in the Vulgate] into two.

26. what Jerome rendered by idola eorum [their idols], we have rendered [in the Vulgate] by infirmitates eorum [their heartaches. The Hebrew text has XXXXXX. But the verbum XXX means to form something with sorrow and toil, as silversmiths labor to give images their form. Therefore, in the 115th Psalm, v. 4, of this sad and labored work, the idols of the Gentiles are mentioned, namely of the art and effort with which they are formed. And Ps. 127:2 [Vulg.], "Ye that eat the bread of sorrows," is what some have rendered: The bread of them that labor in pain, others: A bread of sorrow. Now, however different this may be, all agree that 0'2.^ is that which is prepared and made with art and great labor.

(27) By this name the Spirit calls the teachers of ungodly doctrines and works, which are also their idols, because the lie requires much effort and care to appear as truth, whereas the doctrine of the wise is easy, as it is said in Proverbs (Cap. 14:6, Vulg.), and the truth is simple. But not only in this way are they sorrowful and miserable, but also by the works which are done according to these doctrines. For since they have no faith, they must necessarily be plagued without ceasing by the teachings and works of men. This we have described above in the words and in the 10th Psalm [§ 16 ff. § 61] enough in the verse [v. 2. Vulg.]: "They are seized in the plots which they devise."

The actions of these people are punished by Isaiah Cap. 44, 9-20. in a very sharp equivocation by introducing an idol maker in a long sermon text. This passage fits very well to this verse; whoever wants to, may read it. Therefore, if one says "idols" or "heartache", one is speaking correctly, if one only understands the godless, useless, sad and sorrowful behavior of those who, without faith, want to repay God with their works and teachings, I don't know what, by not being formed by God, but wanting to form God.

For I have said above [§§ 15. 16], whoever thinks differently of God than one must think, makes God conform to himself, not to God. But without faith no one thinks rightly of God. Therefore Isaiah rightly says there [Cap. 44, 9]: "The idolaters are all vain. Who are they that make a god, and cast idols that are of no use? Behold, all their comrades become ashamed; for they are masters of men." For while they presume to make themselves vain by these

[If they try to strengthen their conscience, they only become weaker and weaker, and their conscience gets worse and worse day by day. Therefore, their idols, in which they trust, are their weakness, through which they get used to distrusting God more and more, and the more they distrust, the more idols they form.

30 Therefore the Hebrew text says: They will make their idols much, with an active (activo) verbum, to express the wrong and unfortunate actions of those who always learn and never come to the knowledge of the truth [2 Tim. 3, 7. For this reason they invent innumerable doctrines, sects and works in order to serve God, as can be seen today in the Jews, but much more in the Christians under the pope. For since their consciences are not calm, nor do they know any other way of peace than their works and doctrines, they inevitably engage in various questions and undertakings without ceasing, but do not hold fast to any of them and are not satisfied with them, as experience everywhere abundantly testifies.

What are the monasteries and convents of today, since they know nothing of the faith, but the most miserable torture chambers of consciences, which then blind the wretched people, whose leaders they are, with their godless opinions, instead of teaching their works of faith? Thus one blind man leads another, and both fall into the pit, so that it is far more desirable and safer nowadays to become an oxherd or some kind of craftsman, to take a wife and live in a common estate, than to become a monk or a priest, or even to occupy oneself with the sciences; 1) for these people are the least removed from the faith of all, have the best opinion of those others [the monks 2c.], are not presumptuous of themselves. If now the faith would arise again, no state would be to be despised, or even dangerous.

1) The words: autliferis tantummodo are missing in the Wittenberg; in the Jena they are in parenthesis with the note: Hæe nndita. snnt irr ellitions Lnkilisusi; but they are also found in the Weimar.

32. "After that 1) they hasten." This is also translated and interpreted in various ways. Some have: acclamaverunt, others: dotaverunt, Jerome: post tergum sequentium. I follow our Latin interpreter, so that the sense is: After 2) the wicked have put everything into it with unfortunate efforts, they finally attain nothing but only greater flight, terror and consternation of heart, as I have quoted from Isaiah [Cap. 44, 11.]: "All his comrades become ashamed." For he alone who trusts in the Lord will not flee (festinabit [Isa. 28, 16.]), but is as confident as a lion [Proverbs 28, 1.], and fears nothing that meets him, while the wicked flees and rushes at the sound of a flying leaf, as is said above, Ps. 1, 4. "The wicked are as chaff before the wind." So it is said Is. 30, 15-17.: "If you remained quiet, you would be helped; by being quiet and hoping you would be strong. But ye will not, saying, Nay; but on horses will we flee. (Therefore you will be fugitives.) And on runners we will ride. (Therefore your pursuers will overtake you.) For your thousand will flee from the rebuke of one, yea, from five will ye all flee, until ye remain, as a mast tree upon a mountain, and as a banner upon a hill."

(33) Such haste, fear and terror is just the evil conscience, which always flees and never escapes, always fears and always encounters what it fears, is never calm, because the wicked have no peace (Is. 48, 22.). Therefore he says quite rightly that in order to obtain peace of conscience they multiply their idols, and yet after all this have increased nothing but their haste (accelerationem), or rather, their flight and hurried terror.

34 [Vulgate:] "I want their heaps, the (non congregabo - not to accept as a congregation). Here Christ clearly puts an end to the countless questions about his church, of which some have invented that it is a church of power (virtualem), others that it is a church of representation (repraesentativam), 3) others have brought up something else. Christ says: He does not gather those who are of the blood, as John 1:13 says: "Who are not born of the blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." The same doctrine (locum) Paul acts upon, as everywhere, so also in the Epistle to the Romans [Cap. 9, 6. ff.] and in the Epistle to the Galatians [Cap. 4, 21. ff.] quite explicitly (ex professo) and quite gloriously, where he proves that not all who are children of Israel according to the flesh, but only the children born by promise, and the children of the free woman, Sarah, not those of the handmaid, Hagar, are the seed of Abraham, so that he takes away from the church of Christ all respect of person, and, as he says elsewhere (Gal. 3, 28.) says, in Christ is neither male nor female, neither Jew nor Greek, neither free nor bond, so also neither Roman nor German, but [Gal. 3, 9.], "They that are of faith are blessed with believing Abraham."

Therefore, Roman godlessness, which dreams its lies about the Church, must be detested, since the Church cannot be anything else than a spiritual gathering of people, not to any one place, but to the same faith, hope and love of the Spirit. But not satisfied with this, it (Roman godlessness) binds the church to one place, namely to Rome, and does not let anyone be a Christian who is not a Roman one, by directing its lie with impudent outrage against the article of faith.

For we believe that the holy universal (catholicam) Church is the communion of the saints. We do not say: the communion of the Roman or any other place. Also Christ says Luc. 17, 20. f.: "The kingdom of God does not come with outward gestures. Nor will it be said: See here or there it is. For behold, the kingdom of God is within you." Likewise Matth. 24, 4. 5. 23.: "See to it that no one deceives you. For many shall come under my name, saying, I am Christ; and shall deceive many. If then any shall say, Behold, here is Christ, or there, believe it not." Against such revealed words these wicked dare to say, Behold, to Rome is the church, to Rome is Christ, to Rome is the governor of Christ.

37. Since this time of which Christ spoke is now present, and the raging of Roman godlessness so obviously resists the Gospel, neither recognizing itself nor allowing others to recognize what the church is, we must arm our minds with the word of God by firmly believing and knowing with the utmost certainty, that the Church of Christ is nothing other than a spiritual assembly of believers, wherever they may be in the world, and that everything that belongs to flesh and blood, that is, everything that concerns the appearance of the person, the place, the time and the things that flesh and blood can use, does not belong to the Church of God.

Therefore, we must be careful not to howl with the wolves and romanize with the Romans by blaspheming as heretics those who are not in the assembly of the Roman church or rather the Roman court. For since Christ and the apostles Peter and Paul saw that their bodies and names must necessarily be on earth in a certain place, and that this necessity would give rise to this superstition and godlessness, that they would bind the church to these places, and thus draw the church from the spiritual assembly to a temporal one, they have forestalled this and have diligently warned us. Moreover, in order that they might not turn to Christ Himself as their protector for this very ungodliness, He took care, according to His unsearchable counsel, that Jerusalem should be destroyed and trodden down by the Gentiles. If this had not happened, no one could have prevented them from making the place at Jerusalem, which had been favored with such a great appearance and name, the head of the church.

39 Since this was prevented, this evil was started in Rome under the title of St. Peter and St. Paul, by twisting the words of Christ: "You are Peter" and "Feed my sheep" with great pretense. But even here Christ resisted mightily, for he never allowed the whole world to be subject to the Roman Pontiff, which should have happened if this supremacy (primatus) existed according to divine right, because no one can resist the divine word and promise. And yet, since it stands thus, we do not open our eyes that we should see the deceits (figmenta) of Satan. Therefore Peter proclaimed these deceits even beautifully before, 2 Pet. 2, 1. 3.: "There shall be false teachers (pseudomagistri, he almost said magistri nostri eximii) among you, who by avarice shall deal in you with fictitious words." For how can there be a greater invention than to say that "the rock" [Matth. 16, 18.] means the governmental power of Peter, and "pasture" [Joh. 21, 15. ff.] means the sole rule of the pope? Or what is the purpose of this autocracy other than avarice, which is used for its manipulation of us?

40 Therefore, in order that I may save my conscience and not be called to account at the hour of my death and in the last judgment for ungodly silence, I confirm and confess by this writing before all who read and hear it, and before heaven and earth, the articles which I have undertaken to defend at Leipzig as evangelical and supremely Christian: The general (universalis) church is the entirety (universitas) of the elect (praedestinatorum), and the articles which follow therefrom. And I say and testify that they have been ungodly condemned, and the Concilium of Costnitz, as far as this piece is concerned, has been a wretched Concilium (conciliabulum) of Satan, since it has condemned them. I condemn, put in prison, shun and abhor all who have been present at this concilio and have given or still give their consent, be it the pope, or bishops, or kings, or any who will do so in the future, so that I will not be stained with innocent blood.

I further testify that if John Hus and Jerome of Prague were burned for no other reason than because of these articles, they were wronged, and that the pope and his followers were and are the most cruel and godless murderers, enemies of Christ and his church. All who read this shall be witnesses for this faith and confession of mine. At Leipzig, I truly did not yet know the meaning of these articles, whose words, as I saw, were exceedingly Christian. Thus, at that time, I could not refute the meaning that the flatterer of the pope gave them. But now, since the book of John Hus [de ecclesia]¹

) is available, I see from what precedes and follows, that also the sense of the same is exceedingly Christian. What is the pope, what is the world, what is the prince of the world, that I should deny for his sake the truth of the Gospel, for which Christ died? Let it happen to me as it may, I will always hold on to this opinion, if God is merciful to me.

But let us return to our psalm. Christ first speaks against the presumption of the Jews and completely destroys everything they trusted in. They trusted in three things: first of all, that they were the seed of Abraham and of the flower of the patriarchs; therefore they alone wanted to be the people of God. But just this (he says), which you cite as a proof for yourselves, I turn against you, that just by this you are not my people, by which you test yourselves to be my people. Until me, you were my people according to the outward assembly (synagoga), but now that the promise and the law have been fulfilled, my people are not of the blood but of the spirit.

43 Secondly, they trusted that they would be many. For it did not seem credible to them that the whole nation or such a large

The part of it should be left. For the Hebrew expression in this passage, as Reuchlin testifies, means a great multitude of gathered people, as also Ps. 42:5: "For I would gladly go with the multitude," that is, I would go with a great multitude of gathered people, as if to say: I would gladly abide in the fellowship of the saints. So also here: I do not want to gather those who gather together in a great number, as if they wanted to be considered worthy of being excluded because of their multitude. But not so, ye wicked! For the destruction, and that the destruction be controlled, the Lord will do (and, as Isaiah Cap. 10, 22. says²), in such a way that "though your people, O Israel, be as the sand of the sea, yet the rest of them shall be converted. Against this reason of proof, which is taken from the multitude, and on which they rely no less stubbornly than on the reason of the lineage and the flowering, many things are said everywhere in the other prophets. For they boasted: Peace, peace, and God could not be angry with such a great multitude, and what such a great multitude held and believed could not be false. That is it that he says, "I will not gather their multitudes," I will not accept them, should they become as much as the sand of the sea.

44. the third thing [in which they trusted] was the glory and the name of righteousness and the worship of God (religionis), because of which they boasted especially one against the other as the people of God, since they alone had received the law and trusted in it, what God had spoken, as Paul says Rom. 3, 2. and Ps. 147, 19. 20.: "He shows Jacob his word, Israel his customs and rights. So he does not do to a Gentile, nor does he let them know his rights." With what vehemence Paul fights this their trust is shown before others by his letters to the Romans and to the Galatians. And they trusted in this piece more than in the

2) ait is found only in the Erlangen and Weimar editions. In all other editions available to us, the parenthesis is missing and a new sentence is started with "L!", because they did not recognize that the preceding words are also taken from Isaiah, Cap. 10, 23 [Vulgch.

The first two, how even though they believed that they deserved the wrath of God because of their sins, even though they were Israelites and a great multitude of them, they could never abandon their trust in their righteousness. This confidence is the most stubborn, and against the same he says: "I will not carry their name in my mouth", rather I will blot out their names; they shall not be considered my people because they are called righteous, wise, God-fearing (religiosi), great, or with any other noble] names, but these shall be my people, born of me through the spirit of faith.

45 Now see if the same extremely frightening judgment is not passed in the church before our general public. Have we not also set up these three supports for our exceedingly hopeful confidence? First of all, they boast of [apostolic] succession and, as it were, of the apostolic lineage, and from the bloom and this empty splendor they want to be taken for the people of God, while they are without faith and spirit, and say: The pope is the head of the church. But they call this bunch of flowered people the church, and everything that is due to the apostles, they presume as if it were also due to them.

46 Then, with how full cheeks they raise the great multitude that is on their side, as if they had the right opinion because they held the same with many, as if Christ had not foretold [Matt. 24:5], "And shall deceive many," and Peter s2. Ep. 2, 2.]: "Many shall follow their destruction," indicating without doubt that few remain who are not deceived. But this reason of proof does not receive the pope less powerfully nowadays than the first, however much they always act without faith and spirit.

The third reason is the most powerful one, superstition, which they have established with laws and ceremonies in such a way that, although they are exceedingly godless, they nevertheless sell their righteousnesses and merits, as if they alone were Christians, to the others for all the good (substantia) of the world, because here too they rule only by name, without anything behind it (sine ulla re).

But Christ does not take their names in his mouth, nor do his own. He does not teach these their righteousnesses and ceremonies, yes, he condemns them and contends against them, so that he may establish the righteousness that is valid before God (which we [wrongly] offer to God by works of the law and in proud confidence), so that the word may stand [v. 2. Vulg.]: "You do not need my good" [§ 11], nor have we done anything good to you, but you to us. And this is Christ's pleasure in His saints, that they should be and act in this way, rejecting all others with their idols and their glory.

(48) So we see that this is the purpose (scopum) of this psalm [to show] that Christ, since it is proclaimed of Him beforehand that He will be a great King and Lord in a great and glorious people, begins to reign, which could not have occurred to any man. For other kings are born to reign, but this one dies to reign; to others also are born the nations over which they are to reign; so that this is a marvelous kingdom, which has its existence not from the bloom and dignity of a race, nor from the multitude and power of the world, nor from its own righteousness and strength, nor from any thing that is seen in the world, but from the Spirit before the face of God. Thus it is said in Ps. 22, 30. f.: "He will not let his soul live. A seed shall serve him; of the LORD shall they proclaim unto babes." 1) And Isa. 53, 10. 12.: "When he hath given his life for a trespass offering, he shall have seed, and shall live to the length of the days, and I will give him great multitude for a prey." So it is also said in Isa. 11, 10.: "His rest shall be glory."

In all these passages the death and resurrection of Christ is described, as also in this whole psalm. For reason does not understand that the honor of the reign (regni) should be given to him who died and rests in the grave, and that the new generation is the seed that serves him who gives up his life and does not give up his soul.

1) Thus, in the first translation of the Psalms in this volume, Luther translates this verse according to the Hebrew (cf. Lrl. 6X6A. opp. tönn. XV, p. 356 and 360), not, as Greifs says, according to the Latin Bible.

and that he who gives his life as a guilt offering shall see such a seed living forever. For who can say to a dying man, Behold, thou shalt be king, and the nations shall be thy subjects for ever? A king who is born is certainly wished for, so he had to rise again from the dead, so that this scripture would be fulfilled.

50. so also here; since he asks as a dying man to be preserved, and commands his soul into the hand of the Father, he nevertheless says that he has his pleasure in the saints, and that his inheritance will not consist of those of the blood, but of the glorious ones, as will be said, by apparently teaching by these wonderful words that he will rise again; for as a dead man he could not reign, and yet as a dying man he says that he reigns. Therefore Paul rightly writes to Timothy [2 Ep. 2, 8.] that he should have in remembrance that the Lord JESUS has risen, adding [1 Cor. 15, 4: "according to the Scriptures, 1) as we also sing in the Nicene Creed, namely, because it is most contrary to the mind of all men that one who has died should attain a kingdom, and it is necessary that we base ourselves on these Scriptural passages. Now if the Spirit had not interpreted them, who would have understood them? Who would have read in these verses that Christ will rise again? Or how many are there today who understand this passage in this sense?

v. 5. But the Lord is my goods and my portion; you receive my inheritance. 2)

Jerome translates the last part thus: Tu possessor sortis meae [you are the owner of my inheritance]. The pronoun mihi is too much. But this verse is taken from the Law of Moses, where it is written that the Levites and the priests have no inheritance among the children of Israel, but "the LORD" (Deut. 10:9, Deut. 18),

20. f.] is their inheritance." According to this it is also said here: The Lord is my inheritance, and I believe that from this example, that the land was divided among the children of Israel, but the same was denied to the priests, the prophet, out of enlightenment of the spirit, drew the psalm in this place, namely, that the inheritance of Christ would not be an inheritance common among men, nor such an inheritance as was received by blood and by earthly things, just as the Levites had no inheritance among the children of Israel.

(52) But I believe that this is a Hebrew way of speaking, hereditatis instead of pars hereditaria, or a part that must be allotted to me. For many understand by the inheritance the church, of which it is certain that the Lord is its part. But it seems to me that Christ speaks for his person of the inheritance that falls to him. This is confirmed by the following: Et calicis mei [and my cup]. For we have said in the 11th Psalm [§ 50 ff.] that "cup" according to the use of Scripture means the measure which is appointed to each one by God, and which must be given to him according to his merits, and "to drink the cup" is to suffer, or to receive this appointed measure. And here is also a Hebrew expression: Dominus pars calicis mei (the Lord is the part of my cup) instead of: The Lord is my cup, or that which is appointed to be given to me, so that I receive nothing else as recompense but the Lord Himself.

(53) It is therefore a marvelous thing that a dying man should boast that he has the inheritance, which is the Lord Himself, again indicating that he must be raised from the dead in order to receive this promised inheritance. But what should he not have who has the Lord above all things himself? But who has the Lord above all things? He who has nothing else and seeks nothing but what is God's, even through death and all evil. Thus it happens that he finds everything, while he loses everything; while he chooses no inheritance, everything falls to him of its own accord.

54. Therefore he surely says [Vulg.], "It is you who restore my inheritance to me." Better according to the Hebrew, "You receive my inheritance," for he does not speak of the re-

1) At the quoted place in the Epistle to Timothy is added: "according to my gospel".

2) Vulgate: vominus pars bsreätLiis rnsas st ealieis mei. TU ss, Hui restitnes üei-ediUUsm msani Midi.

but from the onset, as if he wanted to say: It is mine to do and suffer all things, to lose and forsake all things, that I may obey thee. You will, without me caring for it, preserve and fortify what is to be my possession. I do not seek it, and am satisfied that you are my heir and my portion. When I have that, my inheritance is well established and made secure.

Thus we see how Christ does not presume anything and how he is not at all concerned about himself; he only desires to obey God the Father and confidently relies on everything else being well taken care of. And we miserable people, how great a noise we make nowadays because of the [episcopal] parishes and spiritual (ecclesiastic) dominions, in which we are only foreign servants, as if in our hands lay the salvation and the ruin of the church. Why do the Romans not entrust the cause of their servile primacy to God with the same confidence, since Christ, the heir and Lord of all things, nevertheless entrusts his cause to the Father and does not worry about it?

V. 6: The lot (funes) has fallen to me in a lovely way, a beautiful inheritance has become mine.

56 He sticks to the custom of the Scriptures, according to which funes or funiculi are called the measures, divisions or boundaries according to which the inheritance of the land is distributed, as Ps. 78, 55 [Vulg.]: "And by lot he divided unto them the land with the measuring cord (in funiculo distributionis), and Ps. 105, 11. [Vulg.]: "And said, Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, the cord (funiculum) of your inheritance." Hence Jerome translated, "The cord (lineae) is fallen to me most beautifully, for the most glorious inheritance is mine." Deut. 32:8, 9: "He set the bounds of the nations according to the number of the children of Israel. For the LORD's portion is his people, Jacob is the cord of his inheritance."

57 He treats this here in a spiritual way, as if he wanted to say: Just as there the

The cord fell no further than where the number of the children of Israel was, and where the number of the children of Israel ceased, the borders of the nations began, from which he chose no one, but his part and cord was this people: so also now I will not suppose any yeast of men from the flower, but as there I made a bodily separation of the bounds of my people from the Gentiles, so now I have set much more spiritual bounds of the nations according to the number of spiritual children, so that whithersoever in all the world my faithful cease, as the nations of unbelievers begin, even according to the spirit they may not mingle with one another, though they may mingle according to the body.

58. But faith is this border or cord which distributes the inheritance, because it forms the border for the number of believers. Everything outside of it are the borders of the nations, and these are called Mal. 1, 4. "the damned border" (termini impietatis). For "he that believeth shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned" [Marc. 16, 16.]. Thus we see that nothing can be called a church but the church that believes. Therefore the Roman popes with their church are in truth idols and deceptions of godless men. For they strive to break this measuring cord (funes) and to extend it wherever they want, namely also to that which is not lovely, yes, to the utter darkness. But in vain. For he does not say, "The lot is extended," but, "It is fallen"; you will not be able to extend it, but it must fall from heaven.

So he describes the inheritance, which the Lord has determined for him, instead of those who are of the flower. He says [v. 4. Vulg.], "I will not gather those of the flower." Which ones? The glorious, the beautiful, the pleasant, the lovely. Which are they? They have no name nor great renown (personam), they are not Jews nor Gentiles, not Romans, not Babylonians, they are not here or there, but are in spirit, by faith pure, beautiful, lovely before me. For the Hebrew expression in praeclearis actually denotes the lovely and pleasant, so that they are the pleasing

1) In all editions: prassmunt, for which probably praesarueus, or praksuruit, should be read. After that we have translated. - The Weimar one has assumed praesamit in the addenda.

Christ to His believers, in turn, also expresses the abomination He has for unbelievers and those who boast of their flesh and blood.

60 Again, as I said, the resurrection is witnessed because he says, "me." What "me?" Do you not say [v. 1.], "Preserve me, GOD"? It is so, I die in truth, but I shall rise again, and an exceeding lovely inheritance shall be given me. He says funes in the plural, because the whole church, although it is one, is scattered throughout the world because of the ministry of the word and baptism, since one cannot minister to all, so that the individual funes are the individual churches in which the same Christ, the same baptism, the same word is.

61 [The lot] "is fallen," because not by human agency and work, but by the power of God's grace are the faithful of Christ multiplied, and for us all who are converted are by accident, and people of whom we could not foresee it, as it is said Isa. 49:21: "Thou shalt say in thine heart, Who begat me these? I am barren, single. Who brought up these for me?" For so Christ also shows here that he received everything from the Father without his care, and that, as it were, by lot this inheritance fell most sweetly to him.

(62) Also this is not without emphasis, that he says: "It is pleasing to me" and: "beautiful to me" or "beautiful with me", namely everything against the pretence (larvam) of those who measure the church according to the outward appearance, and bind it to places and describe it according to the temporal boundaries of the parishes. For we say nowadays in another way that one church is greater than another, according to the earthly space and the number of people, while in truth it can be either great, or beautiful, or strong, by faith, hope, and love alone; indeed, because it is lovely and beautiful in the eyes of Christ (as he says here), it is understood by the contrast that it is bitter and shapeless before the world and itself, as it says [in Song of Songs Cap. 1, 5. 6.]: "I am black, but altogether lovely. Do not look at me that I am so black, for the sun has burned me like this," that is, Christ.

has subjected me to the cross and to misfortune, and so I am outwardly black, inwardly beautiful. For the one who wants to please Christ must be displeased with himself, he must appear unattractive (obscurum), if he wants to be glorious before Christ. For he who pleases himself belongs to the heap of the flower and the flesh.

(63) Why then do we presume to be great in the world and according to the flesh, one bishop above another, one church above another, since Christ here does not call the church good according to what can have prestige in the eyes of men, but according to what he himself sees, that is, in faith, which humbles and crucifies it among all? But we want to let it go. Our church regiment (hierarchia) has the name of a holy supremacy (principatus), therefore it falls under the word [v. 4.ft "I will not have their names in my mouth." They are works of men, therefore they please men.

V. 7. I praise the Lord who has counseled me; my kidneys also discipline me at night. 1)

Jerome and the Hebrew text have thus: I will praise the Lord, who has given me counsel; even by night my kidneys have instructed me. Here certainly a great and difficult work is indicated, namely to be a counselor, that is, who in death and suffering, when he is frightened on all sides and stands in terror, knows what he should do and where he should flee. For those who are without this counsel flee, but they do not escape. Therefore the prophet Isa. 11, 2. puts counsel and strength together, saying, "Upon him shall rest the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and strength, the spirit of knowledge and fear of the LORD." For if a man be not rich in counsel, there can be no strength in death.

Therefore, not only is it God's gift to suffer misfortune and death, but also to know how to bear them and from where to seek help, as it says in Wis 8:21: "When I learned that I had no other choice could be chaste, if God would give it to me (and that same was also prudence, recognizing that such grace is)."

What then was the counsel that was given to Christ? Without a doubt, that he did not flee in death, did not go behind himself, but said, "Protect me, God," and commanded his whole cause to God. For this is how we are wont to boast in exuberant joy when we are saved from danger, not both because we are saved, but because we behaved in such a way that we could be saved. There is a lovely narrative of the dangers avoided, the accidents averted, the enemy's ambushes thwarted, and all the taking of the anxious care that had made us wise in the present danger. 1) So Christ also boasts that he did wisely in enduring adversity, and that in his divine office, that he did not answer the blasphemies [Isa. 52:13, 53:7], did not flee from death, and was not moved by any words or deeds. For it is sweet to remember that by which one has obtained help, as one knows.

(67) One finds people who, when they are healthy, can give good advice to the sick, and as long as there is no danger for them, they know everything in the best way and can teach everyone; but when the floods rise up to heaven and fall down again into the depths, their soul despairs in misfortune, they fall into fear and stagger like drunkards, and all their wisdom falls away, as it says in the 107th Psalm, v. 26 f., so that no one is more in need of advice than these masters in counsel.

(68) Therefore, the divine mercy shines forth excellently and gloriously here, which is near in the time of such great need, and enlightens a frightened, helpless and poor heart with the counsel for which it asked above, when it said, "Keep me, God. For by this counsel the soul is preserved in the midst of the shadow of death. But

He will also say in the following verse what kind of advice this was.

69 From this it can be seen how our translation can be drawn to the same meaning, so that intellectus is the very counsel by which he knows what he should do and not do in the midst of adversity, so that he does not offend God, but by which he can rejoice, exult, and praise the Lord for being saved.

70 But what is this: "My kidneys also chastise me at night"? What are the kidneys of Christ that either mend (emendant) him, as Augustine reads, or rebuke (increpant) him, as our Latin translator gives it, or chasten (erudiunt) him, as Jerome and the Hebrew text have it? It is nothing else than what the apostle Hebr. 5, 8. f. wants: "He has learned obedience from what he suffered. And being made perfect, he became to all them that obey him a cause of eternal blessedness," and the word Matt. 26:41: "The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak." For although he was full of counsel, he nevertheless felt the weakness of our nature, which resists this counsel. Through this struggle he learned from experience to be obedient, just as we are instructed all the more the more we are attacked by temptations, if we can suffer them wisely and willingly (consulte), as then what seemed to work against the willing spirit of counsel, where one has carried away the victory, is found to be of such a nature that it only stimulated it the more and made it more lively, as Paul boasts 2 Cor. 12, 10. 9. "When I am weak, I am strong. For [Vulg. strength becomes strong in weakness." And Ps. 68:10, [Vulg.] "Your heritage has become weak, but you have made it strong."

Thus the kidneys of Christ, though holy and undefiled, yet, being also weak, were afraid of suffering and death, since the weak nature rather desires to live and to have good days, yet through this fear the council drove him to be all the more watchful and careful in that which was of God. It has been said above in the 7th Psalm [§ 69] that the kidneys have the pleasures or the capacity

1) In the original of the Erlanger, in the Weimarschen, in the Baseler and in the Wittenberger Ksorsrat, what the Jenaer and the Erlanger changed (not well) in Ksersrant.

The spirit of the Lord means to lust (vim concupiscibilem), which hates everything that grieves (tristitias), loves pleasures and tranquility, which causes suffering and death to be hard and bitter in all men, including Christ; this must be overcome by the spirit of counsel and strength.

He expressly adds: "at night" (noctibus), which is better than "until night" (usque ad noctem) in our Latin translation. Although the night could be taken figuratively for repulsiveness, - for the kidneys or the faculty of desire (vis concupiscibilis) do not chastise when there is no repulsiveness, because then it [the faculty of desire] neither penetrates nor is penetrated, so that it is proper for it to discipline and awaken the spirit in temptations, - so here we simply assume, without figurative speech, the time of the night, which is suitable for fear and terror and all the secret workings of God, so that in this way the time also corresponds to the work.

73 Thus we read in Gen. 15, 12, that after the sun had set, darkness and great terror overtook Abraham, and Cap. 32, 24, that Jacob wrestled most fiercely with the angel until the dawn broke. So it is also said in the following Psalm [Ps. 17:3], "Thou provest my heart, and visitest it by night." For just as the night is the best time to pray, as we read of Christ that he often prayed at night, so also to ponder and suffer all that God sends us (omnia divina). So also Christ began to tremble at the coming of night [Matth. 26, 37]. Thus it is said, Job 4, 13. f.: "When I contemplated visions in the night, when sleep falls on the people, fear and trembling came upon me, and all my bones trembled" 2c.

In the Scriptures we read many such things. For since at night man is free from business and everything is quiet, night makes man most fit for those divine effects, that is, for inward sufferings, such as the fear and terror of death, by which the spirit of man is violently chastened, if he is wise and lets it pass over him. Therefore, this is also a proverb in our prophet.

He speaks this without doubt as one who has learned this through much experience, as he says in the 91st Psalm, v. 5: "So that you do not have to be frightened by the horror of the night," by not expressing what this horror of the night is, because it is learned only through experience. If you want to know more about these nights in a figurative sense, read Tauler's sermons.

V. 8. I have the Lord always before my eyes, for he is at my right hand; therefore I will abide.

(75) Here he reveals the secret of his counsel, on account of which he praised the Lord, namely, that he has set the Lord alone before his eyes, but as one who is at his right hand, that he may not be made to waver, that is, as a gracious and merciful Lord.

This was indicated in the beginning of the Psalm: "Keep me, O God, for I trust in You," that is, what is so often said in the previous, that no one can endure suffering or death unless he uses this counsel and models the Lord on Himself in the most merciful way, as it is said in Wis 1:1. 1, 1 [Vulg.]: "Remember therefore the Lord, that he is good," and Ps. 3, 3 f.: "Many say of my soul, It has no help from God. But you, O LORD, are the shield for me, and the one who sets me in honor" 2c. And Ps. 26, 3: "For your goodness is before my eyes, and I walk in your truth."

For we have said that what hope is based on (objectum spei) is nothing other than the pure and undeserved goodness of God, which is promised freely by grace and is to be invoked by those who are not worthy of it; therefore, those are exceedingly wicked and devilish counselors who either press their sins hard upon those who are in suffering or dying, or present God to them, as it were, as a hard driver, by holding up satisfaction and good works. The Lord did not give them this advice, but Satan did, and therefore they come closer to despair and blasphemy than to praise and thanksgiving.

78. [Instead of: I'rvviäedain Ovminuni etc. in

The Vulgate has] the Hebrew text and Jerome: I have set the Lord always before my eyes [proponēbam etc.]. But this imagining of the Lord makes the heart brave, joyful, and willing to do all good works and to suffer all evil, and from this imagining, as is often said, the good life and the good work must begin. For what should he not do and dare with exceeding pleasure who has confidence that he pleases God, and that God is favorable and well-disposed toward him? What sin, no matter how lovely, should he not despise, since he bases himself in this trust in God? Truly, this faith does not and cannot do evil, just as it cannot be overcome by evil.

No one who has not experienced evil can believe that this confidence will move him away from evil and toward good. Therefore, in this verse the spirit paints for us the nature, the attitude and the work of faith directed toward God in the most beautiful way. For what does believing in God mean but to firmly imagine that the Lord is at his right hand so that he will not waver? And whoever persists in imagining this (in eo proposito), how can he not always live and work in the right way? What storm of misfortune could overthrow him? He is founded on a solid rock.

Therefore, the Hebrew text uses more emphatic words. First of all, "I have put", because "put" indicates a firmness and strong foundation, so that it shows that faith is a constant and exceedingly firm disposition of the heart, which does not waver or waver at any time.

Secondly: "The Lord", because faith is not directed to our works, not even to any creature, but only to God, therefore it is also called a theological virtue, because it has to do with divine mercy; but the evil conscience and godlessness has to do with one's own sin and free will.

Thirdly: "Before my eyes", by which he expresses the liveliness and vigilance of faith. For faith is not, as those who dream, a habit (habitus) that lies and snores in the soul below, but

The reason is that he is also the author and the origin of works, indeed, the first and the last in all good works and in the whole of life.

He adds "all the time" because there are two times. For at the time of peace faith does good, at the time of war it suffers evil; it is never idle, but always exceedingly busy. Thus we see how excellent a dialectician David is, who indicates faith in God in such an appropriate description (definitione). And what are all the Psalms but a kind of description of faith, hope and love? For all the Psalms are concerned with these movements of the heart, and they show that faith, hope and love are actually the very best and divine movements of the heart.

For he is on my right hand," that is, in secret, in spirit, he is present, while on my left hand, in what is before my eyes, in the flesh, my enemies persecute me. In the same way it is said in Ps. 20, 7: Et in potentatibus salus dexteræ ejus, that is, his right hand is mightily sustained, however weak his left may become. So also here Christ is left on the left in weakness, but he is received in power on his right. The Scripture uses the image of the right and the left for the inward and the outward man, as Christ says Matth. 6, 3. 4.: "But when you give alms, do not let your left hand know what your right hand is doing, so that your alms may be hidden," where he interprets himself by attributing that the alms are hidden to the right hand, that they are revealed to the left hand, of which perhaps more will be said elsewhere.

85. [Vulgate "So that I may not waver." He does not say, Lest I be touched, lest I be challenged, lest I feel it. For faith is a mighty movement of the heart, it wants to be exercised and cannot rest; neither is it left [in peace]; but it always remains victorious and cannot be made to waver nor fall. For this is our victory, our faith, as it says in 1 John 5:4, and Paul says that we are always led in triumph (triumphari) (that is, become victors) in Christ [1 Cor. 15:57].

V. 9. Therefore my heart rejoices, and my honor is glad, and my flesh shall lie secure.

This is what I have said, that this good trust of the heart in God is infallibly followed by joy of the heart and an exceedingly loving disposition toward God and all creatures. For in this way the Holy Spirit is poured into the heart of the believer, which in turn pours out and expands the heart of man to all willingness to do and suffer everything in vain, both before God and before men. Then he loves his enemies no less than his friends and gladly becomes the servant of all people, so that he can benefit all, since he has not only abandoned care for himself, but has also become a prodigal. Thus in the 4th Psalm, after he had said, v. 7: "Lift up the light of your countenance upon us," he immediately adds, v. 8: "You make my heart glad," by combining these two parts, faith and gladness of heart, as he also does here.

But this joy is soon followed by praising, praising, thanking and praising the divine mercy with the highest joy of the heart. Therefore, he does not simply say: My tongue will give thanks, but: "it will exult" (exultabit), that is, it will speak with exultation and delight (tripudians). This strong movement of joy (affectum) the Hebrew text still expresses by burying another word and emphatically thus: "My glory is joyful." We have [in Latin] lingua [tongue] instead of "honor," and it seems to me that David has this as a special thing before others, that he calls "his honor" the verbal and outward praise and boasting in which he not only glorifies GOD, but because of the deep feeling of this movement also boasts of this praise of GOD. For thus he speaks in the 106th Psalm, v. 47. [Vulg.]: "That we may give thanks to thy holy name, and boast in thy praise." And Ps. 30, 13: "That my glory may sing to thee, and not be silent.

I will. O Lord, my God, I will give thee thanks for ever and ever." And Ps. 108, 2. [Vulg.]: "I will sing and write poetry in my honor." And Ps. 57, 9. "Awake, my glory, awake, psalter and harp, early will I awake."

From all this it is clear that "my glory" is the same as my song, or my voice with which he praises and extols. Therefore, even in this Psalm, we must be careful not to think that Christ calls "his glory" his good rumor (fama); but rather the office of which he boasts in GOD, indeed, praises GOD boastfully and cheerfully; and I do not recall reading "my glory," used in this way, elsewhere in Scripture. Therefore, these are words of bursting joy and overflowing exceedingly strong emotion, which again experience teaches, not speech or pen.

Now the question may be raised whether all this was said in the person of Christ at the time of his suffering? For if this is admitted, it is evident that Christ rejoiced with the greatest gladness in the midst of suffering, as these words of the psalm prove. Many have raised questions about this, but I do not know if they have found it. But I believe that it is not necessary to refer it to the time of suffering, because the prophets do not keep the order of events as Christ performed them, nor do they sing everything in one place, and leave many things unsaid (in medio relinquunt). Nor is it necessary to perform the events in strict succession when a prophecy is given in the person of Christ or another. It is enough if the truth is told in all things, and the order is left to the execution of the events. Even the evangelists do not observe order everywhere.

90 It is a well-known rule for the understanding of Scripture, especially prophetic Scripture, that much is said in such a way that it is anticipated (per anticipationem), and other things are repeated. So also here. Since Christ confesses that he rejoices in the Father and glories and praises, he is silent about all his works and virtues, which he has accomplished in the Father.

He jumps over to the last ones as if he wanted to say: "I will not only praise and glorify, but for the sake of my works and virtues and my whole life, I will also gladly die: I will not merely praise and boast, but, to say nothing of my works and virtues and my whole life, I will also gladly die, and am certain in this very confidence that my dead flesh will indeed lie secure, but in the most certain hope and expectation of the resurrection.

The Hebrew verb "will lie down" [XXXX] is the same as the one in the previous Psalm [Ps. 15:1]: He will rest or "he will dwell on your holy mountain". Therefore Jerome translates here: My flesh shall dwell securely, and it denotes, as is said, a quiet and peaceful dwelling, as if he spoke the word Ps. 4, 9. "I lie down and sleep altogether with peace." In another sense it also denotes buried, Ps. 7, 6. "And lay my honor in the dust," that is, bury, so that it might also be so translated, or yet at least understood: My flesh shall be buried in hope. But Peter introduces Apost. 2, 25. f. this verse not according to the Hebrew, but according to the Septuagint, using neither the word "bury" nor "my honor"; but neither translation affects the sense.

Therefore this is a new prophecy of a thing of which no one has heard before. For this Christ alone is the cause of the general punishment that has been decreed for the whole human race, Genesis 3:19: "You shall be turned into dust. Nor does the Scripture speak of anyone else in this way, although we, in a godly way, assume the same of the Blessed Virgin and St. John. For the Scripture hands over all men to dust. He alone, in the new and truly golden, brings the exceedingly joyful message that his flesh shall not turn to dust, but shall die and dwell in peace.

Therefore, all the individual words are golden and should be considered carefully. "My flesh", in that he takes his flesh alone from the flesh of all men, none of which has remained or lain secure, but all the flesh of all men has turned to dust. There he indicates death, because his flesh, since the spirit was separated from it, had died in truth, like that of all other people. So it is a tremendous miracle that he dies in the same way, but yet does not decompose in the same way.

94. "And my flesh shall rest," that is, even though it will be buried like that of other men, it will have rest and peace, for it will not be touched by any rot or worms. No other flesh has this peace and rest.

95 [Vulgate:] "In hope." For it will not thus rest forever, but will expect to be awakened again and to live.

96) See how the prophet proclaimed in very proper words that Christ would rise from the dead, indicating that he had a very clear and complete knowledge of Christ, that he would die and rise from the dead, and the apostles rightly exalted this passage above others.

V.10. For you will not leave my soul in hell, nor will you allow your Holy One to decay.

97. He declares what he had said [Vulg.], "It [my flesh] will rest in hope." This is the hope, namely, that thou wilt not forsake me, nor suffer me to decay, that is, that thou wilt raise me up without doubt. And it pleased him to say, not: my spirit, but "my soul," Hebrew XXXX, because in Scripture the soul is wont to be taken for life, or for the soul, inasmuch as it quickeneth the body, and giveth it prosperity, that the spirit might show that Christ should truly be recalled again into bodily life.

98 "Your Holy One" in this place is n'yy, who is sanctified by the grace of the Spirit, and Christ is actually called the Holy One of God everywhere in Scripture, as is also the Christ of the Lord. And it is not easy to find any human being who is called a Holy One of God in the singular, or "your Holy One", except Christ alone, whom David also praises here alone.

99. I believe that the Hebrew expression is known: to see the decay instead of: to ver-.

just as seeing death means dying, not seeing death means not dying, as it is found in Lucas Cap. 2, 26. and John Cap. 8, 51. Perhaps the scripture uses this expression to indicate the divine power, before which everything lives and nothing perishes or decays, but before us we perish, and before us we die and decay.

The meaning is therefore quite obvious and abundantly and diligently explained by the apostles. But even here men, trusting in their wisdom, have begun to dispute whether Christ was in hell according to his soul or according to his substance, and what it is that he was in hell.

(101) A large part of them have presumed to contradict the spirit that Christ's soul was not in hell, but only according to its effect; these are, of course, very good interpreters of the word of God: "My soul," that is, the effect of my soul, "you will not leave in hell. He descended to hell," that is, he had an effect on hell.

But let us despise these frivolous and ungodly sayings, and let us understand the words of the prophet, which are plainly spoken, and if we cannot understand them, let us believe them faithfully. Augustine says: "The prestige of this scripture is greater than anything human cleverness can muster. For the soul of Christ has in truth, by its very nature, descended into hell. But what this descent was or is, I believe, is not yet sufficiently revealed, at least not to all.

103 Peter says Apost. 2:24 [Vulg.]: "Him hath God raised up, and dissolved the pains of hell," or, as the Greek text has it, "of death," by which he seems to indicate that Christ was delivered from the pains of death or hell in the resurrection. But I consider the pains of death and hell to be the same thing. For hell is the terror of death, that is, the sensation of death according to which the damned have a horror of death and yet cannot escape. For death, which is despised, is not felt and is, as it were, a sleep.

(104) We see that the Scriptures ascribe two kinds of death to the dead: the pit to the body and hell to the soul. But Peter does not say here that only hell or death is dissolved in Christ, but the pains of hell or death. For although it is believed that many saints have been without pain in the grave and in hell, who also died in peace, yet Christ, just as he died with the greatest pain, seems to have endured pain in hell after death, so that he might overcome all things for us.

(105) Meanwhile, I will stand by the words of Peter until I am taught otherwise, so that I believe that Christ, before all others, felt not only death, but also the pains of death or hell; that his flesh rested in hope, but that his soul tasted hell, and that is what he says here, "You will not leave my soul in hell."

But these negative expressions (negativae): "Thou wilt not let, neither wilt thou admit" 2c. are exceedingly strong affirmations (affirmativae) and testify to the resurrection more strongly than if he had said: "Thou wilt lead my soul out of hell, and wilt preserve thy saint, as [Luc. 10, 42.] in the passage: "Mary has mentioned the good part, it shall not be taken away from her", that is, it shall remain for her in the most certain way. So also here: "Thou wilt not leave," that is, thou wilt bring her out again as quickly as possible; and, "Thou wilt not allow thy saint to decay," that is, thou wilt hasten to bring me back to health and bodily life.

(107) For it seems to me that the spirit in these words speaks in a simple way and looks more at the time than at the place or any other circumstance, so that the meaning is: You will not leave me as long as the corpses decay according to the course of nature, but within the time when they begin to decay, you will raise me up. Otherwise, it might seem that this speech was said by someone who would be miraculously preserved in hell and in the grave until the day of judgment, although no man has been preserved in such a way.

at least not in the presence of Christ, of whom he speaks first. For although the bodies (as in Egypt) are anointed and preserved with myrrh, which serves against rotteness, yet the flesh is consumed and withered; whereas here it is said: "My flesh shall rest in hope."

V. 11. You make known to me the way to life; before you there is fullness of joy, and sweetness at your right hand forever. 1)

108 Jerome: Ostendis mihi semitam vitae, plenitudinem laetitiarum ante vultum tuum, decores in dextera tua aeternos, where it seems that by the one verbum ostendis the three accusatives are governed, one of which our Latin interpreter has changed into the verbum adimplebis, and the third into the nominative delectationes. But this does not affect the sense, for also Peter, Apost. 2, 28, follows our Latin translation.

But he describes the glory of the resurrection in three pieces: the immortal life, the inward joy, and the eternal sweetness. It is called "a way to life" because he goes from death to life, as if he said the word of the apostle Rom. 6, 9. "Christ, being raised from the dead, dieth not henceforth; death shall not have dominion over him." For Christ did not know beforehand the way to life from experience, since this way is nothing other than the way of death, or rather a course to death. But to rise again to immortal life, that is in truth to know the way to life. This alone is in the power and right hand of God, as he says here: "You make known to me the way to life", and Ps. 89, 49: "Where is there anyone who lives and does not see death? Who shall deliver his soul out of the hand of hell?" as if to say: No one. Thus Ps. 68, 21, is called the Lord: "the Lord who saves from death" and "the God who helps", because after death is swallowed up by victory, He leads out into eternal life, as He promised Hos. 13, 14. f.: "But I will deliver them out of hell, and save them from death. Death, I will be a poison to you, hell,

1) Vulgate: Notas mihi kooisti via8 vitae, a<1impledis mo laetitia eum vultu tuo, deleetationes in Ubxtsra toa U8HO8 in Liern.

I want to be a pestilence to you. But the consolation is hidden from my eyes. For it shall bring forth fruit between brethren. An east wind shall come; the LORD shall come up out of the wilderness, and shall dry up her fountain, and dry up her spring," that is, sin, which is the vein, the fountain, the sting, and the power of death 2c.

The internal joy, which Jerome understands not badly from the fullness of joy before the face of God, is that in which God is seen above all gods [Ps. 97:9] in Zion as He is, and face to face, where there is full satisfaction of our heart, so that it is rightly called emphatically a fullness of joys. For in this life "our knowledge is piecemeal, and our prophesying is piecemeal"; so also our joy is piecemeal, and all we have but piecemeal. "But when the perfect shall come, then shall the piecemeal cease," 1 Cor. 13:9, 10. There shall not be laughter mixed with sorrow, nor consolation with grief, as must necessarily happen in this life, so long as we walk, and are not at home with the Lord [2 Cor. 5:8], and see through a mirror in a dark word [1 Cor. 13:12].

111 Therefore we can call the joy of this life a joy in a dark word, but the joy of that life the joy of the face of GOD or the LORD. For so it is said in the Hebrew without the preposition cum [as in the Vulgate] and ante [as in Jerome]: the fullness of the joys of thy face, that we may know that the fullness of joys depends on the face and manifested glory of GOD, as he will say in the following Psalm [Ps. 17, 15. Vulg.]: "I shall be filled when thy glory shall appear." And Christ says John 14:21: "He that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him." This is the eternal joy, because it is the fullness of joys, while the joys that are allotted to the saints in this misery are but a few drops and a little taste that soon passes away; but the fullness that is revealed through the face of GOD is perfect and abides forever. For "this is eternal life, that

They will know that you alone are the true God and the one you sent, Jesus Christ," John 17:3.

112 "Lovely being at thy right hand forever," where Jerome [instead of jucunditates in finem in the Vulgate] has placed decores aeternos, seems to me to mean the other gifts of body and soul and all things, or, as our theologians call it, objectivas delectationes, the actual enjoyments which Christ has of his glory. For as on the left hand of God, that is, in this life, he has had tribulation in all things, so on the right hand, that is, in the life to come, he will have delight in all things. For he who is blessed in the sight of God is blessed in all things at once. Here is no sad sight, but everything is lovely, everything works with him, applauds him, is favorable to him, laughs at him, as Lactantius sings:

Ecce renascentis testatur gratia mundi, Omnia cum Domino dona redisse suo.

[See, the grace of the universe coming back to life is testified:

All the gifts of the Lord returned with Him now].

Here is the same expression in the feminine gender that was above [v. 6] in the masculine gender [Vulg.]: "My lot is fallen on the beautiful" or on the lovely, teaching in both places the lovely nature of Christ in the things that are apart from God (existentibus). In the Hebrew

The construction of the last expression which the Latin interpreter has rendered by in finem, Jerome by aeternos, is doubtful, so that it can be drawn to all three pieces, to "the way to life", to "joy the fullness", and "lovely being at the right hand of God", so that we can take each one as eternal; or to "lovely being" (jucunditates) alone, which Jerome calls an adornment (decores), perhaps because we are delighted and pleased by dainty and beautiful things. This will take place when our bodies, heaven and earth will be transformed into new creatures at the end of the world, where everything will be pleasant and lovely. In the meantime the creature waits, longs with us and is anxious until it too will be freed from the perishable nature and vanity, to the glorious freedom of the children of God, Rom. 8, 21. 22.

114. "The right of God" means (as we have said) the future life or the life before the face of God, which now begins by faith and must be completed by sight. Amen.

So we see how this psalm, above all others, preaches the resurrection and the glory of the resurrection so clearly that it has rightly been called XXXX, a golden jewel of David, who in this passage has displayed his knowledge of divine things so magnificently.

The seventeenth Psalm.

A prayer of David.

1. a new title, "a prayer of David", by which it is sufficiently indicated what this psalm is about, which, as it seems to me, is not unlike what is treated in the fifth psalm and many others. For it is a general complaint of the righteous people against the exceedingly harmful persecutors who kill the spirit, the hypocrites, with whom they have constant war, as it was between Esau and Jacob, for the righteousness and the word of the Truth. Therefore, from what has been said before, which has been dealt with many times, this psalm will also be easy to understand.

V. 1. Hear, O Lord, righteousness; hearken unto my cry; hear my prayer, which cometh not out of a false mouth.

2. the plea, repeated three times and doubled, indicates a great movement and many tears, because in fact the falsehood of the wicked hurts spiritual people more than their violence. For obvious violence can be recognized, and when the danger is recognized, it can be countered in some way; but falsehood brings destruction sooner than it can be recognized. Hence also Paul, 2 Cor. 11, 29, after holding said: "Who is weak, and I become not weak?" still greater against vexation, "Who is vexed, and I burn not?" He does not say, "I faint," but, "I burn," because it is a lesser thing to suffer with the weak, that is, to suffer with the suffering, than to burn for the sake of the vexed. And Apost. 20, 29. ff. he testifies that for three years he did not cease to admonish everyone with tears that they should beware of the abominable wolves who would come among them after his departure and speak perverse things. And Phil. 3, 18. f.: "For many walk, of whom I have often told you, but now I say also with weeping, the enemies of the cross of Christ; whose end is damnation, to whom the belly is their god."

If then the prophets and the apostles were inflamed and wept over the hypocrites of their time, when the Spirit was still more abundant in the church, what do we not have to fear? What tears can be sufficient for us in these depraved times, when there is such great certainty, when we think that the devils have either died or are asleep, although they reign with frightful tyranny, having taken the name of Christ and the saints on their side and boasting of it? But such times are even superfluously proclaimed before; but we are ignorant, and, like the Jews, ignorantly fulfill all that is foretold to us by the apostles, by the present ungodliness, but dream that this will be with others in the future. Woe to these last and exceedingly evil times!

4 The Hebrew text without the pronoun "my" [in the Vulgate] says par excellence: "Lord, hear the righteousness. In order to overcome the darkness of the Jews, who claim that David, by the sin of boasting of his righteousness here, deserved to fall into the sin of adultery afterwards, our theologians have also used this word.

so that they attributed this word to Christ alone. But it seems to me to be a more urgent request that he asks without further specification (absolute) that justice be heard than if he had said "his justice". For he shows in this verse almost in every single word on whom he had looked, and by what he had been moved to be so heated. For he looked at the multitude and greatness of the hypocrites, who alone presume, as they do all good works and righteousness, so also prayer and the mercy of God, although they do all this only in falsehood and only pretend. In this way, many weak people are deceived, so that the truth cannot be helped by any other means than prayer with tears, so that God may be awakened to hear, receive and defend righteousness, or that which is truly righteous, or the righteous cause, which is faith, the word and the works of faith, against the ungodly and harmful hypocrisy of those people. So it is a movement of godliness and love, in this way: Although I am unworthy, I who ask, yet the cause itself, since it is the cause of your word and faith, and in truth righteousness, is worthy that you do not let it be suppressed, for the seduction of the unhappy souls, whom those cruel wolves devour unceasingly with their fabricated words.

Some want to translate it like this: Hear, Lord of righteousness, like Ps. 4, 2: "Hear me, God of my righteousness", which I leave to the judgment of everyone. The Hebrew text is not against it, but I let myself be content with the former understanding. The other two words: "Heed my cry, hear my prayer," we want to understand just as in the fifth Psalm 17 ff]. understand. Then, what difference there is between "prayer" and "cry" has been sufficiently said in the sixth Psalm [v. 10].

6 "Not from the mouth of falsehood", or "from a false mouth". Obviously, he is here accusing the hypocrites, whose teachings and prayers he assigns to the false mouth. But it can be taken either as an assertion or as a wish, in this way: Hear us therefore, O Lord, for thou knowest our Heart, that there be no falsehood on our lips; as we pray with our mouth, so we mean it in our heart, and as we teach, so we live simple-mindedly; whereas with them there is nothing that is not pretended. Like this: Hear, O Lord, righteousness, and see to it that we too, like them, do not pray and teach with a false mouth. Thus we see here the zeal and hatred against hypocrisy, which the saints reject and accuse with such great abhorrence.

V. 2. Speak thou in my cause, and look thou to the right. 1)

(7) I believe that the iudicium in this passage is not the discernment or perspicacity of the mind, by which we decide on all things whether they are right or wrong (as some think), but the matter itself about which the opposing parties dispute, as Ps. 140:13: "I know that the Lord will execute the cause of the wretched and the right (iudicium) of the poor. And Job 23:7: "Lay it before me at once, and I will gain my right (iudicium)." And Cap. 31, 13: "Have I despised the right of my servant or my handmaid, when they have had a matter against me?" "This one is guilty of death" (iudicium mortis), "this one is not guilty of death," they said of Jeremiah, Cap. 26, 11, 16.

8 The meaning is this: My cause and my right (iudicium) is righteousness; I beg you, let it go forth from your face, for I know that what is condemned as evil and unrighteous in the eyes of men is righteous before you and in your eyes. Therefore, as it is in thy judgment before thy face, so let it be also before men, by revealing it. Let not the judgment of my cause remain as it is in the sight of men, when it is condemned; for, as Habakkuk 1:4 says, "Therefore it is not at all according to the law, neither can any right thing gain iudicium; for the wicked overrepresents the righteous, therefore perverted judgments go." These words must also be pray against the heretical judges and the tyrants in the church, from whom no judgment goes out for the truth, but only a condemnation judgment about it. For there is no other way to resist them than through prayer with lamentations and tears. I believe that this peculiar way of speaking (idiotismum) is sufficiently known, that the right goes out (egredi), that a speech goes out, a word goes out, a thing goes out 2c.

9. oculi tui videant aequitates, in Hebrew: rectitudines, or that which is right, of which above in the ninth Psalm 68 f.] is abundantly spoken of. For the prophet condemns the bloodthirsty hypocrites because of their wickedness, 3) that is, because in every matter they seek their own, therefore they condemn the cause of the righteous, since the same seeks that which is of God, that they may establish their wickednesses. For in this way the eyes of men look and notice wickedness (pravitatem). But since your eyes, O Lord, look only at what is right, show this also before all. This you will do when you defend my cause and suppress the cause of others. For as long as thou dost not do this, they will be hopeful without ceasing and boast that thine eyes look upon them and their wickedness as if it were righteousness, and that thou dost not respect and detest our righteousness as if it were wickedness.

(10) This verse has the same meaning as Habakkuk 1:13: "Thine eyes are pure, that thou canst not see evil, neither canst thou look on the affliction. Why then dost thou look upon the despisers, and hold thy peace, that the wicked devour him that is more pious than he?" Thus he again shows that it is something different when God is looked upon than when men look upon, and something different when judging according to the eyes of men than when judging according to the eyes of God.

2) In the original edition üaeretioos, which all editions have (as it seems to us, arbitrarily) changed into tieretmas.

3) It seems to us that Luther here by the expression: ü^pooritas suLKulnarios xravitatis leads a side blow against the inquisitores daereticae xravitutis, so that also well could be translated: So the prophet condemns the bloodthirsty hypocrites who persecute heresy.

(11) At the same time, as I have said, we must keep in mind that we should not rely on our strength or our wisdom. For no one has ever overcome a perverse man with words or with wisdom, nor has he ever defended the cause of faith by his own efforts, as has been proved in the case of all heretics, since neither the apostles, nor the prophets, nor even Christ himself could not overcome his hypocrites, since the wicked, even when they are overcome, do not want to be overcome. What should we wretched little worms presume to do against the antichrists, the strongest enemies of the church, if we leave our prayers and lamentations pending?

(12) I said above that our Latin interpreter liked to use the abstract "equity" (aequitatem) instead of "righteous being," while in concreto he translates not "an equitable one" but a righteous one (rectum). Equity seems to us to refer more to a moderation of the law than to the righteous being, which is the perfect fulfillment of the law.

V. 3. 4. You test my heart, and visit it by night, and purify me, and find nothing. I have determined that my mouth shall not transgress. I keep myself in the word of thy lips from the works of men, in the way of the murderer. 1)

The Hebrew text is not a little different [from the Vulgate], which Jerome translates thus: Probasti cor meum, visitasti nocte, conflasti me, non invenisti cogitationes meas transire os meum, in opera hominum propter verba labiorum tuorum ego observavi vias latronis. But what can be the meaning of this? Certainly Jerome has omitted the adverbium of negation before the verbum transire; nor does he observe the distinction which the verse has in Hebrew. However, although our [Latin] translation is not at all

If this translation is very much in its own sense, let us see if it is in harmony with the Hebrew. Not that I think it should be rejected for that reason, or that I want to blame the Church of God for using this translation for such a long time. For what harm is there in the church having a different opinion of words that are badly translated than the words actually give, if only the latter is godly, since many things are also translated in the best way, the understanding of which the church has not yet had and explained, such as the prophecies of Christ and the apostles about the last times. For who in the church understands them? And yet the words are translated in the most authentic way. Yes, who can doubt that the church has the actual understanding of this passage, even though she does not know that the same is indicated by this passage? The same is the case with many others. For what should she [the church] not have that has the mind of Christ? And yet it is not necessary for her to know every passage of the Spirit in Scripture.

(14) This is what I want to say against the disgruntled people who, if anything is found to be different from what has been generally accepted, immediately interpret it as blasphemy against the church. We praise the diligence of others, but we must believe that we, too, are called to cultivate a portion of the Lord's field, not merely to eat from it, since it is written in Deut. 26:10: "When the new things come, you shall put away the old things." They were not able to eat all of it; some of it has been left for us. Otherwise, if it is enough that they taught, why is it not enough that they lived a good life? If it is enough in the same words, why not also in the same works, so that, being satisfied both in their words and in their works, no one teaches and does anything else than St. Jerome taught and did?

But let us return to the Psalm, in which I translate these two verses literally like this: Thou hast tried my heart, thou hast visited it by night, thou hast purified me, thou shalt not find, my thoughts my mouth shall not transgress. On the works of the

1) Vulgate: Probasti cor et visitasti nocte, IMS in examinasti et non inventa in nie iniHuitas. It non loyatur os meum opera Uominum, propter verda tadorum tuorum ego custodivi vias uurus.

People, in the word of your lips, I have been mindful of the ways of the destroyer.

(15) First, let us deal with the first verse. He had asked that the Lord would judge the right and his cause, and look upon his righteousness; now he explains in what confidence he dares to ask thus. He says, Thou hast tried and tested me in many ways, that thou mightest know whether I am in an evil way, as he says in the 139th Psalm, v. 24, whether I sought mine own, as it is also said in the law of Moses, Ex. 16, 4, "That I might try the people, whether they walk in my law or not." And Deut. 8, 2: "The LORD led thee forty years in the wilderness, that he might humble thee, and try thee." Yet you have found nothing, but I have remained righteous in all things in your eyes, always seeking what is yours. Now this righteous being may thine eyes come to see, and judge my cause according to thy sight (conspectum), since they have never tried and examined that which is mine, and condemn and persecute it for no other cause than because they do not understand it, being blinded and captivated by their wickedness.

This abundance and accumulation in the prayer: "You test my heart, you visit it at night, you purify me," not only indicates temptations of various kinds, but also serves as emphasis and shows the greatness of the movement. It is as if someone who trusts in God in a clear conscience, who has been tested by long experience of temptations, and who in firm hope cannot now be put to shame, as the apostle Rom. 5, 3-5. but finally becomes discontented that his adversary stubbornly works against him, and irritated by the fact that he deceives very many, begins to confidently justify his cause before God against them and to say: "Behold, you know, Lord, that what I have said and done was right in your sight, and yet those wicked have such an abhorrence of it as if it were condemned, and deceive very many by their falsehoods. Jeremiah also experienced this in himself, saying, Cap. 17:16, 17: "Therefore, my shepherd, I did not flee from you, because I did not desire the days of the Lord, you know that.

I have preached, that is right in your sight. Be not thou terrible unto me, my confidence in adversity."

(17) But since everyone is going over this verse, we have to be somnariere here and bring our own opinion, until someone else will offer something better. The first part, "You test my heart," seems to me to refer to the temptations by which man is afflicted in himself, namely, lack of goods, grief and other damage to goods and body, and temporal danger. For here man is examined whether he trusts more in God than in gold or any other good of fortune.

The other part, "Thou visitest it by night," refers to the spiritual temptations by which man, in his sins, is afflicted by his conscience with the fear of death and the terror of hell, so that he may be tested as to whether he trusts more in his works, wisdom and counsel than in the mere mercy of God. For we have said in the previous Psalm that the night is the appropriate time for these temptations, with which God Himself actually visits and severely punishes us.

19. The third part: "You purify me", or you test me by fire, like gold, is supposed to be the outward persecution, where man is deprived of his good name by poisonous tongues, is sullied with the most shameful names and disgraces, just as Christ was counted among the evildoers on the cross and seemed worthy in the eyes of all that he should suffer the greatest of evils, so that he, well afflicted and tested on all sides, may attain hope that does not come to shame, in which he dares, trusting in God, to justify himself in the cause of the word and faith against the hopeful hypocrites, even though he is not hopeful because of righteousness and the perfect use of the word and faith. For the cause of faith is always just and right, however wicked or perfect he may be who practices it.

20. "You will not find." Here is the middle of the verse, where the interpreter has added "in me" from his own, and "iniquitas" from the second part of the verse; in a proper sense, but with a confused division. For this expression denotes both unrighteousness and a thought, counsel, or intention by which we undertake anything in the heart, as Ps. 10:2: "They devise wicked deceit." So it can be said that it is a speech in which something is omitted (ellipticam): "You will not find," namely, that I am on evil ways, as Ps. 139, 23. 24. says: "Search me, GOD, and know my heart; test me and know how I mean it. And see if I am in an evil way, and guide me in an everlasting way." For this is why he tests the heart, to see if it is evil; this, he says, is not found in him. But he says in the future tense: "You will find," by which he indicates that he was not only not found evil, but also intends to persevere in such a way that God will never find it. But in the following part, he completes what is omitted.

21. "My thoughts my mouth shall not transgress." I cannot even imagine why the interpreter, instead of saying: "my mouth shall not transgress," wanted to say: "that my mouth speak not," attaching to it from the beginning of the following verse: "the works of men." Though I do not remember to have read in Scripture this expression, that the mouth transgresseth the thoughts, yet I suppose that the sense is the same which is expressed in the first verse, "That goeth not out of a false mouth." For the mouth transgresses the thoughts or passes them by when it speaks more and further (ultra) than the heart thinks, so that heart and mouth do not remain the same, which is especially fitting for teachers who speak useless things and make many words and seduce souls. In order not to suffer the pain of the cross, they teach all kinds of things to please people, because they desire people's days and want to please people. It also applies to those who deny the truth out of fear of persecution or hope of gain. For among these are such people whose heart knows otherwise; yet their mouth transgresses these thoughts of the heart, that they may not suffer; a great

The part looks through the fingers and keeps silent, for the sake of this very fear or hope of gain. It is so necessary that a man either perish if he contradicts, or offend God if he does not contradict the statutes and works of men.

22 Jerome has escaped [the difficulty] quite nicely, so that one cannot know whether he intended the thoughts to pass the mouth, or the mouth to pass the thoughts, since he changes the indicative of the verb into the infinitive by saying: You have not found my thoughts passing my mouth, with confused division, as I have said, and with omission of the adverbial "not". But the verbum is the indicative of the future tense, in the singularis, "It will not pass," as well as, "Thou wilt not find," praising his perseverance in the same way. Our [Latin] translation can also have this sense, namely, that he was tested, and that unrighteousness was not found in him, that he spoke works of men, that is, that he could not have been brought by any temptations to leave the sorrow of the cross and the reproach of Christ, and to teach works of men, and by this unrighteousness to please men. "For if we were still pleasing men, we would not be Christ's servants," Gal. 1:10. Therefore he asks that righteousness be heard and that righteousness be looked upon.

23. "The thoughts" is the same word as Ps. 10, 2.: "They devise wicked wiles", which we usually call premeditation or plots, like Deut. 19, 19.: "As he thought to do to his brother." And it is 1) a very shrewd and fine saying, "The mouth passes by the thoughts," "when the mouth washes more than the heart knows," or, It passes by, that is, it despises; for it is a very special wickedness and perverseness (pravitatis malum) to despise the good thoughts of one's own heart for fear of the words and works of men. Now follows the other verse.

1) Erlanger: et statt est.

24. "On the works of men, in the word of thy lips, I have been mindful of the ways of the destroyer." The expression XXXX, which our Latin interpreter duras, Hieronymus latronis, translated, comes from the verb XXX, which means to destroy, to divide, to tear, therefore Reuchlin writes that instead of duras it should have been said dirutas. Now this ungodly ripper is a teacher who teaches works of men, by which the soul is more corrupted, destroyed, and divided in infinite manifold ways, as it is said of them Isa. 28:10: "Give here, give here; wait here, wait there; here a little, there a little." And Paul says [Eph. 4, 14.], "Lest we be weighed and swayed with all manner of wind of doctrine." And Heb. 13:9: "Be not carried about with divers and strange doctrines: for it is a precious thing that the heart should be established; which is by grace, and not by meat, whereof they that handle it profit not." Dear, what is this but to be divided and divided into innumerable parts, when we leave the unity of faith, and are given over to works of men, sometimes to this, sometimes to that, sometimes again to another, and so on without end.

(25) Here belong the ceremonies of our time and the statutes, customs, places, festivals, pageants, sects, prayers, and such innumerable things as the sands of the sea, so that if we ourselves had to invent a name by which to call these teachers, we could not invent one more suitable than tornado, murderer, highwayman, who despise the public highway and wander about in their ways. They are in truth rippers, or, as Christ and Paul say, ravening wolves, who tear us from the faith in Christ and tear us into so many sects that no one can count them.

(26) So the meaning is: Against the works of men, which they pretend are taught by the word of your lips, although nothing less is taught by them, I have behaved in such a way that I was careful not to walk in the ways of these ravening robbers. And here, great attention is truly needed, because if the words of God are twisted to this, it is not at all possible.

It happens easily that one agrees to this tearing apart and this robbery. Isaiah also explains this beautifully and abundantly when he says: "Therefore the word of the Lord (see, the word of the Lord Himself) shall be to them: Give hither, give hither; give hither, give hither; wait hither, wait hither; wait hither, wait hither; here a little, there a little; that they may go, and fall back, broken, entangled, and captive." And 2 Pet. 2, 2. f.: "By covetousness with fancied words shall false teachers work upon you, by whom shall the way of truth be blasphemed."

27 For even today the word of Christ, "He who hears you hears me," which he said of the word of the Gospel, has been used to fortify the whole shrine that is in the heart of the Roman Pontiff. Likewise the word Matth. 23, 3.: "All things whatsoever they say unto you, do", which is said of the law of the Lord, has likewise been twisted so that they may destroy the church by the laws of men, as they please. But above all, this most salutary word [Matth. 16, 19.]: "I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven" 2c., has been made a protection for this tyranny of the laws. So now the keys of the kingdom of heaven are the power to make many laws. Thus, since no one pays attention to the ways of the ravening wolf and the ripper, we have all been most miserably drawn into and entangled in works of men, as if they were commanded by the word of the lips of God.

28 Here there is a Hebrew idiom and an omission, since the relative and some verb is omitted, which we complete thus: To works of men, which they teach in the word of thy lips, as if he would say: I have seen that, while they lead us to works of men, which they lie that they are commanded in thy words, they draw us into the ways wherein they would exercise their rapacity against us. But he beautifully punishes their lying fiction, because he does not merely say, your word, but: "the word of your lips" is drawn to works of men. For in truth, since they are without right judgment, they do not take the meaning, but only the sound of the words, as it were, from the lips, and puff the same to their inclinations, as they please, as can be seen in the law and theology faculties, which award certificates of qualification and honorary titles (qualificatrice et graduatrice).

29. our [Latin] translation can give this sense, in this way: "Because of the words of your lips I have been careful not to follow hard ways", as if he wanted to say: I was the more careful not to follow their ways, because they made use of the words of your lips to make them firm, and thus handled me with fictitious words (as Peter [2 Ep. 2, 3] says), while in truth they were hard and difficult ways, since I was miserably torn by them, was in all things like one who is astray, and could not get a firm foothold in any thing. Is this not the very hardest work? Thus, what was a cause for others to follow them, was a cause for me not to follow them, since I know that nothing is subject to greater abuse than your word and name, and that therefore one must be more careful for the sake of your word than for any other thing.

(30) At the same time we want to indicate here that the Hebrew word is a generic or ambiguous one, which denotes both custodiam, by which something is preserved (servatur), as in the first verse, and also custodia, by which one turns something away from oneself, as in this verse, which in Latin would be more correctly expressed by observare than by custodire and conservare. For the word observare can be taken in both meanings, as in German "Acht haben," or actually, as Tauler often uses, "to perceive.

V. 5. Preserve (perforce) my walk upon thy footsteps, that my treads slide not.

Jerome has better (than the Vulgate, which puts perforce): Sustain (sustenta) my walk, namely, because one cannot in any way guard against the wiles of Satan, with which he seduced Eve, by one's own powers, lest he should warp our senses from the simplicity in Christ (2 Cor. 11, 3.), unless the Lord sustain our walk, provoked by our humble prayer. For here free will is useless, nor is the first grace (as they call it) enough, but perseverance is needed, which is not in the will of man, but in the preservation of God.

(32) And take heed to the emphasis that it is greater to persevere than to begin, because it is necessary for those who will persevere that the hand of God sustain them. For many begin, few increase, the very few persevere to the end (perveniunt), as the Lord teaches in the Gospel [Luc. 8, 5. ff.] about the seed that was cast on different lands. And Moses began to pray with his hands held up [2 Mos. 17, 11. f.], but since he was weighed down by stopping, he needed those who held up his hands, Hur and Aaron. For "he that endureth to the end shall be saved" [Matt. 24:13]. But what is perseverance but a continual beginning, and a tireless suffering of resistance both from the devil and from our nature weighed down by sins.

33. "On your footsteps," as has been sufficiently said, is said in contrast to the ways of men. For we are more willing to do anything that either we ourselves have chosen, or that men have ordered, than what God has commanded. For with the commandments of men, nature remains, in that the old man is not touched, yes, the old man is nourished by the commandments of men, but with the commandments of God, he must be killed, changed and renewed. For man does not choose that in his ways, nor follow that which is contrary to or above his reason. But he cannot walk in God's commandments if he does not do and suffer many things that he does not want, that he flees, hates and does not understand. For here the old man is taken out and the new man is put on.

34. "That my footsteps do not slide." In Hebrew, it is not "that," but it seems to be a repetition of what has just been said (tauto-logia). For it is the same, that the feet slide not, and that the walk be preserved. He confesses, however, that his steps or feet should slide badly, that is,

They will become fickle and be led astray if they are not kept on the footsteps of God. For this is how those who are driven to and fro by the statutes of men like a reed is driven by the wind, which is proven by experience in all those who undertake to obtain rest by their own works, who are always learning and never come to the knowledge of the truth, and yet have the appearance of a godly being [2 Tim. 3:7, 5].

(35) Perseverance has another, much more serious danger from the other side, that is, from the right side, which is the safety, happiness and peace of the wicked, of which the 73rd Psalm, vv. 2-5, says: "But I almost stumbled with my feet, my footsteps almost slipped. For I was displeased with the glorifiers when I saw that the wicked were doing so well. For they are in no danger of death, but stand firm as a palace. They are not in trouble like other people, nor are they afflicted like other people." Here, in truth, ten thousand fall on the right, where there hardly a thousand fall on the left. For he speaks not only of the welfare of the wicked, who have their welfare and are secure in the gross sins of unchastity, gluttony, excess and treasure, for these deceive no one but those who willingly and knowingly allow themselves to be deceived, but most of all the hypocrites, who shine beautifully through the works of men, who are not troubled by any cross, and seem to lead an exceedingly good life, who draw the words of God's lips to their works, as is the life of bishops, priests and monks today. From these no one can be safe enough; here, if it is possible, even the elect are led into error. For in this way the pope and the bishops have become masters of the whole world, to whom the other clergy and monks bravely flatter.

(36) In all of these we do not see the least bit of the cross of Christ and true godliness, rather they are the greatest enemies of the cross, and yet they are famous because of the delusion they have and Gives them the name of being godly for the sake of human works alone. For as people of no understanding we think, because they are fortunate in their ways, so that they have also humiliated great kings and condemned the most learned and best of men, that all their things are of God, while this prosperity is nothing but a powerful error, which the apostle preached in 2 Thess. 2:11. This is the maw and the open door of hell. Against this the prophet prays with such great fervor; therefore now follows, continuing the prayer he has begun:

The two pronouns "to you" (te) and "to me" (mihi) have been omitted by our Latin translator or by some scribe, so Jerome has better translated it this way: I have called to you, for you, GOD, will hear me; incline your ears to me; hear my speech. But he begins with gratitude and the confession that he had been heard before. By this he seeks to win goodwill, and prepares, as it were, an attack of prayer. For as we shall see, he will immediately bring an emphasis into the prayer, moved by the size and quantity of the rippers and the wolves, which he would like to resist, and save so many wretched souls, and yet he cannot. As if he said in fervent and, as it were, presumptuous displeasure: Behold, thou hast heard me often before, when I called upon thee; now also I pray; incline thine ears unto me, and hear my words, since I ask for so great and necessary things for so many thousands of those who perish, against so great persecutions of those who bring them to ruin.

38. nor is there anything wrong with the fact that the Hebrew text says in the future tense: You, God, will hear me, and our interpreter: You, God, have heard me, in the past tense; for it is in the prophetic manner that the prophet comprehends both the past and the future, and this seems to be the meaning, which we would say in common speech: I have confidence that I shall not speak in vain, knowing how thou (according to thy goodness) hast graciously rewarded me.

you are accustomed to listen to. The Hebrew language does not have a conjunctive, but instead uses the indicative of the future tense. In this way Christ says Joh. 11, 41. f.: "Father, I thank you that you have heard me. But I know that thou hearest me always." And thus this difficulty is removed, which also plagued Augustine at times, since it seems that just the opposite should have been said: Thou hast heard me, because I have called unto thee. But it is much more beautiful, I have called because thou hearest, that the mercy may be praised according to which he either promises or hears, which moves to this and is the cause that we dare to call upon him, much more than the calling of the one who prays, to whom in and of itself nothing is due.

39 "Incline thine ears" is a common expression in the Psalter, by which, however, (as was said in the preceding [Ps. 5, § 17 ff.]) the humility of the praying is expressed and the height of the listening majesty, which looks upon the lowly in heaven and on earth [Ps. 113, 6.], that is, inclines its ear to the petitions of men, turning away its face without doubt from the hopeful.

v. 7. 8. Prove your wondrous goodness, O Savior of those who trust in you, against those who oppose your right hand. Protect me as the apple of your eye; shelter me under the shadow of your wings.

40) For so 1) these two verses are divided in the Hebrew. And with much greater emphasis the Hebrew reads XXXX XXXX thou Savior of the faithful, or of the trusting, without nearer relation (absolute) than [as it is said in the Vulgate]: who makest blessed them that trust in thee. For "in thee" is added by the interpreter. Behold, then, the force and impetuosity of the prayer in all the individual words, with how great a movement and with how great an anxiety it persists and urges.

41 First, it is said: "Prove miraculously" (mirifica), not merely: Show. That is, make them see how wonderful mercy is. In what way? "Behold, brethren, your profession; not many wise according to the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called. But whatsoever is foolish in the sight of the world, that God hath chosen to shame the wise; and whatsoever is weak in the sight of the world, that God hath chosen to shame what is strong; and what is base in the sight of the world, and what is despised, that God hath chosen, and what is nothing, to bring to nought what is something; that no flesh should glory in His sight" [1 Cor. 1:26-29]. And again the same Paul says 1 Tim. 1, 15: "This is ever certainly true, and a precious word, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." For these are wonders of God's mercy, that He makes blessed the sinners whom He should condemn, and makes glorious the unworthy who should be despised, and in short, exalts the lowly, the rejected, the lowly. This knowledge of God is sweet, fills the hearts with the Holy Spirit, and makes them joyful and strong.

42. "Thy goodness." He does not say, The righteousness, the power, the wisdom of those people, as he had said in the preceding Psalm [v. 4. Vulg.], "I will not gather their heaps that are of the blood," 2c. For this is not only wonderful and lovely in our eyes, but also vexatious and condemnable in the eyes of the wicked, who will not be fools, sinners, and wicked men. Therefore they cannot bear that their wisdom, power and righteousness should be punished, despised, condemned, nor that the mercy of God should be praised. Therefore, they always resist God and boast of Him that He alone is God to the righteous, that He makes no one blessed but the righteous, and that He condemns no one but sinners. They never understand neither what sin is, nor what justice is, nor what mercy is, nor what God is, just as our scholastic theology, that is, the godless, unintelligent, seductive theology, errs. For God does not make fictitious sinners blessed, but true sinners, for His mercy is not a fictitious one, but a true one; he does not act against us with words, but with deed (rebus). For a righteous man is he who in truth acknowledges himself to be a sinner, as Paul says [1 Tim. 1:15.], "Among whom I am the foremost."

1) "so", namely as in our Bible. In the Vulgate, the words: "Against those who oppose your right hand" are drawn to the following verse, which all editions except Weimar's have falsely imitated. That Luther wants these words to be taken to the seventh verse is proven by this passage, but especially by the following

43 "You Savior of those who trust" or believe. He beautifully reminds God of his work and his glory. For his work is to make blessed those who trust in him, as he says Ps. 91, 14. [Vulg.]: "For in me he has trusted, and I will deliver him; I will protect him, for he knows my name." And Jer. 39:16-18: "Go, and tell EbedMelech the Moor: Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, I will bring my words upon this city for evil, and for no good; and thou shalt see it in that day. But I will save thee in that day, saith the LORD; and thou shalt not be given to the men of whom thou art afraid. For I will save thee from falling by the sword, but thou shalt bring thy life as a prey, because thou hast trusted in me, saith the Lord.

44. Dear one, who should not be moved to trust in such a rich promise of majesty, which is advertised to a man with so many words? The Lord is truly kind (dulcis), but only to those who have experienced it. Therefore, as his work is, so is his name; "as his name is, so is his glory" [Ps. 48:11]; as his glory is, so is his love; as his love is, so is our blessedness. He is not, therefore, a Savior of the wise, the mighty, the righteous, the holy, but only of those who trust, whoever they may be. It does not matter if you have been a sinner, a tax collector, a prostitute, a robber [Matth. 9, 2.]: "Be of good cheer, my son, your sins are forgiven you" for the sake of this very trust of yours; and they will not only be forgiven, but this trust will also produce love towards God, through which you will henceforth avoid sin, overcome it and despise death and all evils.

45. "Against them that set themselves against thy right hand." This must be referred to the word "thou Savior," viz.

of those who trust in you against those who oppose your right hand. Thereby he arouses bitter hatred against the adversaries, since their nonsensical behavior already rages no longer against what is his, but against what is God's. They set themselves against your right hand, it is about your cause.

See, then, how soon a violent movement can make an excellent speaker. Does he not prove to be an exceedingly good orator? He praises his cause, he puts himself in favor, he accuses the adversaries, he stirs up hatred against them, and with marvelous art makes the judge not only benevolent, but also heated and eager, and that (which is the highest adornment of oratory) with very short and substantial words; not as if God required this in order that he might be moved, but the more our faith flares up, the more God works through him. But we have said that the wicked, because they do not recognize God nor His works, since they do not think of Him as wonderful, but rather think of Him according to their own sense, necessarily set themselves against the right hand of God.

Almost everyone is unanimous in the opinion that the arm and right hand of God signify the power and strength of God, since this figurative speech is taken from people who use the right hand as their most effective and powerful limb and instrument of the body. However, Augustine almost everywhere takes the right hand of God for the gracious disposition of God, which does not contradict the truth, since the right hand, the power or strength of God is the grace, the favor, the mercy of God Himself, through which He powerfully sustains us against the will of all enemies. Therefore Isaiah, Cap. 53, 1 Christ calls us "the arm of the LORD". And Ps. 98, 1. it says: "He conquers with his right hand, and with his holy arm." Paul calls Christ 1 Cor. 1, 24 "divine power and divine wisdom"; Rom. 1, 16 he calls the gospel "a power of God".

In short, the word of God, that Christ is preached to us, is that by which we are preserved, sustained, built up and united, as it were by an unconquerable right, an immovable rock, an unshakable foundation, a cornerstone, a victorious horn.

to gain the victory in everything and through everything. This is to be said once and for all of the right hand of God, because by nothing else than by his word he makes us alive, begets, nourishes, educates, trains, protects, preserves us, and leads us in triumph into eternal life. Thus it is said in Ps. 118, 15. f.: "The right hand of the Lord keeps the victory, the right hand of the Lord is exalted" 2c. But I do not know if the opinion of Augustine can always hold true and exist everywhere, because of Ps. 21, 9. where it says: "Your right will find those who hate you." In this passage the right of the Lord does not seem to be taken for grace, mercy or the word of grace, one would have to understand it in the way Christ says Joh. 12, 48: "The word which I have spoken will judge him at the last day."

The other verse: "Keep me as the apple of his eye." This is taken from Deut. 32:10: "He led him, and kept him as the apple of his eye." The second part of this verse is also taken from the same chapter: "Protect me under the folds of your wings," for it says there, v. 11: "As an eagle carries out its young, and hovers over them. He spread forth his wings, and took him, and bare them upon his wings." So also Christ says Matt. 23:37: "How often have I gathered thy children together, as a hen gathereth her chicks under her wings!"

But this verse contains a repetition (est tautologicus), by which he makes the danger great, and in the movement of a great concern behaves as if he could not be sufficiently protected from the persecutions of the wicked. This is indeed so, and we see it also in the apostles Peter and Paul, who so often inculcate and repeat the dangers of human statutes that it seems they could not have made us as careful as they would have liked. Therefore, here is the emotion of a man who is afraid of a very great danger and flees from it, as we see in little children who rush to the bosom of their parents and cling tightly to their necks as soon as they fear any danger.

51 We must also have such a mindset.

against God, our Father, against the fear of hypocrites and saints of works, from whom we should take care, as Christ also commanded [Matth. 7, 15.], so that He may guard us most diligently and carefully. For in truth one cannot be sufficiently aware of this evil, since it derives its origin and reputation even from the example of really and truly godly and holy fathers. Since everyone now considers it extremely godly to follow their works, no one at the same time takes care that he should not have imitated their works, but the faith that was the source of them, even though one must do far different works. For to follow the works of the fathers is said to belong to the pagan virtues, and Virgil may praise the brave deeds of the fathers, represented in gold in chased work (caelata), 1) and Cicero may seek glory in the fact that he is rich in examples of virtue in his family. We Christians must certainly look more to faith, as it says in 2 Cor. 4, 13: "But because we have the same spirit of faith, we also believe, therefore we also speak." And Heb. 13, 7. "Remember your teachers, who have told you the word of God, which end look on, and follow their faith." And in the eleventh chapter he only cites the faith of the fathers as an example, as he also says in Rom. 4, 23. f. that the faith of Abraham was written for our sake, so that we also might believe.

Since even the most holy works of the holy fathers are dangerous and harmful, if an example is made of them without the faith by which they were sanctified, what dangers and prayers must not so many rules, statutes, decrees, laws of the most godless men bring with them, whose works they cannot prove by any examples of the fathers, but invent everything from their own heads, and deceive the souls of men?

And from this you can see what need there is for the request of careful guarding, for such an extensive prayer, for the so persistent and urgent concern of this prophet, yes, of the people of God in this Psalm.

1) VirA. lit). I, v. 640 f.

In truth, a thousand fall on the left and ten thousand on the right, because the cunning of the dragon corrupts more people than the violence of the lion. And what do the great multitude of preachers in the church, who are not right in the doctrine of faith, present to us from the stories of the saints but some wretched works? until, since faith has been extinguished, there is nothing left but pagan superstition, where once the church of God was, and only the name of the church has remained, but the thing itself is completely lost.

But even the request that the eyeball be protected is not without mystery. For faith is the eye, yes, the apple of the eye, which man must guard very carefully, because it is very easily injured. For just as a man, when the apple of his eye is corrupted, walks blindly in darkness, so a man without faith is completely in darkness. Thus it is said in Luc. 11, 34: "The eye is the light of the body. If then thine eye be single, thy whole body is light. But if thine eye be evil, thy body also is dark.

The same secret is found "in the shadow of the wings". For the two wings are the words of both testaments, but the shadow is the faith in God's word, the darkness of the spiritual soul, in which it is safely hidden from the vultures and predatory teachers.

V. 9. before the wicked who disturb me (affligerunt, before my enemies who stand around and around after my soul.

56. This verse is connected with the previous words: "Protect me, shield me from the wicked" (that is, from those who are holy, righteous and great by their works, not by faith). Jerome, instead of affligerunt [they have afflicted], has more properly vastaverunt [they have disturbed]. For this is lamented, that by ungodly teachers mainly the church of God is disturbed. So also Paul says of himself Gal. 1, 13: "I persecuted the church of God and disturbed it." For the persecution as a very obvious evil does less harm than the disturbing, which is a glaring evil under the name of something exceedingly good. But affligerunt can stand for the pain that the people of God suffer through the disturbance of the church of God.

57 In Hebrew it is more emphatically said: "Before the wicked"; they have disturbed me. As if he wanted to say: I fought with the tyrants as with quite external enemies, and here I increased and became strong. But these ungodly ones, these inward enemies, who instead of being shepherds, prove to be wolves, instead of angels of light are angels of Satan, instead of servants of Christ are servants of Antichrist, these are the ones, finally, God be lamented, who disturb me in the most miserable way. Here, great and careful protection is necessary, as for the apple of one's eye. Just as 1) I have otherwise disturbed the tyrants and the world, so I am now defeated and disturbed by my own household.

58 [Vulgate:] Inimici mei animam meam circumdederunt. The Hebrew text does not have meam, but so: My enemies in the soul 2) have raised a siege (in anima, obsederunt) against me, where the word "soul" seems to me to refer to the enemies, because he adds at the end: "against me," to describe the snorting rage of the wicked, with which they rage against the disciples of faith, for their own righteousness. For we have said in the 11. 3) Psalm [§ 33] that in Scripture actually the sensation of desire and disgust, or of coveting and loathing, is ascribed to the soul, as Gen. 34, 8.: "My son Shechem's heart (anima) longs for your daughter." Whereas Deut. 26, 30: "My soul shall be disgusted with you." And Deut. 21, 5: "Our soul is disgusted at this loose food."

59 Therefore the meaning of this part is: Those who are hostile to me in my soul, that is, with great desire and heat they have surrounded me, or made a circle against me, as it is said in Ezek. 25, 15. It says: "Therefore the Philistines have smelled themselves and atoned for the old hatred, according to all their will (tota anima), to the harm of my people." This

1) Hua vies. So the Weimarsche, In the original edition of the Erlanger and in the Baseler: Haas viei.

2) Jenaer and Erlanger: animo instead of: anima in the other editions.

3) In all editions: "ks. 10", according to the Vulgate count.

We Germans are also accustomed to punish the nonsense of an impatient desire in this way: "He acts as if it meant his life. An example of this can be seen in the Jews who followed Christ and Paul, and in our time in the magistrates who persecute heretics, in the sophists, the flatterers of the pope, and in the monastic sects. Lucas summarizes this "soul" or burning desire with regard to Paul in these words, Apost. 9, 1.: "But Paul 2) still snorted with threats and murders against the disciples of the Lord." For we see how those who burn with this desire (hac anima) draw breath with sharp and hurried snorting, until they can accomplish what they fiercely demand to do, so that it seems as if they wanted to breathe out the soul. But also in Latin anima is taken for the breath (anhelitu), as in Plautus: Does the breath (anima) of your wife stink?

60. in Latin it does not read well: circumdede runt or obse derunt adversum me, but in Hebrew it is good and contains much in itself, if one takes the word circumdede runt without closer relation (absoluto statu), in this way: My enemies have undertaken a siege with incredible eagerness - by which, however, they subdue more than is in their powers - and have set themselves in a circle, and all this against me, that they may disturb me and put me out of the way.

61 Thus you see how suitably and briefly he describes the power, the multitude, and the pretensions of the ungodly teachers, how they conspire together, how they are on all sides inferior to the godly, how they help one another, how they all have good confidence down to the last man 3) and rage against the doctrine of godliness, how all this can be better understood by example and experience than taught by words.

V. 10. Their fat ones hold together, they speak proudly with their mouths. 4) Jerome has it a little differently according to the Hebrew: Ore suo locuti sunt superbe, but it is the same sense. Dear, what is adipem claudere? The literal meaning escapes us, so we must resort to the figurative interpretation. It is Ps. 78:31 [Vulg.], "And he slew their fat ones, and the elect in Israel he hindered." And before that, Deut. 32:15: "He became fat and thick and strong," where it is clear that the fat ones mean the rich, the noble, the mighty, "the great Hansen" who stand out before the others. Likewise Ezek. 34, 3. [Vulg.], "That which was fat ye slaughtered." And also in German, in figurative speech, we call the rich and those who (as they say) sit in fat, the fat ones. These form Agag, the king of the Amalekites, a very fat man, 1 Sam. 15, 32., 5) and Eglon, the king of the Moabites, who was likewise very fat. Judg. 3, 17. 22. Therefore it is said in 3 Mos. 3, 16. f.: "All fat is the Lord's. Let this be a perpetual custom." It was also not permitted for the Jews to eat blood or fat, which means that the spirit may have wanted to indicate that we should not let ourselves be blown out by good days, and not be troubled by adversities; nor live calmly and joyfully in that case, and be angry and grieved in this case; nor look up admiringly to the great as flatterers, nor be afraid of their terror.

63 So we have "the fat" of the ungodly teachers, the rich and powerful of this world. For so it goes with the doctrine of ungodliness, that the mighty of the world cleave unto it. For the food of Behemoth is chosen, Habak. 1, 16 [Vulg.], while the poor and lowly only adhere to the word of godliness. But this fatness of the wicked is "closed" (clauditur), as I understand it, when the rich and the strong unite, join together, hold the same and do the same, like a circle or a wreath closed and united in itself.

1) kravitatis uæretica "ms¹istris can also mean: the magisters who teach heresy. This expression, mL⁴istris instead of In^uisitoridus, Luther has chosen, because it aims at the Prierias, muZistruir "8acri pulatii, who was at the same time the highest heresy judge. Cf. Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, Introduction p. 16.

den wird. "They come together and hold over the heap, the great Hansen." This is pictured 1 Sam. 23, 26. since Saul and his men surrounded David like a garland (in modum coronae [Vulg.] that they sing him. In this sense it says Ps. 119, 23: "The princes also sit and speak against me," and again [v. 161]: "The princes persecute me without cause," and Ps. 54, 5: "Defiant ones stand after my soul." The examples in the church are before our eyes.

64 "They speak proudly with their mouths," or pride. This is spoken of in the 10th Psalm, v. 2: "Because the wicked are proud" and Ps. 12, 5 [Vulg.]: "We will make our tongue great." For trusting in their fatness, they not only do not hear the poor man's counsel, as he calls it Ps. 14:6, but also defiantly disgrace him and demand recantation or command silence. We, they say, are the teachers of the people, we teach what is right, but all others must obey. But why does he say, "with their mouth"? can anyone also speak with his nose? But he distinguishes their mouth from the mouth of GOD. For he who speaks the truth speaks with the mouth of God; he who speaks with his own mouth speaks lies. Christ says John 8:44: "When he speaketh lies, he speaketh of his own."

V. 11. Where we walk, they surround us; their eyes they direct to bring us down to the earth. 1)

Jerome: Incedentes adversum me, nunc circumdederunt me, oculos suos posuerunt declinare in terram. I do not understand at all what this [in the Vulgate and in Jerome's translation] is supposed to mean. The Hebrew does not say adversum me, nor projicientes me. But I translate it this way: Ambulaverunt, nunc circumdederunt me, oculos suos posuerunt ad declinationes in terra. Passing over the opinion of others, I venture this explanation: After he said that the wicked had laid siege with burning desire against the people of GOD, then had fortified themselves by the great multitude of the great ones of this world, and had spoken proudly and contemptuously of him and against him, he now reports the ungodly certainty and presumption of them which sprang from this, saying:

(66) Ambulaverunt, that is, they are hardened by confidence in their fat, and walk along proudly and confidently, so that the verb ambulaverunt or inceserunt stands without closer relation (absolute), for: They are incessants; "they walk along, are sure of their things, have already caught me," abide in their ways and counsels, being sure that all they undertake is right, and all that is contrary is ungodly. And so they sing songs of victory even before the victory. And: nunc circumdederunt me, that is, they consider me already captured and defeated, even before they catch me, so sure and certain are they. For thus the adverb nunc seems to me to be used to indicate certainty or presumption, as if it were desperate and already done for the people of God. For such confidence and thoughts and speeches have the wicked, where they see themselves fortified by the multitude of the great, against the poor, solitary (paucum) and lowly, saying, "It is now done, it is finished."

(67) Nor can I see how the adverb nunc in this place could express anything other than what I have said. For since, as is quite clear, he speaks of the future power and cunning, indeed, since he asks against it, it cannot mean the present one, except insofar as it is present in its madness and presumption; therefore he will ask afterwards that God will precede the wicked. For indeed, if God did not precede, it would be the same as if the power were already present, which, in the opinion of all, seems so certain to occur.

How now our interpreter with his projicientes me wants to agree with this, I do not know, unless we wanted to say, that those who step in with too much certainty consider the people of God as a thing that can be thrown away, which is easily and contemptuously thrown out, as the apostle calls himself a refuse and garbage of this world, 1 Cor. 4, 13. And it seems as if David had drawn this Psalm from his own history, 1 Sam. 23, 19. when Saul with the Siphites persecuted him so that it was desperate for him; and that he had applied this example to prophecy, for the words fit very well.

68 Oculos suos posuerunt declinare in terra. I would like to understand this to mean that it is said of the reputation of persons, that it is a complaint of the godly people against the wicked, who stubbornly cling to persons, seek high things, despise the lowly, contrary to the commandment of the Lord, Ex 23:2: "Thou shalt not follow the multitude to evil, nor answer in judgment, that thou depart from the right according to the multitude." So they do not fix their eyes on the simple matter of truth, but let them be diverted and give them over to obedience to all the will of the great and the many who rule on earth. So the meaning is: They let themselves think that I am already defeated, despise my cause, and look at it and turn their eyes to where their fat is closed. All that they do, their eyes are drawn and led, they agree with it and applaud it, and in this they are obstinate, because they have resolved to keep them so turned away, completely turned away from the cause of truth, as if they wanted to do God a service.

But he adds: in terra [on earth, which must not be referred to the eyes, but to the things (causas). Therefore I have translated: to the deviations on earth (ad declinationes in terra), that is, the earthly (terrenas). That is to say, they follow the hint of the great ones on earth, and wherever those deviate and strive, they also deviate; forgetting all the heavenly commandments of God, they stubbornly follow the earthly 1) deviations and the earthly things of the wise. Therefore they are reminded in vain, in vain I give account, in vain I pray; they are moved more by their fat than by my words. Therefore nothing remains but that I take refuge in you, who judge rightly.

V. 12. like a lion desiring prey, like a young lion sitting in the den. 2)

Here is a manifest error of the interpreter, for the Hebrew has not suscepertunt me, but similitudo ejus [its image]. For in this psalm it does not deal with the catching, but with the taking of the wicked, by which they would gladly cut off the godly. Hence Jerome: Similitudo ejus sicut leonis desiderantis praedam, et quasi catuli leonis sedentis in occultis [his image is like that of a lion desiring prey, and like a young lion sitting in secret]. And the sense is evident and easy, as we had it also in the 10th Psalm, v. 9. "He lieth in wait in secret, as a lion in the den," where, as well as here, the cruel pursuits and lurking of the wicked are indicted. For it has been said there [Ps. 10, § 77] that this hidden thing is that which is concealed with art and cunning, that the simple and godly may be caught. A truly beautiful and appropriate simile, for just as a lion lies in wait to kill animals in the flesh, so a godless teacher tries everything to destroy souls. And Christ interprets this verse Matth. 7, 15. like this: "Beware of false prophets, who come to you in sheep's clothing (behold, the stalking in secret), but inwardly they are ravening wolves."

Thus we see that the Psalm does not speak of the persecution of tyrants, but of the wicked, who deceive many to destruction. But at the same time, when they are resisted, they threaten, and if they can, they even kill the saints of God. But the arrogance and pride of Moab is greater than his power [Isa. 16, 6.], and desires more than he is able, as it is said there.

In my opinion, there is hardly a passage in the Psalter that is as dark as this one, even in Hebrew. In our case, however, there is, first of all, the even darker [Latin] translation, and secondly, the confusion in the division. Therefore, we want to divide this verse again as it is in Hebrew, namely, according to Jerome's process in this way: Arise, O Lord, come before his face, bend it, save my soul from the wicked, who is thy sword. So it is obvious that ab inimicis manus tuae belongs to the following verse, and that frangam tuam is badly put into the accusative, also badly referred to "my soul", since it must be referred to the wicked. But if someone should like to call his soul a sword somewhere, his sense shall not be stubbornly taken away from him.

73. So he says: Since these ravening wolves try everything, and have many and great helpers, so that it is impossible for us, who are few, to endure or avoid their attacks (machinas), we have nothing else but to lift up our eyes to you, so that you may hear us and forestall the wicked, and make us cautious and wise by your spirit, so that we may avoid his deadly thoughts, and so that, when he comes, you may humble him through us who are ready, and make us triumph over him.

74 For God does not come before and cast down so that the wicked may no longer fear, but so that he may not harm, just as He does not take away the basilisk and the dragon, but yet gives that one may walk on them and trample them underfoot, Ps. 91:13. He does not remove the temptation, but He does not lead into temptation. So Paul teaches the Ephesians [Cap. 6, 11. ff.] that they should be armed with the helmet of salvation, the shield of faith, the sword of the Spirit, and be booted up on the legs to push the gospel.

75. "Save (salva) or deliver (eripe) my soul from the wicked, who is your sword." This passage is well to note that the heretics and the false teachers are a punishment (plaga) inflicted by God's wrath, not unlike the punishment of old of the

The punishment must rather be averted by a humble prayer to God, and God must be reconciled. Therefore, the punishment must rather be averted and God reconciled by a humble prayer to God than by fighting against them with the powers of reason or learning, so that the victory may be in the mercy of God, who was moved by our tears, not in our works. For it is not for us to save our souls from these ungodly ones, much less to overcome them, as he says here, "Save my soul from the ungodly." Now if we despise this prayer and attack them with violence, fire, and insults (as is done nowadays), there is no doubt that the attackers are twofold heretics and incomparably more wicked than those who attack them, because they attack the wrath of God with their insults, and with their violence, and with mere arrogance: but what nonsense can be greater than this?

But take heed how terrible an expression he uses, that he calls the wicked "a sword" of God; for a rod or a staff would be a lighter wrath. The rod hews and saves the soul from hell, as Solomon says [Proverbs 23:14]. Therefore God out of great mercy says Ps. 89, 33: "I will punish their sin with the rod, and their iniquity with plagues." But the sword kills and separates the soul [from the body], and as GOD is great, so is His sword great, and the great sword corrupts great and many people.

The first, pure church was often beaten with the paternal rod, less often with the sword, and this beating was, in the eyes of the flesh, very harsh and violent, but in reality and in the eyes of the Lord, exceedingly mild. This was followed by the persecution of the heretics, which seemed far less severe in the eyes of the flesh. But it was far more cruel and harmful, because it corrupted many more people. However, there was still something of the mercy of God left, because the truth was given on the day when the fathers fought with the Scriptures, and the Word of God reigned in many.

At this last exceedingly evil time rages

Under the rule of the church alone that sword of the wicked with terrifying tyranny, in that no one opposes it. Here everything seems to be quite peaceful and mild, since the tyrants do not persecute, the heretics are not fought with. Being thus free from these two persecutions, we almost all perish by the sword of the wicked, not seeing that under this peace the most cruel persecution prevails, since, after God's word is extinguished, we are drawn to hell in heaps by the word of men.

(78) In my judgment, however, among all the swords of the wicked, we will rightly have to consider Pelagian wickedness the greatest and most harmful. For, as we see, this psalm, indeed, the whole of Scripture, is especially zealous against it. For what do the prophets and the apostles have more to do with than to fight for the righteousness of faith against the righteousness of men? Therefore the Pelagian error is in truth the error of all lines, which has been suppressed many times, but never eradicated. All other errors have been eradicated after some time, but this one the prophets have put down, Christ and Paul have overcome it, but nevertheless it crept in again and again until Pelagius was born, raised its head and began to defend it freely. Then God had mercy on us again and awakened Augustine, who put him down for a while. But after Augustine, he rose again and finally kept the upper hand, because not only did no one oppose him, but the Roman Church even commanded and forced him, the universities taught him publicly, the bishops, the princes and the whole world followed him, as if he were an exceedingly good and Christian cause. For the fact that some in Paris and elsewhere began to rebel against it, as we see, did nothing.

(79) Yes, this error is the source of all idolatry, and always has a different appearance, depending on when it appears. For when have there ever been idolaters who did not make themselves believe that they pleased God by their virtues and powers? And with what then goes the pelagia

What is the difference between the two? Therefore, Pelagius is justified in taking his name from the sea (a pelago), because this error is a kind of sea of error that floods the whole world. For it is actually the wisdom of the flesh itself, which is always hostile to God and never subject to Him, Rom. 8, 7.

V. 14: Of the people of your hand, O Lord, of the people of this world, who have their portion in this life, whom you fill with your treasure, who have children in abundance, and leave the rest to their young. 1)

This is a verse in Hebrew. We will now continue with this very dark passage as we started and see if we can do anything. First we want to look at the translations. From our Latin translation nothing can be inferred, much less from Jerome, who translated thus: A viris manus tuae, Domine, qui mortui sunt in profundo, quorum pars in vita, et quorum de absconditis tuis replesti ventrem, qui saturabuntur filiis, et qui dimittent reliquias suas parvulis suis. Dear, what must we hear here! I am forced to use the worst teacher, that is, myself, therefore I will present my opinion without prejudice and presumption. Whoever has better, let him help me; whoever does not have it, let him judge mine favorably. I translate first word for word: Of the men of your hand, O Lord, of the men of this world (de substantia), their part is in life, and with your hidden things you will fill their belly, they will be filled with children, they have put aside their leftovers for their little children.

The first part of the verse consists of five members, the last has only one member. But with these words, which are full of extraordinarily diminutive speech (tapinosi), he explains who the wicked one is, that sword of God in relation to whom he has asked that his soul be saved from him, and describes him with six characteristics. The first is: "Of the men of your hand, O Lord", which is the same as if he said: Of the lost and hardened people, who must be damned for eternity. For in such a manner he seems to call them men of the hand of the LORD, because of what is said 2 Mos. 14, 30. f.: "They saw the Egyptians dead on the shore of the sea, and the great hand which the LORD had shewed upon the Egyptians." And Deut. 32:41: "When I shall whet the lightning of my sword, and my hand shall take hold to punish; then will I again avenge myself on mine enemies, and recompense them that hate me." Isa. 9, 12: "In all this his wrath is not yet abated; his hand is yet stretched out." Job 19:21: "For the hand of God has moved me." Therefore one also says in German of those who are struck by the blow: "The hand of God has touched him." But it seems to be something common with this prophet that he takes the hand of GOD for the vengeance of GOD, as we have seen Ps. 10, 14.: "It is in your hands," as also Ps. 21, 9.: "Your hand will find all your enemies." And Ps. 39, 11.: "I am faint from the punishment of thy hand." Therefore also the apostle Hebr. 10, 31. speaks with a voice of thunder: "Terrible is it to fall into the hands of the living GOD," as is more expansively said in the 10th Psalm [§89. § 101 f.].

The second characteristic: "Of the people of this world" (a viris de substantia). For this Jerome has, "They that are dead in the deep." For it is the same expression throughout; here: "of the people" (a viris), which in the first characteristic meant: "of the people of your hand" (although now the word, which stands in both places, has some relationship with the word "death" in the Hebrew), so that for Jerome there can be no reason, why he wanted to translate there "of the people", here "who are dead", because it should have been translated either in both places 1) "of those who are dead" or in both places "of the people".

83) For in both places the Hebrew word is not or another, by which some outstanding man, but which is sometimes translated by few or despised people, as Deut. 4, 27.: "And shall be left a lowly rabble," as if he wanted to indicate the yeast of the people and the least among men, as he said Ps. 12, 9.: "Where such loose people rule among men." And Isa. 3:4, "I will give them young men to be princes, and childish ones shall rule over them." This may have moved the Latin interpreter to say, "of few" (a paucis), not because they are few in number, but much more in position. Their number is the greatest of all, but among them there is no one or only a few men who have done a great work or have a great name, as it is said in Isa. 3:1 f.: "The Lord will take from Jerusalem and Judah mighty men and men of war," 2c. which nicely explains the meaning of this word. Therefore, they are little people and are kept only for the vengeance of God, among whom there is not one man worthy of God, although there are many of them.

1) It seems to us that the words: n viris sou are too much, so we have omitted them.

De substantia ["of this world"], which our interpreter de terra, Jerome, has translated in profundo, is the same expression that David also uses in Ps. 39, 6. "Behold, my days are as the breadth of a hand before thee, and my life (substantia) is as nothing before thee," where it is wanted that substantia signifies a certain duration of time, as if he meant to say, Substantia mea, that is, the time that I am here and live is as nothing before thee 2) as also Job 7:16. [Vulg.], "For my days are nothing," and this meaning pleases me very well. For David took this passage from the Psalm of Moses, Ps. 90, 4. f. [Vulg.], "For a thousand years are before thee as the day that passed yesterday, and as a night watch; what is thought to be nothing shall be their years." Hence comes the word [Ps. 39:6, Vulg.], "Behold, thou hast appointed my days to be measured." In the Hebrew it is said of a short measure, namely, a handbreadth, as if to say the word, Job 14:1, "Man, born of woman, liveth a short time," and after that [v. 5. Vulg.], "The days of man are short."

2) Weimarsche: äo instead of: to.

The meaning is: Save my soul from the people of this world (de substantia) or from the people of the world (viris substantiae) (that is, from the very least people, who are only here for this extremely short life, that is, from the children of this very uncertain world, who have nothing but the short and uncertain existence or duration of this life), because they are rejected people and people of your hand. And it could seem that our Latin interpreter intended this, since he said: A paucis de¹) terra already few of the earth), that is, of those who are the least and of the earth, earthly minded, and devoted only to this temporal life.

The third characteristic is: "They have their part in their life. In vitis, for it is [in Hebrew] "life" in the plural. So also in the preceding Psalm [Ps. 16, 11.]: "You make known to me the way to life" (vitarum). So the meaning is: The portion and happiness of these people is not in the future life, but in the present goods. For "they grow old in good days," as Job says [Cap. 21, 13], are content with that and consider the valuable (desiderabile) land as nothing, receive their reward here, because they are people of your hand.

The prophet uses "life" in the plural, because of the many ways of using this life, as Augustine aptly says about the word Ps. 63, 4: "For your goodness is better than life" (vitas). He says: "There are many kinds of human life (vitae), one chooses the country life, another the life of a merchant, still another the soldier's life, another again another. So also today we choose different (as it is called) orders or states of life. But few of them prepare themselves for death and long for eternal life; all of them would rather remain in the state they are in, being satisfied with that part of their life, than die. In this crude nature are above all those godless hypocrites, who are most attached to this life, fear death and do not care about eternal life, like the Jews in the desert.

Is it not an extraordinarily diminishing speech (tapinosis) that the desire of the godless people is directed only to this very miserable life? They are content with it, they do not like to leave it. And it is not to be wondered at, since they not only do not have the faith that overcomes sin and death, which is a mercy of God that is better than any state in life, but also fight it with all their might, although they do nothing but pretend that they desire life and despise death, that they are chosen and desire eternal life. But there is falsehood in their spirit, and in fact they deny it.

89. The fourth characteristic is, "And with your hidden things you will fill their belly." What is this but that they are belly servants, and born only to eat and drink? For it has been said in the 4th, 5th, 10th, and 14th Psalms, that the teachers of ungodliness are everywhere in Scripture ascribed avarice and belly-servants, of whom also the apostle says [Phil. 3:19.], "Whose belly is their god." But God, who hates unbelief and ungodliness, also lets his wrath come upon them, as Ps. 78, 21. f. is said of them, and as Paul Col. 3, 6. speaks: "The wrath of God comes upon the children of unbelief." Therefore, he fills their belly with his bars (absconditis), and gives them what they desire, and "makes them atone for their lust," as it says in the same 78th Psalm, v. 29, that is, he fills their belly, he gives them what they desire, and makes them take their reward in this life, because they do not wait for the one to come.

90. But he says: "With your hidden things", that is, what you have kept (reservatis). Thus he calls the goods and chattels (substantiam) of this world, with which God nourishes (pascit) people in this life. For in every year God lets this come forth again and hands it out, as it were, from His secret store. For a man can neither miss where it comes from, nor could he find it if he sought for it, if God did not of His own free will miraculously provide everything.

gave. So this expression is similar to the one in the 135th Psalm, v. 7: "He brings forth the winds out of his treasures" (thesauris, that means out of the hidden), because "the wind blows where it wants, but you do not know from where it comes or where it goes", Joh. 3, 8. So it is also with the bread, wine and all things, of which this life needs; they all come, and we use them, and do not know where they come from. By this word he punishes at the same time in a very special way the foolishness of godlessness, that it knows well that the things of which it uses are not its own, nor even in its power. But even so, it does not yet learn to trust in God. Yes, which word in this whole verse does not attack the foolish godlessness with many images? Everything is said in the most suitable, strongest and most complete way, if only it would be considered with an attentive heart.

91. the fifth characteristic is: "they will be satisfied with children", that is, they will have children in abundance, for this they also desire among other things, that they have beautiful, fertile, rich wives, beget many beautiful, in every respect praiseworthy sons and daughters, so that they get their way and the thing with the children goes out according to all their desires. For the word "they shall be satisfied" refers not only to the number of children, but much more to the condition of them, namely, that they may be rich, honored, prosperous, and fit for all the splendor of this world. Children may have. For we see this desire everywhere among parents, and David says here that this vice prevailed among the godless Jews of his time. And he speaks much more expansively of Ps. 144:10 ff. where he interprets this verse thus: "Deliver me from the murderous sword of the wicked, and deliver and deliver me from the hand of the strange children, whose mouth speaketh vain things, and whose right hand is an ungodly hand, whose sons are as new plantings in their youth, whose daughters are well-formed, beautifully adorned like the temple. Their storehouses are full, and can give out one store after another; their sheep are fruitful, great is their number.

Their oxen are fat; there is no falling down of a wall, nor harm, nor clamor in their streets. Blessed are the people, they say, to whom it is so; blessed are the people, whose God is the Lord. Does he not say here with oratorical fullness the same thing that he touches here in this verse in extreme brevity (dialectico compendio)?

So also Paul says very briefly Phil. 3, 18. f.: "I also say with weeping, the enemies of the cross of Christ; for whom the belly is their god, which end is condemnation, and their glory is put to shame, of those who are earthly minded. And what speech could have more aptly portrayed the lives of bishops, monks and all clergy? Do they not all seek all this more than even the world? But, surely, they are not satiated with children? In any case, they are also sorry that they are not free to do so; without a doubt, they would surpass the worldly people in this respect as well. But what is the matter with them that they do not have children and wives, since instead of these they have their spiritual creatures and flatterers according to their will alone, to whom they turn everything? Not [says the Prophet this], as if one should not provide the children with a respectable sustenance, but that one satiates oneself on the children, that one pleases oneself in the splendid and abundant provision of the children, and thereby wants to be counted among the godly people, this he punishes.

The sixth characteristic is: "And they leave their remaining things to their young. That is, they are careful to set aside and keep much that is superfluous to them (for they are not satisfied with what is necessary), which they may leave to their heirs, only so that their children after them may be rich and prosperous, which is also what the poet Persius punished the pagans for. Thus the bishops and clergy anxiously strive only that they may increase the inheritance of Christ, and thus leave it behind them increased. But they do this only as very good and holy people, that is, as godless. For nowadays it is called governing the churches well, when one increases their treasures, builds houses, provides the children, that is, their descendants, with the means that they can indulge. In this verse, therefore, he has described the whole disposition of the wicked.

who, although they are only earthly-minded, still want to appear as good people, and by their appearance, then also by their hypocritical teachings, corrupt very many.

95 "The rest" in this place is that which is superfluous, and is to be understood as that which is superfluous, namely, the superfluity of the parents, lest anyone understand it as being said of the remaining lumps, which, when the best things have been taken away, are wont to be left, as it were, as lees, since here he understands rich inheritances. Hence it is also derived in Hebrew from a word meaning an advantage, an abundance.

96 And dimiserunt [in the Vulgate] stands for: they have put back (reposerunt), that is, they have heaped up with all diligence treasures that are superfluous to them in order to enrich their children and heirs.

97 Knowing this, it is easy to rhyme together the Latin translation (nostram, the Vulgate) and that of Jerome. For "of the enemies of thy hand" is different only in expression from "of the people of thy hand," for they are indeed enemies and reprobate people. "Of a few from the earth" has been brought into agreement (§§ 84. 85). Jerome calls them "dead in the depths," perhaps because they live in the highest esteem and enjoy only this briefly measured (spatio) time, but inwardly they are dead before God. The word: Divide eos invita eorum (divide them in their life) will thus coincide with the other: Give them their part (partire eos), that is, give them their reward in their life, as they have chosen the lot of this life. The rest is not contrary to each other.

V. 15. but I will behold thy face in righteousness; I will be satisfied when I awake in thy image. 1)

Jerome has more correctly: I will see your face in righteousness, when I will be awake in your image. This he contrasts with what he had said of the ungodly. They are earthly-minded, they are satisfied with children, and they take their part in this life; but to me this life is contemptible, I hasten to the life to come, where, not in riches but in righteousness, I shall see not these perishable earthly things, but thy face itself. I shall not be satisfied with children according to the flesh, but when I shall be awakened) by thy image; as it is said in 1 John 3:2, "But we know that when it shall appear, we shall be like it," so that similitudine tua must not be drawn to "I shall awaken," but to "I shall be satisfied"; for by the manifested face of God, which is the glory and the clarity of God, we shall be satisfied. And beautifully he has put a word of resurrection: "when I awake", namely from the sleep of death, so that he may teach us that our satiety is not in this life, but in the life to come. There is nothing that would go against the right sense in our Latin translation of this verse, for the glory of God will appear when we have risen from the sleep of death and have been made like Him. But the Hebrew text indicates the resurrection more clearly than our Latin translation.

The eighteenth Psalm.

V. 1, 2: A psalm to sing unto David the servant of the LORD, which spake the words of this song unto the LORD in the days when the LORD delivered him out of the hand of his enemies, and out of the hand of Saul, saying, I love thee, O LORD my strength.

There are many things in this psalm that compel us to understand it of Christ, and again many that compel us to understand it of David, and I myself have not yet become certain which view is the right and proper one, so that I cannot move freely here without danger. Augustine treats it, without being hindered, of Christ and his body, that is, the church, and Paul Rom. 15, 9. seems to agree with it, since he draws the penultimate verse of this psalm to Christ, saying: "Therefore I will praise you among the Gentiles, and sing to your name." We also want to follow this for the time being, since it is safer to point too abundantly to Christ than to the Christian David, and easier to understand the model from the truth, since there is no doubt that David's wars and victories pictured Christ's suffering and resurrection. For St. Augustine says: "Everything that is said in this Psalm, which cannot really be attributed to the Lord Himself, must be related to the Church. For the whole Christ speaks here, in whom all are members.

(2) Let us assume, then, that David, while giving thanks for his victories, at the same time wove a prophecy into the person of Christ, who is the victor over sins, death, and the world, so that we understand the title to mean: "He who spoke the words of this song to the Lord," that is, he who wrote this song about the Christ who was to come, at the time when he was enjoying a quiet life, all his enemies having been defeated. Therefore, the whole psalm has words of the resurrected Christ. He may have wanted to show this mind in a hidden way, since he names Saul as the last enemy, who in truth was the first enemy of David, so that he taught by this reversed order that he was not dealing with his victories but with Christ's.

He now says: "I love you dearly, O Lord, my strength. These are the words of one who has risen again, and who has experienced the power of God in tribulation. For in this way we tend to be seized by a sweet and joyful disposition toward those of whom we recognize that we have been saved from a great evil through their benevolence. For the purity of love is expressed when he says, "You, O Lord," not some creature, which was spoken of more extensively in the fifth Psalm.

V. 3. O LORD, my rock, my fortress, my savior, my God, my refuge, in whom I build, my shield and horn of salvation, and my protection. 1)

This is all one verse in Hebrew. Jerome has it thus: The Lord [is] my rock and my strength, and my savior, my God, my strong one, and I will hope in him, my shield, and the horn of my salvation, and who takes me up (susceptor meus). With the same words he translated the same song 2 Sam. 22, only that he said there for susceptor meus more correctly elevator meus [who elevates me]. Who can distinguish and describe by dignity these exceedingly violent movements of the heart? For the Spirit is not idle in his words, so that one might think there is something superfluous here. I am under this psalm, as I have said, and all others either say nothing, or I understand nothing, much less that they should give me any assistance. Nevertheless, I must continue, taking the liberty of allowing each one to speak of it as he understands it.

5 "My strength", which is written in the first verse, seems to me to be that by which man can jutor HI6U8, spsrLbo in eum. krotsotor oasus 6t oornu salutis rasue, st susosxtor meus.

1) Vulgate: Donūnus ūroaruEntum ni6um, 6t rstuZium6t livsrator M6us, Dons m6U8, uū-

Inwardly he is made confident and strengthened with power from on high. SoPs. 147, 13: "For He makes firm the bars of your gates"; Is. 54, 2: "And set your nails firmly", so that it is the firmness by which He makes the soft and tender minds hard. This strength can only come to us from God, who, as much as there is in us, are extremely easily dissolved and melt like wax before the sun, both in misfortune and in happiness.

Firmamentum meum in Hebrew actually means "a rock", a foundation; it is a rock on which one builds, as Matth. 16, 18: "On this rock I will build my community. Thus, the Lord not only attracts Christ and His own with inner strength and firmness, but He is at the same time the very foundation on which they lean, like a strong house on a solid rock.

7 Refugium meum [Vulg.] or robor meum [Hieron.] actually means "a castle," a tower, a house where one finds refuge, or a fortified place, as Ps. 31:3 [Vulg.], "Be thou unto me a GOOD that protecteth me, and a house of refuge, that thou mayest save me"; so that, adding the foregoing, the Lord is not merely the foundation, the solid rock, but also the fortified house itself, built upon the rock, which sustains and protects him that hath fled to it [the Lord^Λ].

8. liberator meus ["my savior"] actually denotes an escape and the power by which one who is straitened and enclosed by all ropes is freed and escapes, as the children of Jfrael escaped from Pharaoh.

9 Adjutor meus [Vulg.] or fortis meus [Hieron.] in Hebrew again denotes a rock or a pebble, which is often translated by "a strong one. I hold that this is the strength by which one who has escaped and is taken up in a house of refuge remains secure and perseveres against all attempts of those who pursue him.

(10) And these five things belong to the suffering power or endurance of evils. For the first is to be strengthened inwardly. Then, when this strength is challenged, that, lest one fall, one may have a rock on which to rest and stand firm; then, that, lest even through

The last thing is, so that one does not give way, broken by the overconfidence that we have in devils and evil men, that one may be fortified by the power of perseverance.

(11) Very briefly, we can distinguish these five parts by referring the first simply to the adversity, the second to the size, the third to the quantity, the fourth to the strength, and the fifth to the perseverance of the enemies. For when an enemy first realizes that he is being resisted, he takes the great and powerful as his confederates; then he gathers the great multitude to himself. If he does not succeed in this way, he tries with them and through them all violence and artifices. Finally, if he cannot do it in any other way, he uses his perseverance to make the saints weak. "But he who perseveres to the end will be saved," Matth. 24, 13. One would almost like to believe that Paul set these five pieces, Rom. 8, 38. f., but in a different order [Vulg.]: "Neither the present nor the future, nor violence, neither high nor low, nor any other creature can separate us from the love of God."

Now follow the active and driving forces. The first is "the shield" or [Vulg.] "my protector. For the one who wants to attack the enemies must be provided with a shield, with which he can catch the fiery arrows of the enemy and advance and kill the enemies. For he does not need a shield who runs to a place of refuge.

The other is "the horn of salvation," the very power that contends and overcomes. This seems to me to be the power of the word or the confident courage to preach. Thus it is said in Micah, Cap. 4, 13: "Arise and thresh, O daughter of Zion. For I will make you horns of iron and claws of brass,

1) The nou, which is in the original edition of the Erlanger, the Weimarschen and in the Baseler, the other editions have deleted. The sense remains the same.

And thou shalt thresh many nations: and I will utterly destroy their substance unto the LORD, and their substance unto the ruler of the whole earth." "Threshing" is the same as preaching, as the apostle proves 1 Cor. 9:9: "Thou shalt not bind the mouth of the ox that threshes." But what are the "horn of iron" and the "claws of brass" but the word of Christ [Luc. 21:15], "I will give you a mouth and wisdom, which all your adversaries shall not gainsay nor resist"? Therefore this power is called "a horn of salvation" because it overcomes the enemies and provides salvation from the enemies, Luc. 1, 69. 71. Some make a kingdom out of the horn, and this is not out of the way, since the kingdom of Christ consists only in the word of truth; this is indeed the kingdom of salvation, which overcomes everything.

The third power is "He who receives me," or "He who exalts me," that is, in whom I, exalted above my enemies, 1) triumph, as Paul says [2 Cor. 2:14], "Who always gives us victory in Christ." In the same way it is said Isa. 9, 11. [Vulg.], "And the LORD shall exalt the enemies of Rezin above him."

But we see how wonderful the power of Christ and His saints is. The former is the suffering power that develops the active power, as Paul says in 2 Cor. 12, 9: "The power is developed in weakness" (perficitur). Thus the world is overcome by no other weapons than patience and the word of God, as Is. 14, 2. says: "They shall hold captive those by whom they were held captive, and shall rule over their beaters." And Joel 3, 15: "The weak say, I am strong." 2 Sam. 22, 3. To this verse are added the words: "and my refuge, my Savior, who help me from iniquity." Why this is omitted in this Psalm, I do not know.

V. 4. I will praise and call upon the Lord, and I will be delivered from my enemies.

016 Where then is the title which says that this song was spoken when David was delivered from all enemies, and that it was spoken in the person of the risen Christ? Certainly, nothing else can be said here than what Augustine expresses as his opinion, that the whole Christ, that is, Christ speaks with his body and for his body, which is the church that always conquers and always fights, and after the past evils are overcome, prepares to overcome future evils. Or, if one must stand still at the person of Christ, it behooves one to understand it as being said according to the greatness of his heartfelt love (affectus) toward GOD, to whom he sets forth the willingness of his mind to suffer still more if GOD wills, as it is said in Ps. 108, 2. [Vulg.], "My heart is ready, GOD, my heart is ready," and Ps. 26, 2., "Test me, O LORD, and try me; purify my kidneys and my heart." For thus, after he is freed from evil and has experienced divine power, he desires nothing else than to suffer again, so that he may again experience divine power, and from this arises a certain wonderful thirst for suffering, and an immense confidence in the loveliness of God.

(17) But all these things are "written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope" [Rom. 15:4]. For this reason he described the fivefold power of those who suffer and the threefold power of those who act, so that he might instruct us that nothing so evil, so much, so great, so powerful, so enduring, could not be overcome by the power of GOD, if we believe in the same; and especially then it is in the right place to hope in the power [of God] in us when many great, strong, lasting evils befall us, since this is characteristic of the divine power to help the weak, the few, the small, the unprofitable, the fainthearted, not only in evils of punishment, but also of guilt. For what kind of power of God would that be, which alone overcomes the punishments and not also the sins in us? This passage is so full of consolation, since it is contrary to nature and seems to be quite desperate when not only evils come, but many evils, great evils, enormous evils and long-lasting evils. For we see this also in the apostles, against whom, as soon as they had begun to were done with power from on high, not only wicked men arose, but also many and great, and they were mighty. They were also persistent and persistent, as it says in Ps. 129:3: "The plowmen have plowed on my back and made their furrows long.

(18) In the same way, and in every man, Satan works in every temptation, so that he may particularly attack a man with unchastity, anger, pride, avarice, or any other evil. For where he finds a firm resolution to chastity or meekness, he not only sets in motion chastity or anger against it, but also introduces various kinds of thoughts, then makes them great and effective with incredible cunning; finally, he overcomes those whom he could not overcome either by quantity, nor by greatness, nor by powerful effect, more often by stopping and overpowering them, so that when they are tired, he brings them to ruin.

(19) O foolish and presumptuous praisers of free will and of our own actions (actuum elicitorum), who believe that Satan is asleep, do not learn to understand and prevent his thoughts, which are indicated to us in these passages of Scripture, and presume to be saved without struggle, surely, by good actions alone. Not so, ye wicked, not so; the enemy is there, numerous, great, very strong, and indefatigable. To say nothing of his multitude, greatness, strength and tenacity, we cannot withstand even a simple attack if the Lord is not our strength, since, even without the enemy's urging, we are inclined by ourselves to all evil.

20 But by what art shall it be, that, with this multitude, greatness, power, and obstinacy of the enemy, the LORD shall be our strength, our rock, our fortress, our deliverer, and our succor? The prophet answers: This will happen if you call on the Lord with praise; for by this praising call you will be saved from all enemies, as Rom. 10, 13. from Joel, Cap. 3, 5. it is said, "He that shall call upon the name of the LORD shall be saved." And Proverbs 18:10: "The name of the LORD is a sure thing.

Castle; the righteous runneth thither, and is protected." This is truly the noblest and most golden teaching in temptation, and the very best counsel by which we can be saved from all evils, if we can justify God in temptation, praising and glorifying Him, as the example of the three men in the fire, Daniel Cap. 3, shows. [Dan. 9, 7.:] "You, LORD, are righteous, but we must be ashamed, as it is now." It is unbelievable what an effective remedy this praise of God is in dangers, for as soon as you begin to praise God, the evil becomes mild, confidence grows and faithful invocation follows.

21. Therefore, all servants of God must be careful not to seek either to receive comfort or to conquer in any other way, even in any other order, than is prescribed in this verse. Not first shalt thou call, but first shalt thou praise. For there are those who cry out and are not heard, as it says afterward [v. 42.] in this psalm, "They call, but there is no helper, to the Lord, but he does not answer them." Why? Because they have called upon him not with praise but with displeasure (indignando), not setting the kindly LORD before themselves, but looking only at their own bitterness. But no one is freed from evils by looking at or detesting his evils, but by overcoming them and clinging to God and looking at his goodness, as we have seen in Ps. 16:8: "I have the Lord always before my eyes; for he is at my right hand, therefore I shall dwell." O a very difficult and rare advice, that in the midst of the ills one should model the Lord as lovely and praiseworthy, and that one should look at Him who is absent and incomprehensible more than the present ills that still prevent one from looking at Him. I cannot praise enough the sweetness and the power of this verse, since the words are set so appropriately and emphatically.

(22) But those who do not lift themselves up from the praise of the Lord to overcome, but look to the comfort of men, or turn to their merits, or cling to the hope that their lives will be better in the future, they will never overcome, because the word is certain: He who calls on the Lord with praise will be delivered from his enemies, and no other. Thus we have quoted above from Isaiah, Cap. 48, 9. "I will restrain thy munt 1) with my praise, that thou perish not." And Isa. 50:4: "The LORD hath given me a learned tongue, that I may know how to speak in season with the weary." This is what we are commanded in the second commandment, "Thou shalt not uselessly take the name of the LORD thy GOD." And we pray, "Hallowed be thy name." This is the reason that he begins this psalm with so many praises to God and is joyful out of love for God, so that in this verse he seems to give the reason why he boasts so much in the Lord and hopes in Him, as if to say, "Thus, of course, one must start from love and praise and call upon the name of the Lord.

(23) Let someone try this when he is in a bad way, and take hold of some praise of God, and he will soon find relief. For every other consolation is either useless or deceptive, that is, it does a lot of harm; indeed, it has the same effect if you praise either the holy virgin or some saint, yes, even some godly person who still lives on earth, in the name of a disciple of the Lord. So great is the power and blessing of the name of the Lord. Thus it is said to Abraham in Gen. 12:3, "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse them that curse thee." By this promise we are certain that we will be blessed by God if we bless His saints; how much more if we bless the Lord Himself! I confess that I have often lightened my heart in this way.

V. 5 For the bands of death encompassed me, and the streams of Belial terrified me. 2)

24. Jerome: Quoniam circumdederunt me funes mortis, torrentes Belial terruerunt me. 2 Sam. 22, 5. is in Hebrew another expression for funes [bands] than in this passage, which Jerome replaced by outrituos

1) In the Vulgate, instead of: os tuum.

2) Vulgate: Oireuinflentzrunt ine aiores mortis, et torrentes iniuitatis conturdaverunt ine.

Reuchlin seems to me to have translated it more correctly instead of "bands" as collections or heaps, like 1 Sam. 10, 5: "There shall meet thee a multitude of prophets", so that the meaning would be: Death has surrounded me with many and great troops, so that the troops of death are put together with the streams of Belial in the last part of the verse, so that it expresses on both sides the greatness and the multitude of the evils, which as it were break in with immense streams and many hosts.

(25) He had said and taught that the Lord must be called upon with praise and love by those who would be delivered from the enemy. Now he reports that he did this, and tells his story as an example of the teaching he had given, beginning with the very worst and most extreme enemies, death and hell. And although it is true that David himself often suffered these punishments of death and hell, as he himself often confesses in various Psalms, especially Ps. 116:3, 4: "The snares of death had compassed me about, and the fear of hell had fallen upon me; I came into mourning and distress. But I called upon the name of the Lord," where almost the same words are found [as in this psalm], not only the meaning coincides with this passage. But we have begun to understand this psalm of Christ, and have left the general sense for the time being; therefore we take it in this place of the death and hell of Christ.

(26) Now this verse speaks of death, the following of hell, and both speak the same thing by repeating the same opinion. For it is the same thing, "The bands of death compassed me about," and, "The streams of Belial terrified me," and likewise, "The bands of hell compassed me about," is the same as, "The cords of death overwhelmed me." This is our opinion; but we do not mind if someone wants to make four different things out of this.

27 The words are also actually and emphatically set. "They surrounded me" is not merely: they confronted me or: they pursued me, but: they held me and contained me on all sides^.

I, who am alone and a single one, they have included what tortures us the most in death. For if one could go to death in the company of a large crowd that one has before one's eyes, death would be a lesser evil.

28 "Ropes" or orders of battle (cunei), which our Latin translator calls "pains"; namely, not just one servant of death surrounds me, but many, yes, many troops, many hosts; which again expresses the extremely bitter loneliness in death. That by these ropes or orders of battle may be understood ungodly men, whose service death and devils use, we allow, according to the words of Ps. 22:13: "Great bullocks have compassed me about, fat oxen have compassed me about." And again [v. 21, 22.], "Deliver my soul from the sword, and save me from the unicorns."

But our Latin interpreter understands by these multitudes not unrhymed the multitude of pains, which break in at the hour of death, where there is no creature, which would not have to be subservient to death and terror. For everything that is looked at is death and not life. Thus death arms itself with the whole world, and all creatures fight against the dying man or the one who is afraid of death, abandoned and alone, and surrounded by all things. Hence it is that he can give them no other name than a figurative one, calling them battle formations or troops of death. For death, the outermost of evils, would be lessened if troops of some other evil surrounded it. But it has been said in the preceding Psalms that Christ has in truth suffered the terror and adversity (taedia) of death for us, even though we do not all have to suffer the same.

30 "The streams of Belial" is also a figurative speech, which indicates the attack and the army of evils without names. For indeed the pain of death is so great that it cannot be named or thought of, but only suffered. The dying feel that they are in a very bad way, but cannot indicate what it is, therefore there is no remedy; just as the taste of eternal life is so great that they feel that they are very well, but still cannot tell or indicate what it is. Therefore the latter is called a river of God's pleasure, Ps. 36:9: "They are made drunk with the riches of thy house, and thou dost water them with pleasure as with a river"; but the latter is called a brook of Belial or wickedness, as he says here.

Belial" is a frequent expression in Scripture, which in Hebrew is supposed to mean wickedness, although it is almost everywhere translated by iniquitas, in a non-genuine meaning. Hence fili Belial (that is, of wickedness), Richt. 19, 22, "bad boys who are not useful." It comes from (meaning, not) and [2', (meaning, he is of use), since they live only to harm others. Therefore also the name was given to the devil, which we pronounce Belial. But that it is taken here for wickedness is certain, namely [the wickedness] of death, which in many ways inflicts evil on those who die and attacks them with streams of evils, since death is a sea and an epitome of evils.

Thus you see how he actually depicts the evils of death, although they cannot be named, that dying is nothing else (for those who lack faith) than suffering armies and whirlpools of evils, and that those who are alone and lonely are surrounded by them and are frightened on all sides, so that they have to say: "I am frightened everywhere" (Ps. 6, 8, § 51).

V. 6. The bonds of hell encompassed me, and the cords of death overcame me.

It is the same expression "the bands of hell" (dolores) as in the previous verse "the bands of death". Therefore the same is to be understood by it, namely that the bands or battle orders of hell are nothing else than the army of all things of the world, which all arm themselves for revenge on the damned. The word: "They surrounded me" has exactly the same meaning and opinion as in the previous verse. But it is the hell and death is little different as far as the sensation of the one who suffers it (dolentis) is concerned. For the death is the bitter separation from the life, but the hell is that the death immediately accompanies the feeling of the soul that the punishment is eternal and inevitable (irreparabilis). For here the soul is caught and surrounded in truth, so that it cannot feel differently than that it must be damned eternally. For if it saw a way out, which would be only a hair's breadth, it would not be surrounded, would also feel neither hell nor death, but would be cheerful full of hope and confidence.

34 And therefore, because the scholastic theologians did not pay careful attention to these words of the Scriptures: "they encompassed", "they overwhelmed", then also never learned anything about these things, they quite certainly dream of the punishment of purgatory, which they only want by assuming that there is no despair in it, but only satisfaction. Nevertheless, they themselves confess that the punishment of purgatory and hell are one and the same, only that they differ in duration. But as they can make very fine distinctions, they say that the punishment is the same in both places, but not all [punishment in purgatory], but only that which is not at the same time guilt (culpa); but since they teach that despair and servile fear are guilt, they exclude them entirely from purgatory. But we, because the knowledge of this matter is based on experience and not on thoughts that one makes of it, will not argue about it, but simply cling to the words of Scripture, even though we do not understand what pains of death and hell the saints complain about, that they are caught and overwhelmed by the same. Those who have experienced such things may see what these words mean; those who have not experienced them we will not believe anywhere, who do not even understand what anger and unchastity are, which are the very grossest and most beastly movements.

35. the same is repeated, as I have said, "death's cords overcame me," where he indicates that he is caught by death, and so caught that he is taken from his

That is, the ropes of death overcame him and were stronger than him, so that he could not escape them. This means being in hell, from which there is no way back, just as a bird caught in a rope does not return. We believe that all this happened in Christ, even though in a miraculous way, that he was caught in truth by the pains, cords and armies of death and hell.

v. 7 When I am afraid, I call upon the Lord, and cry unto my God, and he heareth my voice from his temple, and my cry cometh before him in his ears.

This is a verse in Hebrew, and it has everywhere the verba in the future tense: I will call, I will cry, he will hear, it will come, as Jerome also translated it, and it is read 2 Sam. 22, 7. But there is little need for this, since the prophets have the peculiarity that they usually throw the tenses through each other; however, this does not happen without cause, as we have often said. So the prophet continues to show by his example that what he had taught was true, that all who call on the Lord with praise will be saved. He says: "I too have been in the greatest misfortune, that is, in the pains of death and the bonds of hell, but I have been saved from all these evils; because I have called upon the Lord and cried out to my God, therefore He has heard my voice, and my cry has reached His ears. Therefore, there is no doubt that there is no other way to deliverance than by calling upon the Lord and praising God. For it is said in the 16th Psalm [§ 13 ff.] what emphasis and meaning it has that God is "my God". For no one says: "My God", unless he praises and loves Him, even in the midst of death and hell, as it is written: "Love is strong as death" 2c.

He makes many repetitions because his mind is full of joy, since it is almost the same: "I call upon the Lord" and "I cry out to my God. Likewise: "He hears my voice from his temple.

and, "My cry cometh before him to his ears." For so he seems to say in the Hebrew. But it is all without difficulty, yet also full of the sweetest movements of the heart.

V. 8 The earth shook and was moved, and the foundations of the mountains were moved and shook because he was angry.

38 What David wants to say with what is found from this verse to the tenth, I can not obtain (consequi). Nowhere do we read that the earth was moved, the mountains shaken, and that other things which he lists here were done for David's sake; but neither do we read that it was done for Christ's sake. Others slip through here very easily by making spiritual interpretations (allegorias), and take no account of the context; for what is easier than to attribute to each individual piece its spiritual interpretation?

(39) Lyra says something that has reason, since he says that it is the way of the Scriptures that, in order to praise any particular good deed of God, either all the good deeds of God are repeated in general from the beginning, or from the number of them those that have been shown to the people of God, according to the words of Ps. 119:52: "Lord, when I remember how you have judged from the world, then I am comforted. And Ps. 77, 12. f.: "I remember the deeds of the Lord, yea, I remember thy former wonders, and speak of all thy works, and say of thy doings." Thus begins Deborah Not. 5, when she is about to sing to the Lord about the exodus from Egypt, saying [v. 4 f.], "O Lord, when thou camest forth from Seir, and wentest forth from the field of Edom, the earth trembled, and the heavens dripped, and the clouds were filled with water. The mountains poured out before the LORD, Sinai before the LORD God of Israel." David follows this in the 68th Psalm, saying [v. 8. f.], "GOD, when thou wentest before thy people, when thou walkedest in the wilderness, the earth trembled, and the heavens dripped before this GOD in Sinai, before the GOD who is Israel's GOD." And Ps. 77, 17. f.: "The waters saw thee, O GOD, the waters saw thee, and were afraid, and the deeps raged. The thick clouds poured Water, the clouds thundered, and the rays drove along."

(40) Therefore, it may be that those who praise God tend to go far with the miraculous deeds of God, especially that they cite the miracle that was glorious before others, which He performed in the Exodus from Egypt; as the children of Israel are punished above all because they forgot this miracle, Ps. 78:11. And they doubtless learned many things by the remembrance of it, through the enlightenment of the spirit, so that they seem to have used it as a very common proverb, and then also to have treated the various pieces of it in various spiritual interpretations: yet I do not understand Lyra to interpret the words of this psalm to this very history.

Therefore I must also venture an interpretation (temerandum). First of all, it is my opinion that the past miracles, which happened at the time of the exodus from Egypt, are repeatedly mentioned here and mixed with the present miracles, according to the lovely liberty [which the prophets take] to wander and digress, since we see that this is the custom in Scripture. For even the secular orators teach that if one wants to state something clearly, not only the present, but also the past deeds of the ancestors of the one who is praised must be enumerated at the same time. However, I do not believe that David does only this, but at the same time, out of overflowing joy, he seems to play with the spiritual interpretations of the history in Egypt for the praise of Christ, of whom he clearly recognized that he is meant by this figure. And we see that those who rejoice exceedingly express their joy by spiritual interpretations and new images in speech, so that one might think they are nonsensical. For it delights them to clothe their joy in beautiful and lovely figures of speech and words; one calls what he praises a golden jewel, another its sweetness, another its manna, still another gives it other names. Everybody becomes a poet here, because joy itself teaches to speak in pictures.

This is what Christ does here. Since he rejoices, that the Father heard him and brought him out of hell, he in the Epistle to the Romans as the first and best not only repeats the old miracles of God and mixes them interpreter, who says Cap. 4, 15: "The law only brings in, but also changes and renews them at the same time wrath," and 1 Cor. 15, 56: "The power of sin is the law." by an exceedingly sweet spiritual interpretation, as Rom. 1, 18.: "God's wrath from heaven is revealed against Sirach prays, Cap. 36, 6: "Do new signs and wonders." all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men who hold out For this reason, he does not treat the whole story the truth in unrighteousness." And Rom. 5, 20.: "The law according to its order, but chooses any piece that suits came in beside, that sin might become more powerful." the matter.

Therefore, it is necessary to know the spiritual shake the conscience, and to destroy all [false] interpretation of this history, especially that which confidence. And this is what is represented by the image belongs to the fruit of Christ's resurrection, which is of a great thunderstorm, in such a suitable way that it contained in these two pieces, the law and grace. The cannot be shown more pithily by any other simile law humbles the arrogant, grace exalts the lowly; both (allegoria). For the thunderclaps and lightnings move the happen in a miraculous and diverse way. And these are earth and make it tremble, they also shake and stir the in truth new miracles of God, which He performs through foundations of the mountains, and as the poet says: The no other weapons than the ministry of the Word, through lightnings also shatter the top of the highest mountains. In the despised and unlearned fishermen and their followers. To all this, if I am not mistaken, the prophet Vulg.], "At the voice of thy thunder they shall tremble," alludes in the most delightful way through these figures which is what he says here [Vulg.], "For he is angry with them." But that such a thunderstorm was on Mount Sinai when the law was given is perfectly clear to everyone from the words previously spoken, so that at the same time it would be pictured by the figure what was going on in truth at that time, and the sign would be such as the thing itself was.

44 We read now in the second book of Moses, chap. 19 and 20, when the Lord was about to give the law: "Now when the third day was come, there arose thunder and lightning, and a thick cloud upon the mountain. The whole mountain smoked, so the Lord came down on the mountain with fire; and the smoke of it went up like the smoke of a furnace, and the whole mountain shook greatly. And the sound of the trumpet increased. Moses spoke, and God answered him loudly. When the Lord had come down to Mount Sinai, to the top of the mountain, He called Moses to the top of the mountain" [Ex. 19:16, 18-20].

This figure is too rich for me to attain with words; indeed, I cannot grasp it sufficiently even with my mind. And yet the prophet treats it in the most dignified manner. For the other prophets also have taken much from it, since it is exceedingly rich and full of the mysteries of Christ, for the works of nature, law and grace are treated here, that is, the epitome of the whole theology. Therefore, let us take the apostle

For this reason, the teaching and knowledge of the law, because it has to do with eternal threats and demands what we cannot bear, as it says in Heb. 12:20. It says, "For they could not bear what was said," which is frightening and unbearable to the sinful conscience, and all the more so the stronger and clearer its tone or its knowledge, that is, that through the law in truth comes the knowledge of sin, and that through the law wrath is caused, that is, that the conscience of all men is found guilty and worthy of eternal wrath. This knowledge inwardly in the heart fulfills all that turmoil and impetuosity of the storm, which was seen on the mountain Sinai, as it is described. There I the earth is stirred in truth and it trembles,

That is, the earthly-minded hearts, and not only the mountains themselves, but the foundations of the mountains will be shaken and stirred, that is, "those who are hopeful in their hearts will be scattered" [Luc. 1:51]. For the mountains are the hopeful, the foundations are confidence in power, wisdom, righteousness, and any things. For he who is instructed by the right knowledge of the law recognizes that all flesh cannot stand before God, because man is not justified by the works of the law [Gal. 2:16]. Neither power nor wisdom nor any other good (substantia) can be of use here, everything is shaken and falls away, because he is angry with them, that is, through the law the wrath of God is revealed, especially against those who, trusting in those foundations, hold court before others.

48. "The mountains" he says here without closer relation (absolute), because there are also holy mountains, Ps. 87, 1.: "It is firmly founded on the holy mountains," and in another Psalm [Ps. 36, 7.]: "Your righteousness stands like the mountains of God." But principally the foundations of the mountains are to be understood of confidence in works, or of the works of the law, or of the law and doctrines by which men dare to be justified. For the word and knowledge of the law is primarily intended to make sinners, and "all the world is indebted to God" [Rom. 3:19]. For this is how the apostle of the law primarily uses it against the arrogance of works, by saying Gal. 1) 3, 22. He says: "But the Scripture has decreed it all under sin," "that he might have mercy on all" [Rom. 11, 32:]. And the grace of Christ fights most against the righteousness of men, for this resists most stubbornly the righteousness of God, as it is said in Rom. 10, 3: "For they know not the righteousness that is before God, and seek to establish their own righteousness, and so are not subject to the righteousness that is before God."

49. this is wonderful and well to note-

1) In all Latin editions: "Rom. 3"; in the German translation: Rom. 11, 32. The Weimar version also has this passage in the margin.

The thunderbolts shake not only the peaks but even the foundations of the mountains, for the whole earth trembles, including the foot of the mountains. Thus, the law not only outwardly strikes arrogance, for even the punitive speeches of men can do that, but it also penetrates and shakes the innermost part of the heart, putting even the most secret trust of the conscience in fear, because the law is spiritual and a living word that penetrates more sharply than any two-edged sword [Heb. 4:12], and is no one who can hide from its heat [Ps. 19:7].

50. the hebrew text says with a lovely play on words XXXX XXXXX XXXXXX [it wavered and swayed the earth], which our Latin interpreter perhaps could not render, but said: Commota est et contremuit terra. But it denotes the trembling movement by which someone is moved to flee and run, expressing in the most significant way the power of the law and the fear of conscience. Thus the prophet is lovely, not only in the sayings, but also in the words and in the construction of them, if one would take the time to notice everything.

V. 9. steam went up from his nose, and consuming fire from his mouth, it flashed. 2)

Jerome: Adscendit fumus in furore ejus, et ignis ex ore ejus devorans, carbones incensi sunt ab eo (Smoke rose in his fury, and consuming fire from his mouth; coals were ignited by him). This happens in visible thunderstorms, as often as that which is struck by lightning burns, for here smoke, fire and coals are seen. But that there was smoke and fire on the mountain Sinai, Moses sufficiently indicates, 2 Mos. 19, 18., nowhere however one reads there from coals, unless one wanted to understand that from coals that the mountain was fiery and burning. For it is certain that everything that was on the mountain and near the mountain shone, smoked, burned and steamed with fire, as it says in Deut. 5:23:

2) Vulgate: ^äscsnäit knmns in ira esns, st iZnis a kaeis ss us exursit. Oarbonss sneosnsi snnt so.

"Ye saw the mountain burning with fire." Demi that what was seen was terrible, Paul writes Heb. 12:21, so "that Moses said: I am terrified and I quote". Therefore, at the same time as the fire, the prophet understands the coals, which Moses did not express, and speaks of the same.

52 But he does all this so that he may show by clear signs that he is turning from that history to the secret interpretation and is playing with secrets. Therefore he does not only add the coals, but also some other things, which are not found in the history, or are not read in the same way, like the fact that he says that the foundations of the mountains were moved, since there neither several mountains nor the foundations are thought of, by wanting it to be seen in such a way that the many arrogant ones with their presumptions (praesumptionibus) are represented by the One Mount Sinai. It is also of this kind that the Lord was angry with them, although history says nothing about the Lord's anger against the mountain (in montem) Sinai. It is also of this kind that smoke rose in his anger, while there is nothing said about the smoke of his anger; and, which most clearly indicates the secret interpretation of the history, that he says that fire was kindled from his face, or, as the Hebrew text has it more completely, it consumed from his mouth, for it is not written there either, that the fire from which Mount Sinai burned came from the mouth of God, unless we want to say for this reason that it came from his mouth, because the mountain burned by the lightning that was sent from above, as it were, from the mouth of heaven.

(53) The law, then, is that which proceeds from its mouth, that is, from the mouths of preachers, children, and infants, and inflames, burns, consumes, and devastates all that is prideful in human vanity, in order to prepare the place for grace. For the sound of the law is followed by fear and terror and flight; and since flight is nowhere feasible, fear arises. And this is the fire that consumes and devours all evil, burns out the evil desire, so that we no longer lust after what delighted us before. In such a way

The coals are lit by this same fire, so that sinners, after the evil desire has been burned out by the power of the law, burn, not yet sweetly in love, but mightily in the furnace of their fear, in which they are melted and prepared and purified, like gold in the fire.

54. But the smoke is set before the fire; why is that? Who has ever seen the smoke before the fire? But the smoke is a sign that the fire is present, and although it is not there first, it is visible first. Augustine understands by the smoke the tearful prayer of the penitent (poenitentiam), since they have recognized what God threatens the godless. We do not want to reject this view, but rather strengthen it, so that the smoke is also the outward confession of sins, and all the measurements (argumenta), by which the inward flight and fear of the conscience is revealed, like those, Apost. 2, 37. to whom the words of Peter passed through the heart, and being terrified at them, said, "Men, brethren, what shall we do?" For by these words they indicate what they suffer inwardly. So the ransom rises in his wrath, because the wrath of God, having been recognized by the law, casts down the hopeful into the depths, and from these depths they send up this smoke of their repentance on high.

55) It says 2 Sam. 22, 9 [Vulg.]: "Smoke went up from his nose, and fire from his mouth consumed" (voravit), where our Bible editions (codices) have volavit by an error of the writer, wherein he seems to speak of the smoke of one who is angry, not of the smoke of one who repents. But since he acts a secret interpretation, it fits well that, as the mouth of the Lord is called the mouth of the preachers, and the fire from his mouth the power of the law in the sinner, so also the nose of the Lord are the same preachers, because by them he indicates and reveals his anger. Therefore, just as fire consumes in sinners, even though it proceeds from the nose of the Lord, so smoke rises in them, even though it proceeds from the nose of the Lord. For it is not possible, in the historical and literal sense, for the fire to come from the mouth, or from the nose.

The interpreter says that a burning fire and a smoke of wrath are consuming someone, or that the smoke rises from someone's nose, since a sneezer rather expels his breath downward from himself. But in Hebrew both expressions are ambiguous and the interpreter translates them in different ways, so that he says here: a burning fire and a smoke of anger, but there: a consuming fire and a smoke of the nose. I would say as it is spoken in this Psalm: a burning fire and a smoke of wrath.

v. 10. He bowed the heavens and descended, and darkness was under distant feet.

56. history also teaches this, as it says: "a very thick cloud began to cover the mountain", and Deut. 5, 22. f. and Hebr. 12, 18. the same darkness is remembered. And Ex 19:20 says: "The LORD came down to Mount Sinai, to the top of it, and called Moses to the top of the mountain."

Many have invented much of this darkness, especially the well-known (ille) Dionysius, whoever he may have been. We want to continue on the chosen path with our secret interpretation, according to which, as we 52 f.] said, the arrogant: are humbled by the service of the law, and that this is treated in this passage. Only the power of the law and the wrath of God revealed by it is not felt, it does not shake the foundations of the mountains nor make the earth tremble, it does not ignite the coals nor consume the sinners nor bring forth smoke, unless the Lord Himself inwardly moves, teaches and gives prosperity. For how many have heard John the Baptist, Christ and the apostles flashing and thundering with the thunderbolts of the future judgment and the wrath of God, who, hardened in heart like the Behemoth, who has a heart as hard as an anvil, could not be moved, just as we see many who despise and laugh at the bodily thunderbolts, even though they see that others are killed by them.

58. this is what he says here, and is modeled there, where it is written that the LORD came down to Mount Sinai.

[Ex. 19:20]. For: "He bowed the heavens", that is, he sent the apostles out into the world against the arrogant children of Adam, "and descended", working with them and confirming their speech, as it is said in Gal. 2, 8: "He who with Petro was strong for the apostleship among the circumcision, he also with me was strong among the Gentiles."

59 "And darkness was under his feet," that is, his works and ways cannot be known. This is done by working a strange work, that he might work his work; by condemning, that he might make blessed; by shaking the conscience, that he might bring it to peace. For the works of justification are contrary to all human sense, which cannot bear to be humiliated and made nothing by the power of the law, because it does not understand how well it is dealt with. For he thinks he will be destroyed, while in truth he goes out like the morning star. And he is scattered that he may be gathered, he is plucked up that he may be planted. So faith is needed in this darkness, as Job 3:23 says: "To the man whose way is hidden, and God covers it from him." Jer. 10, 23. f.: "I know, O Lord, that man's doings are not in his power; chasten me with measure, and not in thy wrath" 2c.

v. 11. And he rode on the cherub, and flew along, floating on the wings of the wind.

(60) Nothing of this is read in the history, unless it refers to the fact that in Exodus 25:40 Moses was commanded to watch and make everything according to the image that was shown to him on the mountain. Among them were also the cherubim [Ex 25:18 ff], which were to be made of gold, in the midst of which was the mercy seat; of which the Lord spoke to Moses, as is said there. Thus the prophet, out of exuberant joy, connects at the same time also the mysteries of the tabernacle with the mysteries of Mount Sinai. For it is unbelievable how abundantly the secrets of the Scriptures play into each other and flow in heaps, when once the restlessness of the dangers has subsided, and man is free and joyful in spirit; for then knows he does everything, dares everything, is able to do everything that the anointing that is with him teaches him [1 John 2:27]. Afterwards it became the custom in the holy Scriptures to call God the One who sits on cherubim, as, Ps. 99, 1: "The Lord is King, therefore the nations rage; He sits on cherubim, therefore the earth stirs." And Ps. 80, 2. f.: "Appear, thou that sittest over cherubim. Awaken your power, who are before Ephraim, Benjamin and Manasseh" (that is, on the ark of the covenant, which was toward the west, where those three tribes were located).

(61) For the Lord always wanted and has always taken care that there should be some memorial and outward sign by which he would bind the faith of the believers to him, so that they would not be diverted by various and strange devotions (fervoribus) to self-chosen worship or rather idolatry. Thus in Gen 22:14 the mountain is called Moriah, that is, the LORD beheld, 1) because there he looked upon the sacrifice of Abraham. And Gen. 35, 1. Jacob is commanded to make an altar to the GÖtte, who appeared to him at Bethel. Therefore Moses commanded [Deut. 12:5] that they should not set up any other place for worship than that which the Lord had chosen; but later they often transgressed this by setting up high places and groves. He also gave them the tabernacle of the covenant, the mercy seat, and the cherubim as a place where they could find and call upon Him, all of which is modeled on Christ.

For now we have no place, but we are not without signs and monuments, such as baptism and the mass, but even these are not bound to any place, for Christ now reigns everywhere, and one may baptize, preach and eat the holy bread wherever one wishes. Therefore, our mercy seat, our cherub are in secret, and can only be grasped by faith in the secret of the Word. Christ is the mercy seat, as Paul teaches Rom. 3, 25: "Whom God has set forth as a mercy seat in His blood," "in whom dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily" [Col. 2, 9.], and: "God was in Christ and reconciled the world to Himself" ^2 Cor. 5, 19.]. The two cherubim with wings, which touched each other above and covered the mercy seat, which, with their faces turned toward each other, looked toward the mercy seat, are the two testaments, one of which is the word of the law, the other the word of grace. These are also, as can be seen, opposed to each other (adversa), since the law increases sin, while grace takes it away. But in Christ they come together. "For that which was impossible for the law God did, and sent His Son, and condemned sin by sin, that righteousness required by the law might be fulfilled in us" [Rom. 8, 3. f.].

1) In the editions viäeditnr, for which with the Vulgate probably viäedit should be read.

(63) This is also the intention of those who say that "cherub" means a multitude or fullness of knowledge, because the ministry of both words, that is, of the law and of the promise or grace, teaches all things when it is rightly done. So the Lord rides or rides on the cherubim in spirit and in truth, when he reigns in us through faith, which is prepared in us by the ministry of both words. For what our interpreter has given: Adscendit super cherubim, the Hebrew text expresses more appropriately: He rides or rides, to signify the life-working (vital) kingdom of faith within us. So our cherub 2) is not bound to any place, but everywhere, wherever the word of faith is, the Lord sits on the cherubim through Christ and reigns in us. Therefore, this was also observed in the example, that above the mercy seat and the cherubim nothing was placed that could have been seen, but by faith alone one believed that God had His seat there, and "from that place (says God [Ex. 25, 22.]) I will speak to you". Thus, it is only by faith that we believe that God dwells in Christ; we believe this through the testimony of the cherubim of both Testaments, and we may not expect the word of God from anywhere else than from this mercy seat, Christ.

64. the same thing now seems to be said again (per tautologiam): "He floated on the fittest of the winds" or of the spirits. For he speaks of a spiritual wind, because it is the very word of the Spirit that interprets the law and shows grace. For this word comes quickly as the wind that blows where it wills, and you hear its sound, but you do not know from where it comes or where it goes [John 3:8]. But the fittest of these winds are the oral words on which these spirits fly. For the pagans also invent of their Mercurius, by which they want to indicate the divine speech, that he is winged at the feet. So much is the inclination to spiritual interpretations implanted in the human mind by nature. So he hovers over us on the wings of the winds, that is, through the ministry of the oral word, through which faith is taught, he hovers over us, so that where the oral word is, grasped by the spirit of faith, there is no doubt that the Lord is and hovers over us.

He says "fly", although the cherubim, which were made of gold, could not fly, because he saw that the cherubim would not be given wings in vain in the law, since wings are given for flying. He understood that it was indicated that in the future there would be a flight of the Word through the whole world, which is the ministry of the Word, and above this flight, and above these wings, the Lord would hover and be present everywhere at His Word, as it says Marc. 16, 20: "The Lord worked with them, and confirmed the Word by signs that followed." Therefore this flying seems to me to indicate the swift running of the Word through the world, as it is also said in the 147th Psalm, v. 15: "His Word runs swiftly." But not only this, but also that it indicates that neither the Word, nor the Lord who cooperates, is idle in the church. For one must never let go of the word, but it must always be in use, in motion, in flight, so that the Lord Himself may always fly and move the faith in us. Although He is able to do everything by Himself, He has decided not to do it in any other way than through the ministry of the Word, so that faith may have a place, and so that we may be saved from our weakness, which cannot bear divine things unless they are wrapped up in the Word, through which, as it were, He has given us the power of the Word.

Therefore, it is not to be despised that he used the word "fly" twice; [this he did in order] to instruct us that the Spirit of the Lord is not carried over the waters of the nations, nor does he rule through his present deity (numine), but only those who are instructed with the word, so that the presumption of human power and free will may be destroyed, and the grace and blessedness of God our Savior may be praised toward those who hear and keep the word of God. It is also written in Deut. 32:11 that the Lord hovered over the people of Jacob, as an eagle carries out its young to fly and hovers over them.

But if someone wanted to take the flight on the fittest of the wind from the history of Mount Sinai, I would not argue very much against it. Perhaps it can be said that the Lord, when he descended on the mountain, hovered on the foothills of the wind. For he did not use the mountain as a support, since it must rather be said that he abstained in the air, since he is carried by nothing, but carries all things himself with his powerful word [Heb. 1:3], which is indicated by this flying.

V. 12. His tent was dark around him, and black thick clouds, wherein he was hid. 1)

(68) Since darkness is always fruitful, as is ignorance, it may again seem as if the prophet touches the twofold model (figuram) of Sinai and the tabernacle, at least in the first part [of this verse], which seems to speak of the darkness of the Holy of Holies and the tabernacle. For the fact that there was no light in the Holy of Holies signified that, since God dwells in His Church through Christ, faith is in their hearts, which neither comprehends nor is comprehended, neither sees nor is seen, and yet sees all things. For he is a certain confidence of things, which through present, yet is not seen.

1) Vulgate: posnit tenedras latidnlnin säum, in eirenitn esns taksrnaenlnin chns. "kenedro^a aqna in nnbibns aeris.

but were not seen at all, just as the ark of the covenant was most certainly present in the holy of holies, but was not seen. So his tent was around him, because he himself had his seat in the midst of the holy of holies. This indicates, as it is said in Ps. 46, 6, that God is in the midst of His church, therefore it cannot be made to waver. The prophets drew these and similar prophecies from this example.

For God does not rule in us only outwardly with the tongue and with the word, but in power; neither are those constant who believe in Him with the tongue and with words; but those who believe from the heart are righteous [Rom. 10:10]; in the midst of whom He Himself dwells. These are strong, and in all things they have help through the face of God (that is, through the presence of God), as it is said in Ps. 46:6, "God will help her with His face," or, "God will help her early," that is, with His certainly present Godhead and face itself.

70 But we will also come to Mount Sinai, of which it is written that when the Lord descended, the mountain began to be covered with darkness, and it is rightly said that on the summit and in the midst of the mountain He established darkness for His hidden abode (latibulum), signifying the same faith by which He dwells in the midst of His church in our hearts, where He is not seen. But since this darkness is apart from us, the letter that kills is terrifying to the prudence of the flesh, since it greatly fears to be killed, and yet it must be killed, as the law teaches that it must be killed, so that it may ascend with Moses to the top of the mountain, who had entered the darkness to the Lord. For one cannot come to the Lord in darkness unless the prudence of the flesh has been killed by the law.

71 In circuito suo tabernaculum suum, namely posuit, is the same [as posuit tenebras latibulum suum] repetitively, although in Hebrew the preposition in does not stand, but so: Circuitum suum tabernaculum suum, that is, as he ordered that the darkness would be his hidden abode.

He has also arranged that his tent should be around him. This seems to me to be said in the sense that faith or the church sanctified by faith is that in which God dwells. For this reason He makes His tent only that by which He is surrounded, that is, closed and hidden, just as He was surrounded and closed by the Holy of Holies and surrounded by the cloud and darkness on Mount Sinai.

(72) And it is against the reputation of persons that he says his tent is that by which he is surrounded. Everything, whatever this may be, has neither name nor reputation of the person. For all who surround him and cling to him, whether they be Gentiles or Jews, become his tent, for there is no difference. But this is bitter (as I have said) for the flesh that is to enter [to God into darkness], lovely for the spirit that has entered. For man enters only through the darkness of faith, and faith only through the death of the flesh. Therefore, this darkness, as long as it is external, is death and hell; as soon as it has become internal, it is life and blessedness. For the letter holds the darkness and the cross against us, but the spirit of faith breaks through and finds the Lord after he has entered the darkness. Therefore, the one who flees and is terrified of the darkness, like the people of Israel who refused [and asked] that the word of the law not be spoken to them [Ex. 20:19 ff], does not reach the Lord. For if you do not hear the law, which must humble and crucify you, you will not hear the Lord speaking to Moses within. But also Moses does not go in any other way than that the Lord calls him, as the words 2 Mos. 19, 20 indicate.

73. *tenebrosa aqua*¹) in nubibus aeris. Jerome: In nubibus aetheris. Certainly, according to the Hebrew, it can also be said: In nubibus nubium [in exceedingly dense clouds]. For each of these two expressions XXX and XXXXX denotes a cloud, so that we must understand a dense and thick cloud as in thunderstorms; and better it would be in the accusative: tenebrosam aquam and without the preposition in, in this way: Posuit tenebras latibulum suum, circuitum suum tabernaculum suum, tenebrosam aquam nubem nubium, so that what follows explains what precedes. As if he wanted to say: He wanted the darkness to be his hidden abode, in the midst of which he wanted to dwell; this darkness was that black water in the exceedingly dense cloud of the storm. By all this is signified the killing of the old man, which the Lord exercises in his own by the word of the law; and yet he does not do this in a cruel way, since he is near to all those to whom he inflicts this evil, that he may do them good. That is why this happens "around him".

74 Although the dark waters in the clouds of the air are everywhere referred to speculations about dark prophetic passages, we who pay attention to the context of the words and sentences understand by the dark waters the work of the law, that is, the death of the flesh, the sadness of the conscience and the wrath of judgment, whereby the flesh is afflicted, just as those dark clouds full of water are both sad and burdensome to the senses during storms. For both water and darkness signify tribulation and persecution in the Scriptures.

The thick clouds (nubes nubium) or the clouds of the air are the apostles who proclaim sorrowful things to the world, by which they bring all men under sin through the word of the law, because they are around the Lord, and the Lord is present in the midst of them, hidden, and works all things through them by means of the word. Thus it is said of the vineyard of the Lord, which He calls Israel, Isa. 5:6: "I will command the clouds that they rain not upon it." And Isa. 60, 8. "Who are they that fly as the clouds, and as the doves to their windows?" But when the black clouds are dispersed, they send down a salutary rain, which before seemed to threaten doom by their black appearance. Thus, a preacher of the Law and yet makes alive when he teaches that the Law is fulfilled in the Spirit through Christ. The figurative speech of clouds and rain is frequent in Scripture for the ministry of the Word.

V. 13. From the brightness before him the clouds parted, with hail and lightning (grando et carbones ignis).

I confess that I do not understand the meaning of this verse, according to which it should be connected with the previous one. Therefore, my first explanation shall be this word: I do not know. But in order to give rise to better things, let us talk about it in the uncertain. Augustine and Jerome understand it that the apostles turned from the Jews to the Gentiles, but they do not indicate the context according to which this must be understood that it happened from the splendor before the face of the Lord. And lest we think that we alone are struggling in this passage: even Cassiodorus thinks that "before the brightness" is an expression in the pluralis, which must be referred to the clouds, as if one said: very bright clouds. Admittedly, it is no wonder if we also miss something, since such great men speak almost nonsensically in such a tremendous misnomer (lapsu).

In the meantime, I will also give my thoughts. Up to now, the prophet has sung about the ministry of the Word according to its first part, the teaching of the Law, through which sinners are humbled, where the Lord is present. Now he also sings about the later and other part, through which, after the power of the law has been demonstrated, the word of grace exalts and comforts the humiliated. This will be the meaning: Those black and terrible clouds, in which the wrath of God is revealed by the word of the law, pass by, pass away, and are emptied before the exceedingly great brightness and clarity that is in His presence, that is, the revelation and knowledge of God, by which His mercy is known, is so lovely that the former unrest, which the word of the law caused, no longer grieves. For (as Bernhard says) just as self-knowledge without the

If the knowledge of God works despair, the knowledge of God without self-knowledge works presumption, if otherwise this can be called a knowledge of God that is without self-knowledge, since it is necessarily only a contemplative (speculativa).

(78) Thus Paul attributes joy and hope to the glory that is recognized, saying: "For if the ministry that preaches condemnation had clarity, how much more does the ministry that preaches righteousness have exuberant clarity. For even that part which was glorified is not to be regarded as clarity in comparison with this exuberant clarity. Because we now have such hope, we need great joy." And afterwards, v. 18: "But now in us all the glory of the Lord is reflected with unveiled face; and we are glorified in the same image, from one glory to another, as of the Lord, who is the Spirit." You see that the apostle, speaking of the clearness of the uncovered face, puts almost the same words that are in this verse [Vulg.]: "Before the brightness of his face." For what is the brightness of his face but the glory or the clearness of the uncovered face of GOD?

79) What then is the glory of the Lord? What the uncovering of the face? We have said in the fourth Psalm [64 ff] and in others that the face of the Lord and the face of God above us and set before us is nothing else than having the Lord present and gracious, trusting in him, and, as is the custom of Scripture, knowing the Lord, which in this world is only by faith. Thus the apostle Heb. 8, 11. says from Jeremiah [Cap. 31, 34.], "And let not a man teach his neighbor, saying, Know the Lord: for they shall all know me from the least to the greatest." And Isa. 11:9: "For the land is full of the knowledge of the LORD, as it is covered with the waters of the sea." This knowledge of God makes the heart glad, just as self-knowledge grieves, because the latter presents mercy before our eyes, as Ps. 26:3 says; but the latter always presents our sin before us, and forces us always to think of our sin, as the 51st Psalm [v. 5] says. The face

The glory of God is therefore the revealed knowledge of God, in which the glory or clarity of God is seen. But the glory of God is our justification, which we see is not in the running of man, but in the mercy of God. Therefore we give glory not to ourselves but to the Lord, who, as the apostle says, does everything "to the praise of his glorious grace" [Eph. 1:6], so that "he who boasts may boast of the Lord" [1 Cor. 1:31], after our glory has been completely destroyed and our shame exposed by the word of the law.

80) But after the clouds have "passed by" and the sinners have been sufficiently humbled by the knowledge of sin brought about by the ministry of the law, and they are brought before the face of God, where they recognize the glory of God's grace, and are brought to peace: then they are joyful and praise, and at the same time the hail and the fiery coals also pass by (transeunt). For so, I believe, must be referred to the verb "pass by" both the clouds and the hail and the fiery coals.

81 "Hail" figuratively refers to the harsh and harsh words of the law, or as it is elsewhere [Ps. 9:6J], the rebuke among the nations.

But "the fiery coals," which the Latin interpreter calls "coals of fire" according to the Hebrew manner of speaking, we understand either from the same ones of which he said above [v. 9. Vulg.] that they are kindled by fire, namely the sinners themselves, who are burned by the fire 1) of fear; or the same words of the law, by which that fire of repentance is kindled in the conscience. I like the latter best, for all this passes away when the bodily knowledge of God's mercy is revealed. For then the clouds, which before were hateful, become pleasant, and the preachers of the law, whom we detested, we love, and finally approve of their hard and burning words, not unlike a child hates its disciplinarian and its discipline, until it has attained the inheritance and recognizes what it is for.

1) Erlanger and Weimarsche: i'ni instead of the hard disciplinarian was useful. Paul uses this example in his letter to the Galatians [Cap. 4, 1. ff.], which is not unsuitable for the understanding of this passage.

(83) I believe that the prophet took all this from the part of history where it is written [Exodus 20:21] that Moses went up the mountain and entered into the darkness, that is, before the face of the Lord. For we understand it in this way, that this storm was not before the Lord, but only around him, as he also said in the previous verse. Just as the glory of the Lord appeared to Moses when he went in before the face of God, so also, because the Lord had spoken to him, he brought with him the brightness of his face, as it is written in Exodus 34:29. It is written that at the same time the clouds and the hail and the fiery coals passed away, and were no longer before His face because of the splendor of the face of God: so also, as the apostle teaches [2 Cor. 3:18, 12], in all of us the clarity of the Lord is reflected with His face uncovered, and we are transfigured into the same image through fellowship in the same clarity, and have great hope and joy. The driver ceases; the yoke of her burden, the rod of the driver, and the staff of her shoulder is broken by the child that is born to us, and the Son that is given to us, Isa. 9:4, 6.

Again, the prophet either adds something to the story, or he plays from his own spirit with a figurative speech. For we do not read explicitly in the second book of Moses that hail and fiery coals were sent down from heaven on Mount Sinai, but because it was a strong thunderstorm, it is understood that fire, hail, snow, and stormy winds intervened no less than they were mixed in with the plagues of Egypt [Ex. 9:23], since the office of the law is depicted in both places.

I say this according to my understanding; let another follow his sense. For that the word transierunt means a change is proven by the saying Matth. 24, 35: "Heaven and earth will pass away (transibunt), but my words will not pass away.

go"; this is the meaning I have adopted at this time and in this place. Now if someone wants to understand it in this way, "the clouds, the hail, the coals pass before the clarity of the Lord's face," that is, that the word and the rebuke of the law be strong and penetrate, and not be hindered from accomplishing in sinners that for which it is preached, because of the presence of the glory of God that is preached, which puts to shame the arrogance of men, as the prophet Ps. 77, 18. [Vulg.] seems to say: "For your arrows pass by" (transeunt), I do not reject it. Here, too, the transitive can rhyme beautifully with the preceding and the following, so that the power of the word is shown, as it says in Heb. 4:12: "The word of God is living and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword," and it is not up to me to decide which of the two views is preferable.

V.14. And the LORD thundered in heaven, and the Most High let out his thunder (vocem) with hail and lightning.

This verse almost forces us to take the latter view of the previous verse, but we will look at both, and the former first. The prophet seems to refer to the fact that it is written in Exodus 19:19 that the Lord answered Moses when he spoke, after which thunder (voces [Exodus 20:18]) was heard, and the Lord spoke the Ten Commandments. The spiritual interpretation of this is that only through the voice of the Lord is the law fulfilled. For what is it but that Moses speaks, and the Lord answers him, that the law is given by Moses, but grace and truth are given by Christ, who answers the law and fulfills it alone? As it is said in John 1:17: "The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth were given by Jesus Christ. So the Lord thunders from heaven (de coelo), that is, he preaches the word of grace from the host (de choro) of the apostles; and the same is said, "He sends forth his thunder" (dat vocem suam), repeatedly. For the voice of the Lord is a powerful voice,

As we will see Ps. 29, 4. and Ps. 68, 34.: "Behold, he will give strength to his thunder (voci suae)."

The 147th Psalm, v. 16-18, also plays beautifully with this image: "He gives snow like wool, he scatters frost like ashes. He casts his locks (crystallum suam, that is hail) like morsels; who can remain before his frost? He speaks, and it melts; he blows his wind, and it thaws." By all this is signified the ministry of preaching, which is rough in its first office, that of the law, but sweet in its later office, that of the word. In this sense, "hail and fiery coals" must be taken in a different sense than we took it in the previous verse. For there we 81 f.] said that they were the rough and burning words of the law, but here we shall have to say that sweet and refreshing words are signified. Now, even if we could assert to some extent (utcuque) through the expenditure of effort that the word of grace is harsh, burning for flesh and blood (for man does not recognize the value of it, as Jn 6:60, 63. to the Jews the speech of Christ, which was a speech of life, was harsh and a speech of death, and Paul confesses that it is a good smell of Christ, but only to some for life, to others for death), it is clear that this is violent and forced.

Then the order of the words would be this: The LORD hath omitted his thunder (vocem suam, which is hail and fiery coals, that is, rough and burning, "for our GOD is a consuming fire" [Heb. 12:29.], yea, as it is said in Jer. 23:29: "Is not my word like a fire, saith the LORD, and like a hammer that breaketh in pieces rocks?") Therefore we must also treat the other view and subject it to the judgment of each one. Although he had sufficiently said in the foregoing that the earth shook, that the foundations were shaken when the Lord was angry, and that He flew on the cherubim, and other things by which the power of the word of the law was pronounced, and the presence of the Lord in the ministry of the word: yet he deals with the same thing in these verses, in that he wants to inculcate and explain the same thing. For

He says that even the clouds had their effect (fuisse efficaces) before his brightness, and that the Lord thundered in them from heaven, letting out his thunder with hail and lightning, so that the work which the law does with threatening, terrifying, troubling, quarreling, scolding, punishing, burning and consuming (for we have seen that all these are given to the office of the law in these verses) should be ascribed to the clouds, to the apostles and preachers, but to the Lord alone, who gives that clouds, hail, and fiery coals pass by, for he himself lets out this his thunder (vocem) from heaven. For so we also read in history [Ex. 19, 16] that thunder and lightning arose before the sound of the trumpet, so that a clearer and clearer knowledge of the law is given through the constant stopping with teaching.

It is therefore obvious that the translators did not understand these verses either, since they translated against the manner of the language (per soloecum): Dedit vocem suam, grando et carbones ignis, whereas it should have been translated thus: Vocem suam, grandinem et carbones ignis, in the accusative, depending on the verbum dedit. Now there is nothing to do with distinguishing the thunder (vocem) from the coals and the hail, or with combining them, if only both are understood from the word of the sermon. As the same is various and serves for various movements of the mind, so it is also represented by numerous signs (impressionibus) of the heavens, as there are the stars, the rain, the hail, the mist, the snow, the lightning, the thunderclaps, and all things that can fall from the heavens, whether they make alive or kill; the former of these are to be referred to the word of life, the latter to the word of the law. The heavens are the apostles, as we shall see in the following Psalm.

2 Sam. 22, 12. ff. these verses are somewhat different, for there one reads thus: Posuit tenebras in circuitu suo latibulum suum (where latibulum suum is omitted, and instead of tabernaculum suum is put latibulum suum), cribrans aquas de nubibus coelorum (instead of densitas aquarum in nubibus nubium, for dense clouds seem to pass the water as through a sieve to pour down). Instead of prae fulgore in conspectu ejus [nubes] transierunt, [grando et] carbones ignis,¹) our [Latin] text has there [2 Sam. 22, 13.]: Prae fulgore in conspectu ejus²) succensi sunt carbones ignis (for nubss is superfluous, and succensi sunt is the same verbum as transierunt, in that it means both), tonabit de coelo Dominus, et excelsus dabit vocem suam³) (where grando and carbones ignis is not repeated). I leave this diversity to those who have time and desire.

V. 15. He shot his rays (sagittas), and scattered them; he caused great lightning, and terrified them.

It is obvious that the prophet speaks figuratively of the arrows, since nothing is read of them in history; therefore he calls "arrows" the lightnings themselves, of which it is said in Exodus 19:16: "There arose thunderings and lightnings." So also the 77th Psalm [v. 18. f. Vulg.] calls them, "For his arrows go forth, there is thunder in heaven." Hence the words by which the conscience is struck are called arrows, Ps. 38, 3. "For thine arrows are in me." And Job 6, 4. "For the arrows of the Almighty are in me, the same fury drinketh out of my spirit, and the terrors of GOD are upon me." We read everywhere much of such arrows, as also Ps. 7, 14.: "His arrows have he prepared to destroy."

So these "rays", lightnings, arrows are the same words of the law, which frighten, disturb, pierce the heart of the sinner, because the prophet still remains to explain and inculcate the office of the law. Therefore, this verse also serves to prove that the preceding verses are to be understood according to the latter conception, more of the office of the word of the law, than of the word of the law.

1) Here the text of the editions is not in order, therefore we had to insert the words in square brackets. The confusion seems to us to have arisen from the fact that Luther quoted both texts (2 Sam. 22 and our Psalm), but the scribes could not follow him. The editors did not fix it either.

2) Here we have omitted undes according to the Vulgate. This also requires the explanation that follows immediately.

3) We have inserted this text from 2 Sam. 22, 14. instead of: "t intonnit Ú6 ooelo Domina" ot ultissirnns äoäit vo66in hardly what is found in our place.

from your word of grace, so that the right way of connection may exist. For we have said that the word of the law is diverse and manifold in its work, which it works in the heart of the sinner with terror, threatening, punishing, burning 2c. Therefore it is also explained on Mount Sinai by various symbols of thunderstorms, and here and in other places by various words denoting a thunderstorm. All this is understood more and easier (felicius) by experience than it can be explained by words, since also the prophet, as if he could not achieve this with his words, turns to history and wanted to indicate more than explain with figurative words.

(92) Therefore, if we cannot understand other things, we should be satisfied that through all the storm on Mount Sinai and all the words with which it is told to us, all the turmoil that the Word of God stirs in the hearts of sinners is held up to us, so that they are changed to hate themselves and the world, and are salvifically killed. For these are the wars of the LORD of hosts, who wars against them from heaven, as Deborah Not. 5, 20. So that the summa, the goal and the right understanding of this psalm is that Christ, who suffered, is raised again, preached by the Holy Spirit, believed and worshipped, humbling the hope of the world. For this is the summary and brief understanding of this whole psalm, as anyone who is attentive can easily see.

But he says, "He scattered them," that is, he tore them apart and divided them. For he did not come to send peace, but the sword [Matth. 10, 34.], so that man would not only be separated from his household, but also from himself, through the hatred against his own soul in this world. And he did not merely send lightnings, but "he made lightnings many", so that he might draw the world into the turmoil of the cross through the multitude of preachers. Thus it says Ps. 68, 12: "The Lord gives the word with great multitudes of evangelists" (virtute is so much as exercitu [hosts]). He says Jer. 16, 16: "I will send out many fishermen, who will they shall fish." This, then, is a wholesome dispersion and disturbance, by which they are brought to right unity and peace. 2 Sam. 22, 15. it is thus said: Misit sagittas et dissipavit eos, fulgur, et consum- sit eos. Some understand by the lightnings the miracles by which the Lord confirmed the word of the apostles. I leave these their opinion, because it is not clumsily spoken.

V. 16 Then water was poured out, and the ground was uncovered, O LORD, from your rebuke, from the breath and snorting of your nose.

94 This can in no way belong to history, in which nothing is said about the springs of water (de fontibus aquarum) and the foundations of the earth, if he does not refer to the word 2 Mos. 15, 27. The children of Israel came to Elim, and there were twelve wells of water and seventy palm trees," by which, according to the unanimous judgment of all, the twelve apostles and the seventy disciples of Christ are modeled, so that the prophet treats the history of the whole exodus piecemeal, and sings of the mysteries of the New Testament according to the freedom of his spirit. For indeed, through the ministry of the Word, the world has come to know that the apostles would be the fountains of water, the princes of the world, as was promised to Abraham and his seed. So it is also said in Ps. 45, 17: "Instead of your fathers you will have children, you will set them as princes in all the world." The same is said Ps. 68, 27. "Praise GOD the LORD in the assemblies, for the fountain of Israel."

95. Therefore, if we understand the living apostles and prophets or their books, it will come to the same thing. For just as no one would have considered the apostles and prophets to be such and such great men, if the Lord had not revealed and glorified them by the ministry of the Word and the powerful working of miracles, so no one would have considered their books and their minds to be such and so great as to be the fountains and foundations of the earth, if the Spirit of Christ had not revealed it. But it is rightly believed that the apostolic mind and sense was the best that was in the apostles, and that the relics of garments, ge

These are the foundations of the faith of the simple people, which are nothing compared to the relics of books or rather of the mind, which cannot be left behind by any books, but can only be preserved in the hearts of its believers by the benevolence of the spirit. These are the foundations of which Paul says Eph. 2, 19. 20.: "You are now no longer sojourners and strangers, but citizens with the saints and members of God's household, built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets."

Therefore, this verse is also a part of the proof that the prophet in this psalm speaks in the spirit and literally treats the spiritual interpretation taken from history in Christ.

But he says that all this was not done by human will or by our care. For who has ever ascribed to his word such great power that what has happened through the ministry of the gospel in the whole world, the incredible great deeds of God foretold in this psalm and now fulfilled, should happen through it? This is what has happened, "O Lord, from your rebuke", for you have rebuked the Gentiles, and the wicked have perished, Ps. 9, 6, they have been salutarily rebuked and changed for the better. So it says John 16:8: "He will punish the world for sin," and Romans 11:32: "For God has decreed all things among unbelievers, that He might have mercy on all," and Romans 3:19, 20: "That every mouth might be stopped up, and all the world guilty before God; so that no flesh by the works of the law might be justified in His sight."

The second part of the verse is formed by the words: "From the breath and the blowing of your nose" (ab inspiratione spiritus irae tuae), because that is how it is divided in Hebrew. The snorting of God's wrath he puts together with the breath by which man is made alive or becomes a living being, as it is said in Genesis 2:7: "He breathed into his nostrils the living breath." Does not the breath of wrath (spiritus irae) rather kill than blow life into him? Yes, indeed, he is the spirit (spiritus) that punishes the world for sin [Joh. 16, 8.] and reveals God's wrath against all men, as

Rom. 1, 18. is said. But just by this he breathes the life of grace into those who are humiliated by this wrath. Thus it is said in Isa. 11, 4: "He will smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath (spiritu) of his lips he will slay the wicked."

We have described the ministry of the church and the fruit of the resurrection of Christ crucified. All this, he says, was done "through the Spirit who sanctifies," as Paul also speaks in his superscription Rom. 1:4, in which he very briefly and beautifully summarizes everything that is said in this psalm about the ministry of the word and the fruit of Christ's resurrection, as one can easily see if one carefully compares both and pays attention to it.

V.17. He sent out from on high, and took me, and drew me up out of great waters.

(99) Since Christ confessed in the foregoing that he suffered, called, and was heard, and then sang of the miracles wrought in the whole world by his resurrection through the ministry of the word, why does he again boast that he was drawn out of many waters? For after he was raised and preached, he was not drawn out of the waters again. I do not believe that he returns to what he had begun to tell about his salvation, as if he had inserted preaching of the miracles of the Word, but according to the simple nature of the connection I assume that he now speaks in the person of his church. For after the word of the cross was preached and sinners were frightened and converted to the faith, persecution began immediately, first among the Jews, so that the apostles were forced to go to the Gentiles because of their unbelief and rage.

Therefore, he sings about the story that Lucas writes about the apostles and the believers in the Acts of the Apostles. The following is very fitting [v. 28], where he contrasts the wretched people with the "arrogant" people of the Jews, and [v. 44. f.] the obedience of the Gentiles in contrast to their disobedience.

and [v. 50] says that he gives thanks among the Gentiles, which can certainly not be understood to mean that he spoke this in his own person. It also makes a difference that from this verse to the end of the psalm almost all verba are in the future tense, while until then they were in the past tense, so that we may recognize that Christ speaks of the church and in the church. For also Apost. 9, 4. Christ said from heaven to Paul: "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?" although he only persecuted the church of Christ.

The Lord also says to the king Sanherib in 2 Kings 19:27 ff: "I know your living, your going out and your coming in, and that you rage against me. Because thou hast raged against me, and thy riotousness is come out in mine ears," though he persecuted only the people of Israel. Hence the 82nd Psalm, v. 3. dares to say, "For thine enemies rage, O LORD, and they that hate thee lift up their heads," and yet it follows [v. 4.], "They make crafty plots against thy people." For this He promised in Ex. 23:22, "I will be an enemy to thine enemies;" and Zech. 2:8, "He that toucheth you toucheth the apple of mine eye;" and Gen. 12:3, "I will curse them that curse thee."

So Christ says in the person of his church, which is gathered from the Jews: "He will send (mittet) from on high, and fetch (accipiet) me, and draw me out of great waters" (assumet). This he did when he sent the Holy Spirit from heaven, and gathered out of the raging Jews all those whom he had previously ordained. For "the great waters" in this passage are the peoples of the Jews, as it is said in Revelation 17:15, "The waters which thou sawest are nations and Gentiles"; also in many other passages of Scripture they mean peoples in figurative speech. For these verba, which express an acceptance (accipiendi), do not denote a snatching out of the evil, which the following verse will describe, but the election and separation from others, as is said of Enoch Gen. 5, 24: "God took him away" (tulit) and Cap. 20, 3: "For the sake of the woman whom you have taken" (tulisti) and it seems the prophet refers to the

She called him Moses, because she said: "I pulled him out of the water: I drew him out of the water." For the same verbum XXX which is put in that place is here also. And Moses has been a model of those who are drawn out of the water, that is, chosen out of others; hence the name Moses is not derived from Moys, 1) which means water, as some dream, but from assume (assumendo), the one assumed or drawn out, because he is taken out of the water.

V. 18. He delivered me from my strong enemies, from my haters who were too powerful for me.

102. "He will save me," it says in Hebrew (as I have said), so that this may be recognized as a word spoken by the Church, of which Christ prophesied. But they are words of confidence and hope in GOD, because she [the Church] confesses that the enemies would be stronger and the haters more powerful than she, so that we would know that we who want to be Christians would have to despair of all human protection. For it is not the true and genuine church that is protected by the worldly arm and the quite futile rays of banishment of those idols, but the fictitious one, which flaunts the name of the church, but denies the power of it. We read in the Acts of the Apostles how cruel and violent the Jewish people and their rulers were against the apostles and the disciples of the Lord. But when they were saved, they praised the Lord; and already in Paul alone they fulfilled this verse, because he had been converted.

V.19. They overcame me at the time of my accident, and the Lord became my confidence.

103) He explains the way of salvation, which was that in the midst of persecution He did not abandon the church, but assisted and protected it, so that the enemies who were stronger than it did not destroy it, and not only this, but also carried it out into space, as the following verse teaches.

1) Iosepkus, tit). II, IX, § 6, explains by the Egyptian Llo, water, and ousoUe, save.

This is what he says: "In the time of my fall", that is, even in the time of persecution, when it seemed that I was completely abandoned, and those had the upper hand, he did not abandon me, but protected me. In this again we are praised that faith consists in what is not seen; but that we must believe we are strongest through the presence of the Lord then; when we are weaker than all, as Paul says [2 Cor. 12:10.], "When I am weak, then am I strong." And Joel 3:15: "Let the weak say: I am strong." For this the cleverness of the flesh comprehends not.

V. 20. And he brought me out into the room, he plucked me out; for he had a desire for me.

104. He will lead me out of the narrowness of affliction into the wide space of comfort. Thus Paul says 2 Cor. 1, 3. f.: "Praise be to God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who comforts us in all our tribulations" 2c. For the breadth and narrowness allegorically signify comfort and affliction, Ps. 4, 2. [Vulg. 1: "In affliction thou hast made room for me," since affliction constricts the heart and countenance, but joy expands them, Prov. 15, 13: "A merry heart maketh a cheerful countenance: but when the heart is troubled, then the courage falleth also." And Cap. 17, 22: "A merry heart maketh life merry, but a sorrowful spirit drieth the bones." And Cap. 15, 15: "A good heart is a daily good life."

105 For salvum me fecit Jerome has better: Liberabit me, likewise for quoniam voluit me Jerome has: Quia placui ei. But the meaning is: His pleasure and good pleasure rested on me, as it is said of Christ Matth. 3, 17: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." And Luc. 2, 14. [Vulg.]: "And on earth peace to men of good will," that is, to those who are well pleased. But there is a very pure confession and an exceedingly confident thankfulness in the word: "The Lord has done this to me, not because I was worthy or deserved it by any works, but by grace, in vain, according to his mercy, because it pleased him thus to look on the lowly and to save it, that he might be pleased with the lowly, that he might be pleased with the lowly."

Let no flesh boast of him, but let him who boasts boast of the Lord, for it is not by our running but by God's good pleasure and mercy that we shall be saved.

V. 21: The Lord is well pleased with me according to my righteousness; he repays me according to the cleanness of my hands. 1)

This verbum retribuēt should have been given in the preterite like the others, or also the others should have been translated in the future tense, so that the understanding and the order would not be confused. For here the church compares itself to the godless synagogue, in comparison with which it was worthy to be saved and carried out into the wide space, even though it had nothing to boast of in God's sight but the pleasure of God, by grace, in vain. We have seen both in the seventh and in the seventeenth Psalm [Ps. 7, 9, 17, 1.] that in the same movement of the heart, GOD was invoked for His judgment according to righteousness. For although we cannot be justified before GOD in any other way than by accusing ourselves, yet the wicked do us wrong in many ways, especially in the word of GOD. This is why he here cites his righteousness, for which, as he boasts, salvation from his enemies was recompensed to him. For the judgment between us and God is different from that between us and our ungodly adversaries. There is a great dispute about this between Job and his friends, in that the latter insist that man can bring himself to be righteous even before God, if he is not stained with sin before men; Job, on the other hand, claims that he is righteous before men, but confesses that he is a sinner before God, before whom all men are sinners and lack the glory that they should have in God [Rom. 3:23].

We have said in the thirteenth Psalm [§ 27 f.] that the word "recompense" in Scripture indicates more the change of suffering than the worthiness of merit. For our

1) Vulgate: I't. rstridust raiUi Ooininus 86rundum suGtitiainet

Merits are nothing in the sight of God, but He, rewarding according to His gracious mercy, changes our sadness into joy, our affliction into a wide space, as it is said in Is. 61, 3: "That ornaments may be given them for ashes, and the oil of gladness for mourning, and beautiful garments for a sorrowful spirit." Therefore, we must be careful not to understand "my righteousness" and "the purity" or innocence of "my hands" as if the church boasts of them before God; but the wicked are unrighteous against the church, which confesses its sins. By this righteousness she deserves to receive the opposite of what she suffers from the ungodly, and the ungodly the opposite of what they hope for.

(108) Thus God forbids Deut. 9:4-6, saying, "Now if the LORD your God has driven them out from before you, do not say in your heart, 'The LORD has brought me in to possess the land for my righteousness' sake, when the LORD has driven these nations out from before you for their wickedness. For you do not come in to take their land because of your righteousness and your upright heart, but the LORD your God drives out these nations because of their ungodly nature, to keep the word that the LORD swore to your fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Know therefore that the LORD thy God giveth thee not to possess this good land for thy righteousness' sake." So we can and should boast against the wicked because of our righteous cause, but before God we must submit and be silent and give Him glory alone.

But I believe that "my righteousness" refers to suffering, 2) "the cleanness of my hands" to innocence, that is, that it [the church] has been unjustly injured by suffering evil for the sake of its righteous cause, and by not repaying or doing evil to anyone because of injustice. Namely, it is precisely because of this that it deserves to be carried out into the wide space, because the Lord, according to His gracious mercy, is well pleased with such people.

21 It seems to us here Mtkntia. has the meaning "suffering," as in the third Psalm, K 14.

v.22. For I keep the ways of the Lord, and am not ungodly against my God.

The church continues to compare itself to the synagogue, as the following will prove. For though the righteous have sin in their flesh, and their body is dead because of sin, yet the spirit lives because of justification, as the apostle says Rom. 8:10. On the other hand, the ungodly display their righteousness in their flesh, but there is falsehood in their spirit because of their ungodliness. Thus the righteous appear (agunt) outwardly as sinners, but inwardly they are righteous. The ungodly, however, are righteous on the outside, but sinners on the inside. But there is no comparison between the sin of the spirit (which is ungodliness) and the sin of the flesh (which is rebellious evil desire): neither is there any comparison between the righteousness of the flesh (which is dealing with the works [operatio] of the law) and the righteousness of the spirit (which is faith in Christ).

This is what it [the church] says here: "it keeps the ways of the Lord". But in what way are they kept? In the spirit, not in the flesh; by faith, not by works; by grace, not by free will. Therefore it adds, "And am not ungodly against my GOD." That is, this is keeping the ways of the LORD, that one be not ungodly against GOD. But ungodliness (as I have often said) is the unbelief that relies on being justified by its own works; where this is, there is no keeping of the ways of the LORD. But the Hebrew text says with a simple expression that is, if one could say so, impiavi, I have been ungodly from my God. But ungodliness is a going away and departing from God, as we have seen in the fourteenth Psalm 81 ff. have seen. And Jer. 17, 5. it says: "Cursed is the man that trusteth in man, and taketh flesh for his arm, and departeth from the LORD with his heart." Therefore, the Latin interpreter speaks in Hebrew: Nec impius fui a Deo meo, I have not departed from my G^Otte through ungodliness.

1) xeeeaati is missing in the original and in the Basel.

Since the sin of ungodliness is so great in comparison to what is left of evil desire in the flesh of the godly, the church rightly boasts that it has not transgressed the ways of the Lord, nor has it been ungodly against him, as its adversaries are, who rage against it under the pretense of righteousness and zeal for God.

v.23. For all his judgments I have before me, and his commandments I do not cast away.

The church aims at the wicked, of whom it says in the 10th Psalm, v. 5: "Your judgments are far from him. Such was also the nature of her rival, the synagogue, which most of all wanted to be respected for having the rights (judicia) of God before its eyes, for not rejecting His commandments (justitias), yes, for always accusing the church of this offense. This dispute remains as long as flesh and blood remain; since the prudence of the latter does not grasp the righteousness of the spirit, nor suffer its righteousness to be punished, whereas the prudence of the spirit does not suffer the righteousness of the flesh to be praised, and preaches the righteousness of faith, so it happens that these two children, Esau and Jacob, clash in the body of Rebecca with perpetual warfare.

Blessed, therefore, is the man who speaks of the law of the Lord day and night, Ps. 1:2, for he has all the judgments of God before his eyes, and does not reject His commandments (justitias) (Hebrew: His justifications); he is the one who keeps the ways of the Lord, which are commanded in His judgments and commandments. But that one has the rights of GOD before his eyes indicates that he loves them. "For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also," Matt. 6:21. But we need the law of God to be constantly before our eyes, because we are troubled and distracted by many things and incidents. But the desire for the law of the Lord will bring this about by itself; if this is not there, then we will soon throw the speeches of the Lord behind us, whereupon the neglect of the ways of the Lord immediately follows and godlessness against God 2c.

114. i believe that "rights" (judicia) and "justifications" (justificationes) refer to the-

In this passage, we distinguish that the rights belong to the prohibitions by which the old man is judged, and the justifications belong to the commandments by which the spirit is justified, the new man.

V. 24. But I am without change before him, and beware of sins.

Here he clearly confesses 1) that there is still something left of the old man, against which he promises to fight, as the apostle Gal. 5, 24. Rom. 6, 6. and elsewhere teaches that one should kill the flesh and the members that are on earth [Col. 3, 5.]. Therefore, after all the ways of the Lord have been kept and ungodliness avoided, there still remains the task of crucifying the evil desire in us, that we may be cleansed from stains and renewed from day to day before God, and beware of our wickedness lest it overtake us. "For sin shall not be able to have dominion over us, because we are under grace" [Rom. 6:14.] Neither shall we yield obedience to the lusts of the flesh, that sin may reign in our mortal body [Rom. 6:12], though it shall not cease to provoke, that it may rule and reign. This constant renewal and care for sin is despised by the wicked, because they think they are pure; because they do not have the rights and commandments of God before their eyes, they do not realize how great and complete (absolutam) purity they require. Therefore, for the same reason, he also adds an emphatic word (emphasin): cum eo, that is, "before him." For the wicked who despise these stains become more and more impure before the Lord from day to day, precisely because they are the most pure in their own eyes and in the eyes of men.

117. we have not yet had the expression XXX which the interpreter has translated by iniquitatem at this point. I do not know.

1) The logical subject here also remains "the church," as we see mainly from § 99, s 117 and s 130, but here another grammatical subject enters (86 puAnuturnn); as such (according to 8 99) either Christ is to be regarded, who speaks in the person of the church, or the prophet (according to § 131).

In what way I should distinguish this expression from other words that mean sin (iniquitatem). I would willingly allow that by the same the works of the flesh are signified, so that it would be referred to original sin, that is, the evil which the unleashed evil air commits, that is, when sin rules and reigns, and is put into operation. For the other words seem to refer more to the law that forbids than to the origin of the evil that rages. Thus it is said in Ps. 51:7: "Behold, I am begotten of sinful seed (in iniquitatibus)" 2c. If this were true, it would be very fitting for our view, since the church intends to be careful that whatever sin is left in the flesh does not break out into the work.

V.25. Therefore the Lord repays me according to my righteousness, according to the cleanness of my hands in His sight.

He repeats the same thing that he said above, in order to say it more clearly and to add more. All this goes against the godless adversaries, who both do not believe this and have a completely different opinion of themselves. For he continues to take sides against the godless synagogue, "this is the kind that thinks itself pure, and yet is not washed of its filth," Proverbs 30:12. Therefore, it continues to impute impurity and condemnation to the godly or the church, as if it were most against God, not to mention that it is undefiled before Him and is careful of its sinfulness.

119. against this now justifies (how I

[§ 106 ff., § 110, § 112]) the Church has said its thing, and indicates that, according to God's judgment, quite different things would be said by it than are said by the ungodly. For although she is not righteous, nor are her hands pure in the eyes of the ungodly, she is so in the sight of God's eyes, that is, of God and of all who have God's eyes, that is, who are spiritual. For the ungodly judge everything wrongly, God judges rightly; hence what follows here, that to the pure everything is pure, to the impure nothing is pure [Tit. 1, 15]. To the God-

The innocent is guilty; the elect is rejected, and he who is of God (divinus) must be possessed by the devil. In short, with a perverse person everything is definitely wrong. This is because he judges according to what his eyes see, not according to how God sees it with His eyes. Therefore, it follows:

V. 26. f. With the holy you are holy, and with the pious you are pious, and with the pure you are pure, and with the perverse you are perverse.

120 Here the prophet gives the reason why the wicked condemn everything about the godly. The cause is that they themselves are unclean and wicked, and each one judges as he himself is, as I have quoted from the apostle's letter to Titus [Cap. 1, 15J: "Nothing is pure to the impure, but both their mind and conscience are impure." So he said that he had purity of hands and righteousness, but not in the eyes of the ungodly, before whom all that the godly man is and does is rather abominable and intolerable unrighteousness and uncleanness. But for this contempt, God will give him glory and honor. Meanwhile, he consoles himself in faith and hope, saying:

121 Let it go [Revelation 22:11], "He that is unclean, let him be unclean after all"; let perverse men have their perverse ways. We boast in the best way, that we are rejected in their eyes, but holy in yours, because with the saints you are holy. That is, so that we may teach a new and wonderful gloss: With sinners thou art holy. For this saint, with whom God is holy, is none other than he who denies himself holiness and ascribes it to God alone, retaining sin for himself alone by this true confession, as they do, Dan. 9,¹) 7: "Thou, O Lord, art righteous, but we must be ashamed; as it is now." And this very confession of truth, by which they ascribe holiness to God, causes it to flow back to them, and they themselves also to be ashamed.

1) In the Latin editions: Dau. 3.

be sanctified. For it is the truth that we are all unclean, and God alone is holy.

Therefore, those who are holy in this way, that is, truly humble and bad in their eyes, consider everything that God says and does to be holy and valid, and speak the word Ps. 119, 137: "Lord, you are righteous, and your word is right." And again, Ps. 145, 17.: "The LORD is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works." For after their will is killed, they have pleasure only in the will of God, by which they praise and bless and worship all that befalls them.

On the other hand, the perverse and wicked, whose will is alive in all things, leaves nothing undone that God says and does. For he wants everything to turn out according to his will, which he considers 2) to be the holy of holies. Since this cannot happen, he perverts what is in fact the sanctuary of God and condemns it as the most unholy and accursed thing. An example of this is a godly person in whom God is, speaks and works, whom the wicked cannot stand. Thus, God is necessarily perverted in the case of the perverse, and instead of being considered holy, he is considered accursed. But as one thinks of God, God also proves Himself to man in the way he thinks of Him. Therefore, everything is wrong with a perverse person, even that which he has from God.

You see that God does not become holy, chosen, pious, or reverted according to His essence and nature, but according to His words and work, which He works in the good and evil spirits, and that both receive in themselves what they attribute to God. For just as the godly, by making himself unclean and sanctifying God, is sanctified in the best way in all that he lives and does, so the ungodly, by making himself holy and making God unclean, is defiled in the worst way in all that he lives and does. For he who makes himself holy cannot but make God unclean in all his words and deeds. But he who sanctifies God in all his words and deeds, the cannot but consider himself unclean. Is it not therefore something wonderful about this defilement and sanctification, that the one is defiled by his holiness, the other is sanctified by his sin? Is not therefore the wicked man the most unhappy man, who is himself stained by his holiness? Is not the godly man the most miserable man, who is himself sanctified by sin? Therefore he says afterwards [v. 28.], "For thou helpst the wretched people, and the high eyes thou bringest low."

Therefore, holiness is not so great that it should not defile a man if he assumes it for himself and does not attribute it to God alone; nor is sin so great that it should not sanctify a man if he ascribes it to himself by right confession and takes it away from God.

But it is very difficult not to presume holiness and not to ascribe sin to God. For who is constantly so minded in all things that God does to us that he should hold every word and work of his sacred, that is, revered and held as a holy thing? Who considers punishments, ignominies, deaths and all evils as holy things that he should receive with reverence? Job was one of the saints to whom everything that GOD sent him was holy, and said [Job 2, 10.], "Have we received good from GOD, and should we not also accept evil?" [Cap. 1, 21.:] "The LORD gave, the LORD hath taken away," as it pleased the LORD, so it was done, "the name of the LORD be praised!"

Ask the wicked, to whom (as they say) even a hair is bent, how he himself has chosen it, and see if he will not utter innumerable curses and cry out that what has happened to him is unjust, wicked, criminal; it has also not come from God, but from the devil, what has happened to him, such a holy, pious and chosen man. For the perverse man adorns himself with these beautiful names and pretends to be so, while in this nonsense of his he ascribes to God (that is, to the works and words of God) criminal and unrighteousness and all evil that there is.

128. from this now these whole two verses can be easily understood. For "with the pious you are pious" (cum innocente innocens eris) is nothing other than that in the eyes of the godly everything that God says and does is considered blameless, for they praise and justify everything in Him. But just by this their confession and attitude they are also blameless before God in all things that they do and say. For they have an exceedingly blessed exchange with God: as they hold of God, so God in turn holds of them. Innocens [blameless] in this place is XXXX, that is, sincere, proven, perfect, without change, as in the 119th Psalm, v. 1: "Blessed are those who live without change", and Hohel. 5, 2: "My dove, my pious"; German: "pious", who hurts no one, does everything that he is obliged to do.

(129) So also the word: "And with the pure you are pure" (cum electo electus eris), is in the same sense nothing else than that the godly are so minded that they had everything that God does with them for a chosen (electa) thing, and did not want it to happen otherwise. They are well pleased with it, praise and bless the Lord, and please themselves only by recognizing that it is God's good pleasure, as it is written in Matt. 11:25 ff. that Christ rejoiced and gave thanks that the Father had revealed this to babes and hidden it from the wise, for no other reason than because it was thus pleasing in His sight. But by this disposition they are also chosen before God, and as they choose, so they are chosen again.

(130) But that it is so, the flesh did not sit down. Nor do the wicked understand it, but rather it seems to them that the opposite is true, namely, that the ways of the Lord are not kept by the godly, nor that they guard against sins, nor that they are forgiven according to the cleanness of their hands, nor that God is holy, pious and elect with them, but rather that everything they do is utterly ungodly against God and man. Therefore, they also condemn as foolishness, error, sin, heresy, everything that the godly have done and are doing, so that all these words of the Church can only be accepted in faith as

The truth of the matter is that, as we have often said, it looks far different in appearance and in the eyes of the people.

From this we see that the prophet does not speak of the election of eternal providence, nor of the first grace of justification, but of the fruit, benefit, work and reward of grace. For he wants to show what the word and the grace of faith work and achieve in man, as also the saying 1 Sam. 2, 30.: "Who honors me, him I will also honor, but who despises me, he shall be despised again." For man does not honor GOD until he is visited and honored by GOD with grace. But when he has received grace, he strives not to fall away from grace for the sake of men, whether they be friends or enemies, and to do what offends God. If, then, he endures reproach from men for God's sake, and persists in honoring God, God will give him honor for reproach, and he will be holy with the Holy One and chosen with the elect, contrary to all human understanding.

132) That this is the right understanding is clearly shown by the preceding and the following, since he says that he will be recompensed according to his purity, by which he shows that he is already in the first grace and suffers injustice, but will finally be chosen and honored by God; and afterwards [v. 28]: "For you help the wretched people," where he explains that he experiences in the hopeful that he has received grace. But I have already said above that an interpreter of the holy scriptures must be careful not to draw the words of God, which speak of the use and work of grace, to the beginning of grace itself, and from this draw the poison of that heresy, which ascribes to the free will the power to make itself capable of accepting grace, as is done with the words of Zech. 1, 3: "Turn to me, and I will turn to you", and similar. Therefore, in this passage we have to imagine a holy, pious, elect person as a godly person who, for the sake of the word and faith in God, is considered to be an exceedingly nefarious, harmful person,

He is considered a rejected man in his own eyes and in the eyes of men, and is not worthy to live because he is the least and the most obsolete. But that the Lord is holy, pious and elect with him, must be understood in no other way than that he despises the appearance of the person, but that he only looks at the lowly and despised, and finally declares them holy, pious and pure, because they have confessed and received him as holy, pious and pure.

Thus it can be understood in two ways that the Lord is holy with the saints, in an active and in a suffering way: that he is both sanctified by them and sanctifies them in turn, which is also what Christ says [Matth. 10, 32.]: "Whoever confesses me before men, him will I also confess before my Father." And again [John 12:26.], "Whosoever shall serve me, him will my Father honor." But how does he honor him but by declaring that he is holy, pious, and elect, whom the ungodly have thought and declared to be an unholy, harmful, and lost man? For these are words of comfort addressed to those who live godly in Christ but are despised in this world.

135. "But with the perverse you are perverse," "as God does, so it is not right"; therefore, conversely, "as they do, so it is not right". Here is that proud Moab, who is always ready to teach GOD, and to judge all that GOD says and does in his own, but in the meantime has nothing else in his mouth but GOD, and misses to teach and do good and holy things, which was the vice peculiar to the Jews, before all nations. For God is not perverted in His nature, but in His word and work, by which He rules in godly men.

Therefore, taking care of the prophet speaking in the spirit, we understand by this perverse one such a man, who is not only not perverse in his own eyes and in the eyes of men, but only holy, pious, chosen, completely the most holy, who builds his nest under the stars, and considers himself a ring on the right hand of God, before whom everything is impure what the godly say and do; but all his own shines beautifully. But by this very traffic heil, because he has a wrong opinion of God and himself and of everyone, he deserves that, as he transgresses God, he in turn be transgressed by God, and be made known to everyone as a transgressor.

137 St. Jerome translates thus: With the perverse you will perverse, and the other word: With the blameless you will act blamelessly, by which he indicates that he understood these verses in an active way. According to this view one should also say: With the holy you will sanctify, and with the elect you will elect; or so: The holy you will sanctify, the pious you will make pious, the elect you will elect, the perverse you will perverse; only that I do not know what task the peculiar way of speaking (idiotism) seems to attach to GOtte according to the Hebrew, since he says: With the holy you will be holy, with the perverse you will perverse, as if he wanted to say: The task of being holy, of being perfect, of being chosen, of being perverse, is given to you by the wicked, since they perverse all yours and justify themselves alone.

V. 28. For you help the wretched people, and the high eyes you bring low.

You see that this is said in the person of Christ's people, who are holy, pious, chosen, but "wretched" (humilis), as I said, that is, despised, and who are nothing less than holy and righteous and chosen in the eyes of those who are perverse and arrogant. Thus he gives the reason for all that has been said before, and praises the righteous judgment of God. For this reason he sanctifies the saints, because he helps the miserable; thus the saints are miserable, that is, lowly and despised; for this reason he also perverts the perverse, because he lowers the high eyes; thus the perverse are the haughty and honored and glorious. As if he wanted to say: This is thy righteous judgment, yea, thy nature, that thou exaltest the lowly, and art with them, but abasest the haughty, and art against them; whereof we have said many things, and of which the Scripture is full.

139 But he actually says: "the eyes of the arrogant" (oculos superborum), not: the arrogant. For the vice of the haughty

They are arrogant in their eyes because they seek high things and see in themselves what is nowhere to be found, so that it is not necessary to make the things themselves low, because of which they are arrogant, but only the eyes with which they look down on the lowly with contempt and admire themselves. Proverbs 30, 13. is said of these same Jews: "A kind that carries its eyes high, and holds up its eyelids." Paul says Rom. 12, 16. "Do not seek high things, but hold yourselves down to the lowly." Job 22:29: "He exalteth them that humble themselves: and he that bringeth down his eyes shall recover." Thus the wicked have high eyes, which are set on their strength, righteousness, and wisdom; but the godly cast down their eyes, and look on their weakness, sin, and foolishness. Therefore it is said in Proverbs 29:23: "The hope of man shall overthrow him: but the humble shall receive glory." And there Cap. 16, 18: "He that shall perish shall first be proud; and proud courage cometh before the fall." Oh, how powerful words these are, how important speeches!

V. 29. For you illuminate my lamp; the LORD my God makes my darkness light.

It is clear that this also refers to the people of Christ. For Christ has no darkness that needs to be illuminated. But what he says is this: Those have high eyes, and every arrogant one is his own guide and his own light. He hears no one, he departs from no one, not even from God Himself, whom he also departs from with all that is His. But your wretched people become foolish so that they may be wise, despair of themselves, give you their hand and submit to your guidance (magisterio), and want to be guided by your light, as it is said in Ps. 89, 16: "Lord, they will walk in the light of your countenance," and Ps. 4, 7: "Lord, lift up over us the light of your countenance," and Ps. 32, 8: "I will guide you with my eyes."

This is also taught by the figure of the Exodus from Egypt, where the children of Israel passed through the cruel desert, in which, as it says in Deut. 8:15, "there were fiery serpents and scorpions and drought", not by their own guidance, but by the clouds and fire.

The Lord's glory rose over her, so that the Gentiles were also enlightened by the light of the Lord. So also in Christ Jerusalem arose and was enlightened, Isa. 60, 1. 3. and the glory of the Lord rose over her, so that also the Gentiles walk in her light, and the kings in the brightness that rises over her. And there it is said [v. 19.], "The sun shall no more shine unto thee by day, neither shall the brightness of the moon shine unto thee: but the LORD shall be thine everlasting light, and thy GOD shall be thy praise."

Of this light it is abundantly said in the fourth Psalm [§ 64 ff.] that it is the word of the Gospel, as Peter also says, 2 Pet. 1:19: "We have a strong prophetic word, and you do well to heed it, as a light shining in a dark place, until the day dawns, and the morning star rises in your hearts." For in so much turmoil in fortune and in misfortune, as it were in a very dark storm, we have no other little or great bear (eliceu = ἰλιχην), that is, Leit stern on the sea, as the Word of God, by which we all, as much as we are saved, are guided. What then is our lamp that is illuminated by this light of the Word? Without a doubt, our heart; whether you call it conscience or intellect, there is nothing to it.

And behold, nothing is ascribed to what nature has instilled and to all the cleverness of the flesh. He calls this his darkness, everything that is in us without the word of God, and asks that this darkness be illuminated by the light of the word of God. This is easily understood by the one who is in temptation, for he understands that all reason cannot advise him; indeed, the wiser one is, the more incomprehensible he becomes in danger. But the word of God upholds and gives advice on what to do, namely to trust and expect salvation from God, as follows:

V. 30. For with you I can smite warriors, and with my God I can leap over the wall. 1)

1) Vulgate: HuoniLm in t6 srisuar a tsntutione, st in vso inso ti-ansgrsdiar ninrnni.

143. "With you," not in me; if you guide and enlighten me, not by my running and working, I will escape the temptations, knowing that when I have reached out to you, I must expect your counsel. Thus it is said in Ps. 44, 4-7: "They took not the land by their sword, neither did their arm help them; but thy right hand, thine arm, and the light of thy countenance: for thou wast well pleased with them. God, you are the same my King who promised help to Jacob. Through you we will crush our enemies; in your name we will subdue those who oppose us. For I do not rely on my bow, and my sword cannot help me" 2c. Behold, the true Christian Church knows nothing of the worldly arm, which nowadays the godless bishops alone seize, invoke and fear. How beautifully their life and their mind fit the holy scripture!

144 Jerome and 2 Sam. 22, 30. [Vulg.] more correctly: Quoniam in te curram accinctus, et in Deo meo transilium murum. For he takes the image from the soldiers who are very stout-hearted in war. For accinctus his armed one], which is called in Hebrew, is called 2 Kings 24, 2. latrunculus [a war servant], for which we say a soldier. For so it is said there, "And the LORD sent upon him soldiers from Chaldea, from Syria, from Moab, from the children of Ammon." So he wants to say, "Trusting in you and your enlightenment, I will not be afraid to oppose anyone; I will fight against every kind of enemy; I will overcome a wall, and everything that opposes me; that is, I who am weak in myself will be unconquerable in you, and, as Paul boasts, Phil. 4, 13: "I can do all things through him who makes me mighty," and 2 Cor. 2, 14: "Thanks be to God, who always gives us victory in Christ."

Therefore, "wall" in this passage does not only denote sins, but also the power of the enemy, against whom the church of Christ fights through faith in the Word of God, as one fights in war against the walls of the enemy. For towers and walls in the Scriptures figuratively designate the leaders, the patrons, and the rulers.

among the nations, as Ps. 122, 7: "Let there be peace within thy walls, and happiness within thy palaces" (turribus), that is, among the rulers and regents of the church. Isa. 49:16: "Behold, thy walls are ever before me." Thus he has here set "the wall" for the walls, that is, all the violence of this world, with which the strong man keeps his palace, until a stronger one comes upon him, and overcomes him.

And actually he says "I will leap over" or "I will climb over", not "I will tear down" or "I will destroy", because the power of the world is not abolished by the word of faith, but only overcome. For Christ did not abolish Caesar's kingdom, but established a more exalted kingdom, that of truth. And Paul subjects all men according to the flesh to the authorities, Rom. 13, 1, while he firmly teaches that according to the spirit all are free in Christ, 2 Cor. 3, 17. In the same way Peter, 2 Pet. 2, 10, scolds the future despisers of the authorities, who also preaches Christian freedom. Thus we overcome everything, and most of all when we are subject to all.

V. 31. God's ways are without change, the speeches of the LORD are purified. He is a shield to all who trust in him. 1)

147. meus is not in the Hebrew, but without closer determination (absolute)Deus. This is spoken according to the Hebrew way, for which we would say: God's way is undefiled. For the Hebrew speaks thus: God's, undefiled is His way, as Ps. 68, 17. [Vulg.]: "The mountain on which it is the good pleasure of God to dwell on it", and Gen. 2, 17.: De ligno, quod est in medio paradisi, non comedes ex eo. This way of speaking has also our German language, since we say: "Of the wood in the middle of paradise, thou shalt not eat of it." Likewise: "A regent of the church, it is not due to him to argue" 2c.

148. so he goes in a lovely movement of the heart, in which he has his pleasure to God, he continues to praise the words of God as he has praised the works, both against the works and against the words of the arrogant and the wicked. For that God is holy with the saints, and strengthens those who trust in Him, He does this through a clear conscience, for a clear conscience is cheerful and courageous. But it is not purified by any works or doctrines of men, but by the law and the way of the Lord, as it is said in Ps. 19:8: "The law of the Lord is without change, and restoreth the soul." For as the word of the LORD is, so is the way, that is, the life according to the word; as the life is, so is the conscience. But "the speech of the LORD is pure, as silver plated through, proved seven times" [Ps. 12:7]. And this makes it so that the wicked cannot rejoice in God, but all theirs is perverse, because their ways are defiled, from which they walk at all times according to the doctrines and commandments of men, and please themselves in the same, drawing even the law of the Lord upon these their opinions.

Therefore, attention must be paid to the comparison in which, throughout the whole, the church compares itself to the synagogue, boasting in God, who not only approves of all the works of the church, but has also given it the completely pure doctrine of the Word, according to which it lives holy, pure and pious. On the other hand, he makes both the works and the words of the synagogue impure, however much it may appear otherwise in the eyes of men. For as the ungodly consider the life of the godly to be unclean, so they also consider the teaching of the same to be unclean, not knowing the righteousness of faith, which is of God, and seeking to establish their own righteousness, which is of works. Nothing else can follow from this than defiance and presumption. Against these he says here: "He is a shield to all who trust in Him." For those who walk in the way of God and cling to His word do not trust in themselves, but in God, by whom alone they are also protected, while those protect themselves by their powers, works and teachings. For the godly have need of God as their protector, since, because of the way of the LORD, which is without change, and because of of the Lord's truthful speeches must always suffer from the wicked, who seek to corrupt them.

For where is there a God without the Lord? Or a refuge without our God? 1)

He is a shield to all who trust in Him, because He is, therefore, able to protect, since there is no other God besides Him who could harm. Thus it is said in 1 Sam. 2, 2: "There is none holy, like the LORD; beside thee there is none; and there is no stronghold, like our GOD is." From this passage David took the last part of this verse, for they are the same words. Jerome also translates the Hebrew XXX not by Deus, but: Fortis, by saying: Et quis fortis, sicut Deus noster? Here also the separating conjunction aut must not be put, but the connecting et; because this verse says twice the same thing (est tautologicus).

151) So this sense is a comforting one for the church against the insult and the glorification of this Peninna [1 Sam. 1, 4. 6.], the synagogue, as if the prophet wanted to say: If He protects, who can harm? "If God is for us, who can be against us?" [Rom. 8:31] "Who is there that can harm you, if you do what is good?" 1 Petr. 3, 13. So also Hannah says 1 Sam. 2, 2. the same against her presumptuous rival, and adds [v. 3. 9.]: "Let your great boasting and defiance be; for much ability helps no one."

V. 33. God equips me with strength and makes my ways without change.

152 Again, here [in the Vulgate] is a Hebrew idiom: Deus, qui praecinxit instead of: Deus praecinxit, or: He who has prepared, just as [v. 31.]: My God, undefiled is His way. And here is the same word immaculatam, as there [v. 31.] impolluta, namely, that is, pious (innocentem), as before [v. 26.], "With the pious thou art pious." Above [v. 31.] the Church said that the way of the Lord was without change, here she boasts that her own way is without change; and since above [v. 21. f.] she was to the Ge

1) Vulgate: HuoniLin (Mis Deus praeter Dominum, aut Huis Deus praeter veum iwstruui?)

When she has said that she was not wicked against God, and praised her righteousness and the cleanness of her hands, why does she repeat the same thing so often, and say it again and again, making a babble, as it were, with superfluous words?

I have said that in my opinion the prophet in this psalm sings of the state of the first church in the person of Christ until the calling of the Gentiles. Therefore, its head, Christ, is introduced in the beginning, then the preaching of the gospel and the emergence of the church among the Jews, and the comparison of it with the rejected and abandoned part of the synagogue, which, proud of its own righteousness, ridiculed and despised the faith of the church, yes, even forbade and persecuted, as Pharaoh oppressed the children of Israel in Egypt, so that they would not multiply.

Now, however, he seems to be singing about the progress and increase of the same; the more the wicked tried to hinder them, the more the faithful increased. That this is the meaning is shown by the words and also by what follows. For the power with which she is armed, as she says here, is such a power as is ascribed to a great multitude and a war army, as it is said Isa. 60, 5.: "When the multitude of the sea turneth unto thee, and the power of the Gentiles cometh unto thee," that is, a great crew (vis), a great multitude of the Gentiles. Ex. 15:4: "Pharaoh and his power he cast into the sea." Hence this expression XXX more often stands for an army, which here and in other places is translated "power." So also the Latins say of a great power (vim) of money, of men, of horses 2c. when they denote the multitude.

(155) That the church should therefore be equipped and surrounded with power is the same thing that Lucas Apost. 2, 47: "But the Lord added to the church daily them that were saved. And Cap. 5:14: "And there were added more and more that believed on the Lord, both men and women." The same means that, while before she had said that the way of the Lord was without change, now she says that her way is without change, since her way and the way of the Lord are one and the same.

is the same. For it walks in the way of the Lord, not in its own way, which is not the way of the Lord. For this is the way of the synagogue, as Isaiah Cap. 53, 6. says: "We all went astray, each one looking to his own way." And Gen. 6:12: "All flesh had perverted his way." That therefore the way of the church without change be made (poni) or (as it is called in Hebrew) given (dari), that is, that it be proved and strengthened by the following of many. If this did not happen, the church would finally fall away, since there are so many wicked people who accuse it of being harmful and impure.

Therefore, what is said in Exodus 1:7 as an example had to happen: "The children of Israel grew and begat children and multiplied, and became so many that the land was filled with them. And again, v. 12. "The more they pressed the people, the more they multiplied and spread." Hence the Church here puffed exceedingly, "My way," because by her example of walking in the way of the Lord she drew many into the same path. For she had in the apostles directly from God the way of the Lord, but the others through the ministry and example of the apostles and the disciples who preached to them. God always keeps this way in the church, so that although all are taught by Him alone, He nevertheless draws all through the service, the word and the example of men, and guides them through the way of the church to His way, which is the same. Jerome translates 2 Sam. 22, 33: Et complanavit perfectam viam meam (God has paved my perfect way), which will easily be drawn to the same meaning.

V. 34. He makes my feet like the deer, and sets me on my high place. 1)

Jerome has here and 2 Sam. 22, 34: Coaequans pedes meos cervis, et super excelsa mea statuens me. I know that in the foregoing I have interpreted "the feet" from the movements of the mind and the disposition of the heart, as in the 14th Psalm [§ 96]: "Their feet are hastening to shed blood."

This interpretation is puffing in many places of the Scriptures, perhaps also here. But I will again dare to follow my own opinion, and understand the feet of the church in such a way that it is more fitting to the context, because we move with the prophet in the spirit. For this verse seems to me to indicate the reason for the preceding, where she said that her way was increased and strengthened by the following of many. This has happened by no other power than by the ministry of the gospel, which has not gathered so many to the church so quickly without a great miracle of divine power, although the way of the Lord that the church walks is contrary to all prudence of the flesh, nor can be considered undefiled by any man unless God has changed his heart; this he has now accomplished with incredible speed through the ministry of the Word.

The feet of the church are therefore the ministry of the word, or, which makes little difference, the evangelists themselves. Thus Paul writes to Timothy [2. Ep. 4, 7.] that he has completed the course; and Apost. 20, 24: "That I may finish my course, and the ministry which I have received." And to the Galatians, Cap. 2, 2. "That I might not run, or have run, in vain." Of these feet speaks the vision of Ezekiel, Cap. 1, 7. where he writes that the four feet of the beasts would have stood straight, and Isa. 52, 7. which Paul cites Rom. 10, 15: "How lovely on the mountains are the feet of the messengers who preach peace, preach good things" 2c., that is, how lovely is a preacher who preaches grace and forgiveness of sins. And Micah 4,²) 13. "Arise and thresh, O daughter of Zion. For I will make you horns of iron and claws of brass." Again Isa. 32:20: "Blessed are ye that sow by the waters, for there ye may let go the feet of oxen and asses." And many similar sayings are found throughout the Scriptures.

Therefore to the apostle Paul an ox that threshes with its feet on the threshing floor means a preacher of the gospel, 1 Cor. 9:9: "Thou shalt not bind the mouth of the ox that threshes." But it is the

1) Vulgate: Hui perkooit pocles Eos tLNHuum osrvoruin, et super oxMlsa [Mtueus ius.

2) In the Latin editions: LUE nons 5.

The extraordinary swiftness of the deer is well known, which is also attributed to the word, Ps. 147, 15: "His word runs fast."

What is this "height" to which the Lord has placed him? And how do the feet and the height agree? then also the swiftness and the standing? Some understand by this the heavenly things on which the church is based; but it seems to me that he is still speaking of the feet. For in the Hebrew text it is said, He hath made me to stand; but this properly comes to the feet. Therefore I simply think that the same is said here as Isa. 40, 9: "Zion, you preacher, climb up a high mountain. Jerusalem, thou preacher, lift up thy voice with power, lift up, and fear not; say to the cities of Judah, Behold, there is your GOD." In the same opinion he added Cap. 52, 7: "On the mountains," saying, "How lovely on the mountains are the feet of the messengers who proclaim peace." Perhaps this is also taken from the way of the deer, which train their young to run and teach them to be careful of flight; they lead them to precipitous slopes and show them how to jump. Running and standing on one's feet do not conflict with each other, as Ezek. 1, 21. 25. is written that they walked and stood.

But by the "height", whether it be mountains or slopes, I understand nothing else than multitudes of many peoples, in the midst of which the preacher stands and confidently proclaims the word of God, which is not in human power, as Christ indicates when he says Luc. 24, 49: "You shall be clothed with power from on high. Therefore it is said: He has made me stand. Thus Peter stands, Apost. 2, 14, and lifts up his voice to the Jews; so also Paul in many places; and Christ, Ps. 82, 1, stands in the midst of the gods. This standing is explained by Isaiah Cap. 40, 9. f. in his glorious exhortation. That the hosts of the nations are called mountains is evident from many passages. For Jeremiah Cap. 51, 25 calls Babylon a mountain, and every church is called a mountain, as the general church is called the mountain of the Lord.

Ps. 68, 16. and Is. 2, 2. 2c. The Hebrew text, however, says "my height", by which it either designates the providence of God, which has worked that the ministry of the word has been useful only to those who should be called to the church, or it designates thereby par excellence every special (partial) church.

V. 35: He teaches my hand to fight and my arm to draw a bow of brass.

He continues to praise God's speeches and their power. For they are not only without change and purified, they do not only teach and convert many to the faith through the ministry of preachers, as he has said so far, but they are (as Paul teaches in 2 Cor. 10, 4. f.) also mighty before God, to disturb the fortifications, to disturb the attacks and all height that rises up against the knowledge of God, and to take all reason captive under the obedience of Christ. Thus, in the letter to Titus, Cap. 1, 9, he commands that a bishop should not only be able to exhort by sound doctrine, but also to punish the gainsayers, and not otherwise than by the word of faith, which is according to the right doctrine, not by human subtleties or miserable philosophical reasons. This is what he says here.

163. "He teaches my hand to fight." For the Church is not involved in worldly warfare. She has her own battle, as I have already mentioned from Paul's writings, namely with the adversaries of the Word. If the Lord does not teach us to fight with our hands and gives us arms of brass 1), we will fight against them in vain. For even Moses and Aaron could not overcome Jannes and Jambres in any other way than by the finger of God [2 Tim. 3, 8]. From human reasons only harmful quarrels, hatred and mobs arise, as Paul also teaches [2 Tim. 2, 23].

164 But I believe that it is easy to understand that this equation, which is taken from warfare, in which everything is done mainly with the hands and the arms, does not mean anything else.

1) In the Vulgate, the second part of this verse is called: You have made my arms like a bow of brass.

than that the preachers who are taught by God are given an untiring and unconquerable power to teach the word to punish all adversaries, as Christ also promised [Luc. 21, 15.]: "I will give you mouth and wisdom, which shall not gainsay nor resist all your adversaries." So says Apost. 6, 10. [Of Stephen], "They were not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit out of which he spake." This was also confirmed by Gamaliel Apost. 5, 39. by saying, "If the work is from GOD, you cannot dampen it."

V. 36. And thou givest me the shield of thy salvation, and thy right hand strengtheneth me; and when thou humblest me, thou makest me great.

I do not know where this verse [in the Vulgate: Et dedisti mihi protectionem salutis tuae, et dextera tua suscepit me. Et disciplina tua correxit me in finem, et disciplina tua ipsa me docebit] came from. In Hebrew for all this is A verse which reads thus, And thou hast given me the shield of thy salvation, and thy right hand hath strengthened me, and thy meekness hath made me great. Here nothing is said about chastening, about correction, about the end, about teaching. But also 2 Sam. 22, 36. this piece is omitted: "And thy right hand strengtheneth me." There we also read by an error of the scribe: Et mansuetudo mea instead of: Mansuetudo tua.

Thus, all the victory that the Church, with hands that had learned to fight and with arms of brass, has won over the adversaries, she does not attribute to herself, but with godly gratitude to the one who won it, as if she wanted to say: That I have not been defeated in this battle for godliness, and that the true doctrine of faith has remained unharmed to me, is because your salvation was my protection and your favor preserved me, and through this miracle I see that it was your goodness alone that, after the adversaries have been overcome, my number has increased.

However, no one who has not experienced it can easily believe how great and dangerous this struggle for doctrines is. We see it in Pau lus in the epistle to the Galatians and in all the epistles, with how great a spirit and with how great a care he himself labors in this battle and arms us. For the old serpent is exceedingly crafty, and deceives the hearts of the simple very easily; yea, whom does he not deceive? To this difficulty is added that the doctrine of the Church is higher than men can comprehend. If God does not alone teach it, preserve it, give it victory, make it great, everything else is on the side of the adversaries, the multitude, the greatness, the power, the eloquence, the talent, the learning, the beautiful appearance, the riches, so that it is only in God's protection and in the preservation of His rights that those are preserved who already believe and those are added who contradict.

Therefore, Paul also acts before God more with godly prayers for the churches, that God may guard the hearts and minds of the believers, so that their senses will not be deceived by the cunning of the serpent and the wickedness of men, than that he should rely on words alone, even though he also has these from God, as it were, as weapons of God.

Therefore, it is a grace to be equipped for battle, but it is a greater grace to overcome in battle and to preserve the citizens and subjugate the enemies, to increase one's cause, not merely to protect it. Who are we, then, that we either presume to protect the truth and overcome the enemies, or if we cannot do so, become unwilling? The kindness of our God causes us to be preserved and increased, not our presumption, so that God's glory alone may stand.

What shall we do now with our Latin translation? It could probably give the same sense: Corrigi per disciplinam Domini in finem unum doceri per disciplinam Domini, namely: To become great through the goodness of God. But this would require so much violence and torture to express this meaning, which the words do not want to suffer, that it is better to pass over it altogether and to be content with the text and the sense of the Hebrew.

V. 37. You make room for me to walk underneath so that my ankles do not slip. 1)

Namely, after the opponents of the Word have been overcome and the speech of God has been affirmed, thereby preserving and increasing the believers, not only are they not constricted and diminished, which the opponents wanted, but their steps have room and are strengthened, which is the result of the kindness of God, who has made the Church great against the will of her oppressors, because many more enter through them than before they were oppressed, as I have shown above with the image of the children of Israel in Egypt.

The same is repetitive: Vestigia mea non sunt infirmata [my footsteps are not weakened], that is, they are most strongly fortified, since the wicked undertook to weaken them. For we have said that the negative language in the Scriptures is often stronger than the affirmative. I believe that this Hebrew way of speaking is known, that fīrmare means: to establish, to fulfill, to maintain, as the apostle Rom. 3, 31. says, that the law is not abolished by faith, but established (statui), of which he Rom. 8, 3. that it is weakened by the flesh (infirmari); and again he says Rom. 4, 16. 20. that the promise is made firm (fīrmari) by faith; again [v. 14.] that it is not only not established by the law, but is also taken away. In the same way, it must be said here that the steps are strengthened, that is, that the way of God in which the church walks is strengthened, which happens when the believers who walk with one another in it are strengthened.

But why the church calls them her steps and her footsteps, when they are the steps of God and the ways of the Lord, has been said above [§155 f.]. For the church, by its example, makes the ways of the Lord its own, and before men, where the example applies, it seems to be only the way of the church, but in faith it is recognized that all this, whatever it is, is God's work.

To others, it seems that space is made for the church to walk, to do works of joyful love, overcoming the fear of persecution. For a wide space is cheerfulness and comfort. But this does not fit well in the context.

V. 38. I will pursue my enemies and seize them, and will not turn back until I have killed them.

After the Church has experienced the marvelous goodness of God, that He increases it while the adversaries diminish it, creates space for it while the latter oppresses it, gives it strength while the latter weakens it, it even takes confidence in pursuing the enemies and persecuting them until it destroys them, so that it is all over with them. And so it has happened and still happens in every victory of God's people that the enemies seem to be superior and insurmountable in the beginning of the war; but after the attack has happened, it is strengthened, the enemies give way and are defeated. Then the Church does not cease to pursue the battle begun, until it exterminates all the adversaries.

Therefore, this verse describes the perseverance in war or victory, and the tireless bravery of the Church to the end. This is also sufficiently proven by the words: "I will pursue", likewise: "I will seize", "I will not turn back until I have killed them", or as Jerome translates: "Until I consume them". For "I will pursue" does not denote a new beginning of the war, but the continuance of the war begun, as Ps. 34:15: "Seek peace and pursue it," that is, follow it to the end. And "I will seize them," means that they will be completely captured and totally mastered.

177 This is illustrated in the war of Joshua against the inhabitants of Ai [Jos. 7, 1. ff. 8, 1. ff.], in which the children of Israel were first beaten and weakened, so that they became despondent; then they fled out of cunning, until they lured the enemies far away from the city, and then they turned against them and completely destroyed them. By this the Spirit signified that the church at first by pretended flight, that is, by suffering according to the flesh

1) Vulgate: vilatasti Aressus rucos sudtus me, et Lon sunt intirinatu vekti^aia rosa.

Weakened, it would appear to give way, while strong in the spirit of faith, it would finally defeat and completely exterminate its enemies. Thus the Arians, who were strong at first, were finally completely destroyed. In the books of Judges, on the other hand, it was not so, for there it is often written that the children of Israel were not able to destroy the Jebusites.

v. 39. I will smite them, and they shall not withstand me; they must fall under my feet.

From what has been said before, the meaning is clear, namely, that the church seizes the adversaries, strikes them down and destroys them, so that they, having lost their strength, cannot stand up nor resist the one who strikes them. For this verse describes the weakness of the adversaries, as the preceding ones describe the bravery of the Church. "Falling under the feet," I think, is spoken in a simple figurative, instead of: that the adversaries be humbled and converted to the faith. But I will leave it to the reader to understand here also the feet of the church from the ministry of the Word, as Lucas says in the Acts of the Apostles [Cap. 6, 7.], "There were also many priests obedient to the faith." Then "falling under the feet" will be the same as obeying the Gospel.

v. 40. You can arm me with strength for battle; you can throw under me those who oppose me.

Again, the same strength is in this passage that was thought of above [v. 33]: "God equips me with strength," that is, you have surrounded me with the multitude of the faithful. But here he adds, "To the battle," by which the church boasts that it is not merely increased by the multitude of believers, but also by the multitude of warriors. For out of the defeated and defeated adversaries many have been converted and have become leaders and shepherds of the churches, powerful to build up and to fight in the salvific doctrine at the same time, holding the sword in one hand and building with the other, as is said by Nehemiah [Cap. 4, 17].

But after the warriors are increased in this way, it becomes easy to throw down all those who rebel and rise up against the knowledge of God. That is, after the church is multiplied, it is multiplied more and more, and grows up and sprouts, which we have seen fulfilled in the first church from the Jews.

The words "under me" (subtus me) belong to the verb "to throw under the feet" (supplantasti), as above [v. 37] in the words: "You make room to go under me", to the verb "you make room" (dilatasti). I leave it to the grammarians to judge the awkward expression subtus me instead of sub me or subter me.

v. 41. You put my enemies to flight, that I may destroy my haters.

So far he has spoken of the Jews, who, overcome and humbled by the Word, contributed to the growth of the church; now he speaks of those who are hardened and persist in unbelief, whom he calls enemies and haters. For the church has suffered no more cruel hatred than from its own brethren, the Jews. But mark the real meaning of the words [Vulg.], "Thou hast put them to flight from me, and hast disturbed them." These are terrifying words: the synagogue is defeated and flees; the church is victorious and persecuted. For this is the meaning of the saying, Inimicos dari in dorsum, as Gen. 49:8: "Judah, thy hand shall be upon the necks of thine enemies."

182 But it is also lamentable that the synagogue always remains in such a way that it turns its face away from the church, that is, it hates it continuously. It does not want to and cannot recognize it, and does not give up its hatred; yet it does nothing against it, but always flees and is forced to give way. This we see before our eyes in the Jews to this day, so that their situation cannot be expressed more appropriately in a few words than that they are set at a back (positi dorsum), given only to hate and suffer misfortune.

So, that they are also disturbed, we see more clearly than we read it; but even more lamentable is what follows:

V. 42. They call, but there is no helper, to the Lord, but he does not answer them.

It is also said of them, Proverbs 1:28: "Then they will call to me, but I will not answer; they will seek me early and not find me. With this, Solomon refers to the utterly futile behavior of the synagogue and the vain prayers by which they believe they are serving God and appeasing Him, while He, after Christ has been proclaimed to them, will hear no one else and make them blessed except in Christ. For there is no other name under heaven given, wherein we are to be saved, Acts 4:12. Therefore they labor in vain in all things, they call in vain, they pray in vain; they have no helper, no one to hear them. Nevertheless, being hardened, they do not cease from their presumption. Many and frightening things are said about this misery in the prophets.

V. 43. I will crush them like dust before the wind; I will clear them away like the dung in the street.

184] Of this crushing and making small has been sufficiently dealt with in the first Psalm 66 ff. that the Jews are crushed by a twofold crushing, and have become like chaff that the wind scatters [Ps. 1, 4]. We see that they are scattered over the face of the whole earth, that they have nowhere quiet and certain to dwell, that they have no kingdom, no principality, and absolutely no power. But they are even more spiritually scattered in various ungodlinesses, since they leave the faith in Christ standing, and are driven about by various and strange teachings. They are also given to all nations throughout the world to be trampled on, like the dung in the street, which, when thrown out, is of no use to anyone, except to soil the feet. Thus it is said in Isa. 10:6 [Vulg.], "It shall be trodden down as dung in the street." And in Hebrew it is said: I will empty it as dung in the street, that is, as Christ said Matt. 5:13. of the salt that became dumb: "It is of no use henceforth, but to pour it out, and let men tread it down." But for the Jews also here a twofold trampling, that they are both bodily subjected to all, and despised like useless dung, and spiritually [trampled] by the devils with shameful doctrine.

Note the emphasis: "dust" and "dung on the guest. The elect are a solid, good, and fruitful earth, not barren dust blown away by the wind; and precious polished stones held in honor, not a little dung that is without all use. But as out of the dust and dung is taken all that is of any use, so also out of the rejected, so that there is nothing left among them that can be used.

V. 44. You save me from the quarrelsome people and make me a leader among the Gentiles; a people I did not know serve me.

Here Christ speaks in his own person, but everything said above can also belong to his person, because he himself did everything and caused the church to do the same. He clearly prophesies of the rejection of the synagogue and that the church of the Gentiles will be accepted. In Haggai 2:8 Christ is called the "comfort of the Gentiles", and Gen 49:10: "The Gentiles will hope in Him", and Isa 11:10: "The root of Jesse, which is a banner to the nations, the Gentiles will ask for it", and in many other places, as Paul Rom 15:9 ff. gives some passages with this present.

187 But he speaks spitefully of "the quarrelsome people", thereby praising the justice of God and making the guilt of the Jews heavy, as if he wanted to say: There is nothing but contradiction among this bitter and stubborn people. It would have been a small thing if they had not believed or despised, but now they pursue the offered mercy even with violence and resist and contradict with unrestrained fury, by which they force it that they have to be left and I become the head of the Gentiles, as it is said in Ps. 110, 6: "He will judge among the Gentiles, he will do a great battle."

(188) And here it is to be noted that the prophet does not speak of the beginning of ungodliness, fonbut of the perseverance in it and the retribution of it, as he spoke above of the perseverance in godliness. For no one knows the beginnings of mercy and hardening, for God's judgments are incomprehensible, Rom. 11:33.

And lest someone think that he will be the head of the generations of this very contradictory people, he himself declares himself more clearly and distinguishes them completely from the Jews by saying: "A people that I did not know serves me", so that they cannot continue to boast that God alone is known in Judah [Ps. 79, 1]. Thus it is said in Gen. 32:21: "They have provoked me in that which is not GOD; with their idolatry they have provoked me to anger. And I will provoke them again in that which is not a nation; in a foolish people will I provoke them to anger." Thus Hos. 2:23: "I will say unto him that was not my people, Thou art my people;" and [Cap. 1:10] "It shall come to pass in the place where it was said unto them: Ye are not my people, it shall be said unto them, Ye are the children of the living GOD."

190) The fact that he says: "Which I did not know" refers to the bodily presence of Christ, in which he visited the Jews. But it can also, and better, be referred to everything else that he showed to this people in particular, such as: the law, the promises, the miracles, and what Paul also mentions in Rom. 9, 4. ff. that he did not show to the Gentiles, by which, as is said, he recognized them alone. Whereas to the [foolish] virgins, Matth. 25, 12., and to the hypocrites, Matth. 7, 23. he says, "I know not yours."

V. 45. It obeys me with obedient ears; yes, the foreign children have disobeyed me. 1)

He compares the stubborn faithlessness of the Jews with the willing faith of the Gentiles. They are honored with many signs and wonders, instructed by the law and the prophets, and finally, since Christ himself and the apostles taught them, called.

they did not come to believe. None of this was shown to the Gentiles, but only the hearing and the sound of the Gospel came to them, and immediately they obeyed, because God had decreed it beforehand. This is why he praises with such special emphasis the willingness to believe: At the hearing of the ear they will be obedient to me (audient mihi) (as the Hebrew text has), because the Gentiles became believers only by the word which they heard with their ears, although they did not have the prophets and the law.

The Spirit uses the hearing or hearing (auditus seu auditio) after the manner of the [Hebrew] language actually for the oral word, as Isa. 53, 1: "Lord, who believes our sermon?" [auditui] that is, the word which we preach that it may be heard. Hab. 3, 2. "O Lord, I have heard thy rumor (auditionem tuam, that is, thy audible word), that I am astonished."

193 And this peculiarity pleases me extraordinarily, since by it the spirit seems to indicate a twofold mystery; first, that the word of God is of such a nature that unless one closes all the senses and receives it with the ear alone, and believes it, one cannot grasp it, as it is said in Is. 7, 9: "If you do not believe, you will not abide. For the word of God makes foolish and blind, or, as the apostle says [2 Cor. 10, 5.], takes all reason captive under the hearing of Christ. Speaking in this manner, Christ also said to the Pharisees [John 8:37.], "My speech do not sow among you." No one understands this, except at the time of tribulation, when man is completely without all good counsel and simply clings to the word, letting himself be guided by the divine preaching (auditui).

194 Therefore this complaint about the Jewish people is written, that they did not hear with their ears, nor did they incline their ears to the voice of the Lord, nor did they obey it, because they did not want to be guided by the word of God in the time of tribulation, but wanted to govern themselves by their own counsel and eyes, that is, they did not believe, but wanted to feel like horses and mules do [Ps. 32:9].

195. therefore, I do not know how to use the hand-

1) Vulgate: In auditu auris odkäiviti inilii, ülii alloni inontiti kunt miUi.

The people of the Gentiles have been foolish in their own eyes, so that they believed me in things which they could not see or understand. Who now does not see how beautifully that fable of the Gallic Hercules 1) could be drawn here? What are the golden chains, which people gently pull through their ears, other than the verbal word of God, through which the faithful are drawn to Christ? But even if this is something pagan, it is still subject to Christ and serviceable.

The other mystery is that it is not enough for books to be written and read in the church, but it is necessary to speak and hear in it. For this is why Christ wrote nothing, but spoke everything; the apostles wrote little, but spoke much. Thus, as he could have said Psalm 19:5: Her book goeth forth into all the earth, he rather said [Vulg.], "Her sound is gone forth," that is, the living voice, "and to the end of the world," not the writing, but: "her speech." Likewise [v. 4.], "There is no speech nor language, since their voice is not heard." Note: "Since their voice is not heard," not: since their books are not read. For the ministry of the New Testament is not formed in tables of stone and death, but in the sound of the living voice. Hence he says elsewhere [Ps. 60, 8.], "GOD speaketh in his sanctuary." For now he speaks in the church, whereas formerly he wrote in the synagogue, and proclaimed by the sacred Scriptures, Rom. 1, 1. f.; but by the living Word he completes and fulfills the gospel. Therefore one must strive more for many preachers than for good scribes in the church. In this sense Paul also writes to the Galatians [Cap. 4, 20.]: "But I would that I were now with you, and that my voice might walk," because many things, and more effectual, can be done orally, which cannot be done by writings.

1) Luther alludes here to an account that Lucian gave in the beginning of his Ae about an alleged image of the Gallic Hercules (Ogmios). In his right hand he holds the club, in his left hand the bow; therefore the chains are attached to his tongue; smiling Hercules turns back to his entourage. As explanation Lukian gives: Hercules had not overcome all by his strength as well as by his eloquence. (Weim. ed.)

197 "Strange children will lie to me" (mentientur mihi). He calls them strangers because they have turned away from Christ, having become unbelievers. For this is what the Hebrew word means in this passage. But with this he secretly praises the fathers and punishes the degenerate children. For they are children of the fathers according to the flesh, but strangers according to the spirit, since they do not follow in the footsteps of the fathers, of whom, as may be seen, it is said in the fourth Psalm [v. 3, § 11 ff.], "Ye children of man (fili viri, that is, ye children of men and of nobles, spoken according to the synecdoche), how long shall my honor be profaned?"

198] "They have lied," that is, they have become liars against me, since they boast that they are heirs of the fathers and the people of God, while they prove nothing less. On the other hand, the people of the Gentiles boast neither of the fathers nor of worship, but have become the son of the house, doing the truth by faith, by which they prove themselves to be the people of God. But those who do not believe do not have the truth of God, therefore they always remain liars, since only faith makes people truthful. He thus shows the future faithlessness and obduracy of the Jews, that they do not only err, but also establish and defend error as truth.

V. 46. The foreign children pine away and flounder in their bonds. 2)

For since they lie and persistently contradict the truth, not only are they not renewed in their minds, but they also become hardened and inveterate in their opinions. For an erring man can easily be set right, but who can set right a liar who deliberately argues against the truth? Thus it is said in the

2) Vulgate: l'iiii alieni invetorati sunt, etcüacMioaverunt a semitis suis.

Fourth Psalm, v. 3: "How do you love vain things so much and lies so much? We see enough that this is fulfilled in the Jews.

200. et claudicaverunt a semitis [and they limped from their paths]. For this we read 2 Sam. 22, 46. and in Jerome thus: Et contrahentur in angustiis suis [and they will be constricted in their narrowness]. Others render it thus: And they will limp from their bonds. And 2 Sam. 22, 46. is by transposition of the letters the verbum for which XXX is here put, perhaps because the Spirit wished to indicate that it mattered little whether he said: they limped, or: they were bound together with bands. For it is the sense that the Jews, who, despising the faith, cast away the liberty of Christ, are given up to their wrong mind, so that they entangle themselves with their own doctrines, as it were with bands, afflict and torture, and yet never walk rightly, but always limp, so that accident and heartache are in their ways [Rom. 3:16]. The same meaning is Ps. 81, 12. f.: "My people do not obey my voice, and Israel does not want mine. So have I left them in their heart's conceit, to walk after their counsel." And Proverbs 1:31: "They shall eat of the fruit of their substance, and be satisfied with their counsel."

201. Nor could this work-sanctified nature (res justitiarum) of the wicked be more aptly and appropriately expressed than that they are constricted in their narrowness. For we see how all such people are full of misgivings and have a captive conscience, so that they fear even where there is nothing to fear, and suspect sin where there may be merit. So narrowly do they make their own way both with their opinions and with their statutes: they are always restless, always questioning, always fearing. Paul meets these beautifully in the letter to the Colossians Cap. 2, 21. ff., where he mocks their words, saying, "Thou shalt not touch this, thou shalt not taste this, thou shalt not touch this, which yet all things are consumed under hands, fund is men's commandment and doctrine,] which have a semblance of wisdom." For this is instilled in them by their statutes: you must not do this, you must not do that; finally, nothing is permitted to them except that they are ungodly against God and man. Examples of this in our time are the customs and practices of priests and monastics.

There are people whose hearts always want the wrong way, and they do not want to learn the way of the Lord", as it says in Ps. 95, 1) 10. This forms Elijah before 1 Kings 18:21, where he scolds the servants of Baal, saying, "How long do you limp on both sides?" For they are limpers, because they walk with only one leg, or yet not with both; and yet, because they move, they are like the walkers. This is because they walk in the letter of servitude in an ungodly spirit, presuming to serve God with their works and in their ways.

V. 47. The Lord lives, and blessed be my refuge; and the God of my salvation must be exalted.

Now, after his and the church's history or prophecy is finished, he returns to praising and glorifying God. But it can be understood in such a way that from a praising heart it is said, "He lives", that is: His is the life and the praise, as one says: To God alone be glory and honor. So also the apostle says 1 Tim. 6:16, "Who alone hath immortality." Thus he alone lives, and he alone is eternal, so it is he alone who must be exalted, so that glory may be his alone.

204. In this way is spoken against the faithlessness of the Jews, who through their narrowness seek the life, praise and honor that they alone should ascribe to God, and thank Him for it. Hence he says, "GOD of my salvation," that is, who makes me blessed; not I myself by my powers; according to the ordinary way of speaking, as one says, "GOD of my righteousness," Ps. 4:2, that is, who makes me righteous. But in the Hebrew, instead of [in the Vulgate], "Praised be my GOTT," XXXX is said, which is sometimes translated by rock, sometimes by hoard, as we saw in the beginning of this Psalm [v. 3.], "My hoard (fortitudo), in whom I hope." So also here he praises GOD, since he confesses that in Him stands his strength, not in himself.

This verse can also be spoken from a glorifying heart, in contempt of those who are constricted by their narrowness, because they have neither life, nor strength, nor the glory of God, and therefore also no salvation, which one can only have in the Lord through the freedom of faith.

V. 48. The God who gives me vengeance and forces the nations under me.

He says: "The God who gives me", 1) instead of: "who gives me", according to his way [see § 147 and § 152]. This may be said here in two ways, first: He who gives me vengeance, that is, who avenges me, as Ps. 110:1: "Until I lay your enemies at the footstool of your feet." Secondly: Who gives me to execute vengeance, because he is appointed judge of the living and the dead, and, as John 5:27 says, "He hath given him power to execute judgment also, because he is the Son of man," where it is taught that he did not glorify himself, nor avenge himself, for an example to us, lest we should be presumptuous and ambitious. Thus Christ takes vengeance on the godless Jews and rules over the believing peoples of the Gentiles, being exalted by the right hand of God and made Lord over all.

V. 49. who delivers me from my enemies, and lifts me up from them that set themselves against me, thou savest me from the wicked (a viro iniquo).

These last four verses seem to be a kind of conclusion of what has been said in the whole psalm. Therefore, their meaning is sufficiently clear from the preceding. That which in Latin is called viro iniquo (that is, of the people of iniquity, according to the synecdoche), is in Hebrew the XXX, that is, the injustice that injures the neighbor and causes him harm, which the interpreter could have given quite appropriately by iniquitatem (iniquity), if he did not also like to make other changes.

V. 50. Therefore I will give thanks to you, O Lord, among the nations, and sing praises to your name.

1) In the Vulgate, the second person is here.

This verse is cited by Paul Rom. 15, 9, as we have said [§ 1], which also forces us to understand this Psalm actually from Christ. After Christ is delivered from the Jews, who are angry with him, his enemies, rebel against him and commit sacrilege, and is now recognized in the church of the Gentiles through faith, he praises the name of the Lord and sings to him, that is, after he has given the gifts of his Spirit, he works that we give thanks and sing praises. Furthermore, that we give thanks and sing praises to him indicates that we live and are in the Church free of charge, not through our righteousness, but through the benefits of God by grace, so that only the faith and mercy of God may be honored.

V. 51: He who shows great salvation to his king, and favor to his anointed, David, and to his seed forever.

209. but it is "great salvation" by which he saves Christ his King and his Christians, because he saves from death, from sins, from hell, and from all evils; for this salvation is eternal, life, righteousness, and glory. But the bodily salvation is small, indeed, nothing. Thus we are taught that we should despise bodily salvation, and that it is Christian to look to the great, eternal salvation. For it belongs to the new testament to have great salvation, as little salvation was appropriate for the old testament.

210 It is the same thing that he says: "And good deeds to his anointed. This is the end of the middle of the verse. For this salvation is not given to those who have earned it, but solely from God's mercy. Therefore he understands here by "his anointed" the One in whom it is promised that mercy shall be bestowed; therefore, he says here, it is also proved to him, that is, fulfilled in him.

211) "David and his seed forever." Since this is the second part of the verse, it seems to me to say this, that salvation was fulfilled in that king and 2) mercy in the Lord's anointed, so that David and his seed might be satisfied, to whom the promise of the king and the anointed of the God of Jacob had become,

2) Erlanger: M instead of: et.

as 2 Sam. 7,¹) 12. ff. is said. So everything that is said in the first part that it happened in Christ must be understood in such a way that it happened to David and his seed forever, as it is said in Isa. 55, 3: "I will give you the certain graces of David. This is expressed by Lucas, Apost. 13, 34, as follows: "I will give you keep faithfully the grace promised to David," that is, eternal salvation and mercy. For the prophets held fast to the promises of God, and often repeated them and inculcated them, yes, they also expanded them and explained them. This is also necessary for all who will be saved, since salvation lies in them alone, not in commandments or any works.

1) In the Latin editions: 2 Ultimo.

The nineteenth Psalm.

V. 1. 2. A Psalm of David, to be sung. The heavens tell the glory of God, and the firmament proclaims the work of his hands.

1) That this psalm is to be understood from the ministry of the gospel is taught and enforced by Paul when he says Rom. 10:18: "Have they not heard it? For their sound has gone out into all the earth, and their words into all the world." Therefore the heavens, the feasts, the sun, the days, the nights, and similar things must be taken figuratively. Through them, as through lovely blankets, the spirit draws us from this visible world to the vision of a new world, in which there are other heavens, nights and days, whose image and shadow we see in this world. So here the clear circumstances and the context of what is said, then also the reputation of the New Testament, force us to take the secret interpretation, which otherwise an interpreter of Scripture must refrain from as much as possible, lest he lose his simple mind and wander about in nothing 2) but his own dreams. For so we often say: one must not play with secret interpretations in Scripture (at least not in argument), if the secret interpretation is not forced by other passages of Scripture.

2) But we have also said in the foregoing that the spirit sometimes uses figurative words.

2) We have followed here the reading of the Wittenberg and the Jena edition: niotis. The Erlanger offers: niortis, the Baseler: niortnis. The Weimar edition has mortis in the text, but this is improved in the addenda according to the Wittenberg.

when dealing with a kind of figurative matter (if I may speak so). Thus Ps. 2:9: "Thou shalt smite them with an iron scepter" 2c. Although the Gospel is sweet and gentle, yet it seems iron to the flesh, pronouncing a glorious thing with low and base words. Here, on the other hand, speaking as it were in an exalted manner, the prophet pronounces the things that are lowly in the eyes of men with glorious and mighty words, using figurative speech and almost universally calling those "the heavens," which were yet the sweepings and lees of the world, and in truth a kind of living image that represented something other than it was.

3) "The heavens" are therefore the apostles and all those who administer the apostolic office, that is, the ministry of the Word. And here we will see that it is explained to us with excellent eloquence what the Gospel is, what it means to be an apostle or a bishop in the Church, and also what the character of the one who wants to be a bishop must be.

First of all, they must be "the heavens" and "the festivals. Dear, what virtue is there that is not required in the ministry of the church? "The heavens" are God's throne and dwelling place, as it is said in Isa. 66, 1: "The heavens are my throne." A bishop of the Church of God must therefore have God dwelling in him, so that he is blameless and adorned with all the gifts, as Paul describes him Tit. 1, 7-9. and 1 Tim. 3, 2. ff., namely that he has a heavenly life and lead a life worthy of God on earth, so that through this purity he deserves to be instructed from above and to be taught by God [Joh. 6, 45.], so that he does not present his own things to earthly minded people, but divine things.

5. then he should be "a stronghold between the waters", because the Holy Spirit liked to call it "the heavens", Gen. 1, 6. because of future mysteries, because a bishop and servant of the word must be firm in faith when he is placed in the middle of the waters of persecutions for the sake of the word of God, so that he does not give way to superiors or subordinates, and is not moved by prosperity or adversity. And it is these things that make a person holy in the sight of God, firm against men. For if a man is a hireling, he will flee, and not be a firm, but "clouds without water" [Ep. Jude, v. 12] or "a vapor that lasts a little while" [Jac. 4, 14].

But the ministry is: "to tell the glory of God and to proclaim the work of His hands". This is described with simple words, without a picture. Thereby we are also forced to understand people under the "heavens", since the visible heaven cannot tell and proclaim, because it does not have a mouth, tongue or voice, unless we wanted to speak figuratively.

(7) Therefore you see that the apostles and apostolic men are not commanded by the Scriptures, but that they should make the living voices resound in the church, and that for this reason those are not bishops and priests who today are called so 1) even if they could perform all the prayers and all the masses in one day. For their office is not to read the horas canonicas, to attend masses, to roar in the churches, to make noise with musical instruments, and to fill everything with incomprehensible and non-speaking (surdis et mutis) sounds; yes, even to perform miracles, or to adorn life with the best works, efforts, and exercises, and to shine by a good example to others is not enough, but one should not be called bishops and priests.

should tell and proclaim and serve others with the word. But where are those who do this? Nor is it enough to tell or proclaim anything of any kind, so that one does not proclaim the glory of men or the works of men's hands, but the glory of God and the works of his hands, that is, nothing other than the gospel. For what is the gospel but the proclaiming of the glory of GOD and His works, that is, JESUS Christ, the Son of GOD? This we will see when we have seen what the glory of God and the works of His hands are.

8 Paul says 1 Cor. 1, 23. f.: We preach Christ, to the Jews an offense and to the Greeks foolishness, but to the called saints divine power and divine wisdom. For God alone is righteousness, truth, wisdom, power, holiness, salvation and all good. But ours is unrighteousness, foolishness, lies, weakness and all evil, as all this is abundantly proven in Scripture, and we have often taught in the foregoing. For [Ps. 116, 11.] "all men are liars," and 1Hos. 13, 9.] "Israel, thou bringest thyself into mischief." Therefore all lack the glory they should have in GOD, and no flesh can boast before Him, as Paul says Rom. 3, 23. 27. fund 1 Cor. 1, 29.] But "Christ is made unto us of GOD wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption" [1 Cor. 1, 30.], and "by him dwelleth the glory of GOD in our land, and righteousness looketh down from heaven" [Ps. 85, 10. 12.], "that whosoever shall boast may boast of the LORD" [1 Cor. 1, 31.]. For "God, the Father of mercies, hath blessed us with all manner of spiritual blessings in heavenly things," but not otherwise than "through Christ," 2 Cor. 1:3 [Eph. 1:3].

9 Therefore, the glory of God cannot be told unless the shame of men is told at the same time, nor can God be praised as true, just and merciful unless it is preached of us that we are liars and sinners and wretched people. If we believe both of these things, we will be blessed, and the mercy of God will reign in us for His glory. Thus it is said in Ps. 51:6: "Against you alone have I sinned, that thou mayest be right in thy words." So there is nothing in us of which we can boast, but everything that can disgrace us is abundant. But in GOD there is that of which we can boast, and nothing by which we can be put to shame.

10. From this it may be inferred that the glory of God is twofold: that by which we boast in Him, after He has given us a clear conscience, by grace freely, through His mercy; and that by which He is glorified in us and by us; and that the glory of God be proclaimed is nothing else but that that be preached whereby God is glorified, and of which we boast, that is, all the wonders of His ineffable mercy, and the riches of the glory of His mercies poured out upon us, that is, that in truth Jesus Christ and the gospel be taught purely.

(11) Behold, then, how the Spirit has spoken such great things in a very short word, and not only in a very short word, but also in a very appropriate word, for it expresses not only the things, but also the custom of the things. For many preach Christ, but in such a way that they never understand or announce His custom and good deeds, as the great multitude of preachers do, who preach only the histories of Christ when they preach best. But this is not Christian preaching if you preach Christ only according to history; this does not mean preaching God's glory, but if you teach that the history of Christ serves to benefit us who believe to righteousness and salvation, that he did this not for himself but for us according to the will of God the Father, and that we know that all that is in Christ is ours. This faith and this knowledge of the Lord causes us to love, honor and glorify him.

(12) Although Moses and the prophets knew this honor, they did not tell it, but foretold that it would one day be told, since the teaching of the Law worked rather the honor of men and the dishonor of God, in that men, through the works of the Law, either become hopeful and presumptuous, or despair and hate God. This Telling comes to "the heavens". Therefore, this psalm is also one of the passages in which, as the apostle Rom. 1, 2. says, the gospel is promised in the holy scriptures through the prophets.

Since all that Christ has is ours, as the gospel teaches, and I have not ascribed righteousness to the works of the law, but to the grace of God, 1) it is thought to follow from this what was also thought to follow from the preaching of the apostle, namely, that we should no longer do good works, indeed, we should do evil, so that good may come from it [Rom. 3, 8], sin so that God may be glorified [Rom. 3, 5. 7.], persist in sin so that grace may become all the more powerful [Rom. 6, 1.], and the like. For such is the mind of the prudence of the flesh, which comprehends not the glory of God, because it is stifled in its glory. The apostle refutes this beautifully Rom. 6, 1. ff. and Cap. 8, 5. f. Now is not the time to talk about this.

14. "The work of his hands." Here is said, that is, a private, something manufactured, not so-called temporary acts or accomplishments. Thus, again, the power of God's grace is praised, and our shame is revealed. For the works of God's hands are the new creatures themselves, the believers themselves, of whom Jacobus says [Cap. 1, 18.]: "He begat us according to His will, by the word of truth, that we might be the firstfruits of His creatures." And Paul in the Epistle to the Galatians [Cap. 6, 15.]: "For in Christ JEsu neither circumcision nor foreskin counts for anything, but a new creature." For the word of the Gospel does not change the actions of him who does them, 2) nor does it look at the sacrifice, but at him who offers the sacrifice, for the works do not make pleasing in the sight of God, but he who is pleasing does [pleasing] works, and the glory of God is only in those who do the works, but not at all in the works.

1) In the Basel edition: triduitnr instead of: Irilmi. This change probably comes from the fact that the editor (as well as the old translator) considered triUui to be the iuüiitlvus prassentis passive!

2) In the Basel: a^ntes instead of: uMntis. - Here Luther will have thought of the sacrifice of Cain and Abel. Cf. Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. III, 108, Z15 ff.

Moses changes the works through the law, but not those who do works; therefore he makes hypocrites and only makes people righteous according to outward appearances. But the gospel makes alive and works the truth in men.

15) That he speaks of the works of a new creation (recreationis), not of those of the creation, can be inferred from the fact that he prophesies of the Gospel, in which it is taught what must become of us, although in fact there is no difference between the creation and the new creation, since God brings both forth from nothing, and all creation is a work of God's hands, except the ungodly. For everything else does not serve itself, does not act, but is driven (non agunt, sed aguntur), and are for God's glory alone; in the image of these things we too must be permitted.

(16) What, then, is the work of the hands of God proclaimed, but to teach that the old man is crucified and the new put on, that one dies to Christ and rises with Christ, and that thus the glory of God is fulfilled in us?

(17) There again you see how briefly and appropriately the Spirit speaks not only the mysteries of the cross of Christ, but also its custom and benefit, so that you can learn here, too, that they are nothing but talkers who preach Christ's suffering only in a historical way, but do not teach its custom and fruit, which consists in our becoming works of God's hands. Where then will free will remain? Where that man should do as much as is in him? Since we are taught here that we are made, not do, and that we do not work, but that God works us, that we are powers, not doers, the whole theology of the arrogant falls apart. And this is the reason why those must be "heavens" and "strongholds" who tell this, since this is contrary to the whole world, especially to the wise, holy and powerful, and it is necessary that they do not give way to the rage and impetuosity of these people.

V. 3: One day tells another, and one night makes known to another.

(18) This verse has been treated strangely and differently; let us leave that and follow our sense. For he seems to be explaining what he said in the first verse, lest a carnal man should understand or expect that the glory of God and the works of his hands should be told in such a way that we should see the thing itself at the same time, or that what is told should be visible, as it is with the glory and works of men and of whom it is told; for thus faith would be destroyed. Therefore, the prophet wants to understand such honor and such works of God, which cannot be comprehended unless they are grasped in word and faith. For it is not seen that it is only God's glory, let alone that it should have appeared, which we are in the works of God, but meanwhile we believe by faith. What else would it be that he said "they tell", "they proclaim"? For what is told is not presented to the eyes but to the ear, it is not shown in deed but in word. Hence he says that the heavens by their telling present not a thing, but the word; he does not show that which is known, but the knowledge (scientiam) or cognition, that he may put out the eyes, take captive the senses, make us fools, and by preaching (auditu) alone make us blessed by faith. For in the case of the philosophers, those who tell something make it seem that they are indicating the things themselves, not the word, since knowledge is not indicated, but indicates a thing; therefore, they become foolish in these speeches of God.

19 But he puts "days" and "nights" together in a lovely contrast. The days are the heavens themselves, the apostles, the festivals, to whom the Lord says, Matth. 5, 14: "You are the light of the world. And Paul in the Epistle to the Ephesians [Cap. 5, 8.], "But now ye are a light in the Lord." And Phil. 2, 15. f.: "Under which ye shine as lights in the Welt; that ye may keep the word of life." This day, made by the new sun, Christ, says the word to another day, that is, to the world, or to the men of the world, who shine by the light of their own wisdom; that is, he would have it not that she should see it, but that she should believe it, and cease to be day and wise in her own eyes, as if to say: The wisdom of the Spirit preacheth unto the wisdom of the flesh, and preacheth so as to take her captive by the word, and make her foolish. For the wisdom of the Spirit is day in the sight of God, the wisdom of the flesh is day in the sight of the world, that is, each of them is famous, glorious and honorable in its place. Thus it is said in 1 Cor. 1:20, 19: "Has not God made the wisdom of this world foolishness? For it is written: I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and the understanding of the prudent will I reject."

(20) I like this view because it is written that the gospel is to be preached to those who know nothing about it, Romans 15:21: "To whom it is not preached of him, they shall see it. Since then one day proclaims the word to another, he does not tell it to the one to whom it has already been proclaimed, nor even to himself, the proclaimer, but to another, and that to one who is opposed to him, to whom it had not been proclaimed.

21 But that days and nights are to be understood figuratively, this requires that he says: "He says it" (eructat verbum), "she makes it known" (indicat scientiam). For the natural days do not proclaim the word, or teach a knowledge, or hear and know, since the word, the hearing, the knowledge, the instruction, but also the proclaiming and the announcing belong to living men on earth. But also the following verse, which says about speaking and languages, confirms the same. Thus the night, that is, the believing apostles, make it known to the unbelieving night. For it is a repetition of the same thing or doubling (geminatio). For just as the faithful are a light before God and in God, so they are a night before the world and in the world, namely hidden and despised, yes, even in their own eyes nothing and darkness, because they do not please themselves. On the other hand, the ungodly and unbelievers, as they are a light in the world and in their own eyes, pleasing themselves and appearing beautiful, are night and darkness in the spirit and in the eyes of God. For thus says the apostle [Eph. 5, 8]: "You would have been darkness.

(22) Now the prophet makes four distinctions here, naming men as they are according to their different appearances and parts. The wicked are day in their eyes, according to the outward man, night in the eyes of God, according to the inward man. The godly are days in the eyes of God, according to the inward man, night in the eyes of men and in their own, according to the outward man.

(23) Notice with what deliberation the prophet speaks, how he ascribes the word to the day and the knowledge to the night, because to the night, that is, to the world, the knowledge is shown according to the inward man, but to the day, that is, to the same world, the word is proclaimed according to the outward man. For the word is for hearing, by heart, but the knowledge is for hearing, by heart; but whoever wishes may also understand by knowledge the oral word. So the meaning is that those who have understanding in the spirit teach knowledge to those who have understanding in the flesh, that is, they give knowledge by word of hidden things that they do not reveal. Thus Luc. 1, 76. 77. is written of John, that he goes before the Lord to give, not salvation itself, but knowledge of salvation, because our salvation is hidden with Christ in God, but the knowledge of it is revealed through the word of faith.

V. 4. There is no speech nor language, since their voice is not heard.

Who are the "theirs"? The heavens, the days and nights that tell the glory of God and the works of His hands. But where will we hear these heavens? or in what people? or in what languages will they speak? He answers: They will speak in the languages of all nations and in all lands, as the following verse will say. This was fulfilled when the apostles proclaimed in many tongues the great deeds of God, and it is still being fulfilled in the whole world, because the gospel, which was spread by the apostles in many tongues, still resounds in the same tongues.

to the end of the well, although not all speak in different languages; nor is this necessary.

(25) How loquelae and sermones are distinguished is not yet quite clear to me. Many think that loquelae refers to the languages, sermones to the differences or peculiarities of the same language, as in the Hebrew language the Galileans differed from the Jews, as we read in the Gospel, where they said to Peter (Marc. 14, 66. Matth. 26, 73.): "You are a Galilean, because your language betrays you." I am content with the fact that this verse teaches that the apostles spoke in all languages.

(26) But this verse stops the mouths of those who say that the apostles spoke only in one language, the Hebrew, but that others heard their own languages. For here he says that there is no language in which their voice was not heard. For if it was the voices of the apostles, and these were heard by men in all languages, they certainly made themselves heard in divers languages; or if they did not utter these sounds (sonuerunt), it was not their voices, but either those of the hearers, or of the desire that was between them.

(27) But by what miracle they gave forth the diverse voices, so that the hearing was not confused (for the same ear cannot hear diverse voices at the same time), who can know? He who gave it to speak in many tongues, could also cause any one to reach the people who had that language without (disturbing) noise and unmixed with others, as Christ spoke to Saul 1) from heaven, and yet was heard by Paul alone. Lucas indicates this very thing [Apost. 2, 6.], when he says that the multitude died, and each one heard that they spoke with his own language, as if he wanted to say: "Each one heard only his own language, and yet each one heard the same [apostles], and they spoke in man's own language.

tion of different languages. For he does not say, "They heard their own language," but, "Each one heard that they spoke with his own language," that is, that they spoke in their own language and were not merely heard. Why else would it have been necessary for the apostles to understand the Greek language in which they wrote? The Hebrew language would have sufficed; nor would it then have been necessary to say that they spoke in many languages, but that they were heard with many ears, and the miracle would not have been in the languages of the preachers, but in the ears of the hearers.

28 Again, see how he praises faith, for things are not seen which are told, but their voices are heard; hearing alone is required in the Church of GOD. Jerome translates thus: Non sunt sermones, non sunt verba, quibus non audiat vox eorum, where the word verba is expressed by XXXXX, which sometimes means things or stories, or a rumor (famam), as I believe is taken here. And not only faith, but also the effect and fruit of the word is praised at the same time, because it is said that they did not speak into the wind, but their voices were heard, that is, admitted and received, which is done by faith. I leave here the question raised by some: whether this verse is fulfilled, since all nations have not yet heard the gospel? It is easy for anyone to answer.

V. 5 Their line goes out to all the earth, and their speech to the end of the world.

29. here he indicates the place (as I have said (§ 24]) where these heavens shall give forth sound, lest any man complain or make excuse that he cannot sail over the sea, or ascend into heaven to hear. "For the word is almost near thee in thy mouth and in thy heart," says Moses, 5, Book 30, 14. For to this end they were gifted with divers tongues, that their sound might go forth into all lands. And see how carefully the Spirit chooses his words; lest the apostles be thought to be the authors of the word, he makes them servants and workers.

bear witness, as Christ says [Matth. 10, 20.]: "For it is not you who speak, but it is your Father's Spirit who speaks through you." And again [John 16:14.], "The same shall transfigure me, and [John 15:26. f.] shall bear witness of me, and ye shall bear witness also." Therefore he says: Their voices are heard, but another is he that speaketh. Their sound goes out, but it is another who brings it forth (efflat) and sends it out, using their voice and words as his instruments.

30 Augustine applies this passage against the Donatists, who confined the church to a corner in Africa; but it must be directed much more against our new Donatists, who say that there are no believers in India and Persia and Asia. For where the sound and the words of the Spirit are, there without doubt is the true church of Christ. For the Spirit of Christ speaks only in His Church. Therefore, since here is a manifest text that the sound of the apostles has gone forth into all lands, and one does not read that the same has been revoked, we must be careful not to boast ourselves alone as believers with the godless Donatists, whether those or these, who perhaps are nothing less than believers, since we do not hear the word and the sound of the apostles anywhere.

(31) And although the Hebrew text says, "Their cord (regula) goes out into all the earth," the apostle Rom. 10:18 says, "their sound," and it comes to the same thing. For the sound of the gospel is the cord by which the church is built. For it is not built by the bodily tools of craftsmen, but by the word of life. At the same time, however, a certain measure is indicated by this word, according to which the office of each apostle is divided in the whole world. For they did not all preach in the same place, but were distributed over the whole world, not that they should take the riches of it for themselves, but that each one should lead his part back to Christ.

He made a hut for the sun in the same. 1)

This is the last part of the preceding verse in Hebrew and reads thus: "He has made a tabernacle for the sun in them. Some take the sun in the proper sense for our visible sun, under which the church or humanity of Christ, the tabernacle of God, was revealed. But it is better, I think, that the prophet continues in the picture he has begun, and that the sun is such a one as can stand in these heavens and dwell in them. This is also indicated by the following verse: "And the same goes forth as a bridegroom." And the interpreters 2) have changed the Hebrew XXX, which means "in the same" (in eis, that is, in the aforementioned heavens), into suum, yes, they have generally omitted it, although in fact this image is taken from our sun and the visible heavens, in which the sun dwells and runs from morning to evening in a very lovely course. Therefore the meaning is: He has Christ, who is the sun of righteousness (as he is called Mal. 4:2, "Unto you that fear my name shall the sun of righteousness arise, and salvation under the wings thereof"), set [to dwell] in the apostles. For he enlightens them, speaks, works, and is all in them.

For we see that also in our (his) heaven the sun is his glory and his whole being, since when the sun has set and darkness reigns, rather a sad chaos than a heaven is before our eyes. Thus, if the apostles or their successors were without the Christ dwelling in them, they would truly be a chaos, and not "the heavens." Therefore, this verse gives the reason for what has been said before, that all the glorious things that have been said of the heavens, and all that they are able to do, are not based on their power, but that they are able to do them through the power of the Christ dwelling in them.

34. but "the tabernacle" is faith in Christ, by which he dwells in us, as it is said in Eph. 3:17, "Christ dwelling in your hearts through faith." Of this says Jesaias, Cap. 4, 5. f.: "For it will be a screen over all that is glorious, and will be a shelter for the shade of the day from the heat, and a refuge and concealment from the weather and rain," that is, faith protects on both sides, from fortune and misfortune.

V. 6, 7: And she went forth as a bridegroom out of his chamber, and rejoiced as a hero to run the way. She arises at one end of heaven, and runs back to the same end, and nothing is hidden from her heat.

35 That is, he prepared the gospel, or what the apostles were to tell about in the gospel. For in these two verses he describes the sun, of which he had said that a tabernacle was made for it in the apostles, from which the whole gospel resounds, and which is the glory of God, in which he also decided everything. It is almost the opinion of all that these two verses speak of the incarnation, the walk and the ascension of Christ; this opinion we will follow in the first place.

The chamber of Christ, which in Hebrew means something hidden and veiled, is understood by all of the Virgin Mary, from whose womb he came forth, like the sun from the dawn, yes, from the concealment of the night. This is certainly a beautiful opinion, by which the ineffable birth is indicated, in which the power of the Most High overshadowed the Virgin, and in secret this child (foetum) of salvation worked, of which nature knew nothing, nor could reach it. For just as the rising sun comes forth in such a way that it is visible to all, and yet no one can know where it comes from, so Christ, when He was born, came forth in such a way that all could see Him, and yet (as Isaiah [Cap. 7, 14.] prophesied) He had an inexpressible birth, because this, that one should be born of a virgin without the man's assistance, goes beyond the custom and understanding of nature.

37 But he calls him a bridegroom, because he is joined to mankind and to the church in one flesh, which is a

The Lord is the great and sweet mystery in which the rich and the poor, the righteous and the sinner, the blessed and the damned, the child of grace and the child of misery are united. For by no other word can this mercy be more gloriously extolled than that He is called the Bridegroom of the Church, wherein it is prophesied that all that is His is given to us, and all that is ours is taken away. .

But how does the bridegroom go out of his chamber? and why does he praise this sun, Christ, by this comparison? Perhaps because a bridegroom goes out adorned and garlanded, rejoicing out of love for his bride. Thus Christ came forth from the Virgin's body out of love for the Church, adorned and crowned in spirit, while he came according to the flesh in the highest poverty and contempt. For he came full of adornment and crowns of God's grace, rejoicing in the love of his Church. Therefore, he rejoiced like a hero to run the way, that is, in great strength of love and spirit he increased, worked, fought in the battle of death with the devil and our sins, suffered and died.

39. "It arises at one end of heaven," one wants to be said of the birth in eternity, because he came forth from the Father and came into the world, as he says Joh. 16, 28. "And returneth unto the same end again," one declares of his ascension. Furthermore, by "the heat thereof" is understood the Holy Spirit, who filled the whole world by transfiguring Christ, that he is the Lord over all things, and that all things are put under his feet.

(40) The opinion of these people, I say, is true, but not expressed in the right place, for it lacks order and proper sequence, and it seems to me that the prophet is not speaking of Christ's incarnation, walk and ascension, but of his glorification and the preaching of him. For he describes the heavens and the whole mystery of Pentecost and the ministry of the gospel. Therefore I assume that he does not go back to what happened before the Pentecosts, but rather follows what followed the telling of the heavens.

and the gift of languages, namely the kingdom of faith, which is spread over the whole earth. This seems to me both the order and the words, if we only assume that the prophet speaks figuratively, as the majesty of the sacred mystery requires. For thus we have the heavens, the feasts, the days, the nights, the sun, the tabernacle of the sun taken in a spiritual sense from the mystical Christ preached by the apostles. Thus, in the same continuous or uninterrupted homonymous speech, the bridegroom's coming out of the chamber, the rising and returning, and the joyfulness of running 1) the way, can only refer to the reigning Christ preached and believed through the Gospel. These are my thoughts, without wishing to oppose anyone who has a better view; for the psalm is about a new world, as we have said.

41. since the sound of the heavens goes forth into all the earths, he who has made his tabernacle in these same heavens goes forth through this their ministry, and is manifested in earthly hearts through faith, by which he betroths himself to the church of the whole earth, as it is said in Hosea Cap. 2, 19. f., "I will betroth myself unto thee for ever; I will trust myself unto thee in righteousness and in judgment, in grace and in mercy; yea, in faith will I betroth myself unto thee." For Christ did not actually and fully become the Bridegroom by His incarnation alone, but also by His Church's consenting to His covenant through faith. For "he that hath the bride is the bridegroom" [John 3:29]. For consent makes marriage; before the same it is more properly said of a suitor than of a bridegroom. Therefore, his coming forth as a bridegroom is his revelation, so that the church may believe in him, that is, if he is believed in, it is revealed that he is the bridegroom.

(42) But what is "out of the chamber" or out of the hidden place, I do not understand, unless the prophet understood it in this way.

1) Jenaer and Erlanger: exaltatio instead of: exultatio.

that Christ may arise in the hearts of believers in such a way that one does not know where he comes from, as he says John 3:8: "The wind blows where it wills, and you hear its sound, but you do not know from where it comes or where it goes", so that the gracious condescension (dignatio) of the merciful God, by grace in vain, may be displayed. For it is not by our thinking, our understanding, our willing that faith in Christ comes to us, but everyone who is endowed with faith in Christ is preceded by the Spirit with incomprehensible and hidden effect, just by hearing the word, without any other effort on our part.

(43) If I am correct here, then this way of speaking, Ps. 135, 7: "Who makes the wind come out of secret oysters", and Ps. 17, 14: "Whose belly you fill with your treasure", will belong to the same figurative way of speaking. For if the things that belong to the nourishment of the body come forth from the hidden things of God, so that no man by his effort can forestall them, seize them, or bring them about, how much more are the divine and eternal things, which are given in faith and by faith, brought about by the ministry and hearing of the Word, without our effort! He adds, therefore, with necessity, that Christ may come forth and arise in our hearts, like a bridegroom out of hiding, so that the glory of God and the works of His hands, not the hope of our free will, may be told.

44. But it is beautiful that this hidden thing of God is called the chamber of the bridegroom, since the church is called everywhere in Scripture, that is, the hidden thing, which is the chamber of Christ, out of which Christ (that is, all that is of Christ, 2) whether it be faith, or the word, or the power) went forth and appeared in the world. For since this is revealed in the Church, at the same time Christ is revealed, since as the Bridegroom He has all that the Church has. Thus Paul says Eph. 3, 10. f.: "That now it might be made known to the principalities" and rulers in heaven, to of the church, the manifold wisdom of God, according to the purpose from the world, which He has demonstrated in Christ our Lord." Since the church and faith in Christ thus go forth, Christ certainly goes forth in the church, and through the church and out of the church before the eyes of the world, as it is also said in 1 Tim. 3:16: "Great indeed is the mystery of God: He is manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, appeared to the angels, preached to the Gentiles, believed on by the world, received up into glory."

(45) And I know not what emphasis there is in the words of this verse. It is greater than I could obtain, that he should bring in Christ as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber. For by this short word he seems to make the church and Christ one flesh and one spirit, and all things common between them, to which also the Song of Solomon alludes, since it describes the origin and the coming forth of the church, saying [Song of Solomon 6:9]: "Who is she that cometh forth as the dawn, fair as the moon, chosen as the sun?"

Yes, it was common for David to compare the exit of Christ and the church to the exit of the dawn or the sun, like Ps. 110:3: "Thy children shall be born unto thee as the dew out of the dawn," where we have [in the Vulgate]: Ex utero ante luciferum genui te. For what is the womb of the dawn but the chamber of the church out of which Christ went forth, in that by the gospel preached by the apostles the Christians were multiplied in whom Christ was, and they in Christ? So about the same thing are the last words of David, 2 Sam. 23, 4: "As the light of the morning, when the sun goeth out in the morning without clouds, when from the brightness after the rain the grass groweth out of the earth." But also Job curses his day [Cap. 3, 1. 9.]: "He must not see the light, nor the eyebrows of the dawn."

47. May we call "the chamber" the hidden things of God, or the womb of the Church, out of which Christ comes forth and grows, there is nothing in it; both are true, and from the bodily birth of Christ this spiritual birth is easily understood. For as

In the Holy Virgin both were hidden, namely the womb of the Virgin and the hidden work of God, through which Christ was formed and born, so it happened in the Church with both. For out of the womb of the apostles, who were the first Church, and through the secret work of God, Christ came forth in spiritual birth and was revealed to the world. For Christ would be nothing if He were only born in the flesh into His person, if He were not also born in the spirit into His body, which is the Church. We understand it in this way that the prophet in his parable speaks mainly of this birth, as I said, through which he actually came out like a bridegroom.

48 "She rejoices like a hero, to run the way." "A hero" (gigas), Hebrew XXXX, 1) is called a mighty one and a ruler, but in spirit, by which the prophet indicates that the church, and Christ in it, had had happy progress through the word of the apostles, and increased against all the power of hell, although the church according to the flesh was weakened by various and many persecutions. For Christ has not been weakened, but has even run with joy, glorified and exalted through the whole world, just as the visible sun seems to rejoice, as it were, when it rises and ascends on high.

But the royal prophet speaks in a peculiar and royal way, so that I must confess that I cannot attain his words by any interpretation, although I grasp the matter to some extent even by reflection. For he describes in one short word the struggle of the church, which stands in proud faith against all the powers of the world through the exceedingly powerful Word, ascribing everything to Christ as a hero who fights valiantly and overcomes and leads it out well, even though all this appears quite different to the senses. For, just as he had the exceedingly lowly 2) apostles with the splendid images of heaven, feasts, day, night

1) In the Erlanger and in the Baseler: "u the Wittenberger and the Jenaer have rightly deleted the "a".

2) Jenaer: Milissimvs instead of: viissinaos.

In the same way that he praised the power of Christ, the hero who walks in the church and spreads far and wide through the gospel, he describes with the same verbosity in images the power of Christ, the hero who walks in the church and spreads far and wide through the gospel in the highest weakness and (as it seemed) reduction of this church, so that he did not appear as a bridegroom but as an enemy, and had the appearance that he would not go out but would perish. That is why he says that he comes out of hiding and out of the closet, that is, through the mystery of the cross and the crucified church.

50 A summo coelo egressus ejus, et occursus ejus usque ad summum ejus. The Hebrew text, in more appropriate words, says: "It arises at one end of heaven, and returns to the same end." In this he indicates, in extraordinarily appropriate words, that the Church has multiplied throughout the world. For he calls "the end of heaven" what we call the horizon, remaining in the image of the visible sun. For just as everywhere on earth the same sun is directed from morning to evening, as it were from one end of heaven to the other (for so it appears to the senses), so Christ rises everywhere on earth, and his church is gathered from morning and evening, as he says Matt. 8:11: "Many shall come from morning and evening, and shall sit with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven." Isa. 49, 12. "Behold, these shall come from afar, and behold, those from the north, and these from the sea, and these from the land of Sinim." And Isa. 43:5-7: "I will bring thy seed from the morning, and will gather thee from the evening; and will say toward the north, Give; and toward the south, Resist not. Bring my sons from afar, and my daughters from the ends of the earth, all that are called by my name, even whom I have created for my glory, and prepared them, and made them."

51 This thought is expressed in the second Psalm, v. 8: "I will give you the nations for an inheritance, and the end of the world for a possession. And Ps. 72:8: "He shall reign from sea to sea, and from the waters even unto the end of the world." Therefore, summum coelorum and summum eorum is included in the

In this verse it is said in the same way as Christ says Matth. 24, 31: "They will gather His elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven (a summum coelorum, that is, from the morning) to the other" (usque ad terminos eorum, that is, until the evening). For thus Christ was gathered out of the people of the earth, from morning till evening; everywhere He was preached, everywhere He was believed, everywhere He became the Bridegroom of the Church, which was done by the ministry of the Word alone, even as the preachers did not think of it, nor foresee it. For so the apostles heard that Samaria had accepted the word of God before they had decided to preach to them 1). And Isa. 49, 21. the church marvels that it was surprised by the multitude of believers, of whom it had no provision, saying, "Who begat me these? I am barren, solitary, exiled and outcast. Who brought up these for me? Behold, I was left solitary; where then were these?" For thus the good smell of Christ in the apostles led people from all over the wide world to the word and faith of Christ, that is, from one end of heaven to the other.

52. "And nothing is hidden from its heat." There is no doubt that here the Holy Spirit is figuratively called the heat of the sun. But here he did not look at any person, nor did he make any distinction between Gentiles and Jews, because he is the same Lord over all, who was able to raise up children for Abraham even from the stones. For as all have sinned, so all have been justified and made alive by grace through the heat of the Spirit which had mercy on them. But he chose to call it "heat" rather than by any other name, that he might indicate the power of the Spirit who makes alive. For heat is a characteristic of life, cold of death. Thus it is said in Gen. 1, 2: "The spirit of God hovered on the water", that is, he sat brooding over it and warmed it by his heat, in order to give life.

1) In the original edition: iilis, which all editions except Weimar's have changed to illi. This change is not necessary. Compare Apost. 8, 14, where both in Latin as well as in German, the collective term Samaria is followed by the plural.

just as a hen incubates her eggs and brings them to life.

In the Hebrew it is not written: Qui se abscondat [who can hide himself], which indicates the fleeing of a man who hides himself, just as Adam hid himself in paradise, but simply: He is not hidden from their heat, which rather indicates that he who is hidden will be mercifully found and enlightened or brought to light, just as Luc. 2, 31. f. is said of Christ that he is prepared to enlighten the Gentiles. For this is an expression of what he had said, that Christ reigns everywhere on earth, and that there is no place where his Spirit does not justify men and make them alive, lest the ungodly should bind the church of Christ in any place, and shut it up in the corner where they sit, wanting only to be regarded as being enlivened by the warmth of the Spirit, when in fact they are dead from the cold of Babylon.

For this is what the prophet means to say, that only at the coming of the gospel will the Holy Spirit be poured out on the whole world. For the law neither gives nor has warmth, but rather is coldness, making even 1) people unwilling, lazy, even dead to good works, as it says in Ps. 147:17 ff: "Who can abide before his frost? He speaketh, and it melteth; he maketh his wind to blow, and it thaweth." He will, I say, send forth the word of evangelical warmth, that is, of the Spirit, that will melt it, as it is also said in Ps. 125:4, "O Lord, turn our prison; as thou dost dry the waters at noon."

V. 8: The law of the Lord is without change and restores the soul. The testimony of the Lord is sure, and makes the foolish wise.

55) After describing the ministry of the gospel and its work, which is to bring glory to God, to plant faith in Christ and to give the Spirit through the same word, he goes on to describe the fruit of the gospel, which is the love of the law, that is, the fulfillment of the law, as it is described in Romans 13,

10. means, "Love is the fulfillment of the law." For the law is not fulfilled by works, but by love, and it does not want to be loved with works only in appearance, but from the heart.

(56) Therefore the prophet has in mind those who have received the Spirit through the word of faith, and have become joyful and have gained love to do what is of the law, and teaches how holy and righteous and good the law is, which seems bitter, unjust and harsh to those who are without the Spirit, though this is not the fault of the law, but of the hearts. As if he made a comparison between Christ and Moses, saying, They hated Moses, and fled from his shining face; yea, they also attacked him with stones, and always murmured against him. For herein is pictured the mutual conduct of the law and the inclination to evil. But Moses was indeed the most ruthless man on earth, which they did not recognize, and the law of the Lord is exceedingly loving, which the corrupt heart does not recognize until the voice of the bridegroom, after the wickedness has been taken away and the spirit has been given, the law is recognized and loved.

57 Therefore, although he speaks of the law, which is the letter written in the ten commandments, he speaks only of the beloved letter that has already been drawn into the spirit. For thus the Lord promised Jer. 31, 33. "I will put my law in their heart, and write it in their mind." This he indicates by saying, "The law is without change," that is, without blemish or blameless, that is, (as it reads in Hebrew) which makes good and blameless, which it does not do unless it is written by the finger of the Spirit, and taught by the heat of the word; therefore he also mentioned the heat beforehand in the preceding verse.

(58) We have elsewhere abundantly said how the law is a letter, whether it be written or spoken or understood, until it be loved. This love, however, does not come from the law itself teaching, but from the warmth that justifies.

1) The Basel edition has et erased here.

and converts souls. In short, in these verses the prophet ascribes such glorious gifts to the law, that it is without change, converts souls, and the like, so that he distinguishes it from the law that is taught without the word of faith and the warmth of the spirit, which only stains and turns away souls, making unbelieving and unintelligent people, so that everything that he praises of the law in this passage may be understood as belonging to the spirit that warms through the word of faith. For this reason he also expresses his joy with such a great abundance of words, since he repeats the law so often (namely six times) always with different words, and praises it with twelve epithets, as it were, as with twelve fruits of the tree of life, in that he clearly demonstrates through this verbosity what actually happens in a soul that loves the law and rejoices in it. For he who loves the law cannot praise it enough; so much does it please him, whereas before it displeased him completely. Therefore, let us also consider all this in opposition (per antithesis), so that we may more easily recognize what the law does without the spirit, and what the spirit does in us without the law.

59. First, the law is "without change" through faith, not merely in itself or (as it is called) objective, but also in us or (as it is called) effective (for by its very nature [formaliter] it is always without change), because it makes us good and undefiled, and is loved by those who have now become undefiled and good, as a law without change, that is, truly recognized for what it is. But without faith it not only does not make us undefiled or good, nor is it loved, but it also makes us guilty and evil people, and is hated as evil, because the law causes wrath [Rom. 4:15] and death [Rom. 7:13], which everyone hates, and it forbids evil desire, at which everyone becomes indignant and unwilling, even though he feigns obedience for fear of punishment. This hypocrisy is attacked and annulled by what follows.

60. second [Vulg.], "It converts souls," for (as I have said) the law before the Spirit converts the hand for fear of the

But it turns the heart away the more through hatred of these punishments and through displeasure at the prohibition of the evil air; it also converts the mouth, the eyes and ears, and all the powers, but the heart is not righteous and the spirit is not sincere. Therefore, lest anyone should understand that in these verses the law is praised absolutely, it is necessary that he should understand at the same time that the law has become such through faith, but that it does not accomplish such things by itself alone. For the law does not do such things, but it becomes of such a nature through the heat of the sun, which rises through faith in the word. It becomes, I say, such in us in whom it was quite contrary before faith. For in this sense it is clearly understood that the fruit of faith in the gospel is that the law has become lovable, and such a thing as he here describes.

Third, "The testimony of the Lord is sure. There is no doubt that by "testimony of the Lord" is understood the same as by "law," as also by the following four names, "commands," "commandments," "fear," "rights," for ever different causes. For "law" (lex) it is called, because it instructs or instructs us in that which we do not know. "Testimony" is called bearing witness, because it is given as a sign and memo by others, as it were as witnesses and messengers, by one who is absent and not before our eyes. We will deal with the other names in their place; here we will see only the two types mentioned.

For the law by teaching makes XXXX (that is, good people), and converts souls when it is taught otherwise in faith. It is a certain testimony, for though it is the testimony of one who is absent, who is nowhere visible, yet it does not deceive or delude. For it is not fulfilled in vain, and our work is not forgotten before him who is not seen. For in this way faith believes that the testimony of God is certain (fidele). This thing tends to make people suspicious of faithfulness, then also sluggish to keep faith, because people deal with each other according to what they can see it before their eyes and grasp it with their hands. 1) And not only in this way is it reliable in a suffering way (passive), but it also makes reliable people in an active way (active), so that those who have faith are not more sluggish in their doing when they are absent from the one whose testimony is, than when they are present before him. On the other hand, where the spirit of faith is not, it is not considered certain, nor does it make reliable (fideles) people, but rather it makes unfaithful people (infideles). For they act as if the one who commanded it did not exist at all, or did not demand it or repay it. Thus the testimony becomes void and false for them, because they themselves are void and false.

Fourth: "It makes the foolish wise. Parvuli here are actually the simple-minded and those who are easily persuaded, as Proverbs 1:22: "How long will you foolish ones (parvuli) be foolish?" and Cap. 14:15: "A foolish one (innocens) believes everything," which actually fits the "testimony". For only those hear the testimony of the Lord who are easily persuaded and led like little children, since it is proclaimed by lowly and despised witnesses from Him who is so far removed from all sense. But they become wise through the testimonies, that is, they become such people who recognize things that are beyond all understanding and far from us, that is, they come to the knowledge of God. Knowing Him, they withdraw from all things that can be seen and grasped, and strive to please Him whom they do not see. In this way, the law, by teaching heavenly things, becomes through faith the testimony of the Lord, which is wise and "after" wise people.

(64) On the other hand, those great ones who cannot be persuaded are rather attached to present things; blinded by them, they become unwise and understand nothing of the absent God. Even if they are forced to speak, hear, or think of God for fear of punishment, they depart from Him in their hearts and become absorbed in the Things they see. This is because the testimony of the Lord has not yet become such that it could make the foolish wise, that is, it has been taught without spirit.

In Hebrew XXXX can be taken XXXX collective, that is, as the epitome of the testimonies, or all that there is of the testimonies of the Lord, as we say XXXXX, the youth, that is, the totality of the young people, or all that there is of young people. But this serves little to the point, only that we must pay attention to the chosen expression of the royal prophet.

v. 9 The commands of the Lord are right and gladden the heart. The commandments of the LORD are pure, and enlighten the eyes.

Fifth, he praises the commands (justitias, which the Latin interpreter elsewhere translates by justifications, since here it is not XXXXX, but XXXX, which is also rendered by statutes and commandments) as "right", which are directed by the gospel of grace. The law of the Lord is called justifications from the effect that they justify (justificent [cf. § 58]) and exercise in justification (in justificando), or, so that we agree with the Hebrew, because they set men in right order and guide them in what they must do; on this fits nicely the praise that they are right and delight. For before the law of the Lord is spiritually understood, it makes the consciences very restless and distressed, and wearies them by many detours of works, in that they fall short of the righteousness of the law, and yet do not attain to the righteousness of the law, as the wandering of the children of Israel in the wilderness on the shore of the Red Sea illustrates, where they grumbled because of the complaints, and began to be distressed because of the toil and the ripening. For the law is not satisfied by works, but by its unending activity it completely exhausts those who do it, dragging them hither and thither, so it also makes sad, arouses sullenness, causes people to be discontented, to walk in crooked ways, and to be unwilling. But when it is taken spiritually, that is, loved

When the word "good" is used, it is wonderfully brief and leads straight to the goal, making people cheerful and ready for all good works.

The sixth thing is that it makes the heart glad, while it is far more contrary to the flesh. For the letter kills and weighs down the hearts, in that they feel that the requirement of the law is not satisfied by either strength or works, and they realize that the more they strive and do works, the more they become guilty (debere). Or if they do not labor in this matter, they delight in works in a vain and perverse confidence, because they delight not in God, nor in a clear conscience and the law of the Lord, but in themselves. This is not a joy of the heart, but of the body and of the senses, in that there is nevertheless a restless conscience hidden within, which will come to light in its own time; just as the testimonies make wise those who are arrogant in the letter, by which they think themselves wise. For as long as the law is a letter, it always works one of these two things; for either it only converts in appearance, or in truth only turns away more. Thus it either gives a fictitious wisdom, or makes still more unintelligent. Thus it only makes you happy in appearance, or only saddens you more. Therefore the Spirit touches three qualities (habitudines) of the law, since he does not simply say [Vulg., v. 8.], "It converts," but adds: "the souls." Thus he does not content himself with saying, "It makes wise," but adds, "the foolish;" and [v. 9.], "They delight," not any arbitrary thing, but, "the heart." So we shall see it with what follows. For he indicates a threefold kind of people: some who do not know the law, others who know it and hate it, and others who know it and love it.

(68) If the law is not known, it makes converts only in appearance, for it converts, but not their souls. But if it is hated, it makes them more turned away, and that from the heart. How? Namely, those who presume to fulfill it by their own efforts have not yet recognized it,

How spiritual the law is. Therefore they set up their own righteousness and think, according to their blindness, that they have fulfilled the law, that they have become good, converted and without change, while through this ungodliness they are twofold defiled and twofold perverted, and the law is twofold defiled to them and twofold turns away their souls, precisely by this foolish delusion of their innocence and feigned conversion, first, because they are in fact ungodly (nocentes) and apostate, secondly, because they adorn this ungodliness (nocentiam) and apostasy by a semblance of works, and arrogantly boast themselves of vanity and falsehood.

(69) But those who know the law, as it is spiritual, put away this presumption, and know that by the law is required of them that which they neither can nor have. Therefore they are tormented by conscience, or hate it, that their lusts are denied them, and that what they do not have is required of them. Since with this hatred they hate the good law, they are more averted, and become angrier, so that even the law is not without change to them, but from a different cause from those mentioned before [§ 68]. For those neither acknowledge that it is without change, nor do they become without change through it; but these acknowledge it, and yet do not become without change through it. But those who love and acknowledge it also become without change.

70 Thus the testimony of the Lord, if it is not recognized, makes wise only according to appearance (ficta), for it makes wise people, but not those who are "silly" (parvuli), but because it is hated, it only makes more incomprehensible. How so? Since they presume to do enough by works, and do not know how to do nothing, they make themselves believe that they are wise and understand everything, and that they have become faithful (fideles) and true, while through this ungodly hypocrisy everything is doubly opposed. But those who realize how unfaithful (infideles) and vain they are, and have nothing to suffice with, hate the testimonies of the Lord and wish they were not bound by them. Through this evil will they become even more unintelligent, and are drawn even more to follow the

They would rather that those invisible things were not there, so much is lacking in them that they should strive for them. So with neither of these is the testimony of the Lord certain, and such as makes wise, but from different causes. In the case of the former, because they do not even realize how certain it is, they are completely vain, and do not become wise through it; in the case of the latter, because they see that it is certain, and they themselves are vain, yet they do not allow themselves to be instructed by it, so that they become wise. But to those who love it, it is certain, and it instructs them wisely.

(71) Thus the commands that are not known make merry only in appearance; for they rejoice, but not their hearts. They inflate with joy those who are arrogant in their works, so that they make themselves believe that they are righteous and pleasant, when in fact (as Ecclesiastes tells Solomon, Cap. 4:17) they do not know how much evil they do, and inwardly they have an entirely troubled and not at all cheerful conscience. But those who realize that they are not righteous, and are driven to many things by the demands of the law, hate the law and are afflicted by many complaints, and are always sad before the Lord in all their ways, as it says in Mal. 3:14: "We lead a hard life before the Lord." So for neither of them are the commands of the Lord right, nor do they please the heart.

Seventh: "The commandments of the Lord are pure" (lucidum). It seems to me that the interpreters have rendered by "bright" (lucidum) that which in Hebrew means "pure" or elect; for it is the same expression which is set Ps. 18:27: "With the pure thou art pure"; perhaps moved by what follows: "And enlighten the eyes," which fits more to that which is bright than to that which is pure (electum). Next, they may have wished to avoid a useless repetition (nugationem)¹, since they translated above [v. 8.], "The law of the LORD is without change." But neither of these causes is sufficient. For why did they it is not given rather also in such a way: The commands are joyful, instead of being "right," because it follows: "and gladden the heart"; or: The testimony is wise, instead of: it is "certain", because it follows: "and makes wise"? So also in the other things no consideration is given to uniformity. But we have said [§ 57] that "without change" (immaculatam) in Hebrew actually means: blameless (innocentem) or, what Paul ascribes to the law, righteous, holy and good. So it must mean: "The commandments of the Lord are pure" (electum).

73. But it is actually called a commandment because it demands and forbids, and therefore understands the law of God in the part in which it is most burdensome and hated, since being instructed, put in order, and guided (of which we have said that the law, insofar as it is a testimony and command), is easier, and human arrogance can bear it more easily; But the commandment he hates and despises as a stern driver and harsh ruler, and obeys only with displeasure and with grumbling. But of those who do not understand it, that is, of the first kind of men, of whom we have said that they are hypocrites, it is believed to be kept by them alone, presuming to fulfill it with their works; but when the spirit comes which kindles love for the commandment, it is not only not despised or hated, but is reckoned among the most precious and elect things. For then the commandments of the Lord become in truth "louder" (electum), so that they would not for any thing in the world that they were not given, and if they were not given, they would most gladly desire that they should be given.

Eighth, "They enlighten the eyes. The ignorant hypocrites, who are hopeful in the appearance of works, make the commandments blind in fact, thinking that they are very enlightened and see everything. For the commandments enlighten, but not their eyes. Others, however, make them completely blind, who, through hatred of the commandments, are led to consider nothing less and more contemptible than these very commandments; but their evil airs prefer them to these, and choose them in their hearts, no matter how much they pretend otherwise, forced by fear. For what greater blindness can there be than that one, instead of the very lawful commandment of God, should consider the shameful evil pleasures forbidden in this commandment to be the choicest and most delicious things? But those who love the commandment, who consider that the evil lusts are exceedingly shameful, consider nothing more choice and delicious than the commandment of the Lord, which not only shows or bears witness against such shameful things, but also forbids them altogether, so that it commands that they should not be. For they delight in the fact that they are most strictly forbidden, and that the opposite things are most urgently required. Thus the very commandment of the Lord coincides with all their desires. For they have enlightened eyes, and see clearly what things are to be loved in truth, and what things are to be hated in truth.

(75) But before we pursue other matters, and that we may no longer be in uncertainty, we ask by what means we may attain that the law may be without change, the testimony certain, the commands right, the commandments pure, the fear pure, the righteousness true, and also that the other things may come to pass which have been and will be said of the law. I answer: You never get there by doing works and laboring, because it is not fulfilled by works and efforts, but by despairing of works and efforts. For the law cannot delight before its fulfillment, but after its fulfillment. But since the foolish saints of works seek to fulfill it by their works and never despair of themselves, they inevitably grow weary and labor in vain. For as long as they find that in themselves with which they can pay the demand of the law, they do not cease to deal with works, and thereby to be restless and to afflict the law. Thus the law exhausts and wearies them until it consumes them forever.

(76) But those who have experienced their inability and confess that they cannot satisfy the requirement of the law, despair of themselves and take refuge in Christ, the only Fulfiler of the law, in

if they hear him and believe in him, since he is the end of the law; he who believes in him is righteous [Rom. 10:4]. Now everyone who is of this nature, before all his works and without any law, receives in vain, through this humility and his faith, the Holy Spirit, who, not by works, but by the grace of his power alone, kindles a new and delightful desire of love, and makes hateful the desire which is forbidden in the law. After this has happened, the will is already changed into another and looks at the law of the Lord and sees that it commands and forbids exactly what he himself, ignited by the Holy Spirit, desires and loves. Thus it happens that he must necessarily love the law, which in all things meets his desires, praise it, and sing about what is sung about in these verses.

For then man sees that it is not through the fault of the law, but of the will, that the law increases sin and thereby causes wrath, since it is without change, and converts souls, makes them wise, gladdens and enlightens the eyes. For if the law by its nature increased sin and caused wrath, love would do the same, which is the friend of the law and agrees with it in all things. It does this also when it is outside the will, just as the law, which is always outside the will, where love is not present. For what did the love of Christ do to the Jews but greater wrath and sin? So also the law works in all men, as long as it is outside their will, but not in their will, nor their will in it, until it is loved, and that is loved which the law commands.

V. 10. The fear of the Lord is pure (sanctus) and abides forever. The rights of the Lord are true, all righteous.

The Hebrew text actually has, "The fear of the Lord is pure," or louder, and this is not said as by an epithet (as is usually thought) by which it is to be distinguished from the servile fear, as far as I can understand, but the fear of the Lord is taken here simply for the fear of God, of which he indicates by the glory of praise that it becomes pure through the gospel in the hearts of those who burn with the heat of the word, while in all others it is impure, that is, considered impure. This we understand the more easily if we take this verse to be said of the fear and its purity objective, in the way we have spoken of all things aforesaid. For so also the law of the Lord, taken simply, is without change, but only to them that are without change; but to them that are penitent it is penitent and hateful. Thus the testimony of the Lord is certain to the godly, but uncertain to the ungodly. Thus the commandments of the Lord are pure to the righteous, but reprehensible and despised to the wicked. So also here "pure" must be referred, not to the fear itself, but to the attitude of those in whom it is considered pure. For as a man is, so is the law to him, and as for the law.

The ninth thing is that the fear of the Lord is pure, since the hypocrites also imagine that they fear God and are pure in the fear of the Lord, although they are doubly impure and in fact despise Him in their hearts. But others, who know their impurity very well, feel that they do not fear God, and would rather be free not to fear Him, choosing the impurity of their heart, which despises God and does not see Him. But those who love the law, have enlightened eyes, and know God, see how pure the fear of the Lord is, how he who fears the Lord and turns away from sin does not neglect anything. Such a one delights in this purity because he himself is also so minded as the fear requires, having become of the same mind with it in all things.

(80) But why is fear counted among the laws and commandments, and not rather, or equally, love? I do not know what to say, but I will make an attempt: Because it is love alone that makes the law and that which the law works wholesome and good, but the law primarily awakens the fear of God, as 2 Mos. 19, 16.

Mount Sinai, and in all those who are struck and grieved by the demands and threats of the law. Because this fear is by heart and outside the will (as well as the law, which aroused it), that is, it is not loved, therefore it is impure not through its guilt, but through the guilt of the will; but where it is loved, it becomes pure. For then it fears GOD, as also the loving will desires his, having become conformed to him in all things. For love takes pleasure in seeing that God is feared; the law not only commands this, but also does it.

81 Since he speaks here of the fear of God, which the law inspires, which, when loved, is pure, when hated, is impure, it is not badly counted among the names of the law; indeed, it seems to be the law of the letter itself, since in fact the letter of the law is not recognized unless the conscience is terrified by the sight of the law, and the law has become, as it were, a terrifying fear, as Mount Sinai, the image of the law, indicates.

82. The tenth is, "And abideth for ever." For just as the law, which is fulfilled by love, is eternally fixed, so also the fear, which is born of the law, becomes eternal when it is instilled by love. And as the law, if it is not loved nor fulfilled, is temporal, and is often consigned to oblivion, so also the fear, if it is not loved, remains temporal and only for an hour, and is never firm nor true. Therefore, for those hypocrites, fear remains a fabricated one, for it remains only for an hour, according to outward appearances. But with those who hate it, it never is, let alone should remain, because they never let it into the heart, nor love it. And by fearing it in this way, they despise God more and more, therefore they become all the more impure. For he who does not fear with will (volens) despises twofold. But those who love them, because they fear with their will (volenter) what the law commands, love them eternally and firmly, and agree with the law in all things.

The eleventh is: "The judgments of the Lord are true. These "judgments" can, indeed must, be understood to be both the law itself and what it works in us. For thus the law of the Lord is called the judgment (judicium) of the Lord from his office, because it judges and condemns the flesh, or concerns the old man, and that which belongs to the mortification of the flesh. Therefore, all offences are rightly called judgments, which kill the old man, so that the law may be fulfilled. For just as the law, if it is not taught nor understood, need not even be called a law, and the testimony, if it is not known and felt, is not even a testimony (for if the mind of man is not moved by the word of the law, it is as if a fairy tale were told to a deaf man, as happens with the ignorant hypocrites who despise the word of the law): so judgment, if it is not felt in the effect that it kills the flesh, is also not to be called a judgment. Therefore, as the law, when it terrifies, awakens the fear of the Lord, so it kills the flesh when it judges, and judgment rightly follows fear, so that what it fears may befall the ungodly flesh. But it fears the judgment of the law; after it has been judged and killed by it, the new man, who is born inwardly through faith, loves and praises this judgment, and what was previously burdensome in the flesh becomes pleasant to him.

(84) Therefore the hypocrites, who know not the judgments of the Lord, yet pretend all things, are doubly vain, because they never desire to be judged and humbled from the heart, yet they boast that they are the most humble and lowly, and that the judgments of the Lord are true. But because they hate them, though they do not deny that they are true, they are not true to them, because they do not want to be made true by them, that is, they do not want to be judged or killed by them, and would rather they were not there. But by those who love them, they are recognized as truthful, and it is they who have made Daniel, Cap. 3 [Prayer of Asariah, v. 31], sing this to the Lord: "All,

What you have done for us, O Lord, you have done according to true judgment. For he smites no one for nothing (vane) and in vain, since in the flesh there is always that which in truth is worthy of judgment and death, that is, sin.

The twelfth is: "All are righteous. For the Hebrew verb is one that stands without closer relation (absolutum), that is, they are righteous. In semet ipsa, is the same expression which Ps. 4, 9. In id ipsum means: In pace in id ipsum, 1) which has such a meaning that it sits together and joins together in a crowd, so that in semet ipsa is the same as: all at the same time, or all with one another, so that the meaning is: The judgments of the Lord are all righteous, which is said because the judgments, being true, and having found (habeant) in the flesh what they must judge, judge the same righteously, and by this very means make righteous those who love them, and acknowledge that they are righteous. But to those who hate them, they are unjust, because they do not even want to be justified by them. But to the hypocrites they are just in a fictitious way, because they [the judgments] make them (eos) just, but not all; for what they themselves have chosen, according to that they want to be judged and justified.

Take heed that the prophet says "judgments" in the majority and adds: "all" or "all of them." This must be a great love, which loves the judgments of the Lord, which are many and various, since we have much of the suffering of Christ [2 Cor. 1:5]. Then it is difficult to attach righteousness to all judgments, by which the perseverance of love is indicated. There are, of course, many who bear one or another of the Lord's judgments without grumbling, and are justified; a great number who bear many things and many things, but few who bear all things, and bear with joy and praise those things which increase as it were without end, and are daily heaped upon them. For these are they who glory in tribulations [Rom. 5:3], and count it joy when they fall into many temptations, which the prophet teaches in the following verse.

1) Compare Ps. 4, § 73.

V. 11. They are more precious than gold and much fine gold; they are sweeter than honey and honeycomb.

The Hebrew text has not [like the Vulgate] lapidem pretiosum multum, but XXXX, that is, much fine gold, because Jerome also has said "much delicious fine gold". For it is wanted that 12 be the noblest gold, as the Indian or Ophirian (ophirisum), [which country has its name] for Ophir and Hevila, the grandsons of Eber, Gen. 10, 29. Hence Gen. 2, 11. f. is said that the gold of the land of Hevila is very good. Therefore it is also said in 2 Chron. 8, 18 that Solomon sent ships across the Red Sea to Ophir and brought gold there. Likewise from Josaphat 1 Kings 22, 49. Since it came at last predominantly in use, one called it obrizum, which should mean so much as ophirisum [ophirian]. Job 31:24: "Have I put the gold for my confidence, and said to the nugget of gold (obrizo), My comfort?" Isa. 13, 12.: "That a man should be more precious than fine gold, and a man more precious than gold pieces of Ophir" (obrizo mundo), where in Hebrew XXXX XXX is written. With Job, however, is alone what has been spoken of in the title of the 16th Psalm. So it is clear from many passages that this interpreter, whoever he may have been, has carefully avoided the uniformity of the speech (omoeologiam), that is, the useless repetition of the same thing, which one calls nugatio 1), and has often brought in his own opinion.

The translator has also omitted the whole expression, which the Hebrew text has with "Honigseim", as 2[^] with the fine gold (obrizo), in this way: "gold and much fine gold", "honey and overflowing Honigseim", as Jerome has translated; perhaps because he [the translator] also wanted to avoid the monotony of the speech here. For XXX, which here means XXXX in the plural, means both honey-seed and an overflow, so that it seemed inconsistent to him to say favum favorum. But I follow Jerome, so that I believe that the prophet has as in the first part "gold and much fine gold", 1) Compare § 72.

so said in the last part "Honey and much or abundant honey glue".

Now the question is about the word "honey germ", since one believes that the expression XXX means more the spices, although it is also taken for honey germ. There again I take the liberty to assume that the prophet wanted to combine in such a way with the ordinary honey the nobler honey, which we call honey germ, as he combined with the gold the nobler fine gold.

90 This verse proves what I have said, namely, that this psalm speaks of the law of the Lord, which has become lovable through the gospel, or as it is in the eyes of those who do not deal in works but believe. For as it is more desirable to him who loves it than all treasures, and sweeter than all pleasures (voluptates) (which he extols by the quantity of gold and honey), so it is also without change, certain, right, pure, true, converts souls, makes the foolish wise, gladdens hearts, enlightens eyes, endures forever, is righteous in all things. On the other hand, before the gospel and faith, for the one who hates it, it is completely the opposite in all things. It is therefore a great miracle of the Spirit and of the hand of the Most High, which brings about this change, that they like above all things what they disliked above all things before. For what do men seek more eagerly than riches and pleasures? and yet the spirit is more pleased with the law of the Lord than the flesh is with riches and their pleasures.

(91) Yes, in order that his power may shine forth all the more clearly, the Spirit makes use of an increase (auxesin) in the proclamation of the praises of the Law of the Lord in this miracle. For at first the law is very mild in that it teaches; though the flesh also suffers this only with impatience, which it bears only unwillingly to hear something that is repugnant to it. But it is harsher when it reproaches as a testimony, and teaches about things that are not seen, demanding a righteous nature (fidelitatem); but even more so when it weighs down with various ways of becoming righteous (justificationibus). Thereupon it increases and becomes a Commandment, in that it presses hard and drives. Then it terrifies and crushes through fear; finally it becomes exceedingly hard, in that it goes so far through its judgment that the flesh must be completely killed and condemned. For here the flesh is most impatient, and though it hates and abhors the law in all the foregoing parts, yet in this last part it hates and abhors it in the highest degree. And yet the spirit, when it comes, makes all this not only bearable, but also beloved and desirable and sweet above all that can be desired and above all that can grant delight.

I believe that from all this it is clear how excellent a prophet David was, how he had his own way of speaking, and his own images and figurative speeches (figuras et tropos) both in words and in utterances, since he was able to recite with very clear words such deep and hidden things in the greatest brevity, so that no one can attain it.

Thus we have the fruit of the evangelical preaching, the love of righteousness and the hatred of ungodliness, that is, the fulfillment of all laws. Since we cannot attain this through any powers, works, laws or efforts, all that is left is to despair of everything and attain it through faith in Christ alone.

V. 12. also thy servant is remembered by them, and he that keepeth them hath great reward. 1)

The Hebrew text says instead of custodit ea [he keeps them]: He is careful, or reminded, or taught by them, which Jerome translates: He will teach them. But our Latin interpreter comes nearer, who says: He keeps them, having been induced again by the following expression to guess the meaning of the preceding, as he is wont to do; yet he is not far from it. I believe, however, that what he says belongs to all that has gone before, not merely to "judgment. But in truth, what is the law, progressing gradually to a testimony, commands, commandments, fear, and judgment, other than these very judgments, that is, the death of the Lord?

of the old man? In this one piece, the law is fulfilled. For after sin is taken away, the law is fulfilled, and only righteousness reigns. Therefore, those who are God's servants have only one concern, namely, that they practice well in that which is the noblest and last part of the law, that is, the judgments, and, carefully and remembered, pay attention to the old leaven. In this opinion Paul also says Gal. 5:24: "But they that are Christ's, crucify their flesh with the lusts and desires."

95 And truly he reminds them not in vain to be careful, because of the serpent's cunning, which easily deceives the unwary, as the apostle fears concerning the Corinthians [2 Cor. 11:3]. For no matter how careful one may be, one cannot sufficiently grasp how mischievous the prudence of the flesh is, and how mischievous an eye it has, with how its striving it seeks its own, and adorns itself with a holy appearance. Tauler speaks beautifully about this in his sermons, in which he so often accuses nature of being exceedingly deceitful in its dispositions.

96) All these things are resisted by the judgments and the law of the Lord, until the body of sin is completely killed and destroyed, and this mortal is swallowed up by the immortal life. Meanwhile, however much we may serve in the spirit and delight in the law of the Lord, yet the body that decays weighs down the soul, that with the flesh we serve the law of sin, and this is the cause that we must take careful heed of the judgments of the Lord, by which this bondage of sin is condemned.

97. And though this be burdensome and laborious, yet to them that are exercised thereby shall be given a peaceable fruit of righteousness, as the apostle teacheth the Hebrews in the 12th chapter, v. 11, and here David: "And he that keepeth them hath great reward." "For thy work shall be well rewarded," says the Lord through Jeremiah [Cap. 31:16.] All this is said for the comfort of those who labor, not to strengthen the desire of those who, as the hirelings and servants as those who, by certain miserable works that they do, make God, I do not know, what kind of a huckster, since they do not want to burden themselves with trouble in the courts of the Lord. So he also comforts 1 Cor. 15, 58. those who have trouble: "You know that your labor is not in vain in the LORD." For the servants of God must know that they please GOtte in their labor, lest they grow weary and despair in sorrowful spirit, since He wants to have cheerful laborers in His law who seek no reward (gratuitos). But to those who please God, great reward inevitably follows, even though they do not seek it, since God cannot deny Himself, who says to Abraham, Gen. 15:1: "I am your very great reward."

V. 13: Who can tell how often he misses? Forgive me the (wisely) hidden faults!

98 "Heir" and "my" (meis) are not in the Hebrew, and delicta are errors (errores), as Jerome translates it, or the sins that one does ignorantly (ignorantiae). This is how all have interpreted the title of the 7th Psalm: Ignorantia David. 1) By this also are signified those sins which, through the hidden error of presumption and pride, we take for good actions; namely, the roguishness of the flesh, that it often deceives us in the midst of tribulation and lowliness, so that we please ourselves precisely because of lowliness, and find pride precisely because of the contempt of ourselves, precisely because of the confession of sin, precisely because of the accusation of our pride. Therefore it cannot be otherwise than that the judgments of the Lord are always true and righteous, even though we are judged by them without ceasing, and all that we are and do is condemned by them.

Now the question arises: Where do these errors and mistakes come from in the servant of God, who keeps the judgments of the Lord, and to whom the Law is without change, certain, right, pure and lovable in every way? Is not love the fulfillment of the law? Does not the servant of God keep the Judgments of God, or is he lying in that he holds them? The apostle answers Rom. 8, 10: "The body is dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of righteousness. Therefore the spirit of the prophet teaches that those who believe in Christ are sinners and saints at the same time, and delight in the law of God and serve Him with the mind, but with the flesh serve the law of sin (Rom. 7, 25.). For so far as they believe they are righteous, but so far as they still have flesh they are sinners. "For the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh" [Gal. 5:17].

By flesh, however, we do not mean (as I have said) the [visible] gross part of us, but the quite hidden and deceitful disposition of the flesh, namely the head of the old serpent, from which no one can sufficiently guard himself. The devil also makes it so that no one recognizes his errors, and we all give offense in many things and are stained with hidden faults, so that there is no righteous person on earth who does good and does not sin. So the verdict is clear: as long as we are in the flesh, no one recognizes our faults. Therefore, with Job, Cap. 9, 28. 2) [Vulg.], we must fear because of all our works and know that before God no living person is righteous [Ps. 143, 2.].

Therefore, a man must despair of himself and all that is his and take this one remedy, that he take refuge in the throne of mercy and ask to be cleansed of his hidden faults. Only through this humility can he be blessed, for the heart of man is evil and no one can fathom it (Jer. 17:9), and who can boast that he has a pure heart? And Augustine says here with truth: Sin covers the eyes in such a way that one cannot see even that from which they are covered, indeed, that one can see this least of all, as this is also seen in fleshly eyes. Therefore he does not say: Who has defects? For all have them; but not all recognize them, yea, no man recognizes them.

1) Compare Ps. 7, K 5.

2) Weimarsche (erroneous): Job 9, 2.

102. But since this is a thing which is known to extend over all (scientia universalis), in that the Prophet attributes to all men without distinction defects which they do not recognize, what then do our sophists, who pretend to insurmountable ignorance, of the advanced bar, of the first movement, to do as much as is in us, and of many other trifling things that make men safe and pure, careless and careless, so that they are heedless of the judgments of God, and dream that they can at least at times be without a venial sin?

The prophet has certainly been without mortal sin, and claims that there are people who say this about themselves (as those speak of mortal sin), even without venial sin, since he speaks this while being inflamed in spirit. For he would not pray this to God either if he were not fervent in spirit. And yet he says that his faults are not known to anyone, namely such faults that would not make him blessed if God did not cleanse him of them. Nor would he pray so urgently because of venial sins, and ask to be cleansed of the same, which those hold so low as to teach that they are taken away by I know not what things, which one would almost call ridiculous. Thus Paul says 1 Cor. 4, 4. that he is conscious of nothing, but is not justified in it, and Jacobus [Cap. 3, 2.], "We are all manifoldly wanting." All these sayings of truth and humility blot out those haughty hypocrites all at once by their ungodly thoughts, with which they devised good works and merits, and distinguished venial sins from mortal sins, of which he now says:

V. 14. Keep thy servant also from the proud, that they rule not over me; and I shall be without change, and innocent of great iniquity. 1)

104. in Hebrew it says this way: Also keep your servant from the proud, so that they will not rule over me, and I will be free from them.

1) Vulgate: IÄ alieris pure" srrvo tuo, si in ei non tusrint äöminati, tun" iuuuæulutus ero, "t ernunändor a äelieto maximo.

Change be, and remain innocent of great iniquity. 2) For the interpreters seem to have read the letter X instead of X, therefore they translated XXXX instead of XXXX, that is, strangers instead of proud. And what here [in the Vulgate] is expressed by parce, which in Hebrew is: for custody (in custodiam), whereby one is restrained from doing or suffering anything, as Gen. 20:6: "I have kept thee (custodivi), that thou sin not against me," that is, I have restrained thee. The emphasis in this word indicates the greatest danger and the most dangerous battle by which the ravening wolves, the hypocrites, under sheep's clothing, seek to devour the simple-minded souls and to draw them away from the godliness of faith (by which alone the law is fulfilled and loved) into the superstition of godlessness and works, by which only the law is violated even more. For it is such a great thing to persevere in the godliness of faith that the Spirit cannot sufficiently remind and inculcate us to beware of the flattering doctrines of proud hypocrites.

But with how great confidence does he say that they are "proud"! For indeed, where faith is not, confidence in works is proud without end, but with such a secret and spiritual cunning that they themselves, who are proud, cannot recognize it at all; for everything that belongs to humility and godliness they show with a more beautiful appearance than the true believers, so that no one can be sure but he whom the Lord has preserved and kept back, lest he be carried away by their examples and words, as is prayed and taught to pray here. These are the ones of whom it is said in Rom. 16:18, "By sweet words and splendid speech they deceive the innocent hearts."

106. He thus says: Preserve your servant, lest these proud ones carry me away and deceive me. For if I am preserved by thee, that they can do nothing against me, however seemly their armies and boasts of works and words may be, then in truth I will be innocent, perfect, without change and simple, in German: "a pious man. There he shows at the same time in contrast that he will be godless if he is not preserved, and those would get the upper hand over him. For if faith is lost, he will trust in works and howl with the wolves who before was a simple sheep of Christ.

2) This is how Luther put it in the first translation of the Psalms in 1524, in this volume Col. 18.

107] I have said above [57, 72] that our Latin interpreter translates the word XX generally by immaculatus ["without change"], which for the apostle Rom. 16, 18. means "innocent" or simple-minded, Greek: ἀχάχους. The words of the apostle which brightly illuminate this verse are these [Rom. 16. 17- f.]: "But I exhort you, brethren, that ye take heed to them which cause division and offence beside the doctrine which ye have learned, and depart from them. For such serve not the Lord JEsu Christ, but their belly; and by sweet words and glorious speech they deceive the innocent hearts." Truly, this passage throws light on innumerable passages in the prophets and psalms, and attacks all the statutes of men with marvelous force, emphasis, and expressive words; therefore every Christian mind should keep it firmly and vividly in mind.

108. and remain innocent of great iniquity. Many think that this "great iniquity" is pride, and not evil, but obscure and inauthentic, since impiety is pride. But the prophet wants to say that the wicked keep themselves pure from the small sins by not killing, not stealing, not breaking marriage, as that Pharisee boasts in the Gospel [Luc. 18, 11] (for Christ also calls these commandments Matth. 5, 19. the smallest). Moreover, they are not at all cleansed from the great and manifold (multo) iniquity by which everything is defiled, even the good works of the ungodly, so much so that they are even more defiled by these very works because of them. This is ungodliness and unbelief. Therefore, we must understand that the prophet is speaking comparatively, having in mind two different purities of two sins, which are judged according to different judgments.

For the wicked purify themselves from the smallest sins, that is, those that can be committed through the body, the lesser part of man, while they do not consider the greatest sin, that is, the one which they commit as hardened people with the soul, their greater part, and yet do not see.

(109) On the other hand, the godly consider it a small thing that they are clean from those small sins, if they are not also clean from that great one, which, although it is only one, makes many sins, yes, sins in all things. And I believe that the prophet intentionally wanted to mark this ungodliness by this epithet, that he calls it "many" and "great" (for both mean the Hebrew because it is the same with other sins, that each one for itself is only one sin, but the one who has this monster has at the same time many and great sins, in that it burdens all our works (of which there must necessarily be many) with the most evil (as they say) secondary circumstances and faults, namely with ungodliness against God. Therefore, although it is only one sin, at the same time it is also said to be very many and very great sins.

V. 15. Let the speech of my mouth and the conversation of my heart be acceptable to you, O Lord, my refuge and my redeemer.

The adverbium semper [in the Vulgate] is an addition. Now the meaning is: If I shall be clean from the great iniquity, and the proud could do nothing against me, that is, if I shall be justified by the faith that purifies the heart, not by the works that defile, then I shall be truly pleasing and acceptable in your sight. But if I am pleasant, then my speech and my thoughts will also be pleasant. For the fruit of a good tree will be good. But let no one think that his words are pleasing, no matter how beautiful they may seem, if he is righteous without faith, because he is stained with many and great iniquities.

(111) Although the "speech" and "conversation of the heart" can be understood from the ordinary speech or prayers, they are not the same as the "speech" and "conversation of the heart".

I still believe that it is understood from the words of the teaching. For those who have a pure faith also immediately teach purely, as it is written Ps. 116:10: "I believe, therefore I speak." And faith does not remain idle in secret, but comes forth and confesses to GOD for his own and other people's blessedness, as he said above [v. 6.] about the sun going out. To this opinion, I believe, he added "of my mouth" and "of my heart" to indicate the office of teaching. Therefore the meaning is indeed the same as is said in the first Psalm, v. 3: "And his leaves wither not, and what he doeth prospereth." For in this way the same is spoken of the good tree. So here: If we are pure, our sermons will please God; he will cooperate and confirm them, and will make them have a happy progress and convert even the adversaries, as it is said in Proverbs 16:7: "If a man's ways please the Lord, he also makes his enemies pleased with him." But if we will not be pure, what is left but that they [our sermons] displease, and have no good progress, and also drive the friends to war [against us]?

112 Not for nothing he adds: "before you". For the speeches of pure faith are abhorrent to all men, as Christ foretold Matth. 5, 11. and 13, 21. because they crucify the old man and punish the world because of of sin, which is pleasing in the sight of God, but intolerable in the sight of men; and yet, because they please God, they have good progress, even against the will of the world.

For this very reason, in the end, he calls the Lord his "stronghold" (which in Hebrew means -mx, that is, my rock) and his "redeemer," not only because he redeemed him from the sins and the attempts of the hypocrites and placed him on the rock of pure faith, but also because he made him persevering and victorious against the enemies of the Word, having given him the joy of the Spirit to speak, as the Lord says to Jeremiah Cap. 1:8, "Fear them not: for I am with thee, and will deliver thee." So also the apostles prayed, Apost. 4, 29, 31, that they might speak the word against the Jews with all joy; and immediately the place was moved, and they spoke with joy, full of the Holy Spirit.

We have spoken abundantly about "the conversation of the heart" in the first and second Psalm [Ps. 1, § 38 f. Ps. 2, § 4]. It is, in fact, a preoccupation with the word, ready for teaching, as will be said below Ps. 49, 4. "My mouth shall speak of wisdom, and my heart shall say of understanding" (meditatio cordis mei prudentiam). Therefore, either the same is doubled here by repetition (tautologiam), or one is explained more by the other.

1) In the issues: 9.

The twentieth Psalm.

V. 1. 2. A Psalm of David, to be sung. May the Lord hear you in your distress, may the name of the God of Jacob protect you.

1 Almost everyone interprets this Psalm of Christ. But it seems to me that this interpretation is too remote to be called literal. Therefore, I believe that this psalm, according to a simpler and closer conception, is a kind of general supplication.

(litanias) be for the authorities and those who are placed in high offices (sublimitate), for whom also the apostle 1 Tim. 2, 1. f. commands to pray first of all, that we may lead a quiet and calm life. And, to express my opinion, it seems that David composed this psalm, as it were, as a God-fearing (religioso) and holy war cry, through which he could protect himself and

He wanted to incite and train the people to pray and to behave godly in the war against the enemies of godliness, like the Turks in our country.

The whole psalm expresses this as his will almost in every single word, that the ruler of a people should not be presumptuous in his strength, should not trust in his means of help, should not rely on his attacks, according to the words of Ps. 33:16 ff: "A king is not helped by his great power, a giant is not saved by his great strength. Neither do horses help, nor does their great strength save," but he must expect help from heaven, he must know that victory comes from heaven, and hope in the name of the Lord alone and fight through prayer as Moses did [Ex 17:11].

Thus the prophet prays and at the same time teaches a very necessary doctrine, which princes seldom observe. For there would be fewer wars and happier victories if, according to the rule of this psalm, they were presumptuous in the Lord, praying more valiantly than striking out, and then they would in truth be images of God on earth and divine princes, and would fight no differently than if they were called and compelled to do so by a just cause, in humility of heart. That is why the Psalm begins immediately: "The Lord hear you," by leading the prince up before God, so that he may do everything he does according to his counsel and with his help.

4. "In adversity." Here, too, the princes are reminded of their office, that they should know that they are placed in high position for the welfare of the people, for whose sake (pro qua [sc. salute]) they should suffer and toil much, and that their principedom is in truth a time of need. For idle and pleasure-seeking people, who are princes only for their own sake, are not worthy that one should ask for these great miracles of God on their behalf; indeed, they are not princes either, but sows in their dung puddles. But he who seeks the good of the people with all his heart will never be without trouble, for Satan and the whole world will be hostile to him.

5. "The name of the God of Jacob protect you." Not the sword, not the shield, not the armor, nor anything else.

except the name of GOD, Ps. 44, 7. "For I do not rely on my bow, and my sword cannot help me." But how and with what weapons does the name of GOD protect? Certainly by faith, and by calling upon Him, as Joel says [Cap. 3, 5], "He that shall call upon the name of the LORD shall be saved." And Proverbs 18:10: "The name of the LORD is a strong lock: the righteous runneth thither, and is protected." For thus he will be protected or exalted (exaltabitur) by invisible power. For there is the same expression as here, which denotes more an exalting than a protecting. Is. 9, 11. it says: "The Lord will elevate the people of Rezin against them" (elevabit).

(6) Therefore, a ruler over the people must have a clear confidence in God, so that he will not be presumptuous in his strength or despair in his powerlessness. For there is no difference with the Lord, whether he helps by much or by little, as it is written in 1 Sam. 14:6 and 2 Chron. 14:11.

7 He rightly and timely says: "The name of the God of Jacob", not Israel, does not praise the name of God by any other epithet. For Jacob is called, from the sole of his foot, a subverter [Gen. 27:36], which is quite appropriate for the adversaries and the time of adversity, that the prince of a people, protected by the name of God, emerges as the victor and subverter of his enemies.

V. 3. He sends you help from the holy place and strengthens you (tueatur te) from Zion.

8. instead of tueatur te [he protects you] Jerome has: He strengthens you, which expresses more the confidence and the strength of the heart; whoever has this strength will easily overcome all adversity. For the Lord protects and strengthens His own from within. In contrast, the world protects and strengthens itself from the outside. This is what the words contain: "From the sanctuary" and: "From Zion". For we have said sufficiently that "sanctuary" designates something separate, hidden, invisible, where the senses do not reach, and of which reason comprehends nothing, so that "of the sanctuary" is as much as of heaven and only of God, who dwells in the sanctuary. With this, he beautifully indicates the nature of faith,

Who believes what he does not see, and firmly expects help, from which he does not know where it comes. But man desires and expects help from worldly things and from what is in front of his eyes. But "the help of men is of no avail" [Ps. 60, 13].

9 The same is repetition. "And strengthen thyself out of Zion"; for by help we are strengthened, so that repeated prayer also increases the confidence of the heart (affectum) and promises certain help. But what does "from Zion" mean? Not from Egypt or from Babylon, because he speaks in accordance with his time, when the Lord dwelt and was worshipped on Zion, as if he wanted to say: Thou shalt not run forth apart from thyself, but expect in thyself the strength of the LORD; he will come if thou dost not run away, he will strengthen thee if thou seekest to be strengthened nowhere [else]. For he cometh not to them that flee, but to them that firmly expect him. And he does not give counsel, either in this verse or in any other, to escape adversity by flight, but to overcome it by steadfastness and going forth to meet it in faith in the name of GOD. For this is how God protects every man who is His by Himself, not by the help of men. Examples of this are that he often saved the people of Israel without any nations helping them that were around them, but all sat down against them, only through his presence in Jerusalem and Zion, through the right worship of God against him. And as often as they did not expect help from Zion, but from Egypt or the Assyrians, so often they fell and, because they leaned on a staff, were only the worse injured.

10 And the word "out of Zion" has a special emphasis in it. For it is called a waiting place, not only because we stand on the waiting place or have God present, but also because the eyes of the Lord Himself are open over us, as it says Ps. 34, 16: "The eyes of the Lord look upon the righteous", and Ps. 32, 8: "I will guide you with My eyes", which He formerly did only over Zion, the place He had chosen for Himself at that time. Now Zion is the whole world; for everywhere where one believes in God, there he sees and is seen.

the God above all gods on Zion, as we have also said in Ps. 4, 7 [§ 65 f.] about the light of the face of the Lord, which is lifted up above us. But this verse rightly follows the preceding one, because it does not happen that one is exalted in the name of the Lord over the enemies, unless the heart of the prince is strengthened from heaven, so that the prophet indicates by this verse, as it were, the cause of the preceding verse, and how it should be done.

V. 4. He remembers all your grain offerings, and your burnt offerings must be fat. Sela.

This verse also contains a repetition (tautologicus est), and the same is found in almost all verses of this psalm. The two previous ones, however, praised the person before God, who only becomes pleasing before God through pure faith; in these two following ones, he praises the works of the same, in correct and beautiful order. For in such a way the Lord first looked upon Abel and then upon his sacrifice [Gen. 4:4]. Moreover, this verse praises the sacrifice, and the following verse praises the intentions (studia), so that the doing is there rather than the speaking, the offering rather than the asking. For many say: Lord, Lord, but do not do the will of the Father, even the opposite. Therefore their prayer also becomes sin.

(12) And we see that here only a good and godly prince is prayed for, because a godless one does not pray that he may be heard, nor does he believe that he receives strength from the sanctuary, although he sacrifices by heart, according to his works, or rather pretends to sacrifice. But he does not make sacrifice his [the prophet's] prince, but he wishes all good to the sacrificer; unless one wants to say that the prince's sacrifice is also a common one with the people, in whom there are some godly people, by whose supplications it is implored that he too may become good and blessed with them.

not as if they were evil, but because they are fulfilled by Christ, and grant the arrogant a defiance of their righteousness. For it would not be sinful for anyone today to sacrifice according to the same custom, if only he did not do so with confidence in his own righteousness, or as if it were necessary for the sake of conscience, for everything is free and permitted that is not contrary to faith.

14 But it is not because of this that this psalm should not be prayed today and by others, for just as another person, another cause, another time, another place are in the new law, so also another sacrifice, but still the same faith and the same Spirit remain throughout all times, places, works and persons. The outward changes, the inward remains. For in all there is not One Work, but One Faith; neither is there everywhere One Servant, but One Lord; and, "There are diversities of gifts, but there is One Spirit. There are many ministries, but there is One Lord. And there are divers powers, but there is One God, who worketh all things in all" [1 Cor. 12:4-6]. Thus He who willed circumcision in Abraham, willed baptism in us, exactly with the same will, and entirely in the same faith on our part, yet with different effect. For the Church must stand with Christ from the beginning of the world, surrounded by diversity, and be a steward over the various gifts of God according to the diversity of members, times, places, and causes, which are changeable and diverse; yet the Church remains One, and always one and the same.

15 What then is our sacrifice? For some centuries the sacrament of bread and wine has been considered the supreme sacrifice, but (as we have said) in an ungodly opinion. For under the new law there is neither a temple, as seen in Revelation [Cap. 21, 22.] in the new city of Jerusalem, nor a sacrifice, of which Dan. 9, 27. was foretold that it would cease, but we ourselves are the temple of GOD, as Paul teaches 1 Cor. 3, 17. So we are also the city of God, so also the sacrifice and everything that was once and is now represented by the bodily temple and the sacrifices.

has been offered. Therefore the apostle Rom. 12, 1. says: "I exhort you, brethren, by the mercies of God, to present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your reasonable worship."

16 I will pass over the various interpretations of the ancient sacrifices and content myself with the two that David teaches, Ps. 50:23: "He who offers thanksgiving praises me." Ps. 4:6: "Sacrifice righteousness." Ps. 51, 19.: "The sacrifices that please GOD are a fearful spirit." On the very blow it is said Dan. 3 [Prayer of Azariah, v. 39. f.]: "With sorrowful heart and bruised spirit we come before thee, as offering burnt offerings of many thousand fat sheep. So will you make our sacrifice acceptable and pleasing in your sight this day; for you will not let those who hope in you be put to shame." And Hos. 14:3: "Forgive us all our sins, and do us good; and we will offer the bullocks of our lips." Heb. 13, 15.: "Let us therefore offer, through him, the sacrifice of praise to GOD at all times, that is, the fruit of lips that confess his name." And Ps. 116:17: "Unto thee will I offer thanksgiving, and preach the name of the LORD." And Ps. 54:8: "I will offer unto thee a sacrifice of joy, and will give thanks unto thy name, O LORD, that it is so comforting." And the like.

(17) Therefore, our sacrifice, which we offer in time of need, is a bruised heart and the confession of sin, that is, we ourselves, groaning to God in need, acknowledging the tribulation as righteous, patiently enduring the death of ourselves, and offering ourselves to God according to all His will.

18 For this means all the tumultuous nature of the exemplary sacrifices with their slaughter, blood, burning and similar commandments in the Law of Moses. The consuming fire is the fervor of the Holy Spirit, who pours out love into our hearts, which consumes all that is of the flesh and of the old birth in us. This is to offer a burnt offering, that is, one that is completely consumed by fire, so that we, having died to self, may live to God, and the members who previously served unrighteousness may now serve righteousness, and in all these things we may praise, extol and worship God.

give thanks. The wood with which this fire is fed are the words of the Gospel. The knives with which the animals are slaughtered are the words of the Law, which kill the old man, strip him of his old skin and lay him on the altar, Christ. For in faith in Christ all things must be done.

(19) But what is "the burnt offering becoming fat"? Undoubtedly, in figurative speech it denotes a complete, tender, pleasing and pleasant sacrifice. For "the fat" serves to express the secret interpretation of abundance and sweetness. Gen. 49:20: "Of eatables cometh his fat bread, and he shall do pleasantly unto kings." Thus we have said in the 17th Psalm 63] that the fat of the wicked are their great ones, the rich, chosen and tender pleasers. For this image is taken from the custom of men who delight in fat and well-fed cattle as in delicious things. So also it is said in Ps. 63:6 [Vulg.], "Let my soul be filled, as it were, with sea and fatness, and let my mouth praise with glad lips." Hence it is written everywhere: a fat field, a fat mountain, where in Latin we say laetum and jucundum.

But the Hebrew expression is ambiguous at this point, so it could also be translated this way: And may your burnt offering be burned to ashes, selah. This is said even appropriately in reference to the burnt offering; but both may be taken at the same time.

What "sela" is, which is added at the end of this verse, we have said in the previous [Ps. 3, § 19 f.]. It is namely an indication of a particularly great secret movement of the heart, which was brought forth by the spirit at that time through the contemplation (super) of the fatness and the cremation of this burnt offering, which [movement] no one knows except the one who receives it.

V. 5: He will give you what your heart desires and will fulfill all your requests.

(21) Surely we must be most careful not to pray like this for tyrants and those who seek only their own, unless we agree with them in this.

that there is no prince who does not want his own to flourish and have good peace, since wars are fought for the sake of peace, and we pray for their civil welfare. But it is more understood that one prays for a good prince. For he who is such is attacked by many adversaries, especially by these same evil tyrants, and needs divine help, so that through it his plots and desires against them may be fulfilled. For one must not pray for the tyrants, but for him whom the tyrants unjustly oppress. And also the children of Israel did not pray for their enemies, but for their king David, who struggled to fight the adversaries.

(22) So should ours, 1) the Turk-eating gods of war, who raged against the Turks, rely more on their prayers than on their forces. Since they do not do so, and are themselves worse than the Turks and devastate Christ's people, I do not know whether we should pray more strongly against them or against the Turks. Certainly, as things stand today, one must pray not only for the emperor, the kings and princes, that their heart's opinion and counsel may be fulfilled, but that their heart may be opened and they may recognize who are the true enemies of the church, against whom they should counsel and against whom they should be indignant. For as long as they are blind and do not see how we ourselves need chastening, how can they counsel? For what counsel they take, shall we pray that it may be fulfilled? Nevertheless, some can be found among them who are not blind and want our cause to be advised; for these we should speak, saying with fervor: "The Lord give you what your heart desires, and fulfill all your counsels," or as the Latin translator says: he confirms them.

V. 6. We boast (laetabimur) that you help us, and in the name of our God we cast up paniers. The LORD grant (impleat) thee all thy petition.

23. here the variety-loving (varius) interpreter says: Impleat, while above.

1) Jenaer and Erlanger: nos instead of: vostri. - Immediately following the Erlanger: mnrtes instead of: iVlartss.

[v. 5] the same word was rendered by confirmet. Of the verb laetabimur we have said in the 5th Psalm, v. 12, that it is a joy expressed (vocalem) by the voice, or sweet words, by which men are wont to display their joy strongly. And it reads in this place like an encouragement, as if it were said, or should be said, by those who go into battle, and boast in proud defiance that the help of the Lord is with them for their salvation, as those not. 7:20, "Here is the sword of the Lord and Gideon," and as Josh. 6:20, the children of Israel made a great shout and immediately the walls of Jericho fell down. And the king Abijah cried out, 2 Chron. 13, 14. ff., with his own, following the same example, and slew five hundred thousand 1) of the children of Israel. But even now it is the custom of the soldiers to exalt the name and glory of their leader in order to encourage themselves against their enemies. This verse also teaches this attitude and custom, but a godly and worshipful one.

24. this sense is confirmed by the following verbum ("we throw up paniers"). Magnificabimur, as misrendered by our Latin interpreter, is translated by Jerome thus: We will perform round dances; but even this is not sufficient. Others give it: we will be glorious and noble (nobiles). Others want it to be a word pertaining to the war camp (for 8]. means a flag or standard of an army). Therefore this verbum XXXX means: We want to raise a flag, or if one may say so: Vexillabimur, "will cast up paniers," which is likewise a work of those who go into battle, so that they not only shout with the voice, but also cast up their signs on high, as the men of Gideon not only blew with trumpets and shouted, but, instead of flags, also smashed pitchers and cast them up on high [Judges 7:19].

25 Therefore, "because you help us" (in salutari tuo), that is, after we have called upon you by faith for your help, let us be joyful and shout joyfully and "in your name," that is, after we have called upon your

1) Held in the Weimar and Basel HniuHnaTinta: HninMiNa.

In the same faith, that is, in your strength, not in ours, and with confident courage go into battle with all our enemies. For with the Lord there is help and victory. But salus [help] and salutare [that you help] are one and the same, although the interpreters like to translate salutare.

26. Since it is so necessary in a worldly war to cry out for the help of God and to raise banners in His name, how much more is this necessary for our Christian leaders, since we must fight with the evil spirits under heaven, against the cleverness of the flesh and the heresies, That we do not throw up our standard, our titles and our images and boast of our name and our help, that is, that we do not carry before us philosophy, human wretched statutes, decrees and other abominations of our name and our power, as the silly bishops are doing now. Our banner is the word of the cross, the sign of triumph, reddened by the blood of Christ, which the Church of Christ, terrible as the heads of armies, opposes to all the power of darkness. For if one throws out another word, it is nothing else than playing after the children's way in the vacations or rather with carnal furies (in feriis seu furiis).

27. "May the Lord grant you all your requests." This word, too, is an encouragement to one who goes confidently into battle, as if to say: We go, and in the name of the LORD, under thy standard, we do our war service, and to thee, our King and Leader, we obey. But the Lord will do what is in him, and grant you your request. It behooves us not to know what is to come, and yet to obey you. So also 2 Sam. 10, 12. Joab, David's captain, after the army was arrayed on both sides, puts the victory into the hand of the LORD: "Let us be strong for our people, and for the cities of our God; but let the LORD do what is pleasing in his sight."

v. 7 Now I see that the Lord helps his anointed, and hears him in his holy heaven; his right hand helps mightily.

(28) What the prophet has asked until now, he now clearly promises, after he has been raised to a certain hope. For a man who is of such a mind as these words indicate to him irrefutably persuades himself that it will happen in such a way, as if he wanted to say: "Well, we will attack the matter, and we know and are sure that the Lord will help his anointed. For it is not possible that he should not hear him who is presumptuous with such great faith and with such a mind toward God, "for you do not let those who hope in you be put to shame," Dan. 3 [Prayer of Asariah, v. 40.], and Ps. 17:7: "He is the Savior of them that trust in Him." Therefore he says, "Now I know that he will help," for that it is a verbum in time to come enforces what follows: "He will hear him from his holy heaven," though it might more properly be translated thus after the manner of a participii praesentis or after the manner of a noun (nominaliter): Now I know that the Helper or the Savior, the HErr of his anointed, will hear him. And I believe that it is known from the foregoing that the Hebrew language very often uses a verb in the past tense instead of in the present tense, as here: Now I have known, that is, now I know, or now I have become a knower, if one wants to take it without a word that depends on it (absoluto statu).

(29) But this verse is an encouragement of a very constant faith, which persuades itself, even which is already convinced by the aforementioned attitude. For he who is of such a mind that he dares to say, "We boast that you will help us, and in your name we will raise our banners," is at the same time quite certain that he will not be abandoned, just as that is indeed quite certain, which he alone feels. Thus Paul dares to say, Rom. 8, 38. f.: "I am sure that neither death nor life 2c. shall separate us from the love that is in Christ," and elsewhere [2 Tim. 1, 12.]: "I am sure that he shall be able to keep me my companion until that day." For he whose heart saith, I believe, saith.

at the same time also with inevitable conclusion: I am sure that it will be as I believe. For when true faith is in the heart, it confirms what it believes with such certainty that it cannot be persuaded that anything will be more certain, and it already knows it as completely as if it had happened. That is why he does not say here: I suspect, or think, or understand, but: I know, or I have experienced, that he will help, that is, I am certain and firmly convinced, as Paul speaks after his manner, yet in the same sense.

(30) This again is a proof against the ungodly sophists, who make us uncertain of the grace and love of God toward us, prating that it is sacrilegious to claim that we love or believe, or are certain of the work of God concerning us, when nothing is more abominable than this delusion of uncertainty.

31. Therefore, I like very much the manner of speaking peculiar to the Hebrew language, according to which here the verbum cognovi in past time (by which faith is praised) is combined with the verbum exaudiet in future time (by which the believed work is designated), so that those who speak ungodly things may be shut up, and they shall know that the works of God, which concern us, although they are future, must be for the believers by faith as if they were present, yes, past. For this is why the prophecies make exceedingly frequent use of the verba in the past tense, especially in the Hebrew language, not only because of the certainty (as they say) of the prophecy, but even more so to indicate and teach the nature of faith.

(32) And I wonder very much, since they confess altogether that all the articles of the second coming of Christ, of the last judgment, of eternal life, and of the fire of hell, will certainly come to pass, and assert that those who doubt or are uncertain about these things are heretics, and likewise declare him to be a heretic who doubts or is uncertain about the creation, the incarnation, and the whole past mystery of Christ: why they dare to pass this off as orthodox when anyone doubts that he is in grace, that he obtains mercy in the Sacrament, that he certainly and infallibly has a gracious God, since this article is the first of all: I believe in GOtt, the Almighty Father. Blind, blind they are and blind leaders. They believe GOtte in past and future things, in present things they do not believe Him. But we want to speak with the prophet constantly and in reference to the present: "Now I perceive that the LORD helps his anointed." We will speak more extensively about the words "notice," "know," "recognize" at another time; "heaven" and the "sanctuary" were discussed in the second verse.

33. "His right hand helps mightily." This, too, is a word of a stout-hearted faith that goes [into battle] and cheers up, sure of God's future help, as if we were to say after our. Way and in our sense would say: I know that He will hear him and save him mightily. For it is a Hebrew way of speaking: In potentatibus salus dextrae ejus [in many powers stands the help of his right hand], and it is the same sense as in the 118th Psalm, v. 16. Dextera Domini fecit virtutem [the right of the Lord has proven power], that is, since the right of God helps, there is no power that could oppose it, which would be able to destroy, because he is not only mighty, or in his power (potentia) stands the help that executes his right, but also in potentatibus, that is, mighty in many ways. For by this noun in the plural, although in Latin it reads strangely (barbare) and unrhymed, the glorious faith is expressed, which ascribes power and wisdom to God alone, that he can help not only in one but in many ways, although none is before the eyes of those who are in need. And this word, which is full of the proudest confidence of the heart, which relies firmly on God's power, has a wonderful emphasis and fervor: "Let him do it, he will and can help."

34 It can also be translated according to the Hebrew: Now I have come to know that the LORD, in helping his anointed, will hear him from his holy heaven with many powers of the help of his right hand, so that everything depends on the verb: "he will hear [him]", which in Hebrew also means as much as: "he will answer [him]", so that the meaning is: He will hear him mightily, by helping him alone with his right hand, not by the power of Men. And in such a way it reads that he denies all human help, and the emphasis is on the word "his right hand". I like this sense very much, but it is not very different from the previous one.

35 "His anointed" must be taken here generally for the king, because in former times the kings were anointed. But this very word increases the confidence that this prayer will be heard and help will be given. For when one knows that he is called by God to a work, this increases his courage greatly and gives him courage. For he knows that what he does, he does according to God's will and by God's command. Only he is careful not to seek God's help in humility and fear for his proud powers, because he is satisfied that God has commanded him to do so. For this is how the same prophet Ps. 7, 7. sets himself up by saying: "Help me back into the office that you have commanded me", which he says here with the short word: "His anointed", that is, whom he himself anointed and appointed as king, and wanted him to do what he does. Therefore it is written of David that he wages the wars of the Lord [1 Sam. 25, 28], that is, those that were laid on him and commanded him according to the will of God. On the other hand, those who are not called undertake everything in a very unfortunate way, as the children of Israel proved by their example, Numbers 14:44 ff. That is why he preferred to say "his anointed" rather than our king, so that they would be encouraged by God's command and not by their own advantage, as the great multitude of those who fight now tend to do.

If God would, such people would be ours, too, the eaters of Turks, who deceive the people of Christ with their godless deception of indulgences and are wont to plunge them into ruin of their possessions, body and soul. For how happily we have fought so far is proven by the increase in the dominion of the Turks.

of our enemies to our highest shame. For we, as godless people, are presumptuous both in our strength and in our righteousness, being haughty before God and man. Then we seek nothing but glory in front of the world, and in all these abominations we have pretended to the holy name of God. Both with fictitious words and deeds we presume all things, and yet we certainly promise martyrs' crowns for all this. O what frenzy!

Certainly David was a very pious king. Even though he was mighty in strength, he wrote this psalm to instruct the people in what trust and strength they should have in him, by restraining the applause of the great crowd, who ascribe everything to their kings, and directing them to the divine mercy. Therefore, the help of God's right hand was with him in power, while with us, on the contrary, the destruction of our left hand remains in weakness. But what is it to wonder that our kings have nothing in common with David in this matter of war, since we have nothing to match him in the faith of Christ, which should be our first concern?

V. 8. They rely on chariots and horses, but we remember the name (invocabimus in nomine) of the Lord our God.

37 [Hi in curribus et hi in equis] is a beautiful omission [of the word "rely"], which in the German language can be rendered quite well: "They with horses and chariots", because one must think of the verb "to fight" or "to rely". It is also a strange dispute that goes on in pure and firm faith: those rely on horses, we on the name of the Lord, those on the power of visible things, we on the name of the invisible, those on their senses, we on faith 2c. But since the Latin interpreter wanted to use the word invocabimus, he would have said more correctly: Nomen Domini invocabimus. For although the Hebrew says: Invoco in nomine Domini, and audio in voce Domini, video in turba, we must nevertheless say in Latin:

Invoco nomen Domini, and audio vocem Domini, video turbam. At this point the Hebrew text instead of the Vulgate): "We will call": "We will be mindful", and Jerome has: We will remember the name of the LORD our GOD.

It is indeed a wonderful encouragement and attack in warfare that the enemies fight armed with horses and chariots, and the righteous only with the remembrance of the name of God. It is certainly a great faith that dares to do such great things in the remembrance of the name of the Lord. For it is the custom of warriors, even to this day, that when they go into battle, they recall either the valiant deeds of their fathers, or former victories and other things by which they cheer and stir up their hearts. But it behooves our princes to be mindful of the name of God, on which all our help and victory is based. Proverbs 18:10: "The name of the Lord is a stronghold; the righteous runneth (as one prepared for war) and is protected," that is, he will have the upper hand and be victorious. But: "He runs along", that is, by being mindful of him and in faith in him.

39 But there is a very special emphasis on the word: "We think of it", which no one recognizes but the one who has experienced it, because without doubt the prophet indicates his experience here. For to whom should it occur that anyone would be victorious by merely thinking of the name of the Lord, if he had not experienced it? But also, how hard it is not to forget the name of the Lord, who would believe that? For death enters, shame, conscience, and a thousand dangers, by which the heart is assailed inwardly as by far more powerful forces than outwardly the body, so that it, torn to and fro on the present things, and what is around and what breaks in, loses the name of the Lord.

(40) And it is not enough that the name of the Lord be remembered and called upon once at the beginning, but it must be remembered with persistent and constant remembrance until victory is obtained at the end.

has against all terrors and dangers that confront him. For as it is impossible for the name of the Lord to fall, since he is eternal and almighty, so it is impossible for him who clings to him and endures to fall.

41. But the wicked, in whose ears the name of the LORD seems small, being [as he thinks] nothing but a breath and perishable letters, cannot grasp these wonders of his, so great and glorious. Therefore he forsakes him, and taking flesh for his arm, relies on men, and departs from the LORD with his heart, fleeing to the rod of Egypt, as it is said of Saul, that he died in his sins, because he trusted not in the LORD God of Israel [1 Chron. 11:13]. The other miracles of the name of the Lord must be left to the heart and experience, since no one can obtain them with words and ears.

V. 9. they have fallen down and fallen, but we stand upright. 1)

This is not said as a history, or not only according to history, but rather in a prophetic way, yes, according to the way of faith (fideliter). For it is only fitting for the faith that is measured in God to sing a song of triumph before the victory and to spread a rumor before the help, since everything is permitted to it. For since he believes, he already has what he believes, because faith does not deceive; as he believes, so it happens to him. Thus Moses, 2 Mos. 14, 13. f., strengthens the people, who are afraid of the persecuting Egyptians, by proclaiming the certain victory, saying: "Do not be afraid, stand firm, and see what salvation the Lord will do for you today. For these Egyptians whom you see today you will never see forever. The Lord will fight for you, and you will be silent." And so it happened that Pharaoh, relying on his chariots and horses, was drowned in water.

43. instead of obligati sunt, Jerome and the Hebrew text have better: they are fallen down.

1) Vulgate: Ipsi odÜALti sunt et eeeiierunt, nos Lutem surrexirliuZ et erecti sunuis.

or they have fallen, the verbum without further reference (absoluto verbo), so that it denotes the fall of the power that relies on itself, which, after God has withdrawn his hand, falls into itself and is overthrown, even though no adversary overthrows it. In this also the antithesis is more beautiful, because "to fall down" (incurvari) and "to rise" (surgere) are opposite to each other, as also "to fall" and "to stand", which is expressed here by erecti sumus. Furthermore, by "fall down" and "fall" the prophet expresses the failure (defectum) in such a way, as by "stand out" and "stand" the prosperous progress (profectum). For "to fall down" means to be weakened, and "to fall" means to be completely defeated; "to stand up" means to have the upper hand, and "to stand" means to overcome. With these words he sets the matter before us, as it were, and describes it as if it had taken place in our presence, in order to awaken faith in GOD. For the thing behaves in such a way that they first fall down and finally fall; first get up and then stand still.

44 But what is this? He who confesses that his adversaries fall and fall, surely confesses at the same time that they had previously risen and stood. Does he then at the same time indicate that the godly also fell and fell before, since he makes such people out of them who would stand upright and stand? Far be it from this, for these are words of faith, which is quite sure of things to come, as if they had passed away, and pronounces the thing as it is going on before the eyes of men. For while the wicked trust in chariots and horses when the enemies attack, they certainly seem to be upright and to stand; whereas the godly, who trust in the name of the Lord, seem, as if they were far from being a match for them, to fall and topple. But faith rejects this pretense of the senses, and boasts thus: "Although those are erect and standing, trusting in chariots and grates, but we fall and fall, as it seems, we are nevertheless sure that this appearance of things will shortly change, and those who are erect and standing will be overthrown.

must and do fall, but we, who seem to be overthrown and to fall, are in truth raised up and will stand, yes, we have already risen up and are raised up. O what a beautiful example of faith!

v. 10. Help, Lord, the King hear us when we call.

In our Latin translation, this verse can be seen as a conclusion or affirmation, but the Hebrew text has this division: "Help, Lord, the King hear us at the time when we will call. I do not know what mystery may be hidden in this, for it does not say: hear us, but: he hears us, in the third person, as he said at the beginning of this psalm: "He hears you," in the same person and with the same verb. For "the King" is in the nominative, not the accusative; the pronoun te at the end of the verse is not found [in the Hebrew]. If there should be anything hidden in it, I leave this to those who are spiritual (spiritualibus). I am satisfied with the quite simple-minded sense according to which, I believe, GOD is here called "the King," in the third person, according to Hebrew, as also in the beginning of the Psalm: "The LORD hear thee." And Moses says, 4 Mos. 14, 17.: "Let now the power of the LORD be great, as you have sworn," instead of: your power. And Ps. 3, 9. "By the LORD is found help, and thy blessing upon thy people." And Deut. 27:16: "The LORD will set a man over the congregation," that is, "Set thou, O LORD. And Gen 41:33 Joseph said to Pharaoh, "Let the king set a wise man."

46 So also here: "The King hear us." For the article "the" is put to emphasize [the word "king"] particularly, that is, hear thou us, who in truth art this our king. For David, which serveth thee, is not king, neither reigneth his kingdom, but thy kingdom. For we are your kingdom, and you are our king. By this sentiment, he moves GOD very strongly, that is, he teaches us to move GOD, who then moves will when we are moved. For how should he not hear when his kingdom, his cause, his honor is in danger? That is, then we pray most fervently when we have the confidence that we are God's kingdom and a part of God's goods. For then we do not seek our own, and are certain that He will not abandon the thing that is His and the kingdom that is His, especially since we call upon Him, about which attitude the seventh Psalm [§ 47 ff.] has spoken more extensively. So this verse asks for a general and permanent help from God, in this way: As you have already helped me and heard me, so procure that you help and hear us always and at whatever time we may call upon you. For this is how he who has once experienced the help of the Lord desires that it be there again and again, fearing that it might one day leave him.

(47) We have interpreted this psalm as an example of the faith of every king, but I am not yet sure whether I have hit the right meaning. For although he speaks of the banner, of horses and chariots, which seem to enforce that one must draw this psalm to the outward battle, I dare not deny that it is to be understood of Christ, and that it speaks of the battle signs in the spirit. For I am particularly moved by the 110th Psalm, among many others, in which Christ the King is called upon to sit down and reign in the midst of his enemies, and that his scepter be sent out of Zion; likewise, that the kings of the earth be crushed, and the like. Even though this is written in the flesh, it is spoken and understood entirely in the spirit. Something similar could be cited from the 72nd Psalm, and in the 2nd Psalm, v. 9, the "iron scepter" is spoken of in the spirit. So one can understand also here "panier" easily in the spirit. For there is nothing else to prevent me from interpreting this Psalm of Christ than that I have resolved to avoid the secret interpretation as far as possible; then also this, that this Psalm in the New Testament is not dressed like the others. Again, the following psalm penetrates very much from the fact that it must be understood from Christ, and it is probable that it is

(48) Perhaps it would be safer, so that the reader can judge and decide, to briefly mention the other conception of Christ, according to which the prophet, in the person of the faithful people who know nothing of carnal wars, also prays for his King, who himself, as a spiritual prince of war, fights with this same people against the violence and the gates of hell. For of incomparably greater importance is the battle of the word and faith, by which we do not fight with flesh and blood, but with the evil spirits under heaven, not for our life and the perishable things, but for the eternal, that is, for righteousness against sins and errors.

49. besides, who knows if this Psalm is not drawn in a general sense to both? as the word 2 Sam. 7, 14.: "I will be his father and he shall be my son", which is said of Solomon, is understood at the same time sHebr. 1, 5.] of Christ, and some others, Matth. 2, 18., as the voice on high (Ramah) of the children in captivity [Jer. 31, 15.], and at the same time of the little children whom Herod had killed.

50 Let us therefore set Christ before us with the whole multitude of martyrs, how they fight and die for the truth and the kingdom of God, against the violence of the tyrants, who were superior to them in power and weapons, and yet are defeated, and the understanding will be easy after what has been said before. For it is the same faith, but in a different matter. For here Christ and the martyrs are defeated bodily, there they overcome, because on both sides the same Spirit is at work, who represents Christ and the saints with inexpressible groaning, at the same time helping their weakness. He speaks:

(51) The Lord hear thee in thy trouble. Since there is none to comfort, and thou alone sufferest in the time of thy affliction, and thy saints with thee, let the LORD comfort thee, and hear thee, who shall save thee from thine enemies. For there is no doubt that Christ and his saints through the Spirit groaned with this unspeakable fervor, with which we, too, will have to groan in death and hardship.

52. "The name of the God of Jacob protect you. For there is nothing left but the name of God alone, on whose invocation, as it is believed, the help for the sufferer hangs and is preserved, as it were on a very thin thread, since everything else not only cannot save, but works into the hand of the destroyers.

He sends you help from the holy place. But it is precisely this that causes great anguish, that one should cling to the name of God alone and expect help only in an invisible way and from the invisible God who dwells in the completely separate sanctuary. And yet, the Spirit helps the sufferers through this groaning, so that they feel (even though with great effort) an inexpressible and unnameable help.

54. "And strengthen thyself out of Zion." "Zion," as we have said, is the same as "sanctuary." For he expects, and is able to do nothing else, than to feel that he expects help from Zion, the hidden dwelling place of God, so that he may not only endure hardship, but also finally overcome it.

55. "He remembers all your grain offering," namely, that by which you offer yourself to God to go to death (in mortem). For here, too, if the groaning spirit did not hold it against them in all circumstances that they had not yet been completely forgotten by God, their weakness would certainly believe that the very thing they suffer and sacrifice themselves for would be rejected, condemned and consigned to oblivion. For the flesh would grumble and say thus: You suffer in vain, God will never remember this sacrifice of yours.

56. "And your burnt offering must be fat." That is, it must be abundant, fruitful and complete. But here, as we have said, the "burnt offering" must be taken in the spirit, as well as the "grain offering." For this is how Christ sacrificed himself completely on the cross, that he might be consumed by the fire of love. It can be said here instead of "all your grain offering": of the whole grain offering, just as the "burnt offering" was burned whole with fire. Through this sigh

The Spirit instructs them to pray and hope that they will suffer nothing in vain, but that everything will be pleasant, memorable, and complete, which those in need expect with such faint hope that it seems to them that they want it more than they hope for it.

(57) "He will give you what your heart desires, and confirm or fulfill all your requests. And this also the Spirit makes them expect (facit), although weakness persuades them that both their desires are in vain and their designs are void. I think that in these four verses the power and nature of this inexpressible sighing is beautifully illustrated, as it were in experience and as with an example. Now follow more cheerful things, in that the adversity leans toward victory.

58. "We boast that you help us, and in the name of our God we cast up paniers. The LORD grant thee all thy petition." Of this boasting and casting up of paniers we have also spoken above [§ 24 f.]. For thus Christ and his martyrs have the confidence, even though they must die, that through the help of God they will triumph, boast, and lift up the banner, and preach and confess Christ with all the greater joy, the more they are afflicted. And even if they themselves are killed, they have the confidence that others will do the same in their place, with whom they have in common, as one body, so also the same, namely this voice, and do not doubt that what Christ has demanded will be fulfilled, even against the will of the tyrants (postulavit). But what does he demand? Ps. 2:8: "Heische (postula) von mir, so will I give thee the Gentiles for an inheritance, and the end of the world for a possession." For this demand he obtained for the "triumphant" and panieraufwerfenden (vexillificantibus, if I am so (I may say) martyrs, that is, for those who confessed, preached and died with joyfulness.

59. "Now I perceive that the Lord helps his anointed, and hears him in his holy heaven; his right hand helps mightily." This must be explained as above [§ 28 ff]. For he helped Christ and heard him when he fulfilled his desire through the multiplication of the church. But he heard him through the strong help of his right hand, that is, as his right hand is wont to help, which helps only those who have no strength themselves. For God is mighty in the weak, good in the wicked, kind in the unpleasant. The Spirit, the Helper of the Weak, teaches that one should firmly commit such things to God.

60. "They rely on chariots and horses, but we think on the name of the Lord our God." From the [§ 37 ff.] foregoing the meaning is sufficiently clear. For the tyrants are victorious by their power, the martyrs only by remembering the name of God and calling upon him constantly.

(61) "They have fallen down and fallen, but we stand upright. For thus the church has grown and strengthened by the very thing by which it is oppressed; and the godless tyrants have perished when they were most powerful, as we see all this fulfilled by experience. Although there are other people who fall as martyrs and others who rise as believers, but because they are one people, they ascribe to themselves, according to the figure of the synecdoche, which is very common in Scripture, what belongs to only one part, although in truth the martyrs also rise in spirit, since many follow them in their faith.

62. "Help, Lord! the King hear us when we call." The meaning is the same as we have given it above 45 ff].

The twenty-first Psalm.

V. 1. 2. A psalm of David, to be sung. O Lord, the king rejoices in thy strength, and how glad he is at thy help!

This psalm is almost in all things the same as the preceding one, so that even here I am not entirely sure whether it is to be understood of Christ alone, or of any king, and it is to be wondered at that in such clear and blunt words there is such a dark meaning. But it seems to be a thanksgiving at all for the granting of what was asked for in the preceding psalm, so that it is a kind of victory song of Christ rising from the dead. And as we have explained the preceding psalm first from an exemplary (figurali) king, so we want to explain this one first from the exemplary (figurato) Christ, since in fact David and every king in his wars and victories exemplified Christ's suffering and resurrection, and it is easy to understand the exemplary and the exemplified thing, one from the other. Perhaps this psalm also speaks in a general sense of both kings at the same time, as it also seemed to be with the previous one [Ps. 20, § 49].

2. the King Christ, after death is conquered, will rejoice in your power, by which you raised up and made victorious the one who died in the weakness of the flesh and was subject to everything, or as the apostle says 2 Cor. 13:4: "And though he was crucified in weakness, yet he lives in the power of GOD."

3) It is the same thing that the other part says: "And how very glad is he in thy salutare!" that is, since he has been saved from death. Our Latin interpreter likes to translate salutare instead of salute [help]; I don't know why. But "strength" and "help" are almost everywhere taken for the same thing, namely, that by which God saves us and makes us strong, so that they are words that designate more the gifts of God than the author, as I have often said of the "wisdom of God," of the "justice of God," and the like.

But there are many other names, not only in the Hebrew language, but also in the Greek and Latin and German, perhaps in all others, by which power or strength is indicated. The difference of these we shall perhaps examine in another place; we have dealt with the words "rejoice" and "be glad" in the 5th Psalm, v. 12, and in the 9th Psalm, v. 3.

V. 3. You give him his heart's desire, and do not refuse what his mouth asks. Sela.

4. a twofold description of prayer, the first of which refers to the prayer of the heart, the other to the prayer of the mouth. For the prophet uses oratorical words here. What is the prayer of the mind other than "the desire of the heart"? what is the prayer of the mouth other than "what his mouth asks" (voluntas labiorum)? However, others have instead of voluntate labiorum: the speech (eloquium) of the lips or prolationem labiorum; but they designate the meaning "prayer" too weakly, because this speech of the lips, by which it is indicated that one asks for something, is called prayer. Therefore our Latin interpreter said voluntatem or the desire of the lips, so that the lips correspond to the heart and the desire of the lips to the "desire of the heart", in order to express that the oral prayer could not even be called a prayer if it were not also desired and produced from the desire and the attitude of the heart. For the will of the lips is a living and fervent prayer; for what is there that is more living than the will or desire? I do not know if this way of using David's eloquium can be found anywhere in Scripture.

(5) It is indeed a good order that the prayer of the heart should be put first, without which the prayer of the lips is a useless murmur; and as oral prayer should not be neglected, so care should be taken that it is accompanied by the prayer of the heart.

of the heart. The apostle says: "I will sing psalms in the spirit, and will also sing psalms with the mind" [1 Cor. 14:15].

6 Non fraudasti [you did not deceive him^ must be understood in this way: You did not deprive him, you did not refuse him, that is, you took care that he did not pray in vain, nor did you turn away from his prayer, so that you did not hear him; in that the prophet, by the negative expression, makes the prayer one which is in the highest degree Yes and Amen (affirmativam). But what did his heart desire? What did his lips ask for? It follows:

V. 4. for you shower him with good blessings; you place a golden crown on his head. 1)

7 Our Latin interpreter translates again and again the word XX by: precious stones instead of: the ophiric and best gold, as we have also seen Ps. 19, 11. Yea, Psalm 119, 127. he [Vulg.] says, "More than gold and topaz," where the same expression pas (XX) by its similar sound (allusione sui) has made him think of "topaz," whereas he should have said, "Above gold and above fine gold," for the very same words are there with which Ps. 19, 11. is said, "More precious than gold and fine gold." And in this place Jerome translates, A crown of fine gold, which the opinion of all and the general custom require. For the crowns of kings are not of precious stones, but of gold. But it is evident that he is speaking of a royal crown; we therefore translate word for word thus: For thou wilt precede him with blessings of goodness; thou wilt set upon his head a crown of ophiric, that is, the most precious gold.

8 I do not fully understand what the word praevenisti means. As much as one can guess from the Hebrew, it is spoken comparatively, that is, Christ was blessed in such a way that he was the most distinguished (princeps) of all those who are blessed and that his blessings were of the kind that are not bestowed on anyone else, as Ps. 45:8.

1) Vulgata'. Huouiaru praevenisti eum in deneäietionibus äleedinis, posnisti in eupits ssns eoronarn äs iapiäs xrstioso.

means: "Your God has anointed you more than your companions. And Paul says, Rom. 8, 29.: "That he might be the firstborn among many brethren." And again, 1 Cor. 15:20: "Christ is risen, and become the firstborn among them that sleep." And Ps. 89, 7. "Who may be like unto the LORD among the children of the gods?" This "foreknowledge" (praevenio) definitely refers to the person, although this can also be said in a very beautiful and quite true sense, that Christ rose first of all, so that this passage would also be one of those prophesied about the resurrection of Christ, thus referring not only to the dignity of the person, but also to the foreknowledge of time. For Paul also calls him the "firstborn among them that sleep" and "the firstborn" not only with regard to the personal dignity but also to the time.

So now the meaning is: Praevenisti eum, that is, you have made him first in those best blessings, which is confirmed by the following part, which says that he was crowned king, declaring, as it were, this "advance".

(9) For we have said that in this verse the prophet begins to tell what these things are which the heart of this king desired and the desire of his lips demanded, namely, salvation from death and strength from weakness, that is, the best blessings. For one must get used to this Hebrew way of speaking, according to which what is called "blessings of good" (bonitatis) is called in Latin "good blessings" or rather the very best blessings. For our Latin interpreter not infrequently translates the Hebrew which actually means "good" by dulce [sweet] and in this verse by dulcedo [sweetness). A Latin speaker can hardly understand what this is supposed to be, since in Latin we would call benedictionem dulcedinis the blessing that sweetness gives or contains, as we call the righteousness of God that which God gives.

(10) "Blessings" (benedictiones), however, is called, likewise according to Hebrew idiom, that which we call benefactions, as Jacob

Gen. 49, 25. says of the "blessing on breasts and bellies" 2c. 1 Sam. 25, 27: "Here is the blessing that your handmaid has brought", because everything comes from God's blessing, as Gen. 1, 22. 28. ff. is written. So the prophet distinguishes this blessing of Christ from all other blessings, because he calls it, that is, good and sweet, while nowhere else is the blessing praised with this epithet, by which he indicates without doubt that he is speaking of future goods, in which there is no tribulation and no bitterness. For what we possess in the time of this life, however good it may be, we do not possess without something evil being in it (sine malitia), "for it is evil time" [Eph. 5:16], and "it is enough that every day has its own plague (malitia)," says Christ [Matt. 6:34], since he also foretold his elect that they would be afraid in the world and would not possess even the exceedingly lovely grace of God without toil. By this word he anticipates that no one may presume to understand by the golden crown of Christ a temporal crown, making him by the flowery words a king equal to others, but only in good things, that is, in future and spiritual things.

(11) But that we must assume here a vague speech (allegoriam), the meaning of the circumstances, the context 1) and the sense forces us to it, so that we can understand by the setting out of the golden crown nothing else than a paraphrase for the fact that he is appointed king in holy, spiritual and exceedingly good things. This paraphrase is not rare in the Scriptures. Judges. 5:10: "You who ride on beautiful donkeys," that is, you who are most noble and most high; likewise, "You who sit in judgment," that is, you who are judges; and "You who walk in the way," that is, you who are lowly, common and rabble-rousing. Gen. 49:23 [Vulg.], "They that have projectiles attack him," that is, the slingers. Thus here: "You will put a golden crown on his head," that is, you will make him king over all kings and Lord over all lords.

1) In the Wittenberg and the Jena: oironmstLntiLO 6QN86HN6litil instead of: eireninstantiae, eonseansntins.

(12) For what glory of God would this be, whose description began in such a sublime speech, that it portrayed this king as one who rejoiced greatly not in man's, but in God's power and help, then, who was showered with the best benefits, and endowed with long life, and set for constant blessing: and now, in the midst of this divine splendor, fell into such dung that it should also extol the honor of this perishable gold? For such crowns are possessed everywhere, by their own power and presumption, by the most godless and wicked people, who are not worthy that God should gladden them with his countenance in his power and help, but that he should devour them in his wrath and give them to be devoured by fire, as this Psalm will say afterwards. Therefore, the majesty of both the crowning and the crowned, and the other circumstances, must remind us that this golden crown also belongs to an unusual majesty and is not attached to any of the other kings.

v. 5. He asks you for life, so you give him long life forever and ever.

(13) I believe that the prophet here goes into detail (partiri), so that he goes through the aforementioned "good blessing" in order, and explains what he wanted to say with the golden crown. For he enumerates: life, honor, the kingdom, the priesthood, blessedness, and all these as eternal goods; then victory and eternal vengeance on his enemies; for after this is set forth, it will be clear what the king's heart desired and what the desire of his lips was, namely these very best blessings. Now the first blessing he asked for was that he might save him from death. And this he did. For he not only raised him up, but also gave him long life, for all time and beyond, that is, eternal life. And therefore we know that this psalm speaks of Christ, because it is written that he asked for life, and that eternal life was given to him. For one who is to die has such a movement of the heart that he asks for life.

asks. The apostle writes to the Hebrews [Cap. 5, 7.] that Christ did this and "was heard, because he honored God. For the one who has life is not given it, just as he does not ask for it.

But the prophet interprets himself by saying that life was asked for and long life was given, which should have no end but "forever and ever".

14 These two expressions "and" are translated in various ways. They seem to me to designate eternity according to the manner of speaking peculiar to the Hebrews, as we say in German: "immer und ewiglich". Although I said above [Ps. 5, § 263] that it means an uncertain time, we understand eternity by this meaning, just as by Melchizedek, who has no beginning and no end, Paul understands the eternal priest Christ. Whoever wanted to, could refer the one expression to the kingdom of Christ in the contending church, the other to the triumphant church.

But notice that the prophet wanted to clearly indicate that God gives us greater things than we ask of Him, by saying in simple words that he asked for life, and soon after in much more exalted words that he was given long life for time and eternity. Thus our request is always less than the gifts we are to receive, as the apostle teaches Eph. 3:20.

V. 6. He has great honor in your help; you place praise and adornment on him.

15 There is a wonderful variety and inconsistency in the [Latin] translation. These Hebrew expressions XXXX XXX it has Ps. 8, 6. rendered by: Gloria et honore, 1) here: Gloriam et magnum decorem; Ps. 45, 5th: Specie tua et pulchritudine tua, and Ps. 96, 2) 6th: Specie tua et pulchritudine tua, and Ps. 104, 1st: Confessionem et decorem induisti, and Ps. 110, 3rd: In splendoribus sanctorum. Meanwhile we say: "Praise and adornment." For adornment (splendorem) we call the royal endowment and abundance of all things, as in the Evangelio Lucă [Cap. 16, 19.] the rich man lived all days gloriously and in joy, and the poet 3) says: Et domus interior regali splendida luxu [and the richly adorned interior of the house is endowed with royal splendor]. This we can also call megaloprepiam [great splendor] and magnidecentiam [great adornment], which is what our Latin interpreter wanted, since he expressed the One Hebrew expression by two, magnum decorem. But it is the "ornament" and great adornment of Christ that He has in His kingdom great, many, and very noble princes and peoples, gloriously adorned with all wisdom, truth, and other spiritual gifts (but He Himself is most adorned and adorned of all), who have the richest abundance of the most delicious things, yet with discipline and reverence, as the apostle called the Corinthians [1. Ep. 1, 5.] praises, since he says that they are richly made in all things. But his "praise" is that he is honored by them all, all praise him and thank him that they have all this through his gift.

16 The meaning is: The king Christ, who in his death was the most despised and least man, abandoned by all, receives through your help or by saving him from death the highest honor for this disgrace, abandonment and contempt, because you put praise and adornment on him. Isa. 53, 12. "Therefore I will give him great multitude for a prey, and he shall have the strong for a prey." Prov. 14, 28.: "Where a king has many people, that is his glory," where the same expression XXX is translated by dignitas, as in the same place Cap. 20, 29.: "The strength of young men is their prize, and gray hair is the ornament of old men." I would say in German for XXX: "Pracht und Herrlichkeit," great adornment, awe-inspiring splendor, adornment. Because actually means xxxav and gloriā [glory], XXX but χαύχημα, the prize, the active praise (gloriationem), as above [Sprüchw. 20, 29.] exultatio juvenum stands instead of gloriatio juvenum fortitudo

1) This citation from the eighth Psalm is missing in the Basel, Wittenberg and Jena editions.

3) Vii-AÜii ^611618, lid. I, V. 637.

Enm. Ps. 89, 18.: "For you are the glory of their strength", that is, in you and in your strength they boast. In short, he has put praise and adornment upon him, that is, he has made him famous and a prince and king of honors, which cannot well be understood of David, who was continually afflicted with so much adversity; therefore let us understand it of Christ glorified and preached and believed and worshipped.

V. 7. for you make him a blessing forever; you make him glad with the joy of your countenance.

17 We have heard about the King of honors, now we will hear about the Priest who brings salvation and is eternal. Some believe that Christ is given for blessing, because he is blessed by all for eternity. In this way of speaking, it is often said in the prophets about the people of Israel, that they are put to a fable, a proverb, a mockery, a parable, and Gen. 12, 2. God says to Abraham: "And you shall be a blessing" (for this is the Hebrew text), for which our Latin interpreter says: And you will be blessed. Isa. 19:24. f. [Vulg.ft "Israel shall be blessed in the midst of the earth, whom the LORD has blessed." Isa. 65:8: "As when must is found in a cluster, and saith, Spoil it not, for there is a blessing in it: so will I do for my servants' sakes, that I spoil it not all." In these passages and in many others, "blessing" is taken passively.

But the Hebrew text says here: Quoniam dabis eum benedictiones in aeternum in the plural [instead of: In benedictionem in the Vulgate]. Although this may be taken passively, because this king is blessed by very many and showered with many blessings by GOD, yet I hold that it must be taken active, according to the words Gen. 22:18.: "And by thy seed shall all nations be blessed." For the blessings with which he is blessed in his person by GOD, he has sung sufficiently above [v. 4.] in the verse where he says: "For thou dost shower him with good blessings."

Therefore, I understand here the eternal and heavenly blessings with which Christ, as the eternal Priest, blesses His own, as they received the Spirit, as the apostle Eph. 1, 1) 3. says: "Praise be to God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has blessed us with every spiritual blessing in heavenly things through Christ. For I hold that it is the same thing that we are blessed with spiritual blessings in heavenly goods through Christ, and that Christ is set apart to bless forever. But it belongs to a priest to bless with this kind of blessing, by which goods are imparted. Moreover, blessing is found in common life, by which we praise those who have goods and wish happiness to all, even to the lowly, and in general this [blessing] stands with the high and this with the lowly.

19. and this is our glory and praise, that we have a bishop, by whom the curse with which we were punished in Adam is changed and swallowed up, so completely that no temporal curse can harm us, whether it be the curse of sin or of men who curse us, but rather must benefit us through the rich and eternal blessing in Christ. It is surely an exceedingly sweet word for all who believe in Christ, that we have our own high priest, and one who blesses us in all things.

20. "Thou gladdenest him with the joy of thy countenance." This cannot be understood otherwise than of the blessedness which the revealed glory of majesty has. For "the joy of the face of GOD" is the joy that the face of GOD is revealed. Our Latin interpreter, however, should have cheaply omitted the preposition cum [before vultu tuo].

V. 8 For the king hopes in the Lord and will stand firm through the goodness of the Most High.

(21) All this that is said will happen to him because he hoped [in God] and did not waver. And here is given a beautiful and proper paraphrase, or rather description, of hope, which alone is capable of refuting all the ungodly opinions that have been handed down about hope. For "to hope in the Lord" is the same as "remaining firm through the goodness of the Most High," not wavering, but standing and waiting. Of course, it is easy to rejoice and delight in the present goodness, but when it is not there, and there is misfortune on all sides, which troubles, presses, moves, not to let oneself be moved to despair, not to give way, but to expect the opposite, that is, first to hope in truth; but this is a very difficult thing, about which more has been said in the 5th Psalm 174 ff.

(22) Therefore, let those be on their guard who teach that hope comes from merit. For hope, as we are taught here, surely looks to the goodness of God, as fear looks to wrath and judgment. For he who hopes in the goodness of God is not moved, but he who fears the wrath of God has no rest. If then it is written that Christ, who was completely innocent, hoped in the Lord and held fast to the goodness of God, who are we to presume to overcome the judgment of God by our strength and efforts and not rather by the goodness of God alone? This is written for our learning. Therefore, those who fear the judgment of God too much must turn the eyes of their minds away from the judgment and wrath of God and toward goodness; in turn, the eyes of the insensitive 1) and hard of heart should turn from goodness to judgment, so that they may be humbled.

V. 9. your hand will find all your enemies, your right hand will find those who hate you. 2)

He continues to speak of the victory of this king over the subjugated enemies. Our Latin interpreter, as he likes to change, has made the same verb, which is active in both places, inveniat, [in the first place] a passive one, inveniatur. [This should not have been done,] for it is a repetition of the same thing (tau-

1) Here we have followed the old translator, since we cannot prove the word invenit lexically.

2) Vulgate: Inveniatur in omnibus inimicis tuis, cetera tuis inveniant, omnes, qui tuis inimici sunt.

tolgia), as Ps. 2, 4: "But He who dwells in heaven laughs at them, and the Lord mocks them." But he rather calls them enemies and haters of God, as of Christ, for the reason, as I have often said, that we should know that God takes vengeance for us and fights, as he says [Rom. 12, 19]: "Vengeance is mine, I will repay." And Ps. 110, 1: "Until I lay your enemies at the footstool of your feet." Of the "hand of GOD" we have Ps. 17, 14.

[§ 81] abundantly acted in the verse, "Of the people of thy hand," for it signifies the power and work of God's vengeance. Therefore, he speaks of the Jews who killed Christ, who gathered against the Lord and His anointed, and still persist in the same ungodliness.

24. But what is this? Has the hand of God lost them, that it should be necessary for them to be found by the hand of God? [No, but by this expression the presumption and certainty of God's enemies is shown, who act as surely and confidently as if they were not in the power of God, yes, in their foolish zeal promise themselves not only impunity, but also a reward, thinking that they are doing God a service, so that they now fear nothing less than the hand of God, but think that they have built their nest in the bosom of God. They will be like the wicked, who are suddenly found, because they are not aware of it. Thus it is said in 2 Cor. 12:20: "I fear, when I come, that I shall not find you as I will, and ye shall not find me as ye will."

V. 10. You will make them like a furnace of fire when you look into it; the LORD will devour them in his wrath, fire will devour them.

(25) The prophet beautifully illustrates the matter. For this is how it happens when the wicked are suddenly found, visited and seized in their troubles, that they would like to escape the sight of the wrath or the revelation of the righteous judgment of God, but cannot escape, and speak the word, Hos. 10:8: "You mountains, cover us, and you hills, fall upon us." But in vain

They are forced to endure this day and the eternal revelation. Then begins the fear, the fleeing and the unbearable horror, which makes them burn from this inward, unspeakable fire. For the outward fire is nothing in comparison with this inward fire, so that the prophet quite actually pictures them [the wicked] with the "furnace of fire" (clibanum ignis), or as we say in Latin: per clibanum ardentem, who exercises his rage, not by fire, which is put around it, but inwardly scorched and burning. Thus Abraham, Gen 19:28, saw Sodom and Gomorrah as smoke from the furnace.

This most noble and unbearable punishment God will execute with His face alone, that is, with the revelation of His wrath, as He says here: "When you look into it, you will make them like a furnace of fire," and 2 Thess. 1, 9: "Who will suffer torment, eternal destruction from the face of the Lord, and from His glorious power." And Ps. 34:17: "But the face of the LORD is upon them that do evil." Yes, this is the punishment that no one understands but the damned who feel it, so that it is terrible to even think of the words of this verse: so actually do they depict it, and I do not remember any other passage in the Old Testament that so clearly indicates the misfortune of damnation. The fener furnace is lit by the unbearable sight of God and lasts forever. For the day of judgment will last but a moment, but will endure forever, and never cease thereafter. On and on they will be judged, and on and on they will suffer torment, and on and on they will be a furnace of fire, that is, they will be tormented inwardly by the highest anguish and affliction.

27. not as if the wicked see god or his face, as the godly will see, but they will feel the presence of his power, which they will not be able to suffer, and yet will have to suffer, as can be seen even now in the judgments of this time. The righteous has a confidence like a lion, and also expects with joy that the truth will come to light. But the unrighteous is terrified of this. So that one Day will be lovely to the saints, but terrifying to the wicked.

28. "The Lord will devour them in his wrath." This has the same opinion as the preceding, and is as it were a declaration of the furnace of fire, because his wrath will be revealed. By this beholding [in wrath] he kindles them (as I have said) with the fire of the furnace. The Hebrew would say, The LORD will consume (absorbabit) them in his wrath, because he seizes them, so that they cannot escape in any way. For he will not merely bite them, but devour all that they are, so that they cannot escape after any of their parts. Also this word certainly has a great emphasis and vehemence in it: "to be devoured by the wrath of God"; and this all goes to the inward punishment. Now follows the other part of this verse:

29. "Fire will devour them" (devorabit). In Hebrew: And the fire shall consume them (comedet). This is understood by the external fire into which they will be thrown with the devil and his angels, Matth. 25, 41: "Depart from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels," in that they will burn in body and soul, inwardly and outwardly. Who told this prophet everything so clearly? For no other passage has described hell so clearly. But he knows the first part from experience, the other part by revelation. For those who have sat down in this life as in a garden of refreshment and rest, they will be there a fiery furnace and food of fire.

v. 11. You will destroy their fruit from the face of the earth, and their seed from the children of men.

(30) This verse also forces this Psalm to be understood by Christ and his enemies, and we see that it is fulfilled everywhere in a tangible way. "Their fruit" may be understood either of their offspring, or of all that they have possessed in this life (which is called the fruit of the hands), yea, even of the good that they may have done, as they were in the law.

of the Lord. For all things were laid waste by the Romans, and they were scattered from their homeland over the face of the whole earth. And not only that, but also their seed and offspring will not only be destroyed from that land, but will also be cut off from men everywhere, so that the word of Hos. 9:17 will be fulfilled: "My God will reject them, because they will not listen to Him; and they will go astray among the nations. And Micah 7:17: "They shall lick dust like serpents, and tremble in their holes like the worms of the earth." For wherever there are people, the Jews, if there are any, must sit on the swings, and though they do not wander about without ceasing according to the body, yet they cannot be without the constant fear that they must wander about and wander.

V. 12: For they thought to do thee evil, and made designs which they could not perform. 1)

In Hebrew it is said: Quoniam declinaverunt super te malum, cogitaverunt cogitationem, non potuerunt. In order to avoid a Hebrew idiosyncrasy (idiotismo), the pronoun quae²) is added, and the infinitive stabilire is added for easier understanding. But the verbum in Hebrew is more emphatically set without closer relation (absolute): Non potuerunt, that is, they could do nothing, or they have become powerless, as it is also said in the 141. 3) Psalm, v. 6. Audient verba mea, quoniam potuerunt, that is, because they have become strong and powerful. But "evil" and "plots" are what the chief priests devised to destroy Christ, who "spake in vain," as Ps. 2:1 is said, saying [Luc. 20:14], "Come, let us kill him, that the inheritance may be ours." So it is also said in Jer. 11, 19: "They have reasoned with me, saying, Let us destroy the tree with its fruit (mittamus lignum in panem ejus), and cut him off from the land of the living."

1) Vulgate: tzuorÜLm doolnavorunt in t" wala, oositaverunt Consilia, yuao non potuorunt statüliro.

32. but he suitably says declinaverunt (they intended) to indicate more the plot than the accomplishment of the wicked, which he explains by the other word, "They could not carry it out." For thus he set the sea its bounds, that on the shore its proud waves should break, as it is said in Job [Cap. 38, 10.]. In like manner also to the wicked, that they may will evil, and yet not be able to perform it, as it is said in Isaiah, Cap. 41, 23: "Defiance, do good or harm, let us talk of it, and look with one another."

V. 13: for you will make her a shoulder; with your sinew you will aim at her face. 4)

Jerome has: Quoniam ponēs eos humerum, funes tuos firmabis contra facies eorum. This is extraordinarily significant and appropriate. If you ask: What will happen to the unbelieving Jews after this? He answers: They will only live to carry burdens, that they labor in vain with many, futile and heavy works of the law, being inferior to righteousness, and do not attain righteousness [Rom. 9, 31.]; in one word he describes their laborious and useless work in the law and the works of the law in the shortest way. The Hebrew text can be translated in two ways: For thou shalt make her shoulder in what thou hast left (in reliquiis tuis), thou shalt aim against her face; or thus: for thou shalt make her shoulder, with thy sinews thou shalt aim against her face. For what our Latin translator says: Praeparabis vultum eorum, I do not like, because he has omitted the preposition "against" (ad), and the verbum which stands in this place more often means to aim or to strain. That is why Jerome translated it this way: For thou shalt make them shoulder, and thy cords thou shalt stretch against their faces. But "cords" he calls the sinews that are stretched on a bow for shooting the arrows, as Ps. 11:2: "They stretch the bow and lay their arrows on the sinews." What will be the meaning now? Whichever translation one may follow, one will find difficulty.

34 I assume here with Jerome instead of reliquiis [in the Vulgate] "sinews" (nervos), to which the verb "you will aim" or "strain against their faces" moves me. This seems to me to denote a twofold punishment of the Jews, the first of which is to be made a back, that is, put to flight, as Gen. 49:8: "Thy hand shall be upon the neck of thine enemies" (in cervicibus). The other is the coming of a greater calamity, that those who flee and turn their faces to escape, the Lord meets them and tightens his sinews, so that they are punished, whether they go forward or backward. The burden forces them to flee, and the bow held out against them forces them to retreat: thus they are seized in a strait, and are in such a position that, while they flee one danger, they fall into a greater one.

35 It seems to me, therefore, that the prophet, by the juxtaposition of "shoulder" and "face", wants to express nothing else than that wherever they turn to escape, they will be more involved in misfortune. The back is to indicate their escape, the face, which faces the tense sinews, their running into misfortune (incurtus). The Egyptians, who were drowned in the Red Sea [Ex. 14, 24. ff.], can serve as an example of this, which the Lord made into a back by looking at them and turning them around. After that, when they fled and turned their backs, the waters met them, and so they fell into the midst of the sea. Similarly, another example is Jos. 8:20 ff. of the men of Ai, who, as they fled to the city, were met by the children of Israel armed in ambush and utterly destroyed them in their midst. The same happened to the children of Benjamin, Judg. 20, 45. ff. And who knows if the prophet did not have these examples before his eyes when he wrote this verse.

36 For we see that this happens to the Jews, that they are never more unhappy to fall than when they undertake something for themselves against us, as Moses also told them.

14, 41.] when he said, "You will not succeed in anything," thereby indicating that they undertake many things for their salvation and yet only fall more into ruin. Thus they do not omit anything until this day, which can serve for their deliverance, and nevertheless they fall deeper and deeper into ruin and fulfill the whole 26. 1) Chapter of the third book of Moses, where their stubbornness in this running into misfortune is described extensively.

(37) But when this happens in spiritual matters, it is much more terrible, namely, since they anxiously strive to free their consciences from sins, death and hell by righteousness from works and by their wisdom, and to do enough. But here, in truth, they are made quite miserable backs by toiling with many efforts, and [toil and labor, Ps. 14, § 18], in order to thereby become blessed, while they thereby only become martyrs of the devil and fall into twofold ruin. For the sinew and bow of divine judgment will meet them, and they will be eternally cast out, saying sMatthew 7:23], "Depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity." This twofold destruction he has expressed above Ps. 14, 3. [Vulg. Cf. Ps. 14, § 89 and § 97] thus: "Their way is vain destruction and harm" 2c. Thus they are oppressed by much misfortune, made a back; and yet, unhappy in that which should be for their good, they run into the sinews that are strained and directed against their countenances wherever they turn.

(38) This, in my opinion, is the meaning of this verse, which seems to me to fit the context very well. For after he had said that they should be cut off from among the children of men, and be burdened and afflicted with all calamities, because they deserved it by thinking evil against Christ, which they were not able to perform, it rightly follows that they should be made a back, and that the sinews should be strained against their faces, because they should not cease. to think evil against him, as they have once begun to do; and

The more they are anxious about it, the more they are oppressed, seeking nothing else than that Christ may be destroyed and that they may be preserved. Thus, the judgment of God does not cease to oppose them and to direct its longings against this face and this effort of theirs, so that they always undertake many things, but in vain, indeed, they work themselves into ever greater misfortune.

Hosea 5:12-15 says: "I am a moth to Ephraim, and a maggot to the house of Judah. When Ephraim felt his sickness and Judah his wounds, Ephraim went to Assyria and sent to King Jareb, but he could not help you or heal your wounds. For I am as a lion to Ephraim, and as a young lion to the house of Judah. I, I rend them, and go away, and lead them away, and none can save them. Again I will go to my place, until they know their iniquity, and seek my face." Thus he foretold Ps. 8, 3. that the enemy and the avenger should be destroyed. For what does this hardened people seek to this day but vengeance on Christ? and yet it succeeds in nothing. It feels the burden of its back, it feels the resistance against its face: nevertheless they do not want to become wise even so, because the Lord has made them so.

39 Now let us look at the saying, "With your sinew you will aim." In Hebrew this is expressed by a verbum without closer relation (absolutum), in this way: Thou shalt aim, thou shalt be the steerer, or thou shalt give direction to thy sinew against its face. And that he says rather that the sinew be directed than that the bow be directed, indicates the quickness and the presence of the calamity. So it is also said in Ps. 7:13 ff: "He hath bent his bow, and hath aimed, and hath laid thereon deadly projectile." For he quickly brings disaster upon them, as we see in experience. But how the bow, the string, the arrows signify the divine judgment and sentence, we have seen in the seventh Psalm 82 ff.] abundantly said.

Our Latin translation can be harmonized with it in this way, if we do not take reliquias [the rest] as the yeasts or anything very small, which is to be left after the best of it is taken, as it is commonly used, as the apostle says, that the rest of Israel shall be saved [Rom. 9:27.], that is, the yeast and the most reprobate of this people, as Isaiah calls them, but for that which is superfluous and too much, as we have said in the 17th Psalm, v. 14: "They have left their leftovers for their young." For this is what the Hebrew word actually means in this passage. Then the meaning will be: In reliquiis tuis praeparabis, that is, thou wilt have superfluous judgments and vengeance ready, with which thou wilt repay them to their face, whithersoever they may turn, that they may not undertake so great a thing against thee, that thou mayest not overpower it, and repay them still more, as in the 109th Psalm, v. 15. it is said of them, "The LORD must never let them out of his sight." 2c. But in this view it must be added to our Latin text in or contra, namely: "against (in) their face"; unless one wants to say that he prepares their face for the rest of him, that is, he judges them and everything they do, so that they are plagued continuously with his multiple vengeance, so that as he makes them his back, so he also makes their face the rest of him.

V. 14. Arise, O Lord, in your power, and we will sing and praise your might.

40 He says this in honor of Christ against the Jews, and concludes the psalm with a beautiful final speech, as if he wanted to say: They would that thou shouldst be oppressed in powerlessness, that they themselves might be exalted in their strength; and they would that thy kingdom and thy power should be humbled by all shame and blasphemy; but in vain and ungodly [do they intend this], because this is the brief epitome of all things: thou shalt be exalted in thy strength, and thou shalt be glorified in the power of thy kingdom; this we desire, and this we rejoice in. Those may howl, we will sing, and those may hiss and gnash their teeth, we will sing praises. That which sinners desire will come to nothing; your power and your kingdom will endure, for: "Your kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and your dominion endures forever," Ps. 145:13.

Among the many words of the Hebrew language that signify power or force, the two used in this verse are remarkable to me: XXX and XXXXX, the former of which actually denotes the faculty or natural force by which any thing is strong in its kind. The Greek interpreter sometimes translates this by but not constant; the Latin translator, who is also unstable, most often uses virtvirtusus, in German "Kraft". In this way we speak of the powers or efficacy of gems, metals, herbs, and other things. Thus Ps. 46:2 says, "GOD is our confidence and strength." And Paul calls 1 Cor. 1, 24. Christ "the divine power," and Rom. 1, 16.: "The gospel is a power of GOD, which makes blessed all who believe in it." Again Daniel, Cap. 8, 23, says of the Antichrist: Stabit rex fortis faciebas [There will arise a king mighty of gifts), 1) that is, whose power and (as it is said) all ability (posse) will consist in gifts, not in weapons or in word, but in appearance, ostentation and outward being and superstition, which Jerome translates: A king with an insolent face.

From this it is evident that the power of God in this passage is that power in which He is mighty in His saints through His Spirit, through which the saints are able to do everything that they are always able to do, since they have this power that is as natural and implanted in the word of God as fire has heat, and a stone has heaviness, and the like. Thus it is said of Christ in 2 Cor. 13, 3: "Who among you is not weak, but is mighty among you." Eph. 3:20: "But to him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or understand," that is, to him who has the ability and power, or to whom it is proper, to do more than we ask or understand. For he does not praise the manner of the will in GOD, but the manner of His being, since he says, "To Him who is able." Therefore, in Latin, even the verbum posse does not correspond to this word, since this often refers to to an ohngefähr or arbitrariness, as in Greek: according to its ἐξουσία²) Much weni

t is correct to translate it by fortitudo, as Ps. 24:8: Dominus fortis, dominus potens in proelio. For fortitudo [valor] has, in addition to natural strength, the secondary term of impetuosity and a very excited mind.

But this power means the calm and real (genuinam) ability of things, because they are able and do, as it were, of their own accord, everything that belongs to their nature, so that in this way "the power of God" means that we are able to do everything that we are and are able to do, through his gift. Thus the holy Virgin says [Luc. 1, 49]: "He has done great things for me, who is mighty," that is, who has all the powers of all.

44. But the other word, which the Greek translator sometimes, and not badly, renders by ἰσχυροῦς, the Latin by potentatus, as in the preceding Psalm, v. 7: In potentatibus salus dexteræ ejus. Ps. 150, 1. 2. "Praise him in the firmness of his power," that is, in his strength. "Praise him in his deeds" (virtutibus), that is, in his δυναστατεῖαι; this goes back to the Dominion, in German: [in his) "power". Thus it is said in Gen. 10, 8: "He began a

XXXX to be on earth", that is, "a mighty one", as Jerome translated. And again, v. 9: "This one was a hunter before the Lord," that is, he began to rule over others as a mighty hunter. For the Latin words robustus, fortis, potens are generally too impetuous and wild to be put together with these Hebrew words, as befits that iron regiment and tyrannical people, which, it seems to me, either Isaiah or his interpreter is wont to call "the people of deep (alti) speech," Cap. 33, 19. and Ps. 12, 5. is said: linguam nostram magnificabimus, which Jerome translates: roboremus, but would be more fitting: [Our tongue] we will bring to dominion (dominari faciemus), namely, that it alone may rule and be able to do all things. For it follows: "Who is our Lord?" And Ps. 24, 8: "The Lord mighty in the battle," that is, in whose power is the victory and all success in war. For it is the same for him to help by much or little [1 Sam. 14, 9.], as we have seen in the preceding Psalm [v. 8].

So it is a very beautiful order. First the strength is raised and afterwards the XXXXX is sung, because from the strength it arises; and then the power or XXXXX is easily increased and preserved, as on the other hand there is no XXXXX where there is no XX or virtus. And Ps. 24, 8. he says first, "The strong Lord," afterward, "mighty in battle." Of this power a father of the house is called XXXX, and a mother of the house Gen. 16, 8. "From the face of Sarah, XXXXX that is, my mistress, "I fled." And again [v. 9.], "Return again to thy XXXX," that is, to thy mistress. But Ps. 19, 6.: "She rejoiceth as a XXXX to run the way." And Ps. 33, 16.: "A king is not helped by his great power, and a XXXX is not saved by his great strength", in German: "A mighty LORD". Therefore Gabriel is called GOD's power (fortitudo Dei), but not even fitting.

(45) Another word [for strength] among the Hebrews is of which we have dealt with Ps. 18:2 [S5]: "Heartily I love thee, O Lord, XXXX, my strength." This seems to me actually to denote the strength of mind, which the Latins call fortitudo, the Greeks ἀνδρία. Of this, in the moral

Because it is brought about by encouragement and practice in difficult things, this word is almost everywhere translated by "courageous courage" (confortatione). Deut. 31:6, "Be of good courage, fear not." Likewise to Joshua the same is said, s5 Mos. 31, 23.], "Be of good courage and undaunted," and Jos. 1, 7. "Only be of good courage and very joyful." And in Daniel, Cap. 10, 18, 19. it is often used, "Thou hast strengthened me," 1) "I ermanteth me," 2c., likewise [Vulg.], "Be of good cheer, and be strong," where the same word is doubled [in the Hebrew], as if to say, "Be of good cheer, be of good cheer." And

Ps. 27:14 [Vulg.], "Harvest the LORD, be thou manly, and let thine heart be confident." Behold, he translates XXX by: "Be manly." Thus saith the prophet Hanani to Assa king of Judah, 2 Chron. 16:9: "The eyes of the LORD behold all the earth, that he may strengthen them which are in him with all their heart." Hence [from XXX] the prophet Ezekiel has his name: GOD's strength, or manly bold confidence (audacia) in GOD; and Hezekiah, king of Judah, bold confidence in the LORD. It is read that he had done enough for this name with a beautiful work, 2 Kings 18:7, since he dared, trusting in his God, to break away from the king of Assyria. From all this it is clear that XXX is the strength against the fear, the faintheartedness and the scrupulousness of the mind.

The fourth word is XXX, which also occurs very often, and is translated by virtus. Of this I venture to say that it is quite actually the power which the apostle operations! [powerful effect], Greek ἐνέργειαν, since he calls 2 Thess. 2, 7. 11.

says [Vulg.]: "For the mystery of wickedness is effective" and: "God will send them the powerful effect of error." And Gal. 2:8: "He that was powerful with Peter (operatus est), the same was powerful with me." This we would call efficaciam in Latin, or, as it is usually said, vim executivam [the executing power), so that it is the effect of the aforementioned powers that now comes into operation. Thus Hezekiah says 2 Kings 19:3 [Vulg.], "The children are come to birth, but the woman that bare them hath no power"; in the Hebrew it is, "There is no power to bear." Dan. 8, 24.: "The king shall be mighty, but not by his power." Job 30, 2.: "Which fortune I thought to be nothing." This power belongs to the welfare of a mighty and strong man, so that he may put into effect what he has undertaken both according to his strength and according to his courage. For Paul predicted that the operation of the antichristic error would be powerful, and Dan. 8:24 also says: "He will succeed in accomplishing it.

47. the fifth is the general word [XXX] which he uses in this psalm [v. 12.]:

1) The text says oukortasti, but the Vulgate says eoutortavit.

"They could not carry them out." Gen. 45:1: "Then Joseph could no longer abstain." This seems to me to correspond quite actually to what we express in our Latin by facultas or possibilitas, and in Greek by δυνάμεις in which [the meaning of] right, will, outcome, success, is included, where the force, whether it be in the acting person or not, is nevertheless hindered or assisted in many ways, so that this may happen, or Let not that which is intended be done. Ps. 129, 2: "They have often pressed me from my youth, but they have not overpowered me" (non potuerunt). There are also other words derived from rock, bones, and hardness, which are found everywhere, and which are translated by firmness, steadfastness, strength. But I will leave them, because they are generally fancy words, so that another may also find a field for his diligence, if he wants to.

Here I conclude the second decade of the whole Psalter and freely and sincerely confess that I have undertaken very much beyond my strength and do not have this glory of the apostle, of which he writes to the Romans [Cap. 15, 18]: "I should not speak anything where Christ did not work through me. For by the holiness of my life I have gained nothing, though I know how necessary it was and is that I should not teach something before I did it. By my learning, however, I have gained little, since I have also been a student up to now, not only in the languages, but also in learning the prophetic spirit. For he who treats the Scriptures needs both, but the spirit more than the language.

Therefore, although I see that I have erred in more than one place in the Hebrew language, I fear that I may have erred in even more places in the spirit, although I am not aware that I have violated the true and Christian (catholicam) faith anywhere, so that I can boast that my errors are quite harmless, since in this language the most experienced and greatest, but in the spirit also the highest and holiest have erred.

¹) Therefore, I ask the scholars for the sake of Christ, in whom we share, to disregard what is mine, then also the Printers or any people who publish books, that they did not want to spread this until I or another have corrected some gross errors. For up to this point I have done enough, if it is found that I have given an impetus to wiser people, and have done what necessity requires. For the work that I have taken upon myself and the complaint I do not count highly.

(3) But this I have learned, that the Scripture is such that it disgraces and exceeds every man's ability (ingenium), learning, diligence, and holiness in many things, and while it is laid out to abundance (satietatem) for all, even for the underage, yet it always leaves the great hungry, so that Gregory rightly and wisely said that the Scripture is a water through which a lamb can wade, but an elephant must swim. And no one has erred more shamefully and corruptly in it than those who have presumed that they have erred in no part. And no one has progressed more happily and wholesomely in it than those who feared that they had erred in all things. For this is wisdom, the beginning of which is the fear of God, which gives understanding to babes and rejects the understanding of those who have understanding [1 Cor. 1:19].

4 Therefore, let every one who is my brother judge my errors in such a way that he does not doubt that he will also err somewhere, so that he does not become arrogant everywhere.

error. Rather, we want to give each other a helping hand in the Lord with all our strength, especially in the treatment of the Holy Scriptures; but even then we will not be able to avoid errors, as long as we are in this are unclean lives. But he who has been without sin in this life can boast that he has not erred in any thing. Farewell, my Christian brother, and may the grace of Christ be with you? Amen.

Luther's letter to Conrad Pellican at Basel.*)

[End of February] 1521.

To the man distinguished by godliness and scholarship, Conrad Pellican, Franciscan, his superior in Christ, Martin Luther sends his greetings.

That you praise my work on the Psalms in this way, I cannot accept; I fear that you have let yourself be guided too much by your goodwill. I, at least, do not like my interpretation of the Psalter at all, not only because of its meaning, for I believe that it is the right one, but also because of its prolixity, disorder and desolate, not well worked out mass. For it is a book that I have had to conceive, form, nourish and give birth to with one and the same labor, for lack of time and leisure. For a long time I have been thinking of revoking it. For by the living voice the listeners attain much light and pleasantness, which this desolate mass of letters neither has nor can grasp. If the 12th Psalm (Psal. X1) is not yet printed, I would like you to erase twelve lines at the end of the last page of Litera B with the three following lines of Litera C.
 1) For you see how shamefully I have erred there with the word XXXX. But I have not been with the thing and, as also otherwise often, with many a thought busy. For I am very much overwhelmed with business: I preach two sermons a day, I work on the Psalter, I have the postils (as they are called) under my hands, and I answer the enemies, and I fight against the bull in German and Latin, and defend myself; not to mention the letters that I write to friends.

and the matters that occur in the house and elsewhere. What else I have forgotten: Please, in the 14th Psalm (Psal. XIII) erase everything I dreamed about the word, twenty-six lines. 2) I shall take pains to apply a similar labor to the explanation of the words expressing a cognizance (intelligendi) as I have done in the 21st Psalm (Psal. XX) to the words denoting a power [Ps. 21, § 41 ff.]. Of many other errors, but of lesser concern, the book teems through the fault of the printer.

You do well to pray for me; I am oppressed by many evils and prevented from doing holy things; life is a cross to me. I have the twenty-second (vicesimum primum) psalm under my hands. I would like to give myself over to the hope that the Psalter could be completed if Christ would give peace, so that I could lay myself completely on it. But now not even the fourth part [of my time] serves the Psalter; indeed, I have to steal the time I spend on it. You rightly remind me that I should be restrained; I feel it myself, but I am not powerful. I am carried away, I don't know by which spirit, although I know that I don't want to harm anyone; but they also oppress me most furiously, so that I can't watch out enough for Satan. Therefore pray the Lord for me, that I may remember, speak and write what is good for him and me, not what is good for them, and live well in Christ. Wittenberg, 1521.

1) Marginal gloss of the Basel edition: "He is talking about the page number of the Wittenberg edition." - What is meant is the second paragraph of § 67 of the 12th Psalm, which we have marked with square brackets.

2) This refers to Ps. 14, § 73. We have put the relevant passage in square brackets.

The twenty-second Psalm. *)

V. 1. 2. A Psalm of David, to be sung by the hind who is hunted early. My God, my God, why have you forsaken me? I howl, but my pod is far away.

The title of this psalm is translated by the Septuagint as follows: In finem pro susceptione matutina, Psalmus David. But what caused them to make susceptionem or assumptionem out of hind, I cannot foresee. For the Hebrew text certainly has cervam aurorae in the feminine gender, though Jerome has translated it by cervum matutinum in the masculine gender; unless the Spirit in the Septuagint has wished to explain more clearly what the prophet has indicated somewhat obscurely. For Christ in his suffering (which is sung about in this psalm) accepted (assumpsit) or took upon himself (suscepit) all sins. And this assumption was an early one (susceptio matutina), that is, the first of all, which all saints follow, bearing one another's burdens. But it would be too much trouble if we wanted to use such remote things to defend the Septuagint, since we have the Hebrew text itself.

It is known that the Hebrew preposition is rendered in Greek by εἰς or ἐπί, in Latin by ad, in and super. Therefore we would say here rightly after prophetic manner: ad victoriam in cervam aurorae, as Peter Apost. 2, 25. says, "For David speaks of him," though it is not badly translated, "of the hind;" for all is said of him, and all refers to him, which is sung in this psalm, that when he would come he would fulfill it.

2. but a "hind" he calls without doubt the suffering Christ, because he was taken captive by the Jews in the time when he lived in the flesh and delivered to the Gentiles, that they tore him to pieces, as a hind is caught by the hounds and delivered to the hunters to be cut down. For this reason, I say, I hold that Christ is called a hind in this passage, to which also the whole psalm points, especially as it says [v. 17.], "For dogs have compassed me about, and the wicked have made themselves round about me."

(3) For Jerome's drawing here the manner of the deer, that it draws out the serpents with its breath (naribus) [from the earth] and kills them and consumes their poison, is indeed said quite well of Christ, but, as it seems to me, not in the right place, although Christ has indeed done this through his suffering. For it seems to me that the title indicates the suffering of Christ, not the fruit of suffering. The juxtaposition of the hind and the dogs is different from the juxtaposition of the serpents; in this encounter she conquers, in the other she suffers.

4 But he says rather appropriately "a hind" than a deer, so that he indicates that Christ had gone into suffering, since the apostles and disciples were already gathered as his young deer, that is, that he was already preaching, feeding and helping the people. Of this it is said in Proverbs, Cap. 5, 19: "She is lovely as a hind, and lovely as a deer. Let her love (ubera) satisfy thee at all times, and delight thyself in her love every way." For who is this "lovely hind" (cerva amantium, as the Hebrew text says) but Christ, who was exceedingly loving toward His own? And who are the lovely deer other than his disciples? But the breasts (ubera) of this hind are the words of eternal life, with which he feeds and satisfies all. On these, as Solomon commands, one should feast, lest that harlot [Proverbs 5:3] and stranger, the adulterous synagogue, whose throat is slippery, should be made to eat.

*) This Psalm, which is not found in our Basel edition, has been translated by us according to the Erlangen edition, comparing the Wittenberg and Jena editions. Subsequently, the Weimar edition has also been compared.

is as oil, and whose lips are as sweet as honey, entice anyone to death with her. For to this opinion he seems to me to speak in the whole chapter. Therefore David understands the time and the age (aetatem) and the doing (studia) of the suffering Christ in one word.

5. But, I ask you, what is aurorae [the dawn] or "early" (matutina)?

The most famous fathers have understood by it that "susceptionem" of the resurrection of Christ, which happened at the time of dawn on a Sabbath; others the susceptione matutina, the capture of Christ, which happened in the morning hour; others the cervia matutina, that is, the first and noblest of all Hinds, that is, Christ, the head and the most distinguished among the martyrs. Now those who draw the early (matutinam) knowledge in the word to the "early" (mans), as Augustine says about the first book of Moses, could make Christ out of the early Hind, who is man and God, so that they indicate in this title that the Son of God suffered and died. But I do not like any of these interpretations enough, and yet I do not know what to do in this darkness.

(6) I also want to indicate my thoughts. It seems to me that all prophets in general delight in the dawn and the setting of the sun, and have recognized God's secrets in it. Outstanding among these is that, Gen. 32, 24, where Jacob wrestled with a man until the dawn broke and he was blessed by him. And David says, 2 Sam. 23, 3. 4. "The righteous ruler among men, the ruler in the fear of God. And like the light of the morning, when the sun goes out in the morning without clouds." And Ps. 110:3: "Thy children shall be born unto thee as the dew out of the morning glow." Paul interprets all this in a glorious sense of Christ, Rom. 13:12: "The night is past, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and put on the armor of light." Therefore, the evening is the time of the law, of sin, of death, of the Old Testament, and the synagogue itself, in which the works of sin by the law became exuberant; but the early is the time of the gospel, grace, life, and the new testament, and therefore the dawn of the church, or the new people of the gospel.

Therefore it seems that David, as he used the word "hind" in a spiritual sense, so he also used the word "dawn" to draw the believing reader from a physical hind to the spiritual one, which should be Christ. For why else would the prophet rather speak of a hind of the dawn than of the hind of any other time? But Christ is the hind of the dawn, because he suffered and overcame the law, eradicated sin, conquered death, and has caused a new age (saeculum) and a new day to dawn, in which grace, life and blessedness have begun.

The meaning of this psalm is that it is spoken with reference to Christ, the author of the renewal of all things, after the old has been overcome through his suffering. Thus the night has passed, the dawn has come, and the day is at hand.

(9) This transition and change of night into day and of evening into morning has not been recognized by the Jews until this day, and has been fulfilled rather than they have heard that it is fulfilled. That is why David has shown them so darkly, so that by this title he might model their blindness, which they should read and not understand, unless by the Spirit as the right teacher the covering were taken away from their hearts. For as it was with their hearts, so it was with the Scriptures which were held up to them; for to them that are in darkness (obscuris) all things that are spoken and done are dark; to them that are enlightened siud nothing is dark. Therefore, we easily understand this title, which we could not make clear to those, no matter how much effort we would make them understand it and also be enlightened.

So much for the title. Now let us come to the Psalm itself.

(10) In order that no one might doubt that this whole psalm must be understood by Christ, he himself prayed the first verse of it on the cross, since, as it is written in Hebrews, he was the one who prayed it.

XXXXXX XXXX XXX XXX, that is:

"My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" There it is clear that by our Latin interpreters the word "my" has been omitted in the first place and [after Deus meus] respice in me has been added. And where they gave us the translation: Longe a salute mea verba delictorum meorum, the Hebrew text says: Verba rugitus mei, in that they have been deceived by the likeness of the word [XXXX with XXXX], which without X in the middle means "fault" and "ignorance," as we have seen in the title of the seventh Psalm and Ps. 19, 13. "Who can tell how often he fehlet (delicta)?"

(11) But that there is a special movement and opinion in these words is proved by the fact that the evangelists have deliberately rendered this verse with Hebrew words in order to indicate the extraordinary emphasis. I do not remember that in any other place in the Scriptures the word is doubled. For that it is said by others that mankind was not abandoned, that is, separated from the Godhead, but that the help of the Godhead was withdrawn from it, is quite rightly said, but for the simple-minded, to whom it is useful that such high things are wrapped up in low words according to their comprehension. For indeed, that mankind is left without the help of God is spoken more darkly than what the words themselves contain, namely, that he is abandoned by God. For who can make that help sufficiently clear, since the coarse people think of that alone as help, if God had snatched Christ out of the hands of the Jews by miraculous signs? But this is irrelevant for this verse.

(12) I see some very peevish people who, as soon as they have had to do with something very difficult and hidden 1) or have heard about it, immediately boast about it everywhere in front of (coram) everyone, only in order to be regarded for bringing forward new and wonderful things, making no choice at all, nor taking into consideration, neither the things, nor the listeners, nor the places. Since the untimely wisdom of these people is not

If they keep a moderate attitude toward themselves (Rom. 12:3), they give many people trouble without cause and bring no small amount of bad name to the Word and our preaching ministry. If they served Christ according to the measure of their gifts, they would have enough superfluous things to teach with benefit, and would hold in honor the many graces of God as good stewards. These people have really brought it about that I have begun to fear and have an aversion to dealing with such things that go beyond common understanding, especially with things that are not particularly necessary for the common people to know. 2)

(13) We know that theology must be common to all believers, but again we also know that some enjoy only milquetoast, while others can eat solid food, and that one and the same truth is apprehended in different ways, for it is not possible to accommodate all these ways to the grasp of all, while not depriving them of the truth itself. For Paul does not want the weak, who are tormented by concerns about ceremonies, to be vexed by examples and teachings of those who are strong in faith. But what am I dwelling on this for long? It is a long way that goes through the commandments; love has a short way, and could easily teach us everything in all things.

14 But I want to say something so that I do not completely ignore such a rich verse. First of all, we cannot understand what it means to be "forsaken by God" any better than by first knowing what God is. God is life, light, wisdom, truth, justice, goodness, power, joy, honor, peace, blessedness and all that is good. On the other hand, to be forsaken by God is to be in death, in darkness, in foolishness, in lies, in sin, in wickedness, in weakness, in sadness, in shame, in discord, in despair, in damnation and in all evil. What

2) In the original edition: praesertim soitu HON neessariis aäeo non sunt vul'o. In the Wittenberg one as well, but aüeo non sunt vul'o is missing. In the Jena, Weimar, and Erlangen: kraesertina Huae seitu neaeskaria aüeo non suvt vuiM.

1) Jenaer: elbAerint instead of: vMrint.

Does it follow from this? Will we not make Christ a fool, a liar, a sinner, a wicked, a despairing, and a damned man? This is what I said, that this is hidden and difficult.

(15) But see for thyself. It is admitted by all that in Christ there was at the same time the highest joy and the highest sorrow; likewise the highest weakness and the highest strength, so also the highest honor and the highest dishonor, likewise the highest peace and the highest strife, the highest life and the highest death, which also this verse sufficiently indicates, where he, as it were in contradiction to himself, exclaims that he is forsaken by God, and nevertheless calls him his God, and thereby confesses that he is not forsaken. For no one says to God, "My God," who is completely forsaken. If, then, some parts of God (that I say so) have forsaken Christ, why should one not say that all and the whole of God has forsaken him? For there is nothing here to contradict this but the custom and the opinion of the common man. For what else could be more inconsistent, even for the pagans, before conviction gained the upper hand, than to say that the same man lives at the same time in the highest life and dies at the same time in the highest death?

What then shall we say? That Christ is at once supremely righteous and supremely a sinner, at once supremely a liar and supremely true, at once supremely rejoicing and supremely despairing, at once supremely blessed and supremely damned? For if we do not want to say this, I do not see how he is forsaken by God, since in this way many of the saints, Job, David, Hezekiah, Jacob, have been forsaken, much more Christ, the head of the saints, who bore all our sickness [Is. 53, 4.] in his own person.

(16) My heart is like this: Christ was righteous in fact and remained so, since he did not commit sin, nor was deceit in his mouth [Is 53:9]. For this cause he conceived and was born of the virgin by the Holy Ghost, that he might be without all sin: for how else could he have delivered us from sin? But in the time that he suffered, he took away all our

He took our sins upon himself as if they were his own, suffered for them what we should have suffered for them, and what the damned already suffer, as Paul says from the 69th Psalm, v. 10 [Rom. 15, 3]: "The reproach of those who revile you has fallen upon me." And Isa. 53, 4. 8. 9. "Forsooth, he bore our sickness, and took upon him our pains. For the iniquity of my people have I smitten him, though he hath committed no sin, neither hath there been deceit in his mouth."

(17) Since the smiting of God, with which He smites for sins, is not only the punishment of death, but also the fear and terror of a troubled conscience, which feels the eternal wrath, and stands as if it should be eternally forsaken and rejected from the presence of God, as David confesses Ps. 31:23, "I said in my anguish, I am cast out of thy sight," it certainly follows inevitably that he [Christ] also suffered the fear and terror of a troubled conscience that tasted eternal wrath. For the apostle says Hebr. 4, 15. that he was tempted in every way, as we are, yet without sin, and again [Cap. 2, 17. ? "He had to become like his brethren in all things, that he might be merciful." The apostle also teaches this in Gal. 4, 0 4. 5. "He was put under the law, that he might redeem those who were under the law." And again [Gal. 3, 13. ? "Christ became a curse for us, that he might redeem us from the curse of the law." For he was not merely put under the ceremonial law, otherwise he would have redeemed the Jews alone, and not the Gentiles, who were not included under it; nor was he put under the law of the holy ten commandments (decalogi) in such a way that he should only fulfill it, but that he might suffer what those who are under the law suffer. For to be under the spiritual and governing law is to be killed and condemned, or to be in death and hell, that is, to feel death and hell, 2) which moves to the highest hatred of the law and blasphemy.

1) In the Latin editions: 3.

2) Wittenberg and Weimar: s^ntiri instead of: ssntirs. The sense of both readings is the same.

Thus the word "to be a curse" does not merely mean that he is cursed before men (for Paul indicates there [Gal. 3:13] that Moses is speaking in a general saying that is also said in reference to Christ: "Cursed is everyone with God who hangs on wood"), 1) but that he feels in his conscience that he is also cursed by God. In such anguish of heart he speaks this word Ps. 3:3: "Many say of my soul, 'It has no help from God.'" For he complains that the word of those who revile him has penetrated his soul, which would not happen if his soul did not feel that God was angry. For what evil does not a conscience fear? But what kind of inconsistency is it that Christ is said to have been in fear of his conscience for a short time, so that he felt this misery of ours, even though innocent?

(19) We are indeed tormented by the same chastisement, but in such a way that guilt is indeed connected with it. To make this clearer: sin has a twofold nature in us; for [first] while it is accomplished, it is not felt as sin, which is the very worst thing about sin, namely, forgetting and despising God; for here the law still rests, and sin is dead. But [secondly] when the law comes, sin comes to life again, remorse sets in, and there is no peace in our bones from our foolishness [Ps. 38, 4. 6.]. This is the knowledge of sin through the law, and the spiritual revelation of the law. This is what the damned have, this is death and the descent into hell. Christ suffered this sin, not the former. Of this Paul says 2 Cor. 5, 21: "He made him that knew no sin (behold, this is the conscience, which is not guilty of the former sin) to be sin" (behold, this is the conscience, which was made and accepted for us concerning sin).

(20) But in this also Christ is different from us; for we, but much more the ver-

We bear the wrath of sin and the law in such a way that we sin at the same time, because we, poisoned by the former sin, in ungodly selfishness declare it to be evil and unjust that we suffer, and as in every other sin we sin unknowingly, that is, we do not feel how evil we act in judging in this way. But Christ, who is not poisoned by any sin, does not feel sorrow at suffering out of ungodly selfishness, and has an abhorrence of it, but out of pure, unadulterated tenderness of his innocent nature.

(21) Take a rough example: We, who are corrupted by an ungodly inclination to lust, abhor the coldness of the body and the objects that are unpleasant to our senses, not making concessions both to our nature and to our lust and the infirmity of nature, but Christ abhorred the same objects without any evil inclination, only according to the disposition of His completely uncorrupted nature. We do not enjoy more delicious foods without the infirmity of our innate evil desire, Christ enjoyed them without the infirmity of desire, solely in the sweetness of His nature, acting in all things just as Adam would have acted in Paradise, suffering all things without sin. Paul calls this figure in Christ (Hebr. 4, 15.) a suffering like that of other people, but without sin. Everything is completely the same, but in him there was no sin at the same time, which is with us in all things at the same time.

(22) In the same way, we would not bear "My God, why hast thou forsaken me?" and all the wrath of the law without murmuring and blasphemy, namely, by seeking what is ours from a completely hidden fault. But Christ spoke and bore the same without murmuring and blasphemy, and therefore what 3) is murmuring and blasphemy with us, was with Christ in all things the same as with us, yet was not murmuring and blasphemy, so that we may say that if what was in Christ were placed in us in all things in the same way, it would be blasphemy and murmuring, whereas with him it would be was nothing other than a certain movement of the weak nature, which was equal to our blasphemy and grumbling in all pieces.

(23) For Christ could not sin or do evil, though the things which he did, if we did them, would be sins indeed. And this is not to be wondered at, since, as I have said, even the works which he did would be sins if we did them, though in all things they would be quite like them. He ate, slept, walked, watched, and did all things without sin; if we do the same, we sin in all things. For he was a good tree, we are evil trees; as the person is, so is the work.

24. Now this word: "My God, why have you forsaken me?" is similar to blasphemy against God, but it is not blasphemy. Therefore, if we were to say that Christ became a blasphemy against God, as some translate the saying Deut. 21:23: A hanged man is blasphemy against God, or a hanged man is a reproach against God, about which Jerome says much in the interpretation of the Epistle to the Galatians, we would say it in the same sense in which the word [Gal. 3, 13. 2 Cor. 5, 21.] is spoken, "He was made a curse," and, "He was made sin," because he felt blasphemy, curse, sin in himself without blasphemy, without curse, without sin, which in us would be blasphemy, curse, and sin, which in truth blasphemed, cursed, and sinned. So even Christ is immersed in all ours, as the 69th Psalm, v. 10., and Rom. 15, 3. says: "The reproach of them that revile thee is fallen upon me."

25 Here the objection is raised: If this is true, Christ does not seem to have loved God with all his might; for since he says, "Why have you forsaken me?" he certainly opposes his will to God's will, as he also says in the garden, "Not as I will, but as you will." [Matth. 26, 39.], where he apparently says that he wants what is contrary to the will of God, so violently that he must break this will of his with great strength, even with bloody sweat, and submit it to the will of God. If we did this, would we not be justly accused of being in conflict with God's will through the highest had sinned sedition and the greatest disobedience against God?

(26) But here also is the highest and greatest movement of the innocent, weak nature, which we cannot have because we are leavened with vicious self-love; and if we had it, the intervening of this leaven would immediately give rise to rebellion and disobedience. A clean hand touches clean linen and does not defile it; an unclean hand cannot but defile, because everything is clean to the clean, but nothing is clean to the unclean.

Thus Christ loved the Father with all his strength, but those torments, because they went beyond his strength, forced the innocent and weak nature to groan, to cry out, to be frightened and to flee, just as a beam, when it is burdened beyond its strength, cracks (crepat), out of the necessity of nature, not because of its fault. But even if we suffer beyond our strength, we do not love God out of all our strength by suffering even beyond our strength, because the strength is not pure. Do not the damned suffer beyond their strength? And yet, what they make sound (crepant) is blasphemy. Also what Christ suffers is beyond his powers, and yet what he makes heard (crepat) is not blasphemy, but an innocent cry, yet similar to our blasphemy.

(28) But by this we do not deny that Christ was not afflicted and afflicted in any other way than we or the damned, when they feel that they are affrighted and flee from God. For Christ also in His own eyes was like one forsaken, one accursed, a sinner, a blasphemer, a reprobate, though without sin or guilt. For it is not a mockery, or jest, or hypocrisy, that it should be said, "Thou hast forsaken me." He was in truth forsaken in all things, as a sinner is forsaken after he has sinned; though he was not forsaken as a sinner is forsaken before he sins. It is the truth of what happened in Christ, and one must not diminish and empty the revealed words of God out of human presumption.

29 If anyone does not understand this, then

Let him remain with the multitude on this level field, and let the disciples go to Christ on the mountain. For these things in this psalm are not said for all, since not all have the same gifts, nor the same afflictions. The Scripture has milk for the little children in the right place; it also has wine and solid food for the strong. As the weak have their comfort from the Scriptures, so also the strong and those who suffer great things must be given their comfort.

(30) This we have done with many words, so that we may be the more commanded by the grace of faith and the mercy of God, and may know Christ the more fully. For in this verse those are instructed who are tormented with the depths of the abyss and the gates of death, lest they despair; again, those who handle heavenly things and build their nests among the stars, lest they be presumptuous. For if the wrath of the law, namely death and hell, seizes and terrifies anyone, he will be upheld by this verse, as it were, as by a trustworthy rod, mindful of his Lord Christ, who, tempted with the same temptation, learned. To have compassion on all who are afflicted, since it was not because of his affliction, but precisely because of this affliction of ours, that he took these afflictions upon himself with will and knowledge, out of grace, into which [afflictions] we are immersed without our will and without our knowledge, by birth.

(31) For those who are surrounded with the pains of death and hell have no remedy more readily at hand and more secure than the remembrance of this victorious weakness and of Christ, faith and invocation; faith, I say, in which you believe that he has suffered such things for you and for this your need, that he might heal your affliction, and that you confidently invoked him for this very reason, lest he should say of you the word Isa. 49:4, "I have labored in vain, and spent my strength in vain and useless." For how could he not have labored in vain, and done his works in vain, if we did not trust in them, and did not call upon him in due season?

call? Therefore, according to the advice of the evangelists, let us keep the words of this verse, which are highlighted with a very special mark, as it were, since they are even written with Hebrew words, in the innermost heart for the time when we need them.

32 [Vulg. "Far from my help are the words of my howling." How if in this place there were a confusion of words (hypallage)? for which there should have been said: Far from the words of my howling is my help. The meaning of this would be: The help Hori not, it does not come, since it is called by my howling, so far it is, because you have left me. For so the following verse seems to require: "My God, in the day I call, you do not answer", explaining this verse as it were.

But without figure and better for the context, it is understood in such a way that the one who is abandoned by God comes far away from God, with whom alone there is help; but God does not come far away from anyone, since he is present everywhere. Therefore also Christ, both he himself and his words, since God leaves him, comes far away from his help, which was in God and remained near, so that you must imagine a kind of departure of Christ, who turns away very far from God, who leaves him. For to be forsaken by God means to go from life and salvation to the distant region of death and hell, which no one can grasp who is not in the same distress. For who could believe that this could exist together, that salvation in God is very near, and in us exceedingly far? For if it were not near, he would not say, "My God." If it were not far away, he would not say, "You have forsaken me."

34 Therefore we are far from help when we suffer, but he is near to help us. For what is impossible for us and quite desperate for us is possible and easy for him, so that the whole distance is on the side of our suffering, that is, abandoned weakness, which is nothing other than the very feeling of suffering.

35 But, as I have said [§ 29 ff.], we must give this [as a consolation] to those who are in suffering and are subject to the movements of their hear-

It is not enough for some of the fathers to have Christ's divinity or humanity speak here, and to understand not Christ's help but that of the people. For one must believe that in this entire psalm Christ speaks as man.

(36) But why does he not say, I am far from my help, but [Vulg.], "The words of my howling," since he did not say: Thou hast forsaken the words of my howling, but "me"? Perhaps to set right or explain what he said, "Thou hast forsaken me." For since GOD is a GOD who is near, and not a GOD who is far away, as Jeremiah [Cap. 23, 23.] says, He does not forsake in such a way that He does not remain near, and hold [us] in His hand, as it says in the 139th Psalm, vv. 8-10. "If I lead to heaven, you are there. If I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there also. If I stayed at the uttermost sea, thy right hand would hold me there" 2c. Only the movements of the heart and the words of howling are such that they indicate that they are far from God, that is, although He is very near, they do not feel Him. Thus, we seem to be far from each other, while only the movements of the heart, the howling and the words are far from God, that is, as long as they do not feel what they want and desire. But, as I have said, I am under the words of this psalm, I do not grasp them sufficiently, and even if I could grasp them, I would not be able to recite them sufficiently.

37 But he rather says "afar off" than long, because the prophet foretold the vehemence of the torture, not the long duration, knowing that he would only lack a little time of the angels, Ps. 8, 6. [Vulg. Cf. Ps. 8., § 67 f.], namely for three days. But the alien sight and the nuance of this abandonment and remoteness, an unbearable evil, compels him to howl and to raise a strong cry. That is why he did not say "words of crying" but "words of howling", expressing the most bitter and inexpressible groaning of the spirit.

From this part of the verse shines out what we said in 19 ff.] that Christ was made sin for us, that since God forsook him, he was without blame in

He became like your worst sinner in all things, to whom nothing but the wrath of God fell into his conscience and drove him to despair.

39 Those who read: Verba delictorum meorum [with the Vulgate, cf. § 10] (which they may do, since the letter, as in other places, may here be an accidental one), understand it to mean that he made our sins his sins, so that he might make his righteousness our righteousness, as Augustine says. Thus verba delictorum meorum will mean approximately what is now expressed by: the sinner's prayer. Only one should have been careful not to call Christ a sinner, even though he confessed his sins and they had become his own in truth.

(40) Now, if someone wanted to take all of this passage verbs according to Hebrew for "matter" (re) and "trade" (negotio), so that verba delictorum Christi would be the trade and the earned reward (merita) of his sins, I would not object; the earned reward is indeed ours, as well as the sins, but Christ's are the sins and not the reward. For the evil that the sins deserved he bore, and so made foreign sins his own, as Isaiah Cap. 43, 24. says: "Yes, you have made my work in your sins, and have given me trouble in your iniquities.

(41) And this is the rich mystery of divine grace toward sinners, that by a strange change our sins are now no longer our sins, but Christ's, and Christ's righteousness is not Christ's, but our righteousness. For he emptied himself of the same, that he might clothe and fill us with it, and filled himself with ours, that he might empty us of it, so that Christ is now not merely objective (as they say) our righteousness, but also formaliter, just as our sins are not merely in substance (objective) Christ's sins, but also in essence (formaliter). For as he feels pain in our sins and is put to shame, so we find joy and boast in his righteousness; but he bears the pain in them in fact and essentially (formaliter), as we see here.

42. and I too would almost rather read:

Verba delictorum meorum, as: Verba rugitus mei, although of all interpreters only the Septuagint should keep it with me. For here the bridegroom and the bride become one flesh. This mystery can never be sufficiently told, preached, heard, thought, and understood because of the greatness of its riches and glory. It is entirely hidden from all men of this world, even from the wise and prudent, and is revealed only to babes, to whom alone it is a constant memorial by which they live, in which they rejoice and glory. In comparison, the righteousness that comes from the law, even the righteousness that goes unpunished, is a disgraceful filth, dirt and shame, as Phil. 3:8 says.

V. 3. My God, I call by day and you do not answer, nor am I silent by night. 1)

43 And here I wonder where the Septuagint might have taken εἰς ἄνοιαν, ad insipientiam or to nonsense (amentiam), since in this place the Hebrew text contains nothing, neither according to similarity, nor according to the derivation of the words (etymologiae), which could imply nonsense. But it would be a violent spiritual interpretation if one wanted to understand nonsense by "silence," since this is a nonsensical and foolish person who, overcome by suffering, is silent in praising God, while God has commanded that one should sing to Him at night, and He wants to be called upon and praised in tribulation, as it says in the 50th Psalm, v. 15: "Call upon Me in trouble."

44 Our ancestors, especially Augustine, understood this to be a speech, not of the head [Christ], but of the members, who are not heard when they are in tribulation. But this, that they are not heard, serves them for salvation and wisdom, not for condemnation and foolishness, that is, it is good that one not be heard, so that man may learn by experience that God is a physician, which he would not learn, but would remain senseless, if he were heard immediately and not left.

1) Vulgata: D6US IN6U8, elamado per di6m er HOQ 6XLudi68, 6t Q06t6, 6t non ad ill8ixi6ntiLli mini.

(45) I pass over many other things that have been drawn here by the fathers, all of which are unsound and contradict themselves. For they also labored, but labored nothing, and left us both the words and the mysteries of this psalm unworked. I am looking for the simple meaning, which can also be referred to the head Christ. To him it was profitable that he should not be heard, and the crying which was not heard was not unto him for foolishness, but for wisdom. "For he learned obedience by that which he suffered (as the apostle says in the Epistle to the Hebrews [Cap. 5, 8])."

46 For it is not as Augustine says that a man learns wisdom when he is not heard, but rather the opposite: when a man has been in tribulation and has been heard, then he learns how good the tribulation is. For those who have been challenged and saved know how good the Lord is, but those who have been challenged and forsaken (which is the point of the words of this verse) do not.

Therefore, we will come to the Hebrew text, which says: "Neither is there silence with me at night. This Jerome, deceived by the Jew Aquila, draws with a great and purposeless (infelici) amount of words that God was not silent against Christ, but heard him, making the meaning of the latter part the opposite of the former, as if God did not hear him by day, but heard him by night.

(48) I say this so that we may know that the holy fathers were men, since this silence refers to Christ, and this is the meaning, that he cried out day and night, and was never heard. For he wants to say, "There is no silence for me," that is, there is no one who hears me, comforts me, and causes my weeping and my crying to be silenced and to cease, but I am forced to cry out without ceasing by day and by night, just as if you were relentless and unforgiving. You do not hear, and I do not cease to cry out; so that this verse contains a repetition of the same thing (sit tautologicus).

49. now Augustine meets more void, because he about the grace of the New Testament to the Honoratus, at least the general sense of this psalm 1) (although he turns almost every verse and every single word back and forth in a whimsical way), that in this psalm the difference of things in the New and in the Old Testament is described. For these sufferings are peculiar to the new testament, that one may not obtain salvation that he may find a better resurrection, and be forsaken unto death that he may obtain the life to come, as it is also said in Ps. 44:23, "We are slain daily for thy sake, and are esteemed as sheep for the slaughter." Thus the two things belong in the New Testament: death in this life, and life in the glory to come.

50. In contrast, the things of the Old Testament were also suffering, but only in goods and in the body, to the danger of life and poverty. But God gave them fathers, judges, military leaders, kings, through whom he saved them and preserved them in this life and the goods of this world, so that their leaders were leaders of earthly life, riches and earthly glory, as the leaders of the church can be called leaders of death, lack and shame. Not as if there were not also in that testament people who excelled in the things of the New Testament, but that it was so with the condition of the whole people, in which there were some people who were like the figure of the New Testament, as the prophets who were killed by the wicked; yes, Abel was the first member of the New Testament, just as, on the other hand, in the New Testament many excel in the things of the Old Testament, suffering many things and yet overcoming in this life. But the condition of the New Testament itself is such that it has only the defeated, the slain, the desecrated and the forsaken.

51] This is why he cries out here that he is abandoned, far from help, that he is not heard, that he is not silent, and yet afterwards [v. 4 ff], comparing the things of the Old Testament with himself, he says that those cried out and were heard, that they had hoped.

and were saved, that they had hoped and were not put to shame; just the opposite of all this happened to him and his own.

52) Since Christ is the prince and the beginning of the new testament and the head of the new people, that is, of the people that is to be killed, abandoned and defiled, and as the title [of this psalm] says, the hind of this dawn, he also had to experience and suffer this first of all, that he was abandoned and not heard, and thus showed the new appearance of things and the new form of the people to the world, which no one before him was able to do, however much he might have been of the same form. For it was reserved for him, after the Holy Spirit was sent into the world, not only to die himself, but also to show publicly that the condition of his people was like him, and that his whole church would not suffer for a time like the synagogue, but would die and be buried entirely with him.

By this one gets a clear view into the horrible spectacle that today under the rule of the pope in the whole world not even a trace of the church is left, at least as far as one can see, but that that corrupter, the Antichrist, has devastated everything and has not even left the form of the synagogue, and has rebuilt everywhere more than worldly form, and has rebuilt Jericho, which was once cursed [Jos. 6, 26.], rebuilt it, about which he lost his first and his youngest son [1 Kings 16, 34.].

(54) Now it remains how this is to be understood, that Christ cried by day and by night, since he cried this out only once at the ninth hour on the cross; and I do not allow that any part of this psalm is said of Christ in the person of his members, which many of the fathers have asserted, but I will draw it all on his own person. We can say, since in Hebrew the indicative of the future tense is used as an optative, that in this place it is an optative by its force, which emphatically indicates the movement of the heart of the one who is forsaken, in this way: So utterly hast thou forsaken me, and so far from

1) Cf. Ps. 8:s72.

My help are the words of my howling, that though I may cry or cry day and night, yet my crying would be in vain, because thou hearest not; and I cannot keep silence, but must perforce die and go down to hell; wherewith he again confesses that he feels eternal wrath.

V. 4. But thou art holy, who dwellest under the praise of Israel. 1)

The Hebrew text reads word for word like this: Et tu sanctus, habitator, laudes Israel, where according to the Hebrew peculiarity in the second part of the verse the conjunction et must be inserted, in this way: Habitator et laudes Israel. For the prophet says in the plural agitator, hymns, poems, songs. He praises GOD with three names: "You are holy", and "you who dwell", and "the praise of Israel". But what will be the meaning? I hold that this is said in a quarrel, in this way: I am forsaken and made far off, I am given into the hands of sinners, and subject to all evils, as he says below [v. 7.], "I am a worm and. no man, a mockery of men and contempt of the people." But thou art holy, honorable, and unapproachable, who hast set thy tabernacle on high, that no evil may befall thee [Ps. 91:10].

56. for in this way that which is set apart is called holy in the Scriptures, and is kept away from with fear and reverence, and is not approached sacrilegiously; as it happened to Moses at the fiery bush, Ex 3:5: "Remove your shoes, for the place where you are standing is a holy land." And 1 Sam. 6, 20: "Who can stand before the Lord, such a holy God?" Jos. 24, 19.: "You cannot serve the LORD, for he is a holy GOD." The Hebrew text has: XXXXX XXXXX XX in the plural.

(57) So to be holy and to be a worm, to be separate and not to be a man, to be unapproachable and to be a mockery of men and a contempt of the people, is very strong against each other; this serves to make the complaint great.

58. similarly, that he calls him: "The you dwell," that is, you are one who sits securely in peace and quiet, while he, on the other hand, is forsaken, in fear, flight, and unrest, is extremely frightened, has nowhere to go, and, as he says, cannot be silent, for there was no peace in his bones [Ps. 38:4]. It is a great sensation of anguish peculiar to this affliction, and known to none who have not experienced it, as Hezekiah also, who suffered the same, complains, Isa. 38:11, saying, "I said, Now must I no more see the Lord, yea, the Lord in the land of the living; now must I no more behold men with them that live in their time."

59 But he says, "The praise of Israel," because, as we 49 ff. have said, and will become clear from the following verses, so dealt with the people of Israel that he always saved them in life, and did not let them go to death and hell; and the prophet seems to have taken this passage from the words of Moses, Ex. 15:2: "The LORD is my strength and my praise, and is my salvation." But he left Christ in such a way that he had to go to death, where there is no one to remember him [Ps. 6, 6.], and to hell, where no one gives thanks and praise to God. Thus also Hezekiah speaks, since he says in the above-mentioned passage [Isa. 38, 18.]: "For hell does not praise you, so death does not praise you."

(60) And here we see clearly that Christ suffered the punishment due to sins, and that he tasted death and hell. For for what reason and necessity should he call God "the praise of Israel" if this had not happened, because he, most vividly affected by the sensation of the torment of hell, feared that he would not be like the praising Israel, and would not be able to say: "The Lord is my strength and my praise, and is my salvation"? For this is the greatest concern of those who suffer this fear, that they would curse and blaspheme God with the damned, to whom they feel themselves made like, as we have seen in the 6th Psalm, v. 6.

(61) And since here he cites strange praise and is silent about his praise, he shows how close and similar he is to the damned who curse. And just this also increases the

1) Vulgate: Ia untern in saneto iuditas, luns Israel.

Lamentation and the pain that Israel, which has been saved so many times, has praised the Lord, but He, completely forsaken, has come into danger not to praise but to curse.

62. So he struggles in a great battle to endure with Israel as a praiser, even though he is not preserved with Israel, and to grant God holiness, even though he is defiled by the hands of sinful men and devils as the most worthless thing on earth, and that he praise God as the one who dwells in tranquility, even though he is most frightened by the most inactive fear and the most restless movements of his heart, and is like dust before the wind, which has nowhere to dwell nor to abide.

63 Our Latin translation can easily be drawn to this opinion, since it is the same "dwell in the sanctuary" as "be holy" and one "who dwells there. But the fact that the Hebrew text has laudes Israel where we have laus Israel is due to the peculiarity of the languages. For he wants to show that Israel has often been saved, so that it praises God, but he is completely abandoned, so that he cannot praise as a dead and damned person, since the dead (as the wise man says [Sirach, Cap. 17, 26.]), as those who are no more, cannot praise. And this lamentation he now carries out more extensively and richly, saying:

v. 5. 6. Our fathers hoped in you, and because they hoped, you helped them out. They cried out to you and were saved; they hoped in you and were not put to shame.

64. These words are very similar to those that come from hatred and grumbling against God. For, although he is the same God, yet he heard and saved the fathers who hoped in him and cried out to him, but this one, who hopes in him and cries out to him, he rejects and abandons. For it is a very grievous thing, and a cause of great despair and cursing, that the same God should deal differently with one than with another, without any fault on his part; for such is the mind of him who is oppressed by this temptation.

It has a strong and great appearance, as if there is not a little unrighteousness in God. For so also the damned shall be God's...

accuse that, although everything is the same in men, he saves some and abandons others, only according to his will. You see, then, how here in Christ the temptation to blaspheme and curse looks through. For he was challenged in all things. And this very feeling, without his having consented to this challenge, compels him to break out into these words, so that he may overcome this challenge of ours in himself.

(66) Therefore, you are rightly the praise of Israel, because you have saved them so many times, since they hoped in you, making you their psalm and their song. But what are you to me, who also hope in you and cry out to you? He does not dare to say: You are not my praise; and yet this does not happen, by which he could be his praise. Thus he seems to consume within himself the temptation to blaspheme, which seemed almost to burst forth, swinging as it were between praise and blasphemy, and falling silent. For here the rod of comfort has fallen away, on which the people of Israel leaned and sang, Ps. 119, 52: "O Lord, when I remember how thou hast judged, I shall be comforted." And Ps. 77, 12, 13.: "I remember the deeds of the LORD, yea, I remember thy former wonders, and speak of all thy works, and tell of thy doings." Ps. 143, 5. "I remember the former times, I speak of all thy deeds, and say of the works of thy hands." For, armed with these thoughts, they overcame all evil, just as the people did 1 Macc. 4, 9.: "Remember how our fathers were saved."

67 But this hope is cut off from Christ and the Christians as it were from a weaver, and it is said to them, "Those have been saved, but you are forsaken," or as Peter says, 1 Pet. 4:1: "Because Christ suffered for us in the flesh, arm yourselves also with the same mind." It is a different suffering, a different comfort, a different help in the New Testament. So Christ goes back to the deeds of the Lord, and remembers his previous miracles, and says of his deeds [Ps. 77, 12. f.], but through this he does not gain any comfort, yes, he is even more afflicted, since everything is just the opposite; which tortures a fearful conscience unspeakably.

68 For just as it is said with truth: It is a joy to the miserable when they have comrades in their sufferings, and the example of someone who has suffered the same is very comforting, as Peter also says, 1 Pet. 5:9: "Know that these same sufferings are upon your brethren in the world," so on the other hand, being alone and suffering without an example, especially when it is inflicted by God's cause (which is felt by the one who suffers it), is a dreary torture. For here, the "evil eye" (as they say) is afflicted by the well-being of others and by its misery and is greatly indignant against God, as we read that it also happened to Job, who did not sin in all this, nor did he speak anything foolish against God; which was certainly an exceedingly great praise of his faith [Job 1:22].

69) But that he repeats so often: "They hoped", "they hoped", "they cried out", "they hoped", "you helped them out", "they were saved", "they were not put to shame", I believe it is because of the severity of the challenge, which this new way of their suffering, compared to the former adversities of the fathers, cannot sufficiently weep.

70 But if someone wants to distribute this to different times of the fathers, I have nothing against it. Perhaps this verse: "Our fathers hoped in you, and because they hoped, you helped them out," can be applied to the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, who, because they hoped in the Lord, were miraculously saved and preserved, as the 105th Psalm, v. 13-15, says: "And they went from nation to nation, from one kingdom to another nation. He let no man harm them, and punished kings for their sakes. Do not touch my anointed ones, and do not harm my prophets." And Deut. 32:10: "He led him and guarded him as the apple of his eye." 2c.

71 The other verse: "To you they cried and were delivered," may refer to the exodus of the people from Egypt and to the judges in Israel. For it is written of the children of Israel in Egypt [Ex. 2:23] that they cried unto the LORD, and their cry came before the LORD. In the book of Judges it is often said [Cap. 3, 9]: "Then they cried out to the Lord, and He raised up for them a Savior who delivered them," so that Ps. 106:43.¹) is said of the same: "He often delivered them."

(72) What is left: "They hoped in you and were not put to shame" refers to the time of the kings, especially Samuel, Saul and David, when this people happily accomplished many glorious things by trusting in their Lord, and were not only not oppressed to the point of crying out, as in the time of the judges, but spread their dominion everywhere as victors.

For this reason he also says: "They have not been put to shame," that is, they have come to glory and have been exalted, so that we must understand it in such a way that Christ understands in these three pieces [v. 5, v. 6a and v. 6b] all the histories of the fathers, from Abraham to Himself, in which the miraculous deeds of God shone forth, so that He might become the praise of Israel.

74) It is also to be noted, 2) that he says: "Our fathers", making himself like one of that people, because of the assumption of the flesh, according to which he was a right and natural son of the fathers, but not fleshly nor naturally begotten.

V. 7. But I am a worm and not a man, a mockery of men and a scorn of the people.

(75) That Christ is called "a worm" in this passage, that is, that he was born of the mother alone without a father, without man's assistance, "and not a man," that is, that he is God, as some of the fathers would have it, seems to me to be said here untimely, since he does not indicate here the manner of his birth, nor of his nature, but of his suffering as a pure man.

76. but I think he adopted the common way of speaking, after which we are accustomed to call those worms and maggots, which we call very despised and rejected, as also Job 25,³) 6. is said: "How much less a man, the maggot, and the child of man, the worm?" And Isa. 41, 14.: "So fear not, you little worm Jacob, you poor heap Israel." Again Job 17:14: "I call corruption my father, and the worms my mother and my sister."

For (to follow my spirit) a worm is not only a thing from which nothing can be hoped for and which cannot be used, but also something disgusting and an abomination, which is born in rottenness and stink, and lives and dwells in it.

78) Thus Christ, who was abandoned in shameful suffering, like a worm in rottenness, had no hope anymore, and was no longer of any use in the eyes of men, even an abomination and an abomination, because of the great repulsiveness and shame of the cross, just as the whole church, which is in despair because of similar suffering, as we have seen, is called a worm in Isaiah [Cap. 41, 14]. For this 1) verse depicts the attitude of men, who are angered and offended by the sufferings of Christ, for although these men seem good, the suffering and cross of Christ and His own stink before them, and are as filthy as a worm and decay, and are an abomination to them, as Moses exemplified when he fled from his staff, which was turned into a serpent, Ex. 4, 3.

(79) According to the same manner of speaking of the common man, he says: "And no man"; where the spirit was careful not to put the name of nature but that of power, lest someone should raise the slander that here the truthfulness of human nature is denied. For so we also say in our mother tongue of people who are very weak or despised: "[He] is no more worthy of a man." And Isaiah, Cap. 53, 3, calls him the most worthless among men, in order to express his weakness and uselessness among men, where he again speaks according to the attitude of men who contemplate the suffering of Christ, in whose eyes he already has no more value (virtutis), is not to be counted for a man, and seems to be completely lost.

80 But this he says (as he has indicated [§ 55]).

has caught) in the manner of a hader. He speaks: The fathers hoped, and you saved and preserved them; but me, who cries out and hopes, you trust so that I am a worm and not a man in the eyes of all, because those (as Augustine correctly interprets in this passage) again obtained salvation in this life; but the Lord was scourged, and no one came to his aid, he was scourged, and no one interceded for him, he was crowned with thorns, and no one took care of him, he was put on the cross, no one saved him. This is what Augustine says. For there was nothing of power in him, so that no man has been so forsaken. And not enough.

81. "The fathers hoped in you, and were not put to shame," yea, they are set in honor and made famous in all the world, as it is said of David, 2 Sam. 7, 9: "I have made you a great name, like the name of the great men of the earth." But Christ has become a mockery (opprobrium) of the people and contempt (abjectio) of the people, that is, such a thing which men flee as a disgrace, and are wont to wish upon others as something evil. As if he wanted to say: I have become a proverb and an example with which one wishes evil.

For opprobrium must be taken here as active and passive, namely, that by which men are reviled, and that by which they revile or revile one another, and one wishes evil upon another. Thus abjectio [rejection] is that by which they are rejected and reprobate, or despised and despise, which Paul 1 Cor. 4:13. states more clearly: "We are always as a curse of the world, and a sweep-offering of all men."

83. thus Christ became a curse, so that his disciples could not be reviled with any greater insult than that they were Christians, as Ps. 31:12 says: "I have become a great reproach to my neighbors, and an abomination to my kinsmen." And Ps. 88, 9: "My friends thou hast put far from me; thou hast made me an abomination unto them." And Ps. 69:9: "I am become a stranger to my brothers, and unknown to my mother's children."

For to this day and to the end of the world this mockery and contempt of Christ continues, which Paul calls the vexation of the cross of Christ, so that there are few who are not ashamed of him before men and are not offended at him, which did not happen with the fathers, who, saved from death, especially the ignominious death, always remained in honor and great esteem among men.

But we must pay attention to the emphasis of the words, and at the same time to the horror they evoke and the consolation they contain. He mentions "the people" and "the people" to whom he has become a mockery and a scorn. Who is not of the people? Who is not of the people? Who, then, does not take offense at Christ? It brings horror to look carefully at these words, and yet it is a comfort to know them for those who suffer similarly. The prudence of the flesh, the free will, the reason that has the best in mind, the natural powers and the like pretensions of men, what do they do? They consider Christ to be the highest disgrace, mockery, shame and curse. This is their preparation for grace. Where is the evidence of quantity, greatness and length on which the sophists rely, these wretched enemies of God's grace?

So you see that a confessor of Christ and a preacher of the gospel of God must be of such a nature that he is not surprised if all the people and the whole nation detest him and consider him an abomination; indeed, if they do not consider him an abomination, he is not yet a perfect confessor of Christ. For the proof of his salvation is that he is a mockery of men and a contempt of the people. For so also Jeremiah laments Cap. 20, 8: "The word of the Lord has become a mockery and derision to me daily." And Christ says [Matth. 10, 22.]: "You must be hated by everyone because of my name." And Matt. 5:11: "Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you, for my sake."

87 And it is to be noted that he speaks of the people and the people in an evil sense and in diminutive speech (per tapinosin), as.

Joh. 2, 25: "For he knew well what was in man." For he speaks of those whom we, as people generally do, consider to be good and godly people, since we see that they also applaud and adhere to the truth; as in Christ's time the common people praised and glorified God because of all the things that he did in a glorious way, as the gospels teach.

For as long as the truth reigns in glory and progresses happily, they pursue it with great heat and are favorable to it. Christ pictured these people in the likeness of the seed that fell on the rock, "which went out and withered, because it had no sap," Luc. 8:6. For this is how he himself depicts them, speaking [v. 13]: "But those who are on the rock are those who, when they hear it, receive the word with joy; and they have no root; for a time they believe, and in time of temptation they fall away." And Joh. 2, 23-25. he describes them very well: "Now when he was in Jerusalem at the feast of Easter, many believed in his name, because they saw the signs which he did. But Jesus did not trust himself to them, for he knew them all, and had no need that any man should bear witness of any man, for he knew well what was in man."

89. even though these people do not persecute the truth and are sorry when it is suppressed, they do not stand by it, but are ashamed of it, afraid, abandon it, keep silent and let it be suppressed, as we have quoted from the 31st Psalm, v. 12: "I am ashamed of my relatives", of whom Christ says Matth. 10, 32: "Whoever confesses me before men, him will I also confess before my heavenly Father. Luc. 9, 26.: Whoever is ashamed of me before men, I will also be ashamed of him before the angels of God. Therefore he calls them "people" and "nation" as if he wanted to say: "They are men and the useless multitude."

90. At the same time, we learn how shameful it is before God to be no more than "one man" and "one people," and how few there are.

who boast of the cross of our Lord. For these are not "men" but gods, not "people" but hosts. Therefore God is called the Lord of hosts, that is, of the choicest warriors of the people; but people is the yeast and the great multitude of cowardly men.

So "a mockery of the people and contempt for the people" must be taken both in the genitive and in the dative, that Christ is a mockery to the people and of the people, a contempt for the people and the people, so that we understand both the active and the passive meaning by it. And it is said in the Vulgate] quite appropriately plebis rather than populi, namely according to Latin usage, because plebs is a part and the lowest rabble of any crowd, but populus denotes the whole crowd, in which the princes and nobles are included. And also the prophet has not put here the word which indicates power, XXX, but which indicates nature, XXX, in that he does not say a mockery of XXXX, but a mockery of XXX, that is, of that earthly multitude of men in whom only the natural sense rules, without power and grace. Therefore to these people Christ is a mockery and a contempt; for thus he [the interpreter of the Vulgate] translated these words in the 119th Psalm, v. 22.: Aufer a me opprobrium et contemtum. But what he is to the persecutors and oppressors follows:

V. 8. 9. All who see me mock me, open their mouths, and shake their heads: let him complain to the Lord, and let him be saved, if he has a desire for him.

To them it is not a mockery and contempt, because they are not ashamed of it, since they have never accepted it, but a laughter and a mockery. The rage of these people causes him to be a mockery and a scorn to those who are weak.

And one must especially note the order that before he lists the evils he suffers, he complains about the blasphemies, and before these about the public contempt of men, but above all about the abandonment of God, which is indeed also here the order of the sufferings, according to their severity. For the blasphemy of the persecutors is more terrible than the persecution itself, which increases the public contempt of the people, since there is no one to give him even a consolation. But above all this, there is the affliction that God Himself does not even comfort the one who suffers in such a way, who is blasphemed, despised and considered an abomination, since He is the last refuge of the wretched.

(94) Therefore, although there was almost no order in the sufferings of Christ, since the Jews raged against him and did everything without order (confuse) against him, he nevertheless put them in order beautifully, starting from the most severe sufferings and proceeding to the end of all his sufferings, namely to his resurrection and the glory of his kingdom. Therefore, this verse follows the preceding one in a puffing manner, as it says:

95. "All who see me mock me." Not that his mother and relatives also ridiculed him, but he says this out of a general feeling, because he sees that he is a public mockery and abomination, whom no one dares to comfort or protect. In this way of speaking Ps. 6, 8. is said: "My form has grown old, because I am frightened everywhere." So also here: There is no one to protect me or comfort me, so much do they all not only frighten me, but also laugh at the one who is frightened. In such a situation we would also say: "Are they all mocking me? Is there no one to comfort me?" Not as if there were no one favorable to him, but that he does not feel nor experience this favor, and the expression of this feeling or experience is this: "All who see me mock me."

Here, too, one could assume a synecdoche, that "all" stands for: many of them, which is a frequent figure in the Holy Scriptures; but in my judgment, the former conception indicates more completely how the sufferer is to be understood.

97) The word: "Those who see me" has a special emphasis and weight, because this is the worst kind of blasphemy, when someone is publicly ridiculed to his face, and the insults are hurled in his face. For it is easier to make the mockeries and vituperations...

But when you see it and are seen and cannot turn your face away from the scoffers, that is a great anguish of heart.

98. but what a mockery that had been, follows: "They open their mouths and shake their heads." More appropriately [than: Locuti sunt labiis in the Vulgate] Jerome translates: Demittunt labium, for this word actually designates the gesture of a scoffer who, with lower lip pulled down and stretched forward, opens his mouth against the one whom he scorns. But our Latin interpreter, because in the Scriptures "to open the mouth" means to speak, translated: "With their lips they spoke." But this passage has another verbum which means to open. By these words, however, the excessive defiance of those who rage is expressed, which also increases the tribulation not a little, since the raging, after the victory, as it were, has already been won, can have no cause to persecute the sufferer, since he himself is already martyred by the highest fear.

99. But these two verses are explicitly mentioned by the evangelists in reference to Christ, so that our work is not necessary here. For it says Matth. 27, 39, 43: "Those who passed by blasphemed Him and shook their heads, saying: He trusted in God; now deliver him, let him be lulled; for he said, I am the Son of God."

In passing, it should be noted that the evangelists do not describe almost any part of the suffering of the Lord in more powerful words than this mockery and blasphemy, the insulting speeches and all that is said in these verses. But also the words of these verses show sufficiently the power and force of these fiery and terrifying arrows. For they say at repeated times, and by incessantly penetrating upon him [Vulg. v. 9.], "He hoped in the Lord," and again, "He help him out," and again, "He deliver him," and again, "For he hath pleasure in him," by repeatedly mocking his assurance that he will be helped, they oppose the insurmountable barrage that help is denied him. For it is unbelievable with how many and indeed with how many

His heart was shaken by these words, and his heart was shaken by these words.

These are the fiery arrows of $\pi\omicron\upsilon\omicron\iota$, that is, of the most godless adversary, of which Paul teaches Eph. 6:16. For what greater act of violence is there than to make the hope in God waver, and not only to make it waver, but not only to tell of it as if it were already overthrown and completely void, but also to rejoice in it, to speak of it scornfully, and to make a mockery of it?

Furthermore, the greatest torture is that they reproach him with God's unchanging providence, or rather with God's hatred, saying: "Does he take pleasure in him? For even this they do not simply hold against him, which would have been superfluous enough evil, but they mock and ridicule him. For one must believe that these exceedingly fiery darts of the arch-villains did not merely strike Christ in the ears, but that they penetrated with exceedingly violent impetuosity into the marrow and into the innermost heart. For this was necessary for our sake, that these evils might be overcome in Christ and made harmless to us.

103. And since this passage prompts, and the matter is useful, we must digress a little, that we may obtain from this psalm the right usage of these things for the time when we have need of them. And above all, we must recognize and give thanks that Christ has made all these sufferings not only harmless, but also holy and salutary through Himself, by taking them upon Himself and feeling them in His completely good and completely holy heart, so that henceforth whoever is a Christian is all the happier and more blessed, the more similar and the more such sufferings he endures, but unhappy and completely alien from Christ, whoever obstinately throws them away and flees them. For here is fulfilled what is said in Malachi Cap. 2, 2. is fulfilled: I will bless your curse and curse your blessing.

104 For since he sanctified all waters by the touch of his very pure flesh for the baptism of regeneration, how much more must it be believed that by the touch of his very pure will and spirit he sanctified all these strong streams of water, suffering and I have sanctified you for entrance into eternal bliss!

In short, the whole world is a treasure of holy relics for the Christian. Since we honor the common relics everywhere with festivals, pomp, and feasts, how much more should we also honor these much holier ones, which have also made those relics holy, with due pomp, namely, with spiritual pomp, which is praise and thanksgiving in the midst of these evils or rather of these very best goods, as the 34th Psalm, v. 2, says: "I will praise the Lord at all times. For by this praise alone are these relics honored, not by gold, not by purple, not by precious stones.

Thus, from this picture (tabula), the last war is depicted, which we fight in death with the devil and even with God Himself and all creatures, where Satan attacks us, as with the last, so also with the best equipped troops. For here he does not urge us to despair, knowing that we will be stimulated by such an attack to resist him, but he attacks the resistance itself, and endeavors to suppress our attempt to draw hope by ridiculing our hope as one that has long since vanished (victam).

This does not happen in other temptations, where hope and faith fight the battle. Here faith and hope, which are to fight, are opposed, and because of the quarrel is a quarrel, a war must be repelled with another war, one must fight in order to be able to fight, and offer resistance to the one who dissuades from resistance, and it must be overcome with greater effort the one who dissuades from waging war than the one who forces to wage war.

Oh, dear God, what do those saints of works and lawmakers want to do here, who deal with their own righteousness, who have never known what faith and the Word are, since here the righteous will hardly be blessed who knows the power of the Word and faith correctly?

(109) What then shall a righteous soul do when it is surrounded by these afflictions? It should remember its Lord, who said [Matth.

10, 24]: "The disciple is not above his master." If he has called and has not been heard, and has heard all this that is said here, let it be a joy to him, or at least let him have patience, that such things also befall the servant.

110. And let us see the whole larva of Satan, with which he undertakes to cause despair in those who are dying. The first is, that he [the dying] is seen of all; the second, that he is mocked; the third, that the mouth is opened against him; the fourth, that the head is shaken; the fifth, that he must hear, "He complaineth unto the LORD, and he helpeth him out;" the sixth, "He delivereth him, hath he pleasure." Here one could speak the word, Job 5:19: "Out of six tribulations he will deliver thee, and in the seventh no evil shall touch thee."

The first horror of the soul is when its eyes are opened and it feels that it is exposed and made manifest before all creatures with the shame of its entire evil life, and that here also the soul, which was very good and honorable in the world, is found to be hideous and full of shame, and finds no hiding place or refuge where it could hide or cover itself. For she now goes out, and after she has gone out, she is stripped of all fleshly creatures like a garment, and must now see and be seen all the things of her shame, however hidden. Then the wicked, who cling firmly to this garment of theirs and desire it, refuse with the utmost reluctance to be uncovered, and yet cannot resist [Hof. 10, 8.], say, "Ye mountains, cover us; and ye hills, fall upon us." Then the soul feels what it means to say, "All who see me." "For [Luc. 12, 2. 3.] there is nothing hid, that shall not be made manifest, nor secret, that shall not be known. Therefore, what you say (let alone do) in darkness will be heard in the light; what you speak into the ear in the chambers will be preached on the housetops."

The second horror is when they mock, for they not only do not cover up, but they mock. Not as if the good crea-

But because it seems to the godless souls or to those who suffer such things, as if everything leaves them, and that one does not have mercy on them at all, so that it seems as if one also mocks them, as is shown in the wise virgins, Matth. 25, 9, who mock the foolish, saying: "Not so, lest it break us and you. But go ye to the merchants, and buy for yourselves."

For since the soul is burdened with shame through evil works and ungodly life, every glance of the whole creature that it casts upon the creature, or the creature upon it, becomes, as it were, a voice that detests its evil life, reproaches it, and laughs at its foolishness, that it has not done otherwise and deserved better while it was in life. And so they [the creatures], with unbearable comparison of their righteousness and the soul's unrighteousness, will place the soul most shamefully mocked in the midst of all, just as the Jews placed Christ against themselves, as if they were righteous, as an exceedingly ungodly man among the wicked, mocked by all people. Most of all, however, the devils afflict the soul with the most frightening thoughts of this kind, and make it weary.

The third terror is this: When these two are too few, and the soul, strong by faith, has either suffered or overcome them, they take greater things, and begin to act the matter with the very most violent terrors, and the arrows of the holy Scriptures. But they only cite such sayings, which contain threats and instill terror, with gruesome examples of the wrath of God, as are [Matth. 12, 36.]: "Men must give account at the last judgment of every useless word." Likewise [Ps. 140, 12.]: "A wicked man shall be cast out and overthrown." Likewise [Matt. 23:13], "Woe unto you, hypocrites!" and all such harsh words and actions directed against the ungodly. Now, after this sentence (majore) has been taken as a basis, it is easy and follows from it, since every man's own and natural weakness and timidity of conscience also helps to make the

Put the lower part (minorem) under it and say: You are such a person! That is what he says here: "You open your mouth.

(115) For I follow here the well-fitting opinion of those who interpret the two lips as the two testaments. The lower lip is the word of the law, which, although it in itself causes wrath, increases sin, and is a word of death, the terrible two-edged sword of the cherub, which prevents entrance into paradise, is nevertheless twisted by the cunning and wickedness of the devils in this challenge, and is presented in appearance as far more unshapely and terrifying than it is in itself. For this is why he [the devil] is also called a leviathan, because he magnifies our sins, and also hangs his censure on that which is well done, leaving nothing but the highest degree worthy of accusation, out of all power, as much as he can. He who has once felt this, understands easily what I say, like Job, who speaks [Cap. 6, 4.]: "The arrows of the Almighty are in me, the same fury is drinking out of my spirit," although he was innocent, even according to God's own testimony; and again [Job 13, 9.]: "My adversary glares at me with his eyes." Our Latin translation can also be drawn from this: "They have spoken with their lips," that is, only with the letter of death and terror, not also with the spirit of life and comfort.

116) The fourth terror is that he shakes his head, 1) that is, when the soul endeavors to help itself even by the comfort of the upper lip, that is, by the word of the gospel of Christ, who is the head of all, against the fierce arrow of the angry and deadly law, which has been hurled in an ungodly and perverse manner, Satan opposes it and makes this head waver and doubt. For though the lips and the heads of the godless Jews were wicked, yet they do not unrighteously show the evil use of a good thing, since both are good works of God, although they are put into evil use by the wicked. Thus, the good law and the good gospel can be used by the devils in an evil and wrong way, especially in the last hour, when they do not want to leave anything wholesome and whole for the wretched soul.

1) Latin: vum movvt capM. For the understanding of this and the following paragraphs it is to be noted that these words are used here in a twofold way, namely, first, that the devil and his servants shake their heads; second, that they make the head of the believers, Christ, wavering and uncertain.

But they do not cast away the head, but move it. For Christ is our righteousness, 1 Cor. 1:30, of which we constantly boast by faith, as if it were our own, since our righteousness is not sufficient for the law and cannot stand in this hour. And yet he takes it upon himself to move this head for us, and to stretch out the lower lip of the law so much that it protrudes above the upper lip of the gospel, and the soul begins to waver in Christ; not as if it believed that he is not the head, but that it doubts whether he is a head to it, since by this movement and doubt it is already like a head that is to be thrown away.

For the scoffers are wont to stretch forth their lips and shake their heads at the same time, that it may be seen how the wrath of the law, when it is exaggerated and made too great, shakes and trembles even the strongest faith in Christ, as we see in the dying. But this shaking torments the soul with unbelievable torture, since it is in danger of losing Christ, in whom alone lies its salvation. So they also made Christ's head, that is God, stagger, so that he cried out like a staggering man: XXXXXX or feigned out of natural forces. For in this way she is deprived of the consolation of the gospel in Christ, which the scoffers indicate by sticking out their lower lip and at the same time pulling back their upper lip and grasping it between their teeth.

119 And not only by the word of the law, which is the lower lip, do they move this head, but by far the most by the gospel, which is the upper lip. This is done by this and similar words [John 6:44], "No man can come unto me, except the Father draw him." And again [Matth. 15, 13.]: "All plants, which my heavenly Father does not plant, they are cut off." Likewise of the seed that fell on the stone-rich. For by these flashes the soul is so shaken that it doubts whether its faith was planted by God.

The fifth terror is when the soul thinks that Christ does nothing but what God has ordained, and hears the word [Matth. 15, 24]: "I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel," and again [v. 26]: "It is not good to take the children's bread and throw it to the dogs. Here Christ is taken away, and it is denied that he is the head fei, and it is hoped in God alone who will procure that Christ be restored to her. Here the matter is dealt with without a mediator, and disputes about God's good pleasure and will, to which Christ refers, saying the word [Sir. 24, 12. 13. Vulg.]: "And he that created me rested in my tabernacle, and said unto me, In Jacob shalt thou dwell, and in Israel shall be thine inheritance, and in my elect shalt thou take root." Here it is decided that Christ is to be the head only in the elect, and that according to the unchangeable commandment of GOD; where it now comes to the highest danger of oversight. This is what they say here: "Let him complain to the Lord, and he will help him out," as if they wanted to say: That Christ is not yours, you now see, because you are forsaken, and it is doubtful whether God counts you among the number of those whose head is Christ. From this doubt it goes on to the extreme evil that follows.

The sixth and last terror is the decision of the previous one, that he is not provided. And as by the preceding terror the gates of hell are opened, and the taste of hell is felt, so by this last terror he is already thrust in and swallowed up, and the pit wants to close its mouth upon him, and his soul almost already dwells in hell. This is what they do, since they say, "Let him be saved, if he has a desire for him." For they do not say par excellence, If he will, can, or knows [to save], but "hath he a desire," and not only, "hath he air," but they add, "To him," since no one can doubt that God can save, knows how to do it, and wants to do it; but whether he wants to save him, they strive to make him doubtful, even to nothing. Here, then, he is counted among the wrongdoers and the lost children, and then the wretched man feels nothing else. Here, blasphemies and grumbling and curses are near the door, and one begins to judge God as unjust, terrible and cruel, and whatever else accompanies these evils.

So what should a soul do here that is completely filled with fear and completely overcome? Above all, it should be careful not to argue with its thoughts and the devils about these things and not to answer their objections, but to turn a deaf ear to them and let them pass by, as those people do, Dan. 3:15-18. 3:15-18 When the king of Babylon said to them, "Let us see who is the God who will deliver you out of my hand," they said, "There is no need for us to answer you. Behold, our God, whom we honor, is able to deliver us out of the fiery furnace, and also to deliver us out of your hand. And if he will not, know that we do not honor your gods.

Thus, a godly soul of God must not want to know what God has secretly decided about it, nor must it investigate the majesty, lest it be crushed by the glory, Proverbs 25:27, nor admit that it is tempted to do this impossible thing, that it wants to exhaust the inexhaustible sea of divine wisdom, and tempt God. For this is what the devils want to bring about by insisting that man should desire to be certain of his election (praedestinatione) and to be troubled with it. "A dangerous presumption is this!"

So Christ is completely silent, and does not even answer a syllable to the blasphemies, as an example to us, so that we also do the same. For we, too, will not be able to overcome this evil in any other way than the way Christ overcame it. Although it is difficult to remain silent here, to be still and allow the extremely challenging and biting speeches before we have to make an effort, because there is no other way, and listen to the word, Is. 7, 4: "Beware, and be still", and Cap. 30:15: "By being still and hoping you will be strong," and Lamentations Jeremiah 3:26, 28, 29: "It is a precious thing to be patient and to hope in the help of the Lord; that a forsaken man may be patient when a thing overtakes him, and put his mouth in the dust and wait for hope." For this exceedingly salutary silence Satan cannot endure without the highest displeasure, and endeavors to hinder it with the highest impetuosity. Therefore, one should never lose sight of the example of Christ.

125 Then let faith be used to fight against faith. For since faith deals with things that are not seen, and since there is a certain confidence in things that are hoped for [Heb. 11:1], this presumption of investigating the majesty resists it fiercely, and even assaults faith. [To admit that God can save and knows how to do it is not faith in this hour, for it is quite obviously felt through experience. Likewise, that St. Peter will be saved according to God's will, and likewise all the saints and the elect, is no longer believed, but known. But that he wants to make you and me blessed, that is not before our eyes, nor should it be before our eyes. This is an incomprehensible will and shall be.

Therefore, only faith is necessary here, and such faith that does not doubt that God does and will do with it what is completely righteous, whether it saves or destroys. For here the honor and praise of God remains in our mouths, since we ascribe nothing but righteousness to God in all His will, although we do not see this righteousness ourselves, but only believe it, while the attitude of men and the persuasion of the devils hold the opposite up to us. But it is impossible that he should perish who gives glory to God and justifies Him in all His work and will, as it is said in 1 Sam. 2:30: "Whoever honors Me, him I will also honor."

It is therefore quite clear that this contestation of the accident is a bos-

According to the apostle's advice [Eph. 6:16], we should confront him with the shield of faith and thereby extinguish the fiery arrows of this evil-doer. He is in truth an evil-doer, that is, he is cunning, and fiery are his arrows in this last hour, because he most cunningly draws man back from that which is not before his eyes, that he may bind him to that which is before his eyes. For he wants man to act and judge according to what he feels, not according to what he does not feel. He feels that he is forsaken, but not that he is forsaken. If then he acts according to his feelings, like a horse and a mule that have no understanding [Ps. 32:9], it is impossible for him to be preserved.

Therefore he acts according to faith, that is, without paying attention to his feelings, and becomes like an immovable block against these blasphemies that Satan stirs up in his heart. For such objections and thoughts of the heart are not his, but Satan's. But enough of this.

V. 10, 11: For you drew me out of my mother's womb; you were my confidence while I was still in my mother's womb. Upon thee am I cast from my mother's womb; thou art my God from my mother's womb.

Here the affliction begins to become milder, and the hope leans toward victory, having anxiously sought and found a very tender support. For after he has felt that he suffers in such a way that there is no example for it, so that the contemplation of the miraculous works that God once showed to the fathers cannot help him, he comes to what happened to him himself (ad propria), and grasps in it God's goodness, which He alone showed to him in particular in former times, so that he, who in all other things was something special before all of Israel, had also suffered in a special way, might be saved in a special way. Therefore, after having searched through everything in vain, he finally finds the miraculous works of God that were performed on him, and here he revives himself to the confidence that he asks and pleads, as will follow; for, to search so sharply and precisely even the smallest crevices, teaches fear.

But in two verses he repeats and inculcates this work of God, by which he brought him out of his mother's womb, in order to fortify his hope and strengthen himself. For this is how someone who is in fear tends to repeat what he relies on in order to persevere with God with a firm mind. Here, however, the saying is in fact doubled, because of the vehemence of the movement of the heart.

But in order to make the work of God appear to his heart even more firmly, he does not tell us that he was born and nourished, but in a paraphrase, indeed, he sets it forth more broadly by a description and other images, calling his birth that he was drawn from his mother's womb, and his nourishment: his confidence while he was still at his mother's breasts. 2c. For one must believe that this is said to praise the special miracle of God, by which he was conceived over nature by the Holy Spirit, born of a mother who was a virgin, so that there is an emphasis on the word "you drew me", and another emphasis (epitasis) on the word "womb", in this way:

The other human children are born of man and woman, because the body of both is not only unwilling and resists, but an unchaste urge drives to it and brings forth a confluence, and pours out the fruit from the innermost places of nature. But you have pulled me out of the chaste and barren (because virginal) body, which not only did not flow of its own accord, but because nature was opposed to it and only endured your hand. Just as a bee carefully extracts honey from a flower and does not harm it, so the Holy Spirit extracted Christ from the Virgin's body without harming it, who in truth has the nature of the flesh, without sin, just as honey has the nature of the flower, without corruption. Therefore, nature did not pour out this birth, but God drew it out of nature and sucked it in, leaving it uncorrupted and unharmed.

133. but about us this rough word is said, Job 10, 9. f.: "You have brought me out of life.

men made. Have you not milked me like milk, and curdled me like cheese?" where he describes the carnal procreation almost shamelessly, if it were not the exceedingly chastening spirit speaking.

And he says, "You drew me from my mother's womb," not from the loins of a man, so that the mother was an unharmed virgin in conception and birth, and I was conceived and born as a special man before all others without sin, without having deserved such great tribulations. For here he looks at his innocence, with which he also comforts himself, seeing that there is nothing in him for which he should suffer, but that he only bears the sins of others, as he says in another Psalm [Ps. 35, 15. Vulg.]: "Scourges have fallen on me, and I did not know it," that is, I was not aware that I deserved scourges.

You were my confidence when I was still at my mother's breasts," that is, you made me have confidence even then, when I was hanging at my mother's breasts and was nourished by foreign service, since I was as it were not powerful, that is, from my beginning. How much more will you not leave me now to the end! Since you alone took care of me then, you will also take care of me now and alone, since I am again not powerful and alone.

This verse again presents Christ without sin, since it teaches that he hoped even when he was a little child, since confidence is a work of grace, not a work of nature. This does not fit to other children of men, who are born as children of wrath and unbelief [Eph. 2, 3. 5, 6.]. Although he likewise cares for them out of unmerited grace, he does not make them full of confidence and spirit until they are changed by another birth and drawn out anew from the womb of the church, then hope in him at the breasts of the same, so that they are in spirit what Christ is both according to body and spirit. The same is what follows: "Upon thee am I cast from my mother's womb," which (as I have said) is set repetitively, only that it interprets Christ's confidence in GOD more clearly. For "to be cast upon GOD" is to confidently commit oneself into the hands of GOD and to leave oneself (as one speaks) to Him (resignare), as the 55th Psalm, v. 23, says: "Cast your concern upon the LORD (that is, your care or sorrow), and He will provide for you." And 1 Pet. 5:7: "Cast all your care upon him, for he careth for you." And Ps. 40, 18. "For I am poor and miserable, but the Lord cares for me." And Ps. 27:10: "My father and my mother forsake me, but the Lord receiveth me."

It is in this way that Christ also encourages himself here, and remembers that God has been his provider and protector from his childhood, of which he speaks in lovely and emphatic paraphrases by naming the womb, the womb, the breasts. For these works of God give a great comfort, if one holds them before oneself again and again with rapt attention, as if one were speaking in the person of Christ: Dear God, you were so concerned about me that you formed me in the womb of my mother, then immediately, so that I would have something to live on and so that I could be nourished, after I had been formed, you filled my mother's breasts with milk and kept me in her womb and at her bosom.

Augustine plays beautifully with similar thoughts in the first book of his Confessions, in which he praises God and expresses his amazement at how God created him, and (as he speaks) is amazed at the mercy of God, which took care of him through the service of the mother. And Ps. 139, 15. f.: "My bones were not hidden from you, when I was made in secret, when I was formed under the earth. Your eyes saw me when I was still unprepared" 2c.

Although these thoughts are childish and effeminate, they are also brought up at the wrong time, since in such great troubles it is not the right place to think of them (for the wisdom of the flesh dictates that this is an offense to good behavior), and would like to teach that one should have masculine thoughts), experience, indeed, the example of Christ in this place gives us the right instruction that we should constantly remember these tender and exceedingly sweet works of God, and then, when we get hard and very strong food (offas) to eat, namely the wrath and the rod of God, return again to the sweet milk, the mother's womb, the mother's love, and all the exceedingly tender manifestations of mercy that were shown to us in infancy, so that just as we should remember the good in evil days, so also in the days when we are strong, we should remember them when we were very tender, and when we suffer as men, we should remember what we received as children.

In short, only experience and the heart can teach how powerful and strong this remembrance of the milk, of the mother's love and the womb is, and how then everything becomes exceedingly chaste and pure that is either shameful or despised outside of temptation. If one begins to look with a fervent heart at Christ hanging on his mother's breasts or lying in the manger, what evil should he not immediately drive away, what weakness should he not strengthen? Just try it, and you will know what it is to see the divine majesty dealing with childish works, that is, with the lowest and almost ridiculous works, which are more of a spectacle than a serious matter.

But Christ alone can say, "Upon you I am cast from the womb," while we are cast from the womb to the devil, as far as the life of the spirit is concerned, although we also are cast upon God, according to the life of nature. For he wills that all men be helped, and he makes much of his grace to sustain men and cattle, as he opens his hand, and fills all that lives with good pleasure. So also Christ alone can say, "You are my God from my mother's womb," since we are born as idolaters, conceived in sins and raised.

143. contemplating thus his innocence and the exceedingly tender care of his father, he comes now, as the greater torments

He now prays with a much stronger movement than in the beginning, where he complained that he was abandoned and could not be heard. Now, however, he begins both to pray and to hope that he will be heard, although in a different way than he told at the beginning. For now that he is instructed, he knows that he will be heard, not to receive this life, but that a better one will be restored to him. Therefore he says:

V. 12. Be not far from me, for fear is near; for there is no helper here.

144 [Instead of: Ne discesseris a me, in the Vulgate Habens Jerome and the Hebrew text: Ne sis longe a me. For he does not want to indicate that GOtt should depart from him as if he had been near, since he cried out above that he was forsaken, but rather wants this: that GOtt should not persist in being far away, but should finally draw near, since he had already stepped all too far away, which is also indicated by the following sentence: "For fear is near." Fear, however, could not be near if GOtt had not gone far away. So let GOd come near so that fear may go away; let Him come near so that fear may come far away.

For that the anguish is near is not understood from the time, as if it would occur in the very near future, but from the violence, strength and vehemence, as from a place that it is not distant from him, but rather lies fiercely on his neck and oppresses him, as follows, in which he interprets himself: "For there is no helper here", as he complains above [v. 2] that his help is far away, by which he does not mean the time, but the strength of the suffering. This is also how it must be seen here.

146. And here you see how all who saw him and mocked him were among the persecutors. For although his mother and his friends were present, they were considered as if they were not there, since none of them could help. This rather increased the fear instead of alleviating it, since he now had to suffer for their sake as well, and they were tormented with him in their hearts.

V. 13: Great bulls have surrounded me, fat oxen have surrounded me.

147 Here he begins to tell in order what a near fear this is, and how there is no one to help him, for, he says, I am alone in the midst of many bulls and fat oxen, that is, in the midst of the raging people of the Jews and their rulers.

For not only is there no helper, but he also cannot flee, since he is besieged on all sides, as it says in Ps. 2:1, 2: "Why do the nations rage, and the people speak in vain? The kings of the land rebel, and the lords confer with one another." For he calls the people "bulls" and the rulers "fat oxen" (tauros Basan), as is clear from Ps. 68, 31: "The herd of oxen among their calves."

But is Christ impatient and repays his persecutors for their abuse by calling them bulls and oxen? Not at all, but with figurative names he indicates in the shortest possible way both their character and their violence, then also the cause of his suffering. For a bullock and an ox denotes a teacher and servant of the Word, as is proven from 1 Cor. 9:9: "Thou shalt not bind the mouth of the ox that driveth." For by the same image Christ seems to indicate that he too is a farrow and an ox, since he complains that he suffers as the only farrow among many farrows, and the only ox among the fat and fat oxen. For thus it is written of him in Gen. 49:6, "In their anger they have slain the man, and in their courage they have corrupted the ox," where we have [in the Vulgate] the corrupt reading: Suffoderunt murum by an error of the scribe, in that he could easily turn taurum into murum. And Ps. 69, 1) 32nd [Vulg.]: "God will be well pleased with a young bullock that brings forth horns and claws" (that is, with Christ who suffered and was glorified by the preaching of the Gospel).

150 The cause of suffering, then, is the word of doctrine and the service of the gospel, for the sake of which from the beginning of the world until the end of the world, we have been in the service of the gospel.

1) In the issues: ?s. 68.

In the end, the teachers of human laws and the ministers of works rage. So also Christ was killed for the sake of doctrine alone, by none other than these godless teachers of the people.

151) Further, that he says of those that they are many, fat, and fat, while of himself he says that he is a single man, and altogether tender, without a helper; that is, as we have often said, "that the fat keep themselves together" [Psalm 17:10], relying on their multitude and greatness; seeing that they have not the truth, and cannot prevail with good reasons, so they seek to oppress the poor and forsaken ministers of the word with violence and noise. For this they have as the only ground of their ungodliness, that on their side stand many and great men, and the minister of the word alone; whereas the Scripture, on the contrary, accuses this very thing, and asserts its proof against themselves.

Therefore the Spirit instructs the messengers (apostolos) of the word by this example of Christ, that they may know that their adversaries will have the multitude of the people, and what is high in the world, [on their side], that they may not be offended at it. Thus it is said in the 119th Psalm, v. 161: "The princes persecute me without cause." And again, v. 23: "The princes also sit and speak against me."

But he puffingly ascribes to each individual his own. He calls the people XX what we also call in German "Farr", namely a young cow, a young bull, which is strong and horny and even unruly, because the great pile and the crowd of the people is a strength without understanding, without judgment and without breeding. For who can tame or calm this beast when it is irritated? Therefore, in the 2nd Psalm, v. 1, he also ascribes to them raving and clamor, saying, "Why do the heathen rave?" that is, do they stir up trouble. Then he also says [in the Vulgate] "many fools," because the common people consist only of a great multitude (as I have said) without judgment, sent only to attack and riot, which by all means does not want to suffer moderation and does not have it. But the chiefs he calls [in Hebrew] "oxen Basan", that is, fat oxen.

And "Bashan" is spoken disgracefully, if we take it as the proper name of the country or as a general expression for fatness. For it denotes wealth, abundance, pleasure, power and honor, and all that is fat and excellent in the world, as the king of Moab, Eglon, Judges. 3, 17., Amalek and Agag, 1 Sam. 15, 8, 18., and the most distinguished (pingues) in Israel, Ps. 78, 31., and Og, the king of Bashan, Deut. 3, 11., illustrate.

So the multitude, the greatness, the height, the power, the favor, the pleasure, the honor, that is, the whole world is hostile to the Gospel of God and His servants, who are lonely, small, little, low, poor, afraid, despised and hated. About the emphasis that lies in the words "they have surrounded me", "they have surrounded me", we have sufficiently spoken in the previous Psalms, so that we would not have to repeat the same thing everywhere.

V.14. They open their mouths against me like a roaring and ravening lion.

This they did when they cried out, "Away, away with him, crucify him" [John 19:15], of which also Jeremiah Cap. 12:8 says, "My inheritance has become to me like a lion in the forest, and roars against me; therefore I have become angry with him."

157. For the prophet shows the stormy and sudden anger of the Jews, that, just as a roaring and ravening lion, with its yoke open, does not first try or consider what it wants to do, but with a snorting attack seeks only to do one thing, that he may rob, devour and devour, so that the godless chief priests against Christ, out of rage, neither think, nor see, nor hear what they should do, or what they should do, but only snort after the one thing, that they may kill him as quickly and as cruelly as possible.

(158) For it is a stronger expression to indicate fury that he says the lion's mouth is opened, than if he had said the claws are stretched out; for it was not enough for the Jews to rend and slay Christ, but they desired that he also should be consumed and devoured, so that the memory of him would be completely erased from the earth.

This is the attitude of all the wicked against the godly. Proverbs 1:11 f.: "We will devour the innocent alive as hell, and the pious as those who go down to the pit." Thus it is said in Ps. 7:3: "Lest like lions they catch hold of my soul and tear it asunder," and Ps. 10:9: "Like a lion in the den," and Ps. 17:12: "Like a lion desirous of prey."

160 In this verse, however, the adverb "like" is not added in Hebrew, but in this image he calls the people of the Jews a ravening and roaring lion, perhaps in order to indicate the fury of the Jews with all the greater emphasis.

V. 15. I am poured out like water, all my bones are broken, my heart is melted in my body like wax.

Many refer this effusion of Christ to his blood, because water is poured out completely before other liquids, down to the last drop; thus the blood of Christ is poured out completely from his body. But this seems to be a little human feeling, which has in mind only such thick liquids as oil and honey, while also wine and many other liquids, not less like water, are poured out completely.

162) It would be better to say, if this sense is to be accepted, that the blood of Christ was poured out as abundantly, lavishly, and disdainfully as water, which is poured out most disdainfully and lavishly, so that it must be understood that the blood of Christ was the most disdainful and unworthy in the eyes of those who poured it out, as Ps. 79:3 is said in the same sense: "They poured out blood about Jerusalem, as water." For other liquids are poured out with care and mindfulness, and in such a way that they are collected in other vessels, as, wine, oil, balsam, myrrh, and the like.

But in my opinion, this pouring out of Christ also, and even really, refers to the whole of Christ, as it is said in 2 Sam. 14:14: "We die of death, and rive the water into the earth slimy, which one does not stop", and Gen. 49, 4.: "He went away carelessly, like water." This is to indicate that Christ was cast away most contemptuously, like water, and that he was everywhere offered to all for rejection; and what is still more indicative of the suffering described here, that he was received and preserved by no one, but, as if despairing of his resurrection, was thrown away irretrievably, just as water once spilled is not gathered up again. With these words he indicates how he would be in the eyes of men, especially the righteous and the best, for to these it seemed that it was done for him, because they hoped that no one would preserve him and bring him back anew, as the disciples said, Luc. 24, 21: "We hoped that he should redeem Israel."

Now if someone wanted that also this was meant by these words, that he was poured out according to his strength, that is, as Daniel speaks [Cap. 10, 17.], that there was no strength left in him, but was exhausted to the utmost and worst, like water; that he, emptied of all his strength, was nothing but an empty vessel of weakness, while before he was exceedingly full of all strength (for so Peter also calls [1. Ep. 3, 7.] the woman the weakest instrument [vasculum]), and with this word as with a general theme begin to narrate his sensuales (sensuales [§ 174]) sufferings, which he then continues to elaborate orderly one by one, I leave this to the discretion of the reader. It seems to me that this view is almost the best of all.

165 "All my bones are divided," that is, they are divided, separated from one another. Though some think that this refers to the crucifixion, yet I believe that below [v. 18.] this thing is spoken of, "I would number all my bones," and that here it is declared that his strength was destroyed, which consisted in his bones being weakened both by the aforesaid terrors of inward anguish of spirit, and by outward afflictions, so that no one leg assisted the other, but, as if they were separate members, each was weak by itself. For in healthy and stiff

In very sick people, the bones are so strong that one helps the other with its service. And experience teaches that the bones of very sick people, or those who are frightened beyond measure, become weak and heavy, and are not capable of any work. Therefore, the bones of Christ were not separated in such a way that one was detached from the other, but the services of the bones were separated and left one another in the whole body.

166. "My heart is like melted wax in my body." It is not actually [as in the Vulgate stands venter in the Hebrew, since the heart is not in the belly, but in the interior or viscera, for in the same the heart is hidden under the breast. This affliction also does not refer to the spirit, but to the senses (sensum), insofar as the heart, namely the most noble instrument of the spirit, when it is crushed by these spiritual and bodily torments, trembles, quivers and surges, even in sensually perceptible motion. This lament occurs frequently throughout the Psalter. Ps. 40:13: "My heart hath forsaken me," and Ps. 38:11: "My heart quaketh." This word "trembles" has a wonderful emphasis that abundantly fulfills the image that is attached to the heart in this passage, that it melts like wax, in that it indicates that the heart turns here and there, spins around and around, like a top, so that it can find no rest anywhere.

Doctors also know about trembling of the heart, but it is not the same as this, as far as the movement (affectus) and the causes are concerned. For those who are confident and of good courage are said to be strong in heart, to be hard as a solid rock, and to stand firm, as Ps. 27:14 says: "Take heed to the Lord, be confident and undaunted, and take heed to the Lord. So, on the other hand, the heart of the crushed and terrified is soft and wavering, so that it resembles melting wax. On the other hand, Micah, Cap. 1:4, says of the wicked, who are faint and afraid: "As wax melts before the fire, as the waters that flow beneath," and Ps. 68:3: "As wax melts (fluit, that is, melts, melts away; it is the same verb as here) before the fire, so must the wicked perish before God."

This disappearance is expressed in the 39th Psalm, v. 12: "When you chastise a man for sin, his beauty is consumed like a moth," where the same verb meaning to melt is used in this way: You have caused his loveliness to melt away like a moth. But one wants that this verb actually means a burning, a drying up, a withering, as it is used to happen by a great fire. Thus Isa. 64, 1. f.: "Oh, that the mountains would melt away before you, as hot water boiling away from a fierce fire," so that this verse could also mean: My heart has become like wax melting away, because wax cannot suffer fire at all, and can only be brought to the fire so that it is consumed and dries up. In this way, one must assume, Christ wanted to indicate here that his heart was weak from inner and outer suffering, that it had contracted and was fading away.

But that he adds "in my body" seems to be an excess of words, as lamenting and afflicted people are wont to use them; if it is not said to make a distinction between the afflictions that attack from without, and cause pain through objects and feeling, and those that torment within, namely the aforementioned 92 et seq.] Spiritual, which, without sensually perceptible objects, yet in an incomprehensible way seize the heart inwardly, melt it, and make it nothing, so that he feels that he is indeed corrupting and disintegrating, and yet cannot tell or understand where this stormy spirit comes from or where it is going; hence it is that he can neither escape nor seek relief, but must remain in the midst of anguish.

v. 16 My strength is dried up like a potsherd, and my tongue cleaveth to the roof of my mouth; and thou layest me in the dust of death.

Here he goes on to speak of the sufferings touching the senses (as I have said). But it is a wonderful figurative speech that he compares the weakened strength to a dry shard. For in this place "my powers" in Hebrew is XXX, that is, my expression of power, my efficacy,

My activity, or my power to perform, so that the meaning is: Since all my bones are exhausted, my strength is weakened, 1) my heart is melted, I have become incapable of any work. I can absolutely do nothing with all my limbs, so that even if I think and intend to do something, I still lack the strength to accomplish and do it. For when there is a confident spirit, a man is joyful and grows splendidly, as a fruitful tree brings forth much fruit, and all things are well with him, and his strength is increased, as it is said in Proverbs 20:29: "The joy of the young is their strength." But when the courage of the heart faints, it withers and ceases to be active, as a withered tree ceases to bear fruit.

Since Christ wants to make known his great weakness, he does not compare his drought to a withering tree, but to a dry potsherd, which is the very thirstiest, sapless and driest. For he was so exhausted, and so deprived of all sap of life and of that which serves for natural growth, that he was completely dry and parched, of which the prophet Isaiah, Cap. 53, 2. seems to speak: "He shoots up before him like a neis, and like a root out of dry ground." For out of this barren shard and utter weakness grew the exceedingly sap-filled, blossoming, fruitful tree, the church. So this withered strength does not denote a weakness, illness, or anything that is attributed to it (aliquid positivum), but the inability to do something, so that something is denied to it (privative). This is followed immediately by the following:

172. "My tongue sticks to the roof of my mouth." This needs no explanation. For a broken tongue is dry, thirsty, and desirous of drink; so Christ thirsted with dryness on the cross. But this thirst and dryness came more from the spiritual needs than from the spiritual needs.

1) In the Jenaer, in the Weimarschen and in the Erlanger: Lūsis Omnibus ossibus, bumiliatis viridus. The Wittenberg one offers: ^Uusis omnibus, bumiliatis ossib. viribus etc. The latter seems to be an alteration, because the expression oLtusis ossidus was used. Cf. Z165.

from the bodily tribulations. For it is unbelievable how this anguish suddenly dries up, dries up and dries up all the lifeblood in all the limbs, especially in the tongue, where we feel this dryness most; as we have said [§ 168] not inappropriately that this verb "to dry up" comes from the noun XXXXX, which means a great and fierce fire, or conversely XXXXX from XXX, 1) which means to melt away, to fade away, to be dried up, to dry up. For it is here the fire which those felt who said in Deut. 18, 16: "I will no longer hear the voice of the LORD my God, nor see the great fire, lest I die." And Cap. 5, 24. f.: "Today we have seen that God speaks to men, and they remain alive. And now, why should we die, that the great fire may consume us?" Therefore our God is called "a consuming fire," Deut. 4:24 and Heb. 12:29.

173 "And thou layest me in the dust of death"; deduxisti me (in the Vulgate) is as much as posuisti me. This seems to be said, as it were, as a concluding speech, with which he concludes, as in a summa, that all sufferings amount to this, that he should go into the dust of death. But what is this dust of death? I believe that this is spoken figuratively instead of: into nothingness, which is in death, so that dust figuratively stands for "nothingness". Thus we see that Ps. 7, 6. indicates the dust of dishonor, since it says: "And lay my honor in the dust." And 1 Kings 16:2 speaks of the dust of poverty, saying, "I have raised thee out of the dust, and made thee ruler over my people." 2c. And Job 7:5 speaks of the dust of sickness: "My flesh is full of rottenness round about, and of the dung of dust" 2c. Thus one sees that it is a quite proper way of speaking of the Scriptures that one takes "dust" for a thing that is made to nothing.

v. 17 For dogs have surrounded me, and the roll of the wicked has made itself around me; they have dug through my hands and feet.

After he has listed two kinds of suffering, namely the spiritual and those that affect the senses (sensualium), he lists here the third and last kind, which are in the body and limbs and affect the limbs, namely that he is robbed of his clothes and must suffer nakedness.

The word multi [in the Vulgate: canes multi] is superfluous, and Jerome has translated hunters instead of "dogs", perhaps to explain, and the title enoughzuthun, so that we understand that they are hunting dogs, and that the hind is captured and mauled.

But all this is abundantly well known from the gospel. For they surrounded his body, took him captive, held him, and made themselves about him; at last they crucified him, and digged through his hands and feet.

177 But does not Christ here also use abusive language by calling them "dogs" and "evil"? But invective must not be judged by the appearance and sound of words, but by the attitude of the heart. For that is no abuse which is brought forward without anger and hatred. For Paul also calls the Jews dogs, deceitful workers, enemies of the cross; and Christ calls the apostles fools; just as, on the other hand, exaltations and praises are judged according to the heart and not according to the words.

Therefore he calls those "dogs", who accused him with unjust barking and biting before Pilate, tore him to pieces and delivered him into the hands of the Gentiles to die on the cross, although they themselves knew that they did it only out of pure malice. But this animal is known to be fierce and furious; by this its peculiarity (ingenio) it differs almost from all other animals; therefore the fury and fierceness of the Jews had to be indicated by this image.

179 But we also want to act a little on this passage, about which there is much dispute: "They have dug through my hands and feet," so that we will not be regarded as having left them completely untouched and passed over them.

180. the Jews stubbornly claim that here it is not to be read: "They have dug through", but-

1) So is to be read after v. 15. instead of none in the editions. Garnes is Niphal from dern: like a lion; claiming that the verb "they have dug through" is written in Hebrew with X and X and X, without X, while in this place X is placed between X and X, and XXX is read, not XXX. But it means XXX like a lion, XXX they have dug through. Moreover, they claim that the word XXX is found only twice in the whole Bible, namely in this Psalm and in Isaiah, Cap. 38, 13. where it says: "He broke all my bones like a lion." In all other places it is XXXXX, not XXX, as in the 7th Psalm, v. 3. "Lest they XXXXX my soul." And Ps. 10, 9. "He lurketh in secret XXXXX," that is, like a lion. And in this Psalm, above in the 14th verse, "XXXXX rapiens et rugiens." And I do not see how they could be compelled by grammar to take for "they have digged through" in this place, since they themselves compel us to take the same expression Isa. 38:13: "like a lion." Certainly there is a great semblance on their side, none on our side, as far as grammar is concerned. And it would be a harsh thing to say that at this point all their books are corrupt. For that one could change the dots, and read "XXX and XXXX, that is not enough, since it is sufficiently known that one must not believe the dots, since they are only a new invention.

181 For us who believe in Christ, and hold to the certain testimony of the gospel that this whole psalm is spoken by Christ, it is easy to prove that "they have digged through" must be read, not: like a lion. For we do not throw light on a fact from the mysteries of Scripture, but on the mysteries of Scripture from the fact, that is, we make the Scripture of the Old Testament light through the Gospel, and not vice versa; and we bring the sense of the Old Testament into harmony with the sense of the New Testament, and make it look upon Christ, like the two cherubim on the mercy seat, as it is said in Jer. 23:20, "What he hath in mind, afterward ye shall well know." And to Moses the Lord says [Ex. 33:23], "You will look behind me."

182. now that we are certain that

Christ's hands and feet were pierced on the cross, and no less certain that this Psalm is directed to Christ, then also the sense is extraordinarily appropriate, and requires that "they have digged through" must definitely be read, especially since even according to grammar there is no compelling reason to the contrary: so we read "they have digged through" without any contradiction and without hesitation.

183 But our adversaries will first of all be cornered by the inconsistency of the meaning itself. For what shall this mean: Like a lion my hands and my feet? If they now also want to say that the word "he has made himself about me" (obsedit) is to be repeated, in this way: The evil one has made himself about me as a lion has made himself about my hands and feet: they cannot make this evasion, but rather get into even greater inconsistency. For how shall a lion make himself about hands and feet, to whom the Scripture attaches an open mouth, roaring and ravening, that he may devour the whole? Or what would this be an antic of the spirit, that he would add to the fact that the whole man is surrounded by the evil mob, that also the hands and feet are surrounded by a lion; as if he who surrounds the whole body does not also surround the hands and feet?

184 It remains the same thing, if they also wanted to put any other verbum to the complement. For whatever power they would ascribe to the lion over the hands and feet, they would have to ascribe the same power to him (according to common sense) also over the whole body. Our view, however, is not opposed by any inconsistency, but everything fits very well to each other, so that, even if neither XXXX nor XXX would stand there, nevertheless the fact itself would teach that it must be supplemented.

Secondly, they also have this difficulty, that they must allow that this verse speaks of a very extraordinary suffering of these hands and feet, whoever they may be. Let them now bring forward either Mordecai or Esther: what then is the tremendous suffering that one of these two would have suffered in hands and feet? But also the whole scripture remembers no Ge-

The right hand of a person who has suffered a particular violent injury to his hands and feet. For this must be a different affliction from that of the rest of the body, and certainly one that affects the hands and feet alone.

What then is this affliction? They cannot say that they were bound with bands and fetters, for a lion does not do such things to hands and feet, nor anything of the kind by which the manner of the parable could stand; nor did Esther or Mordecai suffer anything of the kind, nor were their hands and feet cut off; and they can by no means attribute to a lion and hands anything of the kind suffered by any saint. But we have Christ, of whom it is known that a quite extraordinary suffering (persecution) happened to him on hands and feet, which this verse pursues and seizes with all zeal.

187 Now only grammar remains, which must give way to theology, since not the thing is subject to the words, but the words are subject to the things and must give way, and the word must rightly follow the sense, and the letter the spirit. First, XXXX can be read without dots for XXXXX, that is, "those who dig through," instead of: "they have dug through," so that it is a noun in the plural, which in the status constructus (in statu regiminis) throws off the X at the end, changing the vowel X into X, as the custom of the Hebrew language entails. Then, without changing the sense, it reads thus: Der Evil Rotte hat sich um mich gemacht, die da durchgraben (or: of those who dig through) my hands and feet. Since in all such nominibus after the first letter of their root word an X or a cholem sign is used to be added, so that the noun is different from the verb and is derived from it: who knows whether the prophet, making use of his freedom, did not put an X instead of the X, because of the extraordinary occurrence of a new thing? For we read that Isaiah also used the same liberty, and Cap. 9, 6. inserted an X finale in the middle of the word XXXXX against the custom of the whole language and grammar, likewise because of the extraordinary mystery of the kingdom.

Christ, which, closed and unfruitful in these things, is nevertheless multiplied and opened over the whole world.

If now alone the obstinacy argues against it, it would have been of no use if he had also put the verbum XXX 1) with its actual letters and points. For since XXX is ambiguous in Hebrew, and can mean buy, prepare and dig through: who could force stubborn people to allow the meaning "dig through" rather than the meaning prepare and buy? Yes, the people who are not moved by the fact [of fulfillment] (re gesta), and cling to the letters, would then have rejected the meaning "dig through" with greater pretense, since it is less intolerable that hands and feet should be disposed of and bought, as hands are said to work, to be taken and found. For if they would then agree, if it were set, and despise the ambiguity because of the obviousness of the fact, they would also soon agree and easily prefer this very truth of the fact to this single letter X. But as with the letter X, they would not agree. But as they maintain their stubbornness with the letter X, so they would then have asserted the ambiguity. And which truth, no matter how obvious, does not despise the stubbornness and tries to escape from it?

But how if the prophet had intentionally put the X in between, in order to forestall the evasion by ambiguity on the one hand, and on the other hand to ward them off by the inconsistency, so that they would not subject themselves to it, that is, He said, "Like a lion," and yet brought them back from the ambiguity as by an excellent warning sign, which he gives them by the letter X, and kept them resolved in the middle in such a way that they correspond to the right meaning, which is in accordance with the fact,

1) In the Wittenberg and in the Weimarschen here consistently Gaari is written, in the Jenaer consistently Oaaiu and in the Erlanger That 7N2 must be read, proves K180, besides also the different meanings, which are attached in this paragraph to the Verbum. Gesenius derives the word from , which is in chaldaisrender form, and takes as well as Luther as status eoustruetus for could not escape? And yet, stubbornness perverts what has happened against stubbornness in order to protect itself.

And who knows whether the Spirit did not also change this expression with the intention that it might be a hidden secret until it was fulfilled? just as he also made the title of the psalm very obscure, so that nothing but the fulfillment (res gesta), yes, only he himself could open it up. Since now the whole church has this spirit for a teacher, and reads in this passage: "They have dug through", which agrees with the matter itself, let us let the obstinate go, as the apostle reminds [Tit. 3, 10. 11.], "Avoid a heretical man, when he is once and again admonished; and know that such a one is perverse and sins, as he that hath condemned himself," in that we have enough in this, that we have preserved our faith, and defended our reading so far, that neither by any strict demand of grammar, nor by any puffing sense, nor by any proof taken from the fact itself, can they compel us that we should not read: "They dug through." But we have, in addition to the fact that grammar is not against us, but rather protects us, especially insofar as it has to do with the connection of words to sentences (syntactica), also this, that the sense and the fulfillment (rem gestam) agree in the most fitting and harmonious way. The latter, however, have only grammar, and that the most stringent, and only insofar as it concerns orthography (orthographicam), and even this only uncertain, since only one example in the entire Bible defends it, and no 1) evidence that comes from the fulfillment speaks for it, but rather against it, then the sense is quite inappropriate and unrhymed, and finally there is no uniformity in the word order (syntaxeos).

But what the meaning of these words is is beyond question, since it is well known to the whole world, even to unbelievers. But here we see the incomparable glory of the Spirit of David, who has revealed all the mysteries of the world.

He was so thoroughly aware of Christ's suffering that he also foresaw what would happen at the crucifixion. For he himself was not a little instructed and practiced in these spiritual evils, so that it was easy for him to foresee that Christ would also suffer similar or greater things; but that his hands and feet would be dug through, that he had never experienced, nor had he ever seen anything like it in anyone else, and yet he speaks it in such a way that no other passage of Scripture has presented it as clearly, not even the Gospels with the whole New Testament.

190 And what we must marvel at even more: he is at the same time exceedingly dark and exceedingly clear in the same words. For who, before it was fulfilled, could have understood the piercing of the hands and feet and the counting of the bones from the crucifixion, since they can be pierced in so many ways, even without anyone being crucified? But after it is fulfilled, nothing can be said more appropriately, nothing more clearly, than that the hands and feet are pierced and the bones are counted, so that also Augustine says here that the stretching of the body on the wood could not have been described better.

v. 18. I want to count all my bones. But they look and see their delight in me. 2)

191. in Hebrew: I will count all my bones, which in Latin could be said by the optativus potentialis, in this way: Queam, vel queas, vel queat quis numerare omnia ossa mea. This verse has also either given or invented a saying to our German language, in which we say of very lean people: "One may count all his bones." For neither the Jews nor anyone else took the trouble to count his bones, nor did he count them himself. In itself, however, the understanding is clear and well known to all from the fulfillment, as far as history is concerned, but otherwise very unknown, as far as the mystery of faith and the spirit is concerned; of this we will speak later.

2) Vulgate: vinumeravei'untotQniao[Lairiea, ixsi vero eonsicleruverunt et inspexerunt me.

1) It seems to us that instead of vnulla, referring to eonkntantia, should be read: nuNo, referring to arZumento. We consider the former connection forced. The sense, by the way, remains the same.

192 The two verba "to look" and "to see" or inspexerunt seem to me to be so differentiated, at least in this passage, that the one, namely "to look", means to turn the eyes to see, like Ps. 14, 2: "The Lord looks from heaven to earth." Gen. 19:17: "Look not behind thee." By this word also others are called to look, like Is. 51, 1.: "Look at the rock from which you are hewn", like Ham provoked his brothers to look at the nakedness of their father, Gen. 9, 22.

193 The other, "to see them," means to take time to see, and to feel either pleasure or displeasure from what one sees, which either pleases or torments the eyes. Thus it is said in Ps. 112:8, "Till he see his pleasure in his enemies," and Ps. 54:9, "That mine eye may see pleasure in mine enemies."

194. on the other hand it is said [Ps. 112, 10.]: "The wicked will see it, and will annoy him", and still more clearly Ps. 35, 21.: "There, there! we like to see that." And Micah 7, 9. f. the prophet alternates in brief textual words with the two meanings of the word [Vulgate[^]: "I shall see his righteousness (that is, I shall see my delight in his righteousness), and my enemy shall see out of me and be put to shame (that is, she shall see it with pain). My eyes will see her" (that is, they will see her with delight). In this way also the word Ps. 91, 8 [Vulg.] must be understood: "Yes, you will see with your eyes (considerabis), and see how it is repaid to the wicked", where exactly the same words are set as in this verse.

The meaning is thus: Since I suffered these things, they not only had no pity on me, but since there was nothing left that they could do to me, they, in order to disgrace me, 1) asked and incited each other to look at me; "they pointed fingers at me. After that they feasted their eyes on me and satiated themselves with boisterous leaping, boldness and lust, namely, because they had succeeded in their wickedness. This is called

1) The Weimarsche has put a comma only after in Insam Anoiniarn, we, however, before these words.

The 89th Psalm, v. 43: "to rejoice his enemies", as Samson also did when he played before the Philistines [Judges 16, 27]. Indeed, their exceedingly cruel rage is punished, that they could also take pleasure in the extreme and so torturous punishment of death. Verily, "the eyes of men are not full" (as Solomon says [Proverbs 27:20]), even in the exercise of their fury. But the Hebrew expresses this sentiment more fully, since he says, after his manner of speech, "They see [their delight] in me," "I shall see [my delight in] his] righteousness," "mine eye shall see [its delight in] my enemy[s]," or when it is without an object to which it refers (absolute), "The wicked shall see it, and shall vex him," 2c.

V. 19: They divide my garments among themselves and cast lots for my robe.

It is surprising why the evangelists mention this verse before others, since it seems to indicate the smallest and last part of the suffering, namely the robbery of the clothes; especially John, who omits the first verse that Matthew and Marcus introduce, but tells this one, which does not have so much weight, with many words and as a whole history [Joh. 19, 23. 24.].

197 Why do they not mention the heart, the bones, the tongue, or other things that are mentioned here? But perhaps the evangelists were also moved by this: why did the prophet sing about this disgrace of Christ, while he remained silent about many others that have a greater meaning, such as the spitting, 2) the crown of thorns, the scourging, because they perceived a very special secret in it, which they wanted to reveal. Or did they perhaps do it because they wanted to indicate, by citing the first and the last verse that deals with suffering, that all the ones in between also refer to Christ, and that because they are fulfilled, they must also be regarded as if they were clothed? For the first verse speaks of the first and highest suffering of Christ, this last of the last and mildest suffering of all. From

2) Wittenberg and Jena: supra instead of sputa.

We will deal with the mystery at the appropriate place.

198. Now this is the opinion of the prophet, that Christ was so completely given into the hands of the wicked, and that it was so desperate for him, that they also made a mockery of his garments out of excessive certainty; so much is missing that they expected him to rise again, or were afraid that this would be avenged by God. For I do not believe that the soldiers, in order to gain something from it, divided the clothes, but that they wanted to make a joke, laugh and play with it, as with a ridiculous thing, as a sign that he was a ruined, lost and rejected man, and handed over to eternal oblivion, as the most worthless among men, as, after his body and life were taken from him, not even his clothes should be left with his own for a memorial sign. The words of John [Joh. 19, 23J] about the unstitched skirt, which was worked from the top through and through, are well known, which he calls a garment, around which they threw the lot, "times or not times". 1)

After the suffering of Christ has been brought to an end, it is fitting that we, in order to understand this most exquisite psalm all the better, linger a little and pay attention to what Paul says [Col. 2:3], "that in Christ are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. Therefore, let us try to penetrate this hiddenness, if the Spirit will graciously open the door for us.

First of all, there is no doubt that in Christ not only are all the perfect examples of Christian conduct presented to us, but also all the mysteries of prophecy are commanded, which are to be fulfilled in his church until the end of the world. For St. Augustine teaches in the 3rd book "Of the Trinity", Cap. 4, that Christ corresponds to our twofoldness through his simplicity, that is, through his simple history he serves us with twofold fruit, with his example and with his mystery.

1) "mal oder unmal" is probably as much as: equal or unequal. The German Wittenberg edition resolves the word "worffen" by: geworfen.

But at this time we must go beyond St. Augustine (augeamus), weave our thread further, and divide Christ into four figures, as it were according to the four ends of the cross. Two we want to give to the godly, who make good use of him; two to the godless, who misuse him in the worst way. Let the one form of the godly be those who believe, the other those who follow him; the one form of the wicked be those who fall away, the other those who persecute him; but all these four forms in secret, so that they cannot be perceived otherwise than in faith.

202. 203.²) The first figure of Christ is his knowledge in spirit and faith, that is, that you do not only know the history of his suffering, with which one struggles nowadays alone, as this has not happened in any matter with greater superstition, since it is sullied with so many fables, antics and lies that hardly any history has remained. Yes, they [the preachers of the Passion] have indulged in inappropriate, not to say ungodly, digressions, and indeed those who have been praised most highly have made almost the entire history, or at least the most distinguished part of it, consist of the swords, pains and co-sufferings of Mary. In addition, the invectives against the Jews take up a not insignificant part of it, so that, even if something of the history is left, nothing remains 4) of the simplicity of the evangelists, which alone is most effective in this matter and should have been retained in order to form the faith of the spirit. But this is hindered, nay, completely corrupted, in the curious and superstitious. But by simplicity alone it is nourished and preserved, as it is written, Proverbs 3:32: "With the simple is the speech of wisdom.

2) In order to be able to maintain more or less the same counting with the old edition of Walch, we have had to provide this section with a double number. For Roth has added in § 203, from his own, narratives about the mischief of the papists.

4) Instead of 8U4>6N68t should be read well.

Hebrew text has: With the sincere (rectos) is his secret.

Then you will know the suffering of Christ in the spirit, when you are carried away in the fervor of faith, and do not doubt that Christ suffered all these things for you, and that the punishment he suffers comes from your sins, which he took upon himself and bore, and when he rose from the dead, he swallowed up in himself as a victor, so that they would not harm you, if only you believe in his name.

For as the form of the suffering Christ was in the eyes of men, so is your form in the eyes of God, and what men do to Christ, your sins and the devils do to you, except that when you suffer, you do not feel them, but rather take pleasure in them, like a frenzied man laughing in his misfortune, at which Christ, who is wise. Suffers pain. But you, too, will feel it when, through the revelation of the law, you will recognize that exceedingly shameful figure of your sin, which you brought upon yourself in ignorance, since the law was veiled, by your sinning.

206. So you are this wretched, forsaken man, a worm and not a man, a mockery of men and a scorn of the people, mocked by all who see you, brought to despair, rejected, condemned, surrounded by bulls and oxen, given into the jaws of the roaring and ravening lion, poured out like water, with all his bones cut in two, his heart melted, His heart melted, dried up like a potsherd, his tongue stuck to the roof of his mouth, laid in the dust of death, surrounded by dogs and the pack of the wicked, with his hands and feet dug through, whose bones can be counted, whose clothes have finally been taken away from him and distributed by lot, so that he may be forgotten forever, and who has been erased from the memory of all men.

All this, I say, which works sin in the soul, Christ shows you, who do not know it, in his form. If you do not believe this, and recognize yourself as such, and you will not cease from sinning and multiplying this form, the day of revelation will come, so that you will not believe.

You can feel that you are like this, but you can neither avoid it nor change it.

But what each of these sufferings is in the conscience would take too long to investigate, and would be said in vain to those who have not experienced it, since everything happens suddenly and takes place through the disgrace of the conscience. But afterwards you can recognize something of these things from the third and fourth figure. After this first appearance you become like Christ in spirit and faith, that is, you believe and recognize that you are in your conscience like Christ was in the flesh; and this is a wholesome and good likeness, which promotes salvation.

The second form is the following of Christ according to the outward example, as only those act the suffering of Christ who act it best today, although these are also rare. Thus it is said in 1 Pet. 4, 1: "Therefore, since Christ suffered for us in the flesh, arm yourselves also with the same mind." Hebr. 12, 3: "Remember Him who endured such contradiction from sinners against Himself."

210. but of the first figure Rom. 4:25 says, "Who for our sins was passed away, and for our righteousness was raised up." And Peter 1 Pet. 3, 18. [Vulg.]: "Christ died once for our sins, the righteous for the unrighteous," and since the epistle to the Hebrews describes Christ as the High Priest, it deals aptly with this first figure.

211 And in this twofold knowledge hangs the wisdom of Christ's faithful, but the former, which is of faith, is the chiefest; and these two Augustine calls the mystery and the example; the mystery by which the hidden faith is nourished; the example, which is succeeded by the outward life.

Through this form we also become like Christ in the flesh, that is, we suffer similar things by heart; and this is also a salvific likeness, of which Paul says, 2 Cor. 1:5: "We have much of the suffering of Christ." For this figure, too, is recognized only in the spirit, that is, it is felt in us.

through the attitude of the heart and through love. For no one suffers like Christ, unless he is instructed by the Spirit as his Master, whereas someone without the Spirit can speak much of it, do much, and even suffer much, but which is not similar to the suffering of Christ. For the devils also suffer, but through their guilt; Christ's sufferings are innocent sufferings, and for righteousness' sake.

The third form is that of the apostates and unbelievers. This has no other difference from the first form than according to what the senses perceive. For ungodliness makes such people of them as the form of Christ is. But as unreasonable people they do not recognize this, and persist in it, progressing more and more in this likeness from day to day, from one blindness to another, from one vice to another. But men of understanding, and humbled by the revelation of the law, recognize it, and are restored, daily taking off this form, and progressing from one virtue to another, from one clearness to another, until the body of sin is destroyed, and dies with Christ, and is renewed into the same image of Christ [2 Cor. 3:18, Rom. 6:6].

The fourth figure, of which we have presupposed to speak, is a prophetic one, which indicates to those who have the spirit what the church will have to suffer from the ungodly teachings of devils and men. For the church is the figurative or allegorical body of Christ, the spiritual desolation of which he modeled in his natural body. For the church is not so much devastated by temporal persecutions as by pernicious doctrines of men, yea, it is expanded by the former, diminished by the latter; and this is the last persecution of Antichrist, foretold by the apostles, in which the Spirit of Christ, persevering in his remnant, shall groan for the church of God over that of which Christ complains in this psalm according to his natural person.

The 89th Psalm speaks of this matter without spiritual interpretation and in a clear prophecy before others, and speaks [vv. 39-46]: "But now you violate and violate the law.

And thou art angry with thine anointed. Thou destroyest the covenant of thy servant, and treadest down his crown to the ground. Thou hast broken down all his walls, and hast broken down his strongholds. All who pass by rob him; he has become a mockery to his neighbors. Thou hast exalted the right of his foes, and gladdened all his enemies. Thou hast also taken away the power of his sword, and hast not let him prevail in battle. Thou destroyest his cleanness, and thou dost bring down his throne to the ground. Thou shortenest the days of his youth, and coverest him with scorn." So much for this Psalm.

The first part is "to be forsaken", in which one part many evils are included, namely what Ps. 89, 39. says: "You violate, you reject, you are angry with your anointed. This is nothing else than that the church or the kingdom of Christ is forsaken concerning faith, as Paul predicted [1 Tim. 4, 1.]: "In the last times some shall depart from the faith, and cleave unto seducing spirits." And Christ says Luc. 18, 8: "When the Son of Man shall come, thinkest thou that he also shall find faith on the earth?" This is certainly done, and has been done for a long time, with so many ceremonies, so many sects, so many orders, consuming themselves in vain all over the world, with many cries day and night, with many prayers, with many sermons, with many masses; and with all these things nothing is accomplished: daily everything only becomes much worse.

And even those who cry out in truth with the groaning of the Spirit are not heard, that these abominations should be cast out of the church. It is time to cry out, but the Lord would not be appeased because of the sins of our exceedingly ungodly Manasseh, who has forgotten God and begun to care for his own. Thus it comes about that everywhere one looks at the splendor of [false] spirituality (religionum), the outward appearance of Christianity, the hypocrisy of works and the shadow of the Gospel, but there is no power of faith and no love. Love has grown cold and godlessness is rampant, and only a torture chamber of consciences is left, since God is leaving us.

218 The second is, "that he is a worm and no man, a mockery and contempt of the people," a laughing stock, a mockery, an object of displeasure and blasphemy. For after superstition and the pretense of godliness have taken root, so that they are now secure, and will not even tolerate another way, much less be anxious for it or seek it, the Christian faith has become a marvelous mockery to them, because one must not speak against their pretensions. If you should undertake this, as indeed faith does when it is there, you will soon be rejected as a heretic and disgraced a thousandfold. Nowadays there are quite obvious examples of this.

219. Therefore Christ is a fear, a contempt, a laughter and a mockery of the people to us, out of fear of the most holy governor of Christ and his whole priesthood, who, since he cannot stand the doctrine of faith (for faith cannot exist at the same time as papal doctrine, since the latter is hypocrisy and pretense, the latter truth and right), must necessarily glorify himself and, under the honorable name of Christ, sully the Christian being with all dishonor: so that he must be a Christian, not who believes in Christ, but who obeys the pope; and a heretic, not who denies the articles of faith, but who does not revere the pope. But it is done for Christianity when the governor of Christ reigns. For then God begins to disturb the covenant of His servant and to desecrate His sanctuary on earth, that is, to trample His crown to the ground, so that not the King Christ, but the man of sin reigns over us in His holy place.

Thirdly. How could we believe that "the many bulls and fat oxen" are other people than those strong giants, the monstrous bishops, who are neither priests nor princes, but the most shameful monsters, who are fused together from what glistens (fuo) in these two estates, together with the monks and the spiritual voluptuaries, whom we call provosts, deans, officials, canons, vicars and our lords. For of these the church and the

The faith of the church is so imprisoned, surrounded and oppressed that it would be easier to subjugate the tyrannical kingdoms of the pagans to the faith than to outline these people's exceedingly splendid ceremonies, which have swollen to an incredible mass, since nothing of the truth can be seen in front of their profusion, so completely have they filled the whole of Jerusalem to overflowing (ad os).

These teach with their mouths wide open nothing but the most sacred rights of the Pope, and the teachings of Aristotle and natural reason, so much so that they have also invented the high schools (universalia studia) for the furtherance of this devastation, in which all that would be born of the baptism of Christ, especially the people of outstanding talent and aptitude, should be swallowed up quickly by the workers hired with dignities and prebends and titles of honor.

222 And this devouring, which is worthy of hell, must not be called the work of a roaring and ravaging lion, but of a shepherd who instructs and teaches in the best way, to which they add that they think they do right when they take away the faith and the confessors of the faith and destroy them with church punishments (censuris), with fire and sword; and even so they must not be accused of being roaring lions.

Fourth. What must necessarily follow from these evils is that the church is poured out like water, the bones are severed, the heart melts in the body, the powers dry up, the tongue sticks to the roof of the mouth, and it is laid in the dust of death.

For what do our sneezes hold less today than the souls baptized into Christ and redeemed with His blood? Do we not see that bishoprics, parishes and other pastoral offices are distributed with such levity, even spilled and poured out, that the more unlearned and wicked someone is, the easier he can get in and even several are transferred to him? so that they do not regard the great multitudes of souls differently than water, which is spilled in the most cruel and contemptible way. Certainly, these money-grubbing birds of prey will not be able to Christ's people are not commanded to pasture, not imposed, but poured out completely, again neither taken up nor gathered by them; but they let it flow and go, that what will perish there may perish, if they only keep their income (census).

(225) Why is it surprising that the bones are divided and that there is such weakness in the people of Christ that no member learns or knows how to help the other, so much so that through this satanic rule even those who should be the bones and the strength of the people, namely those who are firmer in faith and word, cannot help anyone. For not learned, godly and good men are admitted to these offices, who would be useful for the bones of one to support the other and the flesh, but in the highest place are only the oxen and the bulls. Thus it happens that at last even the best hearts fade away and perish, for they are abandoned by the ministry of the Word and lack brotherly comfort. Therefore, the power must necessarily dry up and the example of good works must completely cease, so that in such a way neither faith, nor good conscience, nor works of love can be seen in the church.

But when the power is dried up, and the use of the works of love is taken away, it is impossible to preach the gospel in a right way, for the tongue will stick to the palate, and the gospel, as it is done now, will hardly be presented according to the bare words; that is, if it is not tasted by the experience of faith and the custom of life, nor known by a living sensation, it is impossible that it should be taught fully and effectively. For he is (as they say) not mighty (compos) of what he speaks, therefore he cannot act it rightly. For that is taught coldly and with little fruit, which is taught without the movement of the heart, just as he speaks with difficulty, whose dry tongue sticks to the roof of his mouth.

So Christ remains in the church, but poured out like water; the bones remain, but separated; the heart remains, but melted; the powers remain, but

The tongue remains, but it sticks to the palate; for Christ and his members must remain until the end of the world. And we see that the gospel has remained in the public sermons and in the private masses, but in such a way that it is not handled with the pretense of teaching and exhorting, but that only the syllables, as is the custom, are recited and read from the pulpit, but those fable preachers immediately turn the sermon to other things, namely, to things of no value. By doing this, they themselves become those birds of the air [Luc. 8:5] that trample on and eat the seed they had thrown along the way. Now if the gospel is thus acted upon in the most careless manner, what is this but that the dry tongue of Christ sticks to the roof of the mouth? For there is no lack of people who would like to hear it, but there is no one to tell it to them in a lively and well-ordered way.

This is the way in which the church is laid in the dust of death, that nowhere its form or a trace of it comes to light, and yet the world is full of the lips, tongues and voices of preachers, but nowhere the well-moistened and moving tongue of Christ. What an abomination it is to see such things! With how great a maw and gluttony are the souls devoured here that are born in Christ, so that one could speak the word Ps. 89:48: "Why wilt thou have created all men in vain?"

229. In addition, take that dogs and the evil ones have surrounded him, who also dig through his hands and feet. These are the rulers in the churches, who even penetrate the Christians with their pernicious teachings, persecute them and chase them into their nets. So completely are they not satisfied that they have concealed and suppressed the gospel. For even Isaiah [Cap. 56, 10. f.] calls such people dumb dogs, who will not bark, and yet at the same time are quite insolent and insatiable. For what do they preach but what serves their insatiable avarice? How they bite, bark, scream and rage against the souls, the life and the goods of the people, in order to protect the goods of their church and of the

To increase and preserve the inheritance of Christ! With these iron and hard nails they dig through, slander, condemn, banish the hands and feet of Christ, and make them useless, that is, the right works and the right opinions of the Spirit. For that the words of doctrine are called "nails" is proved by Ecclesiastes 12:11, where it is said, "The words of the wise are spears and nails driven in deep," just as arrows, swords, and other weapons of war are nothing but doctrines.

230 So to dig through the hands and feet is nothing other than this: Even if there are still some left who punish the ungodly superstition of those people, and strive to teach the right works and the right judgment about Christian things, they still crucify and condemn them with their decrees, church punishments and curses, and make them completely powerless, so that they maintain their ungodliness.

And here God takes away the strength of the Christian sword, and does not help in this war, as the 89th Psalm, v. 44, says, and lets the truth fall and ungodliness prevail, so that strong errors rule over the children of unbelief, so that they believe in ungodliness, because they have not accepted the love of truth, so that they would be saved [2 Thess. 2, 11. 10.]. And these are the abominations of the pope and his church.

232 Moreover, they search the body of the church in such a way that one would like to count all its bones, that is, no one can remain hidden from them, but as soon as someone should be suspicious, even in some corner of the world, the traitors drag him out into the open and stretch him according to all their desire. For whom does the confession of the ears let remain hidden from the pope, even if he were still so far away? Therefore, it must no longer be assumed that some of Christ's bones are hidden somewhere; they will be completely brought to light and counted wherever they may be, either by the scouts of secret confession or by the torturers and torturers, as I have said.

233. with all these things, however, so much is lacking in them that they can be influenced by any feeling of the

They should be moved by pity and compassion for the souls that they are constantly destroying here through the action of Satan, that they even laugh and rejoice, taking pleasure in seeing and hearing that the church is so oppressed, dug through hand and foot, and that everything is going well according to their liking. For so the papists have often rejoiced with their idol of this desolation, when with their impiety they have overcome the ministers and promoters of right godliness.

The last part is that they divide the garments and cast lots over the unsewn skirt. For after they had suppressed everything concerning the word and faith, so that neither the power of the oral word nor the fruit of faith blossomed publicly in the church, there was only one memorial left, by the sight of which (inspectu) we could remember Christ and nourish ourselves by this memory, and renew ourselves again to the word and faith, namely the holy Scriptures, which are not recited orally, but are contained in the letters. For this Paul commands Timothy, that he should stop with reading [1 Tim. 4, 13.], and Christ Himself Joh. 5, 39.: "Search the Scriptures, for it is they that testify of Me," and Matth. 22, 29. He chastises the Sadduceans: "Ye do err, and know not the Scriptures, neither the power of GOD." In the Scriptures, therefore, the truth of faith is found wrapped up, as Christ is wrapped up in His garments. For where the oral word and the faith and the works of Christ are gone, we have nothing left of him but the Scriptures alone.

That is why in the last place this disgrace is sung about, and the evangelists, because the Spirit was with them, realized what would happen to the books they wrote to us about Christ. And although this disgrace caused Christ little pain, this figure meant not a slight but the most extreme damage to the church, since the spirit of faith could be drawn from the Scriptures; words and works would then have flowed from faith, and the honor of the church would have remained largely unharmed.

236. but he prophesies twofold disgrace to the Scriptures: the dividing and the giving away. First we want to say about the dividing. Many hundred years ago this secret of wickedness began to stir, so that the extremely simple sense of the very simple Scriptures was divided into many. This evil is due to Origen, then to his successor Jerome, who (as I believe) are holy and chosen men. For even then, the elect began to be led into error, so that they twisted the word of Paul 2 Cor. 3, 6: "The letter killeth, but the spirit quickeneth", so that they called the letter the historical mind, the spirit the secret (mysticum) mind, by an exceedingly unfortunate imitation of the apostle Paul, who introduces Gal. 4, 24. f. the secret interpretation of Abraham and his wives, but does not call them letter or spirit.

Something like this, writes Philo (as Eusebius tells in the Church History), was also done by the Christians in Alexandria. In that city there was then a famous school of Christians, after that which had been under the apostles at Antioch. It seems that Origen followed the example of the same, and since he added to his own, stumbled too much, until he finally taught that the historical mind is the literal one, which must be despised, and only the spiritual one must be accepted. But at that time the spirit, which was still glowing in the church, resisted him and condemned his books, since a great storm arose, because by such action he gave the apostate Porphyrius great and right cause to ridicule Christian scholarship (philosophiae).

But when the fathers were gone, and it became worse and worse with the following generations, the Scriptures began to be torn in many ways, until it came to the high schools (universitates), and the kingdom of Antichrist was confirmed in the hand of the Roman pope, since now no longer the secret of wickedness, but wickedness itself worked, and the abomination stood publicly in the holy place. Since Christ was eradicated with faith, his [the pope's] apostle with the most distinguished, St. Thomas with Lyra and his own, began in

To spread throughout the world the fourfold meaning of Scripture: the literal, the moral, the secret, and the deeper meaning (literalem, tropologicum, allegoricum et anagogicum), and to divide this garment of Christ into these four parts, so that each part would have for itself its authors, explorers, and teachers, as it were brave warriors and bold destroyers of Scripture.

239 By this they have brought about that they have the words of Scripture, but so fragmented and torn up that they have left us absolutely nothing of a consistent understanding with which we might clothe our souls. For even St. Thomas, with all the Thomists and all the scholastic teachers in general, never had or taught the right and true understanding of even one chapter, neither in Paul, nor in the Gospel, nor in any book of Scripture, as experience clearly proves.

240 For where are the men who have dealt with Paul or the gospel in due and right understanding? And yet they praise the precepts of these verses:

Litera gesta docet, quid credas allegoria, Moralis quid agas, quo tendas anagogia.

[The letter teaches what has happened; the secret interpretation, what you should believe; the moral interpretation, what you should do; the deeper meaning, what you should hope].

241 Is it not exceedingly ungodly to divide the Scriptures in such a way that you should ascribe neither faith nor morals nor hope to the letter, but only history, which is useless; so to the secret interpretation faith, not morals, not even hope; to tropology morals; to anagogy hope? As if Paul did not say, 2 Tim. 3, 16. f.: "All scripture inspired by God is profitable for doctrine, for judgment, for correction, for chastening in righteousness, that a man may be perfect unto all good works." Dearly beloved, what do they do with this tearing but to show that they understand nothing at all in the Scriptures, neither of faith, nor of hope, nor of morals.

242. Therefore it happened that they told the stories of the excellent fathers, Abraham, Isaac and the saints of all the people of Israel did not act to teach the faith (as the apostle does in the letter to the Hebrews chapter 11), but despised them as dead histories, so to speak, and dreamed up I do not know what kind of concepts (sensus) of faith and morals and hope. Through this godlessness they have taken this garment from us and torn it and instead of it they have put on us (as Isaiah calls it Cap. 59, 6.) "cobwebs", that is, decrees and statutes, and what is the greatest abomination, the ethics of the wicked boy Aristotle for the garments of Christ.

Thus we see that the Scriptures are with them, but divided and torn by their fourfold division into useless and uncertain lobes, so that they can serve neither for the teaching of faith nor of morals. Namely, the lack of understanding has taken over to such an extent that they did not understand grammar properly, and from what they found said in figurative speech, they made this secret interpretation (mysticum), that is, something that has no sense and understanding.

Now if the Spirit had not declared beforehand [John 19:23] that this tearing of the Scriptures should remain within the limits of the fourfold understanding, they would certainly have invented as many understandings as grammatical figures are used in the Scriptures, since they did not have so much understanding and judgment that they could have taken allegory, tropology and anagogy for one and the same. For it is the spiritual, the moral, and the deeper sense one and the same thing, which the apostle does not call any sense of Scripture (for Scripture has no more than a single, quite simple sense), but speaking in mysteries, saying 1 Cor. 14:2, "But in the Spirit 1) he speaketh mysteries." For this thing moves outside of Scripture in the freedom of the Spirit, and has nothing to do with the treatment of Scripture, but is in itself especially another kind of proceeding (studii), while Scripture remains the very most conspicuous teaching of all faith, hope, love, and all good works.

245. in addition to this fourfold certification

1) In all editions: Spiritus, but in the Vulgate, as in our Bible, spiritu.

they have introduced another abomination into the Scriptures, which here the prophet calls the lot about the unsewn skirt. For all of them admit what Christ John 10:35 says: "The Scripture cannot be broken," and that its reputation must be completely inviolable, so that one may neither contradict it nor deny it. This assumption or major, [that] the perfect knowledge of the will of God 2) in theology must be drawn from Scripture, is constantly admitted by all. But where it comes to the subordinate and the minor, these warriors soon make a mere mockery of Scripture by their arbitrary glossing and distinguishing, so that they destroy the power and prestige of the whole of Scripture. For even nowadays neither the pope nor a Thomist can be overcome by Scripture, even if he admits the prestige of Scripture. "Let us not divide the skirt (they say), but let us loose it therefore, that it may be." [John 19:24.]

246 Is it not a loosening of the Scriptures, when they are drawn at will wherever they please? Do not the magistri nostri in the high schools give themselves authority from hand to hand to interpret the Scriptures? until it has come to the point with them that they ridicule him who cites the Scriptures, while they argue (as they say) on quite insurmountable grounds of reason. So they draw lots, since they do not teach what the Scriptures require, but each tries his luck how to adapt them to his own sense and make them his own. For this happens, because they argue with each other and dispute and interpret it, not without danger. This means, in truth, that by lot they gain the robe of Christ, for no one thinks that it is his, because he has overcome the opponent and has drawn the Scriptures to his mind.

247. in this lot, the pope (as befits him) is the chief of the soldiers, who teaches by a general commandment established for all that it is his alone to read the Scriptures with complete certainty 3).

to explain. He allows others to do this only in a magisterial way, in a disciplinary way, and in an investigative way, but not in such a way that the interpretation is conclusive (non determinative). For he plays with his fellow players in such a way that the lot must fall on him alone, and it lies in his hand alone to interpret the Scriptures. Yes, with the victory in this game it has already come about that the pope is elevated above the Scriptures, and not unjustly, because the lord of a thing is rightly elevated above his thing (which he also attained by the lot and by playing), so that he may also dispense against the gospel and divine right; for example:

248 A work of this looseness is what he teaches in the extravagant "of the vows and the fulfillment of the vow" of the vows, where he draws the word [2 Mos. 13, 13.] that the firstborn of the ass shall be loosed with a sheep, to the effect that he is free to change a vow; and in some earlier distinctions of the decree about his primacy he calls himself the rock, and the church the Roman church, and the keys the right to give laws. And Isa. 10, 15. he makes the other churches, which are oppressed by the Roman pope, out of the saw, which is pulled by the sawyer, and what he does in the chapter *Solita*e and in the chapter Significasti, we have said elsewhere 1). The whole mass of his decrees and decrees is full of such casting of lots.

Therefore we now have the sacred Scripture as such that, though it be presented in a simple manner, without dividing it into four parts in the manner aforesaid, yet it shall not be permitted to be taught in any other sense than that which we expect to be uncertain by the Roman See. The lot is cast and the understanding of Scripture is sought, but since it is not up to us to give a final decision, and it is uncertain where the most holy shrine of His most sacred heart will incline (except where it is certain that Scripture is perverted to be strengthen its benefit and tyranny), we must worship chance and (as Isaiah Cap. 65, 11. [Vulg.] says) the table of fortune.

Here belong the declarations of submissiveness in religious matters and the protestations that tend to take place in the high schools, in the churches and in all sermons. No one dares to say: This is the Scripture, but: I testify (they say) that I do not want to say anything that is against the holy Roman church. What do they teach among the people of God today? Nothing but the uncertain reservation of the most holy shrine of the heart, which, not possessed by a devil, floods the whole world far and wide with terrifying abominations of lies.

Thus we have the Scripture as such, neither denied nor divided, and remains the unsewn skirt wrought from above through and through, but by the looseness of wicked popes and theologians the Scripture becomes a mere mockery and an uncertain possession. For how could one teach a certain faith if one makes the meaning uncertain?

O a frightful picture, that not only the voice of the gospel should be cut off, but also the letter of it should be made doubtful, and subject to uncertainty, lest there should be any hope of bringing it to life again! And these are the people who teach best nowadays, teaching that everything is uncertain, and do not want anything to be regarded as asserted by them, while faith, if it is not quite certain, cannot be faith.

253 Here now behold these gates of hell, the high schools, the mothers of the doctors, and with how fatal a name they are called scholae [schools], that is, ludi [games], in that with this name almost this ungodly looseness is attached to them; and how rightly the teachers have been called scholastici, that is, ridiculous people, or also, those who do their play with something.

254 If you do not know who those four soldiers are [I will tell you], they are our honorable magistri nostri, who deceive with the fourfold sense of the Scripture (and in this they are not yet the worst), and with the fourfold sense of the Scripture they deceive with the fourfold sense of the Scripture (and in this they are not yet the worst).

1) In the writing "An den christlichen Adel deutscher Nation," Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. X, 303, § 72.

by the looseness of their mockeries (which they call interpretations) make a mockery of the Scriptures. "And this (says the evangelist [John 19:24.]) did the soldiers." Who knows whether this number "four" was not also meant to indicate that the future high schools would consist of four faculties, by which he [the Holy Spirit] wanted to warn us [and indicate] of how great an abomination these exceedingly glorious mothers of studies would stink before God. Here belongs the excellent ninth chapter of Revelation about the four angels, the steeds, the hairs, the crowns, the locusts coming out of the bottomless pit, so that we do not see the high schools more clearly depicted in any other place.

255. how if the apostle Eph. 4, 14. had also wanted to indicate these abominations, when he says: "that we might no longer be children, and be weighed and lulled by all manner of wind of doctrine, by the craftiness of men, and deceitfulness, that they might deceive us"? For in the Greek it is Ἐν τῇ χυβείᾳ τῶν ἀνθρώπων, ἢ πανουργία τῆς πλάνης. It

But χυβεία comes from the game of dice, so that it is actually nothing other than to use the words of God like dice, claim nothing certain in them, but throw them on different opinions. It seems that with this word he deliberately wanted to interpret this casting of lots of the soldiers, and that he especially clearly foretold these players with the Scriptures, the popes, bishops and magistros nostros. For what do they do with these untruthful opinions and uncertain doctrines but that they weigh and weigh, drive and force us, who are children, with all kinds of wind of doctrine, wherever they want? Now he also punishes with the word πανουργία (deception) their evil doing, or, as Jerome calls it, the play of the jugglers (circulatorum). For if even in the time of Jerome there were deceivers who, after the manner of jugglers, played with the Scriptures and hypocritically brought forth all that was popular from them, since the mystery of wickedness alone was stirring: what then do we think has happened in the meantime, since wickedness has increased in the course of so many centuries, and what is happening now, since abomination reigns? See the books of the

If you look at the popes and the doctors, you will see nothing but deception. And this may be enough of this frightening lot and the dividing of the garments.

We have now seen how the spirit of the prophet in the passion of Christ deals primarily with that which belongs to the service and custom of the Word, namely, with ungodly teachers and unholy hearers. For the prophet is silent about what evil life is and does in the church, but the passion of Christ is not silent about it. We want to talk a little about this in order to give good hearts an occasion [for contemplation]. Because wickedness in life is so evident that it can easily be recognized by all, and the desolation of faith, the suppression of the word, and the sacrilegious procedure with the holy Scriptures goes along brazenly under the most glaring titles, therefore it is not presented to us for contemplation in prophetic words, but only by the sight of Christ.

The head of Christ means Christ Himself, or the faith and teachings of Christ, whose hair and beard mean those who are next to Christ, namely the shepherds of the people, who preside over the people with the word of God. For thus he says Ps. 68, 22. that he will shatter their hair skull, that is, the priests of the synagogue; and Isa. 3, 24. that he will give a bald head for a frizzy hair; and in the Song of Songs the bride sings [Cap. 5, 11.] that the hair of her bridegroom is black as a raven, that is, the hidden ones in the spirit and the holy shepherds are without all beautiful appearance; and [Cap. 5, 2.] that his locks are full of dew and night drops, that is, she praises the apostles and apostolic men, the shepherds in the church. Thus the Spirit also modeled the very proud and splendid priesthood of the Jews through the exceedingly luxuriant and very beautiful hair of Absalom [2 Sam. 14, 26.]; and Ps. 133, 2. is sung that the balm on Aaron's head flowed down into his beard, and from his beard into the hem of his garments, that is, that the grace of the Spirit came into the people through the shepherds, through the ministry of pure doctrine.

259 Further, that the thorns signify either the ungodly, or covetousness, or the riches of the ungodly, Christ enforces.

Luc. 8, 14, where he interprets the seed that is choked by thorns as the word that is hindered by the cares of this world and the deceitfulness of riches. And in the Song of Songs it says Cap. 2, 2. "As a rose among thorns, so is my friend among daughters." And 2 Sam. 23:6 [Vulg.], "The wicked shall be plucked up as thorns." And Judg. 9, 15. 20. Jotham calls Abimelech a thorn bush, and the men of Shechem thorns. And Ps. 118, 12, it is said, "They dwell as a fire in thorns." This is to say that thorns are ungodly teachers, belly servants who have given in to the riches and cares of this life, as all Scripture presents them, as we have said above.

260. From this it is easy to understand what this crown of thorns is, which the soldiers have woven and placed on Jesus' head, namely this basic soup of the most godless people, the pope, the cardinals, the bishops, and all that there are of prelates, of colonels, who hold each other most tenaciously and have joined themselves to each other and give each other a helping hand, who have become fat with unspeakable riches (for they say that they were great thorns) and choked with the outrageous indulgence and ostentation of this world. And yet the church suffers these unlearned, tasteless 1) people in their high position, under the hair of their head, that is, superior to pastors and ministers of the Word. For they are powerful and oppress them, while they themselves are no more capable and useful for the word and faith than a crown of thorns for the head and the hair of Christ, in that they are only very powerful in tormenting and oppressing the pastors and ministers of the people with their tyrannical handling of the law.

In the meantime, by doing violence to the holy head of faith and word, they also disfigure the whole face with the hair and the beard in the most shameful way with much blood, so that it no longer has any beauty. This is done because, since the most shameful life goes unpunished and is the most

The most unrestrained, in miserliness, courtliness, indulgence, unchastity, and the most disreputable deeds, make the whole course of the church bloody, that is, more worldly than the world itself, more carnal than the carnal themselves.

For what is more worldly today than the most holy governor of Christ and his cardinals, bishops and prelates? What king has greater territories, 2) what prince greater riches, who has greater splendor, prosperity, idle days, and everything that can only be imagined, or has ever been, than this kingdom of the pope for the glory of God and the glorification of the holy church? Meanwhile, those who should teach the Word have hardly the bread, and yet dare not speak. So completely has this crown of thorns suppressed and covered the whole head, including hair and beard.

This is what they wanted with their most sacred decrees, with which they prevent the devil's counsel, so that no one should stop their extremely harmful vices, so that a subordinate should not judge a superior, so that a layman should not rebuke a clergyman, so that the pope himself should not be punished by a council. For they have arranged everything in such a way that their wickedness would remain unpunished, and they would have safe liberty to subordinate themselves to any thing, as is the case today. Thus reigns this man of sin and the child of perdition, the pope. Now the word of Isaiah [Cap. 53, 2] is fulfilled with the form of Christ: "He had no form nor beauty." For who nowadays sees in the clergy anything but avarice, presumption, fornication and all shameful deeds, and so completely unpunished that if you oppose them, you will be banished, as if you had offended the church of God and attacked its ministers, while they themselves, as the highest part of the church, should represent the exceedingly lovely image of Christ in the purest way through holy life and teaching. Where is now the figure of the church? There was no figure (says he [Isa. 53, 2. 3.]), therefore we have esteemed them nothing.

Now we come to the purple robe, which is a garment of kings; it also signifies a kingdom. It seems to me entirely that this is the conspicuous (insignificant) work of the Antichrist, by which the pope, through the agency of Satan, has restored the fallen Roman Empire and subdued it, bringing it from the Greeks (as he says) to the Germans. For what is this discarded purple robe (for they also clothed Christ not with a delicious and usable purple robe, but with one that had already been worn and was no longer worn) other than the Roman Empire, which the pope usurped at the time when it had already withered and fallen?

265. The pope did not transfer this empire to the Germans for any other reason than that he subjugated these wild but simple and reliable people by this glittering great deed (ostento), and by it made himself secure and protected in all his authority, that he did not make them, but made himself Roman emperor, yes, ascribed the name of emperor and the title of emperorship to a barbarian people (as they say), but kept for himself the cause and the right, and now became no longer a Roman emperor, but the emperor above the Roman emperor. In order to fulfill this all the more cunningly, he saw to it that his clergymen, namely the three greatest bishops of Germany, were mixed into it and made electors of the empire.

Therefore, the church, instead of being clothed in the garments of Christ, is now clothed in the glory of the empire, is not based on word and faith, not on the Scriptures, but trusts in the temporal arm and the bloody empire. For this empire has cost the Germans so much blood that the spirit did not wish in vain that this mantle should be purple. Nevertheless, the most holy governor of God and the church still lean on it, still the foolish German people shed their blood in streams for these abominations, and one sings to them: The empire is not outside the church, that is, Christ is not mocked differently than in the purple robe. Yes, it was considered good to call this kingdom "holy", because it is not prepared by God, but by the most holy governor of God, to whom 1) everything he wants is holy. Thus, the exceedingly unhappy church must allow itself to be surrounded and mocked by the glory of this imaginary kingdom, and sits in the middle of this kingdom in a frightening form.

267. that they give the Lord a reed in his right hand seems to me to mean that after the tyranny of this Roman antichrist was established through the fictitious empire of uneducated Germany, philosophy and empty deceit were introduced, as the apostle Col. 2, 8. predicted (and he calls this in another place "powerful errors" [2 Thess. 2, 11.]), by which one began to rule the unhappy people of Christ with a new kind of doctrine, that is, to seduce, and to draw away from the Gospel of God. To this destruction was added the issuing of the papal decrees, or as the apostle says [Col. 2, 20. 22.], the commandments and statutes of men of the world. And out of these two wells of the abyss rose those locusts that devastated the earth [Rev. 9, 2. ff.], namely the teachers of the two faculties, theology and law. For by their wisdom the papal tyranny is exercised; they sit in all the ecclesiastical districts: namely, the jurists hold the consistories, the theologians the preaching chairs in the churches. Both teach nothing of the things of Christ, but of the Pabst and Aristotle, and inculcate them in the poor people. Behold, this is the royal scepter and the rod of wickedness, the rod of the kingdom of Antichrist.

268 Not for nothing does Matthew also say [Cap. 27, 29.] that the reed was given to him in his right hand, not in his left, for it should happen that the Antichrist would not command his teachings, with which he mocked the church, under the pretense of ruling the church, merely over the bodies and temporal things, which are on our left, as bourgeois.

1) Instead of Hui in the editions, Wohl should read eni.

He would break into the consciences and ensnare them before God and in spiritual things, which are at our right hand, and rule in God's place with lightning and church punishments, and drive the people to believe that they sinned no less when they did not accept His commandments than when they rejected God's commandments, yes, they feared them more than God's commandments, so that only the reed ruled in the right hand of the church. For that is how they twisted the word 1 Sam. 10, 22.: "Obedience is better than sacrifice", and they so exalted this god-robbing obedience and strengthened it with lying signs that followed their church punishments, that they completely destroyed the obedience of faith and did not even think of it.

And what is the doctrine of philosophy and spiritual law but a dead, barren, and empty reed? which, like a full and strong wood, a scepter more falsely pretends (mentitur) than really represents; in truth, a vain deceit. For in such a doctrine nothing but vanity and falsehood is put forward under the title and name of science and godliness, whereby faith, which alone is truth, is not taught, but of garments, food, houses, bodies, days, persons, and other things, how to consecrate them, how to keep them, and how to make a distinction between them, and innumerable other quite trivial peculiarities of a seeming pretense, by which the simple-minded rabble is seduced from the truth to a trivial nature. This is the bickering of the falsely famous art and the unspiritual loose talk, 1) which the apostle commanded Timothy [1 Tim. 6, 20] to avoid.

(270) But apart from the nothingness, the reed also contains another mystery, which Christ interpreted in Matt. 11:7, when he said, "Why did you go out into the wilderness to see? Did you want to see a reed that the wind weaves to and fro?" namely, that the gospel speaks of a continual

1) Jena and Erlangen inanis. The Wittenberg and the Weimar have novitas according to the Vulgate, which offers novitates.

But the empty deceitfulness of papist doctrine and philosophical theology is nothing but a reed of opinions and questions, which is moved to and fro by winds and never lets the consciences rest in peace, and, as Isaias Cap. 28, 10, there is nothing here but: "Give here, give there; wait here, wait there; here a little, there a little," until it has come to the shrine of the heart. There never arose anything more inconstant, more wicked, more lying, more void under the sun than this, and yet the people in so many lands have to go by its inconstancy. O, what a fury of the wrath of God!

But the mocking worship, in which they bow their knees and say [Matth. 27, 29. Hail, King of the Jews", means, as it seems to me, the desolate disorderly being, which nowadays is called worship both in the aforementioned teachings and in the custom of men, while the right worship is faith, hope and love towards God and the neighbor, by which the old man is killed, and the new one is renewed from day to day, where pure prayers, wholesome fasts and mutual goodwill bear fruit in very good life.

But since this true worship has already been extinguished by the papist reed, another worship has been established, which consists in building large and costly, enormous (moles) churches up to the heavens, and that in innumerable quantities, then in filling them inside with vessels, panels, paintings, sculptures and the most precious carvings more than they are adorned, moreover, the holy garments of the priests of inestimable value are multiplied innumerable. Then, when this is prepared for this service, there is also an increase in the number of people who are scorched and smeared on their fingers, who, in order not to have built such large houses in vain, fill them with nonsensical shouting or incessant murmuring, and sing the hymns and masses as if they wanted to be considered that they were really mocking from the bottom of their hearts, unless they, caught up in the folly of papal doctrine, did not realize that this frenzied being was nothing but a mockery.

Other than worshipping Christ with bended knees, after he has already been scourged, crowned with thorns and clothed in the purple robe.

If this is not mocking Christ and his people, which is the church. Dear, what then is mocking? People should come together to pray and have some kind of houses to hear God's word. But now one comes together to shout, to feast the ears and eyes, and everything is built and decorated to tickle the senses of the flesh. For this purpose bells, organs and all kinds of musical instruments have been brought into the temple of God as an altar from Damascus [2 Kings 16:10, 11], for by all these things God is ridiculed like an idol worthy of mockery. For with this display of ceremonies (as I have said), faith and love, the right worship of God, are not only not nourished, but also extinguished, so that people, instead of faith, learn to trust in such works, and instead of practicing love, throw away their possessions to adorn these stones and wood, taking the need of their neighbor for nothing in the meantime.

And this deplorable error of the people is increased by these busy and blasphemous popes and bishops, priests and monks, who, under the pretense of purgatory, seek to satiate their infinite avarice by devouring the goods of the whole world. For there is no end of anniversaries, vigils, masses and other (so-called) endowments, in all of which you can find nothing of a divine commandment, indeed, everything that is contrary to the divine commandments, since God has placed His service in faith and love; but those people put it in their ceremonies, customs and works, which they themselves have invented.

This is the service of Moloch in the valley of Hinnom. For as Manasseh (as his name indicates) had forgotten God and His law, and had caused his children and those of his people to pass through the fire [2 Kings 21:6], and, lest the crying of the burning children should be heard, with timbrels and other musical instruments he had made a sound.

great stupefying noise was made (as they say), by which the minds of the parents were distracted, so that they steadfastly bore the so cruel and blasphemous death of their children, and thought that they had done God the highest service by it: so do they also act in this service of our Moloch, where they, with so much splendor of dresses, vessels, voices, offerings, organs, and with preaching and praising of these things, as it were with kettledrums and trumpets, drown in eyes and ears, meanwhile do not understand with how blasphemous idolatry they corrupt so many souls and sacrifice them to the hellish fire, yes, before this nonsensical service they do not even think of the right and true service of God.

But that his [Christ's] head is beaten with this reed means that these holy, that is, cursed decisions of the church are used to give a final judgment (descendendis) in questions of faith (as they call it). Although they do not publicly deny Christ, nor do they cut off his head, since pure faith must remain in some people until the end of the world, it nevertheless suffers public tyranny from this reed, and it is not decided according to the spirit of truth and according to the prestige of the Scriptures, but according to the reed of the pope, according to void human statutes (while they always keep the name of Christ and the church for appearance's sake).

277 Such is this: that the essence of God is neither begotten nor begotten; that the soul is the essential form of the body; that bread and wine are changed on the altar; that the laity are to be given only one form instead of the whole sacrament, and similar abominations, many of which were established at the Council of Costnitz. Yes, everything that the papists like is an article of faith. For at that time truth was truly struck on the head and made a mockery of, yes, struck down with John Hus, and the abomination of the papal statutes was erected in the holy place.

In the meantime, they have not ceased to publicly spit at the truth and mock it to its face. For if anyone there and at Rome or in the schools of the damned, the truth is not spit upon.

Whenever anyone asserted anything as certain, it was unanimously and furiously held up as a curse-worthy heresy that had to be scorned and rejected, and the same accusation is still being made today. Thus the faith lies in ruins, is not only extinguished, but is also a disgrace to its believers, as if it were heretical, annoying, seductive, causes divisions, and is sullied with other such abusive words, so that it, just as Christ in his last suffering was counted equal to the evildoers, so in the same way, after many persecutions of tyrants and heretics, he suffers this as the last persecution, that he is counted among the damned and abominable errors.

Behold, these are the last times of wrath, of which Daniel prophesied [Cap. 7:25, 12:11]. These are the perilous times of which Paul warned [1 Tim. 4, 1. ff. 2 Tim. 3, 1. ff. 1, where all things will be laid waste. This is the terrible prophecy of Christ [Luc. 18, 32. f.], that He will not be delivered to the Jews but to the Gentiles to be scourged, mocked and crucified. For in the Gentile Church all these things are fulfilled under the leadership of the Roman Antichrist, who is a servant of error, an apostle of Satan, the man of sin and the child of perdition. May God grant that the Lord may soon destroy him with the spirit of his mouth and put an end to him with the appearance of his future! Amen.

280. But behold, we have passed over the scourging. We will speak of it recently. The 2nd Psalm, v. 9, teaches that Christ will rule the nations with a rod of iron, and Isa. 11, 4. says: "He will strike the earth with the rod of his mouth." But also 1 Kings 12:4. the people complain about Solomon's very heavy yoke, which Rehoboam [v. 14.] calls "whips" (flagella), saying, "My father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions." Therefore, I believe that the whips and scorpions are the extremely heavy yoke of the pope, who by his laws tortures and severely beats the consciences of the poor people, and especially, I think, the torture is depicted here, by which the poor people are punished.

He tyrannizes in the Sacrament of Penance with the extremely harsh laws of secret and auricular confession and satisfaction.

For who could enumerate with how many wounds the consciences of the Christian people are wounded here, since they were tormented to recall so many generations of sins, their kinds, differences, grandchildren, daughters, members and parts, to present and find them again in detail? Since the matter went as far as the impossible, namely, that the wretched people were urged to confess all their sins, even at the risk of their salvation, and [they were threatened] that they would be lost if they concealed even one sin. Then, the compulsory requirements of penance flooded in, with little prayers, works and other disturbances of the minds, teaching the unfortunate people to do enough for their sins not with faith, but with works.

From this it necessarily followed that the conscience of no man could ever have peace, but was beaten by the compulsion of these tyrannical laws with constant scourging blows. For there can be no peace in the conscience if it does not know that sin is forgiven and that enough has been done for it. But even if works are fulfilled to infinity, the conscience cannot know that sin is forgiven, and yet, according to the doctrine of these godless people, this knowledge is sought through works, whereas only through the promise of God and faith in the same can both forgiveness and peace be attained.

In truth, then, we have been scourged without any cause, so that it can also be said of us with Christ [Ps. 35:15, Vulg.]: "The scourges were swung at me, and I knew nothing about it," that is, there was no cause for it, and I have been showered with scourge blows without guilt. And this, of course, is the yoke of our completely worthless Rehoboam, for whose sake Israel also separated from him, in that the whole Oriental church turned away from the Roman tyrant: but there is still hope that among them there are still seven thousand people left, who have worshiped Baal.

not worship, as there were seven thousand left in the ancient people [1 Kings 19:18].

Now what this is, that Christ, after being mocked, has his clothes put on again, that he is drenched with gall and vinegar, and the like, I leave to others, being satisfied that I have given them an opportunity, since I did not want to be too expansive.

V. 20. But you, Lord, do not be far away; my strength, hasten to help me. 1)

The Hebrew text has, as I think, so: Et tu, o Domine, ne elongaveris, o fortitudo mea, ad auxilium meum festina, or as [the Latin interpreter has better translated Ps. 70, 2: Ad adjuvandum me festina. Although the interpreter changes here, and makes defensionem from auxilium, and conspice from the verbum festinare, and at the same time confuses the distinction; so also the word XXXXX translated by auxilium tuum a me, although in the Hebrew there is neither tuum nor a me, yet auxilium meum might be interpreted to this opinion: You, who are my only help, hasten to help me. So also in German it is said, "Thou art my help and comfort, hasten and help me." For it is thought that the name of God (which is sometimes translated "the strong one") comes from this, as if it were said of helping, because He alone is the Savior of all men, but especially of believers. But more than enough has been said of the verbis that stand without a closer relation (e verbis absolutis), as in this place: Ne elongaveris, that is, do not be far from me, do not hesitate to be with me 2c.

But in this verse he begins to pray and prophesy, because he has already come out of the mud. The lamentations have come to an end, and the struggle of suffering tends to victory, and he now speaks out of other movements of the heart, namely by wanting to sing of the fruit of his suffering, which consists in the conversion of the nations to faith in him, "through the Spirit who sanctifies, since the time he rose from the dead".

He is the one who is dead, namely Jesus Christ our Lord", as Paul says Rom. 1, 4. By this spirit he is powerfully proven to be a son of God through the ministry of the gospel, which makes all blessed who believe in it [Rom. 1, 16].

First, he prays for himself, not for his own sake, but so that the name of God may be proclaimed through him, and so that through his word the nations may be converted to God, and God may be glorified in His mercy. But he continues this prayer in three verses, choosing the words so as to express much and great sorrow. The first verse is this, "But thou, O LORD, be not far off; my strength, haste to help me."

He prays that God may be near and hasten, whether it be that the sufferer feels as if help is far away, or that he prays that God may not leave him long in death. For with all others, God postpones this until the last day. But with this one he hastens to raise him from the dead.

It is not necessary to think that he asks for help to preserve his life, since it is clear from the foregoing how he was laid in the dust of death and was abandoned in a completely different way than the old fathers. For this is the prayer and supplication of which the apostle Hebr. 5, 7. writes that he offered it up with tears to Him who was able to save him from death, and was also heard, because he had God in honor. Therefore, the meaning and cause of this prayer must be taken from the context of this Psalm, lest we think it is like ours or like the ordinary prayers of men who pray for the necessities of this life.

V. 2t. Save my soul from the sword, my lonely from the dogs. 2)

Deus is not in Hebrew, and instead of unicam the translator would have better said solam or solitariam. For he wants to say that his soul is alone, abandoned by all; there is no one who asks for it, takes care of it, comforts it, as it is said in Ps. 142, 5: "I can

2) Vulgate: Lrusairamsa, Dsus, auimam msaru, st äs mauu

I looked to the right, and behold, there is no one who wants to know me. Namely, since loneliness is in itself a cross, it is even more of a plague to be in such great torments without an example and without a companion. But in such a situation we too will have to be in any suffering, or at least in the agony of death, and cry out with the 25th Psalm, v. 16. "Turn to me, and be merciful to me, for I am lonely and wretched."

290. from the word framea [sword] we have in the 9th Psalm [§ 48] and in the 17th Psalm

[It is seen that it comes from the Hebrew, and is called a sword by cutting, and denotes both the persecutor and the persecution itself, because of the fierce and sharp hatred with which the wicked rage against godliness. For the adversaries strive with the greatest effort to exterminate (abscindere) both the godly and godliness and to eradicate them from the memory of men. Therefore, in Scripture, the sword is also ascribed a mouth (os), because it devours the living with its sharpness, as it is said in Deut. 32, 42: "My sword shall devour flesh," and in other places we often read that with the mouth of the sword (in ore gladii with the sharpness of the sword) a city has been smitten or nations slain. So also here Christ complains that he is eaten by the sword, and asks that he may be saved and led out of death.

The same is that he says: "Of the dogs", looking to the title, in which he was called a Hind, which is given up to the dogs. And we see the fierce impetuosity of the dogs against the game, which, if no one resists them, they kill and devour without fail, so that he also wants to express by this word the wild greed of the Jews, with which they seek to devour Christ, and he even, because he was alone, is already devoured. Therefore, he asks to be saved from the power of the dog (de manu canis, that is, the dogs, by a synecdoche), into whose power, as he complains, he has come.

V. 22. Help me out of the lion's mouth, and deliver me from the unicorns.

See the increase: sword, dogs, lions, unicorns; and he does not mention swords, dogs, lions, unicorns, but the sword, which is already raging in his soul and in his life, and the violence of the dogs, the mouth of the lion and the horns of the unicorns, so that he shows that they have not only done something against him, but that they have accomplished their work on him. For he is already in the power of the dog and already mangled, who asks to be delivered from his power, and he is already killed in the lion's den and about to be devoured, who asks to be delivered from the den of the lion, and he has already suffered the horns of the unicorns, who asks to be delivered from the horns of the unicorns. .

What a great cruelty is this, that it could not be sufficiently indicated by the name and the work of the sword alone! But even the fury of a devouring dog, of a devouring lion and of the pouncing unicorns does not fully portray this, because there is no more terrible hatred, no more cruel envy than that with which Satan rages against godliness and the doctrine and teachers of godliness, because not only in one way and with his usual fury he also desires to completely destroy them above all others, because he recognizes that only through this his kingdom in the world is in danger.

294 Of the nature of unicorns we will say more in its place, Ps. 92, 11, where it is said in a good sense: "My horn shall be exalted like a unicorn. Here it is enough to know that this animal has a fury that cannot be pacified, as is the case with a roaring lion and a hunting dog. Moreover, it cannot be tamed, for no unicorn has ever been captured alive, which is also written in Job 39:9-12: "Thinkest thou that the unicorn shall serve thee, and abide at thy crib? Can you tie your yoke to it, to make the furrows, so that it breaks behind you in reasons? Can you rely on him to be so strong?"

let it work? Will you trust him to bring your seed back to you and gather it into your barn?" All this is spoken in terrifying mystery against the people of the law.

295 For the synagogue, which cannot be tamed, is signified by this, which is so puffed up by its righteousness, that it condescends neither to serve Christ, nor to abide at his manger, nor to hear his word, nor to till under him, nor to teach, nor to plow his grounds; but though it have many powers, and abound in works of the law, yet Christ cannot trust it, neither doth he command it his affairs. For she neither brings back the seed, nor gathers it into the barn, that is, she does nothing for the church, nor for the growth of the church. These unicorns, and wild unicorns at that, Christ mentions here. I do not want to say anything here about the fact that one thinks that the rhinoceros is a different animal than the monoceros, or (to say it in German), the rhinoceros is a different animal than the unicorn. For one says that the latter has a small horn on the nose, this however a large horn on the forehead. It is certain that our Latin translator took both for the same.

Humilitatem meam does not stand here (as also almost nowhere in Scripture) for the virtue of the mind, which Paul calls ταπεινοφροσύνη, that is, the attitude of heart, that one strives after low things, not high things, as he interprets Rom. 12, 16. interprets, but affliction and oppression, and in general the figure of lowliness in which the virtue of ταπεινοφροσύνη is exercised, which Bernhard calls humiliatio, not humilitas. Of the latter also Ps. 9, 14. is said, "Behold my misery among the enemies," 2c.; though I do not know whether there is not rather a verbum in the second person in this place, Humiliasti me, that is, thou hast afflicted me, thou hast oppressed me, and made me low. Something quite similar to these four kinds of persecutors is found in the words and manner of speaking of Ps. 51:10, where it is said: "That the bones which thou hast broken may be made merry.

beat" or broke 2c., for which we have [in the Vulgate] the reading: Ossa humiliata.

But there is no doubt that these four things, the sword, the violence of the dogs, the mouth of the lion, the horn of the unicorn, signify the whole multitude of godless teachers who raged against the truth of the faith, just as the Jews raged against Christ. But others may play with secret interpretations, we will follow the story.

V.23. I will preach your name to my brothers, I will praise you in the church.

Dear one, who is this new and admirable preacher and eulogist, who has publicly declared in so many ways that he died and was swallowed up, and finally after his death (and all this he prophesies) it will happen that he will preach and praise the name of God? For it is true that he had to die who predicted such great things about his death, so that he would not die. Again, it must be true that the same one will preach and praise God's name. Thus, either dead and alive at the same time, or risen from the dead, he preaches and praises; not dead and alive at the same time, since this would be impossible and inconsistent. For Christ was not at the same time, or could not be at the same time, a living and a dead man, although he was at the same time a dead man and a living God, in that different natures were in one and the same person, so that one can indeed say with truth that the person was at the same time alive and dead, but not the nature.

Therefore, he proclaims here his resurrection beforehand, yes, the fruit and work of the resurrection, which is the praise and glory of God, that he heard him in the aforementioned prayers and saved him from death. Of this new and wonderful thing, he says, he will preach, praise and give thanks.

But since Paul in his letter to the Hebrews [Cap. 2, 12. 1, this verse must not be regarded coldly, for it briefly comprehends both a mystery and the ministry of the gospel in itself. The mystery is that he calls them [the believers] brethren, and the na-and preaches the praise of God. But the ministry is the ministry of preaching and praise itself. So here again we are to learn what it is to preach the gospel in the church.

For we have often said that the preaching of the New Testament is the preaching of the glory of God, as we have shown in Ps. 8:2, 9:3 and 19:2: "The heavens declare the glory of God" and: "They make your name glorious in all the earth. But at the same time that the name and works of God are preached, the shame and worthlessness of men are also preached, "so that all the world may be guilty of God," and all are found lacking "the glory that they should have in God," Rom. 3:19, 23.

And this is the mystery which is hidden from the wise and understanding. For the word of grace is a word of the cross, an offence to the Jews and a foolishness to the Gentiles, who, not being able to bear that the name of God should be preached and their name condemned, then that the works of God should be preached and their works rejected, blaspheme the name of the Lord, that they might honor their name, and not be subject to the righteousness of God, that they might establish their righteousness. And so, having abominations of idols, they do blasphemous things, as all this is easily understood from what has been said before.

The service is that this word to salvation from the name of the Lord is not only in letters and books, but in public preaching and confession with a living voice, so that it is not only known, but also preached outwardly, with continuance, in season and out of season 2c. Thus it is also said in Ps. 8, 3: "Out of the mouth (not out of the pen) of babes and sucklings thou hast prepared a power," and Ps. 19, 2: "The heavens (not, they consider, but) tell the glory of GOD."

But to go out in public like that and preach freely and challenge the whole world is not in human power. Therefore he says, "I will preach," I will be the one who speaks in them, as he also says to Moses, Ex. 3:14, "I will be who I will be." For a minister of the word must not only punish everything that belongs to the world, but also testify to it by his example, and give up his goods, honor, life, righteousness, wisdom and everything for the word, so that he may first prove in himself what he teaches.

It is therefore a difficult ministry, just as it is an incredible secret that is administered through it. Therefore he reserved this work of power for himself, so that no one would presume to teach from his own strength, but would let Christ preach in himself.

But he also preached the name of the Lord to his brothers in his own person, as Lucas writes in the Acts of the Apostles, Cap. 1, 3, in that he allowed himself to be seen among them for forty days and spoke to them about the kingdom of God.

Therefore away with all the statutes of men, and all that is not Christ! For I (says he) will preach; whereby he hath abolished all doctrine that is not the gospel, because the sheep hear Christ's voice, and not the voice of strangers; but Christ preacheth nothing but the name and praise of God, that is, the grace of God, and the sin of men, as it is said John 16:8: "He shall punish the world for sin, and for righteousness, and for judgment."

306 But that he says, "To my brethren," the apostle exalts Heb. 2:11 ff, saying, "For they are all of one, both he that sanctifieth, and they that are sanctified. Therefore he is not ashamed to call them brethren, saying, I will declare thy name unto my brethren, and in the midst of the congregation will I sing praise unto thee." For this is the exceeding riches of this mystery, that we are brethren, joint heirs with Christ, children of God, kings of the world, and possessors of the ineffable goods with Christ. And who could properly estimate what it is to be a brother of Christ? Everything is comprehended in this One Word.

So we have three things in these words: the ministry of the word, the thing that contains the word, the fruit of the word. The ministry of the word is the preaching of the word; the thing that contains the word is the glory and the name of God, the fruit of the word.

1330 xvi, 340-S42. Interpretations on the Psalms. W. iv, itsi-iscu. 1331 is that we become brothers of Christ through the word and faith in the glory of God, that is: "The gospel is the power of God that saves everyone who believes in it", Rom. 1, 16.

Behold, this is the fruit of Christ's resurrection. This is the Hallelujah, which is so frequent in the Psalter and in the New Testament [Revelation 19:1, 3, 4, 6]. For what does Hallelujah mean but: Praise the Lord? But to praise the Lord is to preach the gospel, so that hallelujah is the true and proper praise of the gospel.

But how many there are who repeat these letters and words Hallelujah all day long, and yet are exceedingly hostile to the Gospel! Hallelujah is not a word of the rich, not of the glorious, not of the mighty, not of the wise, not of the righteous, not of the living, but of the poor, the lowly, the weak, the foolish, the sinner, the dying; for to the poor the gospel is preached. Sinners sing and hear HalleluJah [praise the Lord], but those sing and hear Hallelunu, praise ourselves.

310 The same is what the following part says: "I will boast about you in the church". For "the glory of God" is the same as "the name of God," and "I will boast" indicates the same Christ, the same office, the same danger. For what has been said of him who preaches, the same will be said of him who boasts. And "the church" is the same as "the brethren." Unity, peace, love, and joint-heirship with Christ are indicated on both sides. For the church is flesh of his flesh, and bone of his bone; it is brother, sister, and mother to him.

In this verse, then, everything is exceedingly sweet and pleasant, because the gospel is a joyful message, but only to those who will be brothers; to the others it is a stench of death unto death. This is also followed in very good succession:

v. 24. Glorify the Lord, you who fear him; all the seed of Jacob honor him, and before him all the seed of Israel shun him.

312. by the word that speaks of the praise and the name of god [v. 23.

Faith is encouraged, but not all obey the gospel, but least of all the works saints, who are full and rich in works, before whose eyes there is no fear of God. With them the fruit of the word is lost.

For this reason he turns to those who fear the Lord, who, after hearing the general statement in the Gospel, Romans 3:23, 10, 12: "They are all sinners; there is none righteous, there is none that doeth good," are afraid of this terrifying voice of the Lord, and believe that what they hear is true. Therefore they are displeased with themselves, despairing of themselves, and take refuge in the mercy held out to them, that they may be saved. Behold, these are they that fear the Lord, and glorify him.

314 But as the wicked do not believe that what they hear said against their works is true, so they do not fear or flee to mercy; therefore they do not praise the Lord, whose benefits they neither feel nor seek.

But grace cannot be preached unless sin is also preached. For the giving of the medicine is a very clear proof of the disease, and the more powerful (major) the medicine is, the more severe the disease obviously is. Therefore, if the Gospel exalts the name and glory of God, it also exalts the greatness of our evil and shame. Those who believe it fear, come near and are saved, and praise the Lord. But those who do not believe it ridicule both the physician and their illness, thinking that they are completely healthy.

Yet the prophet exhorts that all the seed of Jacob should honor him. In order that he may be able to do this, he exhorts that all the seed of Israel should shrink from him, desiring that they believe the gospel, so that they may both know themselves and so stand in fear; but after that also the grace of God, and so praise God, because this word of salvation is promised especially to them, as the apostles often said to them in the Acts of the Apostles, especially Paul [Cap. 13, 26]: "Men, brethren, children of the family of Abraham, and those who among you have heard God's word, I pray to you.

fear, unto you is sent the word of this salvation." And soon after [v. 32. f.], "God fulfilled the promise made to our fathers in us their children." But they cast this away, and feared not the LORD; therefore they also became whoredoms of the fathers, after the carnal seed only, Israelites, and the house of Jacob.

317. That is why the prophet carefully prefaced it with, "You who fear the Lord," and then said: "All the seed of Jacob" and "the seed of Israel," so that he showed that those who were without fear could not boast, although they were the seed according to the flesh, and that no one could boast that he was the seed of Jacob and Israel who did not fear the Lord; and therefore all the seed of Jacob and all the seed of Israel do not understand all the Jews in themselves, but only those who fear him. For only these are the true seed of Israel. But what "fear" is, has already been said.

v. 25: For he did not despise nor spurn the affliction of the poor, nor hide his face from him, and when he cried out to him, he heard ([ex]audivit [me]).

This is a verse in Hebrew, and the pronoun me [in the Vulgate] at the end is superfluous. For here he tells the reason why he praises God, and indicates to which people the gospel is useful, namely, as I said, to the poor, oppressed, miserable. For 113, 5. f.: "Who is like the LORD our GOD, who has set himself so high, and looks on the lowly in heaven and on earth?" For this is what makes Him most lovable and praiseworthy, and that we may approach Him confidently, that His eyes are fixed on the afflicted and the poor; and the more contemptible the form of men is, the nearer and more present there is God, for He knows the high things from afar.

319. Therefore, nowhere in his commandments does he command us to be careful of the rich, the powerful, the great, and the honored, but (so he says [Isa. 58:7Z]), "If you see one naked, clothe him; and those who are in misery, bring them into the house; break your bread for the hungry, and do not shun thee.

your flesh." Although the exceedingly kind Lord has no flesh, he does not despise the flesh, and we who are flesh withdraw from our flesh. What would we do if we, like him, had no flesh? Without a doubt, the same thing that the devils do.

(320) Therefore, since he looks only to that which is lowly, it is necessary for us to obtain the grace of the gospel in another way, that we may become lowly, that is, that we may know and believe that we lack the glory we ought to have in God, that we are full of our shame and all evil, and so fear in this poverty. Then the Lord does not despise these poor people; indeed, whatever they ask, they will receive. For that the prayer (deprecationem) of the poor be not spurned, that is, that he take exceeding pleasure in it, and not hide his face, that is, that he make his face shine exceeding graciously upon them, since indeed the Hebrew text has here more fittingly and better [than the Vulgate, which offers: Nec avertit faciem suam a me]; Nec abscondit faciem suam a me, since it is very common in Scripture, and indeed a peculiarly Hebrew idiom, for God to make his face shine upon us; likewise also the contrast to this, that he hides the face.

Therefore, he who wants to be the seed of Israel and enjoys the grace of the gospel must be poor. The saying stands firm: Our God is such a God who looks upon the poor. And see with what abundance of words and with what care the prophet speaks. It is not enough for him to have said once, "He has not despised," but he adds, "He has not spurned," likewise, "He has not hidden," and, "He has heard."

322 After that he sets himself as an example by saying: "When I cried out" (cum clamarem), as our Latin translation has it, as if he wanted to say: "Behold, by my example learn, I who have become the most despised of all men, and am counted among the wicked. And since I was most despised, rejected, behold, I am most esteemed, received and heard. May this figure therefore according to my example; the gospel wants to have such a form in order to save them. Of course, our weakness needs such a fullness of exhortation, so that it does not shrink from being humbled, or does not despair when it has been humbled, and in this way possesses salvation through this cross.

The Hebrew text seems to me to contain a general meaning saying (absolutam gnomen), in this way: For he did not despise nor disdain the poverty of the poor, neither did he hide his face from him, and when he cried unto him, he heard. The meaning is evidently this: Therefore the Lord is to be praised and feared, because he neither despises nor disdains the poverty of the poor, nor the poverty (paupertatem, not deprecationem [prayer], as in the Vulgate, because of this it is said in a moment) from which one suffers who is in the likeness of lowliness, especially in the shame which is detestable and contemptible among men. For we have said above that the poor man is so called from affliction and oppression.

324 It is therefore a wonderful sweetness of the Lord that the form which the world curses and abhors is worthy and pleasing to him, and that he hears those when they call, of whom the world judges that they are condemned by him.

All this is said because the gospel makes us low and nothing, both before God and before men, so that we are found to be sinners and condemned on both sides, but in such a way that by acknowledging such our evil we thirst for the grace of righteousness, 1) in which we must bear the cross before men for the sake of the gospel. For before God we are found to be sinners for our own sake and for the sake of the world, with which we have kept and walked, but before the world we are found to be sinners for the sake of God and His gospel, with which we have begun to keep and walk in it.

1) In the original of the Erlanger and in the Weimarschen: rnsr^aamur. We have adopted sittianns with the Wittenberg, the Jena and the Erlangen.

326. And so our lowliness has exalted us before God, and this exaltation humbles us before men; since we were exalted before in their eyes, we were humbled before God. Blessed therefore is this lowly one, blessed is his lowliness, for because it has been laid up for God's sake, it is delicious in the sight of God.

So you see the power of the gospel to justify us before God and to crucify us before the world. Therefore the word of salvation is also a word of the cross, the word of wisdom also a word of foolishness 2c.

v. 26. I will travel with you in the great community; I will pay my vows before those who fear him.

Apud te [in the Vulgate] is the same as de te [from you], because that is how the Hebrew text has it. Hitherto he has said of the praise of GOD, which is directed by the public preaching ministry; hence he said [v. 23.], "I will praise thee in the congregation, and preach thy name." But to preach and praise in the congregation means to speak to others who are listening, as it is said in Sir. 15, 5: "He will open his mouth to him in the congregation," and Solomon says: "You shall not speak before the rulers [Proverbs 25, 6. Sir. 32, 13.].

Here he speaks of every man's special worship, namely, the fruit of faith that is produced by the gospel, which consists, as the apostle Heb 13:15 teaches, "in offering the sacrifice of praise to God at all times, that is, the fruit of lips that confess his name. And Ps. 116:12, after he had said [v. 10] that he had believed and preached, but was greatly afflicted because of that preaching, he says: "How shall I repay the LORD for all his benefits which he doeth unto me?" Among other things, he also says the same as here [v. 14.], "I will pay my vows to the Lord before all his people." And again [v. 17.], "Unto thee will I offer thanksgiving." For we have nothing to render but praise, honor, and thanksgiving for his unspeakable gift (as the apostle calls it [2 Cor. 9:15.]), which he has abundantly poured out upon us through the gospel [Tit. 3:6.].

330. but what is this that he says he wants to "praise in the great congregation," or, what is the same, before many people (multa), and that he would "pay his vows before those who fear him"? For also in the 116th Psalm, v. 18, 19, he says that he will pay the same vows before all his people in the courts of the house of the Lord in the midst of Jerusalem. May one not praise in the corner or in the chamber and pay the vows? Furthermore, who can be bodily present before all his people and in that great church? Therefore, there is no doubt that he speaks in the spirit, and of a congregation that is great or many in spirit, and of a people gathered in the spirit, which is nothing other than praising God in one faith, in one spirit. For it is faith alone in which the whole people of God and the whole community are gathered together in unity.

All this is said to express abhorrence of the hypocrisy and sects that divide the church into different parts and bind it to certain places, persons, and other outward things, but at the same time they decompose themselves from praising God in their own places, that is, with their own works. Therefore, since each one serves God with his own devices, and separates himself from the common work of the whole church (which is faith), as if to be justified and saved by it, does not the god make a special church, and praise God in his own tiny part, and only in front of himself? These are the heights and the groves and the valleys with which the people of old left the common temple of God, and each one walked separately in the heat of his temptation (as Peter calls it [1 Ep. 4, 12. Vulg.]). Therefore, "to praise in the great congregation" means to confess that one is justified and saved by the grace common to all, not by one's own efforts, so that there may remain unity of opinion and of heart in faith, even though outwardly there are various offices in the works.

Therefore, the Hebrew text does not say in vain: From you I will praise, because those heretics, that is, the sectarians, cannot praise God other than from themselves. For if they do not consider what is theirs to be delicious and praiseworthy or did not seek to be justified and saved by it, they would undoubtedly despise it and abandon it. But now their actions and their zeal are a clear indication of what they praise and trust in, and how they praise God for what they themselves have, each in his own place, as if they had something special and better before all the common people of God, as that Pharisee in the Gospel praised and thanked God about himself, not that he had received anything, but that he had given God much good.

333 But the prophet does not praise himself from anything that is his, but he says: From you I will praise myself. I count nothing but the common grace of faith, by which thou justifiest and maintainest all alike. For if there were anything else that could make me righteous, I would justly glory in it. Those wicked who have a disgust at being like others, and rejoice in their peculiar nature, have their own from which they praise you, delighting in the fact that they are not like other people.

Therefore, it is not because God is praised in places made with hands; not because it is done in Jerusalem in the Temple; not because it is done in this or that place; not because a priest or a bishop does it, not because a rich man or a poor man does it, but because the believer praises God, whoever he may be and wherever he may be. As now is the time that the Father is not to be worshipped on this mountain nor at Jerusalem, but must be worshipped in spirit and in truth [John 4:21, 23]: so must he also be praised; so that all places, times, persons, that is, the trust placed in them, are abolished.

See, this means "in the great congregation" and "praising before those who fear him," praising in the freedom of the spirit, which knows nothing of any precept: "I will be one of the multitude. And by saying that he praises God before those who fear Him, he punishes those presumptuous people quite sharply, for the ungodly and the sectarians fear Him.

God does not. At the same time he interprets himself what "the great community" is.

For where will you seek those who fear God, in Rome or in Jerusalem? No, not at any particular place, but in faith and in spirit, everywhere. So also, when will you find them, tomorrow or for a year? No, but in faith and in spirit, at some time. Further, what kind of people will you look for? The pope, the bishops, the monks? No, but in faith and in spirit any people. For the faithful fear God, who do not have a certain place, time and person.

337 Thus we see that in a similar way the apostles feared nothing so much as that the unity (communio) in faith would fall away and divisions would arise according to sects and works, as it happens today, which the fifth Psalm, v. 11, calls "great transgressions", 2].

338 And it seems to me that this way of speaking is peculiar to David: I will praise in the community, instead of: I will live and work in the community, because the whole life of the believer is nothing else but praising God, as Ps. 111:3 [Vulg.] says: "Praise and glory is his work," and Ps. 96:6 [Vulg.]: "Praise and glory is before him," and Ps. 104:1 [Vulg.]: "Praise and adornment you have put on," and Isa. 43:21: "This people I have prepared for myself; they shall tell my fame."

But what kind of "vows" are these? Those of monks and nuns, for instance, or the vows of one's own choice concerning the generally practicable works? Be far from that! They are the common vows of the whole "great community" and of all "who fear the Lord. What then did the congregation vow? Surely the 50th Psalm, v. 14. says, with one and the same quite general rule for all: "Offer thanks to GOD, and pay your vows to the Most High." So also in this passage and Ps. 116, 14. 18. the vows are connected with the praises, so that one sees that the vows are nothing else than this very praising. For when we enter into a covenant of faith with God, what do we do but pledge praise and thanksgiving to Him? For we also confess that all ours is nothing, and testify that we are saved only by His grace, and admit that through this covenant we are debtors to preach and confess the grace we have received. This confession, I say, we owe to God, that we are lost to ourselves, and are preserved by His gift alone.

341. and this guilt of ours is the vow which we pay by praising God and accusing ourselves; by glorifying Him and making ourselves ashamed; by justifying Him and condemning ourselves, so that He may be right in His words and all men be wrong [Rom. 3:4]. And this especially in the time of temptation, when we are called upon to pass the test of our accusation and condemnation, that we may then sing to God His song that night, and speak to the people of Dan. 3 [Prayer of Asariah v. 27, 28]: "In all things, O Lord, that thou hast done unto us, thou hast justly punished us." And Ps. 66, 12-14: "We have come in fire and water, but thou hast brought us out and refreshed us. Therefore will I enter into thine house with burnt offerings, and pay thee my vows, as I have opened my lips, and my mouth hath spoken in my distress." Behold, what are the burnt-offerings, what are the vows, which are offered in trouble, as we have quoted from the Epistle to the Hebrews Cap. 13, 15. "the fruit of the lips," and Hos. 14, 3. "We will offer the fair of our lips."

342. 3 [Prayer of Azariah v. 40]: "As if we were offering burnt offerings of rams and oxen and many thousands of fat sheep, so will you make our offering acceptable and pleasing in your sight today." But also the aforesaid Psalm [Ps. 66] makes of the fat burnt offerings with the burnt rams, of the oxen and goats, of which he says [v. 15.] that he will sacrifice them, nothing else than the praise of GOD in the tribulation, saying [v. 16-19.], "Come hither, hear ye all ye that fear GOD; I will tell what he hath done for my soul." What is this? "To him I cried with my mouth, and praised him with my tongue. Where I would do iniquity in my heart, the LORD would not hear. Therefore God hears me and heeds my supplications.

For the great congregation and all who fear the Lord have no other vows.

343. And note that in the sight of those who fear the LORD, he does not pay his praise, but pays the vows, because in the tribulation, where it is a matter of accusing us and vindicating God, God is fearful or terrifying, since he appears angry. But pay thy vows, and be mindful of the covenant which thou hast entered into, that thou hast promised to justify him, and to condemn thyself continually, and thou shalt be saved. But the wicked do not vow, and though they vow, they do not pay these vows.

V. 27. The miserable shall eat that they may be filled, and they that ask after the Lord shall journey; your heart shall live for ever.

344. the Hebrew text has [instead of corda eorum in the Vulgate? "Your heart shall live forever," and pauperes here again means the afflicted, that is, those who adhere to the Gospel, and the faithful, which the Latin interpreter elsewhere translates by miseris, or by humilibus, or by mites.

346. So far Christ has said what he would do to his own in the church, especially in the time of the apostles and those who were to teach others. Now he tells, as I think, the growth of the church and of those who would listen, both from the people of the Jews and the Gentiles, through the ministry of the apostles and the first witnesses (primitivorum), saying that many should be converted from both people. For he does not speak of a bodily satiation, but having foretold that there would be preaching and praising of God in the church, and thereby the right pasture of souls, namely the gospel, which is to be spread and presented through many, he now says that it should not be offered in vain, but there would be sheep that eat and hearers that hear, but only poor and lowly, so that the word of Christ would stand firm, Matth. 11, 5. "To the poor the gospel is preached", and Is. 61, 1. [Luc. 4, 18.? "He sent me to preach the gospel to the poor."

346 Therefore, this verse contains what Lucas often writes in the book of Acts, that the word of the Lord has increased greatly and the number of believers has increased greatly.

347 And when he says, "Your heart shall live forever," he sufficiently indicates that he is speaking of the pasture of the Word, which nourishes the heart, not the belly. But here he also strongly alludes to the sacrament of the altar, since in ancient times the mass was held for the purpose of receiving both the sacrament and the word, and in truth there was a bodily and a spiritual meal there. A bodily, I say, from the bread and wine of the altar; a spiritual from the Gospel; by both the heart was fed, not the belly. And this verse makes a demand on us to deal in detail with the Mass, because of the abominable and frightful abuses, both in doctrine and works, introduced by the Mass, which have abounded in the Church, but this we will save until last.

348 In the meantime, let us see who are the skilled hearers of the Gospel. The wretched, he says, the afflicted and the hungry, who, desirous of grace, are oppressed by sins and suffer from weakness. And they shall be satisfied, they also praise the Lord, for they seek him of whom they have need, and having found him, they are glad and praise him. O happy people, he says, your heart shall live forever. For grace, life everlasting, and his righteousness abideth for ever. What is the matter if even the belly dies? Your heart lives through the immortal food of the Word.

But this verse seems to be written with well-chosen words against the Jewish people, since they, accustomed to earthly promises, only expected temporal things from God, preservation of the belly and food, while these things cannot provide satiety, as if he wanted to say: Woe to you who look at the belly and the food, and yet are not satisfied; the time will come when you will eat and be satisfied, but not carnally, nor as rich and pleasure-seekers, as you have been hitherto, and have insatiably sought to satisfy such people.

but the poor, for this will be the food that will satisfy you, which the food of the flesh could not. After this, those who have desired food will no longer grumble against the Lord, but will praise the Lord, whom they will seek, and not the food.

Furthermore, while those are dead, these will live forever. Thus God destroyed the belly and the food, because the kingdom of God does not stand in eating and drinking. But that he breaks off so suddenly with these words has a great emphasis: "Your heart shall live forever", as if he wanted to say: You shall gladly lack this food that serves the belly, because here your heart shall live forever.

V. 28. Let the end of the world be remembered, that they should turn to the Lord, and worship before him all the families of the Gentiles.

This is only one verse in Hebrew, and it speaks with a clear expression of the conversion of the Gentiles. And although the Hebrew text has in active form: memorabunt and convertent, yet [in the Vulgate] the passive meaning is quite well given [reminiscentur and convertentur] instead: Fient memores et erunt conversae, without closer relation (absoluto statu), as we have often had the like. Thus in the 51st Psalm, v. 6, [it is said according to the Hebrew]: Propterea justificabis in verbo tuo, that is, justus eris, and it is rightly said [in the Latin translation]: Ut justificeris in sermonibus tuis, etc. So also [in this verse]: Adorabunt in conspectu ejus, that is, erunt adoratores coram eo. And also the character of the Gentiles this verse paints with its words, namely that they would be such people, who would be turned away from God and devoted to idols, and inclined to worship all things. It will come, he says, that they will be truly converted, namely to the true God, and will no longer worship idols, but "before God," that is, in spirit and in truth.

352 Although the Gentiles have been converted to Christ, so that it might seem as if this verse was spoken by the prophet of Christ after he had changed the person, we do not want to change the person until we can no longer avoid it, and we want to believe that the man still speaks, who also speaks of the Father in the gospel, and that all

He directs and judges men and all things to Him, so that He shows Himself to be a pure man, even though He draws all things to the Father through Himself, and says that one comes to the Father through Him [Joh. 14, 6.]. So he also says here that the Gentiles are converted to God, although in truth they are converted to him at the same time; but now he is satisfied with the fact that he said they would be converted through him and through his preaching.

This, "that the Gentiles be remembered," I believe, is said of their going into their hearts and returning to God, whom they would acknowledge again after having completely and desperately forgotten Him for centuries in long-lasting ignorance. For the Gentiles not only knew nothing of God, but had also forgotten Him, since they were rooted in their blindness and idolatry, so that in such a way in the word: "Let it be remembered" the great power of the grace of the Gospel is praised, through which those who were so deeply hardened are led back again.

Augustine uses this verse against the Donatists, and it also serves us against the Roman tyranny and its sects, which do not allow any Christians to be in the whole world, unless they serve them as prisoners. For everywhere Christ is known, and through him God, and even now one must believe that he is known everywhere, although by very few, after Satan is let loose to deceive all the Gentiles [Revelation 20:7, 8].

V. 29. For the Lord has a kingdom, and he rules among the nations.

355. Paul seems to refer to this verse Rom. 3, 29. by saying: "Or is God the God of the Jews alone? Is he not also the God of the Gentiles? Yes, indeed, also the God of the Gentiles." Rom. 10, 12. "There is One HEART of all, rich above all who call upon Him." Therefore, he says, the Gentiles will also be converted, because the Lord Himself will reign through Himself, who is the Lord of all. It would be unseemly for the Lord to have only the Jewish people as his kingdom over all.

356 But did he himself rule among the Jews until now? No, but Moses and the law has ruled; the spirit was still not revealed and preached publicly. But he reigned secretly in some, that is, in a hidden kingdom, without the spread of grace and the Spirit.

Therefore we are no longer under the driver of the law, nor in the spirit of bondage, but in the spirit of freedom under the revealed Lord Himself, who rules in all His creatures, after the prince of the world has been judged and cast out, who ruled over us before, who has the power of death [Heb 2:14], and we did not have the Lord.

But "having a kingdom" (regnare) is more than creating, making and having. For God has all things so that they are subject to Him, but He does not have a kingdom in all of them, since a kingdom is a civil and salutary dominion in which the subjects depend on the will and works of their King. In such a way Christ reigns in us when he dwells in us, while we refrain from all our doings, and on his Sabbath, which is sanctified by us, he abides in us and does all our works, which, as all know, is by grace alone. Therefore the kingdom of God is also called the kingdom of heaven, and he our king; we his own people. But if we serve sin, sin reigns in us, and we are in the kingdom of sin and Satan, without God as King, exiles and prisoners, and violate the Sabbath of the Lord without ceasing by our own works. This, then, is the rejoicing that this verse raises: "For the Lord has a kingdom, and is the Lord among the Gentiles," as also Psalm 97:1 says: "The Lord is King, let the earth rejoice," as if to say: The Gentiles will be converted, for the devil will be cast out, sin will be taken away in the world, and the King will reign in righteousness and will be wise; and this will be publicly taught and directed through the gospel.

V. 30: All the fat people of the earth will eat and worship; all those who are in the dust and those who are miserable will bow the knee to him. 1)

1) Vulgata: Manducaverunt et adoraverunt omnes pingues terrae, in conspectu ejus cadent omnes, qui descendunt in terram, et anima mea illi vivet.

In the Hebrew it says: Manducaverunt et adoraverunt omnes pingues terrae, in conspectu ejus genu flectent omnes descendentes in pulverem, et anima ejus non vivet. This verse with the two following ones seems to me to be set by the prophet either as a conclusion or as a summa, but that he, as it seems to me, has deliberately wanted to speak darkly by omission (eclipsi), by omission of the connecting words (asyndetis), by concealment (reticentia), by paraphrase (periphrasi) and other figures, then by changing the person and confusing the distinction, so that we have to struggle, and yet cannot know whether we meet his opinion. We want to try, but we do not want to turn to the distinction signs, nor do we want to allow a change of person, but we want to assume that Christ speaks to the end, who in the Gospel often speaks of Himself in the third person, as John 3:16: "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son. And Matth. 23, 8. f.: "You shall not be called Rabbi, for One is your Master, Christ, who is in heaven." Again John 3:13: "And no man goeth up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven." And so he does not say in this place: Anima ejus non vivet et semen serviet ei etc..

Therefore, the first part of the verse should be a short summary or summa summarum. For he had said that both the Jews and the Gentiles would be converted and worship, but here he expands on what he had said, saying, "Yes, then all respect of persons will cease, so that in Christ there will not only be neither Jew nor Greek, but also neither master nor servant, neither rich nor poor, neither male nor female, neither foreigner nor scythe, neither great nor small, but all one in Christ; with One Shoulder, in One Faith, in One Gospel, they will serve the One God without distinction.

361 For what it is to "eat" and "worship" has already been said [§ 345 ff. and § 351], namely, that by the word "eat" he is saying the Jews, with the word "worship" the Gentiles. But here, both being merged into one, he applies to both eating and worshipping, so that there is no difference between Jews and Greeks, as the apostle testifies [Rom. 10, 12. Col. 3, 11.]; and the same he wants to say with the general word "all", as if he speaks: Both Jews and Gentiles, both those of whom I had said before that they eat and those to whom I had ascribed worship, all without distinction will eat and worship, that is, they will be table companions (manducatores), hearers, servants and worshipers of GOD.

362 The same is what follows: Et in conspectu ejus cadent or "before him they will bend the knees", that is, they will appear before him with knees bent and resting on the ground, expressing in figurative speech the ceremony of worship.

And "the fat ones of the earth" are figuratively called all those who occupy a particularly respectable position (persanatu), as the rich, powerful, noble, honored, strong, beautiful, wise, works saints and the like. For this we have learned from the 17th Psalm, v. 10. "Their fat ones hold together," and Deut. 32, 15. it is said, "He became fat and thick and strong." Therefore, "the fat ones of the earth" are all that is high and great in the world and respectable in the eyes of men. And in this the Lord made no distinction, but caught in his net the great fishes with the small, and every kind of creature that liveth and travaileth in this great and spacious sea.

364. "All who are in the dust." I do not think that it is spoken of the dead or those who are subject to death (mortalibus), as some will, but it will be a circumlocution for a very lowly figure and person, in contrast to the fat ones on earth, so that no person or figure can be so lowly and contemptible, that God should not honor them in Christ by His grace and His gospel, so that all contempt for the contemptible, and all shunning of the fearful, should cease, and the lion lie with the calf and the sheep, the wolf with the lamb, the pardel with the little goat, and a little boy drive them with each other, as Isaiah Cap. 11, 6. 7. prophesied. "For who preferred you?" says Paul 1 Cor. 4, 7. to those who left this equality. "But what hast thou that thou hast not received? But if thou hast received it, what boastest thou, as he that received it not?"

Since God thus reigns in us through Christ, all things are God's and nothing is ours, so that no one can envy another, and no one can be puffed up against another; no one has less or more than another, but, as it is said of those who gathered manna, 2 Cor. 8:15: "He that gathered much had not abundance, and he that gathered little had not lack"; for all that each has belongs to all, because of One, that there is One Word and One Faith, and One Kingdom and One Lord.

But that "to lie in the dust" means that spurned and despised figure, and also an afflicted one, as it is wont to happen in this figure, is proved by the word Isa. 47, 1: "Down, virgin, thou daughter of Babylon, sit thou in the dust, sit thou on the ground; for the daughter of the Chaldeans hath no more a seat. You will be called no more: Thou tender and lewd." What does he prophesy here but the humiliation of the greatness of Babylon? And Klagel. 3, 29: "He who puts his mouth in the dust and awaits hope", and Job, Cap. 7, 5, says that his flesh is full of the filth of dust, and Ps. 7, 6, David allows his honor to be buried in the dust, that is, to be made nothing. So Paul praises 1 Cor. 1, 24. ff. that those are called who are nothing, and the foolish and the weak, so that God may bring to nothing those who are something, because people who are like that are to be respected almost as if they were dead, and already lie in the dust. "But the LORD (as the 113th Psalm, v. 7. 8., has it in Hebrew) raises up the lowly out of the dust, and lifts up the poor out of the mire, that he may set him beside the rulers" 2c. Again, "He pushes down the mighty from their seats and lifts up the lowly" [Luc. 1, 52. 1, so that He makes all equal. And [1 Cor. 1, 31.], "He that boasteth, let him boast of the Lord," and a wretched man that is put to shame turn not away, but [1 Cor.

10, 17.] One bread, one body are we all, who are partakers of one bread and one cup.

367 Et anima ejus non vivet ["and his soul will not live". Cf. § 359]. Whose "his"? None other than the Lord, of whom he had just said: "Before him the fat and the dust shall bow the knee and eat. For the context and the order of the words do not allow it to be understood by anyone else. And this is the mystery which David wished to indicate by these figures of words veiled, that it should be taught (positum), and yet not explained (expositum). You see, therefore, that in this passage Christ wanted to reveal the secret of Himself in the third person by the same word, both of His divinity and of His resurrection. If his soul should die, he must therefore have a soul or mortal life, and no one can doubt or deny that this is said of a mortal man who will die. But the pronoun "his" can only refer to the Lord mentioned in the preceding, whom Gentiles and Jews serve in unison as the true God. So you see, with how open and beautiful words he declares here that he is true man and will die at the same time, but at the same time also true and immortal God, so that in this verse no other God is admitted than the one who will die and once be a dead man, thus in one person God and man.

Behold, this is a part of the summa of this psalm, as if he wanted to say: The short epitome of what I want with this Psalm is this: The true God, who shall also be true man, shall die, and suffer that which I have foretold of him, and then that shall follow, whereof I have said that it shall follow his suffering. And this part he added to this verse, which would have been more fitting together with the following verse and would have started a new one; but this so great mystery had to be included. I do not want to say anything about our Latin translation, which is wrong and not worthy to be treated, since it is just contrary to the Hebrew, unless

Because one wants to do violence to the words and say: Anima mea illi vivet [my soul will live to him, that is, it will rise from the dead, so that it lives to him, since it was dead for the people. But this is not compelling, nor does it prove anything.

V. 31. 32. He will have a seed to serve him; they will proclaim of the Lord to the children of children. They shall come and preach his righteousness unto the people that are born, that he may do it. 1)

Our Latin translation has mixed up these two verses in a very confused way and translated them badly; therefore, we also want to translate these two verses at the same time, literally translated from the Hebrew in this way:

1. et semen serviet ei, narrabit Domino in generationem.

2. venient et annuntiabunt justitiam ejus, populo nato, quoniam fecit.

He had said that his soul would die, here he says that there will be a seed to serve him; but he will not serve a dead man, since he cannot rule as a dead man. For who could serve a dead man? Therefore, the one who was to die must necessarily rise again, so that the seed could serve him. For since, when he died, he was taken away from the land of the living, as Isaiah Cap. 53:8 says, "that he was taken away from the land of the living," it follows that he was raised from the dead in such a way that he would no longer die or be mortal.

Therefore also his kingdom will not be a mortal or temporal one, because his soul will not live in this life, but will be taken away from this life, since it is said: Anima ejus non vivet, which is said of this mortal life, as Paul 1 Cor. 15, 45. f. says: "The first man Adam was made into the natural life, and the last Adam into the spiritual life", calling this life a natural one, the body a natural one, but that life a spiritual one and the body a spiritual one.

1) Vulgate: Et semen meum serviet ipsi, annun= tiabitur Domino generatio ventura, et annuntiabunt coeli justitiam ejus populo, qui nascetur, quem fecit Dominus.

Body is called a spiritual body. Therefore it is also said here that Christ will die in such a way that his soul will not live, that is, he will not be alive after the natural life. For he did not want to say that he would die, but used such words, which actually expressed the matter, namely that Christ would die, so that his soul would no longer live, that is, the natural life with food, clothing, breathing and other necessities of the perishable life. So he has a soul, he is a man, but he will not live in it. But since he also lives in such a way that he has seed over which he will rule, it follows that he is and lives a spiritual man. This could not happen if the natural body did not die and a spiritual one arose again.

From this it follows that he is also God, because this service does not come to a mere man, also not such a kingdom. Then this service must also no longer be a bodily one (animalem), because it is now no longer in the bodily life (animalis), and therefore does not need such service. It will therefore be a service in the spirit, after the synagogue has ceased from outward service; and this also follows that the seed is not a bodily one. For he did not mean to say: the people will serve him, but "the seed", in order to cancel the glory of the fleshly seed of Abraham, and to introduce a new seed, which he himself would have begotten through the gospel from the spirit. So this man will be a new patriarch, the author and origin of a new seed; there will be a new ministry, a new kingdom, such as the world has not known. Thus it is said in Isa. 53:10: "When he hath given his life for a trespass offering, he shall have seed, and shall live to the length of the world." How can a dead man beget children? Therefore, this patriarch is not equal to the former ones. For those died and left behind them the seed which, being dead, could not serve them. But this patriarch will not leave a seed behind him, but the seed will always be present with him and will live into the long run, so that it may serve him alive forever, and yet not in this natural life. For from the

To others it says: "And to your seed after you" [Gen. 17, 7. 8. 19.], but to this one God says: Your seed with you, which will not be after you, but at the same time with you, so completely that it even serves you.

372 Narrabit Domino ad generationem. The verbum narrabit is taken here, as I think, impersonally instead of: narrabitur or sermo erit, like Gen. 10, 9. [Vulg.]: "Of this a proverb arose: A mighty hunter before the LORD, like Nimrod," where the Hebrew text has: And said (dixit): a mighty hunter 2c., that is, someone said, or: one said (dictum est). And Gen. 27:42, "Then were announced (nuntiata sunt) to Rebekah the words of Esau," in Hebrew is thus: Et nuntiavit Rebeccae. Des same Gen. 31, 48: "Therefore one (vocatum est) calls him Gilead", instead of: Et vocavit ejus nomen Galaad, and the like more. So it must also be here, narrabit for: narratum erit Domino ad generationem, that is, one will say that also God has a generation and children's children, namely, since he also has seed, as he says Isa. 66, 9: "Should I let others break the mother, and myself not also give birth? says the Lord. Should I let others give birth, and myself be shut up? saith thy GOD." This seems to be better understood of the spiritual begetting of nations according to the Hebrew. Ps. 102:29: "The children of thy servants shall abide, and their seed shall prosper before thee." But it is an entirely Hebrew speech: Narrabitur Domino in generationem, that is, it will be preached, and in this sermon it will be preached of the LORD, and preached in such a way that the LORD belongs to the generation of children, or that He has a generation, which is wonderful in our eyes, that GOD, like men, also has a generation of peoples. But here he says generationem only once, while everywhere else it is doubled, generatione, generatione. But this happens because in the fleshly seed one generation passes away, another arises, and there is a succession of things that do not remain, but this is such a generation that the earlier do not give way to the later, but are gathered together into one generation, because it is spiritual and eternal.

373 "They shall come and preach his righteousness" (that is, the righteousness of faith), not the righteousness of works and law, that is, his seed and generation shall preach. For this will be their ministry, as it is said in 1 Pet. 2:9: "Ye are the people of the possession, that ye should preach the virtues of him that hath called you unto his marvelous light."

374 For they shall not preach of this king the glory of this world, as Solomon was preached, but his righteousness, that it may be known that this king and patriarch is the conqueror of sin and death, and the author of eternal goods.

But whither shall they come, and whence? Of course, from the face of this king they will step out (foris) and go into this world, and there preach outwardly (foris) his righteousness, in which they live inwardly before him. This is said so that one does not think that this generation is nowhere, because it is spiritual. It will, he says, be spiritual and yet in the world. But they will not be recognized by any other sign than the ministry of the word, all other appearance of the person being taken away. For they shall come on the feet of the gospel of peace, and thou shalt hear their voice, but shalt not know whence they come, or whither they go: for they are the wind that blows, not in persons, but freely whithersoever it will [John 3:8].

376. "To the people who are born," what is that? What is the people that is not born? As I suppose, this is said because the peoples of other kings get their form (formantur) by laws, customs and habits; but by these one cannot promote them to true justice; it is only like a fable of justice and like a play in the theater. For even the law of Moses could only make the Jewish people hypocritical (formare). The people of this king, however, is not made by laws only for appearance, but it is born by the spirit and the water completely to a new creature of the truth. This is the power of his righteousness without an outward appearance, which is preached in the spirit. For what is born is completely changed and new, as Christ says Jn. 3:3: "Unless one is born anew, he cannot see the kingdom of God."

Therefore, the word of God's righteousness is given to the people who are born, by which they are both born and sustained, not in appearance but in truth, righteous in spirit, even though they exist in the flesh (existens).

378 "That he will do it", this is said of Christ the King; if I am not mistaken, in this sense, that all this will happen because he will do it, "he will take it", as if he wanted to say: Who hitherto hath said many things by the law, and promised many things; but nothing hath come to pass. The time will now come when he will send forth the scepter of his power, and give to his voice the voice of power, and send such a word as (as Jacobus says [Cap. 1, 18.]) is powerful to witness to his creatures, and to make our souls blessed, so that he is now no longer a spokesman, but a doer: "He will do it once," as it is said Isa. 52, 6. [Vulg.], "Behold, I myself that speak am here." He had given the law before, but there was no one to do it; now he has come and given the gospel, through which he does all things.

Behold, in how great a brevity and in how marvelous a covering are comprehended in these two verses all the mysteries of Christ, of His divinity, of His resurrection, of His kingdom, of His people, of His gospel, of His righteousness, of His blessedness, so that a passage equal to this has not yet occurred to me.

It has seemed good to me to set up a hut here and make my home; and because I see that these interpretations are being hastily set and printed, while I would rather that they remained hidden forever, there is also much that I myself am not satisfied with, and have taken upon myself a burden that goes beyond my strength, and therefore often staggers: I therefore ask the godly reader that he may read everything with exceedingly well-considered primal wisdom.

read the part. Not as if I am aware that I have taught anything wrong; the sense pleases me well in all pieces, but it has not always come to me in the right place, and in the Hebrew has sometimes been missed, because I have been overloaded with business; and distracted by various things, I have not been able to devote myself completely to the matter. I do not excuse myself with the difficulty and obscurity of the book, nor with the small measure of my erudition and my gifts (ingenii), for why did I not remain of it? Nor do I console myself with the example of others, although this is a very honorable reason, but I strive to have the pure, right and appropriate sense in every passage; even if I have only been able to achieve this in part, I would like to be considered presumptuous, erroneous and unlearned in many things before others. And to indicate a few things that I remember at present:

In the 12th (undecimo [according to the Vulg.]) Psalm, in the last verse, an error has occurred in the expression, 1) since, because I was not on the point, I have made it a transitive verb in Hiphil; although it is not bad for the interpretation and the sense if one also says circuitu instead of circumdedit. And what I have said Ps. 14 (Ps. XIII) in the second verse about the expression is true, but I would rather that it had all been omitted; but in another place it will be improved (God willing), where I shall deal fully with such words. Ps. 17, 9: 2) In anima circumdederunt I would have better said in the manner of speaking, according to which.

1) Compare Luther's letter to Pellican Col. 1224.

2) In all editions: "vsrs. 11." But that the 9th verse is meant, proves s 58 of the 17th Psalm.

It is said of Jacob 1 Mos. 29, 18. 20. 3) that he served Rachel to take her as his wife. Thus: In anima circumdederunt [they have encamped around my soul] to take her away, as our Latin interpreter has. In struggling in the 19th Psalm in the fourth verse 4) [§ 26 f.], how the apostles spoke in the languages of all would like, I have not thought that one could say, the apostles would have found in different places in Jerusalem, in other and again other houses again and again other languages, and they would have spoken in such a way alone in the language, on which they had come at the time, so that one must understand it in such a way, that these various languages must be distributed on separate times and Oerter and persons; then, as Lucas says [Apost. 2:6, 12], that the people were confounded, when they saw that, as they went about, they spake in the tongues of all them to whom they went, and confessed every man to another that he had heard them speak in his own language.

Besides these things, there are many others and perhaps greater; I do not see it. In addition, there are the errors of the printers; in short, the whole interpretation would please me better if I myself had overlooked it first, since both prolixity and abundance of words are a great shortcoming of it. But there is also much spiritual instruction and revelation in it, for which everyone who is godly gives thanks to the Lord Jesus Christ, who is our light, praised forever and ever, amen.

3) In the editions: Osn. XXXI instead of: XXIX. It depends here on the expression in L^okel, which is not found in the 31st chapter. - Weimar edition in the margin: "1 Mos. 31, 6. and 41."

4) In the editions: ks. 18. tertio versu.

4. D. Martin Luther's short interpretation on the first 25 Psalms.*)

Started May 4, finished probably September 25, 1580.

The first Psalm.)

V. 1. Blessed is he who does not walk in the counsel of the wicked.

I. This first psalm belongs to the third commandment, for it praises and extols to us the practice of the divine word, that we should gladly hear, learn and read the same. For this actually means to sanctify the Sabbath, the holiday.

with the word of God, for by it all things are sanctified. And when the word is taught, then the hour, the day, the place, and the person who preaches or listens to the word is sanctified. Therefore, Christians must keep the Sabbath every day, that is, they must always keep the word.

*This writing was written when Luther was at the fortress of Coburg during the Diet of Augsburg in 1530. Aurifaber reports about it in the second Eisleben volume, p. 19: "At the same time I). Martin Luther read and interpreted these twenty-five psalms to the venerable Mr. Veit Dietrich, then a student at Wittenberg, and to his table companion, who was waiting diligently for the doctor at Coburg, when he was able to take an hour or so off from his varied, large, important and difficult business there to strengthen his faith, hope and prayer with these psalms. Such interpretations have been recorded and transcribed with special diligence by the well-meaning Veit Dietrich. A part of these interpretations, namely about the first 12 Psalms, was published by Aurifaber in Erfurt in 1548 under the title: "Kurze und tröstliche Auslegung über die ersten XII Psalmen, so v. Martin Luther seliger Gedächtnisniß im XXX. Year in Coburg at the castle of his good friend prescribed to one for comfort and instruction." The whole text was first published in German by Basilius Faber in 1560, and this edition by Faber was included by Aurifaber in the second volume of the Eisleben Collection of Luther's German writings, where it is found on p. 20 et seq. From there it has been transferred to the other collections: Altenburger, vol. V, p. 412; Leipziger, vol. V, p. 246; Walch, vol. IV, Col. 1838; and Erlanger, vol. 38, p. 1. Because none of the publishers had indicated their sources and described them in more detail, it was assumed until recent times that the original was written in German. Only in the Altenburg edition do we find vol. V, p. 412 the note of Johann Christfried Sagittarius, that to him I). Caspar Bertram, Oberpfarrherr zu Naumburg, had sent him a written volume in which these short interpretations, in Latin and German, were contained, and sometimes the days on which they were recited were indicated in the margin. It was not until 1845 that the editor of the Erlangen edition, I). Jrmischer, discovered in the library at Nuremberg the first printing of our writing, which the sons and heirs of Veit Dietrich organized from the manuscript of their father in 1559. The text is in Latin mixed with German. The title of this original edition is: In psalinos vi^inti qniuquo priores, et secznenates aliquot enari-ationes breves et oruditas Keverenci patrik D. klar. Qutüeri pio atudio ao dili^ontia III. viti Tlioodori Xoriker^enms eoHeetue. Xune demuin in lueem neditae. OataloAum ksalmnorun praelationi suöseeirinus. Cl.D.JUX. At the end: Xoi-iderMe Lxeudedant downnes Nontanus et Odrieus ^euderus. This original is only in the Erlangen edition ^xe^etiea Opera, torn. XVII, p. 1. 8qq. It is preceded by a dedication of Dietrich's sons to Duke Christoph von Würtemberg. In this dedication they say that Veit Dietrich added to the second, shorter interpretation of Ps. 1-8 and Ps. 23. these words (Lrl. opp. 6X6.]. XVII, p. 6): "The following Psalms have v. Luther written; to these (which Luther wrote) belongs also the 45th and the 128th". These drafts to an explanation find probably also on Coburg written or soon after. (Köstlin, Martin Luther, Vol. II, 657 ad 225.) We reproduce the text according to the just mentioned print of the original in the Erlangen edition, of course with translation of the Latin. Our time determination is based on the dates given in the Erlangen edition, tom. XVII, p. 8 and p. 227.

In the Latin edition, the interpretation of the first psalm contains the time: ^nno 30. 4. nonas klaff, that is, May 4, 1530.

But they that teach lies, and contrary to the word, sin against the third commandment, and profane the sabbath: for without the word of God nothing is holy.

2 So this first psalm teaches us to hear the word diligently, and all things shall be holy unto us, and shall prosper. O what a blessed man, saith he, is he that keepeth himself from profaning the sabbath. For the wicked have their own preaching, which is called "consilia," that is, their own dreams, as they wash day and night; as the sacramentaries and the Turks do, 2c. all of whom profane the Sabbath.

Nor treads on the way of sinners.

(3) That is, Blessed is he who does not live according to their counsel, as do those who break and desecrate the Sabbath even with their lives. For the Hebrews call "the way" what we call "the way," "the custom," and "the habit," item: "This is the way to do it.

Nor sit where the scoffers sit.

The Latin interpreter did not translate badly: In cathedra non sedit [he does not sit on the chair], lest he also become a teacher of the same doctrine. Thus he makes three degrees. First, that one hears and accepts the ungodly teaching. Second, to live by it. Third, to teach it to others. Then they become mockers, who make a mockery out of God's word and godly life. When one tells them about it, they feel as if they were whistling at a goose, and say like the Epicnrians: Oh, if I had money, or a hurdle for it! as Caesar Pflug said: I think there must be idle people who like to deal with things. He thought he had enough of his castles, so he died sine crux et sine lux, and the devil led him away. So the sacramentarians mock us and everything we teach; they are blasphemers and desecrators of the Sabbath. But the Psalm says: God protect the man from them! As if to say: There are many such godless people.

V. 2. But have pleasure in the law of the Lord, and speak of his law day and night.

(5) Especially the Ten Commandments. Oh, what a great grace and gift of God it is when a man gladly hears God's word, and gladly writes poetry, chats and sings about it. O, how blessed is the man! he says, it will go well with him, and he shall have happiness and salvation. Therefore now follow the promises.

V. 3. He is like a tree planted by the rivers of water.

(6) So also in the 92nd Psalm, v. 13, it is said, "The righteous shall flourish like a palm tree. And this is a glorious likeness of the palm tree, which grows green summer and winter, like the cedars and spruces, and has its daily sap; for it grows nowhere but in sandy and watery places. So should a godly man be, who gladly hears God's word, that is, I will give my spirit and grace: if then you hear the word, let sap follow; for there the Holy Spirit is present, and gives grace to it.

Who brings forth his fruit in his season.

7 The palm tree shows its fruit sooner than its leaves, as does the vine and the fig tree. So also a godly man does it first, and proves it by the works, after which he teaches. For the leaves signify the teaching. Therefore, a godly man can counsel, instruct, and comfort anyone with his teaching 2c.

In its time.

8. that is, when it is useful and necessary; has no specific time, like the monks, always bears fruit, even when he sleeps, drinks 2c.

And his leaves do not wither, and what he does is well done.

(9) He is able to do all things; neither hail nor lightning nor rain nor snow hinders him. He goes freely through all storms, because he has the strength and power in the root. Therefore, if a cross or persecution comes, he does not ask for it, because he has the juice and always goes on, they can neither quench nor dampen it. So he is capable of all things. And now this is the Promise, which he has who follows the word. Now he adds a warning against the wicked.

V. 4. But the wicked are not like that, but like chaff scattered by the wind.

(10) Here he contradicts the previous parable, saying that the wicked are dust. Now think what a great difference there is between a green tree and ashes or dust scattered by the wind. So utterly does it take away all their fruit, that they are good for nothing, nor of any use. I could not disgrace them more. In the sight of the world they do great works, but in the sight of God it is ashes, because there is no juice, water or grace with them. In their eyes and before the whole world they make themselves believe that they are the tree, but before God it is nothing. They are like dust to a pious man. It is a very sublime image. They have no spirit. This they prove also by deed; as follows:

V. 5. Therefore the wicked do not remain in judgment.

11. ["In judgment"] that is, in service, in office; they do not remain with Christians in the

They blow themselves away like the dust, they must cause sectarianism so that they do not remain in the office of the right word.

Nor the sinners in the congregation of the righteous.

They fall not only from the chair, but also from the bench, they remain neither teacher nor pupil, but separate themselves from us by their recklessness and their own heads. Now what is the reason of this comparison? Before the world they are the tree, we are the dust. This is the reason. One must not look at it as the world looks at it, but as God looks at it; as now follows:

V. 6 For the Lord knows the way of the righteous, but the way of the wicked perishes.

Thirteen is the resolution. He delicately intertwines it so that we may be sure of it. If we keep the word, he says he will preserve us, and they shall perish. So then the psalm is a fine comforting exhortation to the word, if we keep it, he will give us to see that he will not leave us.

About the same Psalm.

The tree	that is planted there, rooted in through faith in Christ into the grace of God, by the rivers of water, which bringeth forth fruit, which hath green leaves, to whom everything goes well	with Carrying with Generating with Maintaining with Propagating	From branches against all repugnance	is the godly one.
----------	---	--	---	----------------------

Thus the righteous breaks through, may the adversaries like it or not.

The contrast before the world behaves like this:

The godly is the dust, yes, the dung on the feet.
 The wicked is that tree, yes, a rock.

But see the comparison between the tree that is so vigorous and fruitful and the dust that is scattered and nothing. Who believes that?

Our consolation is:

The wicked are the scattered dust.
 We are the tree with green leaves for eternity.

The second psalm.

Why do the nations rage, and the people speak in vain? The kings of the land rebel, and the lords counsel with one another against the Lord and his anointed.

The world can tolerate all ungodly doctrines and idolatries, but it cannot tolerate the Lord and His anointed. Thus we have been able to suffer all abominations in the papacy, but now we cannot suffer the sign of truth; against this the whole race sets itself. These two men, the Lord and Christ, no one wants to suffer, while before we could suffer so many monks 2c.

2. the "Gentiles" are the kingdoms and countries or nations. The "people" (populi) are actually what we now call plebs. So then he says: "The kingdoms, the peoples under kings, and all the rest of the authorities and the common people, all this is utterly nonsensical against Christ; the wisdom, power, and multitude of the wager must be all therefore.

(3) But this is our comfort, that we know that the race cannot suffer Christ and his word. The other consolation is that they deal with it, but do not accomplish what they want. So the prophet points to the suffering of Christ, that they may kill Christ, but they will not take away his kingdom. Christ is the sign that is contradicted, against which they rage but do nothing. They speak against him, but in vain. They come together and confer, but nothing comes of it.

V. 3. Let us break their bands and throw off their ropes.

4th There they want to go. In him they are not satisfied that he has suffered and been mocked, but they want to cast away his kingdom and suppress it. For it is an imitation of their way of speaking: We do not want to have Christ as a king. So they are not satisfied with persecuting and tormenting him, but want to have him purely removed and gone, so that nothing can be done about him.

remain there. But they are also blasphemers, because they call the kingdom of peace and grace a yoke, and their salvation and life a death. So today our doctrine is the worst thing, and must be called a fetter of the temporal and spiritual regime. It is unpleasant, they say, one should not watch them any longer. And this is precisely the suffering of Christ; this is how far they go with their attacks. But because they do not sin against the anointed one as well as against the Lord, they fall into God's judgment.

V. 4. But He who dwells in heaven laughs at them, and the Lord mocks them.

It is a consolation and an urging. It has already been decided in heaven, the raging and the council must be suffered, likewise their blasphemy, that they condemn and want to pass through with their heads. But in heaven it is said: "in vain". Yes, God respects them here also for nothing, who could only believe it. Now he makes fools of the pope and the Turk; but the effect will also follow, namely this:

V. 5. He will speak to them in his wrath one day, and with his fury he will terrify them.

6. "Once", in his time, when they shall come down, when he shall overthrow them. "He will speak" is spoken according to the Hebrew way, because God judges everything by the word. As Ps. 107, 20. also says, "He sent his word, and made them whole." "He sent his word", he did 1) his part. So also here: "He will speak," he will attack them, namely the Jews and the Romans, who have experienced it; the pope and Turk will also experience it. He overthrows them and thus confirms the kingdom of his son.

V. 6. But I have set my king upon my holy mountain Zion.

7 This is a protection and a high word against the nations, kings, princes and peoples 2c.

1) In the original: "thut".

the gates of hell. So I will set him and keep him, the king, and I will see who will depose him. This is a very glorious text. But it distinguishes this king from the others. For the other kings are chosen by nations; this one alone is set up as king by God Himself, and that as king on earth.

V. 7. I will preach from such a way.

8 Here he describes how the king should be: that he should first of all rule in Zion, here on earth, and his regiment should be called "preaching from one way". This word means ceremonies and ordinances. "A manner" he shall preach. But what manner or law shall it be? He adds:

That the Lord said to me: You M my son, today I have begotten you.

Here he completely abolishes the whole Old Testament, as if to say: "The law of Moses has been taught long enough; now I will also teach, but something different than Moses ever taught or thought of, namely, that I should be man and Lord on earth, that I should be the Lord and Son of God. This is the new preaching that God has subjected everything to this man Christ. This is also what the gospel teaches, that we should accept Christ, the Son of God, and believe in him. It is a very beautiful way of speaking, however, that he does not merely say, "I am the Son of God," but appeals to the reputation of the one who is speaking, as if he wanted to say: I have not made myself a king, another has done it. As he also says in the Gospel [John 14:24], "The word is not mine, but his who sent me." It is the prestige (auctoritas) of the Father who calls me his Son. The apostles in their epistles have well acted this passage, that this certain King is called the Son of God, and is also by nature the Son.

10) Some understand the word "today" to mean the time of grace, but I would rather understand it to mean, "Today I have begotten you," so that it may be understood that this Son is not begotten spiritually but naturally, so that this is the opinion, "You are my natural Son.

Son, whom I have begotten with me today, since "today" is always, and since there is neither yesterday nor tomorrow, but One Day and One Everlasting Day, which is always called "today". On the same day I begat you: You are by nature true and eternal God. Now this is the best verse in the Psalm, that it cites the reputation of the Father. And this is now the description of the person, that he is a preacher and son of God, born in eternity. "On Zion," therefore he is a man. "A son," therefore he is GOD. He is therefore a wonderful king. Now the kingdom also comes from this: You will reign, but not in Jerusalem, like David and the other kings.

V. 8: "Cry unto me, and I will give thee the heathen for an inheritance, and the end of the world for a possession.

011 He saith not what he shall ask, saying, Thou shalt suffer: but he saith only, Heish, and I will give thee more than thou hast asked. For I will not give thee Jerusalem and that nation only, but I will make thee lord of the world; thou shalt have as much to rule as I have. Thus Christ has his kingdom first of all by nature. Secondly, he is also declared to be a king; as is also the custom in the world when kings are crowned. Therefore his kingdom is announced here by the Holy Spirit: "You own the whole world; whether they are not all obedient or not, it is not up to him; he has them all in his hand.

V. 9. You shall smash them with an iron scepter; like pots you shall break them.

012 There shall none abide before thee; there shall none reign but thee, and against thee. And whosoever will not break himself, thou shalt smite him with the scepter of iron. Now I have given the kingdom to you; whoever wants to take it from you, you take from him what he has. This is how it will be with the pope and the Turk.

(13) This is the main passage about the Son of God, who is declared King on earth, but by faith and by the Word. It says: "I will preach from one way"; there it remains; we do not see it, but we hear it. Now follows an exhortation:

V.10. Let yourselves therefore be instructed, O kings, and let yourselves be chastened, O judges of the earth.

014 Take heed, be ye wise. He addresses all kings and judges, none excepted, and exhorts them to hear the word: Let them tell you. But they say, What shall we hear, because we are otherwise wise? But such wisdom is foolishness. And notice here that he does not address the common people, but princes and kings, namely the most wise and learned.

V. 11. Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling.

Honor this Lord with fear, and be glad before him. This is a very good verse, by which he puts away the whole law of Moses. This is the service and worship of one another: Put away from yourself all confidence in your own wisdom, and fear his word. But he does not want the mere fear of despair, but also wants us to rejoice in the faith of grace, that as we should fear for our righteousness, so we should rejoice in his righteousness. For our part we are to fear, but in him we are to rejoice. It is not in vain that it says "with trembling," that is, with a certain timidity. For the zealots who think they have eaten the gospel make a carnal liberty, and rejoice with presumption and boldness, and are all too glad; but let it be with reverence that we think we have it from him. Those who serve God with works fear nothing at all from Him.

V. 12. Kiss the Son.

16. do homage to the son. Here he explains what "serve" means, namely to take hold of the son. He who wants to serve God honors only the Son; he who does not honor the Son dishonors the Father. God's service cannot exist unless one kisses the Son, that is, if one believes in Christ; one may do no more.

For he saith not, Be ye circumcised, fast; but speaketh evil, Let the Son be told you. Whoever accepts this word may boast that he serves God.

That he may not be angry.

For apart from Christ there is no righteousness. "That he be not wroth," saith he. Either kiss him, or you will have wrath, and your righteousness will be condemned; there is no third; there is no more help nor counsel. But nobody believes it. The pope, the monks, the Turk want to do enough with their works. But John says [John 3:36]: "Whoever does not believe in the Son of God, upon him abides the wrath of God." In this verse, all monasteries and convents are condemned and thus doomed to perish.

And you perish on the way.

18 Namely, with your works. Apart from Christ there is no salvation, and yet all men try to bring it about with their works, without Christ. But it shall not be. "Kiss the Son, or be eternally lost.

For his wrath will soon burn, but well to all who trust in him.

This is the final promise. When Christ's kingdom begins, the cross follows immediately. The wrath and the cross are exercises of faith. He seeks his own, he says, he will soon be angry, he will soon come behind his own. Therefore he also comforts and says: The cross is before you, not that you will be lost under it, but that you will learn to trust God. But this is to be noted, that all crosses seem as if our Lord God were angry with one. Therefore, one should oppose faith, saying, "Blessed are those who trust in Him." For to be able to trust in God when everything is going well is not an art; but in the cross, when he stumbles, that one can then accept it as a ruth and say, "Dear Father," then it is an art.

About the same Psalm.

Today I have begotten you.

"I have begotten" indicates that he was his natural son, because he had called him his son; ["I have begotten," he says].

Lest he be thought to have been adopted in the Son's stead.

"Today" denotes eternity, which is a constant present; as Christ speaks John.

8, 58: "Before Abraham was, I am". For there it does not say: He was, or will be, neither yesterday nor tomorrow, but: "He is", and "today".

So he calls himself a son, on the reputation and on the testimony of the father, so that he does not honor himself. He is not made or created, but begotten; nor otherwise than "to-day," that is, equal to eternal; nor before or after the Father, but at the time which is called "to-day" by the Father.

So the new sermon is the gospel of the Son of God.

He would King, if he were not not be Anointed human.
One, Priest,

He would the begotten Son, the if he were not not be Lord of the world, GOD.

For the kingdom or regiment over the world he gives to none but himself.

So Christ is s a new king and a new priest,

What else would it be necessary to appoint a king to preach, since there were preachers before, namely the Levitical ones?

But because he preaches, he is a spiritual king.

But he lives forever, having been raised from death, for he reigns in all the ends of the earth, which a mortal man could not do without an heir in his place. But now there is no heir here.

And yet he is mortal, for he is a king and priest who preaches to mortal men on Mount Zion. Therefore he who is mortal must become immortal through his resurrection, that he may reign.

Hiss from me.

the Master, the of all things, from which it
He is Lord, the King follows that he is true God.

This majesty of dominion is not given to the angels, but to the Son alone, who is GOD, and yet it is said to him: "Heische", as to a lesser and a man. Therefore it is given to him, that is, God proves that he is His Son, Rom. 1, 4.

The iron sceptor

Monks, pens,

Iron.

For nothing must resist him who rules everything with the word, as if he wanted to say: All adversaries will not be able to resist the same.

So the king here is a priest who is teaching, so he adds:

Let yourselves now be instructed, O kings.

Hear this one, all of you Jews and you you, Gentiles.

No one shall continue to teach. He wants to have all of us as his disciples; he takes away the right to teach and to be wise.

"Be wise," that is, let that which is yours be punished, for here is the King.

But why does he address only the kings and judges? Because they are the ones who are most opposed to this king, and they most seriously believe that they are fools.

"Serve with fear"; because your works are condemned.

"Rejoice with trembling" because of the great gifts and benefits given to you by Him.

Thank God that you are worthy to be His servants with all reverence, and take care with diligence and fear whether you will be lords and let yourselves be served as kings.

Again, be joyful and without worry, because you have a King, High Priest and faithful Master, who is willing, able and knows how to govern and sustain you. He is all, through all], in you all, Eph. 1, 23. Col. 3, 11.

Kiss the son.

There remains wrath against all the ways that do not worship the Son and receive this King who is God. Your way, he says, will perish with you.

"Who trust in him." He does not say, "They that do works," but, "They that trust;" because he had hitherto spoken of the word, here he says of faith in the word. But he says:

"Soon", that is, he will be angry about a little thing. As also Ps. 8, 6: "You will let him be forsaken by God for a little while"; where "to be forsaken by God" means as much as that God is angry.

So now we see that this psalm claims that the gospel is a rebellious doctrine, because it causes trouble among pagans, kings, nations and princes. But not through its fault, because the psalm says, "Why?" and "in vain," that is without all cause.

"The kings" are lords and princes set over land and people.

"The Gentiles" are their subjects.

"Lords" or senators and councillors, councilors are the authorities in cities.

"The people" (populi) are their communities.

These four are enemies of the gospel:

The kings, and their subordinates.

The lords or authorities, and their communities.

By lords or authorities are also understood the other rulers and the petty rulers.

See how the order is reversed:

the heathens, the kings,
First he sets the people, thereafter the authorities, to indicate the rebellion, and that the authorities do not act as God-ordained authorities against Christ, but as perverse authorities.

Also, he says differently:
the heathens rage,
the people talk, the kings rebel, the lords deliberate, because they trust in their quantity, Law and justice, their power, their wisdom.

They rage, they talk, they rebel, they counsel, but in vain, because what they are subjected to will not happen.

the people rage and go at it without judgment,
The kings are hopeful, without fear, and think of violence, because The mob is presumptuous, without prudence; the authorities are presumptuous, passing judgment and condemning without equity and justice.

With impetuosity, with violence, with presumption, with unreasonableness they fight; no one allows themselves to be to hear,

To use discernment, to consider, to ponder, and to be reasonable.

The third Psalm.

1 David did not make this psalm when he fled [from Absalom], but after that danger he made a general thing out of his own, and put the history of his danger into this psalm, as an example to all the pious who might encounter such distress, that they might have a form and know how they should then speak and pray, so that they would not despair. For this is what the psalm teaches: Let it be so, that one may not despair nor despair, according to the example of David. For his life, body and soul, his kingdom, honor, favor of the people, wives, sons and daughters were in extreme danger. So it was a very severe challenge, and yet he does not despair. We should also follow his example in our perils and hardships.

V. 2. Oh Lord, how many are my enemies.

The first two verses show the great danger David was in. There is not one or two, he says, but so many that no one can count them: Wife, child, kingdom, honor and glory are all gone.

And so many sit down against me.

003 Many are set against me, which before, when I was well, were my friends. This is how it is in adversity; when one is forsaken, they fall with multitudes who before have helped me teach and preach. So also in Proverbs we say, No adversity alone. And these are the two works: first, that he suffer persecution; second, that he be forsaken of his friends.

V. 3. Many say of my soul that it has no help from God.

4. is a blasphemy. When one is in such misery, evil mouths come to him and want to have the soul as well: If our Lord God were with him, he would protect him; but he does not, and lets him be cast out of the kingdom 2c. There are very poisonous

Words that one should also have lost God. And this is the challenge of the word, that they want to take away one's armor, faith and prayer, as if it were not enough for one to be persecuted; but that one also cannot find it in himself, so that he can hold on and defend himself. God is an enemy to him, they say; so the devil also helps to blow. When it comes to that, it is at its highest, it must break and stop. Thus we now see such blasphemy in the case of the pope and the Turk. Therefore it must surely come to pass that they both perish. Then the spirit comes forth and says:

V. 4. But you, O Lord, are the shield for me, and the one who sets me in honor, and straightens my head.

5 Here he sets up three kinds of defense against the three kinds of temptations of which he said before. First: You have given me your word against the "many" who afflict me; "you are my shield", I have no other help. Secondly: Against those "who set themselves against me" and who fall to my enemies and persecutors and leave me in all disgrace, "you set me in honor." Thirdly, "Thou judgest also upon my head" against the spirit of sadness, and against blasphemy. They want to make my heart dull; but you are my God, and make my conscience glad, so that I do not despair. Up to this point, it has been a story of how he fared in his temptations and sins. Now when one comes to such a point that he starts to encourage himself again, he also starts to overcome, if he only holds on to the word. Now he puts his own experience before our eyes, so that we may follow his example.

V. 5 I call with my voice to the Lord, and he hears me from his holy mountain.

6. from Zion, that is, in the place where he is to be called upon for the word. Prayer and faith are necessary in time of trouble. Faith is necessary so that we do not despair;

Prayer, that we may overcome; for the same is our armor and weapons. Therefore it is called [Zech. 12, 10.] the spirit of grace and prayer, that one may have the spirit, that one may yet provide himself something good to God. Now if the two stand, there is no need for us. One sigh of faith can overcome Satan, and all our temptations; as we shall see in the Turk. In the three following verses he thanks God for such a blessing.

V. 6. I lie and sleep and awake.

(7) Thus he indicates the highest security. So he who can do, pray and believe, lies down to sleep, gets up and asks for no one. But if one is full of thoughts, he cannot sleep. I live in great security, he says. Why?

For the Lord keeps me.

They afflict me, but the Lord defends me and keeps me; therefore I am not only safe, but also courageous, so that I will not fear anyone there. So the experience of faith bursts forth, praising God and saying, "If our Lord God can help in this way, then I will not fear a hundred thousand.

V. 7. I am not afraid of many hundreds of those who are baptizing, who are lying about against me.

9. this is the goal to which the whole psalm is directed, and it turns the special

The history of the world applies to the general. So this is the lesson of the psalm, that no one should be too afraid or despondent, no matter how bad it may be.

V. 8. Arise, O Lord, and help me, my God.

(10) But, O Lord, if thou wilt arise, there is no need.

Whom thou shalt smite all mine enemies in the jaws, and shatter the teeth of the wicked.

(11) Thou knowest the art, and smote them on the mouth, that their teeth should fall. Thou makest them subdue, boast, defy, oppress; but when they have opened their mouths widest, and are about to devour us, thou comest and smakest them, and makest them to be neither here nor there.

V. 9: With the Lord you will find help, and your blessing upon your people, Selah.

If the decision is: "Help comes from the Lord" [Ps. 121, 2], there is no help with men, they can neither help nor harm. So is the blessing with the Lord. The blessings of men do not help, nor do their cursing and blaspheming harm. So with this verse he gives this history to all the people and says: "All who believe and pray have help from the Lord. Then follow him in your afflictions.

About the same Psalm.

I. ¹⁾ The first evil is to have many followers.

The second is that the same increases because the friends fall away; that one falls to them and falls away from me.

II. The third is the high boasting, combined with blasphemy, as if they could prove with a certain fact, 2) that he is rejected because he is abandoned by God. God does not want his. This is a reason for proof that is taken from the revealed facts and what the senses feel.

1) These figures I to VIII are in the original edition.

2) Instead of probet, probent will be read, as the old translator already assumed.

Here one must trust in the thing against the thing, in hope against hope, which does not happen without tremendous heartache. It hurts, because the devil does not say this, unless he has the thing itself, which he can insist on as with an experience.

But the best thing is that it is not.

But "they say," he says. They say indeed, but it does not happen immediately, as they say, because the devil is a liar and all who cling to him. Many words go into a sack, much more out.

Let the word be the word, you are the shield. "The shield" against those who fear and afflict us.

"The honor" against those who set themselves against us and trample us underfoot.

"An uplifting of the head" against those who make the heart fainthearted.

Arise, lift up your head, and be undaunted, undaunted. These three things the Comforter, the Holy Spirit, does through the Word. Rom. 14, 17.

IV. "With my voice." It is only [therefore] to pray, and it is already there 2c. As another Psalm says [Ps. 50:15], "Call upon me in the time of trouble, and I will deliver thee." Item: "He calls upon me, and I will hear him," Ps. 91:15. "I call," he says; does not say: run here, run there; do this, do that; become a monk, become a nun: accuse me, and call me, and I will gladly do it.

V. "I lie" 2c. I see that my sorrow and worry, how I may get rid of my distress, is nothing. If you learn to obey God and trust His word, you will be without worries, you will live, have plans, die, "He will take care of you" [1 Pet 5:7].

VI. "I am not afraid." Though the gates of hell set themselves against me, what is it? If the whole world is against me, what is it?

VII. "Baking", because they wanted to devour with the deed, with words.

But, "praise be to the LORD, 1) that he giveth us not to be robbed in their teeth" 2c. [Ps. 124:6.] For they must spit out again those whom they had already seized with their teeth in order to devour them.

So it is a consolation that God comes just at the time when it comes to devouring, and breaks the jaws of the lions, so that they have to let the robbery go.

"Teeth" are the forces, the fierceness of godlessness.

VIII. "With the Lord one finds help." We cannot help ourselves, so it does not matter much who curses us and says that there is no help for us with God. If he helps, then there is blessing enough.

One concludes: You are in trouble, so you have sinned. Job 4, 7. Eliphaz says to Job: "Dear, remember, where has an innocent perished? or, where have the righteous ever perished?" I answer from the fourth Psalm, v. 2: "I am righteous in the sight of God, but if I am in trouble, God will comfort me. On the other hand, you are godless and wretched people; therefore you have your comfort here on earth, and without God.

1) The words: "But ... HErr" are missing in the Latin. Already the old translator inserted them.

2) In Latin: lilioes instead of: intkliees.

The fourth Psalm.

1. is an exhortation to faith against temptations and plagues, especially those of fate. For the saints must suffer evil, and not only be persecuted, but also be challenged in all ways. There is a lack of good, of friends 2c. For the devil locks himself in everywhere. Therefore those who do not believe seek comfort in their own temptations, so that they may be rid of their misfortune. And so everyone fights against faith.

We have seen that before this time. If one had only one bad leg, he had to pledge himself to a saint; no one wanted to have no heartache. This psalm goes against such people and teaches: "If you lack anything, whatever it may be, just call and ask, and seek it from the one who can help you; do not run here or there, do this or that, let our Lord God help you. But one does not do it, we all want to be our God himself. That is what the bishops are doing now, they do not ask for what they would like to have; they just think: So let us be God.

3) The old translator has "friends", the Latin copy: "joys".

we do to him. Then our Lord God must look upon it sourly I like it best that it is understood for the preaching ministry. and say, "Is it not lawful for me to do anything to it? So it You great men, he wants to say, who are supposed to is a common psalm of all temptations, and belongs to the teach others and know how God is supposed to do, even first commandment, like the one we had yesterday. But ridicule those who teach this way. For so they say: O you in so far as it contains exhortations, it belongs to the third must wait long for Christ 2c. So our honor, that is, our commandment. And it is the purpose (scopus) of this preaching ministry, is ridiculed by them; therefore he psalm that one should call upon God in all distresses and scolds them, "How long shall this ridicule last? misfortunes.

How do you love the Eitele so much, and the

V. 2. Hear me when I call, O God of my Lügen so much? righteousnes, who comforts me in anguish.

These are God's own names, through which He seeks to obtain benevolence (captat benevolentiam). But with this first verse he summarizes the content of the Psalm, namely, that God justifies in sins and comforts in tribulations. Few of them believe this, and they do not accept God's comfort, but have recourse to their own suggestions. They also do not call God a God of righteousness, because they have a righteousness of works. The worshippers of the saints, too, who want to reconcile God with their vows, also want to work themselves out of trouble by works, and thus sin doubly. First, they seek the righteousness of works, and second, they seek another Comforter, and thus take away the names of our Lord God from both of them. But we who believe know that God, though we sin, will forgive us our sins in vain through faith, and will also help us in other troubles. That is why David calls him the God of righteousness, that is, through whom and in whom we have righteousness.

Have mercy on me and hear my prayer.

Help and counsel, as you did before. And this psalm has such prayer primarily in mind (scopus). Now he exhorts and starts a sermon, would like other people to do the same, and first of all punishes unbelief:

V. 3. Dear sirs, how long shall my honor be profaned?

4. this word "honor" can be understood either for "my God", or for the preaching office, as often elsewhere, as Ps. 16, 9.

(5) This "vain" and "lying" he opposes to that he said, "GOD of righteousness" and "Comforter". For the GOOD of righteousness is truth, their righteousness is vanity; so GOOD also comforts righteously. But their countenances are lacking, and are lies. As if he wanted to say: That you do something, that is "the vain thing"; that you hope for something after that, that is "lies". So he first shows them the sin, that they do not ask anything about the true God and His grace, but mock the preachers. Now he also teaches them what the office of a true preacher is.

V. 4 Recognize that the Lord leads his saints in a strange way.

006 As if he should say, Learn ye to believe; know ye not his ways? "He leadeth strangely." If you think he will let them perish, he will help them. But ye would have him help you, not by leading you strangely, but as ye have determined; this cannot be. If he is to help, then it must be such help that no one could have provided for himself; just as we have been miraculously delivered from the papacy. When he loves someone, he acts as if he were his enemy. Just as a householder does: he does not feed his son as much as the sow; not that he prefers the sow to his son. Thus, when God gives great gifts in the world, it appears as if God is inclined and loving. But he gives such gifts that he makes a pig fat and then slaughters it. On the other hand, when he sends afflictions to his own, it seems as if he is hostile to them. But it is said: "He leads strangely", that he makes himself so strange, that one thinks he is the Devil, and not God. This is what he does to his saints whom he loves.

The Lord hears me when I call upon Him.

7 There is "the spirit of grace and prayer", Zech. 12, 10. "Righteousness" is that he leads in wonder; the "comfort" is that he hears. With the pieces let us only remain: here believed, and there prayed. Now he also teaches them about the fruits of faith and exhorts them to patience:

V. 5. If you are angry, 2) do not sin.

(8) After this teaching of faith, they lift up and say: But who can suffer it? Then he teaches them, saying, "You would like to become unwilling, but do not do it; break yourselves, cross such temptations by faith. And what you have that wants to make you grumble, don't follow the movements, you can't fight it, you have to feel the misfortune. Soon a curse is wiped out; now he warns them: "If you feel such evil temptations, do not give in.

Speak with your heart in your camp, and wait.

(9) Go into a secret place, and read the holy scriptures, and keep your heart in silence, and tarry. If you bite yourselves long with it and give word for word, evil for evil, you will not do well; do not do it, go into your closet, sit down contentedly and wait. Yes, they say, we want to arrange processions, have mass sung 2c., as they will do now in Augsburg. Therefore he exhorts them further, and says:

V. 6. sacrifice justice.

(10) So he condemns their works and their nobility: Ye anger God much more with such works. If ye will sacrifice, sacrifice not a swine, but the sacrifice of righteousness, that is, righteousness itself. But "righteousness" is to believe, trust and hope in God, as he declares himself.

And hope in the Lord.

(11) But "to hope" means to lead whimsically. And "hope" means, do not seek to see it.

V. 7. Many say, How should this one know what is good?

012 But when I teach and preach like this for a long time, they say: Who? would you teach us? Should the fool tell us something good? We know better than he. So they cannot suffer faith and hope; for they do not want to suffer, but want to be helped either by force or by attacks. The fool, they say, preaches long about hope, but I feel it well, that it hurts me. Well, he must let them go, even though they are called "many," the great multitude. Therefore he now turns to his own:

But, O Lord, lift up over us the light of thy countenance.

13 If they will not, do it to us, dear Lord. "The light of thy countenance is a kind and gracious face. An angry face is dark. Now when God punishes, He looks sour; but when He comforts, it is called "the light of the countenance," that is, a gracious promise. As, "GOD leadeth his saints whimsically." Item: "GOD of righteousness." Such promises are the lights of the countenance, that is, indications and manifestations of grace and mercy. Therefore, he says, "Exalt over us." Let us hear a gracious word, keep us by thy promise, that we fall not into murmuring and impatience. The word "lift up" means as one casts out a banner. Throw up an ensign, let thy word stand fast with us, that we may be governed by it; as one is governed by the panoply in the army, for there is no other comfort but the word. With money, beautiful women, cities and castles there is no comfort, only God's kind word gladdens the heart.

V. 8. You make my heart glad, though they have much wine and grain.

14 The wicked have not the joy of the word, but rejoice that they have corn and wine, that is, riches and the mammon of this world. Like the popes

1) In the Latin edition the note is here: propriis siZniüelT, eomraonsmiiii. We suppose that eommovsmiui ^"will you be moved"] should be read. The following nurtidus also suggests this. Similarly, in the following Summa of this psalm, § 8: urovsaris.

and monks who sing to our Lord God from a bag of straw; if only they have their monasteries and convents, that is their joy. They become great, not by the word, but by mammon. But this he saith unto the godly for a warning, that they should not be vexed that the wicked prosper so. [There is no harm, he says, for they do not have the joy of their hearts.

V. 9. I lie down and sleep completely with peace.

15. I completely, with all that I am and have, lie down and sleep with good rest.

I will also have to eat. I am sure and command the matter to our Lord God with all that I have.

For you alone, O Lord, help me to dwell safely.

My God is no one, except you alone. They have their mammon; I have you alone and your word; I have enough, and I am safe in peace and security. This fourth psalm is therefore of calamity, but the preceding one is of persecution and tyranny.

About the same Psalm.

Of the calamity in which the weak are broken, and the wicked lust and murmur.

Although the flesh and the world pretend that those who are in poverty or in any other disgrace are cursed and wicked in the sight of God (for it is seen that the law promises good and peace to those who obey it), yet I do not despair, though I am a poor beggar torn to pieces, and a sinner to boot, and have earned nothing but poverty, but I know that I am righteous in your sight through the righteousness of your grace.

This is the matter with which this psalm has to do, that one says: He who serves God has enough; but I serve God and have nothing. That is why he meets such an affliction of faith and says: "God, my righteousness"; that is, by whom and before whom I am righteous, although those accuse me of being ungodly because of my misfortune. But because it is difficult to endure such things, he asks for help that he may endure them, and comforts himself with prayer.

V. 2. who comforts me in fear.

You alone comfort me with your word; otherwise everything cries out against me, because I am in distress: You are lost. As Job's friends did, who in view of his accident, and from what was before their eyes, concluded that he was a godless man before God. Against these, and at the same time against such facts, one must argue with the grace of God. And here it is God alone who comforts. That is why one must pray.

Now he goes out, having been established inwardly by confidence and comfort, to refute those who are otherwise minded by punishing them:

V. 3. Dear sirs, how long shall my honor be profaned? How do you love the vain so much, and the lies so much?

3. the honor

GOD, of the office, of the cross.

Of the cross, because we glory in our tribulations; therefore the cross is a glory.

The honor of the ministry is the sermon, which the wicked, who are well, laugh at. Yes, they say, wait until a roasted chicken bites into your mouth.

GOD. Why do you ridicule my weak God, since he is "my honor"? Ps. 3, 4.: "You who set me in honor"; and Ps. 106, 20.: "You transformed their honor." There is an emphasis on the word, "mine." For those boast of a strange God, and have not their honor in common with him.

For GOD is our Money,
Justice, good name,
high-mindedness.

4. lies, the eitele 1) is the idol and the false

1) So the old translator has it, as we think, correctly, because this interpretation refers to the words of the Psalm. It will be read instead of iräuitas in Latin, varütim.

Service of works, against the honor of which it is now said. For the wicked are well off through their merits; they gain the goods of the world, that is, from the devil. But I, as a poor sinner and beggar, have my righteousness without merit.

5. to love, to have gladly,/these words have an emphasis, for the wicked cling to such their trust in such a way, that they do not forfeit my God, that is, my honor, alone.

Those whom you consider to be

The godless, the lost, the wretched,

but also despise and ridicule. The Christ is no good; but the false lying cap and plate, which is valid, which loves, everyone seeks, that is, an idol.

V. 4. Know that the Lord leads His saints in a strange way; the Lord hears me when I call upon Him.

(6) Oh, that you would know that God is not so minded or judged as you are, but whimsical!

they are the most blessed, the most blessed,
the happiest,

not in fact, but in faith. The thing deceives you, because you do not have faith, but follow your reason. This is a great thing, that my God hears in all distress, which your idols and works cannot; why then do you love them and seek them?

V. 5 If you are angry, do not sin.

7 For someone would say, "Who can suffer it? Who then will serve God, and so live? Answer: If you are moved either against God or against men, do not sin; that is, do not despair of God, do not act against him, or fall away from him to your idolatry and your own conceit. Do not leave the word, and do not go to the wicked, but remain steadfast and persevere.

Talk to your hearts.

8. do not follow the thoughts of your heart, but hold the word of God before it; speak to it through it, and still it, that it may be established by the word; otherwise it will wander in innumerable ways to find comfort there, or rather to fall into murmuring.

On your camp.

9 That is, beware of the public, keep to yourselves, that is, do not allow everyone to be your comforter, who rather corrupts you or makes you more melancholy. Do not jealousy over the wicked. This happens when you go out and see how they are doing so well. Learn the 37th Psalm. Let the word be with you in your chamber, and comfort your heart, namely the word of God, as he said above [v. 3]: "My honor". And for this you may need a brother [who recited it to you or read it yourself; only that you do not let yourself be found in the castles of Babylon.

Harret (Silete).

10. wait, be patient, that is, have hope through patience and comfort of the Scriptures, 1) Rom. 15, 4. for otherwise, without the Word, it is impossible for you to win, therefore "grasp your souls with patience," Luc. 21, 19. believe and suffer.

V. 6. sacrifice justice.

(11) What are you doing with your sacrifices, relying on them to escape calamity? Rather, do this: "Sacrifice righteousness," that is, faith. This is a Hebrew way of speaking: Sacrifice righteousness, that is, justice. Do God his justice, he will not leave you.

And hope in the Lord.

(12) Even though you lack what you want. You should hope, trust, wait, and that most of all when what you desire is least of all; for your flesh causes you this plague.

V. 7. Many say, How should this one instruct us what is good?

13 But I let it get sour, and I try in vain; for most of the part

1) In Latin it says: eonsolaiionern instead of:

despises it and says: "Yes, say what you want, I can see how it works. You speak good words and do evil things. "Give here, give there; here a little, there a little," Isa. 28:10. Item, to Job his wife said [Job 2:9], "Bless God, and die." And to Toby his friends and his wife said, Tob. 2:15: "Now where is the trust for which you gave alms?" Where is it? Where are they? Ps. 42, 4: "Where is now your God?" These are words of the blasphemers.

14. "Many." This is most painful, that many say this, and it is found in the work, and the devil stirs up, and God pampers, and the conscience doubts, and the flesh grieves.

15 The consolation is: "They say". It is well written, because they say it, but in fact it is not so with the faithful. As if to say, "These are the words of the wicked, that they may afflict the pious against the faith. Well, how well your God helps you; put it on the table and eat it' Baal Peor and Dagon would be better.

Lord, raise above us the light of your countenance.

(16) Against these many and against their ungodly speeches, arise, O LORD, and raise up thy standard of victory, that we may be strong and overcome. For the Hebrew word means to raise up a banner, that is, to give courage to the people of war, to make them confident.

and call to battle against them through his word. He raises his face when he turns to us through the word of grace (which shows the face and not the back, like the law) and strengthens us through it.

V. 8. You make my heart glad, though they have much wine and grain.

(17) The word of thy countenance and light, that is, the cheerful word, gladdens and sustains the faith that is troubled, that it may triumph over all these things. On the other hand, they despise this word of gladness and have their joy in their dagon and supplied belly, because of which they also laugh at the word; as he said above [v. 3]. Therefore they strive to have much, to become great and mighty, to become great and mighty by grain and wine, that is, by temporal things.

V. 9. I lie down and sleep in peace, for you alone, O Lord, help me to dwell safely.

18 He now says goodbye to them. Well, they may go, if they do not want to do otherwise, but they will never have peace. But I will go on this word and my honor in safety, sitting, sleeping, watching, eating, drinking, living, handling 2c. This I have to thank thee for, because thou gavest me these things by the word, without my merit. They do not know this and drive their roads there.

The fifth psalm.

Title: For the heritage.

1. the word "inheritance" is often taken for a reward, fruit, usefulness, as Ps. 127, 3.: "Behold, children are a gift (hereditas) of the Lord." Thus this Psalm is called "for inheritance," that is, for rewards, namely, what the faithful and the wicked have for reward. For they have different rewards: the wicked are prospered here, that they may perish; the godly are afflicted here, that they may come to prosperity. So this psalm speaks of

The challenge with the heretics, or the challenge in the word and the doctrine, that those who have the right word are condemned as heretics, but the ungodly have the inheritance, the reward that they are considered holy people. But such an affliction torments the godly greatly, that so many adhere to error, and so few follow the truth; that so great a multitude of the Turks and Papists should be damned, but we, who are so few, retain the right word and blessedness. This is a great annoyance. He

But also in this psalm he does not only fight against the heretics, but also against his own conscience, so that he does not fall away from the word, moved by the multitude of examples.

2 We learn here how to resist the heretics. One should indeed fight against them with the outward word; but if fervent prayer is not added, one will not be able to do much against them. For our prayer causes our preaching, teaching and writing to do something.

Lord, hear my word, heed my speech, hear my cry, my King and my God; for I will pray before you.

(3) He takes it all upon himself to fortify his conscience. As if he should say: They want and boast that they are your people, that you are favorable and inclined to them, that you hear their words; but I know that you hear my words, my prayer, not their word, because they are godless. So Moses prays, 4 Mos. 16, 15.: "Do not turn to their sacrifice", do not let it please you.

V. 4. Lord, early would you hear my voice.

4 I come, he says, that I will pray, hear thou me early. But this word "early" can be understood either according to the letter or in a figurative way (ad metaphoram). According to the letter, because the morning time has always been ordered to prayer and the word of God; as we often see in the Psalms. In figurative speech, "early" means before all things. Surgens mane in Jeremiah 1) [Cap. 11, 7. Vulg.] means: "I was there all the way."

Early I will send myself to you.

5. arach among the Hebrews means to prepare, to make ready, as a table or bed is prepared. The Jews understand it here for a prayer to perform: I will send myself with a prayer.

And remember it.

I want to look, that is, I want to come and pay attention. It is all ways mighty fähr-

1) "Jeremiah" set by us instead of: im Latin. Hiero. is read from Hiere. In the old translation this sentence is missing.

lich with the false preachers, therefore it may well Zusehens. That is why he speaks: I will watch, I will be careful not to lose the word.

V. 5. For you are not a god to whom ungodly beings are pleasing.

I know that for sure. This is a painting of the wicked, intended more to assure one's conscience than to disprove them by it. They want their thing to be right; it also seems as if it were true, and if one judges according to reason, it is also true, so we must have lost; over this our Lord God gives them good and honor. Just as Moses had to fear as if God would look at their sacrifice, since he says Deut. 16:15: "Lord, do not turn to their grain offering." Therefore, it is necessary to strengthen one's conscience, so that one may say: "Even if it seems like it, I know that you do not like it; I find many things about them that are not pleasing to you.

I. The first is "the ungodly being," which I do not miss, namely, that they teach not of faith, but of works alone. So it is certain that no pope either will or can teach that we are justified without works, through faith in Christ; for they do not understand the first commandment at all. This is now our test and touchstone, that we live solely on the promise that God is gracious to us and has given us his dear Son as a propitiation; and whoever does not teach this, we conclude that he is ungodly.

II. He who is evil does not remain before you.

8 This belongs to the works. So also Paul [Tit. 1, 16.]: "Since they are unbelieving and incapable of all good works." So now the papists sin, who daily deal with such thoughts as they may kill and burn us; if they can take from ours honor, body, goods, they do it. We kill no one, but because they kill, he says: I am sure they shall not abide in thy sight, that is, where God dwelleth, in the temple; though they appear, yet verily I know that they shall not abide in the ministry of the word.

III. v. 6. the glorifiers do not pass before your eyes.

9 The verb XXX, from which this noun "Ruhmredige" is derived, means to praise. By metaphor, however, a praiser is taken for a fool, ass, and fantasist, as Thraso is in the Comedy [of Terence]. Therefore he calls praisers or glorifiers those who do nothing else but praise their thing, who thus say: Our works shall do it; who praise their works' righteousness. This also is a reason of proof, saith he, that thou hast no pleasure in them. Thou canst not suffer fools; for "the heavens tell thy glory" [Ps. 19:2.] He that will boast, let him boast that he has a gracious GOD [Jer. 9, 23. 1 Cor. 1, 31. 2 Cor. 10, 17.¹).

IV. You are the enemy of all evildoers.

10 There they are all together. Their whole life, he says, all their works are condemned. What they do for themselves, even though they do no harm to others, is evil; their righteousness is evil 2c. Cause: out of their works they make an idol, like the monks, the enthusiasts, the Turks, the Jews, and everything that does not believe. Their works they do not for the glory of God, but for their own glory. You are an enemy to them, I know that. Why? Because they are greedy for your majesty. These words also strengthen our consciences.

v. 7. You kill the liars.

(11) You are not only hostile to them, but you are so hostile that you also kill those who speak lies. I know, he says, that they preach lies.

The Lord has abhorrence for the bloodthirsty.

(12) These two praiseworthy things have joined them together, that they are bloodthirsty and hypocrites. Killing and strangling is with them, therefore they are also "false ones," pretending to mean well; saying they do everything out of zeal for righteousness, and yet they are false, desperate hearts; what they do and say is a lie. To the same,

1) In the Latin edition: 2 Cor. 11. In the old translation 2 Cor. II, 30. 31. The passage we quoted, which in our Bible is drawn to the 11th chapter, will be meant.

He says that the Lord has an abomination, because they intend to cover up their ungodly nature and pass it off as righteousness. This is called defying our Lord God, when they cover themselves as they do now. So all the wicked can be judged from the first commandment. But what shall I do? I will do it, and I know you will be pleased:

v. 8. But I will go into your house on your great goodness.

013 I know not how to boast of righteousness nor of works: this only do I know, that thou art good. Now therefore will I come before thee, and live in no other despite, but in thy mercy, which is great. This is the first commandment; and this is a fine pure heart, which formeth nothing before it, but the mercy of the Lord alone.

And worship against thy holy temple in thy fear.

14 These two things, which he summarizes here, namely faith and fear of God, those do not have. They do not fear, but boast, as the 36th Psalm, v. 2, says: "There is no fear of God before their eyes." But it shall be thus: before men we shall be pious, but before God we shall fear. Now what I have in me that is worthy of fear is already forgiven in your mercy. I am afraid as far as my person is concerned, and I trust as far as you are concerned. So now the consolation is complete. Now follows the prayer that our Lord God will give constancy.

v. 9. Lord, guide me.

(15) As if to say, I know that I am thus right; only keep me, that we be not presumptuous in our own things, but in our Lord GOD. It is ever better to rejoice in His grace than in my good works. Yet they do not want to suffer the doctrine. This is the devil's sorrow.

In your righteousness, for the sake of my enemies.

16. "In thine" which is before thee, and which is not mine, nor man's, but "thine". This verse is to be drawn to the first Commandment that our Lord God be our God, as he has shown in Christ. Now it is dangerous to fight against the ungodly being and to persevere in such a fight; therefore this prayer is necessary.

Direct your path before me.

Confirm my ways. This is what is said about constancy: that my eyes look no other way than your road, for my adversaries always want to lead me another way. It is very difficult to remain devout among godless people; as in Strasbourg many good men have been brought to ruin by them.

V. 10: For there is nothing certain in their mouths.

18 Their doctrine remains uncertain. Even if one listens to them for a long time, the heart still never becomes sure; for their thing does not stand on the first commandment and God's word. Fasting, masses 2c. do not make a confident conscience. It has no reason; for they are without the word of God. They cannot comfort a heart rightly. Therefore, dear Lord, protect me from this.

Their inside is heartache.

19 Havoth means heartache, misfortune, harm, sorrow. Even though they teach for a long time, the heart always remains in sorrow and heartache, so that no real joy ever enters the heart.

Your throat is an open grave.

(20) This may be understood of avarice, that they are insatiable. But I am tempted to think that they are death slayers, who murder and devour many. Their throat is a hell-throat, and their throat, through which they shout and preach, is like an insatiable grave that is always open.

With their tongues they pretend.

They have good words and good appearances, as we now see in public. Take heed, O Lord; if any man enter therein, he shall go down as into hell.

V. 11. Blame them, O God, that they fall from their nobility; cast them out for their great transgression.

(22) Behold, they blaspheme and rebuke thee; rebuke them again, reproach them, accuse them; make them feel it, bring them to the school, give them an evil conscience, that they may know that they do wrong, that they may therefore depart from their thoughts. These are the counsels of the wicked, as it is written in the first Psalm [v. 1]. So make sure that their teaching does not go out as they intend.

For they are recalcitrant to you.

(23) They think their thoughts are God's thoughts, but they anger you and do not please you.

V. 12. Let all who trust in you rejoice.

24. It is about the first commandment. They have no hope nor correction in thy promises, but hope of themselves. Therefore all they that hope in thee must be sorrowful: create thou that they may rejoice.

Eternally let them boast.

(25) Let them boast; they have just cause to boast, for they boast of our Lord God.

For you shield them.

(26) Though they say that we are ruled by the devil, it is you who protect us.

Let there be joy in you.

27. let them be of good cheer, but in you. For apart from you there is nothing but mourning.

Who love your name.

28 Hereby he points again to the first commandment.

V. 13 For you, O Lord, bless the righteous.

29. is a concluding speech, as above in the third Psalm, v. 9: "With the Lord one finds help. It is with you. They curse, but you bless. "The righteous are those who hope in God and love His name, but they are cursed by the world.

You crown them with graces, as with a shield.

30. Your gracious will is their shield. It is a glorious and very good psalm.

About the same Psalm.

V. 1. in finem pro hereditatibus.

1. finis, that is, for the sake of that for which you are striving; as if someone wanted to say: This they have willed, this they seek. De hereditatibus [of the inheritance], that is, of two kinds of gain (lucris), purpose, reward, fruit, pre

V. 4. Early you would hear my voice.

5. early according to the time, before all things; ///
according to the spirit, hurriedly.
That this may be the opinion: I seek first the kingdom of God and pray; therefore hear me also before all things.

I will be diligent to be taught by you and to be taught by you; I will not be quick to speak, as those wicked are always quick to teach. I will pay attention, and listen to you, as my God and my King, what you speak to me. "Oh that I should hear that God the LORD speaketh" [Ps.
85:9]. My first concern should be that I hear God's word.

Early I will send myself to you.

6. that is, I will let myself be prepared, I will surrender to you that you may shape me, I will

There is a contrast in the words

I want to send myself, because I want to remember it.

From all sides they rumble along, overpowering and hindering the wicked masters, who do not care or pay attention when you teach, but are thrown through each other, divided and scattered into various sects, and listen to and pay attention to no one but themselves. This

From the layering of the wood when it was laid over each

He wants to pay attention badly and only to One Word, and to listen to One Master, One King, One God, in the midst of the most different rotters.

V. 5. For you are not a god to whom ungodly beings are pleasing.

7. the wicked are not pleasing to you, the saints.
It will not remain the wicked, the pious.

He hates the liars, the preachers.
He kills, he abhors the cruel and false, the severe. They zeal for justice by killing the Son of God for the sake of God, because of the most holy cause of truth, which they prove with their lives without falsehood.

The opposite is true with the wicked.

8. for this hurts the prophet.

that the wicked will and boast that they are to please, to remain, to endure, to be loved, to be blessed, to be pleasant, and that the godly are rather what the Psalm says.

Therefore he straightens up and speaks out angrily against them: I know that they are not pleasing to you. For he speaks here with joy of faith, out of anger against such boasters.

They are taken for fools who know a lot of boasting and mastering, hear no one, and want to suffer no discipline. Such a Hōel (ʿn), praiser, is actually Erasmus. It comes from halal praise, as the fools know how to praise themselves magnificently.

V. 6. insipientes.

9. the great ones. I think they are called that because they make a lot of boasts about themselves.

V. 9. Lord, guide me in your righteousness.

(11) He prays that he may do so and be guided in the midst of his enemies, who teach and do the adversary, that they may not entrap him or lure him into their sects, and that he may leave them.

Notice now how much these two are against each other.

the justice < the fear of confidence against God.

trust, fear and have done everything, are useless servants.

As if he wanted to say: Because there are so many others who teach and do against it, keep me in your way, that is, in your grace. It is astonishing that the prophet asks for it, as if he did not have it and did not know about it, while our red spirits can and do know everything in one breath.

Who will continue to do something good if he is finally judged to be a useless servant when he has done everything he was supposed to do?

V. 10. There is nothing certain in their mouths.

12. they are uncertain thoughts, speculations without the word, whether they consider it stronger than the very strongest rocks.

V. 11. Their inner life is heartache.

(13) That is, their conscience is the most wretched thing, for their doctrine leads to despair, brings us sorrow, heartache, and all misfortune.

Blame them, GOD.

(14) The ungodly must be fought against with prayer, that God may reproach and disgrace them, and that their endeavors may be in vain, and that they may be excluded from the church and our fellowship.

For they are recalcitrant to you.

15. they make you bitter, that is, they delight you in the most delightful way.

V. 12. Let all who trust in you rejoice.

(16) This is a prayer for the pious, that they may rejoice by faith in the Lord, not by their works, nor in themselves.

[Forever let them boast.]

Likewise, they shall glory forever and ever. Their glory shall endure forever, for they do not glory in themselves, but in you.

Let them rejoice in your honor, name and praise, not in theirs; for they love your honor, and are enemies to theirs. Neither can any man. For the wicked love their name, in which they rejoice 2c., and they hate the name and honor of the LORD.

For you shield them.

(17) You protect them against the wicked's folly and all, against the accusation of the law, sin, wrath and death, namely, by forgiving their sin and showing them your mercy.

V. 13 For you, O Lord, bless the righteous.

(18) Whom the whole world curses, including sin itself and its conscience, so that without you alone there is no one to bless them. But the wicked are blessed by everyone, but not by you alone.

You crown them with graces.

019 Yea, thou crownest the wicked, but the crowns of the righteous are wrath, persecutions, and all the calamities of the world. Therefore by faith and from the word it is known that these things are true.

The sixth Psalm.

Now this is a very high psalm, which we poor people do not understand, and which belongs only to the great saints. The third psalm is about persecution, the fourth about tribulation, the fifth about heresies. So we go through and through in the temptations. This sixth psalm is about the spiritual temptation, which the monks call the spirit of blasphemy, that one is angry with our Lord God for not doing right. This is a challenge to faith and hope, that one only wants to despair.

V. 2. 3. O Lord, do not punish me in your anger, and do not chastise me in your wrath. Lord, be merciful to me, for I am weak.

2 These are excellent words that he speaks to God. He complains about no man, but about our Lord God Himself. It must be punished, he says; but, dear Lord GOD, that it be only the father's distemper, and not the judge's and stickmaster's. Although we cannot reach this psalm, it is useful to know it well, so that we may know that when we have this kind of affliction, it is not we alone who are to be punished.

are challenged in this way. For this is how it tends to happen, that reason makes a bad judgment according to its feelings, and says: He does not want mine; like Doctor Krause. 1) So here David feels the wrath and anger of God, and condemnation, not grace. Nevertheless he wakes himself up and says: "Do not do it, dear Lord, have mercy on me, for I am weak.

V. 4. Heal me, O Lord, for my bones are troubled, and my soul is greatly distressed. O Lord, how long?

This is an exposition of his distress. The whole life, marrow and leg trembles; everything in man cannot suffer this feeling. But no human heart can comprehend such a thing; experience alone teaches it. And yet it is good that we know 2) that we are not alone when it comes. This temptation is a stake in the flesh, as Paul calls it 2 Cor. 12, 7.

V. 5. Turn, O Lord, and save my soul.

This is a very simple prayer. He feels that God has turned away from him, has lost the promises, the word of grace and salvation, that there is nothing left but a vain example of wrath, Sodom and Gomorrah, the ruin of such a great nation as the Turks are today. For that the Lord had turned away signified that the word was lost, and that he was left alone, a man against Satan.

V. 6. Help me for the sake of your goodness.

(5) Then he abandons all works; he does not say, "Lord, help me, because I have made the temple and the service of God like this. It is the first commandment that he will have a gracious God.

For in death you are not remembered.

This is the other commandment. As soon as one loses God's mercy, one loses

1) About Doctor Krause (Lrauss) compare Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. IX, 262, § 33 and the note there. - Here the Latin has the note: Lie Haine Knxouum 86 ipsnru eentoait, anno 28. The time determination is wrong; it should read: 1527.

2) We have taken the words "that we know" from the old translation. They are missing in the Latin.

also his praise. So there remains blasphemy and hatred, that one would have another God.

Who will thank you in hell?

Who told him that? He must have been in death and hell, otherwise he would not know how to speak of it. As I said, it belongs to the other commandment. For he asks that he may praise and glorify God.

V. 7. I am so weary with sighing, I wash my bed all night long, and with my tears I wet my bed.

(8) This is exaggerated speech as far as the body is concerned, but it is not exaggerated speech as far as the soul is concerned. For the pain that the mind feels is greater than all exaggerated speeches can represent. But the body cannot follow the heart in this. I am weary with sighing," he says, "just as it happens that someone weeps himself weary.

V. 8. My form is ruined by mourning.

These are tremendous descriptions of his fear. Here he starts to groan for the word and will also gradually come to the third commandment. What is written in the Latin text, furor [Grimm], is in the Hebrew Caas Displeasure, mourning, disgruntled, unwilling. As is said of David, when he heard the news that his sons had been slain. It actually means to grieve. But this is what happens: sadness dries up the bones and corrupts the whole body; melancholy arises.

And has become old.

I am about to grow old and gray, because I am troubled everywhere. Wherever I look, there is cause for sorrow. No good thought comes to mind, but the devil possesses the heart with great heaps of evil examples and sayings, so that one becomes gray over them. Prayer or lamentation goes up to this point. Now the consolation begins.

V. 9. Depart from me, all evildoers.

11 "Evil doers" refers to the holy hypocrites who are not considered evil doers before the world. What do you teach? You does not teach to flee to God's mercy, not to call, not to ask; as the papists also do now. But "not to pray" is to despise God, and to tread on works with presumption.

v. 10: For the Lord hears my crying. The Lord hears my supplication, the Lord accepts my prayer.

12. I am concerned about prayer; I am answered; as he boasts in the fourth Psalm, v. 4: "Recognize" 2c. We will not do otherwise, we must wait and call for mercy. And herewith he praises us his worship of God (religionem), of which he says that it is nothing else than weeping, supplicating and praying. Which can do this in faith on mercy, they are right.

v.11. All my enemies must become ashamed, and be very afraid, and turn back, and become ashamed suddenly.

(13) He has persecution of his doctrine by heart, but of the devil within. Therefore he asks that his enemies may be ashamed, frightened and retreat, and become so completely ashamed that they must first try again; then they would desist from their presumption and bear their shame, saying: "O Lord, you are righteous, but we must be ashamed" [Dan. 9:7]. Now follows the seventh Psalm, where he must also become a rebel.

About the same Psalm.

V. I. Pro octava.

1. the octava is a musical instrument with eight strings, since one was not allowed to sing this psalm without instruments. The instrument with ten strings was used for feasts and praises, like Ps. 33, 2. and the one with eight strings was used on weekdays and in mourning, like here.

v. 2. Lord, do not punish me in your anger, and do not chastise me in your wrath.

2. God's anger and wrath is what he feels who is forsaken by God, by the Word, by faith, and that by the effect of Satan, who is the author of death, sin and conscience, and presses on unbelief, despair and blasphemy with his fiery darts [Eph. 6:16], or as Job says [Cap. 6:4]: "The arrows are in me that drink out the spirit." But that this is not done by Satan, but rather that God alone presses on it, the heart feels and believes. For Satan disguises himself in the form of the majesty (which leaves him), as he did to Matth. 4, 9. Christ and said: "If you worship me" 2c. This is the greatest darkness, therefore he cries out: "Oh Lord", "you", "your wrath", "your anger", "oh, do not punish".

3 But by saying, "Do not punish," "Do not discipline," he confesses that he is a sinner.

and deserved the punishment. But he asks that it be a temporal and fatherly punishment, not an eternal one and that of an angry judge. Thus, he feels at the same time fear of his conscience, which bites him, even devours him, and of the punishment that follows the accusing conscience, namely, of hell.

4 Here you see that he is stripped of all reliance on works. Here even the best works are silent, yes, they are even accusers; for he must not dare to hold them against the wrathful God; but he is entirely a sinner, all his is sin. But of this the secure godless people do not know. Therefore, he takes refuge in the mercy of God alone, and confesses that it is not up to anyone's running or willing, Rom. 9, 16.

v. 3. Lord, have mercy on me.

5 It is the Holy Spirit who may rebel against wrath, and against hope he gains and draws hope. The sinner who has earned wrath, and bears witness to it against himself, seeks mercy by asking for forgiveness. For you see that he cites no particular sin here, but confesses his sin in general. Therefore, these are the words of believing sinners who learn to rely not on merit but on grace.

to talk like reason, nature, this
6. it does not free will and to call.

Therefore, as soon as they feel this, they despair, and either strangle themselves, drown themselves, hang themselves, or are moved by the blow, or fall into a constant melancholy (melancholia), as the physicians call it, and bring their lives to an end with constant sadness, or finally fall into madness, raving madness, or other terrible afflictions.

But this feeling is at the same time a kind of sight of all sad, frightening, horrible examples of terrible deaths, stories, works and words, in which God's wrath and vengeance have been shown. Satan presents all these in an instant (as he showed Christ the kingdoms of the world in an instant), and surrounds the conscience with them, as Saul did David [1 Sam. 23, 26.], so that, if the Holy Spirit did not assist here, a man would have to collapse and die in an instant, as if he had been struck by the blow. This is it, that he says: "I am weak", there is no more strength, nor any hope or help neither of life, nor of salvation, nor of righteousness, but death, sin, wrath, hell. I can never.

This is another execution of what he said. I can never, or am weak. Such feeling also weakens the bones, the strength, blood and marrow of the body. Then it shakes the soul even more violently, and brings such fear and terror into it that it cannot think anything, nor pray, nor desire, but only thinks it is lost with the wicked for eternity. Then a moment seems to us to be a whole year, an exceedingly long delay. It is a wonder that he does not curse and blaspheme as Job did, but even calls upon him with a frightened heart and bones. This is perhaps what the author of the book of Job meant, that a Gentile man could not do what David, a Jew, could do.

9. "The frightened soul" is the despair of life, and feeling of death by God's anger. "The frightened bones" are the penetration of the despair into the body, which is the cannot bear it. This fright is from Satan, when man is abandoned from the Word, Spirit and grace, and he is left to himself in the fight against the devil.

V. 4. Ah Lord, how long?

This is the inexpressible groaning that the spirit expels, Rom. 8, 26. For it is the feeling as if he must remain eternally under God's wrath. Will there be no end to it? I could despair. For a fearful man sees no end to his distress.

V. 5. Turn, Lord.

He confesses that he feels that God has turned away from him, that is, that the Word, the Spirit of grace, and the merciful disposition of God have been taken away from him. And it is the same inexpressible groaning as above. He asks that the abandoned soul may be saved from death, from sins and from the devil.

For the sake of your goodness.

12 There it is. David, who is full of spiritual and worldly good works, yes, even of miracles, and also of promises and experiences of grace, forgets all these things, is abandoned by everyone in this fear of his, so that he does not dare to mention one of them, but calls on mercy as the greatest sinner. This may be a faith that fights in the most manly way over things that are not seen. Who believes that God is pleased with it?

V. 6: For in death you are not remembered.

(13) Thus he feels death and hell, in which there is neither faith, nor hope, nor supplication, nor the word, therefore neither salvation nor redemption, therefore neither thanksgiving nor praise. Where there is no thanksgiving, there is cursing and blasphemy. So he has an abomination of blasphemy in hell. What good would it do you if I blaspheme you? It is better that I praise thee; for thou art ever worthy of praise, not of blasphemy. Wilt thou then that all men should be lost, and that none should be saved? "Wilt thou then have created all men in vain?" [For so it seems before them, who are in such temptations as if all men were lost. For there he sees no holy man, but only condemned, because he sees no example of life or grace, but only examples of wrath and eternal death.

V. 7. I am so tired of groaning.

(14) I have sighed myself weary, so that my body aches with groaning. For these two verses represent the outward appearance of the body, how it has shrunk through the anguish of the soul. For a soul that is thus troubled brings forth such sighs that any one of them could make the body weary. Therefore they do not last long (for that would not be possible), but soon pass.

I wash my bed all night long, and with my tears I wet my bed.

15 This is an exaggerated speech, as we say in German: He cries that he wants to wash hands and feet with it. So also here: I would like to wash my bed with it. For he indicates that he is exhausted from weeping. And yet this was not done to be a satisfaction, but only an indication of the recognition of the sin, how great it was, and how abundant the grace of forgiveness, so that the mercy of God would not be disregarded if the sin were forgiven without punishment, or remained unpunished.

16. at night when /

in bed, where / great rest and peace are sought.

With this he wants to indicate that such affliction cannot be helped by our efforts, but must be alleviated by God's grace alone. While otherwise in bed and at night everyone is naturally refreshed, the temptation becomes much greater through such means of help (solatiis). But it is alleviated by the word of grace alone.

V. 8. My form is ruined by mourning.

(17) For the afflictions of the soul also extend to the body, so that the face becomes pale, the eyes darken, the brow wrinkles, and the whole appearance appears old. He speaks but especially from the time of this temptation; for apart from this hour one has another form; although if such temptations are often repeated, the body and the whole life is also very much changed.

V. 9. Depart from me all evildoers.

18 For this challenge teaches the knowledge of sin, grace and its power, against which the works saints fight with all their might (since they are not subject to the righteousness of God). Therefore he turns his speech to them, and becomes unwilling that they despise the grace and mercy of God; and not only that, but they also persecute him who suffers for sins and confesses grace.

V. 10: For the Lord hears my weeping.

This verse proves that with God it is grace and not merit that counts, because he does not praise merit but the grace of the one who hears him. With this he clearly confesses that it is because of God's mercy and not because of someone's running, Rom. 9, 16. But he says it three times ["The Lord hears" [v. 9.], "The Lord hears" [v. 10.], "The Lord accepts" [v. 10.] because of the hardened heart of his adversaries and for his strengthening. For he who asks, or gives thanks for that for which he has asked, shows by this that he is needy, that he has received, and has had nothing. Therefore the righteous man lives by faith [Rom. 1:17] and is a child of mercy, not a master or father of works.

V. 11. It must become shame.

(20) He desires that they may know these things, that they may be saved. He confesses that they are enemies and persecutors, but he also confesses that they are in high honor. They will have happiness, welfare and joy. For otherwise, if they were in disgrace and were downcast, he would not wish for them to be disgraced and to return.

It turns:

Those who are in honor will be disgraced. Those who live in joy will be frightened.

Those who are in welfare and happiness will return. And let this happen soon. Amen.

The seventh Psalm.

Apart from these temptations that we have had, there is still one left, namely, sedition, which also the Christians have to suffer. With the title Christ also had to die, as now the gospel is blamed for making rebellious people, for causing war 2c. One must learn that it does not want to be otherwise. The gospel teaches peace and obedience; nevertheless it must have the name that it is a rebellious teaching. This makes that we do not want to do everything that they want. So David was also accused by Shimei: "Come out, you bloodhound, who have set yourself up as king in Saul's place. [2 Sam. 16:7, 8]. So it goes; he who serves for peace must be called rebellious, and he is blamed as if he had offended the majesty; therefore the devil shall serve the world.

v. 2. 3. In you, O Lord, I trust, my God. Save me from all my persecutors, and deliver me, lest they devour and tear my soul like lions, because there is no Savior.

2. he confesses that his enemies are superior to him, also confesses that he is abandoned and that they are hard on his side.

v. 4. Lord, my God, I have done these things, and there is injustice in my hands.

3 Now here he comes to the point. If it be true, O Lord, that I have taken my kingdom by force, I consent to suffer what I shall suffer; for he himself is hostile to the same sin.

v. 5: Have I done evil to those who lived peacefully with me, or have I harmed those who were hostile to me without cause?

004 These pieces they blamed all on him, that he should repay evil for good, that he should rob Saul. Therefore he says: If it is my work, let it be done to me. But I did not do it, God did it and urged me to do it. This is how it is with us now: the pope and the bishops were condemned before, but now they want to follow the gospel.

Blame them because they are not allowed to sin with impunity.

"Without cause," as if to say, "It has been your commandment [that I should take the kingdom].

v. 6. So my enemy pursues my soul, and seizes it, and tramples my life to the ground, and lays my honor in the dust.

This is a defiance of his innocence. For my sake, I did not want to look at life or honor.

v. 7. Arise, O Lord, in your wrath, rise above the fury of my enemies.

6 Behold, how they rage, as they do now; are they mad and foolish? Now therefore he prayeth, Lord, set thy wrath against their anger.

v. 8. and help me back into the office that you have commanded me (Et suscita mihi iudicium, quod mandasti).

7. help me handle the kingdom. For iudicium means the service and office of governing and presiding over the people. Do this for the sake of your command, so that your honor may stand. So also be angry, and do this for the sake of your people. So he leads first the honor of God, secondly the benefit of the people, that he may rule, and serve God with, and be of use to the people. So I also say: if I did not consider God's honor and the people's benefit, I would not want to preach all my life.

That people will gather to you again.

008 He saith not, To me; lest any man think that he seeketh his own. Thus saith he above, Behold, it is thy office, but look not unto me. An ungodly king or servant divides the people and drives them away from Christ, but a godly one gathers them, not to himself, but to God, for he gathers them to the Word.

And for the sake of the same.

9 Not for my sake. If Absalom should remain in the kingdom, it will be for this purpose.

1410 D- uni- 6i-63. interpretations on the psalms. W. iv, E-E. 1411

The people will despise your commandment and will not believe that you have made me king.

Come up again.

(10) As if to say, The word is now trodden under foot; take up the ministry again. It is a prayer against our bishops and monks, who sit on high, and leave our Lord God here.

V. 9. The Lord is the judge of the people.

11. Here is a change of person. They are not the judges, but the judgment belongs to you, and not to those who do not have the word. This is now the one prayer for the kingdom and regiment, for the glory of God, and the welfare of the people. Now he speaks of his person.

Judge me, O Lord, according to my righteousness and godliness.

12. He appeals to his human righteousness. I am a sinner before you, but I have a good thing before men.

V. 10. Let wickedness come to an end, and promote the righteous; for you, righteous God, test hearts and kidneys.

(13) They shine beautifully, and so make us insolent. But you, God, do not judge by appearance alone, but test the kidneys, that is, the thoughts and the heart. You know what a man thinks in his heart and what he is inclined to do.

V. 11. My shield is with God, who helps the devout heart.

14 Now follow the words of consolation. For after the trust is established, he becomes joyful, and preaches, 1) prophesies and prophesies. And this is a very good sermon that he preaches here. My help, he says, is from the Lord. Those are counted on princes, swords and weapons, but God is my shield, who helps the right.

V. 12. God is a righteous judge.

15 This is who helps the righteous.

1) Instead of praeclieit should probably be read prusdicat, because it follows immediately: Also the word eoneio indicates.

And a God who is daily threatening.

16 He is also a strict judge. He divides the office of a judge into two parts, namely, that he helps the pious and kills the wicked.

V. 13: If one does not want to convert, he has sharpened his sword and drawn his bow and is aiming.

(17) These are words of a very great and mighty earnestness, that he might put under view the wrath of God which is already present; but they believe it not.

V. 14: And he hath laid upon it deadly projectiles; he hath prepared his arrows to destroy.

18. the word dalak [XXX] means to devastate, to kill. He will not shoot with a straw. Those arrows are not a joke, but life and limb. He did not use them to joke, but to destroy with them. But there are such fellows who do that 2) and do not ask anything about it. As they do not believe even now, when God is threatening. Now follows the prophecy.

V. 15. Behold, he hath evil in his mind, with mischief he is with child, but he shall bring forth a fault.

19. He ridicules them, as if it had already happened to them. You do not hear, you do not believe. As it is now, they strive and counsel, they are pregnant with plans and thoughts, that is, you strive and counsel, and when you look at it in the light, it is injustice and misfortune; nothing comes of it. Isaiah also used this same way of speaking [Isa. 8:10]: "All their attempts are in vain. So much now of that with which they deal. Now he also says about their pitfalls.

V. 16. He dug a pit and carried it out, and fell into the pit he had made.

20. as their plot against us is destroyed, so it is also for their own sake

2) "that", namely: that they joke with it. This word "that" is put by us instead of: "one", which we consider to be a printing error. The Latin text says: "one."

Damage, they fall, and are caught in their own rope.

V. 17. His calamity shall come upon his head, and his iniquity shall fall upon his crown.

21 Oh, who could believe these promises, that one could be sure as if it had already happened. So, since the Roman 1)

1) Instead of ImumQum in the Latin edition, read (with the old translator) Uormanuiiu.

The first empire wanted to wipe out the Christians, but it fell to the ground, and the Christians still remain. So it is decided: what is done against Christ must come out against them, they must run away themselves. It must be done by necessity, for God is a righteous judge, so he is called. Now this is a lovely and very praiseworthy justice, that he destroys his enemies with their own attacks. Therefore, one should praise him justly.

About the same Psalm.

V. 2. In you, O Lord, I trust, my God.

(1) He starts against God by trusting in grace, but he is silent about works and merits. He confesses that the Lord is his God according to the first commandment. But an ungodly man does not start in this way, but in this way: I thank you, Lord, because I fast twice a week [Luc. 18, 11. 12].

Help me from all my persecutors.

You are my God, and I trust in you as my God; do now what is due to God, as I do what one who trusts in God should do, that is, help me.

V. 3. Lest they like lions devour my soul.

3. is a narration of his fear, which drives him to trust and pray. For every prayer has the cause that the need penetrates to it.

V. 4. Lord, my God, I have done these things.

He dares, because his conscience is confident, to stand against his enemies, even where God Himself is the judge.

"Such things." As if to say, "In other things I must confess that I have sinned much; but of that which they accuse me, I am innocent, I know it. For it was not of my own will, but according to thy will, that I became king in Saul's stead.

5. teaching (γνώμη): A good conscience forch even when it is certain. For even though this king is established by the word of God, he allows himself to be terrified by the splendor and appearance of the things that stand against him, and needs strengthening. He has to go into opposition, and quarrel and fight about certain things that are confirmed by God's word. The conscience is such a delicate thing.

(6) But he decides, "There is no injustice on my side, that is, against Satan, conscience, and the calumny of the adversaries. So he defies, and sets himself upright.

V. 5. Have I repaid evil to those who lived peacefully nnt me.

(7) I have not sought the kingdom, nor cast him out, nor fallen into his own, as Shimei crieth over me, and Satan troubleth me in my conscience, and maketh me to doubt whether I can rightly possess the kingdom. "Without cause," that is, "I have not taken the kingdom] without being urged by thy word, neither have I sought the kingdom out of a loud will. As it is said in the 25th Psalm, v. 4, "They do wrong without cause." Therefore, he rises up with the word and breaks through against his attack of Satan.

V. 6. Thus my enemy persecutes my soul.

8. he places his life and honor safely in God's judgment against his adversaries and is ready to lose them. But he is quite sure to keep them, according to the joyful and sure conscience of his innocence. It is a great seriousness that Moses has, because he wants the Lord to erase him from the book of life [2 Mos.

1414 - D.xvii, 65f. Interpretations on the Psalms. W. iv. isis-E. 1415

32, 32.], and Paul, since he desires to be accursed, Rom. 9, 3. There is a great emphasis on every single word. My enemy takes from me, not gold, precious stones, house and farm, but "the soul", "the life", "the honor". Furthermore, he does not say that he makes me subservient, but "he pursues", "he seizes", "he tramples to the ground", "he buries me".

v. 7. Arise, O Lord, in your anger, rise above the wrath of my enemies, and restore me to the office (et excita iudicium meum) which you have commanded me.

9 After his conscience has been strengthened and assured, he now prays confidently and accuses his adversaries, whom he wishes God's wrath upon, because they stubbornly and surely despise His goodness and abuse it to the destruction of the righteous. Furthermore, they have no cause, nor any appearance, but it is pure fury and malicious nonsense in which they presume to be enemies and to harm the righteous.

10 Iudicium, that is, the royal office. But see how smoothly he speaks. He does not desire that his kingdom or his honor be restored to him, nor does he remember with a word his royal dignity or authority, but calls it a "judgment," that is, he desires to do the work of a king, and is anxious that he may be of use and service to others, and that too not of his own choice, but because he is compelled to it by his profession; "which thou hast commanded me," he says. I am called to the kingdom by you, therefore I desire to be obedient and to do my office enough.

v. 8. that the people may gather to you again, and for their sake come up again.

(11) I am concerned for the poor people, for if I am not reinstated, and your commandment is nullified, they will become the prey of wolves and deceivers, since they will then agree with Absalom and his, and thereby oppose your word, by which you commanded me the kingdom, and thus, deceived and disobeyed, will be implicated before you in the crime of sedition, and deserve equal punishment.

12. 1) Now behold, how great a danger it is when one participates in the sins of others. 2) That people gather to God when they are obedient to their rulers. 3) That God Himself, namely in His word and commandment, comes up when the authorities are given their due honor. How much more must these two different things occur when the apostles and church servants are honored or despised?

v. 9. The Lord is judge of the people. Judge me according to my righteousness and piety.

13. there stands here a person [the third instead of the other [the second, according to the figure of the Allöosis, as, when one says: It speaks my HErr, that is, you HErr, who have the judgment over all nations. You are king and supreme mayor. Therefore exercise your office between me and them, so that you may justify me by deed and declare my innocence, as you have called me to this office of yours by your command.

v. 10. Put an end to the wicked and promote the righteous, for you, righteous God, test hearts and kidneys.

(14) It behooves a judge to execute these two parts of the judgment, namely, to condemn the guilty and to absolve the innocent. Therefore he had attributed the judgment to God. But now he asks and reminds him to execute this. Thou art a right judge, for thou judgest not by reputation or well-said words, as men do who are deceived, and deceive even when they are guilty; but thou knowest the hearts, therefore thou art not deceived. He says this because Absalom had a great shining appearance, but he had a weak one. The fact that he had forced his way into the kingdom had a great appearance among the common people, and it seemed obvious to them, because they did not pay attention to the word of God who had called him, but they were hostile to the cause itself, because they began it without the word. Just as it happens now that they despise our word, and cry out only because the tyranny of the clergy is broken and lies low. But whoever is in favor of the

They do not ask about this, but they pay attention to what happens to them. But God is judge, and does all these things, he knows it, and our heart testifies to it.

v. 11. My shield is with God, who helps the devout heart.

15. decision. Summa, this is my defiance, shield and castle, the Lord; since he is judge, it is certain that he absolves the innocent.

The other part of the Psalm.

V. 12. God is a righteous judge, and a God who daily prophesies.

16 Until now he has acted on his own behalf before God, has offered himself in judgment, has prayed and comforted himself. Now he acts against his adversaries; he afflicts them, exhorts them to fear God, preaches and prophesies evil to them. First of all, he makes the reproaches difficult by saying that God is just; therefore, he cannot let the evildoers go unpunished. Therefore the proud and the wicked have to fear him. Secondly, he threatens and is unwilling. He not only can, but also will punish, and that in wrath. Third, he will also not pardon long, but will judge soon; as follows:

v. 13, 14: If they will not be converted, he hath sharpened his sword, he hath bent his bow, he hath aimed it. He has laid deadly projectiles upon it; he has prepared his arrows to destroy.

(17) Hereby he sets before them the wrath of God, which is present or threatening (as happened to Absalom), so that he may terrify them with it. But the stiff-necked wicked do not respect this. It does not help to threaten them. That is why he prophesied misfortune to them, which would surely come upon them.

v. 15. Behold, he hath evil in his mind, with mischief he is with child, but he shall bring forth a fault.

18) How it now goes at Bologna 1) and at the courts of the pope, the bishops and the princes.

1) At Bologna (Lononiae) it was decided that the emperor should subdue the Protestants with the sword. Cf. Walch, old edition, vol. XVI, 2068, § 12.

The eighth Psalm.

This psalm is about the kingdom of Christ. For it was fitting that he should add a psalm of consolation after so many trials of the faithful. And the first verse teaches that the kingdom of the Lord Christ is in the word and a spiritual kingdom. Likewise, that it is not in one corner alone, nor in Germany alone, but on the whole face of the earth.

v. 2. O Lord our ruler, how glorious is your name in all the earth 2c.

2. this kingdom of Christ, he says, stands in his name; for the gospel is taught and preached.

In all lands.

3) This indicates the power of the gospel, which is spreading throughout the world.

The name and the kingdom of Christ are carried into all the earth.

Since you are thanked in heaven.

The other power of this kingdom is praise, that there is no other worship but to praise, believe and give thanks to this name. Further, all should notice the contrast in this first verse. Here he speaks, "In all lands." In the law it was said [Ps. 76, 2.], "GOD is known in Judah." Likewise, praise was offered in the temple alone; but now, as far as the heavens reach. For this is how the word "heaven" is often understood, that it means, everywhere under heaven. But it can also be translated: above heaven, that is, one praises him who is above heaven. As if to say: on earth he is blasphemed.

V. 3. From the mouths of young children and infants.

5 Here he adds who they are who do this and praise the name of God. "Out of the mouth of the young children thou hast wrought a power." 1) He uses neither swords nor weapons to strike his enemies. He uses only the mouth; by the tongue, by the mouth, by the word alone he directs his power. Thus Paul calls the gospel a power of God [Rom. 1, 16]. The dear preachers keep their fist inside, and leave the sword to the emperor, they only need the tongue.

(6) The "young children" are to be understood generally of those who are children either by age and understanding at the same time, or by understanding alone. Young and old, which are Christians, must yet become children, if not by age, yet by understanding, that we understand no more than the young children; for as soon as they would rule with wisdom, they fall away. Therefore, if a man wants to be a Christian or a preacher, let him only take hold of his head and give himself up, so that he is not a man, nor old, but a young child. My Hans Luther does not study much; as he is told, so he goes, is badly led by words, and does not ask much whether it is right or not. But the enthusiasts go on, wanting to argue for a long time, when our Lord God tells them, "This is my body," as it rhymes. This is not to be. That is why they never teach anything right. Christians, however, are all children and infants, as Peter also calls them [1 Pet 2:2]. He admonishes us finely that we feed with the teats; the same do it. By their mouth and their simple preaching it is evident that it is a divine power.

For the sake of your enemies.

7) This is that you put to shame the wisdom of the wagers; as we heard yesterday in the Gospel: 2) "The Holy Spirit will

1) Here the old translation has: "prayers". But that the reading of the Latin: "buildings" is correct, proves the second interpretation, K 6.

2) The pericope Joh. 16, 5-15. is intended for the Sunday Cantate. Since in 1530 Cantate fell on May 15, this interpretation of the 8th Psalm is to be moved to Monday, May 16.

punish the world for sin, for righteousness, for judgment" [John 16:8], that is what the world is able to do, and knowing how wise it always is, it shall become a fool. I have the mouth of young children, therefore they are so hostile to me; nor do I oppose them with words, and that your foolish words; as it is written [1 Cor. 1:27.], "What is foolish in the sight of the world, that God hath chosen." 2c. They must become fools because of his foolish word, however wise they are.

That you may destroy the enemy and the avenger.

This is a promise. The adversaries of the word of God shall not lead it out. One must carry the cross over it: but here is the promise that they shall go to ruins. But here the enemies of the word are delicately portrayed; for they are so hostile to no other thing than Christ, therefore all their hearts are set on vengeance, vengeance. The reason is, the gospel does not attack bags, it attacks the highest righteousness and wisdom of the world, which it wants to make foolish and sin. This makes evil blood, therefore they cannot and will not suffer it, as can be seen in the Jews against Stephanum. Thus it is written, how it shall be with us: we shall have enemies, and such enemies as are the most cruel, burning with insatiable vengeance; yet it shall not help them. This is an excellent promise against Eck and Cochläus and their kind. But the contradiction is before our eyes until we learn it, as follows.

V. 4 For I will see the heavens (coelos tuos), the work of your fingers, the moon and the stars that you prepare.

The prophet is now in another world. So he does not speak of this heaven, which we see. He says: "Your heavens", as Paul says [Phil. 3, 20.]: "Our walk is in heaven", there will be moon and stars, that is, teachers. Therefore he does not remember the sun, because in these heavens Christ is the sun. Up to this point he has spoken of the kingdom of Christ, of the nature of the kingdom, of the sacrifice, of the servants, of the enemies, of the cross, of the place and the location of the kingdom. Now he also says about the head of this kingdom.

V. 5. 6. What is man, that you remember him, and the child of man, that you take care of him? You will let him be abandoned by God for a little while.

This agrees with the second Psalm. This king, he says, is called one crucified and transfigured, one dead and raised again. What a king this is, who is nevertheless abandoned by God! How wonderful it is that God remembers him, of whom the whole world judges that God has turned his face away from him and does not see him, because he does not remember him. It is astonishing that you take care of him who appears before the eyes of all men as the most abandoned one; who is regarded not as if someone took care of him, but as if he was cast out; not as if he was remembered, but as if he was forgotten. So we can now also remember and say to Doctor Justus Jonas 1) that God has not forgotten him, that he is not rejected, but that God remembers him and takes care of him. In every challenge it seems as if there is nothing else but forgetfulness and rejection. But in truth it is a remembrance and acceptance. And it is strange that "remembering" should mean when one is forsaken by God, angels and all the world; these are temptations of death, despair and sin. Well then, we shall not fare better than our king.

A little time.

11) As he says in the gospel: "About a little one", namely, about three days, Joh. 16, 16.

With honors and ornaments you will crown him.

12. you will raise him from death, and lift him out of shame and disgrace.

1) He had a son who died at that time. (Note of the original.)

respect. With this he indicates that he has been in the highest shame, disgrace and distress.

V. 7. You will make him Lord over the work of your hands.

13 In this Psalm St. Peter saw, when he says Apost. 2, 36 that God has made this Christ the Lord. But Christ is actually God because of the work he does. For since he assigns to him the right and authority over all creatures, he indicates that this Christ is equal to God in authority. This is unbelievable, and yet it is a comfort to us that Christ has all things in his power and hand; as St. Paul deals with extensively in the epistles to the Ephesians and the Colossians.

You have put everything under his feet.

14 They shall be obedient. But such things we see not, but believe: for it is a kingdom of faith; one must believe, or else nothing is true.

V. 8. 9. sheep and oxen in general, and also the wild animals. The birds of the air, the fish of the sea, and the things of the sea.

15 He adds this for the sake of the text Gen. 1, 28 and Cap. 2, 19. about the dominion of Adam, so that we do not think that Christ has no right or power over the things that were given to Adam.

V. 10. O Lord, our sovereign, how glorious is your name in all the earth!

These are words of wonder. This is a strange Lord. The second and this eighth Psalm are among the most distinguished in the whole Psalter, but they must be believed.

About the same Psalm.

V. 1. ad victoriam pro torcularibus. Psalmus David.
1. XXXX [Githith] is a musical instrument, so called either from the shape of a winepress, or from the city of Gath (Gith), as.

for the instruments are wont to have different names; unless thou wilt say that XXXX, torcularia, [winepress], is the same thing, as that this psalm should be sung at a merry time, because the time of winepressing is the dear-is the time of the grape harvest. But I like the first opinion better, as we also understood in the sixth Psalm of the instrument with eight strings.

Lord, our sovereign, how glorious is your name in all the earth, where they give thanks to you in heaven.

The summa of the psalm is this: He sings with joy that the gospel shall go into all the world; then how the fruit and power of the word, namely the kingdom of Christ, shall prosper through the cross. Furthermore, he depicts the king himself, and the head of this kingdom, the Lord Christ, with joy and wonder. Finally, he says that Christ's people will also be provided for temporally. And therefore he says:

(3) O Lord, who now, when we are under the law, are our ruler, and we, thy servants and thy people, are worthless in the sight of the world, so that thou also art not esteemed among the heathen, and thy name is small, and is counted as it were among the lesser gods. But what will happen then, when the time of grace comes, and all gods, idols and temples will be put down by the gospel, and their names will be destroyed, and you alone will be praised as a god in the whole world? Help God, how great and mighty will then be your name, which the world will not be able to grasp, although it is now considered as if it could not even fill this corner sufficiently. This glory of your name will come through the word of preaching, by which you will be praised under the whole heaven, or everywhere where the heaven extends, that is, everywhere. For this is what the Hebrew text wants to say: "Since your praise will be heard in the heavens, that is, your praise will be proclaimed everywhere under the heavens.

4 Here you should notice that the Hebrew way of speaking indicates that the sacrifice of the new law is to praise God and to praise His name through the word. For he uses words with which Moses used to speak of sacrifices in the Law [Ex 30:10, Deut 1:11, Deut 12:27]: You shall put incense (dabis) on the altar, and put blood (dabis) on the horns of the altar. So also here: They shall offer (dabunt) unto thee, that is, sacrifice, not incense or blood, but thy praise. And not merely in a certain place of the altar, but as far as the heavens stretch.

(5) You should also know that the gospel preaches God's name and praise, therefore it will necessarily punish our works, wisdom, righteousness, and all that is ours, so that it may take away our name and glory, humiliate us, and make us guilty of sin and death, reproach us with our shame and dishonor, so that we may be ashamed, Rom. 3:19, so that all the world may be guilty of God. But see how he uses such a kind and trustworthy word, calling God a ruler, as if he were one of his servants; so that he not only distinguishes him from all other gods, but also confesses him and opposes him to all foreign gods, no matter how weak, foolish and void he is to be regarded. Therefore this is a fervent word of a believing heart: "Lord, our ruler", which is said out of a fervent faith against all aversions.

v. 3. out of the mouth of the young children and infants thou hast prepared a power for the sake of thine enemies, to destroy the enemy and the avenger.

From this praise and exalted name of God, the church arises, a mighty kingdom in the Lord, firmly established, "a pillar and foundation of the truth of God", 1 Tim. 3, 15. This kingdom and this well-founded power, masters or builders and builders, by which such a kingdom is established, are quite strange, namely, the mouth of children and infants, who are the apostles and church servants, who by their conversion before the world became children, fools and weak. Other kingdoms are appointed, not by the mouths of young children, but by the fists of mighty giants. Therefore Christ Matth. 21, 16. also understands minors and children according to the letter. Just as in truth they belong to these master builders of the church because of their youth and the simplicity of their faith. The 68th Psalm also says about this power of the gospel,

V. 34. 35.: "Behold, he will give power to his thunder. Pray to God for power! His glory is in Israel, and his power in the clouds." And in the 45th Psalm, v. 6: "Sharp are your arrows." Item, in the 110th Psalm, v. 2. "The LORD shall send the scepter of thy kingdom out of Zion."

For the sake of your enemies.

Here is a promise and an urging. To the faithful he promises to defend his word, to give victory in weakness, and then to destroy the enemy. And if you should ask: Why does he choose such weak preachers, underage and foolish, before kings and wise men? You have the answer here: He does this for the sake of the enemies, so that he has the opportunity to comfort the oppressed and to push the enemies to the ground, and thus shows his mercy on the faithful, but his power and anger on the unbelieving enemies; as he says in the other book of Moses Cap. 9, 16: "I have awakened you, so that my power may appear in you. Therefore I have struck down the children of Israel, that I might show them my grace and power to save. For if he chose the wise, the mighty and the holy, it would seem as if they had accomplished such great things by their wisdom, might and holiness, and so there would be no room left for the glory and knowledge of God.

(8) You see here how this mighty kingdom is in the midst of tribulation, and is under the cross, being exercised and perfected. Nor does he describe lazy enemies of it, but fierce, vehement and bitter enemies, because they not only inflict tribulation and evil, but are also enemies who are ardent and unforgiving with all their heart, even making themselves believe that they are doing God a favor and acting justly out of zeal against God; They are avengers who save God's honor, avenge the violation of God's nature, defend the truth, expel heresies, and perform other such great works of godliness. For they fight for God, and hope for the crown of victory for strangling the faithful of Christ; but their end is destruction, as he says here:

v. 4 For I will see the heavens, the work of your fingers, the moon and the stars that you prepare.

9 So far he has described the church, what it is, namely, a foundation of truth, 1 Tim. 3:15; what its form is, namely, the cross; by what it is, namely, through the word; what this word is, namely, that praises the name of God; what kind of servants it has, namely, underage children and fools. Now he describes further where it is and in which place it is to be found. Therefore it will not be a kingdom on earth, or at Rome, or at Jerusalem, but a kingdom in heaven, as Paul says [Phil. 3, 20.]: "Our walk is in heaven." But what the kingdom of God or kingdom of heaven is, it is known, namely, an invisible kingdom in the spirit within us, not in outward gestures. Therefore he says, "Thine," "thy heavens," that is, in which thou shalt reign; and makes a distinction between these and the old heavens, as if to say, Wherever thou reignest, there is thy heaven, and the place of thy kingdom. This place cannot be measured or ordered by the hands of men; but "the works of thy fingers", that is, the Holy Spirit judges and orders this place. Therefore it is most seen at night, when, in the absence of the sun, the moon and stars shine, that it may show that this kingdom is not in the light of this world, but is in darkness, and is hidden from the world, because, as the world sleeps in its night, the church shines with its stars in the kingdom of heaven. This heaven, this moon, these thy stars, will I see in thy kingdom; for it is proclaimed by the word, and seen by faith. Therefore he is silent about the sun; for he speaks to him who is the sun himself, whose fingers have made this heaven, who founded this moon and these stars; therefore he does not make another sun, but is it himself.

(10) So then we have that this kingdom is hidden in faith, and, being invisible to the eyes, is seen with faith. Therefore he boasts of a new and strange vision, as if to say, "Now I see the heavens in the flesh, as they are before our eyes.

But I will see new heavens when the young children preach, that is, which will be visible to all who believe, but invisible to unbelievers.

V. 5: What is man, that thou art mindful of him; and the child of man, that thou art mindful of him?

11 He says this after the manner of all prophets, who, when they have preached about the church and the kingdom of Christ, finally add the doctrine of the head himself, of the King Christ. So here he also portrays Christ wonderfully, as a crucified and glorified king, and says: "What is man, that thou art mindful of him?" He speaks this out of great amazement and horror. For it is also in truth astonishing, and to reason inconceivable and incomprehensible, that this King should be a man, and the Son of man, and not only a man, but also miserable and afflicted, yea, forsaken by God Himself, that is, crucified, dead, who nevertheless reigns as God over all. This is the highest article of Christian faith and wisdom, at which even the spirit of the righteous is horrified, but all flesh and the whole world is angry. All and every word is spoken in the most emphatic and powerful way. For "man", in Hebrew Enosh means an afflicted one, and "man's son" at the same time also means an afflicted man, born on earth. But nevertheless, in order that he might be considered a true natural man, he adds: "son of man," that is, born of a man, with true flesh and blood, born of the mother.

12 "Remember him", "take care of him". He is horrified at such words. Who would believe that you could remember him whom you so trusted, and that you would accept him whom you so cast down from you under the cross? This is quite contrary to each other: to remember him, and that he is such a man; to accept him, and that he is a son of man. For what manner of man this is, that thou rememberest and receivest, the following verse declares:

V. 6. You will let him be forsaken by God for a little while.

(13) Hear, hear what it is, to remember this man, and to accept him, that is, that it is called forsaking. If then thou wilt look upon such abandonment, thou shalt find nothing less than remembrance and acceptance. Therefore it is such a miracle that one must be astonished to remember and accept him who is so forsaken. But it follows:

With honors and ornaments you will crown him.

V. 7: You will make him Lord over the work of your hands. You have put everything under his feet.

14 Here, at last, the remembrance and acceptance comes to light and is declared, namely, that he is not abandoned under such abandonment, but it is declared that he is GOD above all. For no one can be set over everything except God alone. What else these verses have in them is otherwise abundantly dealt with. These verses are also written for our comfort, so that we may believe that we will be remembered and accepted when we feel that God has forgotten us and abandoned us.

V. 8. 9. sheep and oxen in general, and also the wild animals. The birds of the air, the fish of the sea, and the things of the sea.

(15) This dominion was given to Adam in Genesis 1:28, but here it is also brought under Christ, because Christ reigns over all things in spirit, and is not thought to reign over angels and men alone, and not to be able to feed His own in this life, because He has another kingdom than the kingdom of Adam and man. But he says that he also reigns in Adam's kingdom, so that he can also feed and provide for his own in a bodily way, in that he does not abolish the dominion that was given to Adam and his children, nor does he destroy the word of God, which is written in Genesis 1:28, but also submits to this dominion, so that he can use it to provide his believers with bodily needs. For cattle, sheep, birds,

Fish are things and goods of the human kingdom, and through these animals we build the earth and subdue it, drive our food, gain goods. Therefore, believers in Christ's spiritual kingdom under him shall also have temporal food. For temporal goods are also subject to Christ, that they may serve him. As Paul says [1 Tim. 4:8], "Godliness is profitable for all things, and has the Promise of this life and the life to come." Likewise [1 Tim. 6, 6.]: "It is a great gain who is godly" 2c.

v. 10. Lord our ruler 2c.

16 He repeats this to indicate that the kingdom of this divine man and human God is not only beyond all wonder, but also overcomes horror.

The Ninth Psalm.

1. the title of this psalm has been acted in many ways. But that I have Germanized, XXX XXXXX [Almuth Labben], high [to] sing, that I understand of the children's voice, of the mother's voice, [Menazeach] but I understand for the male voice of the supervising superiors, who are set over the boys. But the sons of the youth are the Christians.

The content of the psalm is about the church, how it should be saved from its persecutors, that it should overcome with suffering, so that the tyrants perish and the church remains, and the Christians should devour the tyrants, so that the devourers are devoured and the killed are killed. For GOD has such a whimsical way: by the strangled he strangles the living, and by the martyrs he kills the tyrants. This is a high work, which nevertheless happens daily. Yet they must perish. Therefore, this psalm is a thanksgiving and prophecy of victory.

v. 2. 3. I thank the Lord with all my heart, and tell all your wonders. I am glad and rejoice in you, and praise your name, O Most High.

3. this is the right service of God and the new sacrifice, that he who sacrifices thinks of God as a God, for it is to recognize God's benefits, and to thank God for them. This is the one service that God requires of us, as Paul tells the Gentiles in Romans 1:21.

for not having praised God. Therefore we hold that we should have everything from Him and thank Him for it, which is what the first commandment requires of us. As David said, he recognizes God as the one from whom all good things flow and who is a wonderful conqueror, as the one who destroys those who are themselves disturbed.

v. 4. because thou hast driven mine enemies after thee, they have fallen and perished before thee.

This is the cause and the reason of this joy and confession, that he had driven his enemies behind him; those who had been driven back had fallen, those who had fallen had finally been killed. This is how you dealt with them. That which is written in Latin, infirmabuntur [they will faint], actually means to stumble or fall.

The youth of the Son", 1) in the title, is the young crowd, the church. As in the prophet Zech. 9, 17. grain and must is also called youth, young men and virgins. They have grain to eat, he says, and when they have eaten it, young men grow out of it; this is the best part in the worldly and household regiment. So then "the youth of the Son" are all the faithful; for they are strong, fresh and joyful in the faith, they sing: They, the tyrants, have cast us into the dungeons, staked and pegged us; but we have saved-stumbled and perished. Yet you can do the whimsical consequence that we are defeated. They are enemies art: when we are driven back, we chase them; when we and have the sword. There is violence and wickedness fall, we stand first of all; when they stand, they fall 2c. associated with them.

v. 5. For you carry out my right and cause.

Here he confesses his cross, as if to say: I have suffered long enough, I have been called a heretic and a rebel. There lies our cause, but the Lord avenges us. So it goes now: Hamburg, Lubeck and other cities persecuted the gospel before, but now they accept it with the utmost seriousness. The gospel comes there and eats those who ate it before.

You sit on the chair a right judge.

(7) Before we thought that you were asleep, but now we know that you are sitting on the throne to judge. And this is the blessing for which I thank thee.

v. 6. You rebuke the heathen and kill the wicked.

(8) Such rebuke is when he does not handle it, when he does not give people; as he rebuke the Roman Empire. He can soon make a regiment desolate. Scolding means when he never helps, when he makes less by the word.

You will destroy their name forever and ever.

(9) On the other hand, there are still many histories of the Romans, there are still (constantly) many praises and laudations of the Roman Empire now and then. Answer: That does not mean a name; but a name means, which one praises, which one fears, has in honor, regards: like today the Turk is feared, emperor Carl, which have a praiseworthy name. But now no one fears the Roman Empire; but, as the being is gone, so is her name.

v. 7. The swords of the enemy have an end.

10 Hereby he also confesses that he had to suffer. But they can no longer, because with the sword, that has an end. This is a confession of the

You have turned back the cities; their memory has perished along with them.

They no longer reign, they are gone, their name with them. But such are prophecies that want to be grasped with faith.

v. 8. But the Lord abides forever.

12. This is a very rich speech, which comes out of joy. For he has said that he rejoices. But it is a great comfort, and our defiance, that he says here, Our Christ, the doctrine, the gospel, the baptism, his Christians, they shall remain. This is a heretical speech in the ears of the adversaries. For thus they think: Where is the Lutheran Christ? They even think to eradicate it. But here it is. I would like to see if they want to scratch out the verse; they must learn that it is true.

v. 9. He has prepared his throne for judgment. And he will judge the earth rightly, and the people will rule righteously.

A very glorious verse, that the kingdom of Christ is a kingdom of equity and justice. All other regiments are inequitable, for they are ungodly; one does not fear and honor God. For the righteousness of the lawyers is a very small righteousness, which belongs in the seven commandments [of the other tablet] alone. But this Christ sitteth and liveth, is not dead, and reigneth throughout all the face of the earth, as far as the world is, "in righteousness," that is, he teacheth men to fear God, and to believe, and to love one another, and to bear the cross; he executeth righteousness and equity. But "righteousness" is to believe. But "righteousness" is to remain in the same simplicity, and not be bent in any crooked ways. Thus this verse contains a description of the kingdom of Christ.

v. 10. The Lord is the poor man's shelter, hastening protection in time of need.

This is also a good verse, for it does not want to remain outside: is the word present?

the cross is not far from it. And this verse is a testimony that we have to be poor and in temptation. Therefore it comforts us and says: "If we are in trouble because of the word, we are not abandoned, because the word, the cross and comfort always follow each other.

V. 11. Therefore, those who confess your name hope in you.

15) Trying 1) is ours, it's up to us.

Who know your name.

16. he is in secret, therefore he cannot be seen with eyes nor known; but he has a name, saying that he is our Creator, who gives us everything freely, who alone is righteous and just, who reigns in righteousness and gives justice. In sum, that he is God. We shall learn to know this name. He then that knoweth him thinketh the same: If then he is a man, he will not leave us. The sophists want to buy it. But so he is not called, he is not a grocer nor a Fugger; he is God, who gives everything to everyone in vain, and demands nothing in return, except that one recognizes it, and thanks him, and so respects him. I know that I did not create myself, that I do not let the sun rise and set. They do not want that, they want to earn it with works.

For you do not trust those who seek you, O Lord.

17) Those who knock for it and desire it, you cannot let them go, because you have offered it to us in vain. 2) This is a great comfort for us, because we do not seek our honor because we are the most despised in the world and in great danger. This is a great comfort to us, for we seek him, not our honor, because we are the most despised in the world and are in great danger. So we do not seek our benefit, but seek his word, his glory, that he may be thanked and known; therefore he will not forsake us.

1) "Trying" j^that is, verse put by us instead of: "Trying" in the Latin edition. That the old translator also understood it this way, and perhaps even read it this way, is proven by his rendering: "Hoping" and "seeking" belong to us.

2) In the original, "it you."

V. 12. Praise the Lord.

(18) Therefore, because he is a godly God, praise and give thanks, honor and praise him.

He who dwells in Zion.

19 This is what we are told. For Christ is a king in Zion, as it is written in the other Psalm, v. 6. And if Christ be King in Zion, the church also is called Zion. For he that cleaveth unto this man hath the name with him. So we are also called Saxon, because we sit under your dukes of Saxony, even though we were not born in its territory. So even though we are not of the seed of Israel, yet because we believe we are his servants, and have the name of him, as a servant of his lord, a subject of his prince.

Proclaim his doings among the people.

20 This is called the right sacrifice, that we learn to know that he helps when there is no more, in poverty, in contempt, in shame, in hatred. This is what miraculous works mean, that he makes everything out of nothing. Learn this for God's sake, he says, and tell it to the people, for few of them know it. It is his way, he lets us die, we must leave the blood, be miserable and cry out; as follows:

V. 13. For he remembers and asks for their blood.

(21) This Psalm praises God by His right name, namely, that He leads His saints in miracles, as it says in the fourth Psalm. Counting money out of an empty bag, baking bread out of the clouds, that alone is the art of our Lord God, and yet he does it daily. He makes everything out of nothing. He repeats such promises because these things are also repeated in the work. One persecution is immediately followed by another, and so one comfort follows another. That is why he repeats so often that the wicked shall be destroyed and put to death.

V. 14. Lord, be merciful to me; behold my misery among the enemies.

22) This is the second part of this psalm, in which he asks that he may continue in this way.

He said that he would protect his own and destroy his enemies, and that he would do the same from then on.

Lord, have mercy on me.

23. Prayer also concerns us, and are very urgent words, which God makes all the more pleasing and commanding to Himself for the sake of the person. "Have mercy on me", who preach your word and your name; "look at my misery", how I have to suffer, how they disgrace me, revile me and torture me. Thus it is both an accusation and a prayer.

You who lift me out of the gates of death.

Behold, the church is near the gates of death, that is, where death is inflicted, where we are killed and given over to death daily, as Paul says [2 Cor. 4:11]. So now our prince must suffer, and we all must suffer. 2) "Gates of death" can be understood in two ways: first, that they are the gates and power of hell, which threaten and kill, and think of nothing else but murder. Now when this happens, one comes to the gates of death, that is, close to death. Therefore he says: I have no one to save me but you, you alone have the gates of life. Now it will always come to pass that we will be thrust into death; so remember, dear Lord, and help us, and we will praise you more.

v. 15. That I may tell all thy praise in the gates of the daughter of Zion.

The gates of the daughter of Zion" are other gates, namely, the church, in which is spiritual authority. "Thy praise", he says, not our works.

That I may be glad of thy help.

26 "Help" or salvation is commonly taken for victory; as Paul says in 1 Cor. 15:57 that we gain the victory in Christ, that they must be defeated. Now follows a Prophecy, as if the prayer had been answered. So we should also be sure of our prayer, which Christ has prescribed and commanded us.

v. 16. The Gentiles sank into the pit they had made.

(27) They persecute us with violence and cunning, threatening us with death, pursuing us with nets, thus wanting to ruin the teaching with cunning and our life with violence. But that they want to have us, that happens to them themselves. They want to have us dead, but this does not happen, it goes over them; through their cunning and violence they themselves must go down. So he helps us and pushes them into their pit. So the heretics bring themselves to ruin by their own tongues; they drive themselves out the most. This is how it happened among the rulers in the Roman Empire, that one drove out the other.

v. 17: Thus it is known that the Lord establishes justice.

28 Namely in this work. He likes to do right, makes us suffer a little, but then he helps and is recognized 2c. But this also belongs to the prophecy. Before they said: Where is their God? But now he is recognized.

The wicked is entangled in the work of his hands.

29 As he said before: Above that they would perish, they themselves are perished; what they would do, that is above their own head. But what did they want to do? Strangle them. That comes home to them.

Through the word. Sela.

30 By speech. This word does not appear in the Latin text. But it is uncertain what is meant by it. I understand it to mean that the wicked perish, while the godly do nothing but speak; as he says in the 23rd Psalm, v. 5: "Thou preparest a table before me." The righteous sit, eat, drink, sleep, and thus kill their enemies. As we now do nothing but speak, preach, write, read, so we also smite them; for our Lord GOD cannot leave the word unprotected. Thus it is said in Isaiah, Cap. 30, 15: "By being still and hoping you will be strong"; if you alone could keep still, you would be too strong for all your enemies. But this is not to be despised, because God speaks it.

Sela.

(31) There are many opinions about this word, for it is found nowhere else than in the Psalter, and in the song of Habakuk, 3, 3, 9, 13. I consider it to be a filler word (vox enclitica), which fills up the verse; as in German hymns the e is commonly added to nouns to make the verse complete, as in the hymn "GOtt sei gelobet" 2c, "with his flesh, and with his blood" 2c. That therefore "sela" has no special meaning, but alone makes the verse measure complete. As in Latin verses dicier, with Persius the syllable or 1) means nothing.

v. 18. Oh that the wicked should be turned to hell.

(32) I would not have them perish, but I would have them converted; he would have them confess their sins. They lack only one thing, he says, that they are not converted, namely, that they are not led to hell, that is, they live in peace and safety. Therefore it is impossible to understand the word, because it is a word of the cross. Someone must be in distress, otherwise he thinks that faith is only a delusion. I wanted them to come to the school where I have been, to the gates of death; that is, "to be turned to hell.

All the pagans who forget God.

33. They do not admit that they should forget God, but say, We praise God day and night. But they are lacking, for not all who say, Lord, Lord, shall enter the kingdom of heaven [Matt. 7:21]. They have completely forgotten Christ; but he who does not have Christ does not have God either. Therefore, if they felt despair, they would become sick and need medicine.

seek, as it is written, "Make their faces full of shame, that they may ask after your name," Ps. 83:17.

v.19. For he will not forget the poor altogether, and the hope of the wretched will not be lost forever.

34. he probably poses as if he doesn't see us, but it won't even go out that way. Long is not eternal. The wretch suffers, but not forever; so his hope shall not be in vain.

v. 20. Arise, O Lord, lest men get the upper hand.

35 Be thou, O Lord, reign, and let not men reign: lest they reign over thee, and over thy word, and over thy people. Therefore:

Let them all be judged before you.

036 Let them be judged before thee: for before the world they are not judged, but they themselves are judges. But if they should come before thee, and hear thy judgment of them, I know that they should be of a different mind.

v. 21. Give them, O Lord, a Master, that the Gentiles may know that they are men.

This is what is said of the church. O Lord, that thou shouldest set a teacher of the law in the whole world! What are they but men? They say, "They know this themselves; should I not believe that I am a man? So they say, but they want to be gods and consider it a robbery that they are gods. They let themselves think that they have it from themselves. But if they thought they were men, they would submit themselves to God, and would not so exalt themselves above the Word, nor would they want to be above God. The prophet is annoyed by this and prays: "Give them a master", who will teach them to recognize the law 2). But what does the law do? It causes anger, kills and teaches us what kind of people we are. That therefore in Scripture "a man" means so much as a child of wrath, sin and death. For here, as I think, Enosh is a man, subject to tribulation, death, and all miseries. And this is a prayer of the church.

2) In the original: "learn" instead of: teach.

The tenth Psalm.

(1) Almost all ancient teachers understood this psalm to be about the Antichrist, because it is actually written against the papacy. That is why it has no title, so that it would be a little darker. It speaks of our time, which St. Paul [2 Tim. 3, 1.] calls terrible times, when our Lord God would oppose the Christian church. As Christ also testifies [Luc. 18, 8]: "Do you think that in those days the Son of Man will find faith on earth?" So the prophet also says here: "Your Christian church will then lie on the ground. For all its works are directed to blaspheme God with it, to boast about itself, and to afflict the godly. So also Daniel Cap. 11, 37. 38. says: "He will sit in the temple of God, and will not respect the God of his fathers, but will honor the God of Maussim instead of God" (XXXX), that is, of the fortresses. For the Pope does not want to have the God of the poor and the afflicted. He does not like the God; he wants to set his thing so that it is called fortresses, so that he does not need our Lord God. There the Holy Spirit complains about.

V. 1. Lord, why do you step so far away?

2) Dear Lord God, how can you let your church be so miserably destroyed! 1) For he is at odds with God, as it were. The great heartache causes him to see the miserable abomination. "Why so far away?" 2c. Why do you not give your word?

Berbigest you in time of need.

3. the word that the Latin text has: Despicis, means: to withdraw, to hide. Our God cannot be found, he says.

V. 2: Because the wicked is rash.

4. He speaks of the ungodly, who are considered holy, wise and righteous according to outward appearances. He pretends to good works and words, and yet there is neither faith nor love in him.

1) zersühen (sülen) - to rumple; to defile, as of pigs.

him. The Hebrew word Gaah (XXX) means to overpower, to rule, to have the upper hand. You let this happen, he says, that the wicked rule. I would suffer the same to the Ortend, if they would only let us preach.

Must the wretch suffer.

That is, he has to suffer (vastatur). The wretched Christians must suffer. They do not only want to rule, but they also want you to be lost or die with them. The wicked have the power to devastate godliness. "Wretched" means afflicted; as Christ says [Matt. 11:5.], "To the poor the gospel is preached." Methinks also that the word incenditur ["must suffer"] goes to the pope; 3) for it means "to set on fire," as in the book of Judges, Cap. 12, 1., those of Ephraim threaten Jephthah that they will burn his house 4) together with him with fire, that the prophet thereby indicates that the pope shall deal with the poor by fire.

They cling to each other, and devise wicked wiles.

This is the first virtue of the pope and those who follow him: they do not have the word of God, they do not teach it, so they do not respect it. But the thoughts that they undertake, they respect. The word I have rendered "devise" means, when one has something evil in mind. As it is said in Genesis [Deut. 19:18, 19], that if a man should think of something against his brother, it shall be done to him as he thought to do to his brother. They cling to their thoughts. What they devise with their own will they seize upon, and to that they hold fast and keep; there they are above their own will which they have devised. All their teaching is nothing but their thoughts. "We have come into fire", Ps. 66, 1) 12, which must be called purgatory. Thus Jakob [Probst] 2) of Bremen told me that the papists in the Netherlands had defied with this saying Luc. 6, 38: "Pray, and it shall be given you"; thus we would be justified by the works; there they had stood up, like the stiff-necked horses, apprehendunt, there they stop, amplectuntur, grasp it with the hand, seize it. It also sometimes means to attack, as one attacks a thief. In consiliis [in the Vulgate] is a Hebrew way of speaking, and is as much as consilia, as in gladio is as much as gladium. But this is our consolation, that the Holy Spirit tells us beforehand that we will have such teachers, who will keep what they themselves devise, as there are, purgatory, the mass, indulgences, in sum, the whole papacy. "They will walk according to their own lusts", 2 Petr. 3, 3.

V. 3: For the wicked boasts of his courage.

(7) This then must be preached; what they have set must be called the pulpit, the articles of faith; he that heareth them not must be damned.

And the miser blesses himself, and blasphemes the Lord.

8. ungodliness and avarice are always with each other. Thus Paul says [Phil. 3, 19.]: "Whose belly is their god." Likewise, "A covetous man, which is an idolater" [Eph. 5:5]. And soon after in the 14th Psalm, v. 4. "They that devour my people, that they may feed." Likewise [1 Tim. 6, 5.], "Who think that godliness is a trade." These two things cannot be separated from each other. For as soon as one has fallen away from the faith, he cannot trust God, so one must scratch and scrape to get something over.

The miser blesses himself.

That is, he flatters himself, he caresses himself. It is a fine service, they say now.

Thus it is said in Hosea [Cap. 12, 9.]: Praise be to God, "I am rich, I have enough". So now they also say: Praise be to God, we have such a fine state. But by praising their actions in this way, they blaspheme God, calling all that Christ speaks heresy.

V. 4. The wicked is so proud and angry that he asks for no one.

This is the praise of the wicked, that there is no fear of God before their eyes, Ps. 14, 1. 3. So Duke George, the Dukes of B[ayern], 3) Faber, Eck, are sure and fearless, and have hearts like anvils (as Job also says), so sure do they sit; it must be so.

Is so angry.

(11) He has an excellent, high, proud anger; as the pope is angry against the kings, and the monks are also angry. He thus displays a lofty, proud, heavy wrath, that he thinks everyone should fear him, just as H[erzog] J[örg] and the H. v. B.

Ask for no one.

(12) They may preach against it, God also throws in among them at times, but they ask nothing of it; if you tell them and preach to them at length, you only make them more proud.

In all its pitfalls, it considers GOD to be nothing.

13. neither does he ask anything after GOD, as Daniel says [Cap. 11, 37.], "He will not respect his fathers GOD."

V. 5: He continues his work forever.

14 This is stubbornness, that he does not ask about God or anyone else. So he lets our Lord God go, and does what he wants, does his thing forever. For "to go on" means to make an effort for his cause. As: The earth will drive away the HErrn praise, will deal with his praise for and for. And so here: "his doing", which is without God, he is always doing. This is a very big complaint against the pope, as if he had already been there. Such people are also described in the Revelation of John.

Your dishes are far from him.

15 He indicates that there are some who oppose him. There are some who tell him 1) [the pope], but he pays no attention. Likewise: Thy judgments are here, the gospel goeth forth, but they are far from it, and see it not. So we also find that none of them understands either the Ten Commandments, or faith, or the Lord's Prayer. With their decree they go about; but thy judgments are far from them.

He acts defiantly with all his enemies.

This word, puah [XXX], means to speak boldly and confidently, πα'σιάζε^, Proverbs 6:19. Our Latin translation has: proferens mendacia, testis fallax, but it is actually: parthisiensis, an insolent, brazen tale, like Eck, who speaks freely and defiantly against his adversaries. For now he speaks about us as if we were people in despair and lost. M. Philip, Luther, John Hus, they damnir them with joy. This is a description of a great certainty. Something similar is also said in the prophet Daniel. Münzer was almost such a person, and now Carlstadt.

V. 6 He says in his heart, "I will never lie down.

17 This actually goes to the pabstium. Peter's little ship (they say) sways, but it does not sink. Likewise: The church is founded on a rock, which the gates of hell cannot overpower. The unholy Sylvester also praises it, saying that many people have laid their hands on the papacy, but it still remains in its dignity. The psalm complains about this security. The Turk also boasts, and indeed Pope and Turk are one almost as old as the other.

1) "ihm's" put by us instead of: "ihns" in the original.

It will have no need for and for.

(18) I cannot be in trouble, for I have the God called Maussim in this fortress I abide. But you have a God who is called a crucified and weak God.

V. 7. His mouth is full of cursing.

This is the consolation of Christians, that they have and are subject to such great appearances; yet the Holy Spirit says we are to take it for certain that they are blasphemies, and that their mouth is full of cursing. Eck's, Faber's, Cochläi's sermons prove that they can do no more than blaspheme, profane and curse. I think that one has experienced it well with the ban. The ban should be drawn on this verse.

False and fallacious.

20 For this they lie and deceive; they curse us, they deceive their own. When poor people hear about purgatory for a long time, they only hear lies and lose their money.

His tongue causes trouble and work.

Amal (XXX) and Aven (XX) means misfortune and heartache. This is what false teaching is generally called. This word is also written in the seventh Psalm, v. 15: "He has evil in mind. Thus here their preaching, that is, misfortune and heartache. The poor people get nothing out of it but stupid consciences. I think we have experienced it enough under the papacy.

V. 8. He sits and lurks.

22 This is also one of the right virtues of the pope: he has an evil thing, therefore he does not like to let it come to questioning. Cause, if it would come to the scripture, he would have to be wrong. So now they are shouting: The church, the church has approved it, this testimony is sufficient. Shall one give an account to any one? "He sits," says the text. All his rule is that he creeps up on people and catches them deceitfully. But he shuns the light, and does nothing publicly.

Ju the yards.

23. for they are outside the church. All their activity is directed toward appearances, and with these appearances they catch people. But our cause is weak because it is without all appearance. The Latin text has: In occultis, that is, they condemn not publicly or judicially, but without the matter having been heard and known. It is enough for them that they can say: You have spoken such things as are contrary to the church. But this picture is taken from Moses. The court was outside. Thus the pope, who sits even in outward works to deceive the common people, also to deceive the right saints who contradict him.

He strangles the innocent in secret.

24 Without any judicial process, not publicly. It is not that the pope does not strangle the saints publicly, but that he does not investigate the matter, and condemns it absolutely because the church has so decided.

His eyes hold out his arms.

(25) He fears no one so much as the poor to whom the gospel is preached (Matt. 11:5); he does not fear princes and kings so much. So now they look at us alone, that is their only concern, there they deal with alone; because they let themselves think, and the devil also feels it, they will have no rest otherwise.

V. 9. He lurks in secret, like a lion in the den.

(26) Now he brings out their wickedness by a similitude. Above [v. 4 ff.] he said that they are diligent in outward splendor, and by the same seek a just cause to condemn the saints. Here he says how hard and cruel they are, that nothing can help it; as we also learn. If one asks, they are hopeful; if one urges, they despise it; if one admonishes, they push it under the bench.

That he may catch the wretch in his net.

27 This is the net, that they say, He hath spoken against the pope, against the church; so they lead one in. And so they have Gseorg] and others wanted to do with the emperor, and to take him in such a way, 1) that we could not have come to words after that.

V. 10. He crushes and presses down, and pushes to the ground the poor man with violence.

(28) If they can get hold of only one piece that they can accuse, it does not help, even if they find ten thousand other good pieces with us. Again, if they have one that has an appearance, ten thousand bad pieces do no harm. So Cardinal Cajetan said to me at Augsburg: "Revoke the one article about the merits of the saints and admit that they are a treasure of indulgences; if you revoke it, the rest will be forgiven you. So now they have the piece alone, of the celibate state and opening of the convents, of the nuns 2c. So it goes, if they can catch something for appearances in their courts, then the smashing, pressing down and pushing to the ground follows immediately. Therefore they first set up their own, but then they destroy their adversaries without any right, only with deceit. No other tyrant does this. For the Turk acts by public authority, the others by public right. How is it then that they are so cruel? He answers:

V. 11. He says in his heart: God has forgotten.

(29) Just as the heretics and the enemies of God do: Our Lord God does not think of them, they are rejected and condemned before God. So Eck and the people hold us.

He has hidden his face, he will never see it again.

He may not look at them. This is what they said about John Hus at Costnitz. Such a stubborn mind against us they can grasp in lies and deceit. So far he has described the Antichrist that he teaches lies in peace and uses deceit in war. Now follows the crying out to God, which we should also pray.

¹) Compare Luther's letter to Probst of June 1, 1530, De Wette, Vol. IV, p. 27. For this purpose, Duke George, the Dukes of Bavaria, and Margrave Joachim of Brandenburg had traveled to the Emperor in Innsbruck.

1446 L. xvii, R f. Interpretations on the Psalms. W. iv, issi-i-M. 1447

V. 12. Arise, Lord God, lift up your hand, do not forget the wretched.

He must stand up against such abominable blasphemy: Dear Lord God, we must hear this; up, up, dear Lord, so that you do not strengthen their blasphemy.

V. 13. Why should the wicked blaspheme God and say in his heart: You do not ask for it?

(32) Such blasphemy is more grievous to the prophet than violence itself. Now he consoles himself.

V. 14. You see.

33. I know that you see it, that you do not turn away your face.

For you see the misery and wretchedness.

34. I know that you have mercy on the wailing and misery.

It is in your hands.

For it is given into your hands. As the Scripture says of the Lord Christ: "He placed it in the hand of him who judges you rightly" [1 Pet 2:23]. As if the prophet wanted to say: "It is with you, we know no better help; because we trust you, help.

The poor command you.

They will return it to you. This is the greatest virtue we have, that we command the matter to God.

You are the orphan's helper.

37. This is an honorific name of God: You have the glory of being called "a father of the fatherless" [Ps. 68:6].

V. 15. Break the arm of the wicked.

Then he teaches him how he should do. "Poor" means dominion, tyranny. Break, he says, the kingdom of destruction.

And look for evil.

39. seek the ungodly heap home for punishment. But this is why he asks to destroy this kingdom, because it is the ungodly being itself. It is the devil's own kingdom. Now he adds the promises.

V. 16. The Lord is King.

40 This is a promise of the end of the world, for he does not speak of the Jews alone, but of all peoples everywhere. The Lord will come and be king forever.

The heathen must perish from his land.

41. You must stop, you pagans.

V. 17. You hear the desire of the wretched, O Lord.

God sees the groaning of the godly more than their words.

Her heart is sure that your ear will notice it.

43. "Their heart", their hope and sighing is sincere; you know that their prayer is righteous; so you also have a soft ear. This we know and desire, and it pleases God.

V. 18: That you may do right to the fatherless and the poor.

44. The poor orphan will also one day come across a judge who will execute his case for him.

That man no longer defies on earth.

Then it will be over with them, their rule will cease. The people on earth shall then no longer have power, but the people from heaven, namely, Christ with His own. This is said about the end of the world. Say Amen for the sake of God, that it may happen soon.

The eleventh Psalm.

(1) This psalm is a complaint against the wicked teachers who persecute the godly. He describes them as very sure and proud heads, like stones and demons, who want to banish him and say: Think and hold with us, or you must die. Thus they threaten; but he answers:

V. 1. I trust in the Lord.

This is my service, that I trust in the Lord. But he makes a difference between the services. The first is that one trusts in pure grace, the other that one trusts in his own merits. These two services have always been and will be until the end of the world. Abel and Cain beat each other to death over this. Therefore David says: "They rely on their works, but I trust in God's mercy. This is my doctrine and my faith also. Now he refutes their teaching.

How then do you say to my soul, Let it fly like a bird to your mountains?

You want to teach me as if yours is a better way to heaven than mine. You want to be wise, and advise me: Fly to the mountains like a bird 2c. With these few words he scolds them, and judges their teaching and life. If I would follow you, I would be uncertain, I would stray like a bird, I would be cast out of my nest. As he says in another psalm about the nest, that is, about the temple, about the promises, about the first commandment. Since my nest is where I live, you want to push me away into the forest, where there is no certain place. For so it goes, when one has left the faith, that there remains nothing, but that one must go astray. The word Nudi (XXX), which he uses here, actually means to float back and forth, to wander, as is said of Cain, Gen. 4:14: "I must be idle and fugitive on earth." Therefore, if someone has strayed from the faith, then he becomes a wandering bird. As Paul also says 2 Tim. 3, 7: "Learning always, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth." For apart from faith there is nothing else but wandering on the mountains, wandering in the wilderness, since the conscience cannot be sure or calm. But such confession of faith and punishment of the unbelievers is immediately followed by the cross. Therefore he speaks further:

V. 2 For behold, the wicked draw the bow, and lay their arrows upon the sinews.

4. "I believe, therefore I speak. But I am greatly afflicted" [Ps. 116:10]. For they do not suffer that their preaching and teaching should be called heresies. But these words, "They draw the bow," can be understood in two ways; namely, in reference to the doctrine, and from the persecution. But I will rather understand it from the persecution. They persecute me with the sword and with the word. They are ready to shed blood, are prepared and eager to do harm, body and soul. That is what they seek. Those who say, "I trust in the Lord," must be called heretics, that is, the right-hearted who walk by faith.

With it secretly to shoot the pious.

5 As he also said above [Ps. 10:8]. Not that they suffer not to be strangled publicly, but "secretly," that it should not come to lawful action. [They say badly, it is heresy; they go about with secrecy, as Christ said, not liking to hear much disputing or talking about it. They proceed simply and without much ado: This one is a heretic 2c.

V. 3. for they overthrow the foundation.

(6) This also is a goodly virtue of the wicked; this is all their work, to pull down that which thou hast established. Thy foundations, thy commandments, thy law, they have torn down. They teach badly the works, and thus blaspheme thy

Law. All the Sophists do is to outline the ground and build up their own.

What should the righteous man align?

7 This is a word that imitates the speech of the wicked, like Ps. 4:7: "Should this one show us what is good?" The heretic, should he know the truth? Does he want to teach us? So in them is the highest security against faith, against God's commandment, and against the confessors of the truth. Furthermore, the wicked do not call him a righteous man, but a heretic. But the Holy Spirit calls him a righteous man. Now the promises follow.

V. 4. The Lord is in His holy temple.

8 The antitype: Ye tell me to wander in the mountains; but I will not, but will abide with the Lord in the temple. There he is; but if ye will not believe it, let it be; I will keep his word. He has bound himself to the temple. But to know God in the temple is to know him in his word. But now he has his memory in all places where the church is.

The Lord's throne is in heaven.

The Lord, who is in heaven, nevertheless dwells here among the people. Now he continues to comfort that God will not abandon his faithful.

His eyes look at it.

(10) This is a great comfort: I know that he sees. It may seem as if he is asleep, for he lets them draw their bow; but he sees it. These are words of faith.

His eyelids test the children of men.

11. his eyelids are closed, he slumbers; but this is how he tests the children of men. Only be thou confident, and fear not; let thine adversaries be afraid. Because he closes his eyes like this, he listens carefully to a thing and thinks about it diligently. He thus tests the children of men; he wants to see whether the righteous will hold fast and whether the wicked will mend their ways, so that the latter will be rejected and the latter proven.

that he may judge "and say, Thus thou hast done, thus thou. Follow now further, as he examines.

V. 5 The Lord tests the righteous, his soul hates the wicked, and those who gladly transgress.

This is a promise. He closes his eyes to test the righteous, and becomes hostile to the wicked. He tests the righteous, that he may love him; but the wicked, that he may become an enemy to him; for he is wicked in his doctrine, and wicked in condemning and choking the godly, as he says, and loving iniquity.

V. 6. He will rain lightning, fire and swallow upon the wicked, and will give them a weather to reward them.

This is the judgment of the wicked. He will prove by deed that he is the enemy of the wicked. The word in the Latin text, laqueus [rope], is a word that has two meanings; for it means both rope and coals of fire. I prefer to interpret it, coals of fire. But the opinion is, Lightning and thunder, brimstone and pitch, he shall cast upon them, and shall deal with them as he dealt with the Egyptians. Then he caused a great tempest to come, and thrust them into the sea. So this verse is a description of the weather over the wicked, who do not always perish in such a physical storm as the Egyptians perished. But this happens nevertheless, that they also get over their weather, no matter what it may be, so that they do not perish with pleasure and rest.

V. 7. The Lord is righteous.

14 This is the consolation, that the righteous may not despair in his affliction. Where faith is called righteousness, our Lord God delights in it.

Therefore, that their faces may look upon that which is right.

(15) Therefore, if they continue in righteousness and are not moved by it, our Lord God will come and help them and prove that he loves them. So this psalm is a comfort to those who are in distress because of faith.

The twelfth Psalm.

1. 1) This psalm is also against the false teachers, so that we may see how much harder a battle we have against the devils than against the persecutions. For there are not so many psalms against persecutors as against false teachers. First, there is a complaint; second, a prayer; third, a promise; fourth, a prayer.

V. 2. Help, Lord.

2 Dear Lord God, there are so many enthusiasts that one can hardly find a pious preacher anymore.

Because the saints have decreased.

This name "holy" actually belongs to persons and not to things, because it denotes such a person who is gifted with God's mercy, a man of grace who has grace. That is why he asks for laborers in the harvest. Create pious preachers, dear Lord.

And of the faithful is little.

4. amunim (XXXXX) means faithful, fervent, truthful, righteous people. It is actually opposed to falsehood and hypocrisy: faithful and true, he who believes and may be believed. Therefore this is his complaint: The world is full of hypocrites. There are few faithful workers; everything is full of hirelings.

Among the children of men.

5 That is, the children of men are not true; there is a lack of such people among the children of men. What are they doing? He adds:

V. 3: One talks to the other about useless things.

(6) That they blow out big, and call it truth, he calls a useless thing. If they teach a lot of works for a long time, it is still a vain, lost and useless thing, like indulgences, purgatory 2c.

1) On May 31 <45304 (Note in the original.)

And pretend.

This is evil in the first place, because they cheat the people with it, as they are doing now. Nevertheless, they say, there was a fine discipline under the papacy. So they have this before, that all people like to hear that their works are accepted. To such inclination is added hypocrisy; thus they deceive the people.

And teach from a discordant heart.

8. corde [et] corde, that is, out of a discordant heart. They have a false heart, they pretend to be friendly with words, but have it differently in their heart; they are vain liars. The reason is that they are uncertain in their heart. This is the accusation. Now he prays and wishes them misfortune.

V. 4. May the Lord cut off all hypocrisy and the tongue that speaks proudly.

9. actually it means a Znnge who speaks great things, as Peter also calls it, 2 Petr. 2, 18.: Υπέρογκα ματαιότητας, "proud words.

since there is nothing behind". And St. Paul Rom. 16, 18.: Δια της ευλογίας χαϊ χρηστολογίας,²) "by sweet and splendid words they seduce the hearts of the innocent"; they help their cause with splendor and pretense.

V. 5 Those who say, "Our tongue shall have the upper hand.

10 Behold, they now boast of their prestige, as Peter says, 2 Peter 2:14: "Let not sin hinder them." They cannot be resisted, for they sit on the chair and are in the teaching office. We are, they say, bishops and doctors; with this they shut the mouths of the pious preachers.

It behooves us to speak.

(11) That is, our mouths must not be after others, nor subject to others. Your mouth is not our mouth; as the Scripture speaks of Moses [Ex. 4:16], "Aaron shall be your mouth," as the servants are the mouth of him who sent them. So now they say, "You are not our mouth; we did not command you. It is our duty to speak; it is ours; keep silent, or do not speak any more than we want you to.

2) Erlanger: Although this also fits into the context, but does not correspond to the citation. In s 20 of this psalm is also found again: "esirmtoloAm".

Who is our Lord?

(12) So they accuse us of wanting to attack their dignities and cause turmoil. David must hear this here too.

V. 6 Because the wretched are desolate, and the poor groan, I will arise, saith the Lord.

This is a promise. It grieves me that the poor are thus disturbed. What pious people are left, they cannot stay in front of the boys, therefore I will arise and send out workers.

I want to create a helper.

14. against such disturbance I will raise up my word, which is a word of salvation and of victory. The word "create" is spoken with great emphasis: I will lay a foundation. This is by the word, as he says [v. 7.], "The speech" 2c. It is the same word above [Ps. 11, 3.]: They tear down the foundation 2c.

That one should teach confidently.

15 Thus he said above in the 10th Psalm, v. 5, of the Antichrist: "He acts defiantly with all his enemies", So also here: "He should speak freshly and cheerfully against them, not in a corner, but quickly under the eyes. Thereby he gives at the same time a secret stab against the angle preachers. But now he praises the word and the thanksgiving.

V. 7. The speech of the Lord is loud.

16 These are the right sermons, the pure, dear word, which has now come into place.

Like silver in an earthen crucible.

These vessels of earth, or earthen and potter's vessels, are we who have this treasure [2 Cor. 4:7]. In us our Lord God practices the word, the more it is challenged, the purer and purer it becomes.

Proved seven times.

18 This is that which is thoroughly purified. Therefore, he who has the word will also have the cross.

But the cross should be useful and not harmful. So the cross must be called purification and probation. This is how it happened to us: if they had not sermonized 1) and driven us in this way, the word would never have come to light so loudly. Now he adds a blessing and prayer.

V. 8. You, Lord, will preserve them.

19 Dear Lord, let us keep it, help us keep it, we cannot lift it up alone. And protect us from this generation forever.

20 And keep us from the smooth and glorious words, lest they corrupt us with them. As we see that many of them have been deceived by our heretics today. This is a very necessary prayer, for the devil can often take away the whole Scripture with one word.

V. 9 For it becomes full of the ungodly everywhere where such loose people rule among men.

(21) A king that loveth falsehood, and is ungodly, hath all ungodly servants; all things are according to the head. As the teacher is, so is the disciple. Where those come into the preaching office, no one can preserve the people. The Hebrew word (suile), which stands here, means a glutton and a demmer; as v. Eck is one. This same word is also found in the fifth book of Moses, Cap. 21, 20, that parents should accuse such a son who is a [reveler]. It is a very significant name, as if to say, They devour my people, and seek how they may fill their bellies. But here the word Schlemmerei] is put in abstracto [instead of Schlemmers, as we say instead of "young men": the youth. When among men reigns, that is, the assembly of the feasters (Schlemmorum), άσωτων, the heap of such servants: when that comes up, it's bad everywhere.

1) In the old translation correctly: "geheiet", that is, mocked, ridiculed, vexed. In the original: "gehäuet", just as in the interpretation of the 18th Psalm, § 96, where likewise "geheiet" must be read. In the 22nd Psalm, K 23, we encounter the word "verhaute," which is, heal, mock.

2) This will probably be meant by: "IsuUosi".

The thirteenth Psalm.

1. 1) This psalm is about the affliction of a single person, for it is directed against the spirit of sadness, which is a very great affliction. It describes the thoughts of a sorrowful heart that is in despair and anguish of conscience.

Lord, how long will you forget me like this?

(2) It is a dull thing, for a heart that is in anguish makes believe that God has forgotten it; item, that it may endure forever.

How long will you hide your face from me?

3. hiding the face means that the word of promise is gone, that our Lord God lets one sit without the word of promise, that one fights with the devil, law, sin, death and hell. The impatience over the delay is great in this challenge.

v. 3. How long shall I worry in my soul, and be troubled in my heart daily?

I search now and then how I want to comfort myself, but I find nothing. But this is the consequence for and against: As soon as one is without a word, so soon he seeks his own counsel. And just as one wave of water drives another, so too one thought drives another, and one thought follows another. This is the real melancholy, that one goes astray with his thoughts and would like to comfort himself.

How long shall my enemy rise above me?

(5) Behold, here he confesses that it is the spirit of Satan that thus afflicts him; he confesses that the devil vexes him. For, since it is a challenge directed at a single person, I understand by the enemy Satan himself, although it could also be understood by men.

1) Note in original: "On June 1."

V. 4. Look and hear me, O Lord, my God.

6. turn your face again, send the word of promise.

Enlighten my eyes.

7. the temptation that makes a man quite sleepy and lazy, as the disciples were in the garden. For sadness consumes all the senses. Therefore he asks: Dear Lord God, enlighten me, that is, make me cheerful again, give me a brave face.

That I do not fall asleep in death.

8 Thus also says Sirach Cap. 30, 25: "Sadness kills many people," and Paul 2 Cor. 7, 10: "The sadness of the world brings about death." For sadness is a pestilence to thy life, Proverbs 17:22: "A saddened spirit dries up the bones." And Jesus Sirach often admonishes that a young person should be resisted, lest he become a melancholic. It spoils life and limb, marrow and bone.

v. 5 Lest my enemy boast that he has become mighty over me.

(9) If this were to happen, he says, and I were to die of sadness, the enemy would say, "I have executed him! So every challenge is finally blasphemy. If I am defeated, you will be blasphemed.

And my adversaries will not rejoice that I lie down.

(10) Men cannot afflict one so, but Satan alone, when he hath stolen away the word; human temptations, they go not so deep. O Lord," he says, "they would overpower me if I fell; that would be your shame and mockery. Now he adds a consolation.

v. 6. But I hope that you will be so gracious.

11. who could do this, and could throw himself around in sadness in such a way that he could

If he would remove the images of wrath from his eyes and look only to grace, he would already have won. In no other way can one overcome such sadness of spirit, than by looking at God's mercy and the promises. He does not boast of any merit here, no work holds the sting here, but only faith and trust in mercy.

My heart rejoices that you are so glad to help. I will sing to the Lord that he does so well by me.

(12) Because you make me victorious over this sorrow, I will also sing to you. So this psalm contains the lament of a sorrowful soul and a thanksgiving for comfort.

The fourteenth Psalm.

1. this is also one of the right Psalms, because it does nothing else than to punish the whole world, as Paul explains it in the epistle to the Romans, Cap. 3, 19, that the whole world is guilty before God, that no one is righteous before God, and that if one has lost Christ, there is no salvation nor grace; it is all evil and damnable.

V. 1. The foolish say in their heart: There is no God.

The whole human race says in its heart that there is no God. But against this they say: No, rather we teach much about God and Christ. But against this the Scripture says Isa. 29, 13: "With their lips they honor me."

The word Nabal (XXX), which has been translated by Thor, means any man who is without the wisdom of Christ and without the Word. The Turk, the Pabst and the most prudent in the world, everything that does not believe in God from the heart, is XXX [a fool]. This they show by their works, because they condemn God's word. They call our Lord's teaching and word heresy, and say in short: 1) It is not God, but the devil; not God's word, but the devil's word. But he who denies the Word denies everything, even God Himself, Whose is the Word. This is never lacking. What do they do? They deny God and make their own God, as follows.

1) In the Latin edition: "In short" is added to the speech.

They are no good, and are an abomination with their nature.

(4) All their doings (studia) he puts upon them, saying not, They are an abomination in their sins and iniquities, but in their doings. In the best of their ways there is corruption, they corrupt themselves, and are an abomination even to God; for they are without the word, and corrupt with unbelief. And before our Lord God they are not worth a damn. Nevertheless they say that they are the right Christians (catholicos) and the dearest children. So the whole psalm must be put in a strong contrast (antitliesin). But before God they are stinking, and in addition, when they do and find the best.

There is no one who does good.

5 And yet they fast twice a week, and what more the Pharisee boasts of himself, Luc. 18:12. But the psalm saith, "There is none that doeth good." For he also addresses the Jews, that their works should not be called good. Now he sets up a painting to confirm what he has said.

The Lord looks down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if any are wise, and to inquire of God.

(6) That it is true, saith he, Our Lord God himself hath seen it. As many as are the children of men, they all ask not after God. All that are not the children of God (for he makes a clear distinction between the children of God and the children of men),

They are not wise, they do not respect our Lord God. And the same word is in the prophet Daniel: "He will not respect the love of women or any of the things of God", Dan. 11, 37. But especially you should notice that he says of all the children of men that they not only do not ask about God and His word, but also pursue it. Therefore, he does not ask about their fasting, sacrifices, masses and religious orders, but asks whether anyone looks and pays attention to God's word and pursues how he may serve God and do what he can to please God. This is a great and serious saying, but they do not respect it.

V. 3. But they all deviated.

7 Isaiah took this verse over into his prophecy [Jef. 53:6, 56:10]. As much as there is of the whole human race, it all departs from the word, and seeks its sects and works; as all monks do.

And all of them inept.

8. Ἀδόκιμοι, unfit, in Paul, Tit. 1, 16 [Vulg.]: "They have fallen away from the faith, but with their works they are good for nothing." These two things always follow one another. All, none excepted, who are without faith are sinners, and very grievous sinners at that.

There is no one who does good, not even one.

9 This is a mighty sentence. The following three verses [in the Vulgate] are taken from different passages, especially from the Epistle to the Romans, Cap. 3, 11-18. 1) For they are not found in the Hebrew. Now further on he especially blames the teachers. For until now he has generally said that they do not ask about God 2c., which are beautiful, praiseworthy virtues. Now he attacks the teachers 2). Do they not have teachers and bishops? What do they teach?

V. 4. Will no one notice the evil-doer?

10. in Paul 2 Cor. 11, 13. and Phil. 3, 2. these are the evil and deceitful ar-

2) In the original: teaching.

employees. They do evil work; they teach well and work, but nothing but evil deeds. And in addition, when it is preached to them, they do not want to accept it, they do not allow themselves to acknowledge it. The Lord has not spoken through you," they say in Jeremiah.

Who eat my people, that they may feed.

(11) They devour it as bread, both bodily and spiritual, bodies and souls. Thus all the wicked are stingy; they must have income from their worship. Man's heart must have a god, they take it wherever they want; if it is not God's word, it is mammon.

But they do not call upon the Lord.

(12) They do not believe, they are satisfied with their works; they do not want to hear, therefore they do not believe; but if they do not believe, they do not call. Yes, they say, we call; for why else would we cry out so wearily in the churches? But this is not an invocation, for no one has no good confidence in our Lord God.

V. 5. There they are afraid.

Thirteen, "There," where they call not, there they fear. I think he is talking about the fear of worship; for where one has lost faith, one always makes a conscience where there should be none. So Paul says 2 Tim. 3, 6: They lead captive the women 2c. There they fear, since God does not want to be feared: as we see in experience. If a monk should have walked or slept without a barn, or eaten meat on Friday, that would have been sin upon sin, although our Lord God is not interested in it. Again, where they should fear and honor the word, they fear nothing. It shall be so: If he will not honor the word of God, let him honor lies; as Paul says 2 Thess. 2, 11. If he will not fear God, let him fear his own star in his eye. Neh-

3) In the original: "Staaren"; likewise in the old translation. The reading we offer in this saying is found in Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XIX, 855, § 89; also in the Weimar Edition, Vol. VIII, p. 170.

If they take up the word, they must not do all this, for he speaks of those who despise the word.

But GOD is with the generation of the righteous.

14 This is with those who have God's word. The adversaries do not believe this, but say they are heretics. Should our Lord God be with Philippsen, or Duke Hansen of Saxony?

V. 6. You desecrate the poor man's council.

(15) You condemn them; when they open their mouths, you call them heretics. Our Lord God is there, but he must not be called God. "Counsel" is also there, but it must be called heresy. Here it is clear: if our teaching is right, then it must be called disruption. They are bad boys who have the word and yet do not want to recognize it.

But GOD is his confidence.

16 This is the cause of all disagreement. He does not preach differently, the same righteous one, because God's grace. This is the Hadermetz, over this the fight rises. We preach the doctrine of justification, that is the core; there they clash, that the Lord is his confidence; that one insists on grace alone, over that he must be condemned. That is why they are justly called like

They are condemned for doing no good, and what they do, that it is nothing; grace cannot be suffered. That is a miserable bargain.

V. 7: Oh that help would come to Israel!

17 This is what is said about spiritual imprisonment. But I think it is a prayer for the Lord Christ. Oh, how we have been preaching for so long that the right Savior would come one day!

From Zion.

This is the gospel, as Isaiah says, Cap. 2, 3. 2, 3. That he would let the gospel go, otherwise we cannot get along with the boys.

And the Lord redeemed his captive people.

19. that is held captive by the law. We pray this verse for the last day.

Thus Jacob would be joyful, and Israel would rejoice.

20 He would rejoice, not because of works, but because of the redemption from prison, and because of the salvation granted. Thus he defends grace against works and merits. Therefore, this psalm is one of the glorious psalms that masterfully establishes the article of justification.

The fifteenth Psalm.

(1) This is also a strange psalm, that he begins to dispute with our Lord God, and asks him. But he does this in order to give his doctrine the more prestige, that it is decided by divine opinion, which means "dwelling in the tabernacle of God," which are good works, how one should become pious. He looked at the various ways of men, that everyone wants to be pious, this one this way, that one that way, and if one looks at it from behind and from the front, then it is only one's own choice. One says thus, another thus. Lord, tell us what is right. Let the Lord say what pleases him best.

V. 1. Lord, who will dwell in your tabernacle? Who will dwell on your holy mountain?

Out of humility he calls the kingdom of God in the world a "tabernacle". Dear Lord, tell us rightly, who belongs among your people? One says of Aaron and the Levites, the other of many sacrifices 2c. But teach us. So he calls the place where God dwells through the Word also a "mountain" where he puts his name.

V. 2: He who walks without change.

3. the word "without change" means blameless, perfect, righteous, as the

In the first Epistle to the Hebrews, he translates a pious, upright man who walks in faith toward God, so that he is upright before God because of his faith, and blameless before the world. As if he wanted to say: It does not matter about the ceremonies, the boys can do them, too. It is said that he who walks uprightly, whether in the temple or outside, great or small, poor or rich.

And does it right.

(4) The others all practice hypocrisy and do useless things, as he said above [Ps. 12:3]. He alone follows what is right, as he will now tell you in detail.

And speak the truth from the heart.

(5) The most important thing is to teach righteously and to have the word, to honor God's word, to hear it, to learn it and to do it with all one's heart. Therefore he speaks against those of whom he said above in the twelfth Psalm, v. 3: "They dissemble, and teach out of a divided heart," who neither have nor know the word rightly.)

V. 3. who does not slander with his tongue.

(6) Although this may be understood of slanderers, yet I understand from the word that he means those who speak the truth purely, and beware of all false preaching and words, lest they subtract from the word and pervert it. The papists know nothing about virtue; they burn incense to it and put on caseloads, although this work makes the whole world happy. Therefore it is a grace above all grace not to corrupt the Scriptures.

And does no harm to his neighbor.

(7) According to the word, the neighbor is not to harm but to benefit him, and this is done very little. But this concerns most the hypocrites, who speak lies, deal in deceit, and become persecutors of righteousness. Day and night they think only that they do harm, like H[archduke] G[eorg] v[on] S[achsen] and H[archduke] H. v. B. 2) with un-

1) So the Latin edition; in the old translation: "can".

2) Perhaps also here like Col. 1445, s 27, and in the 17th Psalm towards the end (s 29) the Dukes of Bavaria are meant.

They will go around his duke. But if they cannot do harm, they revile him at least, as follows. Then they do not make a conscience, go in all the devil's name, give a hundred guilders to a monastery and endow a mass, so they have done well.

And do not disgrace your neighbor.

8. defile them and say that they call us heretics and evil-doers. If they can do this, their troubles are cooled. But the righteous does not harm his neighbor, neither with words nor with deeds. There is nothing at all about gray caps and casels, and yet they are the best works among the papists.

V. 4: He who does not respect the wicked but honors the godly.

(9) This is the most beautiful verse: for the righteous is not a man of persons. But the adversaries are wholly captive to the reputation of persons. Whether a man be a wicked knave, if he be mighty, well is he courted: but the righteous looketh not on how holy, how learned, how rich, how mighty he is. So say badly: Does Duke George also do this, so that he pays attention to the word and does not harm his neighbor? If he [the godly] sees virtue in him, he honors him, even if he were a beggar; if he does not see it in him, he considers him as a wicked man, tells him so, punishes him: You despise the word, you revile your neighbor, therefore I will not swear with you. One must add much to virtue and risk life and property, like our pious prince, because he separates himself so completely from the others for the sake of doctrine. Thus the Psalm says: Such a man does not look at the person whether he is powerful or poor, but looks badly at the commandment of God. For he knows that our Lord God is well able to repay him. Now these are works that are practiced among Christians against God and their neighbor. Now he will also say of their dealings.

He who swears to his neighbor and keeps it.

10. Does such a man run away from the people into the deserts? No, but he remains in the midst of the business of the world; he must also feed in the world. And now that he has gone-

When he speaks of the works that each person does for himself, he goes on to speak of the dealings that concern things or business. These are also good works, which no one respects, acting honestly and faithfully with people; as it must be, then, that one keeps what he has spoken. But such virtue is also strange, and few people make a conscience of it. Hence these sayings have come: The world is full of infidelity. Item: Good words, little behind them. So now he says of a pious man that he is in the wrong, and is faithful all the way. If then he is to keep faith all the time, it will certainly not come off without his harm, for he will not be kept faithful all the time. You also see that a Christian is allowed to enter into all kinds of contracts (contractus).

V. 5. He who does not give his money on usury.

11. ho, ho, where are they? It is therefore permissible to deal in money, but usury is not.

not allowed. The good works have faded away in the papacy; the monks do not know anything about them, because they are not in the hands.

And does not take gifts over the innocent.

(12) Then he stabs the great magistrates, the judges who can judge or testify, and lets themselves be corrupted. Now such sin was common among that people, and the Jews sinned, especially in these last three things; as it is still among the rich and noble. But these things belong to the ninth and tenth commandments, that by practices they have deprived one another of goods. The works should now be seen, which neither Aristotle nor any philosopher has seen.

Whoever does that will probably stay.

13 The Lord God has spoken it, he says; he shall remain who does this.

The sixteenth Psalm.

1. 1) Now this is the third psalm of the person of Christ, and of his suffering and resurrection. He says of him that he first suffered and then was glorified, although he does not always keep the same order. It is one of the most beautiful and glorious psalms, which the apostles so powerfully led. And it appears from the title that David loved this psalm. Among the Jews, however, the songs have had various names, for they call them roses, lilies, cups, thimbles. In the books of the kings [2 Sam. 1, 18.] the author calls a song "the bow", like ours the long rainbow. Thus David calls this psalm o/M, a golden jewel. For means a piece of gold; hence a golden psalm.

V. 1. Preserve me, O God, for I trust in you.

(2) Thus he begins in the person of Christ, and, as in a draft, he stirs up the whole psalm, what it will become. Namely, that Christ suffered, and rose again, and that the law was done, and that the bill of divorcement was given to the synagogue; and that Christ merited with his suffering, and paid with his resurrection, that these things should be no more. [But nevertheless it is written that the Jews will not accept it.

Preserve me.

(3) This is what one says when he is about to go and die: "Preserve me. Thus says the Epistle to the Hebrews Cap. 5, 7: "He offered up his prayer and supplication to Him who was able to deliver him from death." And Cap. 2, 13: "I will put my trust in him.

1) Note in original: "On June 5, which was Pentecost."

set." So in this verse Christ praises the new service, which is to believe and trust in the God who raises from death. I die and perish, he says, but keep me, for I trust in you. And these two words, "keep" and "I trust", he will act and explain more abundantly throughout the psalm.

v. 2. I said to the Lord, "You are the Lord.

No one has given glory to God as fully as Christ. The others are all unwise and say in their hearts that there is no God. Christ is the first who began to honor God rightly, from whom we have it. This is the right worship that no one performs without Christ alone with His own.

I must suffer for your sake.

Here I doubt how this verse is to be given. Because it is here a Hebrew way to speak, which is unknown to me. *Bonavi*¹) non propter te, is written in Hebrew. Now I assume that this is the opinion: for your sake I suffer. For your sake I do not have it good. I must suffer all misfortune. It is a confession of the cross. He cites his merit: You are my God, so it is the same for me. For as soon as one confesses grace, the cross follows immediately. When one speaks of it, the Rhine burns. The head himself complains that trust is the first thing. But trust is followed by preaching; preaching is followed by the cross; tribulation is followed by preservation. If therefore our Lord Jesus Christ had to suffer for his faith, we shall not have it better, nor worse, but we shall be preserved.

Now he says about the benefit of his suffering. My suffering shall be to me that I may get many saints and brethren, and that I may reject them which will not receive my passion.

v. 3. For the saints who are on earth and for the glorious ones, in them I have all my pleasure.

1) Luther took 'swiv for a verbal form. Cf. in this volume Col. 957, s 11.

(7) I suffer all these things for the saints who are on earth and for the glorious ones in whom I have all my pleasure. This is a beautiful and powerful verse, that the saints will esteem the suffering of Christ higher than all works. But it is also a secret complaint; as if he wanted to say: I suffer heavily, and it shall, unfortunately, not be accepted at all by those who should accept it most cheaply, namely, the Jews; although it is nevertheless not in vain. He speaks of the saints on earth, and of the grace that is to be extended bodily and with the voice. He calls them marvelous or glorious, because of their exceedingly great trust in Christ glorious, highly esteemed, the great saints, who are nothing before the world, but before God they are everything. This is the fruit of suffering, namely, that these saints rule over sin and death, and overcome the world; they are kings and priests, and glorious saints. Now this is what Christ seeks with his suffering, his worship, that we may believe that he suffered for us, and that through his suffering we have victory over death and sin, as he said in the other Psalm, v. 12. "Kiss the Son." Now he rejects the whole synagogue, which wants to be holy by its merits. In these saints, he says, I have my pleasure.

v. 4. But those who hurry after another will have great heartache (Sed istorum idola multiplicata sunt).

8 I do not like those. O, they cause much idolatry. The word XXXXX, which we translate by idolum, means sorrow and trouble. As Gen. 3:16, "With pains shalt thou bring forth thy children." Therefore it is applied in figurative speech (per metaphoram) to the idols and worship of works, because by them the consciences are much martyred. One has nothing from it, but pain; there he complains about. So now the letter of parting starts here. They do not want faith in suffering, but want to earn it by works. I have suffered for the saints, in whom I am well pleased. The others have made much of idolatry. It is a very true verse. They are not satisfied with any work, it must be said:

"made much". This is how the monks were, the Augustinians first, then came the other mendicant monks, for there is no stopping the increase of superstition. Thus they have made much without end of their pretensions, their masses, and their works, as those who are always learning and never come to the knowledge of the truth, 2 Tim. 3:7. Whoever therefore lacks faith in the suffering and resurrection of Christ falls into idolatry, and helps to make much of idols.

Post quae accelerant.

9. "They hasten after them." They not only make much of them, but they hurry with the most persistent zeal. We do not push our faith so hard as the enthusiasts; they would gladly bring their error through and through all Germany. The reason is: as soon as someone falls away from the faith, the devil chases him and he must leave. As the prophet says here, "They have many idols, and they serve them with the greatest diligence. But that one would know who they were, of which he says, he adds:

I do not want to sacrifice their libation with the blood.

10. This is a short abolition of all sacrifices and the Old Testament. I will not sacrifice, neither will I take their name in my mouth. I will not have them that offer their sacrifices in blood: the sacrifices shall be abolished, and he that continueth in them shall be an idolater. But they do not turn back from it, as it is also now. Our priests are much stricter about what they do now than ever before. The devil does the same to him: if one wants to take a thing from him, he resists most fiercely. Well then, the death of Christ shall not be in vain; they must go, the works.

Nor carry her name in my mouth.

11. "Their name," that is, the same sacrifice: I will not preach it, that is, I will reject them; they shall preach that I have suffered. But he rejoices in himself that he has something better instead of the rejected and unbelieving Jews.

V. 5. But the Lord is my goods and my portion; you receive my inheritance.

This "part" (calix) is twofold, namely of wrath and of grace. The cup of wrath is the measured part of the punishment and forfeiture (mulctae). The cup of salvation is the added part of grace, salvation and help. He contrasts this as if to say, "They have their idols and sacrifices, but my worship is to be in them, that is, in simplicity and purity of faith, so that, in short, there is no trust apart from Christ; this alone is our protection.

(13) And so he removes from our sight everything on which we could rely, and leaves only the Lord, who promises us all good things and helps us, who is known by the word and by faith alone. One does not want to suffer the verse. It is not called works, it is called the Lord. And almost in the same way St. Paul speaks Rom. 14, 16: "Create that your treasure is not blasphemed." This goes against the glory of works. I know no defiance, he says, without the Lord. Therefore the church does not rely on works, but on the Lord alone, who holds the inheritance. But faith belongs to this.

V. 6: My fate has fallen on me in a lovely way; I have received a beautiful inheritance.

14 With this he expands the previous verse: "All my pleasure is in them. Funis [cord] is called a lot, because in ancient times the fields were measured and divided with cords. He wishes himself luck that instead of the unbelieving Jews, saints have become his prey. Therefore he gives thanks for his inheritance, which he calls a lovely one. I have fine, beautiful, lovely people, who do not go about in toil of works, but trust in me. Faith makes them 1) beautiful; they are fine, pure, and clean, in simplicity of faith. This is called a holy church, which has not a spot or a wrinkle, Eph. 5, 27. So he must comfort himself against the unbelief of the Jews, as Paul also says: "Should their unbelief nullify God's faith?" Rom. 3, 3. Rom. 3, 3. as if he wanted to say: Our Lord God will still have a church, even if they, the Jews, do not believe in suffering.

1) In the original: "machts" that is: makes them.

V. 7. I praise the Lord who has counseled me.

(15) Here he begins to give thanks in the person of Christ and to describe how he has fared. For above [vv. 2, 3] he said what the benefit of his suffering was, namely, that thereby a new church was established and the old synagogue with its ceremonies was rejected. About this benefit he now rejoices: Praise be to God, who has advised me. With this he confesses that he had been abandoned by everyone and that no man had helped him, but that, as he says in another place [Ps. 63, 9. and 138, 7.], his right had helped him. So now he says, "The Lord alone has been my counsel; he has taught me to trust and to wait. That means "to counsel.

Also, my kidneys chastise me at night.

This is the experience of suffering; therefore he draws on these two, the counsel of God and his own experience of the flesh. God has taught me, and I have experienced it myself in my suffering, as the Epistle to the Hebrews Cap. 5, 8. says, that Christ learned obedience through experience. This is a true doctor, who is first taught by God and then experiences it himself. But experience is when God helps with counsel, so that one thinks, "I will persevere;" as Ps. 130:6 says, "From one morning watch to the next." Above the council one learns. These doctors can preach about it, and certainly talk about it. Therefore Christ also boasts that he became such a doctor through experience.

My kidneys.

17 This is my flesh. The word "heart" in the Scriptures means the secret deceitfulness, but the word "kidneys" means the lusts, inclinations, and everything that one has a desire for. So then he says, "I have bitten myself with my kidneys. My affections (affectus) would gladly not have suffered; as he says Matth. 26, 41: "The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak." The affectus would rather have pleasure than suffering, joy than pain. But with the kidneys one learns, as Paul says Rom. 7, 25. "With the flesh I serve the law of sin"; and Christ [Matth. 26, 39. Luc. 22, 42.], "O Lord, if it be possible, remove this cup from me." The have been the kidneys; but it will not do. The kidneys chastise at night, even as it is written. For an evil thought is one more grievous by night than by day. The flesh did not like to die, but still overcame it. So now he says: I thank my GOt, who has taught me to overcome my kidneys. Now he continues to tell what kind of advice it was.

V. 8. I have the Lord always before my eyes.

(18) With this our Lord God has preserved the heart, that I have always hoped, though I die, yet He will be at my right hand. Therefore, when the kidneys become unwilling, exercise yourself against them and stand firm, remembering that God is at your right hand. Let Satan be on the left side of the kidneys, our Lord God is nevertheless on the best side, Christ also had to do the same to him.

I have the Lord always before my eyes.

I have set him before mine eyes, that no temptation should remove him out of mine sight. This is how all temptations go about, wanting to take Christ from us and put the devil in his place. The head of all the saints complains about this, so we will also have to suffer this.

For he is at my right hand, therefore I will abide.

20 That I perish not, nor be moved out of the place where there is grace and salvation. These are public confessions of the cross, for the contrast clearly indicates that things are going badly on the left, that there is always knocking and banging.

V. 9. Therefore my heart rejoices.

(21) This is my consolation, that I have kept myself in counsel, that I should have our Lord God before my eyes, though I felt otherwise on the left.

And my honor is joyful.

22. "My glory", that is, the instrument for praising, namely the tongue, so that I praise God, as above in the 9.0 Psalm, v. 3.

1) In Latin: ks. 4; in the old translation: Ps. 4, 3" but this does not seem to fit us. "4" will be a misprint.

My heart is glad, and so is my tongue; for as we believe, so we speak, whether in gladness or in sadness. "When the heart is full, the mouth overflows," says Christ Matt. 12:34. "Is glad," that is, preaches it with gladness.

My meat will also lie safely.

(23) He confesses that though his body is dead, yet it is safe in the certain hope that it will not decay. Even though I am dead, he says, no worm shall touch my flesh.

v. 10. For you will not leave my soul in hell.

(24) Though I come into suffering and death, yet my body remains incorrupt, and my life shall not remain in hell. "Hell" is the name of everything that we go to after this life, be it the grave or something else. But I think that the word "hell" has its name from Schaal fordern, which can never be satisfied, that it always wants to have more. The word "soul" he has put for life.

And do not admit that your saint is decaying.

25. Shachath means a pit and decay. You will not let me see the pit, that is, what happens in the pit, namely decay. This is a very clear text of the resurrection, which cannot be understood by anyone else but Christ alone, who, because he is holy and pure, cannot be held by death; he must rise again.

v. 11: You make known to me the way.

These are the words of a dead man, for he speaks here in the person of a dead man. He is in hell, but he will not remain there. The flesh is also in the pit, but it will not feel the decay. It must come together again. He wants to have his inheritance on earth, his saints, and also wants to be in hell. Therefore he must necessarily rise again, and hell and the grave will not have power over him. Therefore he will also overcome death, sin and Satan, therefore he will also be a king and a priest for eternity. Thus it is that after death he must come to life again. That is why he says:

You show me the way to life.

That is, you have raised me up again. Here is the article of our Christian faith founded: Descended into hell, which the Scotists say cannot be proved from the Scriptures.

Borne to you is joy the fullness.

He distinguishes his life from the life of others. I will live," he says, "not in the sight of men, but in your sight. And this text is against the Jews who are waiting for a bodily Messiah. He will live and rejoice, he says, before God.

And lovely beings at your right hand forever.

29 Namely, with this you will satisfy me. The left he has here in this life, but the right he has there in eternal joy and sweetness. This is how he describes eternal life, where there is no more suffering, but only joy and delight, and there is no end to it.

About the same Psalm.

V. 1. Preserve me.

This psalm contains the article: Descended to hell. Here it is disputed whether he went down according to his nature or according to his effect. But we leave such disputations, and remain with the simple childlike faith and word. The real hell of fire is not yet here, which, as Christ says, is reserved for the devil and the is prepared for the wicked. I would like hell to mean that the soul is insensible, like the body in death, and deprived of the feeling of this life and all its sensations, as the body rests without all sensation. This is how I believe this word is taken in Scripture, especially when it is used with the word "buried," as it is here, to mean that Christ is buried after the body and after the soul.

The soul is set outside the boundaries of this life and goes to its place, as it were to its grave. There it also remains in rest. When Jacob says [Gen. 37, 35]: "I will go down with sorrow into the pit" (inferos), he does not say about the pain after death, because peace follows those who have died in the Lord.

If then death is something greater than swoon (syncopis [sic] seu defectiones animae) and the like, nothing can be felt in death; otherwise it must be less than swoon, as in sleep, where terrible images occur to us, and we make ourselves believe that we are in fire, water, 2c., which, as it seems, cannot be admitted. Therefore I hold that it [hell] is nothing but the grave of souls; but these things cannot be comprehended.

3 And yet I do not dislike the paintings and songs of Christ's descent into hell and the redemption of the fathers, 2c. as if such things had happened in a bodily way. For it cannot be modeled in any other way than with such images.

(4) But those questions, whether Christ descended to hell according to his nature or effect, are nothing, for such thoughts are already in another world. Notice what Paul says, Eph. 4:9: "That he ascended, what is it but that he descended first?" If he ascended, he descended before into the lowest parts of the earth, that is, outside this world, under the earth.

Preserve me.

The word "preserve" brings suffering with it. "Preserve, for you are the Lord.

Because I trust.

6 That is, keep him who trusts in you. After all, God is a God of those who trust, not of those who deal in works.

V. 2. I said to the Lord.

(7) For I am sure that thou art the Lord, because of which I suffer; I stand upon it; for thou art the Lord, and the thing for which I suffer is thine; for it is for thy sake that I rely upon it. "For thy sake," that is, for thy word's sake.

I said to the Lord.

8. it is you, it is your command, that I know; whether it hurts, but I am comforted by it 2c.

V. 3. for the saints, so on 2c.

9 This is also a comfort: I do it for the sake of my saints. But make a distinction between the saints of Christ and those of Moses and others 2c.

My favor.

(10) The contrast is, they please no one but me. These are the true saints who are sanctified by me, against the law of Moses.

And for the glorious ones.

11 Paul Rom. 8, 30. says: "Whom he has justified, he has also glorified. He does great things through them, overcoming the world, sin and the devil through them. Other saints can't get rid of lice in the cap, let alone do miraculous works. And notice that he says:

For the saints who are on earth.

This is fine: Christ's kingdom is on earth, and there these miraculous works are done over all the power of the enemy.

I have all my favors in those.

1013 Namely, to sanctify them; by them will I avenge myself.

Has been much.

14. the other false saints, even those who are the best according to the law, as Moses with the whole law; all those who cling to it fall down, because they do not want Christ and his despised saints.

V. 4. I do not want their drankopser 2c.

15 I will no longer teach or preach about it.

Infirmities.

16. heartache 2c. which is produced by false righteousness. They have no peace, neither inwardly nor outwardly, as is said in another place. They will feel two kinds of sorrow and heartache. "With the blood, that is, with all the righteousness of the law.

V. 5. The Lord is my good and my portion.

17. my inheritance, my righteousness and everything, not in the law, nor in myself, Phil. 3, 9.

V. 6: The lot.

I have a beautiful, magnificent inheritance.

Inheritance.

19. is the Church, the saints, gifted with the Spirit and His gifts.

V. 7. I praise the Lord.

20. who advised me, who was with me when I suffered, and gave me good counsel.

My kidneys.

(21) The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak. The flesh contends against it; it grieves the spirit greatly. This is the right sacrifice, namely, to remember and want what is right, and yet not be able to follow it.

V. 8. I have the Lord always before my eyes, for he is at my right hand.

22. that is, he holds me, "now that he is exalted by the right hand of God," Apost. 2, 33.

V. 9. my flesh will lie secure. .

23. the flesh is also made glorious.

B. 10. You make known to me the way to life.

24. that is, you help me out of death 2c.

The seventeenth Psalm.

1. 1) This psalm is also against the ungodly nature and hypocrisy. And it appears from this that the dear prophet had more to do with the members of his household than with the enemies. For there are more psalms written of wars of the ungodly nature than of the flesh. Therefore he prays for himself and for the believers. For this is how it tends to go: as soon as one puts his trust in the Lord, the cross does not stay away for long; then enemies are soon there, pursuing us with cunning and persecuting us with violence, as we have seen in the previous psalms. The first and other verses are, as it were, the content of the psalm, for in them he indicates against whom he is speaking.

V. 1. Hear, O Lord, righteousness; heed my cry; hear my prayer.

2. "Hear," he says, "the righteousness"; do not say, my righteousness. I have a cause, thou knowest that it is right. Therefore, dear Lord, hear my cause. They pray much, and boast of their worship, justifying themselves, as Christ says; you can give them gain nothing. The common rabble lets itself be caught by appearances, and hears them as if they were righteous. But you, who alone can judge the righteous, hear righteousness. Hear what is right, because the world does not want to hear.

1) Note of the original: "Den 7. Juni" (7. 16ns Innii).

That does not come from a false mouth.

3rd There he stabs about himself. He lays out his prayer by contrast [against the wicked]. They also pray, and will take it upon their souls, and upon the last judgment; but it is all false, lying matter. This I complain of thee, and ask not with a false mouth: but that prayer is made in sins. This is a great glory, that he who has the word of godliness has also right prayer. For others, though they pray, yet they pray with a false mouth. But they do it so high that the rabble cannot pass by.

V. 2. You speak in my cause.

4 With this he appeals from human courts, and appeals to another. I do not want my cause to be judged by men. With the same I have already

I will do nothing but condemn them. Therefore, you judge, you represent my cause, and drive those back.

And you look at the law.

For the eyes of men only look upon crookedness and ungodliness. Thus he accuses his adversaries secretly and covertly with these verses. It truly needs to be prayed for; words cannot control things, but only the devout heart. This is almost the summa of the whole psalm. Now he declares with respect to both parties (per partes) wherein their doctrine is false, and his is pure. For the psalm is a prayer for himself and against those, his adversaries. First, however, he speaks for the best of his part. Our part stands thus:

V. 3. You prufest my heart.

6th They, the unholy people, are without a cross, and only wash much, are rich, mighty; but I am tried of thee. Thus it comes to pass, that they which have the word, to them the devil sendeth a cross, hatred, envy, reproach, dishonor, sad thoughts, blasphemy, that we stand ever as silver in the fire. There they stir up and blow with relish; but they are without all cross, in rejoicing.

And visit it at night.

7) "Night" means both according to the letter and in a figurative sense temptations. Oester, however, the word "night" is taken for tribulation. I have suffered many a tribulation, he says, that thou mightest have tempted me. And here notice that he calls the cross a trial, not a corruption, as Paul also says Rom. 5:4: "Patience bringeth experience." "Visit" here means to challenge, to torment. 1) It wants to mean a word of the cross; whoever wants to preach it or learn it, drink the cup of salvation, and say, "I am greatly afflicted," Ps. 116:10.

And purify me.

The Hebrew word Zaraph (XXX), means distill, purify, as the goldsmiths do, goldschmidasti me.

1) In the Latin edition: tridutari instead of: triduiLro.

And find nothing.

This is a very fine consolation and defiance of a good conscience, that he may so surely say: You know that I have done and taught right, as Jeremiah also says, Cap. 17, 16: "What I have preached is right in your sight. Sin finds God well, there he does not speak of now, but he speaks of his cause. We have a good cause, because it is the gospel that we suffer for. We are not persecuted for being adulterers or anything like that. They would well suffer us to help ourselves with harlots, as they do; they would not be hostile to us for that. But they are hostile to us because of this. So now we can boast: You know, O Lord, that I have taught nothing but your word. Though the person be frail, yet the thing is altogether righteous.

I have determined that my mouth shall not transgress.

(10) Because the sophists boast so highly of their work that they also trouble me with it, I have firmly determined that my mouth will not pass before your word, and that I will not teach anything apart from your word. He speaks of the duty of the mouth, that is, of the teaching office.

V. 4. I keep myself in the word of your lips, from the works of men in the way of the murderer.

(11) It is about the word of your lips. This very word [murderer] is also in Jeremiah Cap. 7, 11: "You have made it a murderer's pit"; and Christ, whom we believe, also interpreted it to mean a murderer [Matth. 21, 13]. Pariz (XXX) is called a prowler, parisiensis, from breaking out, that one may tear out to the side to the places of ambush, to assail unwary wayfarers. He now says: They teach the work of men, but I teach the word of God; there it rises above, there it clashes. Such quarrels have been from the beginning of the world, for that is why Cain slew his brother, and will remain until the end of the world. There they stand. God's judgment testifies to them that Zwingli, Heiß, 1) Eck are murderers; the reason is that they do not respect the word, but the works. Those who do this are Parisiens and murderers. Now follow prayers. For hitherto he hath magnified his cause, as he is, that he should hold fast, that he should not fall into their doctrine, but put them under the ban, and hold them to be murderers.

v. 5 Keep my walk upon thy footsteps, that my footsteps slip not.

Here now is the danger. They make it so smooth and beautiful that it will be necessary for us to pray that our Lord God will protect us from the hopeless enthusiasts.

Maintain my gait.

For there is danger, my foot may slip. It is necessary to defend oneself with the word and prayer, for he alone can keep the word. The devil can overthrow the whole thing with a single word. As Doctor Eck in Leipzig misled Carlstadt in a very good matter with a single word. Therefore you should diligently notice that the prophet prays so vehemently.

v. 6. I cry unto thee, that thou, O God, wouldest hear me; incline thine ear unto me, hear my speech.

14 He exalts prayer and makes it great, because he describes the necessity of prayer. As if he should say: It is an important matter, one invites all the devils and the whole world upon oneself. Duke Hans of Saxony is quite forsaken; everyone hopes that we will fail because of this. Therefore help, dear Lord.

v. 7. Prove your wondrous goodness, you Savior of those who trust in you.

This is a declaration of necessity, and a very beautiful verse. In Homer it is never so good. We are they that trust in thee, so hast thou the name, that thou

You do not want to leave them. Therefore, show your wonderful goodness and mercy, for we must be helped with miracles. We cannot be helped according to human ways and with human ability. We are too small; if we are to remain, your miraculous power must do it.

Against those who set themselves against your right hand.

This is a prayer full of faith. He does not call his enemies, but God's adversaries, who oppose God and His right. It is your cause, and a cause of your right, your will and your work. But you must do the helping whimsically.

v. 8. Keep me as the apple of your eye.

(17) Again, this is a great making of the prayer, which praises the cause as a good one. As if to say: It takes great diligence that our Lord God does not look badly upon us, but watches over us as over the apple of his eye. For in the whole world there is nothing more delicate than the conscience. It is said in Proverbs: discipline and honor, faith and eye do not suffer a joke, all three are soon corrupted. Thus one can soon make the conscience mad with a small splinter, so that no one knows what happens to it. I am easily harmed, he says, you must let me be commanded to you as the apple of your eye, you must have great respect for me. Therefore you must watch, and speak of the law of the Lord day and night [Ps. 1, 2.], it is well needed. Not as he did who studied forty years on one verse in the Psalter; for the devil is too strong, the flesh too weak, the world too evil.

Shield me under the shadow of your wings.

We are like young chicks; how soon has the consecration scattered them! we cannot escape it.

v. 9. Bor to the wicked who disturb me.

19 By and by he explains what kind of people the wicked are, namely, the most holy ones in the world. They do not afflict, he says, but they disturb; thus he indicates the danger and the difficult situation. Thus Paul says (Gal. 1, 13.), "I disturbed the congregation of God."

1) The name "Hetz" appears both in the Latin edition and in the old translation. We are of the opinion that there is a mistake here. Should not perhaps 6o6kl6U8 be put instead? That Luther had thought of Cochlaeus at that time is proven by his letter to Justus Jonas of April 23, 1530, Walch, old edition, vol. XVI, 2126. In addition, Cochlaeus is also one of the co-authors of the outoutntio. In the next following psalm, Z58, Eck and "Kochlöffel" are also compiled.

And so the wicked disturb not only our peace and tranquility, but also souls and people, even deprive us of people, denigrate our books and our work. The wicked do this under the highest pretense of holiness.

Bor my enemies who stand around and around after my soul.

20. those who stand around [for]¹) to take my life, thus disturb me physically and spiritually.

v. 10. Their fats hold together.

(21) Hitherto he has described their holiness; now he says how mighty and many they are. Are they so great? It is a Hebrew way of speaking that he calls "fat ones" the mighty ones. They have resolved their fatness, that is, have joined together, united their forces.

They speak proudly with their mouths.

(22) This makes them as proud as the nobility and princes are now; they talk with their mouths of vainly winning the game.

v. 11. Where we walk, they surround us.

They lie in wait for us as we walk and as we stand. They always mock all our works and writings. Philip often marvels at those slanderers who blaspheme us, even though we raise the dead, as Christ did. If they cannot condemn us with public appearances, they condemn us with slander. As we go, so it is wrong.

Their eyes are directed to bring us down to earth.

24 That is, in short, they have grasped their meaning, they want to push the thing to the ground.

v. 12. Like a lion desiring prey, like a young lion sitting in the den.

(25) He is always lying in wait to catch us with his false blasphemies, always seeking a cause to come to us. This is the first part, which contains the accusation of his adversaries and the statement of his cause. Now follows the other part.

1) In the Latin edition this "um" is missing.

V. 13. Lord, arise, overpower him, and humble him.

26. arise, come before (praeveni), that is, be stronger than them, humble them, we are too weak, we cannot resist them by the dear God.

Save my soul from the wicked with your sword.

27 That is, by the word, by thy judgment. They will not hear our word, though it is your word; therefore send them your word, your judgment and your wrath. Add to it the deed, get rid of the leather, and let the sentence go. Now he indicates what kind of people they are.

v. 14. From the people of your hand.

28. they are people of your hand, who shall fall into your judgment, and are reserved for your judgment and your hands. They are condemned and belong to your punishment.

From the people of this world.

29. heled (XXX) is called an age (aetatem), as it is also written in another place [Ps. 49, 2.]: Qui habitatis orbem, that is, in a measured time, which is fixed as the time of life. So he calls them such people, who badly desire nothing else but this life. Methim also does not mean men, but the rabble, as it is also written in the fifth book of Moses, Cap. 4, 27: "You will be a lowly rabble among the Gentiles." So also here: There is a noisy rabble before thee, H[archduke] G[eorg] and the H[archdukes] V[on] B[ayern]. They do not heed your word; but here they are great Hansen.

Which have their part in their life.

30 Peter looked at this verse in his other epistle Cap. 2, 13, where he says: Voluptatem²) arbitrantur delicias dici. They regard temporal life for pleasure, that they may live in pleasure, but are not exercised with the cross. Here "life" means good life, that they may live in pleasure, sit in glory, honor, good and power, and are enemies of the cross of Christ [Phil. 3, 18].

2) This word, which must not be omitted here, is added by us according to the Vulgate.

Which you fill the belly with your treasure (absconditis tuis

31 Paul interpreted this [Rom. 16, 18. and Phil. 3, 19.] and called them belly servants. Hidden treasures (abscondita) he calls the benefits of God, because God distributes his gifts mildly and gives them in a hidden way. Here he creates grain from the sand, [there] from a rock wine, oil. These are hidden treasures.

Those who have children who have abundance.

32 Not that it is evil to have children, but that it is evil to have children in abundance, to dwell upon them, and to lust after them, that they may be made great, glorious, and comely in the sight of the world.

And leave the rest to their boys.

(33) They think that they are leaving great goods behind them, but they do not even think of our Lord God, as is said in the Gospel [Luc. 16:19] of the rich glutton. Therefore, this is a description of the life of the world, that one lives in a drunken stupor, and teach his children also. But I, he says, am a different man.

V. 15. But I will behold your face in righteousness.

This is what is said about the resurrection of the dead. They think that life is life, but there is another. It is not life; I look to another, that is, to your face, that you may be revealed to us; to this we will come through righteousness.

I want to be satisfied when I awake in your image.

The Hebrew word Hekiz (XXXX) actually means to be raised from sleep. The man who is in the world is an image of this life; but when your image shall rise, then shall we be in righteousness. So the things that are here will cease. Then shall thy image arise, that is, then shall we be renewed into the image of the Son, that we may be righteous, wise, and live for ever. But in this world it is not said otherwise, but: You test me with fire.

The eighteenth Psalm.

(1) This will of course be the last psalm that David made, as can be seen from the other book of Samuel, Cap. 22, 1. ff. that he made it shortly before he died. He never had peace until death. This is a common thanksgiving for all the dangers he was saved from, especially those he suffered at the time of his kingdom from Saul, Absalom, the Philistines and the Syrians. That he was saved from many dangers, for this he thanked our Lord God before he died. One would like to understand this Psalm also from Christ, but I think it is more correct to refer it to David; however, the secret interpretation points to Christ.

V. 2. I love you dearly, Lord.

2. racham (XXX) is a word that denotes an intimate affection, and means the tender love of parents toward their children, and of children toward parents. So now he says: I have a heartfelt and filial affection for you. Thus he confesses his highest love, that he had an air in our Lord God. For he finds that his benefits are unspeakable, and from this exuberant love comes the accumulation of names that follows. There is a wonderful richness in the Hebrew language.

My strength.

3 With this he confesses that everything he has done, he has not done out of his own ability or suggestions, but only out of divine power. As Peter also says, 1 Ep. 4, 11: "If any man have an office, to do it as of the ability which God hath bestowed." Chesek (XXX) refers to such strength by which we are strong.

V. 3. O Lord, my rock, my fortress.

(4) These were the best fortresses of old, a strong castle upon a rock. That is why he calls God a rock and a castle, for protection. I have been safe all the way here, and yet I have had no other wall, castle, fortress around me but my God. These are words of a well-trying faith, which testifies from its experience that God is our strength, rock and fortress through His Word. Therefore, through Him we are able to do what we are able to do; through Him we are also secure against all the gates of hell.

My Savior.

(5) Thou wilt keep me, though I perish. Much misfortune has surrounded me; yet I have been preserved all the way, since others have perished. This is said of perils: I have always been safe, because you are my rock; though I have fallen into some peril, so that many have perished around me, yet I have always been preserved. So now the pope, bishops and the heretics are bursting at us, before whom we nevertheless remain on the rock of Christ, there we stand and defy. Although others fall into heresies, we are still preserved.

My God.

6. from whom we receive all goods, spiritual and corporal, comfort and all other benefits.

My Hoard.

7. to (XXX) is called a fortress, refuge, comfort, defiance, on which I insist, proud and courageous. We have commonly translated it "my stronghold" [Ps. 18, 32, 47.]. Therefore also Tyre is called "Zur", a fortress against all tarnishing [Ps. 83, 8.]. Thus he calls God.

In whom I trust.

Here he explains what "to" is, a defiance, since one relies on. But by it he also gives the opposite meaning, as if he wanted to say: Others have their Zurim, as Moses says in his song [Deut. 32:31]: "Their rocks are not like our rock."

My sign.

9. my armor and my defense, that I may defend myself in battle.

And horn of my salvation.

10 This is the power in which I am victorious. For "horn" means a kingdom, power, as if to say: It is not my power, but God Himself is the horn. All my victories and triumphs are all the work of our Lord God.

And my protection.

(11) Thou hast kept me also against the deceitfulness and insolence of Absalom and the rest of the boys. We are not able to reach these words with such a great movement of the heart as he spoke them.

V. 4. I will praise and call upon the Lord.

This is the art of boasting about God. But it is a contrast, as if he should say, Let no man boast of himself, let no man boast of his strength and wisdom. If any man will be saved, let him think nothing of his wisdom, let him boast of nothing but his Lord; in him let him boast, as I boast of the Lord, and call upon him.

This is how I will be delivered from my enemies.

(13) If thou wilt not be defeated, boast thyself in the Lord. Now this is the art of the Christians, that they know, if they want to be preserved, to boast of the Lord, and if they take comfort in our Lord God, they will win. In the following two verses he says almost nothing but about his temptations and dangers.

V. 5 For the bands of death encompassed me.

(14) That is, I have often been in the throes of death, I have been entangled and imprisoned in death. As when he fought against the lion, against Goliath, against Saul, against other enemies in battle [1 Sam. 17:34, 41]. So he was very often in the midst of mortal peril. He calls it "band. It had already surrounded me, there was no rescue left, because my rock.

The streams of Belial frightened me.

15) It is considered that this word "Belial" is formed from Bal (XX), nothing, and Jaal (XXX), useful, as, a useless child. That is why they called Satan by that name. But I think it is a common name, like Leviathan, which is a common name of the dragons in the sea. Thus, "the brooks of Belial," that is, of evil men; that it may mean all that is harmful. Water, according to the secret interpretation, denotes temptations: the rivers or streams are the great storms of tyrants, princes and nations, which come with violence, as the great rivers do. As if he wanted to say: There were great wars, great heaps of people; and indeed "the streams of Belial", which wanted to destroy me, they often frightened me, that I would have almost despaired. Flesh and blood stirred, but the horn of my salvation still preserved me.

V. 6: The bonds of hell encompassed me.

16. as he said above [v. of the bonds of death, and as Paul 2 Cor. 1, 9. says: "We had decided with ourselves that we would have to die." I did not think otherwise, because I would have to go down.

And the ropes of death overwhelmed me.

17 He spoke of violence earlier [v. 5]; here he speaks of cunning. He experienced violence in the battle against Goliath and the Philistines; cunning was shown to him by Saul and Absalom, so that he was almost betrayed and sold. They were ropes, as one lays for the birds and the wild. I have suffered dangers, both by force and by guile, and have been attacked with violence and with guile, even to the death, and so that they have often prevailed, that I have thought: I must stay. So now he has been challenged. But experience followed the challenge, and hope followed the experience, Rom. 5:4. These people can then teach others rightly and talk about it. So far he has acted on what he had resolved to do, that he would give thanks to God, who has helped him so often. Now he adds a story.

V. 7 When I am afraid, I call upon the Lord and cry out to my Lord.

18 He sets forth his example. I have often been in tribulation; but I have a salvation

We have had the means, namely calling, otherwise there is no consolation. Hoping in a man does not do it, but hoping in God. But it is impossible to call upon God in times of need without the Holy Spirit. For the heart raises such objections: The God you want to call upon is angry with you, has done this to you, and is sending you such tribulation. And yet it must be. It is not a matter of fleeing from the one who strikes you, but only of giving yourself freely in the spear and in the thrust, and he will come after you.

So he hears my voice.

(19) This is true faith, that one prays in such a way that after the prayer he can be sure that he is heard. And it is a great art, the first thing, that one may pray to an angry God, and then say Amen to the prayer.

From his temple, and my cry comes before him to his ears.

20. They always bind our Lord God to the temple, yet they add that he is in heaven. But they cannot seize him in heaven, except in the place where he has bound himself. One must seek him only there where he has placed himself, otherwise one will not find him, that one may seek him only in his word. That is why they always add: "from the temple". So this is the content of the psalm: I have been in trouble, and have come out through prayer; so do you also to him. Now he adds an example:

V. 8: The earth quaked and was moved.

21 Until then, he told how he had been in mortal peril and yet had been preserved. Now it is the way of this people that they tend to go far and repeat the past stories. As in the Psalm "Let God arise" 2c. [Ps. 68]. Thus they always repeat the miraculous work as they were preserved when they came out of Egypt. Thus Judith, Habakkuk, Isaiah and all the prophets praise GOD for this work, that He saved His people at that time. And it is also a common example for all the godly that they shall be saved, but the wicked perish. Thus he still preserves the pious, but he kills the wicked, like Pharaoh.

The earth is praying.

(22) This is the history of Exodus 14, and a description of the storm in which the Egyptians perished. They saw thunder and lightning and thought that everything would perish. So Sanherib also perished [2 Kings 19:35]. The word, gaash (XXX) means to lift, as it happens when it thunders. This is how he deals with the wicked.

And the foundations of the mountains stirred, and lived, because he was wroth.

(23) He says that the earthquake was heard in the mountains; the mountains and the valley were terrified because he was angry. He is patient with the wicked for a long time, but when he gets behind them, it goes over and over.

v. 9. Steam emanated from his nose.

This is a description of thunder, poetically attached to a person, as we Germans say: Unser HErr GOtt speiet Feuer.

And consuming fire from his mouth.

25. his fire consumes.

That it flashed from it.

He has made a true fire that burns like coals. Between water and rain, it still burns and consumes.

v. 10. He bowed the heavens, and descended, and darkness was under their feet.

27 As if to say, "God was in that storm. When it is light in the sky, the clouds are high; but when there is a storm, it seems as if it were hitting the roof. Then, he says, our Lord God is near. This is a simple and childish way of talking about the weather, as children talk about it. In one weather, our Lord God makes the sky low and comes near, yet he cannot be seen in the clouds.

Darkness was under his feet.

(28) As we say to the children when it thunders: Listen, our Lord God is angry.

v. 11. And he rode on the cherub, and flew along.

29. in scripture cherubin is two angels with wings, but here he calls cherubin the Winds and clouds; for the clouds fly away like the birds, which are also the wings of our Lord God.

He floated on the fiddles of the wind.

(30) He gives wings to the wind. With wind comes all weather; then comes thunder, rain, lightning, thunderclaps, sulfur, smoke, steam. Now he further describes that God is present in such weather when he wants to take revenge on his enemies.

v. 12. and black thick clouds in which he was hidden.

31 He sitteth on high, saith he, and about him is darkness. He has a strange castle and strange walls; dark, thick and watery clouds, that is his castle and hidden place. It is not made of stones and boards, but only of clouds. There he sits, who wants to do him? He can build a castle that must be left unclimbed and unshot. But he can shoot out against his enemies, so that heaven and earth tremble.

v. 13. From the brightness before him the clouds parted.

This is a description of the lightning. When it wants, it tears the clouds in two and throws out a flash of lightning. The clouds cannot prevent such brilliance; it tears through them with a flash of lightning, as if no cloud were not there, as we see that the whole sky opens up, as it were, when it flashes. Hence this description is taken.

With hail and lightning (Grando et carbones ignis transeunt).

33) "Coals" (carbones) mean burning flames of fire. But it points to what is written in the other book of Moses about the angel: He wrapped himself in fire [Ex. 14, 19].

v.14. And the LORD thundered in heaven, and the Most High let out his thunder with hail and lightning.

34. thunder he calls God's voice; as the poets fable that Jupiter talked with Semele by a thunder. And Job [Cap. 38, 1. and 40, 1.]: "The LORD answered Job out of a weather." When he speaks, there is lightning and thunder; as he did on Mount Sinai [Ex. 19:16].

V. 15. He shot his rays and scattered them.

35 Now he applies history. The weather was directed so that he would crush his enemies.

He let very flash, and frightened them.

036 He caused great lightning, and chased them with it, that they ran into the red sea.

V. 16: There was a shower of water.

037 And there came up waters from above and from beneath, and he smote them with tempests, and drowned them with waters.

And the ground of the earth was uncovered.

The water ran out of the earth. As I now think it happens here at Wittenberg, because the Elbe grows so, and yet there is no rain.

Lord, from your rebuke.

He calls the thundering a scolding. Our Lord God grumbles a little when he thunders.

From the breath and snort of your nose.

40. is a similitude taken from a man's nose. When one is angry, he grumbles and snorts. But the best thing about this description of the weather is that it actually attributes it to God. For even though the devil and the good angels can cause weather, God restricts them in it and allows them as much as he wants; nevertheless, his snorting does. This is now the digression and the example. Now, after that victory against Pharaoh, he also recounts his victories by which God saved him.

V. 17. He sent from on high and took me.

Here he begins to apply the above description to his history. As if he wanted to say: As God has preserved the children of Israel, so also I have been preserved. To them he sent Moses from heaven; so he also sent to me, be it his angels, or a

He has saved me from the water, that is, from the temptations. The word "he sent" refers to a fact. He sent something, as in the 107th Psalm, v. 20: "He sent his word." Thus the Scripture assigns to GOtte the help that we do not deserve. He must come to us, we cannot come to him except through prayer; for he is too high above us.

And pulled me out of great waters.

(42) He alludes to the name Moses, for Moses means one drawn out of the waters; and he has this name because he was drawn out of the river by Pharaoh's daughter. As if he wanted to say: I also became a kind of Moses, and was pulled out of many waters. Until then, he has told his dangers in general; now he treats them in particular.

V. 18. He delivered me from my strong enemies.

(43) He begins the account of his perils from Saul, and deals with them in the following twelve verses. For he suffered much from Saul, for he both violently persecuted David and put him to great shame, for he charged him with the crime of being ungodly and seeking the kingdom. He had to be called a rebel and an ungodly man against God; this is his first persecution. However, some understand this verse of Goliath, but I understand it of Saul.

From my haters.

44. from those who hated me because of your word. For I have been called to the kingdom by your divine word.

Which were too powerful for me.

45 They became far too powerful for me, and I had to flee.

V. 19. which "overwhelmed me," at the time of my accident.

46 Since I was so ill, they should have had compassion on me, but they overpowered me most of all, as did the Siphites [1 Sam. 23:19] and others who were in the court. And would have given him his things can do better, and made them only more annoying. So no accident is alone, for an enemy one has a hundred of them.

v.20. And the LORD became my confidence, and he brought me out into the room, he plucked me out.

047 For he hath delivered him out of the hand of Saul very often and very strangely.

Because he has desire to me.

These are words of faith. And this is the greatest consolation, if one can be of such a mind in times of trial. But how does he know this, of which he boasts so highly? No doubt from the words of Samuel, who said to him, "The Lord has made you king over His people," 2 Sam. 7:8. On these words he staked all his defiance, saying, "Even though I am troubled and saddened by my experience and my misfortune, the word and command of God that I am king is still there. And even though I had to suffer many misfortunes, I always believed that he loved me, as he had promised me. This is what he said about violence and persecution. Now he also says of the accusations and the disgrace. He has not only saved and preserved my life, he has also restored my honor.

v. 21: The Lord is well pleased with me according to my righteousness; he repays me according to the cleanness of my hands.

(49) This was a very severe trial for David, as can be seen in the seventh Psalm, that they blamed him as if he were a rebel. As he [Nabal] said, 1 Sam. 25:10, "There are now many servants who tear themselves away from their masters." Such words are painful. Praise God, it has come to day. God sees that I am righteous, I have neither stolen nor taken the kingdom by force, but God has given it to me. And such is a great strengthening and comfort to the conscience. But this is not to be understood as if he were banging our Lord GOD. There it is not to throb, but to say, "Forgive us our trespasses." Nevertheless, we have the defiance with men, that we say.

can: This is what God has said, and it pleases Him. If there is a defect in me that I do not do it as I should, it is not because of that; God's commandment and word is nevertheless true.

(50) So we too can boast against the scribblers that we are right. For though our faith is weak, yet it is not an unrighteous faith. The ministry and the cause must be praised, not as for our person, but for the sake of the word. So I, too, when they say that I am stronger than I should be, can say, "My hands are clean. It is clear that David was more troubled by spiritual persecution than by that of the flesh. To afflict the body is bodily; 1) but to afflict the conscience, to deprive one of the word, the faith, God, that is very unpleasant.

v. 22. For I keep the ways of the Lord.

(51) I have not done wrong; I have kept his word. I did not do it out of my own sin, but kept my word and did what I was supposed to do; I did not want to act ungodly, but I had to suffer for it.

And I am not ungodly against my God.

I have not acted ungodly against God with ungodliness and unbelief. Someone else, tired of unhappiness, would have said, "If I am not to be king, I will not be king. But I have not done so, but as God has commanded me, so have I done.

v. 23. For all his rights I have before my eyes.

(53) This has been my struggle; I have become absorbed in your commandments. So one commandment drives into all the others. As if he wanted to say, "They always want to persuade me, as if I have acted against God and the king, accuse me of it as a rebel. But I know that I have kept all the commandments and have not sinned against them in any of them.

1) Erlanger (vol. 38, 174) has changed Faber's correct translation: "leiblich" (corporals), which she found in the original edition, as did Walch, into "leidlich".

And his commandments I will not cast away.

54 This very word "commandment" is written in the 2nd Psalm, v. 7, and means an order, a way. God commanded that he should not be served in any other place than Jerusalem. This I have done in every way. I have not obeyed those who say to me, "Go among the nations and serve foreign gods," as he complains, 1 Sam. 26:19.

V. 24. But I live without change before Him (6UM 60).

55. cum is as much as apud. I have been blameless, "without change" before him. Not that there was no sin in him, but that he had not denied the word. For faith is always weak in itself; but by this it is preserved, that it is not another faith. It remains weak, but it is still right; the other failures belong to the Lord's Prayer.

And beware of sins.

56. I have preserved myself that I did not mistreat.

V.25. Therefore the Lord repays me according to my righteousness, according to the cleanness of my hands in His sight.

(57) He repeats the previous verse, except that here he adds, "In his sight. He is much concerned about the challenge to faith and conscience, that he should be pushed away from the word; for people can persuade so much that they make one even astray. For thus they conclude, Saul was ordained king by God; so David sins against God and His ordinance, that he arrogates to himself the kingdom, for God changes neither His word nor His ordinance. Then they stood up; like our sophists now, when they have a saying of good works. David was king in Hebron, in the kingdom of Judah, for seven years, because he always had to hear the reproach that he was a rebel and an unruly man. Of this kingdom of Judah he said above [v. 21]: "The Lord forgives me" 2c. But here he adds, "In his sight." As if to say, "At Hebron I was not before the eyes of the Lord; but now, having received the kingdom of Israel in addition, I sit before the Temple of God in Jerusalem, before the face of God, as a king. There the recompense is completed.

V. 26. With the saints you are holy.

These are very fine sayings. As we are, so is our Lord God: if we are favorable, so is God also favorable. Thus, the devotees, the corner, the spoon, and the servants, have our Lord GOD for dirt; for they are also dirt: when they hear GOD's word, they say it is of the devil, for they are also of the devil. Therefore, no one thinks right of God but a believer. And therefore he says, "With the saints you are holy." Saul and his crowd considered you a heretic, a rebel; but with me you were holy, all your works I considered holy.

And with the pious you are pious.

59 There is no change in thee. But among the corrupt there is nothing so corrupt as you; nothing stinks worse than you. This is seen most of all in the word. Our word is a divine power, and yet they think there is no greater stink. That is why the most pious opinions of God are among the saints, but the most corrupt and perverse among them. This is not the fault of the word, but of the corrupt people.

V. 27. And with the pure you are pure.

60. Those who have pure eyes see that you are also pure. This is seen very well in the word, for without the word God cannot be known. The word is therefore holy, good and completely pure. This we see; but with them it is a vermin.

And Lei the wrong you are wrong.

(61) As they are perverse, so are you perverse. But they are perverse, therefore they also make you perverse. You are not holy to them, but unholy; not without change, but corrupt; not clean, but unclean; for they are unholy, corrupt and unclean, for such are their thoughts. This also happens in temptation, that we must be contrary to our Lord God. So the papists call me a perverse man, not that I am to blame, but the fault lies in the fact that I am a perverse man.

in them, because they are perverse. For the text says, "With the perverse you are perverse." God is not perverted where they would not be perverted themselves. But as they are, so he must go.

v. 28. For you help the wretched people.

(62) Those who must be unholy, perverse and unclean with you are the people you are helping.

And you lower the high eyes.

This is the reason why they are unholy and perverse, because they think much of themselves; this is the cause of all heresies. The wise man says [Sir. 10, 14]: "That is where all hope comes from, when a man falls away from GOD." And Augustine says: ambition is a mother of all heresies. Thus Zwingli and users bring a new doctrine to the people, because they wanted to be above us. They have learned the right doctrine from us; therefore they should have listened to us. But they do not, nor do we demand it. We would like to have them walk beside us, preach and teach; but they do not, they would like to be the foremost. It is a dangerous thing to keep hope in spiritual things. We should only learn from this, that we seek the help of our Lord God, and give God the glory, and say: Lord, even though I know the whole Scripture, a challenge can soon overtake me, so that I cannot know a word or a saying from the Scripture, as has often happened to me. But they do not.

v. 29. For you illuminate my lamp; the LORD my God makes my darkness light.

64. This is spoken according to the Hebrew way. The light among the people is the king, for he is ordained by God's word, and God Himself rules through the kings, and when the kings perform their office, those who obey them obey God Himself. Thus a householder is also the lamp in his house. That is why he says: I was all gone out in Saul's day; but now thou hast shined my lamp, thy word is risen up, and men may judge themselves by it. Now my kingdom shines again. And until now he has said of Saul, in whom he had his first and most cruel enemy.

v. 30. For with you I can crush warriors.

65. 1) Gedud (XXX) means a man of war, from Gad (XX), a man who is armed. But it can be taken here in the nominative as well as in the accusative: I will run toward as one armed; or, I will smite the armed. For now he cometh to foreign wars. For after Saul he had wars with Ammon, with both Syria, Mesopotamia, and Ceylon] 2) [2 Sam. 8 and 10], item, with the Philistines. Of these he says that he overcame them with God, not with his sword, nor with his strength or wisdom. As if to say, The others are armed, these with chariots, those with horses [Ps. 20, 8.], and rely on their piles and armor; but I am not armed, nor do I rely on my armor, but trust in thee, against those who have thee not. So now the Turk, the Pope, and the enemies of the gospel are armed, but we are poor men. And yet the Psalm says that they shall be crushed by us with God.

And jump over the walls with my GOTT.

66) In my God I overthrow all the walls that are in Philistia, the Syrians and the Ammonites, that is, I have overcome nations, and taken cities, I have won land and people. It can be XXXX by shifting the letters also XXXX, 3) that is: I straighten on my paniers on the wall.

v. 31. God's ways are without change.

How does this serve the cause? Answer: He sets his God against all other gods. I boast of great victories. Were they so without all the gods that you overcame? Did they not also have their gods? As Rabshakeh says in Isaiah Cap. 36, 19: "Where is the god Arpad?" Therefore he answers, "They also have their gods, but I..."

1) Original note: "On June 13."

2) In Latin: Oaeles. Walch: Zoda. Cöleshria is the land between the lüdunus and the lidanus.

3) Thus set by us; in Latin it is: botest per metrUkesiu esse iä est etc..

but have another God. My God is the true God, but those rely on gods that are nothing. Their gods have only to help with temporal things, as the Philistine god is called Dagon, that is, grain. These are unclean gods, who do not help those who trust in them; but my God has ways without change, his worship, religion and godly nature is righteous; his speeches are purified with fire. I have a God whose religion and word is righteous; therefore I can do it, which I boast.

The speeches of the Lord are purified.

He rules us by the word, we have his speech completely pure, there is no lack, no fault not in him.

He is a shield to all who trust in Him.

This can be applied to God and to the word, but I prefer to understand it from the word, that it is a praise of the word, as in the Proverbs of Solomon, Cap. 30, 5: "All the words of God are purified, and are a shield to those who trust in Him," that is, [the word of God] is pure and certain, has no addition, one may boldly rely on it that it is pure. So it is also a shield, therefore we go forth to battle. You are mightier with your chariots and horses; but we, in the name of the Lord our God, are armed with the word, which is a shield. It is faithful, not mixed, not counterfeit. And with this shield David also slew Goliath. So now we have some armor, namely, the word and promises of God, which the other nations do not have. So he now confesses that his victories were not his, but God's.

V. 32. For where is there a God without the Lord?

(70) Now here he sits down against the gods of the others: Tell me, says he, where is such a god among your gods? There is no other god but this one, whom we serve here in the temple. This is an affirmation of the previous verse. No saint in the world trusts in his GOt. Thus, the nobles in the peasants' revolt were the very most fearful, for such was their God. Again, they are now the most hopeful.

Or a Hott, without our God?

Here is a clear contrast. Our God is Zur (in), a stronghold, on which one can defy; the other gods are wood and larvae. Thus, the Papists' god is Mammon. Hserzogs Gseorg] is the bishops' god, and their supreme god is the emperor, who shall do it. This means, then, to trust in men, and to have no God.

V. 33. God equips me with power (apud).

72 Virtute belli [with power to war, that is, with warriors; as we say in German: Der Türke ist mit eitel großen Macht vor Wien gelegen, that is, with a large army. But it is a figurative speech. For God girds the kings with a girdle, that is, that they may have a bound people about them. For the girdle signifies the obedience of the people. But then GOd punishes the kings when he dissolves the belt, that is, arouses sedition and discord, as now in Germany. So now he says here: I have had my people fine around me, which our LORD GOt gave. It is not in our power to keep the subjects in their duty, force and wisdom are not able to do this; God must give the heart, and must thus interlock it, and in the end still give the victory to it.

And make my ways without change.

He always boasts that God has kept him from defiling his ways, for he has never shed blood wantonly, but what he has done, he has done on his own authority. He secretly stabs all the other warriors who wage wars out of spite and are bloodthirsty people. But that he wages war, he does so because God has commanded him; for this has been his way without change. As Abigail says to him [1 Sam. 25, 28]: "You wage wars against the Lord.

V. 34. He makes my feet like the deer.

A deer runs over mountains and valleys, therefore he compares his success in war to the course of the deer. As if he wanted to say: It went quickly from my hand, it was the work of our Lord God, who gave me such quick victories.

And place me on my height.

The deer run on the heights of the mountains; so I ran on my mountains, that is, nations. I ran over the cities, over the great Hanses and mighty ones, like a deer.

v. 35. He teaches my hand to fight.

Is a repetition. He teaches me how to get, he guides my hand. With this he confesses his inability, and God's power. Our Lord God, he says, wields the sword.

And teach my arm to draw a bow of brass.

V. 36. and give me the shield of your salvation.

77) "The poor" are the king's captains, as in Daniel, Cap. 11, 15: "The midday poor will not be able to resist," that is, the princes of Egypt.

And your right hand strengthens me.

He confesses that he was often tired, but God always helped him up.

And when you humble me, you make me great.

(79) Thou hast put me in many troubles, as with Absalom (for here he passes over to the wars within); thou hast afflicted me greatly; but I] am grown up thereby. One must notice that our Lord God makes one small before he makes him great. David says that he also experienced this: You let me see a little bit through Absalom, and you humbled me. But it turned out this way, that you made me great. For afterward Judah and Israel would tear each other apart for him, each wanting to have all of him.

v. 37. You make room for me to walk underneath.

80. 1) I have said that in the previous verse he came from the foreign wars to the civil wars with Absalom. As if he wanted to say here: At that time, when Abfa

II Note of the original: "The 26th of June. For meanwhile he wrote the 118th Psalm, Oovüteinini. 1530." This note ("meanwhile," that is, from June 13 Is65] to June 26) gives the reason for the long interruption.

lom, my ways seemed and were narrow. My best counselors had fallen away from me and followed Absalom, so that I had nowhere to go; but you made room for me, that is, you preserved me in my kingdom.

That my ankles do not slide.

81. That the administration of my kingdom (which is my running and my walking) may not waver, go mad, or fall over a heap.

v. 38. I will chase after my enemies.

All this is still to be understood of the civil wars, of the people of the Jews and the kingdom of Israel.

And seize them.

83 This happened in the forest of Ephraim, where Absalom was killed [2 Sam. 18:6, 9].

And not turn back until I kill them.

84. He presses on that Israel had to fall at his feet and say: "You are our bones and our flesh" [2 Sam. 5, 1. Vulg.].

v. 39, 40: I will smite them, and they shall not withstand me; they shall fall under my feet. You can arm me with strength for battle; you can throw under me those who oppose me.

85. that is, the rebels, as Seba and Amasa 2) [2 Sam. 20, 1. 5].

v. 41. You put my enemies to flight, that I may destroy my haters.

86. You disturb my haters. But this he says of his citizens; for this is the gratitude of the world, which it has and repays good kings.

v. 42. They call, but there is no helper; to the Lord, but he does not answer them.

Here you see that he speaks of those who had the same God with him. But the Lord, he says, does not recognize them for his people.

2) In Latin: 6t ^dsla; in the old translation: "and Abele". Now ^bela (Abel 2 Sam. 20, 14. 18.) is not the name of a person, but of a city, therefore, if one wanted to keep the reading Hzsla, it should be read in. But it seems to us that a personal name is required.

V. 43. I will crush them like dust before the wind.

For God is not on their side.

I want to clean them up, like the dung in the alley.

(89) Those who wanted to be the foundation and the precious stones of the earth, I have brought them to lie there like dung on the gaff, in the highest shame. For the Jewish people have been very wicked, and have overtaken the promises which they had.

90 Until now he has spoken of civil wars; now he comes to another challenge, namely, the enmity of his people and daily friends. So now bad boys plague our prince. The nobility, and what little there is of it, 1) attends the pious princes where they can. So it must go with all pious princes; for they must anger their many, since they guard many.

V. 44. You help me from the quarreling people.

91 By this he means the enemies within, the rebellious among the people and the wicked who evade obedience with all cunning. They have always been a rebellious people.

And make me a head among the heathen.

92. you have not only saved me from the rebellion of my own, but you have also made me the head 2c. You have extended my principality, and have brought to my kingdom the Syrians, the Palestinians, 2) the Ammonites, the Moabites, and the Judeans.

A people I did not know serve me.

To serve" means to be subject, according to the Hebrew way of speaking. As if to say, "The promise extended to the land of Canaan alone, but now you have added so many other peoples.

V. 45. It obeys me with obedient ears.

94 That is, it is obedient to me: the strangers are much more obedient to me than my own

People. That is a pretty praise of his people. That is how it is for our prince now; he shall have more favorable and loyal people in H[archduke] Gseorg's country than in his.

The foreign children have missed it against me.

That is, they are not obedient to me, they will not be subject to me. It is a Hebrew way of speaking, that he calls them "strange children"; as if he wanted to say: They are children of the kingdom; but they place themselves, on my soul, like strangers. This is how it happened in all the promises: The Jews should have remained in the Church, but they fall out; the Gentiles should have remained out, and come in. So the Sacramentarians should have the word, but they have lost it. Again, there are many of them in the places of worship, where the authorities persecute the word, who nevertheless have the word.

V. 46. The foreign children pine away.

They are hardened and hardened. So also no worse people than Christians become when they fall. This is also what happened to the devil, who became so evil because he was such a great creature before. So the Sacramentarians, they are much more evil and poisonous than the Papists.

And wriggle in their bonds.

97. It is the same word as above [Ps. 17:10], "Their fat ones hold together." Thus these two follow one another: that they become stale, that is, hardened; after that they cleave one to another, as the toads in the lenzen in the water. For this he blames them, both that they are not to be reformed, and that they rot, that they may do harm. In sum, they do not honor the authorities. "Claudicant is said in the Hebrew way, and means not to walk right, to pretend on the outside that one is walking right, when in fact it is not true.

These dangers of David can be drawn either to a secret interpretation or to an example. On the interpretation of Christ they can be directed like this: Christ had these four enemies: The first one was Saul.

1) Thus the old translation: "geheiet" -vexirt; in the original:
2) "Palestinians" are often called the Philistines.

3) In the original: shall.

That is, the law; for Saul had much works righteousness. The law did not want to grant Christ the kingdom, it wanted to leave him in his prison; but Christ overcame it. The other enemy, Goliath or the Gentiles, is sin, which Christ also overcame. The third, Absalom, is death. The fourth is the world; for sin and wickedness abide in the world, and murmur against it, but work nothing out.

But in the example of the church, this history can be interpreted like this: David had to wage the first war against Saul, that is, against the Jews, over the righteousness of the works. The second war he had with the pagans and the wise men of the world, because against this doctrine reason sets itself. The third is the civil war, which is the dispute with the heretics. The fourth is the war against the unruly and the limping, that is, "the strange children," the false brethren, who, though they do no heresy, yet only corrupt it.

We also have these enemies. First, Saul, that is, the papists. Second, the pagans, that is, the nobles. Thirdly, there are the mobs. The fourth are the peasants among us, who do not want to do anything for the gospel, but let it go on like this. Thus this psalm is an example for all people in all kinds of distress.

V. 47. The Lord lives, and blessed be my refuge.

They will not kill him. For here he gives thanks.

And the God of my salvation must be exalted.

Let him be exalted who proves that he lives by protecting and saving me. "The God of salvation is the one who has given me victory.

V. 48, 49: The God who gives me vengeance and forces the nations under me. Who delivers me from mine enemies, and lifteth me up from them that set themselves against me.

Here he begins the resolution and repeats the four kinds of enemies one after the other, as he has dealt with them above.

You help me from the wicked.

104 Of the poisonous people.

Therefore will I give thee thanks, O LORD, among the nations, and sing praise unto thy name. Who hath shewed great salvation unto his king, and his anointed, David, and his seed for ever.

My descendants shall sing this psalm, that the LORD will show me great salvation. He gives great victory and salvation.

The nineteenth Psalm.

1. 1) This psalm is about the gospel being spread throughout the world. In the past it was interpreted in various ways, one in this way and another in another. But this is the content, that the gospel is made known before our eyes, wherever there is heaven, day, night, speech, earth and the end of the world, that the gospel has gone as far as heaven and earth, and is not preached in a corner, but, as Paul says Col. 1, 23, before the whole creature, and Christ [Marc. 16, 15.]: "Go and preach the gospel to every creature", which is to fill the whole world.

V. 2. The heavens tell the glory of God.

2 This is a synecdoche, as if I said: Nuremberg has the Gospel, Erfurt the Decree, Wittenberg the Epistles of Paul; that is, the people who are at Nuremberg [Erfurt and Wittenberg]. So here: "The heavens tell," that is, those who dwell under heaven. Under the whole heaven, where people are, there one hears the gospel preaching.

1) Note from the original: "Den 27. Juni."

The word Saphar (XXX) in Hebrew means to preach, to tell and speak publicly. The heavens are preachers.

(3) Furthermore, this verse is a very beautiful description of what the gospel is, since it says that the heavens tell the glory of God. For the gospel is nothing else but the glory of God; for in the gospel it is not our merits and works that are preached, but our sins and our corrupt nature and shame. Thus Christ says John 16:8, "The Holy Spirit will punish the world for sin." For it nullifies the glory of the world, and says that we have been saved and redeemed through the blood of Christ alone. I have always been pleased with this verse, for the sake of this description of the gospel. Paul also says, "To the praise of His glorious grace," Eph. 1:12. Likewise, v. 14, it is called a gospel of the glory of Christ, not of free will; for it rejects all the works of men, and praises God alone.

And the feast proclaims the work of his hands.

4. the works of his hands, not of men, whose works it condemns. "Firm" means where heaven is, or all heaven. Another heaven is at Jerusalem, another at Nom. Now both that one and this one are in the firmament. And so Moses uses the word "firmament" almost everywhere. So now David says: What only sees stars, that becomes aware of the Evangelii.

v. 3: One day tells another, and one night makes known to another.

5 As he says in the first verse, not only in the Jewish land and in Jerusalem, so also here: The gospel is not preached on the Sabbath alone, as if it were bound to it, but all days, from day to day, one day at a time. The sayings and promises (for that is what it actually means) are preached every day, and not, as in the Old Testament, only on the Sabbath. The gospel will fall on all oerters and times, it will fill all oerters and times. This must be a great and glorious sermon. But that he calls the morning and the evening "day" and "night" is a Hebrew way of speaking; for at that time one used to pray. But just as

Time and place are understood in general everywhere, so also the persons are understood in general by all people.

v. 4. There is no speech nor language, since their voice is not heard.

6. in all languages the gospel will be preached, not in one alone.

Your voice.

7. that is, the sky (coelorum). Among the words "language" and "speech", I make no particular distinction, although the one reads as if it were to be understood from various dialects in one language. One should preach the Gospel in German, Saxon, Bavarian, Swabian 2c.

v. 5 Their line goes out to all the earth, and their speech to the end of the world.

Here he interprets himself. Kav (XXX) denotes a guideline or a yardstick, according to which one builds. In the Scriptures, however, God's word is called a guideline, as in Amos [Cap. 7, 8. Zech. 1, 16.]: He has drawn his guideline over Jerusalem, and his lead line over Zion. For the word is an instrument of the divine building, and is also a certain rule, which is not changed nor changed by the statutes of men.

He has made a hut for the sun in the same.

(9) This verse has been interpreted by magister sententiarum [Peter Lombards] as if Christ had placed his tabernacle, that is, his body, in the sun, that is, in this life, because he was burned by our temptations. But there is another opinion, namely, that God Himself made a tabernacle for the sun. So it is said, namely, that Christ dwells in those heavens, or in those who proclaim God's glory. For he speaks of the spiritual sun; Christ is this sun, who is set where the word goes, so that nowhere else may he be sought; as he himself says Matth. 18, 20: "Where two of them are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." Item, Matth. 10, 20.: "It is not you who speak." For he also did not send his apostles in such a way that he himself did not speak against them.

But he is present when the apostles proclaim the word, confirming them with his spirit and the teaching with subsequent signs.

V. 6 And the same goes out like a bridegroom from his chamber.

10. is a description of the Lord Christ by a secret interpretation or similitude. Just as the sun rises from going out to going down (for this is what Scripture [v. 7] calls "the end of heaven"), so also the sun of righteousness, Christ, rises and comes forth as a bridegroom. But of a bridegroom the Scripture speaks when it says of joy and adornment. Therefore it is said of the "voice of the bridegroom and the bride". Likewise it is said Isa. 49:18, "I have adorned thee as a bride." It is a glorious thing. Thus Christ is most beautifully adorned, and has the greatest love for His church, and adorns it, but in secret. This verse has been interpreted of the Virgin Mary, but wrongly. For Christ began to go forth through the gospel in the time of the apostles, and continued unto the end of the world, as he himself saith [Matt. 28:20], "I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." And this rhymes, also according to the words, finely with the course of the sun. For when it rises, it is seen in its entirety, without any clouds; but when it comes to the middle of the sky, it is at times covered by the clouds (Christ also suffers this at the hands of the heretics), but still it breaks through when it sets. So Christ is the bridegroom who illuminates the earth from the beginning, or until the end of the world. Now he says that he is also merry for it.

And rejoices like a hero to run the way.

V. 7: It rises at one end of heaven and returns to the same end.

That is, Christ gladly proclaims the gospel and is ready to save people: He burns with love to spread the word. Thus we see how he strengthened his martyrs, so that they also easily endured death for the sake of his word. He runs confidently with the word, like the sun.

And nothing remains hidden from their heat.

That is, Christ is everywhere, filling everything in length, breadth, and depth, everywhere kindling his word, and nurturing and caring for his Christians. This is a great comfort, that now and then, in death, in hell and in Turkey, he can warm, kindle and comfort people by his word. And this text of the proclaimed word, in which Christ is, goes against the red spirits, who want to have the Holy Spirit without the word. No, there is nothing; it must be before: "The heavens proclaim," after which Christ is also there. If Christ is there, he also runs and gives heat and warmth.

V. 8. The law of the Lord is without change.

(13) The preceding words show that what follows is also to be understood of the spreading of the gospel. But it is said by way of comparison, as if David wanted to say, Moses also had a law; but this is a different law, namely, without change and righteous 2c. For this piece is a price of the gospel. Now the first thing is that it is a law without change. But the law of Moses is not without blemish, as is said in the epistle to the Hebrews [Eph 7:18, 19], not because of its fault, but because of its effect. It cannot help people to be without change; it cannot bring them to perfection, as the gospel does.

And refreshes the soul.

14 All this is said against the law of Moses. First of all, it is not without change, for it cannot make perfect people; it remains corrupt throughout. Secondly, it did not refresh souls, nor did it help them from their affliction, but rather tormented them. But the gospel makes them perfect and restores them, so that one can get rid of the heavy conscience and thoughts. Thus it changes a man, and first of all makes him approved (δόκιμον [Jac. 1, 12.]), and secondly it makes the heart free from heavy thoughts.

The testimony of the Lord is certain.

15 Third, it is also faithful and certain. But these things he says against the law and against the Teachers of the law; as he also said above Ps. 5, 10: "In their mouth there is nothing certain. It always remains uncertain that one does not know how he is with our Lord God. Just as the monks, with so many works, always walk along in doubt and uncertainty. But here one knows where he should stay, namely with Christ, there one is sure and certain.

And make the foolish wise.

This is a great glory of the gospel. The saints of works, the monks 2c. also cannot judge rightly of one state, therefore they condemn marriage, the authorities 2c. because they are unwise; but the gospel teaches right thoughts of all things.

17. "The foolish" can be understood in two ways; either as making wise those who have no wisdom; or as a rebuke, because wisdom finds entrance only in the humble, making fools of the rest.

V. 9. The commands of the Lord are right.

18. The fifth is also fine. In the law and in the works of men are crookedness and crookedness, as John the Baptist says [Luc. 3:5], "That which is crooked shall be made right." Here one seeks a way and there a way, there one learns forever, and never comes to the knowledge of the truth [2 Tim. 3:7]. But here it goes right, it is a fine, funny, righteous teaching, since one comes from it. This also makes people happy, as he adds; for it is a short way.

And delight the heart.

19. it [this teaching] rejoices the consciences, gives peace before God.

The commandments of the Lord are louder.

20 These are the very finest words. It is also a pure doctrine, because there is neither falsehood nor hypocrisy in it, but it is pure, as Peter says [1 Ep. 2:2]: "Be eager for the pure milk." This word is not only called pure, but also exquisite, which is most pure, not tainted with any of the ordinances of men, as it is also called the pure, clean gospel.

And enlighten the eyes.

(21) When the law is pure, the eyes also see more clearly. Thus he indicates that the gospel makes men of understanding, who can speak of all classes, discern between spirits, and judge rightly of all things; these are called enlightened hearts.

V. 10. The fear of the Lord is pure.

22 Here he calls the gospel a service of God. But the word which he has placed above, "pure", in Hebrew bar (12), means choice, pure, righteous, pure, unadulterated, unmixed. But the word which is here means fine, beautiful, and pure; as we say, a clean work. So also here. It is a pure service of God, therefore, it is not a false humming work and a marred work, as in the law.

And abides forever.

23) It is not beautiful evil, 1) as it is said in Proverbs. In the law it happened soon that one here, one there a piece broke; this service however remains.

The rights (judicia) of the Lord are true.

Judicia means "rights" by which one governs and lives. As if to say: This is a righteous thing, there is no hypocrisy here; it is not the appearance, it is the reason, it gives what it should give, what the law does not do.

All fair.

(25) There is none among them that does not justify and cleanse from sins forever, as Paul says in the Epistle to the Ephesians, Cap. 4, 15: Crescamus ἀληθεύοντες, let us always grow so that we become righteous. This "becoming righteous" also makes us righteous all the way.

V. 11. They are more precious than gold, and much fine gold.

26 He now concludes with this. For all these things, saith he, I uphold the gospel; for they are the twelve fruits of the tree of the

1) In the original: "sedon döse"; in the German editions: "schönböse. Cf. Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. VIII, 1896.

Life in the Revelation of John [Cap. 22, 2]. Gold is made of three kinds: toU0 gold, common gold, like Rhenish, and fine gold, like Hungarian. But here he touches the highest covetousness in man; for in the world nothing is loved more than gold, and the desire for gold has always been exceedingly great. One seeks gold when one already has wife, child, house and farm. That is why Christ also calls Mammon a god. Nevertheless he says: "Mammon is not so dear as your law, but it is in the hearts of the faithful.

They are sweeter than honey and honeysuckle.

27: "My preaching is sweeter than honey," says Wisdom in Sirach Cap. 24, 27. 24, 27. So now he says: There is nothing sweeter on earth than the gospel and the commandments of God. In this psalm, Muenzer had many speculations, but all only from the spirit, against the outward word, and accused us of not having the word, because he did not see in us the fruits that are here. But this is not said. The gospel is not therefore wrong if I am weak in my life, nor does it follow that I do not have the gospel because I am weak.

V. 12. Also, your servant is reminded by them.

Who are those who have such fruit? I also see little of them. They are called "thy servant," they that submit themselves unto thee, they that serve thee, they that let thee remain master. But it is a contrast, as if he wanted to say: The others, who condemn the gospel, become quite mad and foolish; but your servant becomes witty through it, is preserved and kept in all temptations by this word. As Paul says 2 Cor. 4:7, "We bear this treasure in earthly vessels." Therefore, he who has the word is preserved, he is not deceived.

And he who has them has great reward.

(29) Many good things come of it; for the uses of the gospel are innumerable, for it ministers to all things. Nothing, neither good nor evil, can happen to you that does not be useful if you have the word of God. "Great reward" (multa), he says, you can't say it. For above 13 ff] he has said about the twelve fruits that concern the conscience, but about the same it can be used for all things.

1) In the original: "doll".

V. 13: Who can tell how often he misses? Forgive me the hidden faults.

(30) With this he also touches the danger that the devil will also attach himself to it. Miss," he says, "there lies a devil that leads one away. I know that the Word's way is to preserve us; but there are many sins hidden in me for which I have to fear. We must not think ourselves secure in ourselves, even when we have the Word. For the instinct of the flesh is sometimes such that one thinks it is the Holy Spirit. Therefore he asks that our Lord God keep him in this. As Paul also admonishes, 1 Cor. 10, 12: "Whoever lets himself think that he is standing, may well see that he does not fall. Now these are the cunning deceptions, that no one can see and know his heart. Our heart is our daily domestic enemy, and an exceedingly great enemy. Therefore he says: Make me innocent of my hidden faults. Every one that hath the gospel becometh sure: so the spirit waxeth dull by degrees, and faith faileth; and there is no watchfulness to cut off the remnant of sins. But it is good that we know that the righteous are still sinners. To be in sins is dangerous, not to be in them is also dangerous. Therefore let us pray, as the prophet does here, against the remaining sins that creep up on us, that God will not impute them to us, for we will never be clean. Thus, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, Cap. 12, 1. sin is called a burden that surrounds us, a sticky sin, and a burden that drags us down and stubbornly clings to us.

V. 14. Keep also thy servant from the proud, that they rule not over me.

(31) Before, he pleaded against the hidden wickedness; here, he pleads against the open wickedness. In this the devil also behaves in many ways. Therefore, here is a clear

Text that every teacher is proud outside the gospel. One has enough to do for himself, that he may remain without presumption. Then the heretics come and make their remaining sin alive; there the devil finds the bath ready. Therefore he says, "Protect me from those who seek their own glory under the appearance of the glory of Christ, as the papists are doing today. But he says: "Keep"; as if he wanted to say: I can think, I will not remain unchallenged. But, dear Lord God, forbid that they grow over my head, that they do not win, and that they do not seduce me to their glory, then there is no need.

So I will be without change.

(32) Namely, if I thus remain from the inward and outward pursuits of sin and error, then I shall be without change.

And remain innocent of great wrongdoing.

The word nab means great and much. I will then be absolved before God and be held as an innocent man. Therefore, he who will not abide in Christ falls into vile, abominable vices, arrogance, lies, pride, blasphemy 2c. And this he calls a very great iniquity. As if he wanted to say: Otherwise there is no measure of transgression, otherwise it is a transgression and a misdemeanor.

that over the other. But I will be perfect, if you will give me your grace and the gift of the Holy Spirit. If we are such people, then we can also preach rightly, as he says:

V. 15. Let the speech of my mouth be pleasing to you.

What I then preach and teach will be delicious. As it is written in the Gospel [Acts 1:1], "He began to do and to teach." So also Jeremiah boasts of his preaching.

And the conversation of my heart before you.

35. hagh (XXX) is the word that is written in the first Psalm, v. 2. What I will speak then will be pleasing to you.

Lord, my refuge.

For upon him he was founded through the word, and became a new man.

And my Savior.

Thou hast delivered me from the outward and inward pursuits of sin, of error, of the flesh, and of the devil. So this psalm is about the gospel that went out into the world, and about its fruits and benefits, and also about its dangers. There is nothing forgotten in it that can be said of the gospel.

The twentieth Psalm.

1. 1) This is a clear text for the authorities, and this is an excellent passage to confirm this status, namely the authorities, because it contains their rightful praise. First, that it is pleasing to God; second, that it is protected by God; third, that one is obligated to pray for it; fourth, that its position is an exceedingly arduous one. For she is in many tribulations. The cause of this is that she has the most powerful enemy, namely the devil, who cannot bear that there should be peace,

1) Note of the original: "1-July".

for he is a murderer, Joh. 8, 44. Where he can, he causes bloodshed; so it goes over the pious king. But it is a great grace that the authorities can be sure that they serve God more than any Carthusian monk, because the other people enjoy the peace that they, the authorities, provide. But she herself, who provides peace, does not enjoy it. This work of the authorities emulates the Godhead, so to speak, because it provides peace for others, which it does not have itself.

V. 2. May the Lord hear you in your distress.

2 First of all, he says that the authorities are in trouble and have tribulations, but at the same time he teaches where to look for help and how God uses to help. Pray, he says; therefore, put away all human suggestions. For every authority that is pious has the devil so strongly against it that all its counsels are swallowed up and destroyed. Therefore he says, "The Lord hear thee." It is a matter of prayer, you have an office that will not be governed by human counsel; as ours, who are now at Augsburg, also complain about this.

The name of the God of Jacob protect you.

This is our armor and our weapons. "The name of the Lord is a strong lock" [Prov. 18, 10]. This, then, is the description of the help and victory of kings, namely, this is the name of the LORD. But how does one get it? Through prayer. Therefore it is necessary that one with a humble heart forsake his own attempts and trust in the name of the Lord alone. For wherever the name of the Lord is written in the Scriptures, faith is required.

The name of the God of Jacob.

4 With this he indicates a certain place, so that not everyone is free to speculate and write about God as he pleases; for he has called himself "The God of Jacob. This, however, is not to be understood merely as a teaching, but it is also a prayer of the church, and thus both are connected to each other, teaching and praying, so that one teaches and prays at the same time.

V. 3. He sends you help from the holy place.

Here he now interprets how God's name helps. By bow and sword? No: "He sends help from the holy place", from the place in which he dwells, namely, in a hidden way. As if he wanted to say: God will send you help in a way, at a time and through persons who are unknown to you, and whom you alone have to believe: that I have so freely presented the matter to our Lord God that I do not insist on the landgrave, on my lord, and on the king.

neither, and nevertheless I am not afraid of those either. For he 1) can find a person, a little hour, a way, which soon does it unawares. He can take away the emperor's heart with a word that my gracious lord speaks. "From the sanctuary," that is, from him, from himself, where he dwells, that is, incomprehensibly. One cannot understand him there in the temple, except that he said he wanted to be there. So one must believe invisible things. Our junior 2) would have liked that the description of faith Hebr. 11, 1. should be: of the things that are seen But it must be so, that we do not know where off or where on.

V. 4. He remembers all your grain offerings.

He does not only ask for help, but also that he would promote everything, works, words and suggestions. "Sacrifice" means the best works. "He remembereth" 2c., that is, you must please him in all your works, that you be not in sins. He pardon thee, he incline thee, that thou mayest remember and believe that he is favorable unto thee, and that thy sacrifice is acceptable unto him. In those days they sacrificed cattle, but now, in the time of the gospel, we have other sacrifices, namely, an anxious spirit and thank offerings, Ps. 50:23, 51:19. We have other sacrifices now, namely a sorrowful spirit and an offering of thanksgiving, Ps. 50:23, 51:19, that He may be pleased with us when we are in a sorrowful spirit, weeping and wailing; that He may give us such a mind that we may believe that such is pleasing to God, and know by the testimony of the Holy Spirit that He takes care of us, and remembers such of our tears that we may boast: I know that such a sacrifice is pleasing to you. Now these are the sacrifices of Christians.

And your burnt offering must be fat.

7 This is spoken after the manner of Hebrews. "Fat," that is, lovely, pleasant. So also: The fat ones in Israel, that is, those who are well off, rich and respected. So he asks here that it not be a foolish, meager, unwilling sacrifice, since not a drop of fat flows from it.

1) In the original: "it".

2) "Our Junker", that is Melanchthon. Cf. Köstlin, Martin Luther, Vol. II, p. 657 uä p. 225, 2).

8 You see that the prophet has used a very beautiful arrangement here. First of all, he asks the Lord to be merciful to him, to give him forgiveness of sins and the Holy Spirit, so that he will be protected against sin and will not have an evil conscience. In sum, God wants to make him a theologian. Now he will also make him a lawyer.

V. 5: He will give you whatever your heart desires.

If God is reconciled, and we believe this, then everything that we only think about or consider will happen, if one only says: Dear Lord, you rule, you give happiness to it. Therefore it is also indicated herewith that all attempts are in vain and of no value if presumption is added to them. So now our adversaries do nothing with fear, and do not give God so much honor that they say, "Lord, if this is not pleasing to you, you hinder it; [but] badly defined, they do not even ask our Lord God whether he also wants it or not. But when a man asks God, as David does here, and says, "If it pleases you, O Lord, do it," it is not a human request, but of the Holy Spirit, who prepares the heart so that it can ask with humility. For thus it is said, "The Lord doeth what the godly desire" [Ps. 145:19]. If a prince says: Lord God, I want to get, I want to change this 2c., if you like it, help.

And fulfill all your stops.

10. that it may go abundantly, as thou hast posted it.

V. 6. We boast that you help us.

(11) When God hears those who call upon Him, there is no need for us to be triumphant and rejoice, for it is said, "Thine is the help. If help were with us, the devil would cheat us.

And in the name of our God, we throw up paniers.

12. degel (XXX) means an ensign, a panier; dagal (XXX), an ensign, a panier.

1) definit - established, decided.

raise. From this it is clear that he speaks and prays for the king who is preparing for war, and I believe that David made this psalm so that his people would pray it as often as he went out to battle.

May the Lord grant you all your requests.

He asked in good order: Firstly for religion, secondly for the world regiment, and finally for the king's nobles.

V. 7. Now I realize that the Lord helps His anointed.

(14) Hitherto he has taught and exhorted with his prayer; now he adds the promises. When a king stands thus, he says, God necessarily helps him; for a prince or regent can do nothing more. If he has his sacrifices, of which I have said [§ 6], and likewise, if he takes diligent care of his outward regiment, and calls upon God, he therefore goes under the banner of the Lord. Then it follows that the Lord helps him. But there is an emphasis on the word "HErr"; as if he wanted to say: He does not help himself. Methinks that the Psalm was David's guide to all his victories; it will have been his guns and armor. And indeed, if it were done after him, you should see that the Psalm should also confidently strike among the Turks.

And hear him, in his holy heaven.

(15) Before he said he was in Zion; here he says, "in heaven," and makes a great Lord of him; for he speaks of heaven in the plural, that is, of the whole heaven, so that even the enemies' heaven must be under our God's heaven.

His right hand helps tremendously.

016 He comforteth himself against all his enemies, saying, If he help, it is a mighty help. Now he will fight against his adversaries, he will laugh at them and mock them. He makes them so low, they could not be lower.

V. 8. Those rely on chariots and horses.

17 He confesses that they have chariots and horses, that they are too mighty for us. But what

Are the chariots and the grates against Him who is called the LORD in heaven? What is all this without God? So he diminishes all these things by holding them against God. What is the Turk? What does he have more than a spear and a horse? What is his power more than horse and chariot? If, on the other hand, we have the Lord on our side, we will win the victory without difficulty.

But we remember the name of the Lord our God.

18 We praise the name of the Lord, and there we go. These are two adventurous armies against each other. Here is nothing at all according to the appearance of the world; there also is nothing at all according to the eyes of God. But because the name of the Lord remains, we want to be on top; as he now adds and says what the outcome will be.

v. 9. They have fallen down and fallen, but we stand upright.

They are proud and fall down. But who does this? The name of the Lord. We who are overthrown come up again; but they stand and are overthrown and beaten to the ground. This is a comforting promise for us, but also a prophecy against the enemies.

v. 10. Help, Lord.

This is the resolution: O dear Lord, help now and always, if we may.

May the King hear us when we call.

21 Here a change of person takes place, and it is a prayer for future victory. You have helped us so far, help us further, you are the right king 2c. It is a glorious psalm from the authorities and for the authorities.

The twenty-first Psalm.

(1) The Jews understand this psalm par excellence of the king, as if it were a song of joy at the victories of which he spoke in the previous psalms; but it seems to me to be too strong for that. I think it is to be understood of the Lord Christ as he was raised from the dead and transfigured with glory. It is a very light psalm, since Christ is already reigning.

v. 2. Lord, the king rejoices in your power.

(2) First of all, he praises this, that God raised Christ from the dead and made him king by divine power. This is a great promise, that we have a king who, having conquered death, now reigns in joy and rules against sin, hell and the devil.

And how very happy he is about your help.

3. "Above your help," that is, above your victory, which you gave him in the resurrection.

v. 3. You give him his heart's desire, and do not refuse what his mouth asks.

4 All this is said of Christ. "He asked in the days of his flesh and was heard because he honored God", Hebr. 5, 7. But he asked for the transfiguration and resurrection from death.

v. 4. for you shower (praevenisti) him with good blessings.

5. praevenisti, that is, you have showered him, because XXX means much do (privatere). But here he indicates continually, though darkly, that Christ suffered and was crucified. For because he says that he was showered with blessings, he also indicates the contradiction, namely, that he was showered with curses before, as he is called by the prophet [Ps. 22, 7]: "a contempt of the people". The same is indicated by: "his heart's desire" [v. 3.]. So that in the first verse [v. 2.] he said that he rejoices in the power of GOD, so that he indicates that he felt pain in his weakness and suffering; God even made everything different with him. Therefore, he speaks clearly of his glory, but the suffering he shows only darkly, only through the contrast.

And put a golden crown on his head.

6 That is, you have given him a kingdom after he is saved from his suffering, shame and curse.

V. 5. He asks you for life.

Here he indicates that he was dead.

So you give him long life forever and ever.

8. that can ever not be called David, nor any other king.

V. 6. He has great honor in your help.

9 He describes how the kingdom of the Lord Christ will extend exceedingly throughout the whole world. "He hath great glory," saith he, "in thy sheath," not in the help of popes, emperors, or men; for it shall be spread abroad through the whole face of the earth. This is his great glory, that he will be a glorious king by making sinners blessed.

You put praise and adornment on him.

10. ornament and adornment means praise and splendor, that one is finely dressed, and beautifully adorned with jewelry, so that it has a splendor; as in the second book of Moses Cap. 28 is written of Aaron's garments. So now he says, As the crown is golden, so are his garments. But this is all spoken figuratively. The crown means the kingdom and the power over the whole world, by which he makes the nations blessed through the salvation of God. But by the garments is meant the preaching of Christ, now and then in all places in the world, that he may be adorned. His adornment is the glory which he exercises in his own; so he is clothed. Where therefore Christ is, there the adornment goes with it; for the Word brings all things with it, those gifts of the Spirit of which Paul writes.

V. 7 For you set him up to be a blessing forever.

11. he took this text from the first book of Moses Cap. 18, 18, where God speaks to Abraham says, "In thy seed shall all the Gentiles be blessed." For Christ, after his curse, was made a blessing to all nations forever, that he might bless us all and make us blessed in his name.

You gladden him with the joy of your countenance.

12. He speaks of rejoicing before GOD; for he says, "Your face." It is a joyful king, not in our sight before the world, but before GOD.

V. 8: For the king hopes in the Lord.

So this king lives, and all who are in his kingdom still trust in the Lord and in his mercy. But with this he shows that the mighty are raging against him. For here he goes on to the second part.

And will remain firm through the goodness of the Most High.

(14) If one is not in goodness and grace, he cannot stand firm; otherwise there is no standing but in God's mercy. By works we shall not stand; it is said: in the goodness of the Most High one stands firm. Now he comes to the other part.

V. 9. Your hand will find all your enemies.

(15) This is especially true of the Jews, who wanted to overthrow this king and turn his blessing into a curse. But it shows that the enemies have become very secure after they have killed Christ, as our bishops and princes are now. Therefore the hand of the Lord will also find them one day, when they are least careful.

Your right will find you monkeys.

(16) These are actually the Jews, and after them all the wicked in general.

V. 10. You will make them like a furnace of fire when you see three (tempore vultus tui).

17 That is, they shall be filled with the fear and dread of their conscience. "The time of his face" or "when he looks" is the time he calls when he looks for them and begins to look for them; as he looked for the Egyptians, when he looked for them, they were already in the red Sea. By "furnace of fire" he indicates a red appearance, that they appear like flames of fire. A similar image is also in the prophets Isaiah [Cap. 29, 6] and Zephaniah [Cap. I, 18]; their faces will have an appearance like flames. With this he wants to indicate: then, when the disaster will come upon them, they will be red with fire. So that the first plague is that God makes them a despondent heart. It can also be understood of the conscience. For this is how it happens: when God punishes, the conscience says from the beginning, "You deserve it. For without an evil conscience, the torture would not hurt; so the appearance must be disguised not only of the eyes and noses, but of the whole body.

The LORD will devour them in his wrath, fire will devour them.

(18) He drieth both with one another, the gospel fire and the infernal fire. If it has gone around for a long time, they will still have to go down to hell in the end, but they do not believe it. Rather, they read this verse as follows: "The Lord will reward us and give us His kingdom of heaven for having slain His Son. Therefore these words are all to be understood spiritually. Just as above [v. 7] the contrast was: You have blessed the cursed, and made alive the one who suffered; so here it is the other way around: Those who are kings, and want to reign mightily, you will first strike down, so that they perish in their own person. But after this:

V. 11. Their fruit you will destroy from the face of the earth.

19 That is, their children and heirs. The children of men have a rule on earth, which they have not; for they also have lost such glory, which is given to all men in general, even to the wicked; as, "Ye shall rule over fishes of the sea" [Gen. 1:28] Their [the Jews'] descendants shall not rule on earth. It is a wretched thing to dwell among the children of men, and yet have no part with the children of men, which all the rest have. Thus it is said in the prophet Zechariah [Cap. 5, 9] that they are suspended between heaven and earth.

Moses also prophesied such misery to them beforehand.

V. 12: For they thought to do you evil, and made designs which they could not perform.

(20) They thought to cut you off, and dealt with attacks which they could not raise. Our disciples do not believe this today either. But this sin, crucifying the Lord Christ, is a sin that will not be forgiven. "They have not sinned against a man, but against the Lord Himself.

V. 13. For you will make them a shoulder.

21 Thus he briefly calls their wretchedness and misery a hardening. They are made to shoulder, they turn their backs on our Lord GOD, so he turns his back on them again. They are hardened, and the more they are punished, the harder they are hardened. Such are the urges from the fifth book of Moses Cap. 28, 15. ff.

With your sinew you will aim against her face.

(22) What they propose shall not depart from them. For since they do not want what God wants, he does not want what they want either, and yet they do not let go. Thus, Duke G[teorg] goes straight away turned away from God; from this it follows that nothing ever happens to him. Nevertheless, he does not allow himself to be instructed by his misfortune, he does not recognize his sin, and continues straight away in the thought: It is right. Therefore God says to him: You have become a back, wait, I will also put something under your eyes that you will not like to see. We see the same thing in the Jews of our time, that so many attempts and hopes have failed them, that arrows have gone under their noses everywhere; wherever they want to go out, he strikes them on the snouts. This is spoken after the manner of the Hebrews, which we give with another image: Wherever one wants to go out, one stands with a club, and strikes him on the head, and cuts off his way. They set themselves against God, and he sets himself against them again.

V. 14. Arise, O Lord, in your power, and we will sing and praise your might.

(23) If they will not continue, continue thou, that thy kingdom may pass through all the heavens. So let us do this, and thank you and sing, praise and preach your power, which you have demonstrated in us, namely, the victory over death, sin and the devil, the way of salvation, the resurrection 2c.

The twenty-second Psalm.

1. 1) The title of this psalm is: Pro susceptione. Augustinus has broken himself hard over this title; however, because it is not translated so rightly, he has erred. For according to the Hebrew text it reads: Of the Hind of the dawn, of the early Hind. For this is the title and content of the psalm. For he sings of the hind of the dawn, which is chased by the dogs. But he says of the hind, and not of the deer, for the sake of fertility and meekness, that she is not so cruel as the deer. For in this psalm he will describe the suffering and kingdom of the Lord Christ. There are also two parables in this psalm, one of which is quite consistent with this title. "Many dogs," saith he [v. 17.], "have surrounded me"; there are many dogs about the hind. For he compares Christ to a hind; as if to say, I will say of Christ how he will suffer, who like a hind will be chased by dogs. And this is one of the main psalms of Christ's suffering. For there is no other psalm to be found that describes the suffering of Christ so clearly as this one. But that he calls her "a hind of the dawn" he does to give her a distinguishing epithet; for he sets this hind apart from the whole priesthood and Israelite regime by saying that she is a hind of the dawn, that is, at the end of the law. Paul also speaks Rom. 13, 12. like this: "The night has passed, but the day is coming." Likewise [Gal. 4:4], "When the time was fulfilled." For where the law is, there is no light, but darkness; but Christ appeared when the end of the law was at hand.

The sun came forth. Item, Christ was to suffer in the time when the law was at its end and the beginning of the gospel was already shining.

It seems clear from this text and others that the prophet and the Holy Spirit deliberately wanted to keep this secret of the suffering of Christ from the carnal and unworthy, which is why he gave this psalm such a dark title. In finem means: to sing highly, as I have explained above [Ps. 9, 1].

V. 2. My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?

3. he soon brings him into the middle of the business, in medias res, as Horace says, and brings him quickly into the highest features of his suffering. For since Christ is in the highest distress of his suffering, and now wants to pass away, he cries out: "My God, my God" 2c. [After that, he introduces Christ himself, as if he were narrating his suffering, like Virgil narrates Aeneas, and Homer narrates Ulysses. For he who tells his story himself can help things greatly with the descriptions and words that express his heart's emotions.

4. "My God, My God" 2c. What this is about, being abandoned by God, no man can understand. I have written much about this in my Psalms; but what I have attained, God knows. A man's heart cannot comprehend nor understand this, it is too narrow for that. For "to be forsaken by God" means to be forsaken by everything that is God, by God Himself, by Life, Wisdom, and the salvation rc. Therefore, in this word "to be forsaken" is the highest suffering, that he leaves the Christ stuck in guilt, sin, foolishness, etc., so that he is left in the hand of the devil. Thus it is said in the eighth Psalm, v. 6: "You will leave him for a little while to be forsaken by God." Then the devil blew, that he might bring him to despair. We cannot suffer such a violent feeling of suffering; he must deal with us more cleanly. But Christ himself suffered such things for us.

2) This refers to the interpretation of the 22nd Psalm in the next preceding scripture of this volume.

I cry, but my help is far away.

In the cross, every delay is insufferable and arouses impatience. Suffering is not difficult if you can see the end of your suffering. One thinks it is a matter of one bad hour, one bad day, one bad week, after that it will be better. But if one does not see the end, all suffering is unbearable, even if it only lasts a quarter of an hour. As he says here, "My help is far off"; there is no salvation, so I see no end to my suffering.

(6) This first verse makes the whole psalm clear, in which he complains that he is in the greatest suffering, and suffers without all cessation (aeternaliter). This is the highest suffering, that one loses God, after that it does not want to stop; that is why it hurts that he says: I call; but what does it help? There is no salvation, who knows when help will come? This is how it goes in all suffering, that there is no end to it. Our people now at Augsburg have also tried.

Rugitus [howling] indicates the fierce prayer of Christ and His inexpressible groaning, and yet it is in vain.

V. 3. My God, I call by day and you do not answer.

(7) Here he makes it greater by comparison, and makes it still more dreadful. This suffering of mine, saith he, hath no equal, that he seeth no saint suffer so. Then the devil blew: Why do you not despair, because you see no example of your suffering anywhere? No one has ever suffered so shamefully; God's wrath is heavy on you. We have a saying, which is common but very good, to the condemnor.

stand after: It is a joy to the wretched to have comrades in their sufferings. A poor sinner can still take comfort in this: I have sinned, but Peter also sinned, David sinned; you are neither the first nor the last. Such examples are comforting to us, but the suffering of the Lord makes all such circumstances even more difficult. This he suffered for our sins and for our sins' sake. This we should learn; so we must read the Aristotelem [in] the devil's name for it, and also pursue the doctrine of it most severely.

My God, the day I call.

8. my suffering is without end, and also without example, but I run in my suffering through all the sufferings of all men, and see that you have saved them. I alone cry out to you now and am not heard.

And at night I am not silent either.

9. "Silence" means that one is not despondent and dismayed in his heart.

v. 4. But you are holy, who dwell among the praise of Israel.

(10) This is a dark verse, which I understand thus: lest it appear that he blasphemes God, this word is added, by which he expresses his firmness: "Thou art holy," that is, thou art worthy of praise, thou art not to be blasphemed; it is not thy fault that I suffer thus; thou doest me no wrong either; if I die, yet thou remainest holy under the praise of Israel. Therefore thou shalt not be blasphemed, but I say that thou art the praise of Israel, and to be praised among this people Israel. So it is as it were a rectification of his previous complaint, "Why hast thou forsaken me?" which seems to read as a blasphemy. You have done right, as befits a right, pious, faithful God.

v. 5. Our fathers hoped in you.

He holds himself against others: It is not so with me. As often as the fathers called, they were helped; I also call, and yet am not saved. This holding against each other does not only make suffering difficult.

rer, but is also a half comfort with too. You have helped those who are stuck, you will help me too. Thus he overcomes the comparison that should frighten him, turns it around, and needs it for comfort. So does David also Ps. 77, 4: "When I am distressed, I think of God." Likewise Ps. 143, 5: "I remember the deeds of the Lord." We call upon the God who carried us out through the Red Sea. And in another place: Remember how our fathers were helped [Ps. 105:5]. Thus Christ turns this into a consolation in his wrestling and mourning. This is a high art.

V. 7. But I am a worm and not a man, a mockery of the people, and contempt of the people.

12 These are adventurous, strange words. Christ must be in the world not a man; that is, all men, the more godless they are, the wiser and mightier and more righteous they are; but Christ and his do not have to be men, they are badly thought to be shadows of men. And as one tramples an earthworm, so one tramples him. "I am a worm" is the name given to the work of our Lord God, sons and children; it has no standing at all before the world.

A mockery of the people and contempt of the people.

(13) Thus, when one wants to call someone shameful, he is called a Christian; just as I must now also be called so. They put me on the cross, he says, as one puts a worm on a fishing rod. So I also have no name, but my name is called "mockery and contempt," which is my honor; so he is despised to the highest degree. This is the account of the suffering he endured in his heart. In the following verses he goes around, and says of the external, finally also of the bodily sufferings and pains, that he has been completely exhausted.

1)V. 8. All who see me mock me.

(14) The highest suffering is followed by the blasphemy of the adversaries. For thus they say: Behold, have I not said it before?

Thus our Lord God punishes him! But the cross becomes heavier; and because he feels that he has been abandoned by God, his enemies rejoice over him.

Unlock the mouth.

This ["sperren" (XXX)] is the same word which is found 2 Mos. 13, 12.: "All that is a male that breaks the mother" (XXX).

And shake their heads.

15 Awe yes! are you the man who can punish all the world? I mean, you have it.

V. 9: He complains to the Lord, who helps him and saves him, if he has a desire for him.

This is such a bitter mockery and scorn that it could not be more bitter. And these are actually the devil's words, as in the Gospel [Math. 27, 43]: "He has trusted in God, who will now deliver him," so that the presumptuous victory of the adversaries and their sure boasting are next to each other. The pieces belong to each other, the highest suffering, and after that, contempt and blasphemy, rejoicing and triumph of the adversaries. This is the first part of the psalm, which contains the complaint of what he must suffer: Abandonment and loneliness without equal, blasphemy and rejoicing of his enemies. The word [XXX] which is translated in Latin by speravit means to roll, to promote a cause with a prince, to present 2c. As if he wanted to say: He presents his cause before God.

V. 10: For you pulled me out of my mother's womb.

This belongs to Christ alone, to no one else, for we were all conceived in sins. /But here he begins to comfort himself. He has no consolation from outside, he has to take it badly within himself, and takes hold of our Lord God a little, and says: "I did not make myself, I know that well, it is not my will, nor my drive or cause, it is your cause. If one can say this, it is true; but because it is called "my" [thing], there must be hesitation. But if I think in this way: I am doing this according to the command of God, then it follows:

1) Note from the original "September 13."

So God will protect me. So we have to comfort ourselves now to Augsburg also. But he says this with many words: It is your own business; what am I?

You are my God from my mother's womb.

(18) I have done nothing in my whole life without you; but from the first beginning of my existence I have served you. There is nothing in me that can be called mine, not even my birth itself. Furthermore, I believe that this is also indicated here, that Christ was not born in sins. I am drawn, 1) he says, out of my mother's womb, and, therefore to be reckoned, not born, but drawn out. For Christ came from the womb of the virgin alone, and not from the loins of man, and from such a womb that did not work, but rather suffered, because he was drawn out. So I am, he says, without sin, that I know. Thus he grasps God in the previous benefits, and more in the works, than 2) in his words.

You would be my confidence, since I was still at my mother's breasts.

19. you have been my defiance, that is, my life has been your gift, and you took pleasure in me as soon as I was born. When I was at my mother's breasts, you were my God, and I, as your servant, had given myself completely to you. But others, who are born of father and mother, do not do this; but they suck the breasts in sins, and all is sin until they are baptized.

V. 11. I am cast upon you from my mother's womb.

20 I have been accepted into thy protection, and have been delivered unto thee: there is none that hath taken me but thee. Others are cast into the world and into misery; but I am cast upon thee. Therefore I have not deserved such punishments and blasphemies; they are not as I am;

for I am holy from the moment I began to live. So he sets all this against his suffering.

You are my God from my mother's womb.

(21) With this he gives great comfort, because he has taken hold of our Lord God. You are my God, and I have been your servant. He says of the mother's body alone that he was born of a virgin mother. But here is also shown the way in which one should stand when one wants to pray, and make his conscience quiet. For before he asks, he remembers the benefits, as we also do in the Lord's Prayer: Our Father, you are a great and powerful Father 2c.

V. 12. Do not be far from me.

(22) I beseech thee, let thy help come nigh unto me: now is suffering and anguish nigh unto me. This is almost the prayer of which the Epistle to the Hebrews says, Cap. 5, 7, that Christ offered it to His Father in the days of His flesh. And this is now the petition.

(23) Just as it is good to seek the favor of the judge in prayer, so it is also necessary to arouse disfavor against one's enemies, so that he may be tempted to be a judge and be inclined to show mercy to the oppressed. This also serves to make one pray the more earnestly; as we now say when we pray: Help, dear Lord God, because you see how they deal with us and know that they are wretches; so the prayer is finely strengthened and a right devotion is awakened.

V. 13. Great ferns have surrounded me.

24. parim (XXXX) are called farren, young oxen, breeding oxen. Rabbim (XXXX) means full, strong, large.

Fat oxen have surrounded me.

25. abbire (XXXX) means angels, strong ones, and this name is also given to God, as in the 132nd Psalm, v. 2: "It swore [David] to the Mighty One of Jacob" (XXXX XXXXX) Therefore nen-

3) heal, that is, mock. In the Latin original: "verhaute". For the form, compare in this volume Col. 1455, Z18, and Col. 1506, § 90.

Instead of: natus is to be read: extraetus.
2) So the old translator. In Latin instead of: "denn" - "6t".

The Hebrews also call an ox Abbir (XXXX), of strength. But with this he indicates that his enemies are poking oxen (cornupetas), they poke, do wrong and do violence. These oxen are Herod, Pilate and the Romans. Thus he accuses his adversaries, and sets himself in favor. Oxen, he says, are against me; but I am a worm. They are fat, much, great, strong, and do violence; they are much mightier than I, and are pernicious, wicked, and ungodly, wanton, thrusting oxen. But he calls the kings and princes oxen, and as it were to disgrace he gives them the names of unreasonable beasts. Now it would be an insult if he did this out of such a mind that he wanted to offend them, but he does it so that the judge's heart will be moved.

V.14. They open their mouths against me like a roaring and ravening lion.

(26) This is a description of the terror they inflicted on him. They have come at me with the greatest desire, like a roaring lion.

V. 15. I am poured out like water.

27 This is the description of how they attacked him. A similar image, but in a slightly different meaning, is found in the first book of Moses Cap. 49, 4. of Reuben, for there it denotes recklessness: You are a reckless man, you are like water poured out. But here he says, "I am poured out like water," that is, I am poured out as nothing. Malmsey, [or] otherwise wine or beer is not poured out very much. But I am poured out like water, which is not noticed at all, there was no container, no one caught me.

All my bones have separated.

Thus they have stretched me apart. But one can also understand it from the inner suffering that the strength in the legs goes away, that one can neither stand nor walk.

My heart is like melted wax in my body.

What this is, no one understands, because who has tried it. In Latin it is called tabe scere [fade away], so that one thinks that the heart is going out of his body with the greatest pain. Such things are high, we do not meet it, it is too high for us.

V. 16 My strength is dried up like a potsherd, and my tongue sticks to the roof of my mouth.

(30) The highest fright is followed by a dry tongue, as we see in those who faint, their hands and feet, like a potsherd, become completely powerless. The Medici say it comes from the fact that the blood recedes into the interior, and it may well be true. "Force" here means the activity of the limbs, or the action of the forces in the hands and other limbs. That is why it happens that people are given refreshment when they are led out for execution, and they also drink a lot. They also say of Thomä Münzer that he drank half a Stübichen 1). This is the result of the great terror that dries up and sucks out all juice and strength.

And you lay me in the dust of death.

31. What shall I say much, you have let me strangle badly. "To be laid in the dust means to be made nothing. Thou hast made me, saith he, nothing, and such a nothing as is of death. This is the description of the external sufferings.

V. 17. For dogs have surrounded me.

He accuses them anew and hits the title [of this psalm] with the figure: I have been chased like a hind. But by whom? Not by you, but by dogs. From this it is clear that he has now overcome his suffering, and that it has become better with him; for he turns his thoughts to the wickedness of his adversaries, and accuses them. But he praises God and comforts himself in this way.

And the Evil Rotte has made itself around me.

33. not [the assembly] of thy people. Now he adds clearly how they have dealt more with him:

1) A parlor is about a gallon.

They dug through my hands and feet.

34 He continues with accusations. I believe that it was already an old custom to crucify people, and that this kind of punishment was not first inflicted on Christ; as I hear that this way of killing people is still practiced by the Turks. But the Jews falsify this text badly, and because they lean with all their might on the letters, 1) they do not read: "They have dug through", but: Like a lion my hand and my feet. But it is a public falsification. "They have digged through," he says, "they have crucified me like a thief whose hands and feet are nailed through.

V. 18. I want to count all my legs.

35 We also say in German: One would like to count all his legs. Then it helps that he was dried up and exhausted. That they would have mercy on him! Yes, there is nothing but cruelty.

But you look and see their pleasure in me.

They confessed and saw their joy in him, and laughed 2) in their hearts; that 3) hurt him very much. The word Raah means: to look at a thing with diligence.

V. 19. They divide my clothes among them.

37 They could not make it worse, at last they also have to play for his clothes. Such wickedness is made very big here. Of gall and vinegar the prophet says elsewhere [Ps. 69, 22.]. But all the wicked, when the cause of the wicked comes before them, they do so to it: they are not satisfied with condemning it, but laugh at it, and take pleasure in it, so that in the same wickedness it is felt that the devil does it, and not God's order. For in other courts one has compassion with the condemned.

V. 20. But you, Lord, do not be far away.

38" This is the third and last piece, in which he asks and prophesies at the same time of his future...

1) Compare in this volume Col. 1283, s 180 ff.

4) Note of the original: "September 17".

kingdom. For until now he has told of his suffering; now he adds a prophecy of the resurrection and the kingdom of Christ. It is a very beautiful psalm, full of testimonies that Christ had to suffer and thus enter his glory [Luc. 24, 26].

Lord, do not be far away.

39. do not go so far away from me, but help me to rise again from the dead.

My strength, hurry to help me.

40. these words are signs of a heart that suffers; for in the cross, as I have gone above

5] Every delay is borne with impatience. So he now finely strokes it out with the words, as it is to one's mind in the cross.

V. 21. Save my soul from the sword.

41 He prays clearly for help that his soul may be saved from the sword, that is, from the power of those who wield the sword, from the tyrants who want to take his life.

My lonely one of the dogs (de manu canis).

42. He remains in the image of the hunted hind; of the hand of the dog, that is, of the dogs or of the canine hand. As if he should say: I am in the hunt, and they that pursue me press in upon me; but leave me not in the hands of the dogs. He wants to come out badly.

My lonely one.

43 That is, I who am lonely; as the Scripture often speaks, as Ps. 25:16, "I am lonely and miserable." For every one that suffereth is lonely, having no help nor succor. And this is also God's title, that He is a helper of those who are forsaken by all human help. This word also serves to awaken devotion in the heart, so that the prayer becomes strong: Dear Lord God, help, you see that I am otherwise completely abandoned.

V. 22. Help me out of the lion's mouth.

44 These are repetitions of the same thoughts (ingeminaciones), words that indicate the fierce desire of a very ardent spirit.

And save me from the unicorns.

(45) These are four parables by which he confesses that he is under the sword, in the power of the dogs, in the mouth of the lion, and between the horns of the unicorns. But he says of many unicorns by which he is attacked with the horns. But the historians say of the unicorns that they are unruly and wild beasts that can be killed but not captured alive. So are the Jews and all persecutors of Christians. These are the angriest, most ferocious beasts, which the Holy Spirit cannot indicate otherwise than by such figures. When thieves and highwaymen are led to the gallows, one has some sympathy with them; but this is not granted to the Christians; they become dogs and lions, that is, they are unforgiving and insatiable enemies. This is the prayer in the hope of the resurrection. Now he prophesies of the resurrection as if he had already been answered.

V. 23. I will preach your name to my brothers.

46 What is this? Will a dead man preach, and a strangled man boast? This verse includes the resurrection in itself, for it speaks of his own person, and it is Christ himself who calls us brethren. But no one can sufficiently grasp with the mind how heartily and earnestly this is said: "To my brethren. That is what it means, "my brothers", who are the conquerors of death, hell, sin and all evils. The great God, who fills heaven and earth, says to those who hear him that they are his brothers. Whoever therefore loves the word, hears it, holds it in honor, hears here well what Christ holds him for. And this also comforts us against all tyrants. What can they do if Christ is our brother, if they are like unicorns? This word "brother" also implies that we also have what he has. But he is blessed, free from the devil, innocent of sin 2c. This is all ours.

He also explains what Christ's kingdom is, that is, a brotherhood which has eternal life, salvation, redemption from sins, from the devil 2c. In sum, it is the kingdom of heaven.

(48) He adds to this description of this kingdom the word, "I will preach. For he says that it is a kingdom of the word, which stands in preaching, and continues until the last day, until we also shall be saved. Thus the kingdom is briefly and masterfully conceived, as no Cicero, nor no poet could conceive that it is not the kingdom of the emperor or king of France, but of Christ.

Your name.

(49) This is a description of the gospel, what kind of word it is, of which he said that Christ's kingdom is in it, namely, such a word that "your name" is preached; as he said in the nineteenth Psalm, v. 2: "The heavens tell the glory of God," not of men's names, not of trust in our works, not of our wisdom, but of God's work, of grace, of life and salvation, which is given to us through Christ, of which he boasts. So the gospel is a narrative of God's glory, that God alone may be praised.

50. This sermon of the glory of God contains the sermon of our shame; for God's glory and our glory cannot lie together in one bed. So also God's name and our name cannot stand in one stable with each other. As Daniel Cap. 9, 7. also says: "You, Lord, are righteous, but we must be ashamed." Whoever therefore hears this sermon gladly is a brother of the Lord Christ. And indeed we also see who likes to hear it. Most of them also want to have their hands in the sode, and not let God praise them alone.

I will praise you in the community.

I do not want to be an angle preacher; as Paul also says Rom. 1, 16: "I am not ashamed of the gospel." And Christ [Matth. 10, 32.]: "He that shall confess me before men" 2c. It is not to be a lurker.

52) To boast means to preach and confess that we are blessed by grace and not by our own merit, as Paul says [2 Tim. 1:9]. Now this is the ministry of preaching, and this is the kingdom of Christ, who is a king, who reigns by the outward and oral word; those who accept this are brethren. So then Christ is a preacher, and a word-

But in this word all salvation is included. Therefore these sayings should be well remembered against those who ridicule the outward word. "I will preach" is ever said of the outward word; likewise "in the church. One knows well what preaching means.

V. 24: Praise the Lord, you who fear him.

With this he further describes this kingdom, that this word will have its fruits, that the Holy Spirit will be present. He also exhorts here that we should accept this word, praise God, and believe Him.

(54) For they that fear him have such fear from preaching alone. But it is called "fear" when people are punished by the gospel (as Christ says: "The Holy Spirit will punish"), and despair of their works, and fear God's judgment, because our Lord God will not be satisfied with our works.

55. After such fear follows that one praises God. For Christ comforts [Matth. 12, 16. Luc. 10, 23.] and says: "Blessed are those who hear the word that you hear" 2c. As if to say, Be of good cheer, ye that allow the word. It seems, because ye are without good works, as if it should be lost with you; but it hath not the opinion; it saith, "Glorify the Lord, ye that fear him." He is to be feared, but not despaired of. So also he connects these two things in the 2nd Psalm, v. 11. where he says, "Serve the LORD with fear, and rejoice." 2c.

All the seed of Jacob honor him.

(56) The reason he adds "the seed of Jacob" is to indicate that the promise belongs primarily to the seed of Abraham, for they have the promise that the gospel will come to them. Therefore he repeats:

And before him all the seed of Jacob shall shun.

57 This word means "to be afraid," as it is written in the 2nd Psalm, v. 11: "Rejoice with trembling," that is, with fear and reverence, so that we may not be presumptuous about our righteousness, but accept the word of God with gratitude and humility. For he does not want such a hope, which makes presumptuous.

have. You shall humbly study the word and receive it with reverence. This is the preaching of our Lord Jesus Christ, by which he glorifies the Father and makes us come to the Father through him. For he is the way 2c. [Joh. 14, 6.]

V. 25: For he did not despise nor disdain the affliction of the poor, and did not hide his face from him.

58 He adds this to the explanation of the kingdom of Christ as a characteristic, namely, that the kingdom of Christ is a kingdom of the cross. He touches on this. We also have to hold out, as he does. He says much more in these negative words s: "He did not despise" 2c., than if he had spoken in an affirmative manner s: He regarded 2c.]. As if he wanted to say: Love the God who comforts the miserable, justifies the sinners, makes the dead alive, helps the disgraced to honor, makes the poor blessed. Behold, as he hath done to me, he hath not despised me. It seems to me that our Lord God does not want to be his vet and his vet's vet. He raises us up against such fears and says that God is a God of grace. As if he wanted to say: "Do not trust in your own authority. You must be miserable, become children of death and hell, and then know that he is such a gracious God who cannot despise the miserable.

And crying out to him, he heard it.

59. Christ's kingdom is also a kingdom of prayer, as Zechariah says [Cap. 12, 10.]: "The spirit of grace and of prayer." For where the gospel is, there the two go. Prayer is the other work after preaching. Grace gives forgiveness of sins, which makes one able to pray. But before grace there is no praying, but weeping. Thus these two things are connected with each other in Jeremiah [Cap. 27, 18.]: "If anyone has the word of the Lord, let him pray for the vessels in the temple" 2c. As if he wanted to say: The sign that one has the word is that he can pray. So he comforts us with this verse and says: God does not despise you, as you think, but is a God of grace, and a listener to prayer, as he calls him in another Psalm [Ps. 65, 3].

And has not hidden his face from him.

(60) By this he indicates the struggle of the flesh, that the devil would gladly make us not pray, that one might think, it is of no avail. Of such a God I preach to you. Therefore let my example strengthen you.

V. 26. I will praise you in the great congregation.

(61) This saying is similar to Psalm 118:15: "They sing with joy of victory in the tabernacles of the righteous." It is a realm of comfort and praise; 1) our Lord God, when he hears us, also comforts us, and does not leave us stuck in it.

You I will praise 2c.

62. he will say what a great kingdom he has. Because you help people and hear them, they will thank you for it. For praise follows help, so that one must say: God has done this.

In the large community.

That is, all over the world.

I will pay my vows before those who fear him.

(64) He does not say of the vows of our monks, but of the vows of gratitude, which are made for the testimony and display of gratitude, not that they should be considered as merit. For this is how it was with the vows in the Law, that they were not vows of works, that is, meritorious, but to praise and honor God. For even the vows that were works were not vowed as works by which one wished to earn something, but as a sign of gratitude. To vow something to God, therefore, is to vow to Him the first commandment, that we will hold Him as a God who is to help us and give us all good things. Every vow belongs to the first commandment, for it is vowed for the sake of gratitude alone; as, that I do not drink wine because I am a Nazarene before God, 2) and thus testify of myself that I am a Nazarene.

1) Here we have omitted "that" which is in the original.

2) "Nazarene" (i'n) - a betrothed of God, Judg. 13, 5. lament. 4, 7.

wants me to think of God as my God. It is the same with the sacrifices.

(65) That he therefore says, "I will pay my vows," is nothing other than: I will praise him. I have vowed to him that he shall be my God, since I have everything from him. So when he preaches the same thing publicly and shouts it out, it means paying vows. Likewise, if I vow some work, if I put on a red skirt and say: I will do this as a sign, so that I will indicate to our Lord God that he is my God. But our monks make meritorious works out of the vows, which is ungodly.

(66) Notice further, however, that this is said only for example. For it would be ungodly to make any such vow, for it would be a work of one's own choosing, which from the beginning would bring with it such a delusion as if it were better than another work. Now all our works, by which we can praise God, are already prescribed and indicated to us beforehand in the Holy Scriptures. [As St. Paul says: "Whatever you do, whether you eat or drink, do it all with thanksgiving." [1 Cor. 10:31.]

V. 27. The wretched shall eat, that they may be filled.

67. It is also a realm of a delicious meal. As if to say, I will make a banquet, a good life. Then shall the poor eat, for it shall be a delicious Ahasverian banquet, that is, the word shall be so superfluous, that [it] shall give full charge of all that is to be had; as we see. For the gospel teaches us what is the office of the authorities, of the subjects, of the father and the mother, how to use the sun, the moon, and the air. This is a delicious meal, but he has prepared it for the wretched; those who are overwhelmed by their sins and death, they shall be filled.

And those who ask about the Lord will praise him.

The same wretched people will also praise the Lord. So the gospel is nothing else but this: "Praise the Lord, all nations" [Ps. 117, 1.]. Likewise elsewhere [Ps. 22, 26.]: "I will praise you", des-.

same, Ps. 145, 1.: "I will exalt thee, my God"; that gratitude might be there, for having given the word. But he added, which is well to be observed: "They that ask after him." They are not lazy Christians; they accept it 1) and ask for it, they do not yet have it in sight, but are only interested in the fact that they ask for it.

Your heart shall live forever.

The same food will give your heart eternal life. Even though the body dies, your hearts will surely have eternal life; this is a comforting realm. This he said of his seed, Jacob; now he will also come upon the Gentiles.

V. 28: Let the end of the world be remembered, that they turn to the Lord.

70. 2) This is what he says, that we Gentiles also should belong to the kingdom of Christ, even though this is not promised to us, as it is to the Jews; we do not have the power to wait for it, nor to demand it, yet he has also met us. Reminiscentur is not well translated: One will remember. It is Ps. 117:1, "Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles," and Ps. 2:8, "Cry unto me, and I will give thee the Gentiles." Reminiscentur-, that is, they will be remembered, they will be called by the word, as it says elsewhere, Ps. 87, 4.: "I will cause to preach (memor ero 4)) Rahab and Babel," and Ps. 16, 4. "I will not keep (non memor ero) their name in my mouth." So also here is reminiscentur: Our Lord GOD will also write them in the register, he will not forget them. For it reads stronger in our language when it is expressed in a negative way (negative).

71 "The end of the world," that is, not only the land of Canaan. Thus it is said in the other Psalm, v. 8: "Cry out from me for the Gentiles. The suffering of Christ will bring forth this fruit, and gather together the children from all kingdoms. And before him all the families of the Gentiles will worship.

72) That is, all peoples everywhere, that is, from all nations, will be at the service of Christ.

- 1) In the original: "sichs" - itself deß.
- 2) Note of the original: "September 18".
- 3) In the original: "Habens" - have deß.
- 4) Instead of Lorura, read 6ro.

Some say "worse" because that is how it is understood to speak; what two people do in any house, the house is said to do.

But the abolition of the law is also indicated here. For if all Gentiles are to be converted, and yet remain Gentiles, even if they are not called to Judaism, it necessarily follows that the law is abolished, and the kingdom is a spiritual one.

(74) "To worship" means, according to the Hebrew idiom, to bend the knees and pay homage, which we do with the gestures of the body, as we do to princes. This worship is a sign that we confess that God is our Father, from whom we receive everything. In the first commandment this word is also used [Exodus 20:5]: "You shall not worship them." There he speaks of the idols: you shall not consider them a majesty, you shall not pay them homage, and "you shall not serve them," you shall not do them any works or services.

V. 29. For the Lord has a kingdom, and he rules among the nations.

The Lord will become king himself. With this he indicates that he wants to destroy all the kingdoms of the idols; he wants to reign himself. These are strong sayings against the Jews; the devils still stand so firm and want to be the only people, although he clearly says here about the end of the world.

V. 30. All the fat people of the earth will eat and worship.

76] As he said above [v. 27] about the Jews, so he also says here that a banquet should also be prepared among the Gentiles. But there are three pieces in this verse. The gospel will be the very rich and delicious banquet. They will worship him, will show him honor, will recognize him for their God "all the fat ones", that is, all the mighty ones. But this Hebrew way of speaking is very frequent. [As, Ps. 78, 31. Vulg.:] "He strangled their fat ones." And above in the seventeenth Psalm, v. 10. "Their fats hold together." Not that all the fat men, and every one of them, shall worship the Lord, but that of all the fat men some shall do so upon the face of the whole earth.

All who lie in the dust will bend their knees to him.

He calls "those who lie in the dust" in general any low estate; this is in contrast to the fat. For "to lie in the dust" means to be in a lowly position and in the filth of some miserable life that one does not respect in the eyes of the world, a Cinderella. With this German word the Hebrew way of speaking is very well rendered. But he says "all", and does not look at any person. This is a secret stab at the Jews who boasted [Ps. 144, 13.], "Our chambers are full," GOD blesses His people 2c. But here he says that he also wants to accept the wretched, that is, those who have a semblance before the world, as if they were cursed.

And those who live miserably (Et qui animam suam non vivificant).

78 By this image [animam vivificare] not only the despised, but also the afflicted people are designated. For to make the soul alive, he calls living joyfully. As he calls it in another place, "a light of the living" [Ps. 56:14], that is, the time of welfare, when one lives, when there is a blessed life. But those do not make their souls alive who are afflicted, but their life is rather a death than a life. He will not despise the prisoners, the afflicted, the afflicted, who are considered more dead than alive. He is a bishop of the poor and miserable, not of the rich alone. But such a way of speaking is taken from it: The word nephesh (XXX) means the sentient soul or the living body, as the Greeks and the Latins say: animal [a living being. Therefore XXX means to refresh, as one says: A good drink helps body and soul together again. And therefore one says: To make the soul alive. Now these are our Lord God's courtiers, rich, poor and afflicted people.

v. 31. He will have a seed to serve him.

79 Now he says what kind of king he will be, namely such a king who will have descendants; he will not be barren. Likewise, this king will not die, but he will not die.

derm will have abundant seed. But what kind of seed? "The one who serves him." Therefore, this is how he must live if he is to be served. This is a new kingdom. The king remains a king with his seed. All his children that he will ever have, they will serve him, as it says in the Psalm [Ps. 72, 5. 17.]: "God, give your judgment to the king" 2c. His name will be planted or he will have children as long as the sun and the moon last. His seed remains forever; it does not follow after him, nor is it offspring, but it remains with him at the same time, it does not die.

The Lord will be proclaimed to children.

80. they will preach; as he says in another place: his name will have children as long as the sun lasts 2c. 1) [Ps. 72, 5.], that is, from child to child one will preach of his name.

To Child Child.

(81) For and for is the time and duration, not the progeny. They must leave the seed as a child, that is, forever, as long as one generation stands here on earth.

v. 32. They will come and preach his righteousness.

82) To come and to go out and in (intrare), means to administer an office; as if I said, Pommer goes out and in at the church at Wittenberg, that is, he administers it. So also here: Those preachers, this seed, will come, administer, be sent, run, as Paul calls it, that is, they will teach. But what? "His righteousness," namely Christ's, not of works righteousness, but of faith. This will be preaching. This is a glorious contrast against the worldly righteousness and that of the Law of Moses, as it is written in the Evangelio Johannis Cap. 1, 13: "Which is not of the blood, nor of the will of man" 2c.

1) Here it is written, just as in the previous paragraph: K'liaditur nomen es U8 oorniu 8ole ete, while in the Vulgate it is written 72, 5: perraunedit enm sole. That this passage is meant is beyond doubt by the opening words of the psalm given above (79).

To the people who are born.

This is to be preached to the people who are born. There is an emphasis on the word "born". It means a born people, not prepared and made ready by the law; but, as Christ says John 3:3, "Except one be born again." In our sermon it is valid to be born again and to be born anew, not to be brought together, formed and prepared by ceremonies and pomp.

That he does.

This is a dark resolution, and can be understood in two ways. First, that the Lord has done it, who now promises it, or that it will happen when our Lord God will intervene. For thus says Amos [Cap. 9, 12.], "This saith the LORD that doeth all these things." And Isaiah Cap. 60, 22. "Thus saith the LORD, In his time will I do these things shortly." The other view is that the Lord does this, that it is a divine work 2c.

The twenty-third Psalm.

V. 1. The Lord is my shepherd.

1. 1) This is a thanksgiving and promise of both temporal and spiritual goods, namely of the temporal government and the priesthood. But especially it is a thanksgiving of common people (privatorum), who recognize what fruit they have from the worldly rule and the preaching ministry.

2 But this image is exceedingly beautiful: The Lord is my shepherd. This is a word that is exceedingly full of faith; whoever believes this would be unconcerned about his food and the peace of this world. He says: I am his sheep.

I will not want for anything.

3 This follows right faith: What shall I lack? I will have food, for I have a shepherd. A little sheep must neither feed itself nor defend itself. But the wicked will lack everything.

V. 2. He feeds me in a green pasture.

4. he makes it so very sure, as if he is not afraid, thinking that he is a sheep, and lets himself be

1) Note of the original: "18-September". This time determination will hardly be correct, because the last one given in v. 28. reads the same, and moreover September 18, 1530 was a Sunday. Instead, September 19 may be assumed (cf. K 6 of this psalm). On Sept. 20, Luther wrote three long letters, namely to Link, Melancthon and Justus Jonas, which can be found in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 166 ff. The explanation of the following psalm has the time: "22. September".

He will think that he has a delicious house and green pastures, where he will be pastured in safe peace without any worry or distress. These are all figurative words. "To graze" (cubare [lie]) means to feed, 2) as cattle tend.

And lead me to the fresh water.

(5) He will say, He will make it so that I may be led thither, and lie by the pasture, and feed myself, and not only this, but also give water in such safety that I may not be afraid. So he gives both food and drink in peace and quiet.

V. 3. He restores my soul.

6. what naphash (XXX) is, I said yesterday [Ps. 22, § 78], namely, refresh and revive; as we say, A good drink helps body and soul together. Likewise: To a full belly belongs a merry head. And as we say when we have eaten: It has become better. And this is the first part of this psalm, about the world's rule, that God is the shepherd. He will not leave us, even in temporal need and peace.

He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake

2) In Latin the word: "to feed" is missing. It should be read well: Ondnrsete

3) This passage confirms our Conjecture in A 1 that this Psalm will be interpreted on September 19.

7 This is the other benefit, namely, the spiritual one, which he has shown us with the priesthood. He has established the ministry of the word, which leads me on the right path, into another life. "He leads me through the word, his most dear and precious treasure, that he may ordain us rightly how we should live, walk and stand, so that all ranks may be finely ordered. For this word ["right road"], which he used here, means outward righteousness.

(8) But he added to it for his own sake, "For his name's sake. For in the ministry of preaching the glory of God especially suffers violence, because human reason ascribes to itself what we have through the beneficence of the word.

V. 4: Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil.

(9) The word is immediately followed by the devil and all his angels, and they bring temptations. For when he says, "Though I walk," 2c., he confesses that what our Lord God speaks and does must be armored and pass through the fire. Even though I should live in many adversities, I still want to have the word and stay with it, as our people are now walking in the valley of Augsburg. The wicked, however, walk on light mountains, on the clouds, and fear no misfortune, and yet have misfortune. But ours fear misfortune, and have no misfortune.

Because dn are with me.

(10) Though you seem to have left me, I know for certain that you are with me. But how? Not visibly, not tangibly, but by word, as follows:

Your rod and staff comfort me.

(11) He confesses that he feels unhappiness, for he says: "I do not fear unhappiness. Likewise, "You comfort me"; thus he is afflicted, otherwise he would not say so. "The rod" means the word, for it guides. "The rod" is also the word, for it upholds. For this is what the word Nacham (XXX) means, as one leans up. The stick one has over him.

the staff under himself. This is what he has said about the spiritual ministry and the ministry of words; now he strikes it out with images and beautiful words.

V. 5. You prepare a table before me against my enemies.

This is a beautiful patron. They sit at table, and thus fight against their enemies. It should say: You prepare weapons and walls; so he says: "a table". But with this he wants to praise the wonderful power of the word. Our victory is nothing more than (simpliciter) eating and drinking, that is, holding on to the word and believing in it; for the same is set before us as the bread was set before us on the table of Moses. So now he indicates with this how our armor is to be approached, namely, with faith. "To be still and hope is your strength," Is. 30, 15. and Ps. 46, 1) 11: "Be still."

You anoint my head with oil.

(13) I thought he had put a helmet on me, and he was anointing my head with oil, as if I were going to a dance. How can the Holy Spirit speak so hopefully against the devil? He does not say, you smear, but you anoint me fat with oil, that is, you have endowed me with your word, you have comforted me with it, you have equipped and armed me. And so we are armed with ointment. It shall grieve the devil, when he heareth that one receiveth his wrath no other way, than as one should go to the dance.

And pour me full (Et calix meus superabundans).

14 Here it is in doubt whether the cup, according to the secret interpretation, is to be understood for the word or, however, according to the Scriptural way, for a part: My part, as it is written above Ps. 11, 6: "He will give them a weather for their reward" (pars calicis eorum), that will be theirs. So here: My cup, my portion, my being, my matter has no need, it is full, that is, I am provided for, I have a shepherd. This is how I understand it: As I am, so I am well. But these are all parables taken from the law. The first is taken from the table of the shewbread and Easter [Ex. 25:30]; the other from the vial of the priests, kings, and instruments [Ex. 30:30]; the third from the vessels to offer their drink offerings [Ex. 25:29].

V. 6. Goodness and mercy will follow me all my life.

This is a thanksgiving for the past and a request for the future goods: Dear God, let us therefore stay with the word and worldly regiment. "Mercy", benevolence, that remain with me. I pray that this mercy may remain with me all my life. [Ps. 68, 29. "The same will

Let us be strengthened, for it is your work. Do not stop at the past good deeds, but increase them with future ones; do not desist as long as I am here on earth.

And I will remain in the Hanse of the Lord forever.

16 That I may abide forever. This is a request for both the temporal and the spiritual: as you have given me the word, so keep it for me. For "to dwell in the house of the Lord" means to be there where God's word is heard. But where the same is not heard, there is not the house of the Lord.

About the same Psalm.

V. 1. The Lord is my shepherd.

In this psalm, faith speaks proudly and confidently, full of joy and comfort, thanking God and saying, "The Lord is my shepherd," and I am his sheep. But the contradiction is seen in those who have mammon, the belly, and other gods for shepherds; for before them a believer is looked upon as if he were among wolves, forsaken by God, and lacking everything, and as if it were quite wrong for him to say, "I shall lack nothing."

V. 2. He feeds me in a green pasture.

2 He remains with the image of a shepherd and sheep. For where a sheep in a green field may lie secure and contented, and feed where and how it will, it thinks it has a kingdom. So a believer is also secure because of the promise for the body, both in the household and in the worldly government, having food and peace with a joyful heart.

He leads me to the fresh water (juxta aquas requiei).

3 This is again a rich figurative speech, taken from the sheep that go safely to the water, and drink according to their desire. For "water of rest," refreshment, or safety, he calls the water that quenches thirst in peace. This he has said of the bodily things; now follows the spiritual pasture.

V. 3. He restores my soul; he leads me in the right way for his name's sake.

He feeds the soul with his grass and water, that is, with God's words. First, with "refreshing," that is, with deliverance from the conscience of sin, and comfort and gladness from the forgiveness of sins. Secondly, with the righteousness of faith and grace through the same word, making me hear the same and sustaining me, not because of my works or merits, but for his name's sake, that his grace might make him glorious, and that he might glorify his name in me. Hitherto he has spoken of the pasture; now follows the protection against the enemies.

V. 4 Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for you are with me.

(5) Then we see that a Christian or believer, from the outward appearance, lacks all things and must be in the midst of misfortune, that is, in the valley of darkness, where there is no light, no comfort, no hope, but the door of hell is open, and yet he has confidence that he lacks nothing inwardly, boasts of it, and fears no misfortune. Not as if he himself could do this by his ability and counsel, but he says, "Thou art with me" with the word of life, namely, "Thou sustainest me".

right in the middle of death and the valley of all misfortune; as now follows:

Your rod and staff comfort me.

With this he confesses his weakness. For what need is there of a rod or staff for one who is strong and sturdy? For Christ's word is our strength, by which we are not only sustained but also comforted. Others have no need of such a staff, but stand firm on their legs and are strong in their arms.

I understand "staff" and "stick" for one and the same, namely for the word. Unless one wanted to distinguish it in such a way that the stick keeps the tired hands and arms upright, but the staff the wavering legs and knees. That he thus shows how both are strengthened by the word, both the walk and the work: the walk in the knees, the work in the arms; that is, that faith and works are awakened and gain their progress through the word.

V. 5. You prepare a table before me against my enemies.

(8) This is a wondrous safeguard, that a table should be prepared against the enemy. Why not rather walls and armor for it? Thus he speaks to make the protection great, as if to say, "Not only am I myself comforted inwardly with the word, and lifted up in the midst of adversity, but I also overcome all enemies outwardly by the word alone. And do this so surely that, while they rage and rage, I do nothing else but sit and eat safely at the banquet and inwardly eat abundantly of the word, as if I were sitting at a deliciously prepared table.

9. see here you have: that the word of god victory be against 'the devil, the world, the flesh, sin, conscience,

death,

For from the word these enemies all flee, and cannot bear it. This then is a wondrous and defiant power and glory of the faithful, that they overcome their enemies with eating, drinking, living well, sitting still, being merry, and being still in the word; and not with storming, raging, resisting, striking down, and avenging themselves by their own devices, works, and plots.

You anoint my head with oil (impinguas balsamo caput meum), and pour me full.

10 This image is taken from the anointing of kings and priests. Me," he says, "you do not anoint alone, but you anoint me abundantly, making me a king who is more than the most victorious and joyful against his enemies. For, to be anointed a king with balm is a work of the highest honor and joy, even victory. So "my cup", my part of the cross, is not a cross, nor does it make me weak or powerless, but makes me drunk, and showers me with comfort and joy, as a stream of water waters and waters the dry and thirsty meadows. Summa: Your word is a paradise of comfort in all tribulation.

V. 6. Goodness and mercy will follow me all my life.

Now he concludes the psalm with a prayer, asking for the continuance of these goods of the word. "They will follow me," he says; that is, grant that they may remain with us without ceasing.

And I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever.

(12) That I may hear the word of God (for there is the house of the Lord, where the word is) at all times, and that it may not even be taken away from me, nor be stolen from me by the false masters, who ceaselessly prepare reenactments. Therefore, prayer, watchfulness and attention are necessary, so that the word may remain with us.

The twenty-fourth Psalm.

1. 1) Content. This is a prophecy how the Gentiles shall be called without the law, and that in a hidden way. According to this calling he abolishes the old law.

V. 1. The earth (terra) is the Lord's.

(2) In order that it may be understood that he is speaking [not only of the promised land, but] of the whole earth, he soon adds in the following part of the verse:

"The Earth Floor" 2c.

3. that it must be called the whole earth. Here he draws the listener into the middle of the matter, so that he sees before his eyes as if the gospel were already revealed now, and hands over to GOD the whole dominion in the whole world.

And what's inside.

4. everything that is inside, kings, princes, peoples, cities, fields, cattle, birds 2c.

The ground and what lives on it.

(5) This is what the earth is called, as far as one can live on it. So God is not only the God of the Jews, but also of the Gentiles, as Paul says to the Romans [Cap. 3, 29, 30].

V. 2. for he founded it on the seas.

(6) That it be heaven and earth, and that which is in them be well reckoned, it is no other king's; he hath founded them. Only the Scriptures have taught this, and no one else. For the philosophers still argue today about what the earth is based on. The Scripture says that it is founded on water, and says this according to the sight of the eyes. For the earth is, as it were, in the water, as it is said in the first book of Moses [Cap. 1, 9]: "Let the water be gathered together" 2c., "that one may see what is dry"; what we see before our eyes.

And prepared by the waters.

(7) These things are done so that the water may not be caught; therefore we see, that cities and villages are not far from the water. Therefore he says that not men but God Himself founded the earth on the waters; that the cities are so divided and built on the waters is the order of our Lord God. Therefore this text goes against the Jews, who think that they alone are God's people, but the Gentiles are a people of the devil; but that is not true, he says here.

1) Note of the original: "September 22".

V. 3. Who will go to the mountain of the Lord?

This is a strong text against the Jews. Now you know that Paul argues against circumcision and that outward appearance of the person, that the Jews are the seed of Abraham; they have the prophecies, they have the promises, they are entrusted with the testament 2c. Here, the prophet also completely takes off such a veneer, God granting that it is a Gentile or a Jew, God does not ask anything. But that he needs a question, he does it for the sake of emphasis: Dear one, who will go to the mountain of the Lord? Soon the Jew answers, "I"; and the priest and his followers also, "I". But he says: It will not happen like that. "For the sake of ambiguity, however, he calls the mountain of the Lord not only the one in Jerusalem, but also the Oerter everywhere where the word of God is taught in the world.

V. 4. And who will stand in his holy place?

9. that is: who belongs to God's people?

Who has innocent hands.

With this he knocks the Jews before the head; because all hypocrites are bloodthirsty people. You want to be Jews and God's people; but you beat the prophets to death. That rhymes badly. Thus I say of the priest: You want to be the church, but you kill the godly, the Christians; that does not mean to be Christians; "Your hands are full of blood", Is. 1, 15. Thus every hypocrite is necessarily a slayer of death; for the Scripture connects both with each other, as in the 55th Psalm, v. 24: "The bloodthirsty and false." As soon as the lie comes into the heart, murder follows it; for then they are jealous of their lies.

And is pure in heart.

10. where do you get it? Peter says [^]Apost. 15:9]: "By faith the heart is cleansed." A heart that trusts in God is not defiled with another trust. Neither can the hypocrites. But he deliberately calls the work first, then the heart, so that he attacks them where they are most clearly to be attacked, namely in the very work of murder. But where there is no faith, there is necessarily an ungodly heart.

He who has no desire for loose teaching (Qui non levavit in vano animam suam).

This is a dark speech in Hebrew, which I do not know if I understand correctly. It is the same word "vi in the following Psalm [Ps. 25:1], "Unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul." I take "lift up the soul" for be proud and blow out. This follows one another in right order: hypocrisy cloaked with lies and murder, and thereafter boasting, as it is said in the 10th Psalm, v. 4. "The wicked is so proud and angry that he asks for no man." For when they have done evil, they rejoice, and are glad when it is most evil; as the sophists are doing now at Augsburg. Secondly, this, "to lift up the soul," may be taken for seeing, delighting in, and indulging in vain and loose things; as it is written in Jeremiah [Cap. 44:14]: The land after which they lift up their souls, that is, for which they have lust and desire, they shall not find. Therefore this would be the mind: They are occupied with the most important things, are busy with it, and strive for it day and night. However, I prefer to follow the first opinion.

And do not swear falsely.

12. This is he who does not falsely call on the name of the LORD. "Swear" is the voice of false prophets, whose custom is to teach under the name of the LORD, and sell their lies: that is, "falsely swear." Therefore [one must do away with] killing, being idolatrous, being proud, teaching evil and wrong; these must be done away with if it is in the way; thus the right name of God, the right calling, humility and love remain. Neither a Jew nor a priest has these things, but a godly man. That is why Judaism and Pabbism are at a standstill here; only that one has pure faith and righteous humility; all the rest is worthless.

V. 5. He will receive blessings from the Lord.

(13) There is an emphasis on "he", that is, anyone who does this will be blessed by God, regardless of whether he is a Jew or not. So that he will badly take away the blessing from all who have a reputation. This is a great promise, that he who has an innocent life and innocent hands shall be sure that he has a God, likewise that he shall have enough here and there. But this is part of it, that he who is blessed by the Lord shall bear the curse of the world and of men. Nevertheless it says here: "The blessing is as strong as the curse.

And righteousness from the GOD of his salvation.

14. He shall have the Holy Spirit and the grace of God for this. Here is the word [^]Hos. 6, 6.]: "I delight in love and not in sacrifice." This is the righteousness not of law, or of public office, but which one owes to another among us, for it is all kinds of good deeds, done to our neighbor, which we owe to him. So now he says: He will receive "righteousness", that is, benefits and mercy from the God of his salvation. Here he also confesses that men do him evil and curse him. These are very strong promises, but in the time of trial they do not want to be seen.

V. 6: This is the generation that asks for him.

Here "generation" means a people that remains forever. So he says: "So must we inquire of God, that we may have the right word, and faith, and innocent hands. Being of the seed of Abraham, being circumcised, being a pope or a bishop is nothing.

This one seeks your face, Jacob.

16 "Jacob" I understand for Christ, that he wants to direct the whole people to Christ himself, whom he therefore calls Jacob, because he is a seed of Jacob; but it is also uncertain. Therefore you can understand it like this: These are people who seek your face, that is, the appearance of God Himself, as it is said in Moses [Ex. 33:14], "Your face go before us." For God must make Himself known to us in some visible sign, as He did in the pillar and other revelations; that is, God's faces, that is, things that are seen, by which God indicates that He is with us and favorable to us.

You, Jacob, have God's face. But who seeks it? No one, except those who have innocent hands 2c. Thus, in the Gospel there are three faces: baptism, in which God makes known that he is present; also, the visible word, and the sacrament of the altar.

V. 7. Make the gates wide (Attollite, portae, capita vestra).

18) After the prophecy, how the kingdom of the Lord Christ shall be revealed, there follows an exhortation: "Gentlemen, because it is about to happen that the king will come in, open the windows, the doors and the gates, and let him in. "The gates," he says, "that is where only gates are in all cities of all kingdoms. Through the gates are the public offices. Where there are gates, he says, lift up your heads, open them wide, make room. He wants to show how great this kingdom is, namely, that no gate is so wide that it can contain him. And he exhorted them to prepare the way for him, and to know that the greatest king of all was coming to them, greater than all the kingdoms of the world, that their gates were far too small.

And the doors in the world high.

That is where only doors are in the whole world.

That the king of honors moves in.

20 For honor is hidden, so the gates are closed to him, and no one desires to let him in. The authorities also oppose him, but it is of no avail. He is a mighty king of the cross, and yet glory is hidden under the cross.

V. 8. Who is the same king of honors?

This is how it will be for him: Who? say they, the heretic, the rebel? That is what they call the king. Who is the king of honors? This is spoken most contemptuously, and it shows the most certain contempt of this king; as he is also now despised at Augsburg. It is a ridiculous thing to them that he is called "a king of honor. Therefore he says further:

He is the LORD strong and mighty, the LORD mighty in battle.

He is a mighty and powerful Lord, who has a great and mighty kingdom. But he does not speak of physical warfare, but rather he speaks in a fanciful way, as if the power to keep peace is based on laws, but the power to wage war is based on armor and weapons. These two things are with this king, and he also wars against the spirits under heaven.

V. 9. Open wide the gates 2c.

(23) He does not desist when he is once rejected, but repeats this verse only in defiance. The more they resist, the more he persists, because he wants to reign in the midst of his enemies.

V. 10. It is the LORD of hosts. He is the King of honors.

24. Christ is the LORD of hosts, for he is in daily armor and training. This must be said all the more often in this way, because it cannot be seen before the eyes.

The twenty-fifth Psalm.

The psalm is private and of private matters, for there is nothing in it about public preaching or worldly rule, for it is simply a prayer of the conscience of an individual, in which he asks that God may be merciful to him, forgive sin, and make him pious, guide and lead him. It is therefore a confession of sin, and he complains about his enemies and asks for wisdom and justice.

V. 1. After you, Lord, I long (Ad te, Domine, levavi animam meam).

2. "Lifting up the soul" is the right power of prayer, which is not a useless babble, nor of many words. And they have not spoken rightly who have said that prayer is an ascension of the heart to God; but it is, as the Psalm says here, an elevation of the soul. "But the soul" is the longing and groaning of the heart, which is weary with great desire. He says: "I lift up my soul" 2c., that is, my soul sighs for you, and desires something.

There is a great emphasis on the words "after you", as if he should say: I have nowhere else to go. It seems that his sins have pressed him, and he has felt the wrath of God; and yet he turns with his prayer against the wrathful God. Now, if one can sing the "after you" when he feels God's wrath upon him, and can desire something against God, that is, against how God makes himself feel, that is an art.

(4) Either the sins or the terrors that afflict us, be it whichever, one feels God no differently than an angry God. Hence it comes that one seeks refuge here, the other out there, and one invokes the Virgin Mary, the other St. Peter; but it all helps nothing. This is the best advice, that you break through these clouds of God's anger, and remember how God is in secret, and yet is favorable to you, as he says here: God, I rely on you; my God, in you I trust.

V. 2. Let me not be put to shame, lest my enemies rejoice over me.

(5) There we see what his matter is, namely, that he is oppressed by terror and his conscience. But this is both the face of the wrathful God; as now at Augsburg our sins oppress us, which each one feels for himself, and the adversaries afflict us. But we pray for both, that God may forgive us our sins and put to shame and destroy our enemies.

6 "That they rejoice not." All their thing is to triumph, and to make us ashamed, that we must succumb with shame. With this he confesses that there is shame, and that he feels the shame, but he desires that the shame not endure, and that he not be left in the shame: Dear Lord, do not leave me in it. He also feels that his enemies rejoice.

V. 3: For no one will be put to shame who waits for you.

7 Here he consoles himself with a glorious promise that flows from the first commandment: I am the God who does good in a thousand ways. There is a strong emphasis on the words: "He who waits for you"; yes, it does. "But hope, when it is consumed, troubles the heart" [Proverbs 13:12]. Our people, who are now at Augsburg, would not like to be put to shame, but they must "wait". For the promise is faithful and certain, God does not forsake. Who? He who waits. He does not strike quickly with a club, for he gives room for repentance, and is by nature kind, patient, and suffers the wicked. Such things must be known and understood, therefore we must wait. Finally, he will not let the wicked go unpunished, and he will not abandon those who wait for him.

8. "None." There has never been anyone on earth who lacked it, therefore we will not lack it.

9 "Becomes a disgrace." He suffers well, but is not put to shame. Now he adds

In the first commandment, he also connects the promise and the condemnation with each other.

But to shame they must become, the loose despisers (qui contemnunt te frustra).

10 Boged means to despise, and not only that, but certainly to despise, that they do not remember the despising; as v. Eck despises me and others, whom he does not consider worthy to call by their name; those who go there so surely, and are so certain, that they do not ask anything about it. Those who are most certain of triumph, who are not sure of it, who fear nothing less than that they should be lacking, become disgraced. But why? Because the first commandment says so, and yet they do not believe it, but laugh at it.

11 Frustra, without cause. Yes, they have great causes; but he says, "Without cause," by which he means that one becomes hostile to them. For why do Eck and others puff themselves up like this? Because they have the causes that D. Usingen writes: We have the emperor entirely on our side, we surpass them in power, quantity 2c. These are quite respectable causes of their contempt; and yet he says, "Without cause," for they lack One Cause, namely, GOD and the Word and Work of GOD. If this is not there, let the cause be as great as it will, it is still nothing. For what is Caesar? what is the world against God? This he says against those who frighten him.

Now he turns to God and entrusts himself to his protection, so that he will guide him on the right road. This prayer is necessary for us, both in our special and in public affairs, because our adversaries want to oppose and defy us, and they dare badly to force us into their ungodly ways. Therefore he asks and says:

V. 4. Lord, show me your ways and teach me your paths.

13) Here he looks at their ways and says: Beware, dear Lord, they are shameful ways, show me "your ways". This pronoun s "your"] always expresses a contrast and excludes all other ways. Yes, dear Lord

God, do not let me fall into any other way. For we are weak, and "carry such treasure in earthly vessels" [2 Cor. 4:7], and "have to fight with the mighty in the air" [Eph. 6:12]. The devil, when alone, can soon overpower a man. Therefore he asks, "Show me thy ways."

V. 5. Guide me in your truth.

(14) Not only do I desire your ascents, that is, your word, but I also ask, after I have the word, that you yourself be my master, and give me right knowledge and understanding in doctrine, that I may remain pure in it.

15. in your truth, not in false appearances. Beware that I do not grasp it, as the hypocrites do. The papists have the pope's decree concerning the celibate state of priests, after which they also have Scripture to prove it, but not in truth, for they misrepresent Scripture.

And teach me.

16. inside the heart.

For you are the God who helps me; daily I wait for you.

V. 6. Remember, O Lord, thy mercy, and thy lovingkindness, which was from the world.

(17) I know not any other helper, where thou wilt not keep me in thy word. Therefore I call upon thee, and wait, though thou consume, and leave me in the glue. This is one request, that he make him devout. Now follows the other request, from the conscience.

V. 7. Remember not the sins of my youth and my transgression.

18. one should not forget the sin done before, as Sirach says [Cap. 5, 5.]: "Be not sure if your sin is not punished yet." And Ps. 51, 5. "My sin is always before me." And Moses [5th Book, Cap. 9, 7.]: "Remember that ye have provoked the LORD to anger from the day that I brought you out of Egypt," and tell afterward where they provoked him to anger. So, what a man has done evil, he shall not forget. The cause is this: if we forget our sins, grace will also be considered little in us; as Peter also says in 2 Peter 1:9: "He forgets the cleansing of his former sins," and if we forget our sins, we do not thank God. But if we do not thank God, we are sure and ready to commit greater atrocities. Therefore, we should remember the sins we have committed and say: "I have lived in such and such a way, I have done such and such a thing. Then praise God that He has forgiven you for all of it. In this way grace becomes glorious, and one remains fine in devotion.

19 "The sins of my youth" 2c. Do not remember my sin, but remember your mercy and good deed, which you have shown not to me alone, but to everyone else. The "mercy" is that he forgave the sins. But "goodness" is that he has given many other goods; there is no merit in it. Remember, O Lord, that thou hast given me so much, and forgiven my sin. So when one remembers his sins, God also remembers His mercy.

Do not remember the sins of my youth and my transgression.

20 This is a prayer for the sins. He explains the previous verse, what he means by mercy. I beg you to stay on it, on the mercy. And he says quite significantly about the "sins of youth," for youth is not at all capable of virtue, the blood is still too young and too fresh, and is not able to govern itself, nor does it think what is necessary and good for it. Therefore he confesses that he sinned in his youth. One whores, the other drinks 2c., because the blood is still too wild and fresh. Therefore, if a boy is allowed to grow up in his sod, he becomes a pure devil. Before one learns what he is doing, it is already done.

21 But he asks for the sins of his youth, so that he knows that our Lord God can avenge old sins; for this he should be asked. If one wants to forget the previous sins and his grace, he can pull out the register and say: You know what you have done. It shall be forgiven, but so far that thou shalt not forget it; for if thou art the

If you forget your sins, you will also forget grace. Christ also reminds us of this: "Do this in remembrance of me" [1 Cor. 11:24]. When we remember our Lord God, we must also remember our sins; just as we pray for our sins in the Lord's Prayer.

Remember me according to your mercy, for your goodness' sake.

22. not according to your anger; remember that you are a kind God, you are very good; he knows nothing to allege, except that God is kind and gracious, benevolent and kind-hearted. So we should pray to provoke God, not by our works, but by His grace: "Oh, dear God, do not look at my works, but see that You are good and kind, not that I am evil. If nothing can be imposed on our Lord God but mercy, he is glad to hear it. Now he prophesies and promises.

V. 8. The Lord is good and pious.

23. is a promise that the prayer is answered. "The Lord is good," that is, kind, gracious and right. It can be seen that the word "pious" (rectus) is opposed to hypocrisy, as is the word truth. Therefore he says, "The Lord is good"; but yet he is not a ruler of persons. For he looks at no man's righteousness, wisdom and power. He 1) is a sincere, honest man, and yet kind; he is good, he does much good, but not to those who want to earn it from him.

Therefore he instructs the sinners on the way.

(24) This is a necessary addition, which is condemned in all the wicked, namely, that God teaches sinners or makes them blessed. That is why the interpreter of this Psalm got angry and said: He lays down a law, for "he instructs". But this is the cause that the whole human race can make no distinction among sinners. God is hostile to sinners, but to sinners who do not want to be sinners. For we are all sinners, but we do not all want to be sinners. Those who now recognize for sinners, they have a God. Again, God is hostile to those who do not want to be sinners; as Christ says Matth. 21, 31: "Truly I say to you: The publicans and harlots may enter the kingdom of heaven sooner than you" 2c., and Joh. 9, 41.: "If you were blind, you would have no sin" 2c.

1) In the original: It.

(25) "The Lord is righteous," he is not hypocritical, he is righteous. But you say he is not righteous, because he accepts sinners. As in the prophet Malachi, the Jews dispute. Mal. 2:17: "Ye make the Lord displeased with your speeches, saying, Wherewith do we make him displeased?" 2c.

(26) "Sinners," that is, those who know sin; but he speaks this especially for himself and for others. He will teach those who want to be taught.

V. 9. He guides the wretched rightly.

(27) This is the other request, that as the prayer of teaching is answered, so also the prayer of help may be answered.

(28) For the word humiles, wretched, the interpreter put mites, meek, in the Latin text, because he was offended by this word. "Right," that is, not in wrath, as it is written in Jeremiah [Cap. 10, 24.], "Chasten me, O Lord, yet with measures, and not in thy wrath, lest thou wear me out." And Isaiah calls the Lord "a God of judgment" [Isa. 30:18]. He punishes so that he keeps a measure, he makes it modest, and as Paul says 1 Cor. 10, 13.: "He makes the temptation to gain such an end that you can bear it." For this purpose he used the word "guide" as if he wanted to say: He afflicts in such a way that he guides, so that they can come out and have a right way before them to come out. He does not do as men do or as the devil does, who corrupts from the beginning.

And teach the wretched his way.

29 The word "teach," which he always used, comes to a teacher. But here it is written of those who learn. As if he should say: He makes them disciples (discipulat), he makes them experience it, and thus learn; he trains them. For the cross instructs, and creates that one has to learn, and

The cross is a right rod (flagellum judicii), or a moderate rod. Thus God now makes us suffer at Augsburg, but will do it in such a way that it will not be a wrath. Thus he teaches through the cross; there are people who can speak of it,

V. 10. The ways of the Lord are goodness and truth.

30 With this he praises the Christian and godly life, that it is pure goodness and faithfulness; for "the ways" or paths mean the commandments of God, or the life in God's commandments. "Goodness and truth", that is, benevolence and sincere mind, that there is no hypocrisy. We can understand this more easily from the contradiction. In the ways of the wicked there is nothing but doing harm and being false; it is all sin and iniquity; for they are incapable of all good works; no wicked man can do no good work. But all that a godly man does is a good deed, for all is well done, sleeping, walking, and standing; for they abstain from sins, and keep the ways of the Lord. So a godly person is skilled and capable of all good works, as St. Paul says [2 Tim. 3:17]. On the other hand, an ungodly man, like Eck, who preaches, gives alms, prays, or does whatever he wants, is a devil, because he does it either for the sake of honor, or righteousness, or for the sake of glory. So all the ways of men, even when they are best, are vain and hypocritical. If they are ways, and not errors, that is, their best works, they are not good.

To those who keep his covenant and testimony.

(31) That is, to those who fear God, that is, who live their lives according to the word, everything they do is goodness and truth, because the word they live by is of this kind.

The covenant belongs to the first commandment which we made there with God, that He should be our God and we His people.

33 This is now half of the psalm. In the first part he asked for help against his enemies; item, taught and instructed, and finally asked for forgiveness of sins. Now he says about other sins.

V. 11. For your name's sake, O Lord, be merciful to my iniquity.

34. he does not say here about the sins of youth, he still wants to remain a sinner, and says he has even more sins than the sins of his youth. For [Ps. 19, 13.], "Who can tell how often he lacks?" We are always in sins. This the sophists cannot understand, that a Christian is righteous, and yet at the same time still has sins. But the prophet says, "I was a sinner in my youth, and you instructed me; now I am an old fool, and have been taught, and yet I do not do as I should. So also Paul says that sin is in the flesh. Since Paul says this, we will certainly also have to say it, because as much as we carry in us flesh, so much we also have of sins; as Paul says of himself that he is half a saint, half a sinner, Rom. 7, 23.

(35) Now this sin, of which he complains here, is original sin; for this word "iniquity," which is here written, almost always signifies the ingrained and principal sin, and at the same time indicates that the man is bad, and the sin is evil; as we are wont to say, This is a vice of a man. For the former sins concern works; but here he says of the original sin, which we cannot do without because we live, for it does not depart from us except through death. And in the Epistle to the Hebrews, Cap. 12, 1, it is called "the sin that always clings to us." Circumstans is as much as adhaerens, it sticks as dirt to the wheel.

36 But against this sin there is no remedy, but that we live under grace. For though sin is present, yet we are not under sin, and sin has no dominion over us. Therefore we should learn that our life is a constant struggle against inherent sin, because everything else we have in knowledge and righteousness is too little.

37. for the sake of your name. A mercy seat has been created for sin, so that our Lord God must close his eyes and say, as Ps. 32:2 says: "Blessed is the man to whom the Lord does not reprove iniquity.

net." And in Jeremiah, Cap. 31, 1) 34, it says: "I will remember their sin no more." Our Lord God reserves the imputation of sins for us, so that we may learn that He gives us forgiveness of sins and does not impute sins to us, so that if we do not want to recognize that we have sinned, He will impute them to us. This is our theology, as we pray, "Forgive us our trespasses"; that we may know that we live in grace alone. Grace not only takes away sin, but also tolerates it; this is called the mercy seat.

38. "Be gracious." The word, Salach (XXX) means: not to cancel, or not to impute; but it actually belongs to original sin, which is accepted with mercy, as if a prince had in his court, for instance, a man who had committed a death-blow, and therefore kept him prisoner, after which he said: Well, I will impute the death to you until you confess that you have done it, and that I do not impute it to you out of grace alone, and not either out of merit or duty, as if I had to release you. This is now our mercy seat, Christ, as Paul says to the Romans [Cap. 3, 25].

Which is big there.

(39) Much, or great in all things, and in every respect. We feel this well, and especially a strong man, who is easily overcome by anger, avarice, fornication. We feel all the horrible sins, murder, fornication, adultery, in us. The papists call them a weakness; but here the prophet says that they are sins, and great sins at that, as Paul also calls them [Rom. 7:23.]: "A law that opposeth and taketh captive." For the flesh rages and lusts, but the Spirit resisteth him, saying, Fie on thee; there thy mercy seat belongeth; as he saith here, "Be merciful to my iniquity."

40 Now come promises again for those who fight and struggle against sin. Then our Lord God must send boys upon us, and we must pray and do so until we come under the earth.

1) In the original: In here. 3.

2) Here we have deleted "not". In the original and in the old translation: "nicht zurechnen".

For the sake of your name.

41. 1) Is a short but very great prayer, in which he asks that he be received into the kingdom of grace; for sins are great and many, for the whole man is half sin.

Now he speaks from a very great and violent movement. Oh that one could teach the people and make them know their sins! For this is to fear the Lord. But for this we must bite ourselves; for they do not want to be sinners, and despise God. We would like all people to know that they are sinners. And as the prophet says here:

V. 12: Who is the one who fears the Lord?

43 As if to say, Oh that men knew these things, and knew their sins! how few they are. But those who fear him have this first: He teaches him the way he has chosen. This is the first privilege and gift of those who recognize their sins, and of those who give glory to God and seek mercy, that he teaches them the way he has chosen, namely the way that is most pleasing to God. But this is a great blessing, that one can be sure that his way and life are chosen before God, and that everything he does is pleasing to God. 2c.

44. But the security of the wicked is an abomination. They take it upon themselves to do something, but when they are asked, "Do you think it will please God? I do not know. But whoever feels himself to be a sinner, and that he is nothing in his nature, let him think that God will instruct him in his way, that is, in such a way that he may know that it pleases God. Now, of all the benefits that God gives, this is the greatest, that a conscience can be certain.

V. 13. His soul will dwell in goodness.

(45) This teaching is followed by many gifts; as Solomon says of wisdom [Book of Wisdom, Cap. 7:11], "All good things came to me with her." So, too, he who has the spiritual desire and goods will, of course, have enough in other respects. This is what the word entails.

1) Note of the original: "September 25".

And his seed will possess the land.

46 He prophesied to the wicked that they would perish, but to the godly he promised that they would remain forever. The wicked, says the text, will not take root. But these words can be understood either of the spiritual seed or of the physical seed; for God blesses both. Thus, to St. Augustine the spiritual seed has been given for the bodily. As the first Psalm, v. 3. says, "Its leaves do not wither." Their word must not fall, they must have disciples.

V. 14: The secret of the Lord is among those who fear him.

That is, his secret conversation; for the word of God is in two uses: first, in public appearance; so all the ungodly have the word of God. But they are only the shells, they do not have the core, that is, the locum of grace, the fruit of Christ's suffering 2c., although they have painted the history on all the walls. But no one knows the benefit of Christ's suffering; it always remains a secret. The reason for this is that they do not want to be sinners, but Christ suffered for sinners. Hence it is that they know how to speak much of the suffering of Christ, but do not understand it. When we say, Christ suffered for thee, therefore thou art a sinner, they will not go near.

48 Secondly, the godly not only have the word in public manifestation, but also understand it. For the mystery is revealed to them, as Christ says John 14:23: "We will come to him and make our abode with him"; for he opens the Scriptures to them, so that they must know all the secrets of the Scriptures.

And his covenant he lets them know.

49. namely, the covenant that he promised to be their God. This Eck and the sophists do not understand; for it is written Ps. 14:1: "The foolish say in their heart, There is no God. When it comes to the meeting, they say: There is no God; therefore this covenant remains hidden to the wicked, and is only open to the godly.

bar. Here he complains again that they do not want to recognize their sin. Oh, that people do not want to recognize their sin and do not want to be sinners!

v. 15 My eyes always look to the Lord, for he will pull my foot out of the net.

(50) Hitherto therefore hath he disputed against the hypocrites, and against the righteousness of works, as we also do: therefore must we also contend with them. We would gladly have them recognize their sins; but they would gladly have us accept their lies. And besides this strife we have other enemies. Therefore he pleads now to the end of the psalm against the tribulations. Because we teach such fear and lead people to the knowledge of sin, we must suffer over it. It is called patience. Likewise, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay," Heb. 10:30. We do not want to do more than call upon God and say: I know that you will drag my feet out of the net. They are after our blood; what shall we do? Our Lord God will pull us out one day.

v. 16. Turn to me and be merciful to me (miserere mei).

51 Miserere, that is, make it well with me, have mercy on me.

For I am lonely and miserable.

I am a unifier, that is, lonely and forsaken.

v. 17 The anguish of my heart is great; lead me out of my troubles.

(53) It grieves me in my heart; this causes terror. I think that Philippicha 3) also knows what this means, for this is the most fearful thing, that in every challenge there is tribulation and terror of heart. This is an inevitable conclusion. The heart always remembers: You have offended against our Lord God in some way. Thus, conscience and faith always fight against the terror and wrath of God.

1) Erlanger: vinäiotam instead of: vindtota.

2) Erlanger: äst instead of: äslaciuso; a misprint.

3) This is Melanchthon. Compare Ps. 20, K5.

v. 18. Behold my wretchedness and misery.

54) Behold, dear Lord, how I am afflicted, how I labor and wallow. 4)

And forgive me all my sins.

55) This word Nasa (XXX) means to cancel sin, as in the 32nd Psalm, v. 1: "Blessed is he whose transgressions are forgiven." Does not speak of atonement for sin, 5) but [says]: Whether I have transgressed, let a good conscience overtake me, after that save me also from my enemies.

v. 19. Behold, mine enemies are so many, and they hate me for iniquity.

I am alone, and they have no right to me. With this he confesses that he has sinned, and asks for forgiveness, and yet says, "They hate me out of iniquity." Against GOD I am a sinner, I have done them no harm; he complains of them as one innocent. Look at me for righteousness' sake. Know? Of the sinner. In the same way, if I were among a bunch of murderers, I could say: I deserve it against God, but not against them. One should confess righteousness before the world. If H[erzog] J[örg] attacks me, I may well say that he does me wrong; for H[erzog] J[örg] does not sit in the judgment seat where GOD sits. God can say to me: You are a knave; H[erzog] J[örg] and the whole world cannot say it.

57 "For sacrilege," because I teach the truth, and help them with my teaching; they should thank me, so they hate me. Thus we are the protection of the papists; thus they give us this for that they redden against me.

v. 20. Preserve my soul and save me; do not let me be put to shame, for I trust in you.

Here he comes to the end. I command you my soul, do not let me become a disgrace. You are long-suffering, and you must be with await punishment, you are slow with punishments, but protect me. Thus we have surrendered our confession; what does it matter, he will also prove himself again that he is our God, so that we will not be disgraced with our faith.

V. 21. Bad and right, that keep me.

(59) This saying has been badly understood by the papists, and attracted by the saints. "Bad and right" is that I am sincere and without blame in my life. "Right" is that one is without hypocrisy, who says it out as it is for their heart, goes through freely with life and speech, does not let themselves be

V. 22. God, deliver Israel from all their troubles.

61 He adds this for all the people. Do likewise to the whole kingdom, to those who sit in the priesthood and in the temporal government. Here we see how this kingdom has always been in tribulation.

than the 29th 42nd 45th 51st 56th 81st 128th 133rd 137th 147th and 148th *)

Laid out in 1530 and in the following years.

Translated from Latin.

The twenty-ninth Psalm.

1. is even a prophetic psalm, from the preaching of the gospel, and contains in itself how all the saints and worldly wise piety and righteousness are rejected, and the righteousness of faith alone is valid.

V. 1. Bring glory and strength to the Lord.

2 That is, preach that he alone is glory and strength.

V. 2. Bring glory to the Lord for His name, worship the Lord in holy adornment.

3. adorn yourselves, make yourselves beautiful with the preparation of the gospel and peace, that you may be beautiful when you praise him.

V. 3: The voice of the Lord goes out on the waters.

*This scripture is found, also in Latin with German words mixed in, in the book mentioned with the previous scripture, which the children and heirs of Veit Dietrich published. In this book, there is not a new superscription, which would indicate that this is a special writing, but before each interpretation, there is only the number of the Psalm in question. In the above-mentioned dedication, the editors state that Luther himself (as well as the second interpretation of the first eight Psalms and the 23rd Psalm) wrote the interpretations of the 45th and the 128th Psalm. The same will be written also Wohl still on the Coburg (Köstlin, M. Luther, vol. II, p. 657 aâ 225, 2 (instead of 25. it should be called 45. there)). The other interpretations Dietrich collected afterwards in the following years in Wittenberg (Trl. exeg. opp., tönn. XVII, x. IV). In Latin, these interpretations are found only in the Latin Erlangen edition, tom. XVII, p. 232 8^4. In German translation in the Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 95; in the Altenburger, Bb. V, p. 497; in the Leipzig, vol. V, p. 339, and in the Erlangen, vol. 38, p. 276. We give the German text, improved from the original Latin.

This is the voice of the gospel. The gospel is glorious. The "waters" are the nations and kingdoms.

The God of honor thunders, the Lord on great waters.

5. Rom. 1, 18: "God's wrath is revealed from heaven."

V. 4. the voice of the Lord goes with power, the voice of the Lord goes gloriously.

6. one lies down against it, but it goes through, and keeps the triumph always; 2 Cor. 10, 4.: "The weapons of our knighthood are mighty before God."

V. 5. the voice of the LORD breaks the cedars, the LORD breaks the cedars in Lebanon.

7. he breaks the devil even in the Jewish land. The cedars in Lebanon are the great Hansas, the priests, the high priests.

V. 6 And make them like a calf, Lebanon and Sirion, like a young unicorn.

The gospel makes the heart glad, makes one joyful and humble; but again, it strikes down the hopeful. "The mountains leaped like lambs, and the hills like young sheep," Ps. 114:4, 6.

V. 7: The voice of the Lord is like flames of fire.

(9) This may mean that the voice of the Lord goes forth with great power, like a flame of fire, or other fiery instruments. Fire does not jest when it comes to a tower. The voice of the Lord is a stone cutter, hewing through like a flame of fire. With this he points to the fiery, cutting sword, Gen. 3, 24. It cuts, namely the persecutors. He is talking about the law.

V. 8. the voice of the Lord arouses the desert, the voice of the Lord arouses the desert of Kadesh.

10. [This is] making a great noise; as Christ himself saith [Matt. 10:34.], "I am not come to send peace." Item [Luc. 12, 49.]: "I am come to send a fire.

set on fire on earth." And Ps. 99:1: "The Lord is King, therefore the nations rage." He punishes the world because of sin, makes them tremble and make them realize their sin. He afflicts the wilderness. This is spoken of the terror of the Word.

V. 9 The voice of the Lord arouses the hinds and exposes the forests.

(11) This verse can be interpreted in many ways: After he has aroused the hinds, he strips the forests bare, so that the beasts are gone, and one does not devour the other, so that it is safe in the forest from the beasts. Or in this way: "He strips the forests", that is, removes piety and wisdom, cuts them down. And the word chasaph means to flake away. This explanation pleases me well; as if he should say: You must take off the skirt, the leaves; because you do not bear fruit. It can also be understood as the abolition of the Old Testament; he cuts off the leaves and takes away their adornment, as it is written Matth. 21, 43: "The kingdom of God will be taken from you and given to the Gentiles" 2c. The hinds (cervas) 1) he frees from the service of the law, that they may practice the Scriptures.

And in his temple everyone will say honor to him.

12. that is, everyone will praise him, Psalm 115, 1.: "Not to us, Lord, not to us, but to your name give glory." The kingdom of Christ is a kingdom of honor.

V. 10. The LORD sits to make a flood of sin, and the LORD remains a king forever.

(13) This is what I would like to understand about baptism, although it is uncertain, namely, that he will bring about a new flood of sin, but a flood of salvation; he will give a new water, a new Spirit. Baptism is a flood of sin. Now more have been baptized than have perished in the flood, for twenty ages have passed since the time when baptism began.

1) In the old translation: "heathens", which was probably read from "hinden".

But if one wants to interpret it in an evil way, one may understand it like this: The Lord will still remain king when all the wicked have been destroyed and killed.

v. 11. The LORD will give strength to his people.

14 The opposition can be seen as the weakest of all [this people], therefore it needs special strength from the Lord.

The Lord will bless His people with peace.
(15) It is in great need of it, for it is reviled and cursed.

The forty-second Psalm.*)

V. 2. 3. As the deer cries out for fresh water, so my soul cries out to you, O God. My soul thirsts for God, for the living God. When will I come to see the face of God?

The summa of this psalm is: The believer is challenged; in the challenge he calls upon God; when he calls, he is heard and comforted. For this is not really a special teaching, but an example of one who calls upon God in his temptation and is comforted when he is heard.

But here someone might ask: since it is the case with all temptations that we flee from God, and every temptation brings with it despair, enmity, impatience and grumbling against God, how is it then that the prophet says here that he has a desire for God in his tribulation? Here a distinction must be made, for God is twofold: at times He is a hidden and covered God; as when the conscience in affliction feels sin, feels other damages, either spiritual or bodily, to which it clings, and cannot console itself that God is merciful and gracious to it. Those who judge according to this, namely the hidden image of God, fall into despair and damnation without any salvation.

3. the other image of God is uncovered, or a revealed and not a hidden God, namely the right image of the kind, gracious, merciful, reconciled God 2c. Just as the sun is of two kinds, whereas but in truth is only One Sun, just as there is only one God. For it can be called another sun when it is covered with clouds than when it shines out of the clear sky. If now someone wanted to judge according to the then existing image of the sun when it is covered with clouds, he would have to think that it would never become day and worry about an eternal night. But this is an art, and in truth a golden art, that one thinks that when the sun is covered and hidden with clouds and fog, it will nevertheless overcome the clouds and fog and illuminate the world.

(4) This is what the prophet does when he is in trouble and straightens himself out and desires to see the sun when it has broken through the clouds. He makes a different image in his heart than he sees before his eyes. And even if his conscience frightens him, makes him feel bad, and he almost wants to succumb in despair, he still straightens up in faith, does not throw away hope, and takes comfort in the fact that God will help him and set him up again so that he may see the service of God in the place that God alone had ordered on the entire face of the earth. 2c.

v. 4. My tears are my food day and night, because they say to me daily, "Where is your God?"

5. feeling that God is angry, being abandoned by God, not being able to have the Word, that hurts.

*Note of the original: "This psalm he has laid out in the castle Pretsch, early in the morning, when one wanted to go out hunting" (snd venationem). - In eastslllo kreiseN can also be translated: "in the spot Pretsch", as the old translator gave it.

V. 5: When I remember this, I pour out my heart.

When I hear such words, it goes through my heart. To "pour out one's heart" is to yearn sincerely 1) and, I believe, to ask, to pray. When I hear this, I first of all pray in earnest, and then my heart bursts out.

With myself.

(7) Alone with me, no one can complain but myself. I pour out my heart before him, as if I wanted to pour it out with sighs.

For I would gladly go with the multitude, and go with them to the house of God, with rejoicing and thanksgiving among the multitude that celebrate (festum agente).

He would like to go to church, that is his opinion; he feels that he is far from God, so he would like to be with the crowd where God's word is preached. The Latin Tert has [instead of festum agente the word: sonus epulantis, that is, of the feasts, da man rühmet, prediget.

V. 6. Why are you distressed, my soul, and so troubled within me?

9. is the consolation. He has now poured out.

Wait on God, for I will thank Him yet, that He helps me with His face.

10 The face means God's presence wherever God is, whether in faith or in sight. But here it means in faith. This is my salvation, that he helps me with his dear word. So we can say: The face is the knowledge, the knowledge is the faith and the word.

v. 7. My God, my soul is distressed within me; therefore I remember you in the land of Jordan and Hermonim, in the little mountain.

11 Here he alludes to the kingdom and Zion.

1) Erlanger: "see".

V. 8. Thy floods roar, that here a deep, and there a deep roar; all thy billows and thy waves go over me.

12) "Deep" (abyssus) means a huge and great mass of water; they come against each other, he says. One flood comes upon another; when one has ceased, another cries out. But he adds that they "rush" to indicate how the conscience feels it. "Flood" is first a gathering of the waters, after which it becomes a lake that roars. This takes place at the same time (sunt corre- lativa), that here becomes a swamp and there a marsh and boils. I feel almost like Pharaoh in the Red Sea; that is what he is alluding to. He calls the beating together of the waters in the sea floods (catarractas).

V. 9. The Lord has promised his goodness by day, and by night I sing to him and pray to God for my life.

The Lord wants us to praise his mercy, or to believe that he is merciful and wants to help. When the time of mercy is, he is merciful; but when it is night, let us pray in temptation. In the daytime he wills to help, so shall I say in the 2) night. When it is day, he promises his goodness, that is the time of grace, so we should not forget it at night.

v. 10-12. I say to God, my Rock: Why have you forgotten me? Why must I walk so sadly when my enemy presses me? It is as murder in my legs that my enemies revile me; for they say to me daily, Where is now thy God? Why do you grieve, my soul, and are so troubled within me? Wait upon God; for I shall yet thank him, that he is the help of my face, and my God.

14 This is a prosopopoeia. Now he sings and prays.

2) In the original: "I's", which is: I of.

The forty-fifth Psalm.

V. 2. 3. My heart sings a fine song, I will sing of a king, my tongue is a pen of a good writer. You are the most beautiful.

1. 1) According to the manner of orators, he first draws the attention of the listeners, because he promises that he will sing about a useful, yes, lovely and certain thing. 2) He promises not only certain things, but also that he will sing about them in the best and sweetest way, as a very skillful orator or writer is wont to do; that is, he will speak with graceful, certain words, which come from the spirit.

2. 3) Therefore this king does not overcome and rule with force or weapons, but he is strong through beauty. Then he does not rule with the sword, but with the lips, that is, with the word; and that with blessed lips, that is, with the word of grace, which preaches the form of Christ, so that he attracts and draws all men to himself, as Moses, on the other hand, with the terrible and shapeless wrath of the law, deterred all men, drove them away, or at least made them unwilling through hatred.

The beautiful form of Christ is the grace that he shows us and offers us all that he has done. For what can be more lovely than Christ, if one recognizes his beauty? And notice the contrast here. Moses is a terrible tyrant who shows his back and turns his face away from us. Christ, however, is not only turned to us with his face, but is also lovable because of his beautiful face, a savior and helper. Through this face he reigns.

Among the children of men your lips are blessed, therefore God blesses you forever.

V. 4. Gird up your sword at your side.

4. 1) The children of men also have a beautiful form, but it is a beautiful hypocrisy in the appearance of works, but from a false heart, because it is forced and forced away by the force of the law. But this is under the curse, because the heart is without mercy and turned away.

5. 2) This [Christ] is also blessed by God with lips of grace. For blessed is he who believes in Christ through the Word. So you see here again that the lips of this King are praised, and not his bow or weapons. For Christ reigns through the word, which brings with it forgiveness of sins. 3)) This blessing is not attached to works, but to the lips of grace, that is, not to our presumption, but to faith in the word of Christ. For he says, "thy lips," namely, the Lord Christ's word, and no other, brings grace and blessing. "Thine," as if he should say, not Mosis's or man's lips.

6. 4) By the word of grace not only are the poor and sinners in need of grace healed, raised up and blessed, but just as it is a very blessed lip of grace and blessing to the faithful, so also against the ungodly and enemies it is a sword powerful to punish the gainsayers, 2) and to defend the faith against all the gates of hell, so that Christ reigns on the right hand and on the left as a victor and savior.

The fact that he says that the sword should be girded around the loins is an oratorical expression taken from the warriors. Titus 1:9: "A bishop shall be mighty to exhort by sound doctrine," and be girded with a sword at his side.

8. but he calls him XXX, a mighty one, that is, a victor; for all can be to him.

1) In the margin: "custom of wisdom". - The marginal notes are summarized later (Z29 in this psalm). However, it seems to us that not all marginal glosses have been reproduced in print. Already at ? 4 (No. 1) the marginal gloss should be: "Beautiful form" "Lormmf. Likewise at v. 8. s? should stand in the margin: Itsus furis "custom of the law". On the other hand, the marginal gloss "victory", which? 29 is placed twice in the print; once to the fifth, the other time to the sixth verse.

2) As an aside, "weapons".

his enemies do not resist. God always allows us to be victorious in Christ.

(9) But in the sight of the world all these things are contradictory. For there is no sword, but a straw, even dust; no lips of grace, but cursing; no beauty, but monstrosity and abomination; no good nor useful, but a harmful word.

And decorate yourself beautifully.

10. he binds the sword of the warrior to beautiful and dainty garments, with which Christ is clothed; that you may know that Christ is girded with the sword of the Spirit, not for destruction, but for edification, that the wicked, moved by his beauty, may turn to him and cleave to him.

Adorn yourself beautifully (specie et pulchritudine tua).

11.¹⁾ In Hebrew, this means splendid and ornamental clothing and jewelry, as kings are wont to wear in times of peace. So the sword of the warrior fights with the splendor of a peaceable king, because all his wars are directed so that he reigns in peace. The word kills, so that it makes alive. This means to be girded with the sword and yet to be adorned with glorious garments in peace. From this then follows this comfort, that the ungodly and heretics shall not have the upper hand (though it may seem so). For this sword is the sword of a warrior in armor; their sword, on the other hand, is a straw, though it may seem to be mightier than Goliath's sword. For this is how the secure triumph. But here follows:

v. 5. You must succeed.

12.²⁾ On the other hand we find that we, as it seems, go backward, they always go forward; but this is recognized in faith. But in Hebrew from word to word this verse reads thus:

Let it prosper thee in thy adornment. Show thou equita to the truth, and to keep the wretched in right, for thus thy right hand shall teach thee wondrously.

1) In the margin: "custom of the sword".

2) In the margin: "victory".

(13) Thus he prophesies at the same time, desiring that Christ may have happiness and that his kingdom may be furthered by prosperity, but more by adornment than by strength, that is, by the word that shows us his most glorious benefits, which are presented to us in him. For he is our mercy seat, in whom all things are ours, because by the power of the law nothing was accomplished. But through the rich and very glorious benefits that are shown to us in Christ, we are drawn and willingly follow, since the will of the Spirit is obedient, against all adversity and misfortune that is set against us. So now he no longer walks on foot in the world, but rides as befits a king in the kingdom of the spirit, and goes forth in eternal, immortal glory; but "for the truth's sake". For all other ways are but hypocrisy and lies, which shall at last cease and vanish, though they that are built upon lies may now be seen to lead, not upon horses or chariots, but upon the clouds of heaven.

(14) He calls the righteousness of Christ anvah (XXX), that is, affliction, or a wretched and oppressed one, because there is nothing more contemptible, wretched, afflicted, damned and shameful than the righteousness of faith. Nevertheless, God sees it that it is, and makes it rule against all righteousnesses, even the most hopeful ones. Although they are the most magnificent, mighty and victorious, they must finally give way and come down.

(15) But because this is a marvelous and incredible thing to the flesh, he adds that the right hand of Christ teaches these miracles. For all these things are believed, taught, and understood by faith, which also afterwards in its time shall see them fulfilled. But the left hand, that is, reason, which sees the world, cannot see such miracles, nor comprehend them, nor understand them.

³⁾ V. 6. Sharp are your arrows, that the nations fall down before you in the midst (in corde) of the king's enemies.

3) In the margin: "victory".

16) The word of the Lord Christ is powerful and penetrating, not barren and dull, like the word of Moses; "for the law could not make anything perfect" [Heb 7:19]. Moreover, the gospel is also fruitful, and is not preached in vain. For the nations will submit to you, will hear you, accept you, believe you, honor you, worship you, and serve you; but they will stone Moses. Yea, it is so powerful and fruitful that it converts the enemies, and reigns among the enemies; for thou reignest "in the hearts of the King's enemies," that is, in the midst of the enemies that rage, bark, and condemn against him in vain.

(17) There may also be an emphasis or special weight on the word "in the heart," that Christ takes the best from the world, or even reigns in the place where they least desire it, though there he chooses nothing but that which is weak.

18. all this seems to be completely opposite to the world, namely that the arrows of Christ are the weakest stubble, and the nations rather rage against him, Ps. 2, 1. the best part (medium) of the enemies knocks Christ out and drives him away.

v. 7. God, your throne remains forever and ever; the scepter of your kingdom is a straight scepter.

19.¹) This is said in scorn against the persecutors, who think that Christ will not reign even for one hour. Then it is also said for the comfort of the faithful, that they should be sure that their King reigns forever, however much the flesh may think otherwise. At the same time, it is indicated here that Christ is immortal, for a throne that remains forever belongs to no one but God alone. Now he cannot be a king unless he is also man, according to what was said before, since his form is compared to that of the children of men, and the prophet praises his lips and his garments. Therefore Christ is God and man.

(20) Not only is his throne eternal, but his scepter is also perpetual, for he reigns in righteousness, putting away sin, and destroys death. Thus the scepters of kings are straight and not crooked; for a king should not pay attention to the reputation of persons or care for his own benefit, but should be fair and straight toward everyone. But this straightness is attributed to Christ alone, because in his kingdom there is no respect for persons.

1) In passing, "administration of justice."

/ Servant, man, freeman, woman, in sum, no merit of their own, but one and the same grace common to all. He does not consider (as men do) the power of the mighty, not gender, not blood, nor wisdom, nor majesty 2c. So with this word he rejects all sects, heresies, nobility and ways of life, except faith, which he teaches here is the only way to salvation.

v. 8. You love righteousness and hate ungodly creatures, therefore your God has anointed you with the oil of gladness, more than your companions.

21. righteousness, that is, faith in Christ. "Being ungodly" is the hypocrisy of works. For apart from faith there is no righteousness before God, as can be seen manifold in St. Paul's writings. So you have here that Christ is hostile to the righteousness of works; so much is lacking in it that he should approve or demand it. And here the monasteries with their vows perish; for not only does Christ not approve of such, but neither does God the Father. For this reason he anointed him with oil, with the oil of gladness before his companions, that he might show that the righteousness of faith is pleasing to him, but the righteousness of works is displeasing. And all these things for this cause, that we may be sure that all things which Christ loveth are well pleasing unto God the Father, and all things which he hateth are displeasing; that is, all things which he teacheth are acceptable unto him, and all things which he punisheth are displeasing; lest thou shouldst invent for thyself another God, whom thou shouldst believe to be pleased with thy works, whereby thou seekest righteousness. with which you seek righteousness.

1. he has anointed you.
2. with oil.
3. joy.
4. More than your companions.
5. gOd, your gOd.

22. The oil of joy means the joy in oneself, according to the Hebrew way of speaking. Sacrifice of righteousness, that is, righteousness. "He hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness," that is, he hath made thee an exceeding joyful king, the king of joy, safety, and peace; not a servant and prisoner of righteousness and thirst and hunger, as Moses and the law.

23. "Journeymen

/ God, / that is, has here < the king, / brothers and

/ the high priest, where he does not rather mean this, that he is anointed king of freedom and joy before the Jews (from whose company and blood he was born), who remain under the service of the law, so that here again the abolition of the law is indicated. And this pleases me well.

GOD, your GOD.

From this the epistle to the Hebrews proves the deity of Christ sufficiently [Hebr. 1:9]. You may look at them.

V. 9. Your garments are vain myrrh, aloes and kezia, when you come out of the ivory palaces in your splendor.

25 [These are the virtues, as, love, patience, right doctrine, which are a good smell of life unto life, to them that believe. It is a well-known similitude, taken from fragrant garments. It smells well for you. For the good report of kindness, the works of love, which he has shown and still shows to the afflicted, greatly attract and draw. For such are the garments of kings, Matt. 11:8, just as he describes a king here.

(26) So also they delight in ivory palaces, that is, in royal splendor and ostentation. He depicts the castles and palaces of the Lord Christ. These palaces are the gathering and assembly of the faithful who adhere to the Word, more contemptible in the eyes of the world than the worthless seaweed, just as His garments are "a stench of death unto death" [2 Cor. 2:16]; in the eyes of the world they are more contemptible than the worthless seaweed, just as His garments are "a stench of death unto death" [2 Cor. 2:16].

1) In the margin: "jewelry".

But to God they are white, delicious, durable, like ivory.

V. 10. In your adornment go the daughters of kings.

27. 2) This word also reaches the Gentiles, so that even the daughters of kings believe. If someone, according to the secret interpretation, wants to take "the daughters of kings" for the believers, on this opinion: all believers (namely those who are from the Jewish people) are daughters of kings.

The bride (regina) stands at your right hand in all precious gold.

028 As if to say, There are daughters of kings in thy ornaments; but the queen standeth at thy right hand, and reigneth, as one flesh with thee: for so it is in the houses of kings. She not only walks in your adornment, but also in precious gold. By this "queen" is signified the gathering of perfect believers, as, the apostles, church ministers, who are able to teach and to beget believers. But the "daughters of kings" and the court virgins are imperfect virgins, as it were, capable of marriage, who learn and grow to the perfect, manly and marriageable age, until they also finally teach and beget; these are therefore absolutely like gold, pure and approved in the Word. But these are in the adornment of simple faith, and yet are all together One Church.

029 Now sum up all that is said hitherto in the psalm: for he said that he would sing of a king. Now a king must have many things:

First, a beauty or prestige, of which it is written in the third verse, "She is more beautiful than all men's children."

Secondly, wisdom, and a practice and custom of wisdom. This is also said in the same verse, namely, that he is gifted with "blessed lips" and powerful blessings.

Thirdly, the weapons or violence; which in the fourth verse means the "sword of the hero" and the beautiful chivalric equipment.

Fourthly, the custom and application of the weapons, of which it says in the fifth verse: "You must succeed", "go forth" 2c.

2) In the margin: "Hofgesind".

To the fifth happiness, welfare and victory, which is described in the sixth verse by "the arrows before which the nations fall down".

Sixth, the office of administering justice. This is signified in the seventh verse by his "chair" and throne.

To the seventh, the custom or exercise and progress of justice; of which the eighth verse says: "Thou lovest justice" 2c.

In the eighth, the house ornaments and glorious splendor. This you have in the ninth verse, in the "garments" and "palaces".

The ninth is a court servant, and especially a woman's room and a queen; this is what this tenth verse is talking about.

v. 11. Listen, daughter, and incline your ears; forget your people and your father's house.

(30) Now that he has finished the song and description of this king, he exhorts that this king be accepted, honored and served. Here he abolishes the law and the paternal statutes. Rom. 7, 2. also says: "A woman who is under the man, while the man lives, she is bound to the law" 2c., so that they may heartily and faithfully cling to this one Christ with one flesh, one spirit 2c.; remain in grace, do not act like a dog that eats again what it has eaten [2 Petr. 2, 22.], nor turn back to Egypt, to the righteousness of the law.

v. 12. Thus your king will delight in your beauty.

(31) This is a promise that she will be sure to please the king when she forsakes all other righteousnesses and trusts in the righteousness of grace. Then there shall be nothing in her that is not pleasing to Christ; everything shall be beautiful. Just as a bride who has been taken in marriage by one, and still relies on her father and mother, is burdensome to her husband, so also the synagogue, which relied on the name of the patriarchs, has hardly surrendered to the Lord Christ, and few have come to conversion. Therefore

It is always a great thing to leave such a great reputation and old habit.

For he is your Lord.

32. consider how great your husband is compared to your fathers and your generations. For what are all the saints, if they are held against this one Christ? You have God Himself as your bridegroom instead of your fathers.

And you shall worship him.

(33) Therefore remember and cherish him as your God, as he is worthy, who is so great above your ancestors.

v. 13. The daughter of Zor will be there with a gift; the rich among the people will plead before you.

34. he has hitherto said of the benefit in the circle of the house (domestic), now he says of that which is outward. Not only will you have such a husband, so great, favorable and dear, but everything else will be favorable to you. If your bridegroom holds you in honor, you must walk in honor before all the world; he is probably so powerful. The name Tyre [Zor] he uses to express something else by it, 1) likewise the word "the rich," as if to say, What is great must honor thee; if not, thou must abide in all disgrace and calamity, as befalls the synagogue and the work saints. For you will be cursed if you despise such a great man. The promise and exhortation to receive and honor Christ goes to this point.

This common rule must be repeated here: Do not forget that everything here is done in a spiritual way. Before the world there is a contradiction, that he is cursed who adheres to Christ, and does not blaspheme him in the most outrageous way, and remains with the fathers.

v. 14: The king's daughter is all glorious within.

36. now here he says of the daughter, as he said above [v. 10.] of the queen, 1) por ; this probably stands for psr uuto-nornakiam, that is, he uses a proper name to designate the great and the mighty, as the explanation immediately following shows.

which is the woman. He wants to say with it: If the synagogue does not want, the Gentiles will be his daughter, born from the synagogue. To her all the glory of the kingdom is turned. For after the apostles the church of the Gentiles grew. But yet it is inwardly so constituted, that is, in the Spirit. For there is found the adornment that now follows:

She is dressed with golden pieces.

That is, it is clothed with the word of God in faith.

v. 15: They are brought to the king in embroidered garments.

38. that is, it serves Christ in various gifts, Rom. 12, 6. i Cor. 12, 4.

And virgins after her.

39. for she has believing hearts that 'listen to her, who follow her in faith.

Those who are their neighbors are brought to you.

(40) That is, the members and associates of the church in various places, who agree with it in doctrine and faith, as in the courts of kings and princes.

v. 16: They are led with joy and delight.

41. one must dance and jump at court. He wants to say: You will not be led here with terror of the law, nor with sadness of sin, but by the grace of the gospel they will make consciences glad, will cause dancing, praise and thanksgiving.

And go to the king's palace.

That is, they will see Christ and rejoice before him in this way. For Christ's face is our light and our blessedness. For before the prince the court virgins dance more willingly, and with greater joy and delight, knowing that he is favorable to such merriment.

v.17. Instead of your fathers you will have children, and you will make them rulers in all the earth.

This is the interpretation of the whole Psalm: Because the Jewish fathers were unwilling, Christ took the apostles and the Gentiles as his children and appointed them as rulers of the world in their place.

v. 18. I will remember your name from child to child; therefore the nations will give you thanks forever and ever.

44. that is, my song shall be sung for and for, and among the Gentiles you shall be praised, if the synagogue will not.

The fifty-first Psalm.*)

Content.

The content of this psalm is that one does not come to the forgiveness of sins by works, but only by grace; or, that works do not justify, but only faith. Therefore, there is no other remission for sin than forgiveness by grace, free of charge. Other pardons are fiction. In sum, there are all

The words of this psalm are directed to the effect that we cannot appease the wrath of God with any work and cannot earn mercy.

Division of this Psalm.

The first part is a prayer for the forgiveness of sins. After that he explains the right kind of sin. Finally, he adds some promises, as [v. 19]: "The sacrifices that please God" 2c.

*Note of the original: He interpreted this psalm in Torgau when the prince was ill. The Elector John was dangerously ill in Torgau in February 1532. "Luther, although himself very much suffering, made two visits to the sick lord in Torgau, one lasting several days towards the end of that month" (Köstlin, M. Luther, Vol. II, 269).

V. 3. God, have mercy on me.

(3) He saith not, Behold my hair shirt, my fasting, my sacrifice.

According to your kindness.

4. not according to my satisfaction.

V. 4. Wash me well from my mssethat.

Oh, if only I were free from sins! Help me, dear Lord God, to be clean from them.

And cleanse me from my sin.

6. he summarizes at the same time the original sin and the real sin. Wash me," he says, "not only from the sin of adultery, the blasphemy of the name of God 2c., but also purge me from the sap and roots from which these real sins originate. Forget not only this of my adultery, but cleanse me completely, so that I may never again commit such or such a sin; for if you would not cleanse me, I might well fall into just such danger again tomorrow. In sum, he desires not only forgiveness of sins, but purity of heart. For sin is forgiven in two ways: First, through the forgiveness of sins, and second, through purification. So here he confesses that his sin is forgiven, but he is not yet cleansed. Therefore he says: "Cleanse me", make me clean; because I see that I sin daily.

V. 5 For I know my iniquity. And my sin is always before me.

That is, I see and realize that there is nothing good about me.

V. 6: In you alone have I sinned and done evil in your sight.

8. though I am righteous, that is, pious, in the sight of the world, yet I am a sinner before thee, and a very great sinner. For you are the right man to find sin in me. Even though I am not an adulterer, as I am, yet before you my heart is unclean, full of unbelief and evil desire, without fear of God, without trust in God; therefore

I would like to be washed clean and ask not only for forgiveness of sins, but also for complete cleansing.

On you.

9 So he is not only talking about the sin of adultery, but also about the origin of sin, and about the tree with the fruit. Adultery is the fruit that I have wrought. From where? Before I committed the sin, I caused Uriah to be strangled first and blasphemed God. If such wickedness is in me, I can see what kind of a herbalist I am. Today or tomorrow I could fall like that again.

That you may be right in your words and pure when you are judged.

(10) No one wants to confess that God is not satisfied that one is a carthorse, that he sacrifices 2c., but where God says that we are sinners, they punish and judge God as if He were unjust, because He does not want to look at good works. But I will confess it; therefore I desire, dear GOD, that you cleanse me. Here you see David's experience, which he himself made, namely that he had many against him, with whom he had to quarrel, because they taught that one had to propitiate God with sacrifices and works of the law, as is still happening today 2c. This is a true confession: Oh Lord God, why should I quarrel with you, because there is nothing good in me from my mother's womb on! The tree with the fruit is corrupt. This I confess, because you say it, "that you may be right" 2c.

V. 7. Behold, I am begotten of sinful seed.

There is no more powerful text in the Old Testament about original sin than this verse.

And my mother conceived me in sins.

(12) Even in the womb it is a vain sin not to know God, to forget God, to be ungrateful to Him, to despise Him.

V. 8. Behold, you delight in the truth that is hidden; you let me know the secret wisdom.

This is an amendment that is totally against hypocrisy. Their piety, worship and religion is false pretense. Outwardly it seems fine; but "the truth that lieth in secret," that is, in the heart, teaches what sin is. This is the right knowledge of sin, when one almost despairs because of sin. This is the righteously crushed heart that the world does not know, and this is the hidden truth that pleases God. The pope also teaches truth; but only external righteousness, not that which is hidden; as, from fasting, not eating meat, confessing sins 2c.; but when death approaches, despair follows. In sum, right knowledge of sins means feeling the power of the law and the sting of death. This is "the truth that is hidden," namely, when one knows what the knowledge of sin and the forgiveness of sin are, one knows what fear and faith are. Our opponents [the papists] are right in saying that Christ died for the sins of the world, but this is not the truth in secret, for they cannot punish or comfort.

v. 9. Defile me with hyssop, that I may be clean; wash me, that I may be white as snow.

14 Here he seizes the false appearance of the work saints. I see well that the priests sprinkle the people with ysofen, with blood 2c. But I would like you to sprinkle me. Moses and Aaron do nothing with their sprinkling, but your sprinkling will do it. He would like to be free from sin. Forgive, he says, and cleanse. He would like to feel no sin at all, but be completely happy. Who would have a good hyssop here, who could sprinkle so that the whole heart would be clean! Who now would have refreshment, as he said, whom one wanted to drown, for evil drink! He would like to have peace in his conscience.

v. 10. Let me hear joy and gladness, that the bones you have crushed may rejoice.

There is no leg so strong that it can hold. Even those who boast much about the gospel and teach others know nothing about it.

This happened through the recognition of sin, when Nathan spoke to him: "You are the man" 2c. "I have sinned" 2c. "You do not die" [2 Sam. 12, 7, 13].

v. 11. Hide your face from my sins, and blot out all my iniquities.

(16) He cannot stand the remembrance of sin, that is, there is no joy with me unless God turns away His face from my sins.

Redemption.

17 With a wet rag. He almost stops, repeats and presses on it, would like to be pure.

v. 12. Create in me, O God, a pure heart, and give me a new and certain spirit.

He does not want God the Lord to look at his sin at all. These are vain thunderbolts against pardons, and now goes even deeper; for he speaks of the cleansing of sin. To forgive sin is to believe. He wanted to grasp the forgiveness of sins with a strong faith in his heart. It is true that my sin is forgiven, but who can believe it? No one, unless God gives it to him. He asks for such a right and certain faith here.

Heart.

(19) That God alone may look upon him who is merciful and forgives sin, and not upon him who punishes sin.

v. 13. Do not cast me away from your presence.

The first gift is that God may give the spirit that teaches to cleanse sin and to know grace, that is: Give me the gift of faith, and that in such a way that I may certainly believe; give me certain, confident faith, that sin may never tempt me, that in this faith I may stand against the devil and his temptation, that faith may not doubt nor waver. For he (David) has been in battle, therefore he speaks these things from experience. After this also give me steadfastness, that I may so persevere in the faith, that thou shalt not depart from me.

turn away the face of your anointed one [Ps. 132:10, Vulg.]. Never take me away again.

v. 14. And do not take your Holy Spirit from me. Comfort me again with your help, and the joyful spirit contain me.

(21) Namely, the spirit that casteth out of me the rest of sin, that I may live in certain faith, discipline, and honor. First, the spirit of assurance, which makes certain that faith is without doubt. Second, that which purifies and sanctifies body and soul. Third, the spirit of gladness, 1) which preacheth freely and confidently, and feareth not. It takes a joyful and bold man, who is helped. That is, give me a free, defiant spirit, which may say, Ye desperate boys of Aaron 2c. who dare, though he be strangled at it, as follows. He shall punish the wicked; but it is the most dangerous thing of all, to punish princes and kings of the world. One must dare over it. The Spirit is first righteous in heart; secondly, in body; thirdly, a teacher in deeds; therefore he is wholly perfect.

v. 15. I will teach the transgressors thy ways, that sinners may turn unto thee.

(22) These are not servants and maidservants, but those who, in outward appearance, are most holy, and will not confess that they are in sins. Therefore a courageous spirit belongs to them, which asks nothing of them when they are angry.

v. 16. Save me from blood debts, O God, who art my God and Savior, that my tongue may praise your righteousness.

He deserved death because he wanted to preach. The devil said, "You are a murderer and you are still leading the people astray, wanting to lead them to grace.

1) Luther translates this word throughout as "Freidigkeit," which has been changed to "Freudigkeit" in our Bibles. It means, as Dietz states in his dictionary: "unäueia, Kühnheit, Muth, Freimüthigkeit, Dreistigkeit, Zuversicht." In the Latin translation of the Bible attributed to Luther (Walch, old edition, vol. XIV), it is rendered Läuseiu throughout. Only once, Apost. 4, 13, oonLclsnia.

v. 17. Open my lips, O Lord, that my mouth may declare your glory.

(24) But one does not suffer to praise God's righteousness, that is, that God may help him out. If the saints of works will give me to death, that then my tongue may praise grace.

Lord, open my lips, that my mouth may be open 2c.

Make me bold. As Paul says in the letter to the Ephesians 2) [Cap. 6, 19.]: "Let the word be given to me with a joyful opening of my mouth." When they attack one, one might well stifle; but still God must open his mouth. If you open your mouth, I will fill it, that is, only preach freely.

v.18. For you have no desire for sacrifice, otherwise I would give it to you, and burnt offerings are not pleasing to you.

26 That is, you would rather preach than sacrifice. Go and preach this in Jerusalem, and to the pope, that the mass is nothing!

v. 19. The sacrifices that please God are a troubled spirit; a troubled and bruised heart you, God, will not despise.

(27) An exceedingly sweet and beautiful promise. If only someone could believe that our tribulations are the most pleasing sacrifices to God. First, preaching, second, suffering and being afflicted; these please our Lord God and are the highest sacrifices. But he is not speaking here of the sacrifice of thanksgiving. Humiliation (humiliatio) is the greatest sacrifice, for it kills the old man. There are the slayers [who slaughter the sacrifice], the law, all teachers of the law, terrors of sin 2c. When I preach, I do it to praise our Lord GOD, that I may have the morning and evening sacrifice [2 Kings 16:15. Ps. 141:2]. For he is pleased to be preached of. Every sermon is the highest sacrifice. So Paul says Rom. 15, 16: "To sacrifice the gospel of GOD", that is, the sacrifice of preaching. Philip often said to me, since I do not like to preach: "Go and praise".

2) In the original: „aü Darin."

our Lord GOD. For if one preaches rightly, one must praise our Lord God. If one is thrown into prison over it, he also does the other sacrifice. Thus our afflictions please God, that one affliction is worth as much before God as a thousand sacrifices. The afflicted spirit is a greater sacrifice than the whole Levitical sacrifice; yes, who could believe it! Of this I will tell our prince 1). Take all the sacrifices of the law, all the ceremonies of the pope, and the procession to Augsburg on Corpus Christi; one tribulation of a believer is worth more.

V. 20. Do good to Zion according to your grace; build the walls of Jerusalem.

28. keep it in the building; for so it is better translated. Hitherto he has asked for himself; but now he extends it also further to the all the people and prays for them. He saw how the priests and chief priests were very insistent on the righteousness of the works, so that the truth was obscured in secret, that is why he prayed so diligently.

Farewell, Lord.

(29) Let the kingdom and the priesthood remain in the right knowledge, and keep and preserve them within. This is all against hypocrisy.

V. 21. Then the sacrifices of righteousness, the burnt offerings and whole sacrifices, will be pleasing to you; then they will offer bullocks on your altar.

(30) Then will come the right sacrifices, namely, to continue in prayer and preaching; these are the highest sacrifices. But the moral virtues our Lord God throws into [the] Rapus, like wine, bread 2c.

1) Compare the first note on this Psalm.

The fifty-sixth Psalm.

V. 2. God, have mercy on me, for men want to sink me; daily they quarrel and fear me.

Our Lord God has never struck anyone dead; but he can certainly withdraw his hand, and leave room and power to the devil; for he is a God of life and the living. What I speak must be all devilish things; again, what Faber, H[erzog] G[eorg], M. Bu. speak and do must all be rightly spoken and done.

People.

2 That is, children of the devil. This is a vexatious case: That David should raise up the king, and want to be king himself, is a vexatious bargain.

V. 3. My enemies sink me daily.

3. a figurative speech: they do not want to push me, but push me nine cubits under the earth, so that they do not know anything about me.

For much quarrel against me proudly.

4 With this he shows the great multitude of his enemies: the king, the nobles, all the people. "You are chasing a dead dog," says David, 1 Sam. 24, 15, and Saul: "The kingdom still wants to be," 1 Sam. 18, 8.

Proudly.

5. that is, in maximum safety.

V. 4. When I am afraid, I hope in you.

(6) He who knows this, and thus finds himself that God is his God, according to the first commandment, has the right golden art. If a man is afraid of our Lord GOD, who alone can help him, who will help him? I hope in you; you, O God, are not the one who persecutes me, but the devil and men are; therefore I hope in you.

V. 5. I will praise God's word, I will hope in God, and I will not be afraid; what should flesh do to me?

These are promises; from them you see that he is in battle. He is not yet able to do the golden art, it is still weak.

8. flesh is the hay of our Lord God, Is. 40, 6. who can believe that the pope, the Turk are flesh, and the hay of the Lord? "Egypt is man, and not God. Her horses are flesh and not spirit", Is. 31, 3. This all refers to the first commandment.

v. 6. Daily they dispute my words, all their thoughts find fault with me.

9 Our adversaries do not believe that this verse is against them. Our doctrine is that God should be trusted, that the bishops should preach the gospel; but because they do not like this, it is no wonder that their thoughts are also evil.

v. 7 They stop at hemp and lie in wait, and take heed to my heels, as they catch my soul.

This is my life. If we eat meat on Friday, or whatever else we do, they put it against us, so that they have cause to blaspheme. But what they

They praise what we do, but when we do the same, they condemn it. They dispute the doctrine, and counsel 2c. Examine the text. They pay attention to every opportunity.

Now the prophet indicates how God will deal with the persecutors, namely according to the second part of the first commandment.

v. 8. 9. God, cast down such people without all mercy; count my flight, grasp my tears in your sack.

This is a great comfort. Who could believe that a sigh, a tear before him should not be forgotten!

v. 14. You saved my feet from sliding.

This indicates the unstable life. I have not been safe anywhere.

That I may walk before God in the light of the living.

14 That is, in welfare and comfort. This actually means a sermon: Acting on God's word, praising and thanking our Lord God.

The eighty-first psalm.

1. This is a thanksgiving for the fruits.

v. 2. Sing joyfully to God.

(2) He should have said, Hail to the weak idol, that he forsake his own, leaving us in all manner of trouble and distress; and yet he is a God of strength, but in faith.

Which is our strength.

3. who makes all things needless to enjoy, sustains, protects, saves, heals [1 Tim. 6:17].

Rejoice to the God of Jacob.

4. whom the whole world ridicules, not only as a weak but also foolish God.

v. 3. 4. Take the psalms, and give the timpani, the sweet harps with the psaltery. Blow in the new moon the trumpets, in our feast of deciduous breasts.

5 By this he means the preaching of the word, that the priests and Levites should instruct and lead the people in the fear of God and in the knowledge of the gifts which he mildly gives daily.

v. 5 For this is a way in Israel.

(6) As if to say, I am not offering you anything new, I am not bringing you a new service; this is what our ancestors did, whom we should imitate in this matter.

And a right of the God of Jacob.

7 This is to be noted very well, that he commands his people such a way, which has God's word. Secretly he keeps them from other gods.

The people of the world are not used to the services, sages and orders that have no basis in God's Word.

v. 6: These things he bore witness to Joseph when they came out of Egypt.

Is it not a miracle that in our hearts there is so much laziness, security and carelessness that we can forget even our greatest misfortune, and it must be called to our remembrance again? The Jewish people in Egypt had been most severely afflicted with slavery, and yet it was so soon forgotten by their descendants that the good prophet had to make a public song about it, because otherwise it would have been forgotten. So now we have also forgotten the misery that our consciences, bodies and goods had to bear under the papacy. Now it is no wonder that we forget the benefits of God, because our misfortune and our danger so soon vanish from our memory. Therefore, in order to praise them even more for this song with which they thank God for His gifts, he adds this: "Your gratitude is pleasing to God, and He commands that we thank Him, since He redeemed our ancestors from the miserable bondage in Egypt.

And have heard foreign language.

(9) This also makes the misery even greater, that one must be so plagued and oppressed by such a people, whose language one cannot understand.

v. 7: When I had removed the burden from their shoulders (divertit ab oneribus dorsum ejus), and their hands were loosed from the pots.

10 He uses this oratorical figure of the hypallage 1) in quite an actual way, because he has brought the people to other places and let the burden remain in Egypt. As if he wanted to say: The burden remained on the people sin Egypt], but my people was relieved of it.

U Hypallage - an inverted composition of the word Here after the Latin: He took away their backs from the load, instead of: He has taken away the burden from their backs.

v. 8 When you called on me in trouble, I helped you out and listened to you when the weather overtook you and tried you at the water of the ravine.

(11) Do not become ungrateful, and if any need distresses you, do not fall away from me; for my custom is to save from need. For this reason he remembers the worshipper, that he may also remind them of their sins. In the same way, we should not forget the grace that has come to us through the gospel, since we all led a troublesome life, weighed down by the most abject sins in the ministry.

v. 9. Hear, my people.

(12) You gladly accept good things done to you, but you do not want to know the one from whom you receive all kinds of good things. You are my people, whom I have preserved, fed and redeemed; hear me also. But just as the beginning of this psalm is an imperative of its commandment, so it also remains an imperative, and will never, or only with the very few, become an indicative of its reality]. So it is also with this verse, it remains with the Audi [hear], but of those who say: I hear, is none, or even the very fewest.

Instead of: Israel, si me audieris, must be translated: Israel, me audias.

Israel, you shall hear me.

(13) This is a heretical text, and it contends against itself. He calls them God's people, and then accuses them of not hearing God. As if to say: You want to be my people, but you follow and listen to the idols in Gilgal, Bethel and other places. To them you attribute it when the fruits turn out well, to them you seek help when something bad happens to you. Do not do it, but hear me.

v. 10. That there be no other god among you, and that you worship no strange god.

(14) It is a terrible and more than heretical accusation that he blames them for having strange gods among them and falling away from the right God; what more terrible thing could he say of them?

V. 11. I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of Egypt.

15. you are not, they [said to Davids, you are a heretic, and your GOd is an idol; but we follow the right GOd and worship him at Bethel 2c.

Open your mouth wide, let me fill it.

Let my praise always be in your mouth; boast about me, learn about me, plant me in the hearts of others; let nothing else come out of your mouth but me and my word. But this prayer remains an imperativus, which can never be made into an indicativus. Thus we see that under the papacy innumerable books have been written on the invocation of the saints, the merits of works, the rules of monasticism, the dignity of the celibate life, and other ungodly things, while in the meantime not a single syllable has been written on the merits of Christ and our salvation, 2c. as follows:

v. 12. But my people will not obey my voice, and Israel will not obey me.

The idols are more pleasing to him. For the human heart is so clever that it can more easily believe and trust all other lies and useless fables than the true God. Thus we have been able to put our trust in a cap; but in the true God, who promises us forgiveness of sins by grace, in vain, we have not been able to trust, and even now we cannot fully do so, since we are overwhelmed with so many testimonies of Scripture. But it is all the more difficult that he says: "My people" and "Israel". If they were strangers to whom I had not shown any special kindness, nor had they been helped by me out of any special need 2c.

V.13. Thus I have left them in the stupor of their hearts to walk according to their counsel.

18) Those who did not want to believe in the Lord Christ, who promises and offers free grace, believed in the fictitious intercessions of the saints, and not only in the prayers of the monks, but also in their merits, fasting, vigilance, and observance of mass. But it is something very difficult to believe in this rain.

Christ] to be given up and left alone, and to be exposed to all kinds of error and all the deceit of Satan [Eph. 4:14].

V. 14. If my people would be obedient to me, and Israel would walk in my way.

19 Thus he resolves the arguments which the wicked reproach the true GOD and the prophets with. For thus they say: Why should we cling to the God whom you praise, because he leaves us in so many troubles? No one is worse off, as he said, than he who serves Christ and the emperor. Therefore let us take refuge in Bethel, in Astaroth, and in other gods of the Gentiles. For we see that it is well with the heathen, that they are fortunate against us, that they defeat us. So now he answers: "Do not put your misfortune on me. The fault is yours, you are to blame for your misery; your idolatry and your false trust are the cause that you are so afflicted. Return to me, repent, and you will find that I will be with you. Only be righteous in faith, and let me seek to deliver thee from thine enemies, or thou shalt find no help: as it is written in the fifth book of Moses.

V.15. So I would soon "subdue" their enemies and turn my hand on their enemies.

020 But now, since you will not do this, and continue in your idolatry, I must humble you before your enemies. This is how you want it; you want me to be your friend as much as your enemy.

V. 16: And they that hate the Lord must lack Him.

021 Thou shalt not think that I am favorable unto them, but they are mine enemies also. But therefore they become too strong for thee, that thou hast forsaken me. Else thou shalt leave them. It is not the enemies that afflict thee; but it is I. It is my hand that presseth thee when thine enemies press thee.

But their time would last forever.

22. I would protect you, preserve you and keep you always.

V. 17. I would feed them with the best wheat, and satisfy them with honey from the rock.

(23) For there are two things of which we have need, to nourish and to defend: God therefore promises that if they are converted, He will not be their warrior alone to fight for them but also their husbandman; so that the godly should lack nothing that is necessary for this life. But it is a promise, therefore it is understood, accepted and fulfilled in faith. And even though he does not usually give his believers everything in abundance, they shall not die of hunger.

The hundred and twenty-eighth Psalm.

V. 1-3 Blessed is he who fears the Lord and walks in his ways. You will be nourished by the work of your hands; good for you, you will do well. Your wife will be like 2c.

1. 1) Whoever wants to start a household or marry should not worry nor be afraid of mammon. He shall dare to do it cheerfully in the fear of God, and it shall go well with him, he shall have happiness and salvation, and he shall become rich.

2. 2) But idleness does not do anything. One should undertake some kind of work and craft, for which God will undoubtedly give His blessing. For here he says: "You will nourish yourself with the work of your hands" 2c. As also Solomon says in his Proverbs. Now follows a promise and comfort.

3. 3) "Be well," that is, it will be well with you.

that is, you will be given house and farm, land, goods, livestock 2c. for housekeeping in abundance.

4 But against this stands the example of Abraham, Isaac, 1) Jacob. For of the wicked this would be said with greater truth. I answer: To this belongs faith and patience. This abundance will finally come and be taken from the wicked, Ps. 91, 16. Summa, this Psalm is a promise of prosperity in housekeeping and blessing in offspring. On the other hand, it is a reproach to the wicked, even though for a time they may look at it differently.

1) "Isaacs" set by us. In the original and in the old German translation it says: Israel. But Israël and Jacob are the same person.

The same psalm in a Phaläcian poem rendered by v. M. Luther, Anno 1543, and opposed to the epigram of Martial: Vitam quae faciunt beatiorem etc..^{*)}

A mocking poem (sarcasmus) against Epicurus

by the same author.

Who wants to live in a good säuisch. Like Epicurus is the goal, he thinks nothing of God and man. Believe that it is not God who judges and judges. Believe that there is no life after this. Even if your heart cries out against it, Think, are born to you alone, What you see g'hör in collar your.

Drink, eat, spit, shit, until full and great. Same as a sow, nurse your only well;
If you die as a pig and a cow, Say: This is how you go to heaven.
As the angels run with clubs
And burn such sow in the fire.
Then such an Epicurer wishes:
Awe, who would never be born!
He would be much better off dead. For he would be a mockery of God in heaven.

^{*)} This poem is found in German rhymed translation already Walch, St. Louis edition, Vol. X, 1473, No. 41. Therefore we leave it here. In the Erlangen edition, the same is found in Latin tona. XVII, p. 265; German vol. 38, p. 321/and again vol. 56, p. 359. Both this poem and the following one have the same verse meter in Latin as the above-mentioned epigram of Martial luid. X, 47). Whether the German was also due to Luther, we did not know. In Wackernagel's edition of Luther's spiritual songs, this poem has not been included.

The one hundred and thirty-third Psalm.

V. 1. Behold, how fine and sweet it is for brothers to dwell together in unity.

This psalm is a praise of spiritual unity, how useful and lovely it is. In particular, it teaches how it is to be preserved and what good it brings.

V. 2: As the precious balm that flows down from Aaron's head into all his beard, which flows down into his garment.

(2) Just as the holy oil is not only very sweet, but also flows far and wide; so the word and the spirit of faith are exceedingly sweet, like-minded toward all, opening to all and sharing with them. The oil belongs to the head, but when it flows down, it is good for the beard, yes, even for the clothes: so the word and the faith, which is one toward all, pours out over all, and seeks not what is its own, but what is another's. The word and the faith, which is one toward all, pours out over all.

3) "Flowing down" is the way, power, root, means and path to harmony, and there is a special emphasis on the word "flowing down. Just as going up and being hopeful, exercising dominion and power over others, wanting to stand higher than all others, is the way, power, root, form, means and path to all discord in general, to turmoil and desolation.

4. but the oil flowing down into the beard, and, to be noted, "into the beard of Aaron," that is, into the bosom of the priest, signifies that this is the very first 1) concord that is between the ministers and servants of the Word: that they may be of the same mind, teaching, doing, counseling, and ordering the same thing, that there may be concord in word, faith, ceremonies, and all other spiritual things.

5. but this harmony cannot exist unless those who are in the head condescend to serve the beard and the clothes, that is, to communicate theirs to those who do not have it.

1) We think that priinani should be read instead of primum, referring to concordiam. Because to the priinanrn no deinde corresponds. The other concord is then the secular concord mentioned in the following paragraph.

and do not despise the foolish, the weak and the infirm. It is not an oil for the beard and the garments, but for the head; but by flowing down, the beard and the garments benefit from what belongs to the head, that is, that it nourishes harmony and makes the heart of the weak favorable toward those who are higher.

V. 3. like the dew that falls from Hermon on Mount Zion.

(6) The dew of Hermon, which is not sacred, signifies the harmony of the authorities and rulers, who are the mountains of the world, that they rule in harmony of laws, courts and customs, and that they do not dispute among themselves. But this is done when the highest serve the lowest, and use their office, not for the sake of the good, but for the promotion of the common good, especially of the poor.

(7) Now here it is asked, why the prophet praises the oil to flow down into the beard, and not rather into the ears, eyes, forehead, or nose, since it is probable that it would flow down into these parts also? I think it should be understood from this that spiritual unity depends on it, if the same teaching that comes from the head, that is, from Christ, or from any prophet, flows down first to the disciples, who are bearded, that is, men and bearded, more of their understanding than of their age, mighty in the word, and able to teach others. For the beard is for the mouth, that is, for the ministry of the word.

8 The garment then means the common people, upon whom the same word comes down from the disciples of the head, so that they also believe the same in unison, are of the same mind and live in the same way, and become partakers of the same spirit and teaching.

9. where this twofold unity is, there is also eternal life and blessing, yes, there is also blessedness, paradise and the kingdom of heaven, namely, in that God Himself lets it come there and bestows His blessing on it.

The one hundred and thirty-seventh Psalm.

V. 1. 2. By the waters of Babylon we sat and wept when we remembered Zion. Our harps we hung on the willows that are within.

(1) Our worship is at a low ebb, and we are here in affliction. Above, our enemies mock us, holding us captive [and saying]:

V. 3. Dear, sing us a song 2c.

2 But we cannot do this, because we are commanded to serve God with gladness of heart.

3. the prophecy follows: "I know no other joy than that Jerusalem will be restored.

shall be built. And this is also the consolation that the people shall be delivered from this captivity.

V. 9.

4 God must give him happiness, namely Cyrus, also according to the letter. Summa Summarum: It is this Psalm a comfort for captive people, and it seems that the people made it in the captivity. Other consolations they have had in the prophets Ezekiel 1) and Jeremiah.

1) In the original: good that is, Hezekiah, for which will be read

The one hundred and forty-seventh Psalm,

[from the twelfth verse to the end]. *)

V. 12. Praise, Jerusalem, the Lord; praise, Zion, your God.

The content of this psalm is in the first word: "Praise". What does praise mean? Preaching of the first commandment, that is, of God's benefits. So this psalm is a thanksgiving for the benefits that God has shown His people.

V. 13: For he maketh strong the bars of thy gates.

2 First, he thanks him for the temporal regiment and the temporal kingdom: "You have made firm the bars of your gates." The iron that the smiths put on does not fortify, nor does it make the city secure, but there must be something greater in it for you to do it (tuum). Therefore he says, "You make firm." By human counsel the land and the people cannot be elevated; it is divine power that sustains the dominions. But just as the Iron or bars alone do not make firm where the Lord does not keep: so again the Lord does not make firm without bars. He wants the bars to be there, wants our work and stops, does not want us to be idle, although we can do nothing without him.

And bless your children inside.

When the secular regime is established in peace, it is followed by the discipline of children and instruction in God's word and good manners, which is neglected in times of war.

V. 14: He makes peace within your borders.

So far he has said about the regiment at home. Now he says how the regiment should also be ordered outwardly with welfare and blessing. Our Lord God must also ride on the borders, defend against the violence of the enemies.

*) The first eleven verses are the 146th Psalm in the Vulgate.

And satiates you with the best wheat.

5 This is said of the blessing on the fields. He gives the daily bread with abundance. For this he indicates by saying, of the "best," full. And notice that he says, "He satisfies," as if to say that God showers us with all kinds of benefits.

But what do we do about it? We enjoy the gifts of God, but we do not add the first word of this psalm, but are ungrateful, and do not praise God for His many and great benefits. It is a strange thing: He gives peace and protects against enemies, blesses the fields, the household, the worldly government, gives food to all flesh; and yet we, as people full of unbelief, are neither grateful to Him for this, nor do we believe that God does this. If we are afflicted by a small affliction, we immediately want to despair and mourn, and do not believe that God, who has preserved, protected and nourished us for so many years, will also protect and nourish us in the future. So, too, when He has helped us out of the temptation, we forget such help as soon as we no longer feel the evil. We now live as if there had never been a pestilence, a theuerung, and as if a Turk had never besieged Vienna, and as if there had never been a sweating sickness (sudor anglicus) 2c.

However, this happens even more grossly in spiritual things. We have the gospel, therefore we live as if there had never been a pope, no indulgence, no purgatory, no confession, no pardon. Our nature is so bad and corrupt that it forgets even the greatest benefits of God. That is why David, after recounting the many benefits, punishes our ingratitude by saying only: "Praise". He does not say: We praise, or: People praise God.

V. 15. He sends his speech on earth.

8 Here he teaches how he gives the fruits by the change of the weather, namely this weather he creates with his word. "He sends his speech on earth", that is, he gives to the earth, and says: The earth shall bear fruit.

His word runs fast.

9. as in the first book of Moses [Cap. 1, 3.^ it says: "He spoke, and it came to pass." When he says it, it is already there before him. Here we see the diligence with which the holy fathers read the first chapter in Moses, from which all divine wisdom flowed.' And David very often uses this expression of Moses: "The Lord spoke," as, in the 107th Psalm, v. 20.: "He sent his word and made them well." But how did he make them well? With one word: "He speaks, so it happens" sPs. 33, 9.]. We must therefore refer to the word pay careful attention. Our sacramentarians want to throw it through each other, and invent from the words of John at the first [v. 1.] [Λόγος] XXX. Assaph makes use of this way of speaking only once, in the place I have quoted [Ps. 50, 1], for it is actually David's way of speaking in this way.

V. 16. 17. He gives snow like wool, he scatters hoar-frost like ashes, he casts his locks like morsels.

10. all this, he wants to say, happens by the word, all such changes of the weather, without which the earth cannot give its fruits, he creates by the word. He says: It snows, so it snows 2c. But here is a theological question: How do such comparisons fit together, that he compares snow to wool, which are quite different things? For wool clothes and warms us, as do ashes; but snow and frost do the opposite. So also: morsels nourish us; but closed ones do not nourish. It seems to me that David secretly wanted to indicate the temptations by such a comparison, so that when it snows, when it ripens, when it closes, we do not despair or give up the hope that we will be nourished, but believe that God wants to have and give morsels and wool and ashes under such snow, ripeness and closes, although it seems much different. For in comparisons the Holy Spirit does not consider the appearance, but the benefit of the exceedingly great things that are given.

Who can stay before his frost?

It changes with the weather. After the winter he gives the summer, otherwise would have to if it were always winter, we would die of frost. But how does he give summer?

V. 18. He speaks, so melt it.

(12) By the word he accomplishes all things; he requires no more than a word. That may be a Lord! When the Prince of Saxony says something, there is no one to do it.

He lets his wind blow, so it thaws.

13 A whimsical change, from wind he makes water. The master can make what he wants and out of what he wants.

V. 19, 20: He showed his word to Jacob, his customs and his judgments to Israel. He does not do this to the nations, nor does he let them know his rights.

14 Here he also tells about the spiritual benefits, the word and the worship," and the promises given to Jacob and Israel, he calls it in repetitive speech (per tautoloZiam repetit). But he says about the special privilege of this people, of which also St. Paul deals with Rom. 9, 4. 5.

The one hundred and forty-eighth Psalm.

V. 1. Praise, you heavens, the Lord, praise him on high.

1. This is a common thanksgiving for all the benefits of God.

Praise.

2 That is, give thanks to God for creating you. But how shall they praise him, because they have neither mouth nor tongue? They put before their eyes that he is to be praised, Rom. 1, 20. God's goodness is known from the abundant service (usu) of heaven. But who has ever thanked God for it, if not this Psalm?

V. 2. Praise Him, all His angels.

(3) That is, his courtiers; and they also praise him, but the devils blaspheme him. It is impossible for a believing Christian to have peace in the world, even according to the flesh, for immediately the world, the flesh and the devil persecute him. And yet, one cannot have true peace without faith.

Praise him, all his army.

Namely, that which is created to serve him in time of war and in time of peace.

Praise him, sun and moon; praise him, all the shining stars.

5. what would become if the dear sun, whose services cannot be counted are. One day did not shine? 2c. God is to be praised because He gives so much.

V. 4. Praise him, all you heavens.

That is, everywhere, as far as one can see the sky. The theologians have assumed many heavens, as, the glowing, the crystalline, the watery, the icy heaven, the light or fiery heaven 2c. Of all these things I believe nothing, but hold that, as One Earth is adorned with various creatures, with waters, forests, fish, cattle, trees, mountains, valleys, so also only One Heaven, adorned with its ornaments, with large and small lights, stars and planets, among which some stand higher, some lower in the sky, just as in the forest one tree is higher than the other, because one stands on a mountain, another in the valley 2c.

V. 5: And let the waters that are in heaven praise the name of the Lord.

This is the air, which is water, but it is different from the water on earth, because it is finer. At times it becomes snow, ice or water, as a sword brought from the cold into a warm room immediately begins to sweat. And depending on whether God sends a good or evil angel, a warm or cold breath or wind, warmth, cold or snow follows 2c. "Up in the sky", that is, the air.

V. 6. for he gives, so it is created; he keeps them forever and ever; he orders them, that they must not go otherwise.

This is the cause of what he said before. Now follows the other part of this realm.

V. 7. Praise the Lord on earth (Terra quoque laudet eum).

9. the earth with its host; there are innumerable kinds of seeds, herbs, trees and shrubs. But the world abuses all creatures, and for this blasphemes God, persecutes his word, and strikes his Son on the cross. This is the thanksgiving of the world.

Your Welsh.

10. you who are the rulers of the sea.

And all the depths.

Pliny writes that there is a greater variety of animals in the sea than on land. And this is true.

V. 8. 9. fire, hail, snow and vapor, tempestuous winds, which execute his word. Mountains and all hills, fruitful trees and all cedars.

It rains leaves and grass. Therefore one speaks: The rain is golden, is to be paid with no money. But for all this the world is ungrateful.

V. 10. animals and all beasts.

13. cows are all clouds, because they give butter, milk, cheese, shoes, furs, cloth. A pig is a cloud, because it rains sausages and sides of bacon. Horses build castles, cities, and help build the land with their strength, serve for war.

Worms and birds.

14 That is, everything that creeps on earth.

V. 11. You kings of the earth and all the people, princes and all the judges of the earth.

(15) Then come the journeymen, to whom all these things are given, singing a praise, as it is written in the other psalm, v. 2c. This is their praise and thanksgiving for such rich, divine benefits. Here also belongs the temporal government, by which peace is obtained, that all may be used.

V. 12. Young men and virgins, old men with young men, shall practice the name of the Lord.

16 This is the teaching of the descendants.

For his name alone is exalted; his praise reaches as far as heaven and earth. And exalt the horn of his people; let all his saints praise, the children of Israel, the full who serve him.

17. no one believes that.

6. D. Martin Luther's short interpretation on the 23rd, 24th and the beginning of the 25th Psalm.*)

1530.

Newly translated from Latin.

The twenty-third Psalm.

1. it praises the Church Christ, her Shepherd, for the instruction, government and refreshment of the Sacrament.

The title: A Psalm of David.

V. 1 [The Lord is my shepherd

2. dominus regit me ["the Lord governs me", in the Vulgate] is better expressed in Hebrew: "the Lord is my shepherd" or feeds me, that is, Jesus Christ, true God, is my shepherd alone, who feeds me with no other food than himself, as he says John 10:9: "I am the door, if anyone enters through me, he will be saved, and will go in and out and find pasture." Of this shepherd, Ezekiel says Cap. 34, 23: "I will raise up for them one shepherd to feed them, even my servant David, who shall feed them, and be their shepherd." So the opinion is: Away with those who speak out of their own, and in whom Christ does not speak. There were many such people in those days, and there are many now and always. For they feed not, but] under the appearance of truth.

Rather, these people, like the Pharisees, heretics, and superstitious, devour all things holy and under the name of Christ. For if all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hidden in Christ, it necessarily follows that apart from Christ there is no knowledge and wisdom, nor any shepherd of the sheep. But Christ alone is the only shepherd of the sheep.

I will not want for anything.

(3) That is, I shall have no lack, spoken in the same sense as Ps. 34:11: "The rich are left destitute and hungry, but they that seek the Lord have no lack of any thing." For he does not speak here of carnal abundance, as some think according to the Jewish opinion; but rather he wants this, that the rich are left empty and lack everything, but the poor, and those who have nothing, have everything in the Lord. For the poor have the gospel preached to them [Matt. 11:5], that is, they are fed with the gospel, that is, with Christ Himself. He who has Christ for his help can have nothing.

*This scripture is found (completely in Latin, without interspersing German sentences) in the same book as the two preceding scriptures, which was published by the children and heirs of Veit Dietrich from the estate of their father in 1559. As a caption is set over it: "The interpretation of the three following Psalms has been printed according to Luther's own handwriting". In the dedication letter to Duke Christoph of Württemberg, the editors say: "Finally, through the service of our friends, we have obtained the interpretation of the 23rd and 24th Psalms and the beginning of the 25th Psalm, through which, as it seems, he wanted to continue the work he had begun on the entire Psalter and published elsewhere; however, manifold obstacles did not allow him to carry out this interpretation." It is found this interpretation in Latin in the Erlangen edition, 6xe.] opp., tom. XVII, x>. In German translation, it was first included by Aurifaber in the second part of the Eisleben Collection, p. 112, and there, too (of course wrongly), the remark is prefixed: "The following interpretation of three Psalms is taken and added from D. Luther's own manuscript. Luther's own manuscript." Likewise in the Altenbnrger, vol. V, p. 514; in the Leipziger, vol.V, p. 358; in Walch, vol. IV, 1220, and in the Erlanger, vol. 38, p. 336. We give a new translation according to the Latin original. The determination of the time is probably questionable. .

V. 2. He feeds me in a green pasture.

4 St. Jerome has it more significantly from the Hebrew: In pascuis herbarum acclinabit me, that is, he will make me lie down and rest gently and sweetly on a green pasture. For he speaks entirely in figurative speech, which, however, is nothing other than the simple mind according to the letter. For David did not eat grass, neither do the Christians. But as Christ calls his own sheep, so the prophet calls the gospel a pasture in green pastures or the place of pasture, both in figurative speech. So also in the Song of Solomon [Cap. 1, 7.] it is said, "Where thou feedest, where thou restest in the midst of the day." These two words ["pasture" and "rest"] are translated here [[in the Vulgate] by regit and collocavit, since they mean the same thing.

And lead me to the fresh water.

5 That is, he will nourish and sustain me by the waters, or by the waters of sound wisdom, that is, of the gospel. For he still remains in the figurative speech. For the gospel is meat and drink, the bread of life, and the water of sound wisdom. For as the sheep are pastured "most beautifully" in a pasture beside the waters: so the soul feeds on the Gospel, as the first Psalm, v. 3, says: "He shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water." I know well that St. Augustine, and his imitator Cassiodorus, point this refreshing water to baptism. This is not wrong, but it does not belong here. For "the fresh water" (aqua refectionis) is here referred to a drink and refreshment (as they say), such as happens to the hungry and thirsty. Therefore the preposition super [in the Vulgate] is taken for: at, on, or beside.

V. 3. He restores my soul (Animam meam convertit).

Here he breaks off with the figurative speech and explains that he did not speak above of the pasture of the body (as the Jews erroneously assume), but of that of the soul. Furthermore, this whole speech is very emphatic and important, since when the soul is converted,

This does not happen in a fictitious and false way, only in appearance and with the tongue (as many are converted), but the person is converted from the heart and is changed into another person, although the flesh and the outward man do not stop opposing and lusting.

For by no means is the soul so changed and turned to the Spirit that it hates itself and its own, seeks God, and thirsts for God and what is God's, than by the sweet words of the gospel, which are words of grace and sharp darts of the strong, wounding through love, so that those become joyful and free whom the law and evil desire had previously made unwilling and servants, and therefore in truth hypocrites and hypocritical converts. Therefore, the work of the gospel and the fruit of the word is the change and sincere conversion of souls.

He leads me on the right road (Deduxit me super semitas iustitiae).

(8) In the word "he leadeth" there is an image taken from the leading of the sheep; that is, he will promote me from faith to faith, from one virtue to another, from one clarity to another. Therefore it is better [than in the Vulgate] in the Hebrew as Jerome renders it: He will lead me in the paths (in semitis) or through the paths of righteousness, than: over the paths (super semitas) or by the paths. For almost all the verba which here [in Latin] are in the past tense are in the future tense in Hebrew. But there is nothing in this.

(9) This "righteousness" here is not that of which Aristotle speaks in the fifth book of his Ethics, or of which the jurists speak, but the faith or grace of Christ, which makes righteous, on the paths of which are led those who are docile and gentle, that is, (as it is said), "leidsam and meidsam" (dirigibiles et suasibiles), and by no means stubbornly insist on their sense and are not "köppisch" 1). For the one who is led must be willing, and not cling to any thing in such a way, that he is not ready to let them go at any moment. Those who firmly insist on their good opinion and please themselves more than they should please the will of Christ act very much against this. That is why faith is necessary, that is, justifying grace, so that man may learn to always put his own on the line and deny himself and give up his soul. This, of course, is the narrow way and the right road. That is why he says that it is not he, but the Lord, through his grace, who guides him, because nature opposes this guidance, so that he is rather the object to which the action refers (materia), than a doer, more suffering than active.

1) For the expressions used here, compare Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. XXII, 501 (Tischreden, cap. 14,?24) and De Wette, vol. VI, p. 262.

But this will happen all the more easily if the soul, converted and moved in a loving way by the word of grace, becomes willing to do all of God's will and unwilling against all of its will. This is what the most learned and Christian people (for that is what they consider themselves) oppose, who let nature and their own will take the reins, and call only that free service to God, when they do what seems right and good to them, almost laughing at submission and obedience to religion, since they are sure that they do no evil, and do good of their own free will, although no one commands and guides them, but their reason dictates it to them. This is the wisdom that is worthy of our time, whereas it would be more salutary if one did not trust in oneself in anything, if one were grieved that one had no guide whose words one could believe, and rather let oneself be guided than by following one's own holy good opinion. For here one must let oneself be led on the right road.

For the sake of his name.

(11) Namely, that he may be praised and glorified, not because of my merit. For grace is freely given, that is, faith and righteousness; so also it is freely increased and administered, that man may not be hopeful, but may praise God.

v. 4. And whether I already wandered in the dark valley (in medio umbrae mortis).

That is, even if I had to die and be in death. For at this point I like the interpretation of Ambrose better than that of Augustine. For he says: "And although the shadow of death surrounds us at the dissolution of the body, life does not cease its course, but in the midst of the compulsion of hell we walk unhindered by the power of Christ. Therefore the holy prophet says: "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me." The Lord says this even more clearly of a believer (John 11:26, 25): "He that believeth in me shall never die, neither shall he live, though he were dead." This is what Ambrose says. Augustine understands by the "shadow of death" this life, as it were as an image and likeness of death, as the shadow is a likeness or image of the body. But "shadow" is better taken for darkness and gloom, so that what is unknown and hidden to us is in the switching. So also "shadow of death" is said, because death has a shadow and darkness; for those who suffer death do not know where they are going. For they go to a place that is completely unknown to them, as God has decreed it over them.

So the meaning is: Even if I do not know where or by what means I will come through death (which alone makes death extremely frightening), I still do not fear any evil, because I walk in faith. But for the word which (in the Vulgate) is put: in medio, St. Jerome has: in the valley of the shadow of death, that is, in the depth of the dark and unknown death; hence in other places death is also called a hell and a depth. By these figurative and figurative expressions, the Scripture expresses (as I have said) the ignorance of the dying and the uncertainty of the place to which they go, and I believe that for this reason this psalm is sung by the Church mainly for the deceased.

14 Therefore in medio [in the middle of] is not understood here as if around the switching of death something is still by heart, but it is said par excellence (absolute), as in the passage [Ps, 104, 10.]: "That the waters flow between (in medio) the mountains", the means, in the valley. So also: in the midst of the shadow of death, that is, in a shadowy means, or in a shadowy depth, or a shadowy and dark depth, that is, in death, because it is not known to any man. But the special way and manner of the Hebrew language makes this speech dark. Such ways of speaking are: Coals of fire [Ps. 18, 13. Vulg.], furnace of fire [Ps. 21, 10.], blessing of sweetness [Ps. 21, 4.], instead of: glowing coals, a glowing furnace, or a furnace of fire, a sweet blessing. So also here: the middle of the shifter, that is, shady or dark. The valley of switching, that is, shadowy; and again: the shadow of death, that is, shadow that sets in at death (mortitia), or darkness that is in death.

I will fear no evil, for you are with me.

(15) This is a tremendous confidence that one will not only suffer no misfortune, but also not fear, that is, no punishments in death, through the power of faith.

16 It is not for nothing that I have used so many words in this verse. Yes, I add still more that we are instructed here most beautifully with which heart, with which thoughts we are to go into death, namely that we are to think of nothing except our Lord JEsu. For he says, "For thou art with me," that is, in thee I think, in thee I act, and so I think of nothing else, for in death there is shadow and depth. I do not see where or through what I come. But those who are in the last stages, and let Christ go, are full of sorrow that they must go into torment, and in order that they may go to heaven, they wish with open eyes of the mind that it may be day for them, and that the place may be seen to which they are to go. But they will be greatly distressed and tormented, because no dwelling place will appear that would receive them, but on every rope there is the most dreadful darkness and uncertainty. But it will be good for those who, with their eyes completely closed, do not desire the place to appear before them, but in complete faith and mindfulness of Christ, go into the midst of the darkness of death. For these die in the Lord.

(17) Therefore, this exceedingly glorious verse is nothing other than a word of perfect grace. But nature rather speaks thus: For though I walk on the heights of the light of life, yet I fear calamity, for I am alone, and thou art not with me. For with the wicked even the most certain life is full of fear of misfortune, while for the godly death, which brings with it the greatest uncertainty, is full of certainty. A wonderful contrast and controversy. The living wicked are frightened by the rustling of a flying leaf; and the dead godly are not frightened by the terror of eternal darkness. Therefore one says in the proverb quite beautifully:

I live and do not know how long.

I die and do not know when. I am going and do not know where. I am surprised that I am happy.

But we must beware lest, when death comes and we are tempted by these words, we begin to seek to know and feel where we are to go, but on the contrary, as has been said, we should not wish to know where we are going, just as Abraham 1) went out from his fatherland and did not know where he was to go. For if in this life, when there is temptation, one must hope under the wings of Christ, how much more must one hope under his wings in death and in the last temptation! It is unquestionable that there is salvation in no one else but in the name of Jesus and under his wings, since he is the sun of righteousness. And he himself, when he was our model on the cross, did not say, O Father, whither shall I go? whither shall my spirit go? what place shall receive it? oh, that it would not go into torment! oh, that thou wouldest bring it into rest! but of all these things he is silent, and goes into the midst of the darkness of death, saying [Luc. 23:46], "Father, I commend my spirit into thy hands." Christ goes into the darkness, and a Christian should desire to pass immediately into the light? St. Stephen, the first follower of Christ, did not say either:

1) In all German editions: "David".

Alas, I wretched man! whither will I go? this life now departs from me, another is nowhere in sight; but he says [Acts 7:58], "O Lord JEsu, take up my spirit!" He had indeed seen JEsu standing at the right hand of the power of God, but at that time he truly saw nowhere else but Christ in his heart when he said, "Receive my spirit," but wandered into the midst of the shadow of death.

Your rod and staff comfort me.

(18) If you would ask and answer: How then is Christ with you, David, since he appears nowhere before your eyes in death and temptation? He answers, "Certainly he is not with me according to the flesh and experience, but with his word and sacrament. For "the word of the gospel is the power of God that saves everyone who believes in it," Rom. 1:16; through this word of faith Christ dwells in the heart. Therefore he says, "Thou art with me," namely, because thy rod, that is, thy word, shall comfort me, that even in death I shall fear no evil, as it is also said in the 119th Psalm, v. 105: "Thy word is the lamp of my foot." And Ps. 130, 5: "I hope in his word." That "the rod" (virgam) is the word can be sufficiently seen in the second Psalm, v. 9, because it guides the soul in the midst of the darkness of death, as it says in 2 Petr. 1, 19: "We have a firm prophetic word, and you do well to heed it as a light shining in a dark place until the day dawns and the morning star rises in your hearts." Then the same word is also a staff and a support, that he may not be weary in his wanderings. For apart from the word and promise of (de) GOD we have nothing until we are brought to Him. Therefore, whoever has learned to remember nothing else in death but Christ, understands that this is the word and promise of Christ.

V. 5. You prepare a table before me.

19 That is, you will arrange, you will prepare, before my face, before my eyes, a table, namely, of the sacrament of your body and blood. He alludes almost to the model of the law, where the shewbread or the loaves before thy face (facierum, as the Hebrew text has it) signify the memorial of Christ's suffering in the sacrament. For what is the bread of the face, or the shewbread, but that they are before us and before our face, and are set before our eyes, that we may have a continual remembrance and memorial of Christ, which shall never be left out of our sight, never forgotten? For here we receive strength and comfort and abundant refreshment of mind. For nothing else enlightens the mind more brightly, nothing inflames the heart more strongly, nothing comforts the sorrowful more sweetly than the remembrance of the Passion of Christ, which He commanded to take place at His Sacrament. For who should fear death when it is brought to his mind that the Lord died for him, so that death should have no power over him?

Against my enemies.

020 Why should I fear even in death, since thou hast prepared a table for me against all tribulation and persecution? This verse also instructs us beautifully on how to answer the devils who afflict and accuse us, namely, that Christ alone should be held up to them, because he has been prepared for us against those who afflict us, so that they may not lash out against us but against Christ, and be overcome, as he says [John 16:33]: "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." And again [John 14:30], "The prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me." Therefore, when thou shalt have an evil conscience because of thine iniquities, hold Christ against them, and say in full faith, Though I be a sinner, yet is my Christ good, in whom all my sins are dead, because he bare them on the tree, and slew them.

You anoint my head with oil.

21 [The Vulgate has according to Hebrew idiom: Impinguasti in oleo caput meum,] Latin would say so: Impinguasti caput meum oleo. It is throughout a figurative Speak, instead of: 'By thy abundant grace thou hast made my spirit joyful,' since the head of man is the mind, or rather the spirit, and that by which he approaches God and heaven. "Oil" or ointment is the grace of the Holy Spirit. Impinguare, however, is not merely anointing and spreading, but abundantly and superfluously showering (incrassare) with joy; he has indicated that it is a full joy and a rich (pinguis) gladness of heart. In the same way, in the 4th Psalm, v. 8, without using an image, he said: "You make my heart glad", because there he also spoke of the Sacrament and its fruit, and that he would surely sleep or die in hope.

And pour me full (Et calix meus inebrians, quam praeclarus est!).

(22) This is a repetition of the same thing, for the fruit of the sacrament is to make fat (impinguare), not with flesh and blood, but with the oil of grace and a glad conscience, and to make drunk, not with wine and strong drink, but with the same grace and power. He expresses both forms of the sacrament, namely the table and the bread, which make fat, and the cup and the wine, which make drunk, that is, both increase the believer with the same grace. This he has also done in the fourth Psalm, saying without image [v. 8.], "They have plenty of grain and wine." Here he has said "table" instead of "grain," and "cup" instead of "wine," by a confusion of words, putting the container of wine for what is contained in it (continens pro contento). But this making fat and making drunk befalls only the hungry and the thirsty, as it is Jer. 31:25 [Vulg.], "For I have made the weary souls drunken," or refreshed; but the disgusting rich he leaves empty. But the [appendix]: Quam praeclarus est, must be credited to the interpreter, because not only does it not stand there in the Hebrew, but also another verse begins at the place, and [this verse] ends there, as it is in the Hebrew; but because this has not harmed the understanding so far, it has harmed us.

that there was not much to it. The opinion of the interpreter was: My cup, how glorious, that is, how beautiful, how lovely, how splendid, how good it is, as it is said in the Book of Wisdom, Cap. 12, 1) 1, [Vulg.]: "O HErr, how lovely is your spirit" 2c. But in Hebrew the following, verse begins thus, "Goodness and mercy also shall pursue or follow me."

V. 6. Goodness and mercy (tua) will follow me all my life.

23: Tua is not in the Hebrew. It is a general sentence (absolutus sensus), namely like this: Grace and peace will remain with me and lead me through to the end. As if he wanted to say: Sin and misfortune oppressed me before, but now I am refreshed and made whole, I will remain in grace and peace. For so it is also commonly said: This one stands in grace, or he remains in grace, without adding "God's", although it is understood with. Thus it is said in the fourth Psalm, v. 9: "For thou alone, O Lord, helpst me that I may dwell safely." Therefore, "good" in this passage is security. Security, peace, tranquility of conscience is the most lovely thing, namely, the very greatest gift of GOD. "Mercy," however, is here equally a created gift, usually called the justifying or pleasing grace, which is sometimes translated [in the Vulgate] by sancta, sanctus, and sanctum, as Apost. 15, 34. [Vulg.], "I will faithfully keep unto you the holy things promised to David," instead of: I will show you the reliable mercy of David, that is, the grace that makes righteous in Christ, promised to David and true. Hence also the apostle in his epistles prefixes these two things in his greetings, saying, "Grace and peace," which the prophet here thus expresses, "Surely goodness and mercy." Hence the meaning is, I am not alone satisfied (impinguatus) for the present time, and it is poured into me full (inebriatus), but peace and mercy also shall abide with me unto the end.

1) In the original: sapiontE 16.

And I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever.

24 [In longitudine dierum.] that is, for ever, for of this life it is said [Job 10:20.], "The life of man is short." [Et ut inhabitem in domo Domini in longitudine dierum is written in the Vulgate:] St. Jerome has it thus, Et inhabitabo in domo Domini in longitudinem dierum. And it is the [last] half (medietos) of the preceding verse, for with us [in the Vulgate] it is divided into two verses. Not only in all the days of this life will I have peace and grace, by which sin will be cast out and the conscience made sure, but also after this life I will dwell in the eternal house as a citizen, not as a sojourner but as a native.

From the sixth verse:

(25) We are given great assurance to approach the altar, if we are but hungry and thirsty and afflicted, for the table is prepared for us, not against us, but for us, but against them, which afflict us. But the flesh, the world, the devils, and even more the sins and the wretched conscience afflict us. The flesh, the world, the devil tempt us to sin, against grace. But the conscience and the devils at the same time also because of sin, against the peace of the heart. Therefore, since grace and peace are prepared for us on this table, why would you be afraid to come to it? If conscience bites you because of past sins, you will find peace nowhere else but at this table, as Christ says, John 16:33: "In the world ye fear, but in me ye have peace." But if the flesh tickles with unchastity, the world flatters with gluttony and drunkenness, avarice and hatred, the devil with hopefulness and sloth, where will you go but to the table of grace prepared for you against these temptations? It is enough if you find that you are eager for grace and full of hatred against the exceedingly flattering temptations of the flesh, the world and the devil. Therefore it is said in Matth. 11, 28: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will refresh you."

The twenty-fourth Psalm.

This psalm shows which is the true righteousness and which is the right people of God, against the hope of righteousness from the ceremonies, especially among the Jews.

Title: A Psalm of David.

V. 1. The earth is the Lord's, and what is in it.

2. plenitudo ejus, that is, all that is on it. With this word he immediately meets the Epicureans, of whom there are now many who do not believe that human affairs, especially the lesser ones, are under the providence of God. Therefore, in their lack and weakness, they seek everything, even devilish things, rather than God Himself, although not a leaf falls from the tree to the earth without His will. But primarily he strikes the

The Jews, who publicly believe that God takes care of them alone, thinking that all the others are only a lost bunch rejected by God. For in such a way, the Jews preferred themselves to all the peoples as a whole, as if God did not take care of the other peoples.

The ground and what dwells on it.

Here is either a tautology, that is, a repetition of the same thing, or he says what he said before about all earthly things in general, here especially about men, because they are the noblest of all things on earth. But if he speaks of the incarnate Lord, as St. Augustine understands it, the whole emphasis of the words is certainly directed against the verses.

the Jews, as if he wanted to say: Not you alone are his people; behold, Christ, who is GOD, rules over the whole world, as Joseph modeled in Egypt. For he is set over all things, and all things are put under his feet. So his kingdom is not limited to your ceremonies.

V. 2. for he founded it on the seas.

4. super maria, that is, by or near the seas. The largest and most important part of the people live on the shores of the seas and rivers, near the water.

And prepared by the waters.

5. hebrew: He founded it firmly, because it is by the power of God that the seas and rivers do not turn back the cities that are situated on the shores. But those who understand this verse more according to the doctrine of nature (physice) than according to the description of the earth (cosmographice), namely that the whole earth is surrounded by the sea and floats in the water as on a wonderful foundation, let them tell us what then are the waters on which the earth is founded [2 Petr. 3, 5], not to mention that he says in the majority "the seas", so that he does not mean the ocean itself, but according to the Hebrew way the standing waters and the lakes, so that it is obvious that he understands the land and especially the inhabitable world on the shores. But the secret interpretation of St. Augustine is this: that Christ, the incarnate God, has set His Church on seas and rivers, that is, on the floods and inconstant movements of this world and the persecutions of the nations, and sustains it in the midst of them. But I do not follow this view now.

V. 3. Who will go to the mountain of the Lord?

That is, into the church of God. For this is called the mountain of God in the prophets. Isa. 2, 3. Micah 4, 1. 2c.

And who will stand in its holy place?

7 A repetition of the same thing, only that the "standing" means a serving (servitutum), as if he wanted to say: Who do you think are those whom GOD has chosen in his holy name?

Who can truly serve the church? To this question the hopefuls quickly answer: We, we! especially the Jews. For from the beginning of the world there was a twofold generation of those who inquired after God, and remains even now until the end of the world. The first generation consists of the people who served and serve God without heart, without grace, without spirit only with outward works, customs, sacrifices, ceremonies; as once Cain offered sacrifices, but withdrew the heart and the person from it [Gen. 4, 3. ff.]. So it is said of the Jews Ps. 78, 37. 36.: "But their heart was not steadfast to GOD, and lied to Him with their tongue." So also now in the church everything is full of superstitious ceremonies, so much so that even the priests and the spiritual rulers of the people, who should diminish them, increase and multiply them above all others. Not as if prayers, chants, organs, church ornaments, images, lights, clothes and vestments of the body, plates, and other things that are seen everywhere were evil, but not as if through them or for their sake the people were Christ's people, or someone a member of them; rather, they can be and are without them, as the Spirit will teach hereafter, who thus answers the question:

V. 4. who has innocent hands.

8. who is undefiled, pure, without sin.

And is pure in heart.

9 That is, one who is also pure from the will and the desire for evil. He does not say: a bishop, a pope, a doctor, an apostle, a prince, a king. He does not say: a priest, a clergyman, a monk. He does not say: a man, a woman, a child, an old man, a virgin, a widow. He does not say: a Greek, a Latin, a scholar, a wise man, a powerful man, a rich man, for with GOD there is no esteem of such and similar persons, but also no contempt of persons opposed to these; for all this is condemned if it is alone. Yea, what is more, neither he that prays or sings so many psalms, nor he that fasts so many days, nor he that watches so many nights, nor he that distributes his own among the poor, nor he that teaches others, nor he who is meek, gentle, and kind, nor he who has all the knowledge, all the languages, all the virtues, all the works, of which it has been written and said at any time and place, both in the secular and in the sacred Scriptures: but he alone who has these things, that he may be pure inwardly and outwardly, in spirit and in flesh, even if (if this were possible) he should have nothing of all these aforementioned things.

10. Is this not something wonderful? But hear even more wonderful things. Who then is he who is so undefiled and pure? Answer: None other than Jesus Christ alone. All others are unclean, nor can they be cleansed by their own efforts, but only by the grace poured into them through Christ. For there is no one who can boast that he is pure in hands and heart, not even the apostles and the prophets.

(11) Therefore a Christian is clean in hands and heart, that is, he begins to be cleansed, but is still unclean in many ways. Therefore Christ says [John 15:2], "Every branch of mine that bringeth forth fruit he will cleanse, that it may bring forth more fruit." For he would not bear fruit unless he were clean, and yet he that is clean is cleansed from uncleanness without fail.

He who has no desire for loose doctrine (Qui non accipit in vano animam suam).

12. in Hebrew: He who has not lifted up his soul in vain, that is, he who has not pleased himself and arrogantly presumed, but rather he who humbles and hates his soul according to the words of Christ (Matt. 16:24), holding himself in low esteem in all things. Furthermore, our [Latin] translation has not badly expressed this corruption of the hopeful, namely, that they accept their souls in vanity, that is, they choose themselves, despise other people and accept themselves, and appear to themselves in their generalities as righteous, holy and pure. Therefore, apart from themselves, nothing is pure in front of them, whatever others have done and said must stink. It is impossible to cure those of this vice, who have some special

In the above-mentioned aspects, without the grace of God, especially those who excel in the study of the Scriptures and in living a good life, have a good reputation. As the hope of these people is completely unrecognized, it is also very difficult to heal. Therefore he says beautifully: in vanity, yes, to vanity. For since that in which they accept themselves and please themselves is not God, but a creature, it must necessarily be vain to them. For [1 Cor. 1:31] "He that boasteth himself, let him boast of the Lord," and [Ps. 34:3] "Let my soul boast of the Lord," that is, let it be reproached in myself, and let it be put to shame in itself; and when it is thus depressed and humbled, it becomes worthy of God.

But I believe that he added this part of the verse mainly because those sacrilegious hypocrites are also in the habit of saying of themselves without any fear that they are pure in hands and heart. And I certainly see and hear very learned and well-practiced people who are not afraid to claim that they have a godly and good opinion (intentionem), likewise that they do not seek honor and glory, they do not desire gold, they do not seek carnal pleasure. If they knew themselves and felt the grace of God, they would be very ashamed that they had not said the opposite about themselves and lied to themselves.

(14) Therefore, by this characteristic, one can most clearly distinguish the pure from the impure: that the pure humble their souls, and see and confess their impurity, but know absolutely nothing of their purity. The impure, on the other hand, do not know their impurity, and see and boast of their purity, and so they defile themselves even more by their purity.

And do not swear falsely.

(15) The old law praises the oath, but it punishes the false oath and perjury. For it commands that one should swear in the name of the Lord (Deut. 6:13), and [Ps. 63:12], "He that sweareth by him shall be glorified." Thus he punishes false swearing here. But Christ seems to have forbidden swearing altogether in Matth. 5, 34. f., since He says:

"But I say unto you, that ye swear not at all," that is, one shall not swear in any way. But Christ must be understood according to the will and readiness of the mind, that a Christian, as much as there is in him, by no means swears, unless he is compelled by another's slowness or weakness to comply with him, as he also commands [v. 39.] to offer the other cheeks 2c. Then, of course, one may no longer say of swearing, but that he wills another out of love.

(16) And so one must swear in this life, as one must have riches, life, health, friends, honors, and other goods of this world; and yet one must not have them, but forsake and deny them all, that is, not having them in heart (affectu), and possessing them in deed (effectu). "As they that have nothing have all things" [2 Cor. 6:10.], and they that have as if they had not [1 Cor. 7:29.]; so according to the necessity of this life we are rich, healthy, honored, and yet according to the will of the Spirit poor, sick, and despised. Thus, according to the necessities of life, we must swear badly, and yet, according to the will of the heart, we must by all means not swear; and thus, when we swear, we do not swear, and while we are rich, we are poor. For Christ is a spiritual teacher, he instructs the mind and the heart; but the law and statutes of men teach outward things. For there are some who are rich according to the will of their heart, and have all the goods of the world, though outwardly they are very poor and miserable in need. There are also people who have a greater desire to swear in their heart than is outwardly necessary in their deeds. These are reprov'd and punished by Christ, whose words are spirit and test and judge the spirit.

(17) Hence in this verse he describes the soundness of a pious man toward his neighbor, which is chiefly in faith; for without faithfulness and faith, trade and commerce and intercourse of people among themselves cannot stand. But the Hebrew does not say [as in the Vulgate] "to his neighbor," but only, "And swear not falsely."

V. 5. He will receive the blessing from the Lord.

18 As if to say, Such a one, whoever he may be, whether Jew or Gentile, without distinction of person. And only such a one will be blessed by the Lord, that is, obtain grace, which is the spiritual blessing.

And righteousness from the God of his salvation (Et misericordiam a Deo, salutari suo).

19 This is, from Christ, who is true God, the salvation of God. But the Hebrew text contains, as I think, something else, namely that this verse also belongs to the register of virtues that he described in the previous verses in a righteous man. For he says thus, "He shall receive blessing from the LORD, and righteousness from the GOD of his salvation," so that the meaning is: He shall go up to the mountain of the LORD who, besides the things already mentioned, also has this, that he alone receives righteousness and blessing from GOD, that is, who does not justify himself, nor ascribe righteousness to himself by his merits, but is justified by the mercy and blessing of GOD. For there are none righteous, except they be made righteous by mercy in vain, before (ante) all their merits. Thus it is said in the 4th Psalm, v. 6. "Sacrifice righteousness, and hope in the LORD." To hope in the Lord, and to expect everything from His hand, and to want to make nothing of one's own pleasing before God, that is, to do the truth and sacrifice righteousness. Hence the meaning of all these verses: Blessed is he who is pure, that is, poor and a sinner, and keeps faith with his neighbor, trusting only in the mercy of God. This is as follows:

V. 6: This is the generation that seeks him, that seeks your face, O Jacob. Sela. 1)

20 Here he ends the question and decides who goes to the mountain of the Lord, who is righteous, who is righteous, and who is righteous.

1) Vulgate: Hare sst. AeuerMio HuaereMiura euna, ^uaerentinna taxiern Del 4aoot>. 8e4a. - In the original the words: eurn have been omitted.

den. There we find this marginal gloss: The Hebrew text has tunna instead of lwi, since it obviously indicates that Christ is God and man.

which is the people of Christ. For others also have the firm conviction that they seek the Lord, but they do not know that they also seek themselves and their own from the Lord, which is a terrible impurity.

Therefore, we must also lament our time, in which there is so much blindness even among those who are the best, that they try all other means to come to God through them, except those which they read, pray and teach daily in this psalm. Christianity is burdened with so many decrees of the popes, with so many customs, with so many prayers, with so many indulgences, with so many ceremonies, that one could be led to believe that the law of Moses has returned in twain. They cannot attain purity of heart and the death of the old man, which is required only by the law of Christ, by these superstitious things, so much so that by nothing do they produce more impurity of heart and by no way strengthen the old man more than by the very way by which they think they will attain the Lord. For one cannot find more puffed-up people, more obstinate, more wrathful, more harsh, more bitter, who judge, condemn, and despise others more easily, but exalt their own and please themselves, and, to sum it up in one word, more angry people, and who are further away from Christian humility and love than those who pray all day long. They say mass (celebrant), fast, distinguish themselves by priestly and monastic garb, and plates that build churches, hold vigils and other offices of the soul 1) (officia), namely, the abomination that is to come, and which most vexes God and man. But I do not know whether one can find anything more hopeful and annoying among people than these people who, in addition, go along in special devotions (studiis), in their self-chosen rosaries, coronas, 2) septenths and nglaub-

There are many superstitious prayers, such as those of St. Bridget, not to mention the prayers for the greatest indulgences. For of these Micah says [Cap. 7, 2. 4.]: "The pious people are gone in this land, and the righteous are no more among the people. The best of them is as a thorn, and the most upright as a hedge." For these people consider their doings not only lawful or harmless, but miraculous things of the greatest holiness, as the same prophet [v. 3] says: "They think they do well when they do evil."

But I want to stop here, because the lion is sitting in wait and the heretic Picard is very close to us, who takes everything we say in such a way, as if it was said for him. Now is such a difficult and dangerous time that we must either please the heretics if we rebuke the Christians, or seduce the Christians if we resist the heretics. For the heretical Picard also ridicules the superstitious ceremonies of the Catholics, but he ridicules them in such a way that he looks down on them with hope, but does not have compassion in mercy. Otherwise, he would not hide himself away, leave the erring ones and set up his own sect, but would step up, reach out his hand to the erring ones, bear the burden of the others and help them through common love. Thus it happens that when we lift up our ceremonies to refute the Picards, the simple-minded Christians (catholici) believe that the whole value of godliness lies in them, which they have long believed more than enough, so that they should rather be taught not to believe it. Again, if we do this, the heretic triumphs, and the Picard rejoices as the victor, although his and our speeches, as much as they are exceedingly similar in wording and syllables, are just as completely dissimilar in meaning. For even a picard and an ass have very great similarity, if one only regards them as living creatures (animal), but for this reason a picard would not want to be an ass. "The feathers of the ostrich," says the Lord to Job [Cap. 39, 13. Vulg.], "are like the feathers of the hawk." For he speaks of the heretics, who, the more resem-

The more they are to true Christians, the more pernicious they are, because they are deceptive by their very good appearance.

But let us return to the Psalm. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God [Matt. 5:8], that is, they seek the face of the God of Jacob, that is, seeing. But they do not seek it otherwise than through purity of heart, without which no one will see God, says the apostle [Heb. 12:14], so much so that he calls it "sanctification," as it were, a holy purity.

V. 7: Open wide the gates.

24 [Attollite portas principes vestras, machet open wide your gates, you princes,] that is, you priests and elders of the people, lift up your minds. But what is there for a connection? what for a suitable transition? I have not read enough about these verses to make me calm, and it would perhaps be better that I too, by my silence, let the Holy Spirit have the honor that he is Master: only that sometimes we also give and receive opportunity through an error, that one may recognize the truth through the other, yes [realize] that he cannot err who sees Christ everywhere, although he does not see the literal mind everywhere. The meaning, therefore, should be that the rulers of the Jews and all teachers of the people to the end of the world should be the first to know true righteousness, since the people cannot know it otherwise than through them, and the whole salvation of the church rests on good shepherds, and the fruit of the vineyard on its workers. For if the salt become foolish, wherewith shall the earth be salted? [Matth. 5, 13.] And if one blind man leads another, will they not both fall into the pit? [Luc. 6, 39.]

(25) Therefore, the Spirit first and foremost commands princes to raise their gates and set their minds on high, lest they be sluggish of heart, and such people who have set their minds on the temporal and are only earthly-minded, as the poet Persius also says, "You, empty of heavenly things, bow your hearts to the earth; but rather learn to be heavenly-minded and to understand heavenly things.

because faith is necessary. But faith is not present if Christ does not enter their hearts through his word; but he cannot enter if they do not allow themselves to be taught and to be drawn up and led out to the heavenly and spiritual, that is, if they do not give their minds captive to the obedience of the word and turn away their taste from the earthly things to which they are accustomed.

(26) Now if you were to ask about the aforementioned: How then do we become pure in hands and heart, and the generation that inquires after God? he answers like Moses [Deut. 30:13, 14]: "The word is almost near you," there is no need to cross the sea. Only take care that you lift up your heart and let the word of Christ come to you, and place yourself in such a way that you are taught. On the stroke also the fourth Psalm hath said [v. 7.], "Lift up over us the light of thy countenance." For the light of faith is exalted and shines only on the minds that are lifted up from the earth, because it presents only heavenly things before the eyes and hides earthly things.

And [make] the doors high in the world
(Et elevamini portae aeternales).

In a tautological way he repeats the same. But he calls them eternal gates, because the mind of man is immortal; eternally it will be a door through which God enters. For he will not enter the heart only once and then stop, but with an eternal entrance, just as the sun continuously enters a house with its rays.

That the king of honors moves in.

28 That is, Christ through the word and the faith of the heart. But this word is a rock of trouble and a stumbling block. For it has caused only a very small part of the princes to open their gates and let Christ in, just as very few let him in today. It is true that the apostles and people like them who followed them let him in, but the others were offended by him and closed their gates. For it was a very foolish thing for the Jews and the Gentiles to hear this exceedingly high title of the one of whom

They knew that he had been crucified and died, and that he was a man most desecrated. Therefore, it required a great exaltation to believe that this was the King of honors and the Lord over all things, who had become the most despised among men.

29 But even now Christ comes in his least to his greatest, he comes in his despised to his glorious, he comes in his foolish to his wise: but in all these not only do they not admit him with open doors, but even persecute and revile him. For nowhere is the truth of the gospel more detested than among the great men of the church, and those who are esteemed to govern the people. For as soon as they hear the word of the King of glory preaching in lowliness, they say to the Jews, "Is this the King of glory? Should this be true? Should Christ command this? 2c.

V. 8. Who is the same king of honors?

30 Rather, this expresses contempt, not astonishment. As if they wanted to say: Rather, this crucified one, whom you preach, is a despised worm. Thus it is said in Ps. 4, 7: "Many say: How should this one show us what is good?" as if he wanted to say: What should Christ, who is full of misfortune, be able to show us good? and so they also say to him, Luc. 4, 23: "Physician, help thyself."

The Lord is strong and mighty, the Lord is mighty in battle.

This is the answer of the Spirit through the mouth of those who preach Christ. I do not know whether I am at liberty to make a distinction between fortis [strong] and potens [mighty], since the interpreters have translated these words so very differently (tanta confusione), and it cannot be denied that they have taken them to mean the same thing. But as much as I can obtain, the first, fortis, signifies the essential strength or capacity in itself; but the second, potens, signifies the power and force, as it were the use and application (impetum) of strength, so that he is "strong" who is able and has the powers to accomplish it, but "mighty" who accomplishes the thing with power and mightily. Thus says the holy Virgin, Luc. 1, 49.: "He has done great things for me, he who is mighty," that is, he who brings all things mightily to pass. Isa. 28:2: "Behold, a strong and mighty one from the LORD, like a hailstorm, like a hurtful weather, like a water storm, mightily breaking in."

32 But now let us look at the meaning. That Christ is "strong and mighty," and what is greatest, "mighty in battle," is not evident in his own person, nor in all of his, but the opposite: powerlessness, oppression and defeat in war. Therefore this is something foolish to the fools, and it is not grasped in any other way than by faith and preaching. That is why it is only preached, not shown. But he was strong in secret, and mighty especially in the battle of suffering, which he himself and all his own endured, because by his power he overcame and still overcomes the world and the devil, as John says [1 Ep. 5:4]: "This is your victory that overcomes the world, your faith."

V. 9. Open wide the gates 2c.

(33) He repeats the exhortation, for this controversy continues to the end of the world, in that lowly people always preach Christ, and the hopeful resist Christ.

34 But it must not be passed over that in the Hebrew in these verses it is written thus: Ye gates, lift up your heads, and arise, ye everlasting gates 2c. But the meaning remains the same. For the princes of the nations are the gates by which the people enter into the kingdom of heaven; their heads are their minds. For thus saith the Lord [Matt. 16:18], "And the gates of hell shall not prevail against them," that is, the power of the devils that reign in the world.

V. 10. Who is the same king of honors?

35 They still resist Christ and his word, but they will not prevail until the end.

The Lord of hosts [Dominus virtutum].

That is, of the hosts. Virtutum is Zebaoth.

He is the king of honors. Sela.

37. for he remains the King of honors forever, whom the host of angels and saints on earth have served.

The twenty-fifth Psalm.

1. is a prayer of Christ in the person of His Church, as Augustine says, asking for forgiveness of sins and grace and deliverance from enemies.

Title: A Psalm of David.

V. 1. Aleph. I long for you, O Lord (levavi animam meam).

2. that is, I pray. For it is the description of a prayer which is an ascension or lifting up of the soul to God. It should be noted that this psalm is alphabetical, but two letters are missing, Kaph and Waw. The others are also not arranged appropriately, so that one can see that the prophet did not take great care in their arrangement.

V. 2. Beth. My God, I hope in you, do not let me be put to shame.

You are my God, but I am nothing to myself. In you I trust, because I cannot trust myself; in you I shall not be put to shame, for in me I am put to shame. Before a man sees in himself that he is nothing, he himself is God, trusts in himself, boasts of himself; but when the challenge comes, all this becomes shame, and he is ashamed of himself beyond measure.

That my enemies do not rejoice over me.

(4) That is, I pray thee that I may not be put to shame, nor be a laughing-stock and a delight to mine enemies. For what is more pleasing to the enemies than that he should be put to shame whom they hate?

(5) But the prophet seems to speak in a very general way, and for that reason in a dark way, so that one cannot know which enemies, which disgrace he fears. But the sequence and context of this psalm shows that he is tormented by arrogant works saints, and fears that he will in truth be disgraced before God by his sins, as they have disgraced him.

1) of whose works almost the entire Psalter or 2) at least the largest part of it reports. Yes, such people also cause a great deal of trouble to the truly righteous and humble.

V. 3. gimel. For no one will be put to shame who waits for you.

Here is the same verb [XXX, which the interpreter here rendered by confundentur] that he translated above [v. 2] by erubescam. But "wait" are those who do not fall away in mockery and misfortune, nor by foolish prayer dictate to GOtte the time or manner of salvation.

But to shame they must become, the loose despisers (iniqua agentes supervacue).

This is, they will be put to shame (confundentur), in the future tense, or: Would that God would put them to shame (confundantur), in the present tense, so that they may be saved. Here he begins to reveal who the enemies are and in what they persecute him, namely, those who prefer the statutes of men to the law of GOD. That is why he says supervacue, that is, in a useless way (in vanum) they do righteous things, because in truth they are rather ungodly things. Thus the Jews persecute the apostles, the heretics the Christians, the proud the humble. Therefore it follows:

V. 4. Daleth. Lord, show me your ways.

8 That is, let not them teach me their ungodly ways, but teach me thyself inwardly by the Holy Spirit what ways please thee. Not as the Jews once prayed [Ex. 20:19], "Do not let God speak to us, lest we die." Rather, speak to us, O Lord, that we may live. They are alive and fear death; we are dead and desire life.

1) Erlanger: exxrodant instead of: exprodrant.

2) Instead of M, ant should probably be read.

And teach me your paths.

It is a tautology, a repetition of what was said before. For when God teaches through Himself, He does not speak letters and syllables, but gives living love. His teaching is our doing and our fulfilling of the Law. Therefore, what the prophet prays in this verse is the same as what we usually pray: Lord, give me your grace to do what you have commanded. Give what you command, and command what you will, says Augustine 2c.

End.

At the end of the table of contents in the book published by the children and heirs of Veit Dietrich the following is still found:

At Coburg in the castle Doctor Luther wrote on the wall:

[I shall not die, but live, and declare the work of the Lord.

Ps. 1, 6.

The way of the wicked perishes.
But it takes a long time. Wait.

Ps. 74, 21.

The poor and miserable praise your name, O Lord.
Because the others are not allowed to do yours.

7 Luther's Interpretation of the Seven Penitential Psalms

[Title and preface of the first edition of 1517.]

The seven penitential psalms

with German interpretation, according to the written sense, to Christ's and God's grace, next to his same true knowledge, thoroughly judged.

[Printed in March or April 1517.]

To all the dear limbs of Christ who read this booklet.

Grace and peace from God! Lest anyone wonder, dear friends of Christ, at the text of these seven Psalms, it is to be known that in some verses, for the sake of clearer understanding for the sake of the common translation, taken after the translation of St. Jerome, also helped the translation of Doctors Johannis Reuchlin in his Hebrew sep-.

*The first writing, which Luther himself handed over for printing, is the interpretation of the seven penitential psalms in German, not for the scholars and highly educated people, but for the people: Letters to Christoph Scheurl of May 6, 1517, he says (Walch, old ed., vol. XXI, 573): "I am sorry that my little works (Eng ineptias [that is, the interpretation of the seven penitential psalmenft spread among you by the venerable father f Staupitz). For they were not published for Nurembergers, that is, for feuegebrldete and exceedingly clever people, but for the coarse (as you know) Saxons, to whom the Christian doctrine cannot be sufficiently presented and chewed with however many words." Even earlier, Luther had spent a long time on the Psalms. Luther's very first lecture on biblical writings, soon after his doctorate, was on the Psalter. The glosses and clods relating to it are preserved in Luther's own manuscript, the former in the Wölfenbüttel library, the latter in the library at Dresden. The Wölfenbüttel manuscript was first published by Walch in the ninth volume of his edition in German translation (after a copy that was often faulty).

To respect the Christians, or to doubt that Christ is so close to them, he will tell them how they should judge all this. But my presumption to interpret the Psalms, especially into German, I command to judge freely in every man's discretion. For not to me nor to you, but to God alone, praise and glory without end, Amen. .

dener first published Seidemann under the title: "Dr. Martin Luther's first and oldest lectures on the Psalms from the years 1513-1516. fJn first edition Dresden 1876.] Second fTitel-Z edition Dresden 1880." Complete, both records united into Emem whole, first in the Weimar edition in the third and fourth volumes under the title vietutu sup^r ksultsrium. From the Wolfenbüttel manuscript, Professor C. Aug. Riehm at Halle had the seven penitential psalms printed in 1874 as the Easter program of the University of Halle under the title: luitiurn tteoloAins lmtlmi s. sxempW settoliornm quibus D. l^utlisrus Psalterium inter^retari eoepit. Luther himself intended to print the very first Psalms lectures, as we can see from two letters to Joh. Lang, dated Dec. 26, 1515 and Oct. 25, 1516, from which it is clear that he was busy with preliminary work for the printing of them. However, the planned printing was postponed further and further and finally did not take place at all. In the Penitential Psalms, Luther did not pay particular attention to his glosses or his lectures, because, as already mentioned, he published them for the people. We recognize the time of their publication from a letter of Luther to Johann Lang of March 1, 1517, where he says: "If the Psalms, which I have translated and explained in German, would please no one, they would please me best; but the printer Johannes [Grünenberg] is waiting for you to finish with those which I have sent you." (The meaning of this passage is probably not, as the Weimar edition and also Köstlin, Martin Luther, vol. I, p. 123, assumes, and as also our edition, vol. XVIII, 1974, reads two we have taken over the translation of the old edition, "that Luther had his hearty joy in them" fWeim. Ausg., Bd. I, 154], but Luther wants to say: If my learned friends would judge of my work that it would not please them, it would please me best, because I would thereby receive the certainty that it does not fit for the learned, but for the people. fLuther calls it in the letter to Spalatin, spring 1517 (Erl. Br.W. I, 90), a dish that has been chewed two or three times; however, I must get it into print as soon as possible, because the printer wants it and is waiting for the part of the Psalms that is still in your hands). It seems, then, that the printer had already begun work on the Penitential Psalms on March 1, 1517, but was now waiting for those that were still in longitudinal hands. They were sent to him (as the Weimar edition says) presumably for his own sake, so that he, as a connoisseur of Hebrew, could check the translation. The printing may therefore have been completed as early as March or April 1517 at the latest, since according to Luther's letters to Scheurl mentioned above, the Penitential Psalms were already in circulation in Nuremberg on May 6, 1517. The first printing was procured by Johannes Grünenberg in Wittenberg and went out under the title: "Die Sieben puszpsalm mit deutscher auszlegung nach dem schriftlichen synne tzu Christi vnd gottis gnaden, neben seyns selben. Ware erkenntniß. gründlich gerichtet." At the end: "Gedruckt tzu Wittenberg! hn der Churfürstlichen stad durch Joannem Grunenberck Nach Christ geburt Tausent funffhundert vnd jm sibentzen jar. By the Augustinians." "Sales were so brisk that before the printing was completed, the first sheets were already being reissued, and in many cases the manuscript was reprinted in the following years" (Weim. The first edition was printed by Jakob Thanner in Leipzig in 1518, 1519, and 1520; by Johann Knoblouch in Strasbourg in 1519; and by Jörg Nadler in Augsburg (as the marginal borders suggest), but no date is given. Finally, there are two editions from 1524 and 1525, which contain only a short excerpt of Luther's interpretation; the former is printed in Erfurt in the Pergamentergasse zum Färbefaß, the latter, a reprint of the same, is without indication of the printer and place. - After a number of years, namely in 1525, Luther revised the first edition, because in his "first excursion" he "often missed the text's opinion", and "had also progressed since the time", and let the book go out again, "better prepared and based on the right text". The second edition was published under the title we have placed above it in 1525 by Joseph Klug in Wittenberg; likewise, in the same year, a Lower Saxon edition by the same publisher; another edition by Silvanus Ottmar in Augsburg in 1525; finally, an edition in 1526 without indication of place and printer. In the collections, the first edition is found: in the Jenaer (1564), vol. I, p. 19; in the Altenburger, vol. I, p. 25; in the Leipziger, vol. V, p. 369, and in the Weimarschen, vol. I, p. 154. The second arrangement: in the Wittenberg (1553), vol. III, p. 24d; in the Jena (1556), vol. III, p. I; in the Altenburg, vol. III, p. I, and in the Leipzig, vol. V, p. 401. Both editions are combined with each other in such a way that the translation of 1517 precedes each psalm, but the new translation is included in the text of the second edition, and the deviations of the first edition are indicated in notes: in Walch, Vol. IV, 2258, and in the Erlangen edition, vol. 37, p. 340. We reproduce the text in the same way, basing the first edition mainly on the Weimar edition, but the second on the Jena edition, comparing the Wittenberg and Erlangen editions.

sTitle and preface of the second edition of 1525.)

The seven penitential psalms with German interpretation, improved by Martin Luther. In the 1525th year.

Preface Martini Luther.

Among my first books, I also sent out the seven penitential Psalms with an interpretation. And although I have not yet found anything harmful taught in them, the text is often lacking in opinion; as is the case with all teachers on the first outing, even the old holy fathers, who, as Augustine confesses of himself, have improved daily in writing and teaching. So was this booklet at that time, since nothing better was on the plan, good enough and pleasant. But now that the Gospel has come to noon, shines brightly, and I have also progressed in time, I have deemed it good to omit it again, better prepared, and based on the right text. All readers hereby command God's grace, amen.

The first penitential psalm, in number the sixth.*)

O God, do not punish me in your anger and do not chastise me in your wrath.

2 O God, have mercy on me, for I am weak; make me well, for all my bones are dismayed.

3. and my soul is greatly terrified, but, O God, how long?

4 O God, return and redeem my soul, make me blessed for the sake of your mercy.

5 For in death there is no one who remembers you, but in hell who will give you praise and thanks?

I am troubled in my groaning. I will wash my bed every night and water my bed with my tears.

7 My face is all wasted with wrath; I am obsolete among those who are all my enemies.

008 Depart from me, all ye that work that is not right: for God hath heard the cry of my weeping.

9 God has heard my prayer, God has received my supplication.

010 Oh that all mine enemies were ashamed and greatly afraid, that they might return and be put to shame very quickly.

V. 1.¹) O Lord, do not punish me in your anger.

(1) To explain this psalm, there are a few things to remember. The first: In all suffering and trials, man should first run to God and recognize and accept that everything is sent by God, whether it comes from the devil or from man. This is what the prophet who is mentioned in this psalm does here. ^{a)} But first he runs to God, and takes the suffering^{b)} from God.

1) The counting here is different from that in the Bible, because the superscription is not counted here.

a) his enemies.

b) does not take the enmity of his enemies from them, but *) In the notes to the following interpretations, the deviations of the text are marked with letters, other notes with numbers. An addition in the 1517 edition has the sign: †.

for with wisdom comes the patience and fear of God. But he who looks at man, and does not accept of God, becomes impatient and despiser of God 2c.

The other: God punishes in two ways; once in mercy, as a kind father, and temporally; the other time in wrath, as a strict judge, and eternally. Now when God attacks man, nature is so weak and despondent that it does not know whether it is attacking God in anger or in grace; and in the fear of anger it lifts up and cries, "O God! do not punish me in anger, let it be in grace and temporal, be a father and not a judge. When St. Augustine also speaks: Oh God, punish 1) here, strike here, and spare our there. So he asks here, not that he wants to be completely unpunished, because that would not be a good sign, but as a child being punished by the father.

3) But that these words are spoken by a sinner, or in the person of a sinner,^c) follows from the fact that he names the punishment. For God's punishment is not for the sake of righteousness. Therefore, all saints and Christians must recognize themselves as sinners, and fear God's judgment; for this psalm is common to all, and excludes no one. Therefore, woe to all those who are not afraid and do not feel their sin, and walk safely in the face of God's fearful judgment, before which no good work can be sufficient.

V. 2. Lord, have mercy on me.

4 That is, show me mercy, that I may not perish or perish in anxiety and fear.

Heal me, Lord.

5 That is, strengthen me, help me in this misery.

For my bones are terrified.

(6) That is, all my strength and power succumb to the horror of your punishment; therefore, because my strength fails me, give me your strength.

(7) And it is to be noted here that this psalm, and its like, will never again be found-

- 1) Jenaer: "Zürne". Wittenberger: "Zorne".
- c) through Christ.
- 2) Wittenberger: terrible.

The people of the world have never understood or prayed that the accident would happen under their eyes, as it does in death and in the final journey. And blessed are those to whom this happens in life, for every man must perish. When man thus perishes and is destroyed in all his powers, works and being, so that there is no longer anything but a wretched, condemned, forsaken sinner, then comes divine help and strength. As Job 11:17: "When thou thinkest thyself swallowed up, only then shalt thou break forth as the morning star."

V. 3. and my soul is terrified.

For God's strength and comfort are not given to anyone unless he asks for them with all his heart. But no one asks thoroughly who is not yet thoroughly frightened and forsaken; for he does not know what he lacks, and in the meantime stands secure in other strength and comfort of himself or of the creatures. Therefore, so that God may give out His strength and comfort and communicate it to us, He will remove all other comfort and make the soul heartily sorrowful, crying and longing for His comfort. And so all God's punishments are kindly arranged for blessed comfort, although the unwise prevent the order in themselves and pervert it through their soft and despairing hearts toward God, because they do not know that God has hidden and gives His goodness and friendship under wrath and punishment.

Oh, Lord, how long?

(9) The time is long for all suffering people, and again short for the happy, but especially and immeasurably long for those who have this inner pain of the soul, which is felt by God's abandonment and renunciation, (3) as it is well said that one hour of purgatory is more bitter than a thousand years of temporal bodily pain. Thus, there is no greater suffering than 4) sensitive suffering of the conscience that occurs when God renounces, that is, the truth, justice,

3) Thus the Jena (1) and the Weimar. In the other editions: "da von GOtt verlassen und entsagen gefühlt wird".

4) Thus the Jenaer in both redactions and the Wittenberger. Weimarsche: "wan"; Ertlinger: "wenn".

Wisdom 2c. [1] and nothing remains there but sin, darkness, misery and woe. And this is a drop or foretaste of the infernal chastisement and eternal damnation, therefore it seeks all bones, strength, sap, marrow, and what is in man.

V. 4. Turn, O Lord, and save my soul.

(10) "To turn away from God" is to renounce inwardly, to forsake, from which the terrible fright is felt, and immediately a lifting condemnation; as in the 30th Psalm, v. 8: "When thou didst hide thy face, I was afraid." ^{c)} "To return," however, is inward consolation and abstention in joyful hope. Therefore he says, "Save my soul," as if he were saying, "It is sunk and condemned; show or snatch it out again.

Help me.

(11) For this is the deepest and greatest sickness of the soul, wherein it must perish eternally, if it should remain thus.

For the sake of your goodness.

12. not for the sake of my merits, but for the sake of your goodness,^e so that it may be praised, loved and commended, that you may also help the unworthy. For whom God helps according to his merit, he is honored and praised more cheaply than God's goodness.^e) That would be a great dishonor; therefore, if God's goodness^e is to be praised, all merits and dignities must be nullified; and that is what this temptation does.

V. 5: For in death you are not remembered.

13 That is, the dead do not praise you, nor do they praise your goodness^e, but only the living. As in the 115th Psalm, v. 17, 18: "The dead shall not praise thee, O Lord, nor they that go down to hell: but we praise the Lord from henceforth even for ever." ^{f)} Therefore he does not only speak of bodily death, but also^g) of spiritual death.

1) "entzeucht" is found only in the first Jena Redaction as a conjecture in the margin.

d) You have turned your face away from me, and I am terrified.

e) Mercy.

f) Not the dead will praise you, nor all who are going to hell, but we who are alive give glory to God now and forever.

g) more.

death, as^h) the soul is dead. For sin is the death of the soul, but torment is its hell; both are felt by the one who lies in this misery, sin and punishment of sins. Therefore he says: "Do not leave me in death and hell, but according to your goodnessⁱ) make me alive with grace, and deliver me from hell with comfort.

Therefore, this verse indicates that this suffering is a gate and entrance into eternal sin and punishment, that is, into death and hell. When the king Ezechias said [Is. 38, 10.]: "I have said (with great terror): I must go into the gates of hell in the midst of my life", that is, when I meant to live in the best of all ways.

Who will thank you in hell?

15 Therefore I have said, for thy goodness' sakeⁱ. For hell, where thy mercy is not, doth not praise thee, but rather reviles and blasphemes thy righteousness and truth. This is the noblest thought that the saints have in their suffering, that they also may be preserved, otherwise they are in all ways like the damned. As it is written in the last (penitential) psalm [Ps. 143, 7.]: "Hide^k) not thy face from me, lest I become like them that go into the pit^l)." ^{m)}

16. But the difference is that the saints keep a favor against God, and that they care more that God's favor, praise and honor fall from them, than that they be condemned. For he does not say, "In hell there is no joy and pleasure," but "no praise or glory. Therefore he introduces here that no one in hell is favorable to God, and if he should go into it, he would also be like the damned 3) in God's disfavor; that would be repugnant and woeful to him above all torment. Therefore it is written in the Song of Songs [Cap. 8, 6], "that the love of God is strong as death and firm as hell", therefore that it also remains in mortal and hellish punishment. Thus God also speaks through Isaiah [Cap. 48, 9.]: "I will bridle you.

h) as.

i) Mercy.

2) "to" is missing in the Weimar.

k) Turnaround.

3) Thus the Wittenberg. In the other editions: "would also the same".

with my praise, that thou perish not," that is, a hearty favor to me I will give thee in the midst of thy suffering, and the same shall bridle thee and keep thee, without which all others perish in suffering. Also Ps. 18:4: "I will call upon the Lord with praise, and I will be delivered from mine enemies."^m) For suffering, death, even hell must be overcome by us. But it will not be overcome with flight and impatience, but with favor, will, and love, keeping it against God. These are sharp speeches to the old Adam, especially the one who is still green and fresh; but it does not help.

V. 6. I labor with my groaning.

That is, I sigh a lot and very,ⁿ) that also sighing my work. ^o) My life becomes sour and laborious, for it is no more than sighing. After the manner one also speaks: I have labored or worked with running, with beating 2c. So here also: I labor with sighing, am restless^p) with sighing. ^q)

I wash my bed all night long.

18. that is, I weep so much that the tears^r) swim in my bed; as also follows:

m) "With praise I will call upon GOD, and so I will be redeemed."

n) I have sighed a lot and very much.

o) † have been.

p) "have labored with seiches, have been restless with sighing."

q) † What does this verse want? To notice that he now describes and presents what a right life is. For in this test he has learned that a righteous life does not consist in many works, as the Jews thought, against whom he now begins to speak to the end of the Psalm; but it only consists in crucifying and killing the old man, so that the outer man's way of life, whether according to the world or according to apparent holiness, should be destroyed, and only that should exist which Christ says Matt. 5:4, 6: "Blessed are they that weep and hunger and thirst after righteousness." For this life is to be nothing else but a hatred of the old man, and a seeking and desiring of life in the new man. Is now the mind: Now I see that the world and all flesh and blood is a harmful vain thing in its laughing, being happy, rich, powerful and exalted and the like. For she does not feel what I have felt, therefore she thinks life is good, but does not know what follows. Therefore it is better to weep, to lament, to sigh, than to laugh and be merry, to sing, to have rest, peace, and comfort.

r) In Hebrew thus: I will make my bed to float all night, that is, I will weep so much that the tears shall be

And soak (net) my camp with my tears.

But this is not possible, nor has it ever been heard or read by a saint, according to the words. Therefore, the words are spoken in the spirit, also to be understood in the spirit, so that his soul is so heavily loaded with suffering^s) that if it were possible for the body,^t) he would cry so much. Therefore, as much as is in him,^u) it is the same as happening) And should the corpse follow a soul that thoroughly feels God's punishment, W) he would have to melt closer than in an hour like the snow, and pass away)

V. 7. My form is decayed before the wrath.

20) That is, my form and all the outward change of the body has been changed and disfigured,^y) and all this from wrath,^z) ¹) which I have felt from God. But the world cultivates its form in silk, gold and shining food, like the rich man in the Gospel [Luc. 16, 19. 20.]. But I became the poor and shapeless Lazarus through^a) God's wrath.

s) fiercely inflamed against the old man.

t) wanted.

u) † in the will.

y) † For the will within is the weight of all outward works and life.

w) has thoroughly repented and is inflamed in the truth, x) † And all this is now said to the foolish world; as if he should say: O you blind, miserable children, you lie with good rest and chamber on soft bed, and do your pleasure on it, completely in pleasure you live, well bedded and clothed. Truly, if you knew otherwise, you would wash the beds and merry lairs with tears in your eyes, since you are now lounged on and have pleasure. Oh God, these are not the beds of bliss that serve the lusts of the flesh; they would be so weeping (who could do it) that they would swim in tears.

y) † before the world. For I care and do not wait for his, yes I pursue him with embarrassed and complaining life,

z) † which I received against the vain flesh, out of wrath,

1) This addition is missing in Walch and in the Erlanger.

a) Instead of what now follows in the text, the edition of 1517 up to v. 8. has the following: never willing wrath, so that I may escape God's wrath, which no one may escape, except he who crucifies, devastates and destroys his Adam.

I am obsolete among those who find all my enemies.

That is, I am unfit and useless before the world, like an old man, therefore it despises me in my life, even persecutes me. Because it is repugnant to it and does not want to suffer it. So this life in the cross does nothing for me

And has grown old, for I am troubled everywhere.

That is, I am unfit, like an old man. For such a feeling of God's punishment makes all his strength be consumed, and makes him think that heaven and earth are upon him, and that all men are 1) his enemies. For he finds no comfort anywhere, but only terror and the wrath of God.

V. 8. Depart from me, all evildoers.

22. that this does not mean all unrighteous people, but those who have great holiness^b) and wisdom is proven by Matth. 7, 22. where the Lord Christ introduces this half verse against those who will say at the last day: O Lord, have we not preached in thy name, and done many miracles? 2c. These wise men and saints are here given by Christ to be called operarii iniquitatis,^c) evildoers, because they do not do what is right.

(23) So now here he goes with the hopeful saints, so never before has God's wrath been visited upon them.

other than enemies, for they are all my enemies. Whoever does not know this, or does not believe it, only looks at a right life according to the cross of Christ, soon he will find that the whole world is against him, and mocks and persecutes him as a foolish, erring, evil man. Then his form and conduct must become obsolete and nullified, especially in the sight of the high-minded and the great clergy, who always presume to master these same justifiers, and not to hear or suffer anything from them against their arrogance and conceit. These are they who have all wisdom and righteousness, without which lies in thy cross, and there is not a people in all the world that look more against the cross than they. No one, even less, kills or rejects his own mind, his own way, his own conceit, than they; yea, the same evil infirmities they adorn and fortify with logs of good works, opinion, and word, drawn also from the Scriptures, and so fearlessly, surely, and boldly pursuing or seeking to master the truly righteous. He now speaks of them: v. 8, "Depart from me" 2c.

1) "People" only in the Wittenberg.

b) great spirit and holiness.

c) † perpetrator of the wrong or

d) Instead of §23 and the first words of §24, the first edition says: "These are the real enemies of Christianity. For it has never had, nor has, nor will have any other enemies than those who want to be right, and for the sake of unrighteousness think they are destroying the righteous, when they live so with all diligence that they may live only in peace, quiet, honor, comfort, and not in the cross or trouble; and bear no other distinction from the other gross sinners than that the latter seek pleasure in carnal things, and the latter in their spiritual things.

nor have they come to the knowledge of their sins. Therefore, they neither believe, trust, call upon, know, nor teach God's goodness, but deceive themselves and others with them by works and certain presumption of merit before God. To these he wishes that they also have to experience God's wrath, so that they may one day come to themselves from their presumption.

For the Lord has heard the voice of my crying.

(24) That is, God is so minded that He loves to hear the crying and complaining, and not the secure and free. Therefore, a good life does not stand in outward works and appearances, but in a groaning and sorrowful spirit, as it is written in the 4th [Penitential] Psalm, Ps. 51:19: "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit, a broken and bruised heart you, God, will not despise." And, "The LORD is near to them that are of a broken heart" [Ps. 34, 19.]^e) Therefore, weeping precedes action, and suffering overrides all action.

V. 9 The Lord has heard my supplication; the Lord has accepted my prayer.

(25) These words express nothing else than a spiritless soul, which has nothing more than the crying, pleading and asking in firm faith, strong hope and constant love. And so shall be the condition 2) of every Christian's life and being, that he neither know nor have anything apart from God, nor have him otherwise than in faith. Therefore, those who have the good things, wisdom and reason and piety, will be more hopeful and more deeply in love with them than the gross sinners in the flesh.

For God has heard the cry of my weeping.

Because they lie on high and think they are right, they do not believe that those who are defeated are anything before God, but they think they are doing God a service by doing so and supporting the truth. And this fearlessness and certainty condemns and corrupts all their doings: for without fear and humility no one pleases God. Therefore he says: God is so advised that he will not let those who cry out and 2c.

e) "The sacrifice that pleases God is an afflicted spirit, and a humble broken heart you do not spurn"; and in the 34th Psalm, v. 19: "Close is God to all those who are of a suffering or afflicted heart."

V. 10. All my enemies must be ashamed and terrified.

(26) That is, they stand in their own good pleasure so wickedly and dangerously, and boast of themselves as if they were well off. But they do not know how wicked they are. Therefore it would be good for them to come to themselves and to realize how shameful ¹⁾ and wretched they are in the sight of God. For the great spiritual and wise cannot do otherwise than to please themselves, to be sure, to think⁹ great of themselves, to feel no foolishness, to speak all things well, to do right, to mean holy, to be special toward others, to know not much of [their] equal. This is the in number the thirty-second.

Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, whose iniquities are covered. 3.

Blessed is the man to whom God does not impute sin, and in his spirit there is no deceit.

3 For I have been silent, all my bones are obsolete, since I cry out all day long.

4) For day and night your hand is heavy upon me; I am converted in my grief, when 4) the thorn is pricked.

006 I said, I will confess unto God my Lord that I am not righteous, and thou hast remitted unto me the disobedience of my sin.

(7) For these also shall every saint pray before thee in due season.

8 But in the flood of many waters they will not reach him.

9. thou art my refuge in the persecution that compasseth me about: deliver me, p my joy! from them that compass me about.

010 I will give thee understanding, and instruct thee in the way that thou shalt walk; I will keep mine eyes upon thee continually.

(11) Do not be like the horses and the mouths that have no understanding.

12. with bridle and bit constrain their jaws, which will not draw near to thee.

(13) He who is disobedient to God will have many afflictions, but he who puts his hope in God will be embraced by mercy.

14. rejoice in god and dance, you righteous, and be glorious all you who are of a right heart.

V. 1. Blessed is the one whose transgressions are forgiven.

(1) As if he said, "No one is without unrighteousness, but all are unrighteous before God, even those who practice the works of righteousness, and so seem to come out of unrighteousness, for no one can help them out. Therefore blessed are they, not those who have no sin or work themselves out of it, but only those to whom God grants it by grace. But who are they? This is what the 5th, 6th and 7th verses will teach.

That sin is covered.

. 2 No one is without iniquity, which God clearly sees in all of us. But blessed are they to whom he covers them up, will not see them, will not remember them, will not know them, but will truly forgive them out of grace. These are the ones who do not cover themselves, do not remit, forgive or forget, but look, know, remember and punish.

V. 2: Blessed is the man to whom the Lord does not impute iniquity.

(3) That is, not blessed but unblest is he who does not impute sin to himself, pleases himself, thinks himself pious, bears no conscience, knows himself innocent, and comforts and relies on it, when the apostle says [1 Cor. 4:4], "I am conscious of nothing, but from it I am not justified." As if he were speaking: ^{a)} Blessed is he to whom God does not impute sin, that God is not aware of anything because of his sin. These are the ones who steadily impute sin and infirmity manifoldly to themselves.

In whose spirit there is no falsehood.

(4) That is, that even his heart may not deceive him, if he appears outwardly pious, and esteems himself no other than pious, and may not deceive God.

a) But

Lovers; yet inwardly the opinion is false, and serves not God for God's sake, but for his own sake, and is pious. What evil, false, deceitful cunning most often seduces the great, seeming and spiritual people, who stand fearlessly for the sake of their pious life and many good works, and do not seriously perceive their spirit and inner opinion, nor do they want to take to mind that this deceitful, harmful cunning leaves no man free, but is entirely spiritual in all, and is cast out only by the grace of God.

5 Therefore he calls it a falsehood^{b)} in the spirit; not a trick that a man does and thinks up with knowledge against himself or another, but which he suffers and is innate to him, which lets itself be covered and adorned with good life, so that the man wants to think he is pure and free, then lies the evil filth underneath, which the doctors call amorein sui,^{c)} if the man is pious for the fear of hell or hope of heaven, and not for the sake of God. But this is difficult to recognize, and even more difficult to get rid of, and both may not happen, but by grace of the Holy Spirit.

Now it is to be noted here that the prophet mentions four kinds of iniquity, as, unrighteousness, iniquity, sin, cunning. Iniquity is that man is not pious before God, deprived of what he should have, that is, piety and good works. This is the first harm. The other is "iniquity," which is the evil works that follow, as the other harm from the first; as from poverty may follow stealing or adultery, betrayal, and the like. And these unrighteousnesses are also the good works, which are thus done in deprived and absent true godliness, which is born of grace. The third, "sin," is the evil of nature, which has remained and always remains when iniquity and unrighteousness occur, and is the evil desire, love, fear grown in the skin and innate, which provokes the first two, which is a lasting sin in this time, and in itself it is deadly, if God by grace does not cover it for those who are sorry for it and desire it.

to become healthy. Therefore he says: God does not count it. As if he were saying, "It is there, but God by grace does not reckon it; therefore it is daily, and immediately becomes fatal when man becomes hopeful, and does not suffer over it without ceasing. And therefore it is a deception and subtle "trick" to all those who practice good works and think they are now pure, and do not believe that God's goodness does not count their impurity by grace.

V. 3: Because I wanted to conceal it.

7. that is, ^d) I did not want to know nor know such sin, and thinking I was pious, did not see such falsehood.

d) Instead of what follows here in § 7 to ? 11, the following is found in the first edition: Before I knew these things, I exalted myself, and boasted to myself, pleased myself well in my good life, knew nothing else, because I would now be pure and pious. But it has subsided, I have become quiet; boasting has turned into complaining. For my piety has been recognized to me that it is wickedness.

Obsolete find my bones.

That is, all my strength and all my ability, even the comfort of my piety, has become weak and old, unfit before you, which was so fresh, strong and young before me. And namely he says: "obsolete"; this may also be understood according to the 7th [8th] verse of the first penitential Psalms, that is, before great fear of your judgment I have become old and gray.

For as the time of a suffering man is long, rather it is surpassingly long, when the bones suffer, that is, the powers of the soul before the sight of the divine judgment, that the Holy Spirit shines terribly into a presumptuous soul, that he may humble it and [it] may learn to know itself. Therefore she says: O God, how long shall the sight shine, my bones become old, weak, sick before it; methinks I must perish thoroughly forever.

Since I scream all day long.

The cry comes from the great fear of one's own knowledge, which comes from the sight of the sensitive gaze of the divine judgment, as has been said. This cry is immeasurable, and with no tongue utterable, only known to the experienced all the days, that he also speaks in the past Psalm [Ps. 6, 7]: "I will wash my bed all nights."

For day and night your hand is heavy upon me.

That is, your terrifying power is too heavy for me; therefore I also cry out, and complain day and night; it is far above me your hand, cannot suffer your punishment, which you threaten me with such a look.

I have turned into my misery.

That is, before I was turned away from my misery, I saw only my pleasure in myself; now I see

My bones pined away through my daily howling.

8 That is, I had no peace, and always had a heavy evil conscience that made me weak and miserable and gave me no rest because I did not confess sin nor seek mercy.

V. 4 For your hand was heavy on me day and night.

(9) This makes my evil conscience, which is a vain image of God's wrath, as if he were standing over me with a club, so there can be no peace in my heart.

My juice dried up, like in summer. Sela.

(10) For such burdens wither the heart, courage and mind, that a man's body also declines.

V. 5. Therefore I make known my sin.

011 Now I perceive that there is nothing better than to confess before thee that there is vile sin with me, and no good; that thy grace alone may be praised and desired, and that all defiance and confidence of merit and good works may cease.

And do not conceal my misdeed.

12. as those do to whom the cunning of the spirit makes them deceitfully confident, so that they may also justify and excuse themselves without fear, and thereby engage in quarrels against other people, fall into arrogance, anger, hatred, impatience, judgment and backbiting, become only more guilty for the sake of their innocence, and in all this still want to have acted rightly and well and justly. They hide their wickedness deeply, for they look at their piety, and do not confess their sin to God truthfully and without evil cunning of their spirit within. But the righteous people do not hide their differently. I thought I was blessed; now I am miserable in the truth.

When the thorn prick is pricked.

This is because the verdict of your judgment pricks me so cruelly deep, and puts a thorn in my wretched conscience, piercing all the powers of my soul.

V. 5. I have confessed my sin to you.

This is how quiet I have become, how much I have stopped boasting, that I truly confess that I have never done good, but much sin and evil, even when I did well.

They are not angry, they are not impatient to be wronged, for they do not think they can be wronged if they do not find righteousness in them. And these are the blessed, to whom God remits and denies their unrighteousness, because they confessed and repented of it, and because they do not cover or hide their sin, God covers and hides it.

I spoke.

That is, now I see that one must say and do so, it will not and cannot be otherwise. ^{e)} As if he should say: You are so gracious, so gladly you hear true confession and humble confession, that you also immediately comfort and lift up, as soon as a man intends to humble himself; as soon as he recognizes himself a sinner and complains to you, he is immediately just and pleasant before you.

I will confess my transgression against me to the Lord.

14. that is, I will reprove myself, so God praises me; I will disgrace myself, so God honors me; I will accuse myself, so God excuses me; I will speak against myself, so God will speak for me; I will say my fault, so He will say my merit, as He did that to Marie Magdalene in the house of Simoni the leper 2) [Luc. 7, 48. 50.]

Then you forgave me the iniquity of my sin. Sela.

15. you forgave^f) because I reckoned and confessed the iniquity of my sin. ^{g)}

V. 6. For this all the saints will plead before you.

(16) That is why they will be holy, so that they will complain about their wickedness to you and ask for mercy. And noticeably [he says] 3) "before you".

For though they seem holy before men, they regard it not, but fear thy judgment, and know that their holiness is nothing before thee, but humbly wait for thy mercy.

In due time.

17) [When and what time is it? as often as man recognizes himself,] 4) or in the time of graces. For this is the appropriate time to ask, as the prophet Isaiah says [Cap. 49, 8.]: "I have heard you in the pleasant time", in which the saints are, when God stirs them up and they are visited with the light of the graces.

That's why when great floods of water come.

(18) That is, the saint who thus stands, not on his holiness, but on the rock of your righteousness, which is Christ, on which is founded every one who is his own accuser, striker, and judge, when many blows and cruel temptations come upon him, like a flood of water, or when he is persecuted for the humble life. ^{h)}

They will not get to the same.

19 That is, they will not harm the soul, even if they have to leave body and life.

V. 7. You are my umbrella.

20. in all these rushing waters of temptation, you are my rock on which I stand, so that they will not drown me and swallow me up.

You wanted to protect me from fear.

21 These are the waters, temptations all around.

And with glory of a saved one surround me. Sela.

022 This is that I may boast of thy mercy in all things, and overcome temptation, and be glad. ⁱ⁾

V. 8. I will give you understanding and show you the way you should walk.

(23) I will have you in it. You ask me to redeem you; do not suffer, do not teach me, do not teach yourself, leave you to me, I will be master enough for you, I will lead you the way in which you will walk pleasing to me. Thou thinkest it is corrupt, if it does not go as thou thinkest; thy^k thinking is harmful to thee and hinders me. It must not go according to your understanding, but over your understanding; lower yourself in ignorance, and I will give you my understanding. Ignorance is the right understanding; not knowing where you are going is knowing rightly where you are going. My understanding makes thee foolish. So Abraham went out from his father's country, and knew not whither [Gen. 12:1]. He gave himself into my knowledge, and let his knowledge go, and came by the right way to the right end.

24) Behold, this is the way of the cross, which thou canst not find, but I must lead thee as one blind: therefore not thou, not man, not a creature, but I, I myself will instruct thee by my spirit and word^l) the way wherein thou shalt walk. Not the work that you choose, not the suffering that you conceive, but that comes to you against your choosing, thinking, desires, 2) there follow, there I call, there be disciple, there it is time, your master has come, there be not a horse or unreasonable animal. If you follow me and rely on me, then see: 3) that I alone shall see it, as I did when 5) Abraham did it, in which he did not do anything. This is recently nothing else than a right, simple faith and firm trust, confidence, hope God wants from us. Therefore, in these words, faith, hope, humility, patience are not expressed by name, but what is of the same virtue type and nature. 6) Many are those who write of virtues, praising the names rather than indicating their nature.

V. 9. Do not be like horses and mouths that have no understanding.

26) These are the ones who do not let me rule, but, like the sensual animals, follow as far as they feel; where they do not feel or examine, they do not follow [and do not understand the spirit]. 7) For horses and mouths are not made to understand things that are not sensible, therefore they are not moved by them to love or to suffer. So, the people who do not want to do, let, or suffer further, because just that they can measure and comprehend, feel, examine, and they cannot become measly of my understanding 8). They are the same with reason that horses are with the senses, both of which walk no further than sensitively.

You have to put a bridle and bit in their mouths if they don't want to go to you.

27.^m) I do not like those who have to be forced with laws, like animals with bridles, but those who serve me freely and willingly without the coercion of the law, out of spirit and love.

5) "als" is missing in the Wittenberg, Jena (2) and Erlangen.

6) Weimarsche: imprinted.

7) Addition 1525.

8) Walch and the Erlanger: "moderately". The meaning is: you cannot measure my mind.

m) Instead of the following in § 27: those who do not want to understand, who are like horses, and want to do it according to their good opinion and conceit, send them repugnance until they have to come. That is to say, oolneütz iutruure, when necessity makes will, and the must is turned into the ought, until he says: Shall I, then I will; must it be so, then so be it. Thus God compels the stubborn horses and mouths when he does not allow them to obtain what they want. Let them first go astray in the way of God, like the brave horses, until they get into gear and learn to understand that it must be suffered, and not go according to our will.

V. 10. The wicked must suffer much.

(28) These are the ones who govern themselves, do not want to suffer God's rule, do not walk any other way than according to their own liking,ⁿ) and yet think that they respect and honor God in the best way, they are the most obedient, the most pious, the most right, because they have a good opinion and that what their good opinion gives is right. They are always disobedient to God, for they are of a hopeless mind, and they are not subject to God's mind; therefore they must suffer much and be afflicted, and it is all in vain, without all merit and consolation. [For they have no good conscience, but vain toil and labour in their good life, to which the law and a heavy evil conscience drive them, as the horses and the mouths]. 1)

But whoever hopes in the Lord will be embraced by goodness.

29) Just as those surrounded 2) the judgment and wrath of God, from which they have much misfortune and not happiness, because they stand on their own, putting their hope in their own good opinion. So, the right people who

v. 11. Rejoice in the Lord, you righteous, and be glad.

(30) That is, you who trust in God, may you also rejoice in God; you who neither trust nor rejoice in yourselves, but despair and grieve in yourselves, (3) being enemies to yourselves, and pleasing nothing in your mind.

And praise all who are sincere from the heart.

31 That is, be bold and courageous,^p , exalt yourselves, boast, be well pleased, as a man who boasts. For the heart that is right toward God, and not bent on itself or anything else but God, is founded on eternal good, and stands. Therefore it has superfluous of which it can boast, glory, flaunt and defy, as the apostle says: "Whoever wants to boast, let him boast of GOD" [1 Cor. 1, 31.]. But the crooked souls, bowed down in themselves with false goodness and deceitful good opinion, boast in themselves and not in God.

in the number of the thirty-eighth.

1. O God, do not punish me in Your anger, and do not chasten me in Your wrath!

002 For thine arrows are thrust into me, and thou hast fastened thine hand upon me.

3. there is no health in all my flesh before the face of your wrath.

4. there is no rest for all my bones before the face of my sin.

5 For my sins are upon my head, and as a heavy burden they are heavy upon my strength.

6. it have been stinking and festered my scars, in the face of my foolishness.

(7) I have been sick, and bowed down; all the day long I have walked sorrowfully.

008 For my loins are full of all shame, and there is nothing wholesome in all my flesh.

I am full of sorrow and very humiliated. I have cried out with great groaning of my heart.

10. O God, all my desires are revealed to you, and my groaning is not hidden from you.

11. my heart mutters, and all my strength has left me, and the light of my eyes is not with me either.

12. my friends and my neighbors have withstood this plague of mine.

013 And my hearers stood afar off, and did violence to them that sought my soul.

014 And they that wished me evil have preached vain doctrines, and have spoken deceitful words all their days.

015 But I, like a deaf man, have not listened to them, and like a mute I have not opened my mouth.

016 And I am become as a man that heareth not, and hath no gainsaying in his mouth.

017 For in thee have I hated, O my God, that thou wouldest hear me, O my God and my Lord.

018 For I have said that mine enemies shall not rejoice over me, and that my feet shall stumble, that they shall not glory over me.

019 For I am made to suffer, and my sorrow is always before my eyes.

020 For I will declare that I am not justified, and I will diligently remember my sin.

021 But mine enemies that live, and have strengthened themselves, and they that hate me unreasonably, have increased.

22. and those who return evil for good have promised me, because I followed the good.

23. Do not forsake me, O God, my Lord, and do not depart from me.

24. Make haste to help me, O God of my blessedness!

1.^a) This psalm paints most clearly the manner, word, work, thoughts and gestures of a true repentant heart.

a) f Christ prays this psalm in his suffering and atonement, which he did for our sin. Yes, this is the right rule, whoever hears all the psalms as if they were spoken from Christ's mouth, and so speaks after him, as a child prays after its father; but he cannot pray after him, unless he is conformed to him in repentance and suffering. Therefore, this Psalm 2c.

V. 1. Lord, do not punish me in your anger.

2. the punishment is understood in words, as one scolds an offender.

And do not chastise me in your wrath.

This happens with works, as in the other Psalm, 1) v. 5: "Then he will speak to them in his anger (that is, punish in anger), and in his wrath he will terrify them," that is, punish with deeds and works.

v. 2. for your arrows are in me.

(4) The words of God, in which He reproves and rebukes in the Scriptures, are the arrows; whoever feels them cries out, "Lord,^b) do not punish me in Your wrath." But no one feels them, except the one who has them thrust into his heart, terrifying his conscience; these are the fearful^c) people to whom God shoots them into the heart. But to the fearless, who are hardened, they fall off, as from a hard rock; and this happens as long as the words are spoken through the sermons of men, without the cooperation and inward infusion of God.

And your hand presses me.

(5) That is, not only your angry words and your wraths go deep to my heart, but also your angry works are constantly upon me and press me.^d)

V. 3. There is nothing healthy in my body [before your woe]. 2)

6. that is, as in the first [penitential] psalm [Psalm 6:3], "Have mercy on me, for I am weak."

1) Here the Weimar edition misunderstood "2. psal." for the second penitential psalm and therefore in the margin: "Ps. 32". To prevent such misunderstandings, the Wittenberg, the Jena edition and Walch have in similar cases always put "penitential psalm" where the first edition offered only "psalm".

b) Oh God.

c) soft-hearted.

d) f These are the two kinds of sufferings: outward works, that is, persecution of the body, and inward fright of the soul from the words of God. For every outward affliction brings with it an inward one, so that when *) God attacks outwardly, the heart fears to have earned God's wrath with sins. And so, when the outward one is susceptible, the heavy sayings and words of imprecation come to pass. Therefore, he rather prays for the internal suffering, 2) Addition in the Jena (2) and in the Wittenberg.

*) Weimarsche: wen.

because the flesh is weak and sick to suffer, and cannot bear the hand and works of GO1's punishment).

V. 4. And there is no peace in my bones.

7.^f) For God's wrath so terrifies that even the legs tremble, and flesh and marrow disappear.

Before my sin.

8. before^g) the knowledge of my sin. For the arrows of God and wrathful sayings make sin present in the heart, and from it there is inward disquiet and alarm of the conscience and all the powers of the soul, and^h) makes the corpse quite illⁱ). And where it is so, there it is right with man; for so it was with Christ.

V. 5 For my iniquities have passed over my head.

9 That is, they have completely oppressed me, and are more and stronger than I am. All this comes from the arrows, which make sin so much, so great, so strong, that man himself can neither help nor advise him, but lies down.

Like a heavy burden, they have become too heavy for me.

(10) This is more grievous than I can suffer, as also Ps. 65:4: "O Lord God, the deed of our sin hath overwhelmed us; thou wilt be gracious unto our iniquity." So sin tramples us underfoot until grace comes, and trample sin underfoot, and lift up our heads above it, that we may be mighty over it, and not it over ours, and reign. But they that are in sins, dead, or too holy, feel none of these things.

011 Therefore it is a marvelous thing: he that hath no sin feeleth it, and hath it; and he that hath sin feeleth it not, and hath none: for it is not possible that he should be above and beyond sin.

e) f Before the face of your wrath.

That is, before the presence of your punishment. For by the face is signified the presence in Scripture, or the sensibility of a thing.

f) Instead of § 7: That is, to the inward powers of the soul, as also in the first [penitential] psalm [Ps. 6:3.], "Make me whole; for all my bones are dismayed."

g) 1 of the sensitive presentness, and

h) s the hand of God, the work of punishment by heart i) f and suffering against sin, if he did not live in righteousness and grace. For one devil does not cast out another [Luc. 11, 18. For one devil does not cast out another [Luc. 11:18], nor does sin accuse its own kind, nor does one wolf accuse another; and yet it is impossible that he who cries out against them should be without sin; for he must ever speak before God not with fictitious words, [it] must be true that he has sin when he says, and yet also true that he is without sin; and so just as Christ was true both alive and dead, so at the same time they must be full of sin and without sin who are true Christians.

V. 6. My wounds have become fetid and rotten.

(12) As sores and swellings rot, fester, and stink in the body; so also the evil infirmities of nature corrupt and become stinking, if they are not daily attended to, and healed with the ointment of grace, and with the water of the word of God. ^k) Now they go safely, and take no heed of the same breaches, just as if they were healthy. Therefore follows:

Before my foolishness.

13. before presence; for wisdom is the salt and water that cleanses the wounds; which wisdom is nothing else than a thorough knowledge of oneself, as Proverbs 11:2: "Where there is humility, there is wisdom. For knowledge does not permit man to let himself be so corrupted. But "foolishness" is when a person does not see himself, but thinks he is completely healthy. But the "arrows" reveal this folly, that man recognizes how blind he has been in his own knowledge. Therefore the meaning is: When I recognized my foolishness and my own ignorance, then I also recognized how miserable my wounds are corrupt and stinking, which I did not see before in my foolishness. Therefore:

V. 7. I bend and stoop almost very much.

(14) Like a man who is in distress and in a bad mood, who has a miserable disposition by heart, puts down his head, and does not lift up his head, or hear, or speak, but 1) bows his eyes to the earth.

k) f Prayer and repentance washes them.

1) Jenaer (2) and Erlanger is "also" added.

All day long I walk here sadly.

15 These are true signs of thorough repentance for sin, when the publican in the Gospel was not allowed to lift up his eyes [Luc. 18, 13.], he was in a bad way, and bowed down to the ground, more with his heart than with his body.

) V. 8. for my bowels are all withering away.

16. that is, I am so full of fear inwardly that I would die of thirst, so dry does such suffering make me; as then happens to all who are in the highest terror and fear, Proverbs 31:6: "Pray wine to the afflicted."

And there is nothing healthy in my body.

(17) As above [§§ 6. 7], that the body also cannot bear such anxiety of conscience, not even the legs.

V. 9. I am all too bruised and battered.

18. as a sorrowful heart, that is, completely crushed before such terror of conscience.

1) Instead of s 16 to s 18: v. 8. For my loins are full of all shame.

Should I not feel evil, if I see that I find nothing but sin and evil inclination within me, of which I have only shame and mockery before God? For through the "loins" *) he presses out of the hearts and evil thorough uncleanness. And just as purity is an honor, so impurity is a disgrace. But this inward disgrace is not considered great by those who are pleased with the outward purity of themselves, when it should and must be completely pure before God.

And there is nothing wholesome in all my flesh.

The apostle Paul also says: "I find in myself, that is, in my flesh, nothing good," but only shame and sin. Therefore, that the same wounds, pus, stink, sin 2c. might be taken away from us, Christ also made his flesh like unto chastisement, as ours is like unto iniquity and sin, and so spoke of ) both these verses. For the apostle says in Romans 8:3 that his flesh is like our sinful flesh; his in bodily pain, ours in spiritual harm.

V. 9. I am full of sorrow and very humbled.

As a sorrowful heart that moves to and fro, and finds nothing but misery and wretchedness in him, and is completely crushed and humbled in his eyes.

*) In the Weimar edition: "leyden"; Jena sl) and Erlanger: "Leiden"; however, the reading "Lenden", which we have taken from the old edition, seems to us to be correct, "leyden" is probably a printing error of the original edition instead of: "lenden". The word "loins" in the text needed an interpretation.

) Erlanger: before.

I howl with the restlessness of my heart.

19) As a lion cries and roars, 1) that is, when the heart is so full of sorrow and sighing that it cannot contain itself, it bursts forth with a lamentable howling. ^{m)})

V. 10. All my desires are before you, O Lord, and my groaning is not hidden from you.

20 That is, my desire is so great that I cannot say it with words, I do not know how to ask, my heart you see, what more can I say? Greater is my sorrow than my lamentation can be. So has the first [penitential] psalm [Ps. 6, 7.], "I have labored in my groaning." ⁿ⁾)

V. 11. My heart prays.

21.^o) These are all signs of great terror, when the heart throbs and trembles with the great wrath of God.

My strength has left me.

That is, all my strength is gone, and I am weary and despondent in all things. ^{p)}) So also Christ speaks Ps. 22, 15. 16.: "My heart is like a flowing wax, and my strength withers. All this is caused by the arrows that work this inner sorrow.

And the light of my eyes is not with me.

23.^q) That is, my countenance is not bright and cheerful, but looks sour, sorrowful and gloomy.

1) 1517: ruyget ruZit, roars.

m) f This is even a perfect repentance.

n) f As if he said: I have been full of sorrow and lamentation with groaning.

o) Instead of § 21: A steadfast heart is one that is in good spirits and secure; but the one that is faint and sorrowful, it proves itself, and unsteadily writhes here and there, and is like a barrel that is shaken and turned to and fro, and is all in turmoil, because there are many causes of sorrow and great ones that move it from one to another.

p) Instead of: "This is... despondent": That cannot bring my heart back to silence and tranquility out of my strength.

q) Instead? 23 to § 34: That is, I cannot advise myself either. Before, when my heart was firm, I could only help with my strength, and advise myself with my reason, and comfort myself with my heart. That is now gone, without comfort, without help, without counsel I am now. For your wrath, your hand and your arrow are upon me. Now,

V. 12. My loved ones and friends stand against my plague.

24. that is, I have also become an abomination to my friends, that they may hear my lamentation.

These two sufferings are not enough; the third and the best must also come, which the sufferer must suffer in suffering.

V. 12. My friends and my neighbors have been against my plague.

A suffering person deserves compassion, mercy and support, especially from his best friends. Now enemies are not worse than friends. For who is the closest friend to righteousness, truth, and wisdom, and who helps them more cheaply than the righteous, the wise, and the truthful? Now no one is more opposed to true righteousness than the righteous (as they are called, and think). No one is more hostile to true wisdom than the wise, who cannot stand the words, works and life of the righteous man. For they do not want to be sinners or fools. This is what he means, that they have been hostile to his plague, that is, to his suffering life, they have been enemies and persecutors, have considered it foolishness, and have wanted to destroy it.

V. 13. And my hearers stood afar off from me.

These are the same friends who should be near, they depart far from him. For they are hostile to the cross, and persecute it in all who bear it, thinking that they do well by it. This is what is meant in the life of Christ, whom his natural friends persecuted, the Jews. Therefore the 109th Psalm, v. 16, speaks of them: "He hath not shown mercy, but hath persecuted the poor and needy, and he that is of a grieved heart hath sought to slay." And Ps. 69:27: "They have added more afflictions above the pains of my wounds." For it cannot be otherwise, the rich-minded must persecute the poor-minded, as Esau did Jacob [Gen. 27:41 ff].

V. 14. And they did violence.

That is, they have tried all their power and art, saving nothing, neither *) word nor work.

Who have searched for my soul.

Who have sought the ruin of my soul, with works to hinder me, and with words to seduce me, as follows:

And who have wished me ill.

That is, those who sought to harm my soul, even though they thought to promote my salvation in it. For this is why the Jews disputed with St. Stephen [Apost. 6:9], and always persuade and contradict the true righteous, that they may destroy their speeches, and confirm their own words, which is evil and hurtful to the soul.

Have preached vanity.

They do not want to talk or teach the way of creed and unsealed humility, but the works and righteousness of themselves, which is vain and useless teaching.

flee, as he says elsewhere [Ps. 31, 12.]: "My relatives flee from me"; because they are afraid of the wrath of God against me, that they may not comfort me either.

are. For they do not make wise nor righteous people, but rather hinder and persecute the wisdom and righteousness of God.

And deception they have acted all the days.

They teach nothing but against grace, but under the appearance of truth and righteousness. Therefore it is a deception of souls and vain, without fruit of that whose appearance it presents. And that is to lay ropes for the souls, and to seek their misfortune and evil with all their might. For they are more diligent to preach their deceit than others are to preach the truth. And that means that they do violence and use all their power. "Deception" means that which seems good, and is not good; as all doctrines of good works, without the grace and mercy of God, are preaching.

V. 15 But I, like a deaf man, did not hear them.

That is, I have not taken in their false words that seem good, I have stayed with your truth, when Christ John 10:5, 16, 27 says that his sheep hear, not the voice of the foreign teachers, but his voice.

And like a mute, I have not put out my mouth.

I have held my peace, and have not pleaded with them, because they have done their things with violence and with all their hardness. "For the sanctuary is not to be thrown to the dogs, nor the precious stones to the sows" [Matt. 7:6]. Even where no one listens, do not speak the word, said Solomon.

V. 16. And I have been like a man who cannot hear, and as one who cannot have speech in his mouth.

These two verses lament that those who teach against the sound doctrine of right truth always prevail and are more respected and have more listeners than the right pious. For the less part follows the truth, and the more part follows the appearance of truth. Therefore the meaning is: Is this not a miserable thing, that truth must be silent, which alone should speak, and deception does not want to suffer objection, punishment nor contradiction. It wants to be heard, and speak alone by force. That is why I have become a mute and deaf man, for I am not allowed to speak, nor do I want to hear its words.

But that these two verses are not spoken of Christ hanging on the cross according to the written sense is clear from this: for he also does not hear deceit and vanity, which always have an appearance, but obvious blasphemy and evil words without all good appearance. For "to hear" and "to speak" in this place is to be disciple and master. "Not hearing" is, not wanting to be a disciple. "Not speaking" is not being a master.

V. 17. For in you I have hated, my God.

Therefore I do not hear them, and keep silent. Because I do not want to rely on my wisdom, piety, truth, as they are.

*) In the old editions: still.

And my neighbors step far away.

(25) They watch the way it goes out, and do not take care of me, for fear lest they also be punished by the tyrants who persecute me.

I will not teach or do anything, but will put my trust in you and in your grace.

You will hear me, my God and my Lord.

You will not abandon my hope; you will answer my desire well and do enough. It is mine to ask, and wait for thine and thy mercy. But it is thine to hear me, to answer my supplications, and to be sufficient for my hope. But they that are full, and desire nothing, wait also for nothing, they hope also for nothing, therefore no man heareth them; no man answereth them, no man may suffice them, they have enough already.

V. 18. For I have said.

My concern has been, and I have thought to myself: O would God that they did not experience joy in me!

That my enemies did not rejoice over me.

That they are not finally right, but, as in the first [penitential] psalm [Ps. 6:11], that they would become ashamed, and be ashamed, if they recognized the right truth, which they pursue in me, and their deceitfulness, which they vigorously raise.

And so my feet would stumble, boasting about me".

That is, I said and feared lest my feet should stumble, lest I should stand with the truth. For if that were to happen, they would boast and glory and glorify themselves greatly over me. Therefore, since my hope is in you, hear me, my God, and do not let them experience joy and glory in me. Let it be enough for them to attack me and persecute me for the truth's sake, lest they also be justified in doing so, which they do not have, because they hope in themselves and not in you.

V.19. For I am ready to suffer, and my pain is always before my eyes.

I do not refuse suffering and punishment, I am willing and ready for it, yes, it is just and right, because I only suffer, and am prepared, born and ordered to suffer, because I am full of sin. A sinner deserves his punishment and chastisement from God; I only ask that they not be right who are hostile to the suffering, humble and crucified life, just as if they were righteous, and deserved not suffering, but peace and honor.

But how is the pain before his eyes at all times? That is, I have that before my eyes, from which I bear pain and suffer; these are the sins.

V. 20. For that I am a sinner I will proclaim.

I will confess and not deny that I am a sinner, and will not impute righteousness to myself. And this is the cause that I suffer always, that I am full of sin.

V. 13. And those who are after my soul, place them before me.

26 Then he shows where his suffering comes from, namely, that he is outwardly touched by the tyrants and the wicked for the sake of God's word and right. And from this he is inwardly terrified and fears God's wrath. There all old sins come out, which he never felt nor thought before, and have become rotten. For no misfortune alone.

And those who wish me ill, speak and write falsehood daily.

27 That is, they attack me with lies and false accusation, and plot on me to kill me.

v. 14: But I am like a deaf man who does not hear, 1) and like a mute who does not open his mouth.

28 That is, I must let them be right, and be silent as a stick; for my speech and answer is valid and does not help.

v. 15. and must be like one who does not hear, and who has no back talk in his mouth.

029 For this also I must let them go unpunished, and shut their mouths, and be wrong: for they hear not, neither rage, nor let them be told.

v. 16 For I wait, O LORD, for you; you, O LORD my God, will answer.

(30) These are words of a fine, firm faith, which in time of need forsakes all, and adheres to God's word and grace, and does not doubt that God will hear him and help him. But he does not agree with him in time or manner, but says badly: "You will answer me well, I will hope and not stop.

v. 17 For I think that they will not rejoice over me. If my foot wanked, they would boast highly against me.

(31) My sorrow has been, and I have thought with myself, O God, that they should not have joy in me; that they should not at last be justified.

1) So the Wittenbergers and the Jenaers (2). Erlanger: and do not hear.

but, as in the first [penitential] psalm [Ps. 6:11], that they would be put to shame, and must be ashamed. To "falser" is to fall and not to stand still; that is to say, "Therefore I hope in you, for necessity compels me; if they gain, I must be their mockery forever, and they be right; for this I take care, and am afraid of it. For then your word would also have to become a mockery.

32 This verse shows how a suffering man worries and cares that the wicked come up so high, and thinks that they will go on like this, that it will be all over for him. But God does not let it happen, but when they come up, thinking they have it, He overthrows them, making the righteous happy again.

V. 18. For I am made to suffer, and my 1) pain is always before me.

Thus a heart that must suffer much always speaks and thinks one thing over another: Dear God, there is no cessation of suffering; when one thing ceases, another begins; I see that I am made for suffering, and must always have sorrow before me, Ps. 34:20: "The righteous must suffer much, but the Lord helps him out of all of it."

V. 19. For I denounce my iniquity.

34 That is, such suffering is also not unjust; for my old Adam must be cleansed of his sins and killed by it.

And am careful for my sin.

35. that is, as in the fourth next following [penitential] psalm [Ps. 51, 5.]: "My sin is always before my eyes, and my sin I will confess." That is equal One meaning with this verse. Now as the wise, righteous, hopeful saints, 2) made^r) are to receive peace and quietness, chamber and honor, and have nothing before their eyes to grieve or hurt them, but are themselves merry and well pleased; for they hide not and declare not their sin, neither do they think of it, but of their piety alone.

and other people's sins, as the following verse says: a truly thorough person is the same as these two verses say. For thus also the holy apostle Paul says Rom. 7, 18. f., that sin dwells in him, and that he is imprisoned in sins, although he did no evil, but much good outside. Christ also commanded all his own to hate their souls [John 12:25]. Now there is nothing to hate but sin alone; where then do sins come into the pious, that they should hate them? For he saith not that they should hate the past sins alone, which are now forgiven and atoned for, but the soul and the life which is without doubt still in them. These sins the trustworthy saints regard as nothing at all, and go about safely, saying: They are daily sins, and not against the commandment of God. If this is true, why is he called to hate them? and the apostle complains [Rom. 7:23] that he is caught in it? For against daily sin there is no commandment, neither do they catch any man, as they say.

V. 20. But mine enemies live, and are mighty; and they that hate me without blame are many.

(36) That is, I suffer much and am in pain, but my enemies are well, as Jer. 12:1 and Habak. 1, 2. ff. For to live here means to have good days and to live well. ^s) They are mighty and strong, I am oppressed without ceasing; they are honored, I am disgraced; they are at peace, I am at peace; they multiply and have many who are favorable to them, who praise them, who keep company with them; I am alone forsaken, and no one keeps company with me or is favorable. So a true saint is quite unequal and different from the seeming and false deceived saint.

V. 21: And they that pay me good with evil are against me, because I follow after that which is good.

(37) The self-wise and self-justifying cannot but return evil for good. For the right teaching, which mau gives them, and tells them the best and well

r) ready.

serves, which is good thing after all, they pursue and give hate and torture for it. For this they promise and persuade all who seek the same good and follow it. This makes that the same good is not revealed, but is hidden in God under the cross and will be destroyed. But they do not want to be destroyed in their life and good appearance, they also want to be something, or want to be angry and cause misfortune, and yet in it they think they are following the good. But it is truly evil and their own destruction; from it the pious man departs, and is therefore promised by them.

V. 22. Do not forsake me, O LORD my God, do not depart from me.

(38) I am a lonely one, forsaken and despised by all, therefore receive me and do not forsake me. God's nature is to make something out of nothing; therefore, whoever is not yet nothing, God cannot make anything out of him; but men make something into something else, which is a vain work.

39. Therefore God does not receive except the abandoned; does not heal except the sick; does not give sight except to the blind; does not give life except to the dead; does not make pious except sinners; does not make wise except the unwise; in short, he does not have mercy except on the miserable, and does not give grace except to those who are in disgrace. Therefore, no trustworthy saint, wise man, or righteous man can be

God's matter, and obtain God's work in him, but remains in his own work, and makes a fictitious, seeming, false, colored saint of himself, that is, a hypocrite.

V. 23. Make haste to assist me, O Lord of my salvation.

40. hasten thou to help me, for all others hasten to destroy me. For God's help is not where man's help is, yea, where man's persecution is not, or of himself against himself. For GOD is not a Father of the rich, but of the poor, widows and orphans; the rich He has left alone fLuc. 1, 53.]. "O GOD of my salvation," that is, that I seek no salvation nor help ^) neither in myself, nor in anyone else, but in You alone. So also in the 4th Psalm, v. 2: "God of my righteousness has heard me," that is, he who gives it. But the trustworthy have salvation, help 1) and satisfaction from themselves: Their help is not God's help,¹) they have prepared it for themselves, so that they are not condemned, nor do they want to be. ^)

t) Bliss.

u) But God only blessed the damned; not as some say that they consider themselves damned, and yet are blessed, but they are damned, and there is no fictitious considering. For with God one cannot "mirror", it must be as it esteems itself; and not be otherwise, and esteem otherwise; that is hypocritical and lying before God's eyes.

The fourth penitential psalm, in number the fifty-first.

O God, have mercy on me according to your great mercy.

002 And according to the multitude of thy mercies blot out mine iniquity.

3. wash me more and more from my unrighteousness, and make me clean from my sin.

004 For I perceive that I am unrighteous, and my sin is always before mine eyes.

5. to you alone I am a sinner and an offender in your sight, so that you alone may be justified in your words and overcome (or stand) when you are judged.

6. Behold, in unrighteousness I was conceived, and in sins my mother conceived me.

7 Behold, the truth thou lovest; the inward and hidden things of thy wisdom thou hast revealed unto me.

8. if you sprinkle me with hyssop, I will be clean; if you wash me, I will be whiter than snow.

9. give joy and comfort to my hearing, and so the bones that are bruised shall rejoice.

10. turn away your face from my sins, and wipe away all my iniquity.

(11) O God, create in me a pure heart, and renew in my innermost being a right spirit.

12. cast me not away from thy presence, and take not from me thy Holy Spirit.

13. give me again the comfort of your salvation, and fasten me with a voluntary spirit.

14. I will teach your ways to the wicked, and sinners will be converted to you.

15 O God, God of my salvation, deliver me from the blossoms, and with joy let my tongue proclaim your righteousness.

16 O God, open my lips and let my mouth declare your praise.

17 For if it had pleased thee, I might have offered a sacrifice: but in sacrifices is not thy pleasure.

18. the sacrifice that pleases you, my god, is a broken spirit; a contrite and humbled heart; oh god! you will not despise that.

19. be kind in your good will toward Zion, that the walls of Jerusalem may be built.

20 Then shalt thou have acceptable the sacrifice of righteousness, the whole burnt offerings, and other sacrifices: then shall they offer calves upon thine altar.

and eternally, alone can help me. Have mercy on me, for without your mercy all things are terrible and bitter to me.

V. 2. And blot out my transgression according to thy great mercy.

2.^b) These are all words of a thorough repentance, which makes great and much the grace of God, in that it makes great and much their sin. For, as the apostle says [Rom. 5:20], "Where sins are great, grace is also great." Therefore grace does not taste good to the hopeful, for their sins do not yet taste evil to them.

V. 3. Wash me well from my iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin.

(3) Earlier, in the beginning, he asked for grace and indulgence for the sins he had committed, and for another life; now, almost to the end of the psalm, he asks in an increasing way that he be washed and cleansed more and more. For the first grace is a beginning of washing and cleansing, in which they do not persevere, even going back again, looking at the only real, outward sin, and persisting in it, with loss of grace, and becoming worse than before, even though they do not see it or think it. Now it is so with us that Adam must go out and Christ come in, Adam be destroyed, and Christ alone reign and be. Therefore there is no end of washing and cleansing in this time. For Adam, who was born to us, also makes our good works, which we do in lifting up and increasing, to be sins and to come to nothing, if God does not see the grace and washing that has begun.

V. 4 For I know my transgression, and my sin is always before me.

4. this is the difference between the true saints and the apparent saints, that the

V. 1. God, be gracious to me according to your goodness.

(1) A truly repentant heart has nothing before its eyes but its sins and misery in its conscience; therefore he may not speak these words in all seriousness, who still finds some counsel or reason in himself, so that he is not yet completely miserable, but feels a little comfort in himself apart from God's mercy. If now the meaning is: Oh God, no man nor creature can help me nor comfort me, so great is my misery; for not bodily nor temporal is my harm. Therefore you, who are God

a) f But now I ask for your mercy, not a little as you have mercy on the temporal need of the flesh, but according to your great mercy, as you have mercy on the need of the soul.

b) f Earlier he named the size, now the quantity.

1) Wittenberger, Jenaer I 2 > and Erlanger: Anheben des. - The sense is: in the manner of a man who anheben [to believe]. Only the Jena (1) and the Weim. Edition have the correct reading.

[True saints see their infirmities, that they are not what they ought and want to be, and therefore they judge themselves and do not concern themselves with others. But the others do not recognize their infirmities, and think that they are now what they should be, always forgetting themselves, being other people's free judges; they turn this psalm thus: 1) I recognize the infirmities of others, and the sins of others are always before my eyes; therefore they have their sins on their backs, and the beam in their eyes. ^{c)}

V. 5: Against you alone have I sinned and done evil in your sight.

This is the verse that teaches 2) thoroughly not to respect our outward good works, not to believe men's praise and glory from them, for they are done in uncleanness and infirmity, nor are they considered good in the sight of God unless we confess them so. Therefore the gloss that interprets this verse of outward sins is far from the right ground; for because of outward sin, without doubt, we also sin and do evil, not only before God, but also before men.

Therefore you will remain right in your words and pure when you are judged.

What is this? Can't God be justified, because we are sinners? Or, who judges God? That God in Himself and in His nature is not judged or justified by anyone is obvious, since He is the eternal, constant, permanent and never-changing righteousness Himself, and the supreme judge of all things. But in his words and works he is constantly contradicted, resisted, judged and condemned by self-justifying and self-conceited people, and between him and them there is a constant warfare of judgment over his words and works. That is why it is immediately said: "That you will be judged in your words".

1) In the Erlanger "So" is repeated to the following.

c) t Item, the little word "and my sin is against me always", the "against me" should mean, as then translated, "before my eyes", or towards me, as a counter reproach, which one looks at.

2) In the old editions: learns.

justified" than that your words be justified and truly found and known.

Now, all the words that the hopeful suffer contradictions, it is not possible for us to tell now; let us take them all in one heap, thus: All Scripture and words of God point to Christ's suffering, as he himself testifies Luc. 24, 46. 47. that Scripture holds nothing else but promised grace and remission of sins, through the suffering of Christ; that whoever believes in him, and no one else, shall be saved. This truth and Christ's suffering and faith are opposed by all who do not want to be sinners, and especially by those who have begun to live, who do not want to believe that they are sinners, and do not almost sigh for Christ, when God has promised Christ in all His words to die for the sake of our sin.

(8) Therefore he that will not think himself a sinner, and be accounted so, will make God a liar, and himself the truth, which is the gravest sin, and idolatry above all idolatries. Therefore John the Apostle says 1 John 1:8: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." Item, v. 10. "If we say that we do not sin, we make God a liar, and His word is not in us."

(9) Therefore the prophet saith, Lest this grievous sin of hope come upon me, I confess that I am a sinner before thee, and do no good; that thou mayest stand with truth, and be justified, and overcome all that contend with thee, and justify themselves, judging thee in thy words. For God will ultimately be right and overcome, either here with good or there with seriousness, and will not help whether we are justified before men or before ourselves. 4) For you must turn your eyes away from this and wait with fear to see what God thinks of it.

V. 6. Behold, I am made in iniquity, and my mother conceived me in sins.

(10) Behold, it is so true that I am a sinner before thee, that sin also is my nature,

3) "our" is found in the Wittenberg and Jena (2), missing in the other editions.

is my originating being, my conception, let alone the words, works and thoughts, and subsequent life. [How could I be without sin, if I am made in sins, and sin is my nature and kind? 1) An evil tree am I, and by nature a child of wrath and sin [Eph. 2:3]. And therefore, as long as the same nature and being remains in and on us, so long are we sinners, and must say, "Forgive us our trespasses" 2c. [Matth. 6, 12.] until the corpse dies and perishes. For Adam must die and decompose before Christ is fully born; and this is brought about by the penitent life, and is accomplished by dying. Therefore death is a salvific thing to all those who believe in Christ, for it does nothing but decompose and pulverize everything born of Adam, so that Christ alone may be in us.

V. 7. Behold, you delight in the truth.

(11) That is, outward righteousness and seeming godliness is all deceit, without cause and truth, because it covers inward sin, and is but a figure of thorough, true righteousness; of which thou art an enemy, but men love it. Therefore you love the inward truth, but they love the outward falsehood; you the reason, they the appearance; therefore they do not say, To you I am a sinner.

You let me know the wisdom secretly hidden.

(12) The wisdom of God is revealed to the hopeful only in outward appearance, but to the humble it is shown in inward truth and hidden reason. ^{d)} The outward appearance of this wisdom is that man thinks to serve and follow God with many words, poems, and works, all in outward appearance, which is apparent to every man and possible to do; for there are many givers and wise men. In them one seeks all things of God, but entirely with one's back and outwardly; inwardly they know his less than all the others, so they do not know him.

1) This is missing in 1517.
d) f And says, "Your wisdom"; for it is not ours, but God's who gives it to us.

to seek themselves, even without God, with the same ways of studying and knowing God 2c.

(13) The inner and hidden part of this wisdom is nothing else than to know oneself thoroughly, and thus to be averse to oneself, and to seek all righteousness not in oneself but in God, to always be angry with Him and to long for God, that is, to humbly love God and to let oneself be. 2) This inward, unknown righteousness is signified in all outward adornments, ways, words, works, in which the hopeful remain and harden. Therefore God, who loves the reason and truth, hates them, so that they love appearances and hypocrisy. 3)

V. 8. Defile me with hyssop, that I may be clean.

14. Here he proves immediately with an example, which he spoke before, as if he should say: That Moses and the priests of the law sprinkle themselves and the people with hyssop, dipped in goat's blood, and from this they consider themselves pure [on this the hypocrites, as well as on all other outward sanctification in the law, rely], 4) is only an outward appearance and figure, but not the truth, which is meant by it, which you mean and love, also not the inward of your wisdom, which you have revealed to me. Therefore, sprinkle me with the true goat's blood of JEsu Christ, and from it I shall be in truth and thoroughly inwardly clean, without all my working or laboring. 5)

Wash me so that I become snow-white.

(15) That is, the outward washing of hands and feet, according to the law, does not make me white, but deceives with its appearance those who do not know the inward thing which is signified therein, which is the right, true wisdom. Just as sprinkling with hyssop and washing with water is of no use externally for internal washing and sprinkling, but only as a figure and a sign; so also all other external ways and gestures, which want nothing else than that

V. 9. Let me hear joy and gladness.

(16) That is, all outward righteousness, walk and dealings, cannot comfort my conscience and take away sin. [Above all works and good deeds remains the stupid and frightened, fearful conscience, until you sprinkle and wash me with grace, and thus make my conscience good, so that I hear your secret murmuring: 2) "Your sins are forgiven" [Marc. 2, 5]. No one is aware of this, for he who hears it, no one sees it, no one understands it. It can be heard, and the hearing makes a comforting, happy conscience and confidence in God.

That the bones you have crushed may become joyful.

(17) The bones,^e) which are equally weary and contrite because of the sinful conscience, rejoice and are refreshed when the conscience hears the joy of indulgence. For sin is a heavy, sorrowful, anxious burden,^f) and yet it cannot be removed by the outward works of man, but only by the inward work of God.

V. 10. Hide your face from my sins.

018 That is, take not strict heed to my works; for they are all sin, if thou puttest them in thy sight and judgment. Therefore he saith not, Turn away my sin from thy face. Just as if there were some works that God would suffer to be in his sight, so that he alone would turn away sin and let the good remain; but he must turn away his face, that the works and we may stand and remain, that is, that he will not reckon them.

And wipe out all my iniquity.

19. that is what is not yet there of righteousness, forgive me, as I have asked of the evil that is still there. Turn away thy face have asked. V. 11. Create in⁴) me, GOD, a clean heart.

20. a pure hand, and beautiful words in outward appearance, is easy to do and man's power; but a pure heart separated from all things love, that is the work of the Creator and divine power, according to which the Scripture speaks that no one has a pure heart [Gen. 6, 5, 8, 21. Matth. 15, 19. Marc. 7, 21.] Therefore all are sinners before God [Rom. 3, 23.], to whom the heart is open, as to man the hand or work is manifest. In the heart^h) is the truth, which God loves; but inward righteousness is never fully 5) attained in this life, and yet is always to be sought.

And renew in me a willing spirit.

(21) A crooked spirit is the spirit of the flesh, and Adam's spirit, which in all things bends in on itself, seeking its own, is innate in us. The sincere spirit is the good will directed straight to God, seeking God alone, which must be made anew and infused by God into the innermost part of our heart, so that there is no deceitfulness in our spirit, but that God's will is loved from the bottom of our hearts. ⁱ) do not care that they are rejected from God's presence; yes, they sit down before God's presence and exalt themselves, therefore they are humiliated and rejected. For they think that they are pure, and pious, and enlightened, and therefore unworthy of rejection. But these feel and know that they are reprobate because of their sin; therefore they come first with fear, and ask away with humility that which others think they have won with holiness.

And do not take your Holy Spirit from me.

And the free spirit abstain from me.

(25) That is, with the Holy Spirit, who makes voluntary people who do not serve God out of embarrassing fear or disorderly love. For all those who serve out of fear are not constant and firm, without as long as the fear lasts; indeed, they are compelled and serve Him with reluctance, so that if there were no hell or punishment, they would serve nothing. Thus, those who serve God even out of love of reward or good are not constant either; for if they knew no reward, or if the good departed, they would also cease. These all do not have joy in the salvation of God, nor a pure heart, nor a right spirit, but are their own lovers above God. But those who serve God out of a good, right will are firmly in God's service, be it here or there, sweet or sour; for they are endowed with a noble, voluntary, princely, unencumbered, and unrestrained love of God.

new will firmly and steadily made by God. For the little word, "voluntary^m) spirit", which is written here, means in Hebrew language also a voluntary or favorable, unforcedⁿ) spirit. What is held by force, does not have the dignity; but what is held with will, remains constant.

V. 14. I will teach the wicked your ways, that sinners may turn to you.

(26) This is why I will never teach the righteousness and ways of men, as those who hope do, but the way of grace and your righteousness; (°) so sinners come to you and are truly converted. For out of man's righteousness one is ever more turned from God in the way of hope, which must be where there is no grace.

V. 15. Save me from the blood debt, O God, who art the God of my salvation.

That my tongue may praise your righteousness.

p) Instead of s 27: "The bloomers" are the hopeful, who were born from Adam, strive after the blood always against this teaching and right wisdom, and whoever teaches them, must suffer objection and persecution from them. For they especially do not want to suffer that their thing is nothing, who are not yet in grace, but are pious in the flesh and in bloom according to human convenience and appearance, and think much of it, and want to be held to it. Therefore he says, "O God, who art the God of my salvation, that is, with whom alone is my salvation, and not in me, nor in my righteousness, nor in any creature, deliver me from the children of the blood, who place their salvation in their piety, and therefore resist this doctrine, which alone converts sinners; as the Jews do to the apostles, the Gentiles to the martyrs, the heretics to the doctors, the hopeful to the simple.

no one is justified by his works. Therefore it is called "your righteousness" that you give it to us by grace, and we do not obtain it by works. And therefore:

v. 16. Lord, open my lips.

(29) That is, give me strength and courage, that I may preach the same freely and boldly against the ungodly and hypocrites. ^{q)}

That my mouth may proclaim your glory.

30 That is, by your strength let me^r be bold to punish and convince all men that they are sinners, and that nothing in them is worthy of praise or honor, only deserving of shame and punishment. That they may know that praise and honor are yours alone, therefore that righteousness is yours alone, and wisdom 2c. For no one can honor and praise you, but he reproaches and disgraces himself; no one can ascribe wisdom and righteousness to you, but he takes them from him, and ascribes to him vain sin and foolishness. This praise and honor shall^s) my tongue preach unto thee when thou openest it. For whom God does not send and speak in him, he cannot preach this doctrine^s and bring in God's praise.

(31) And this is the greatest thing that we can do to God, which He also desires most, that praise and honor be given to Him, and all good things that are. Therefore he speaks:

v.17. For you have no desire for sacrifice, otherwise I would give it, and burnt offerings are not pleasing to you.

(32) That is, you do not want anyone to praise him, but you alone, to receive the glory of righteousness and wisdom. Therefore you do not ask about the sacrifice, much less about the other, lesser good works, since the sacrifice is the greatest. Thou wilt have mercy, and not be a judge; thou wilt not consider how pious we will be, but how pious we will become of thee. So that you, and not we, are praised and honored; that we give you nothing, but take from you righteousness, wisdom, truth, 1) merit, good works 2c. And therefore:

V. 18. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit, a broken and bruised heart You, God, will not despise.

33 As if he said, "He despises everything else without a heart that is humbled and broken. For the same gives glory to God, and sin to Himself. The heart gives nothing to God, but only takes from Him; this is also what God wants, so that He, God, may be true. For God's due is to give and not to take.

v. 19. Do good to Zion according to your good will; build the walls of Jerusalem.

34 If the trustworthy saints will not receive this doctrine, and teach others their righteousness, give grace to the rest of the elect, not according to their merit, but according to your good will: That the walls may be built up, that is, that there may be enlightened men in Christendom to keep and teach others, that they be not led astray by the false doctrines and teachers which are their own. For the walls are the teachers,ⁿ) who are to be edified primarily in this doctrine.

v. 30. So you will delight in the sacrifices of righteousness.

35 As if he said, "They will not offer you goats and sheep and calves, but sacrifices of righteousness, that is, themselves. For he offers a sacrifice of righteousness who gives to God what he owes. Now we owe God more than we have; therefore we pay Him no other way, but by giving over all that we ourselves are, and this with humble recognition of our sin, and confession of His righteousness, that He is righteous, as His divine will is with us. This way and serenity is the highest righteousness we can have, and the right sacrifice, which is called burnt offering,^w) as follows:

in the number of one hundred and two.

O God, hear my prayer and let my cry come to you!

2. do not turn your face away from me; in all the days of my suffering incline your ears to me.

In all the days that I shall call upon thee, thou wilt hear me speedily.

4 For my days are passed away like smoke, and my bones are roasted dry, like a goat.

005 I am smitten as grass, and my heart is dry, because I have forgotten to eat my bread.

My bones are in love with my flesh because of the cry of my groaning.

7. I am like a pelican in the desert, I am like a night owl in the desolate houses.

(8) I have made, and have been as a solitary bird upon the housetop.

9 All day long mine enemies have promised me, and they that praised me have sworn over me.

010 Because I have eaten ashes like bread, and mixed my drink with wine.

(11) Borne of the presence of thy wrath and displeasure, because thou hast made me contrite, when thou hast exalted me.

12. my days are gone like a shadow, and I am withered like the grass.

013 But thou, O God, abidest for ever; and thy remembrance endureth from age to age.

014 Oh that thou wouldest arise, and have mercy upon Zion; for the time is come, that you have mercy on them, and the opportunity is here.

015 For thy servants have made the stones thereof comfortable, and have made the earth thereof miserable.

16. and the Gentiles will honor your name, and all the kings of the earth will honor your glory.

017 For God hath built Zion, and hath been seen in his glory.

(18) He has considered the prayer of the unmarried, and has not spurned their supplications.

19. these things shall be written in the time to come, and the people shall praise GOD, which shall be created anew.

20. for God has looked down from His high temple, God has looked at the earth from heaven.

21 That he may hear the groaning of the captives, that he may redeem the children of death.

022 That his name may be proclaimed in Zion, and his praise in Jerusalem.

23. when the nations come together as one, and the kings to serve God.

24. in the journey he has oppressed my strength, he has shortened my days.

025 I will say, Alas, my God, take me not away in the mean of my days; thy years are from one time to another.

In the beginning, O God, you founded the earth, and the heavens are the work of your hands.

27. they will be changed, but you will remain, and like a garment they will all wear out.

028 And as a covering shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed: but thou art the same, and thy years shall not pass away.

029 The children of thy servants shall dwell, and their seed shall remain before thee for ever.

V. 1.¹) Lord, hear my prayer and let my cry come to you.

1. the "prayer" is that he desires mercy^a); the "cry" is that he declares his misery; as then follows:

1) Because of the counting of the verses followed by us, compare the note to § 47.

a) Christum.

V. 2. Do not hide your face from me.

2 Be not wroth with me after that I have deserved. For to turn away the face is a sign of anger, but to turn back is a sign of grace.

In time of trouble, incline your ears to me.

Hear me in the time of my affliction and suffering. For, "to incline the ears" is nothing else than to pay attention to the 2) sorrowful heart's cry. Although the same inclination also expresses whether he could not so strongly call or desire that [it] penetrate up to God's ears, he asks that God incline down to him, that he hear him.

V. 3. When I call upon you, hear me soon.

(4) Not only when I am persecuted and suffer from others, as the preceding verse asks, but also in all need. For this psalm, like the others, also describes, first, the inward suffering that the saints bear because of their sin in a contrite spirit; then the persecution of others for the sake of the same crucified life.

V. 4. For my days have passed away like smoke.

(5) That is, my days have come to naught, and are accomplished in vain, as the smoke vanishes in the air, and is destroyed. Blessed are they that know that the temporal life, because of Adam's sin, is nothing but a vanity; as Ps. 78:33, "And their days are passed away in vanity," that is, like a smoke; for there remaineth nothing of it that is profitable in that life; yea, even now in this time it is more a semblance or sign than a life, as the smoke hath but a semblance and sign of fire, and not the essence.

And my bones are burned like a fire.

(6) Just as fire consumes all that is fat and makes (b) it dry, so also suffering makes it dry.

2) Erlanger: dem.

b) Instead of the following in § 6: a dry shoot; thus also the love of temporal things. An evil fire makes all the powers of the soul dry, powerless and weary of the eternal goods. This is what all men find in themselves from original sin, which has turned us away from the eternal. Goodness, in which we should have firm and powerful love, in all all the powers of the souls arid, powerless and weary.

V. 5. My heart is downcast like grass and withered.

7. the grass, cut off or broken, loses its origin, that is, the inflowing^c) sap and moisture, and becomes dry, and becomes good fireworks; thus we are all beaten in Adam by the devil, and deprived of our origin, that is, of God, from which inflow we should green and grow. That is why we have become pitiless, arid and the work of eternal fire (^d). But again, in the 72nd Psalm, v. 16, of the living He speaks, "They shall green as the grass of the earth." Now, the dry heart is, which has no desire for the eternal good, while the flesh is green for the temporal.

For I have forgotten to eat my bread.

8. Should I not become thirsty when my food has come to me in a forgetfulness? The dry heart's bread is none but God Himself, who alone can feed the heart; for the heart must have eternal food if it is to be satisfied. °But blessed is he who can see and lament forgetfulness; but blessed are they who forget forgetfulness also, as sinners of the senses, and as saints in hope, who are filled, the former with external goods, the latter with internal goods.

V. 6 My bones cling to my flesh at the voice of my groaning.

(9) So much do I labor in a sighing life, and fight against my evil nature, that I am no more than skin and legs, as Job says, Cap. 19:20: "My bones are clothed with my skin." Therefore, by this groaning is understood not only the bodily and temporary sighing, but the whole penitential life and laboring desire.

Lust and joy, we are, alas, inclined to the perishable and to ourselves, and therein have lust, joy and love, that is, fat and sap. Blessed are those who know the same pleasure and joy here, lament and hate!

But those who do not attack themselves do not know what is wrong with them, the bones^g) do not cling to their flesh, but are full of fresh blood and sap,^h) and fed body. So also in the first [penitential] psalm [Ps. 6, 7.]: "I have been laborious in my groaning."

V. 7. I am like a bittern in the wilderness.

Here the other suffering is mentioned, when the worldly and self-wise persecute, despise and mock these hard-working and repentant people. For a good life must also be a foolish life, because he turns away from everything that others turn toward.

I am the same as a little bug in the disturbed cities.

(11) He compares himself to the solitary birds and to those who do not come out during the day, because he is abandoned and despised. He is not esteemed, nor is he suffered in the daytime, that is, in the honor and glory of the world; therefore his life is like a wilderness and a night. ⁱ)

V. 8. I am awake, and am like a solitary bird on the housetop.

12. I am not asleep, and have taken heed to myself. For the world sleepeth, as the apostle 1 Thess. 5:6, "Let us not sleep, as others do, but let us watch and be sober." For temporal lusts are contrary to eternal good, as images in dreams are contrary to right images; as also Isaiah Cap. 29, 8. says that it happens to sinners "as when a thirsty man dreams that he drinks, and when he awakes, his soul is still empty." Therefore this sleep is nothing else than the love and lust of creatures. But "to awake" is to cling to the eternal good, and to see and long for the same. But therein he is alone, and no one with him; for they are all asleep. And he says "on the housetop. As if he said, "The world is a house in which they all sleep and lie decided; but I alone am outside the house, on the roof, not yet in heaven, and yet not in the world. I have the world under me, and heaven above me; so between the life of the world and eternal life I hover alone in faith.

V. 10. For I eat ashes like bread.

(16) Not that he ate ashes, but the Scripture calls good food bread, and evil food ashes; therefore that the food of godly men is small and nothing, even as ashes compared with the food of those who live in the satisfaction of the flesh. If then the meaning is: My food is ashes compared to their food,^o) that is, I am so sad and miserable that nothing tastes good to me, and even if it were good food, it is still as if I eat ashes.

V. 11. Borne thy wrath and disgrace.

(18) The sight of the severe judgment and wrath of God casts out all the lusts of the flesh, and makes evil to eat, drink, and lie down, and so suffering becomes heavy. ^{p)}) Therefore, those who are secure in their life or righteousness mock these repentant and humble people, as it is written in the following Psalm of Repentance.

That you took me and threw me down.

(19) So it seems to every soul, when it feels the wrath of God, that it is rejected and eternally damned. ^{q)})

V. 12. My days have passed away like a shadow.

20. My time has passed uselessly, and now I have nothing of it. Just as nothing remains of the shadow, so also nothing remains of all life that takes place in carnal and worldly lust, without which no one is alive, because the flesh is in all of us. Therefore all our life is a useless life. Blessed is he who recognizes it.

V. 13 But you, O Lord, abide forever.

And your memory for and for.

(24) That is, just as your being remains forever, so also your name and memory remain forever. My name, however, passes away with my being, as in the 9th Psalm, v. 7: "Their memory has passed away like a sound. Therefore, my God, how do I come from myself to you, so that my essence and name also remain forever? I am, alas, too far and deep from you.

V. 14. You would make up and have mercy on Zion.

I cannot come to you, therefore, my God, arise and come to me and take me to you. The rising up means the most sweet and gracious future of God in mankind' (for at that time Jerusalem stood well. Therefore such lamentable cries and supplications may not be understood of temporal help, but of Christ and His kingdom); 1) for then He came to us, that He might lift us to Himself, and then He had mercy on Zion, that is, His people.

For it is time for you to be gracious to her.

26. the time of grace and, as St. Paul says, the fulfillment of time, Gal. 4, 4.^u)

And the hour has come.

27.^v) It is time for you to come yourself, for God does not give grace unless it is time and^w) even. But what they are, follow.

V. 15. For their stones please your servants.

28.^x) He speaks of Jerusalem as a city that is to be built, since the stones and the earth have been laid out for the supply, so well that it is desirable to see it; therefore he speaks of the spiritual building. For Jerusalem (as said) stood in all glory; that the opinion is, Lord, come quickly.

x) Instead of? 28 to the beginning of §45 "that he might prepare his dear saints" 2c. The stones of Zion are the elect of God, they are prepared by the prophets, apostles and preachers to dex grace. The preparation is done by the word of God, when it is preached that all men are in disgrace because of sin, and that no one can stand by his own righteousness without the grace of God, as Rom. 1, 17. 18. Paul says that in the gospel God's grace and wrath are revealed. Whoever hears this becomes humble and terrified, falls at God's feet and laments his sorrow, as this Psalm has done up to this point. When this has happened, then it is time and even for God to come, who does not come except to the humble. Thus all the prophets have made the people comfortable, that is, humble, and sent them to grace; although they are all persecuted about it by the hopeful saints, who want to establish their righteousness at all times.

And have made wretched the earth of the same.

That is, by the same preaching they have made them understand your mercy and desire it. The "earth of Zion" are the least of the people and the imperfect. So John the Baptist also had to come with his voice before Christ to prepare the people and to reveal their sins, so that they would need and desire mercy [Matth. 3, 3]. But those who do not want to be sinners, for them it is not yet time or even that they receive grace, because they also do not receive the messengers and servants of God with his word.

V. 16. And the Gentiles will honor your name.

Here he prophesied; for the Jews the more part became enemies of the humble, as are described above; therefore grace is divided among the Gentiles.

And all the kings of the earth will honor your glory.

That is, in fear and humble submission they will serve you. For love and spiritual fear is the true service of God, without which other works and sacrifices, which the Jews and the faithful build on, are nothing.

V. 17: For God has built Zion.

That is, the city of God, the holy Christendom, is not built with the teachings or works of men, but with the word and grace of God alone.

And has been seen in his glory.

It has now come about through the gracious incarnation of God that the unknowable God is confessed, and that all glory is his alone, no one righteous, good, wise, strong, holy, true, but God alone. The glory was unknown before, because men themselves and build, it is time; stone and lime and all things are there, so fine and much, that thy servants lusted, and would gladly help to build. That is so much to say: one would gladly hear and learn the gospel. This is also the right time for the gospel, when one longs for it. In this way Christ speaks Joh. 4, 35:

"Behold the seed, it is white for harvest." And Luc. 10:24: "Many kings and prophets would see that ye see."

And are favorable to their dust.

wise, righteous, good 2c. and thus attributed God's glory to them.

V. 18. He looked at the prayer of the unmarried.

The glory is all his, he has taken them all to himself, and he has filled them all. Therefore, those who do not want to be single, He does not look at; but those who are single and poor in spirit, who in constant thirst of His graces and righteousness ask of Him, He graciously looks at them, and satisfies them with Himself, when He says [Ps. 81, 11.], "Israel, open your mouth, and I Myself will fulfill this." For GOD cannot give mercy except to the humble, that is, to the hungry, thirsty, unfeeling poor sinners and fools. He does not look at the beautiful words and great works of the rich, the wise, the saints (for there His glory has been destroyed), but only at the desire and prayer of those who have nothing.

And he did not spurn their pleas.

God spurns nothing so much as those who are full and satisfied, who do not desire His grace, who, like God, think they have something to give and do great things, and so are praised and honored by God more than God is by them.

V. 19. These things shall be written in the time to come.

These things shall be preached, written, spoken, and remembered, not in this time under the law, but in the time of grace, in the new testament, because that this people is not yet grief-stricken of these things, being blinded in their righteousness.

And the people will praise God, who will be created by new ones.

The spiritual people, newly created by the baptism of Christ, can understand these things; but those who are not yet born elsewhere and not newly created in spirit and grace, it is not possible for them to know God and His glory. Therefore they cannot praise Him, but themselves. For those praise God who defile themselves, who take from God and give nothing to God; they have nothing, but their good is with God, therefore their praise is also with God, and in God, and not with themselves.

V. 20. For God has looked down from His high temple.

The holy, high temple of God is the blessed man Jesus Christ, in whom the eternal God dwells bodily. This same temple is given to us as a propitiatorio, Rom. 3, 25, that is, as a throne of grace, before which whoever bows down has forgiveness of all sin and all grace. Is now the meaning: God's praise alone will be praised; for it has now come to pass that God, who before in disgrace turned His eyes from us, now looks down upon us in all grace and love, through our Lord Jesus Christ.

stum, who is his temple, and by no one else. Therefore, if there is nothing good but in Christ, all praise must be silent, and praise must be given only to God in Christ.

God has looked at the earth from heaven.

That is, he has accepted poor sinners through Christ, and heaven and the temple of God are one thing. For God gives nothing, everything must come from Christ. The appearance and vision of God is nothing other than a gracious will to have mercy and to help; therefore it follows:

V. 21: That he may hear the groaning of the captives.

These are the ones who realize how miserably they are caught in sins and cry out for the grace of salvation, as the prophet himself said above. For those who are not imprisoned, that is, those who do not see how they are truly imprisoned, he does not hear, because they do not groan.

That he may deliver the children from death.

That is, all who recognize that they are children of death, wrath and condemnation, even those who are physically persecuted and martyred by others. For this is the praise of God, that he looks upon the unworthy, and shows mercy to them that have deserved wrath; as follows:

V. 22: That His name may be preached in Zion.

Not of men's names: for thus is God's glory and name praised in all Christendom, when it is said and known that all is entirely up to God's grace and work, and we are nothing.

And his praise in Jerusalem.

Praise, name and honor are one thing. For that which is the essence, that is the work; but that which is the work, that is also the name; that which is the name, that is also the praise; and the honor of that which is the praise.

V. 23: When the nations and the kings come together in one.

The praise of God in Jerusalem will take place when the nations and kings, that is, every bishop with his people, come together in the church to worship and say mass. For in this way one ministers and should preach, as the apostle, indeed, Christ himself commanded, that one should preach and remember him when one says mass. Therefore, this verse expresses the way to preach God's praise, that is, the holy Gospel, in which is written what God has done for us by grace, therefore He is to be praised.

V. 24. He has suppressed my strength in the departure.

Now the prophet speaks again of him and all others with him. God has humbled and depressed my power in this life. For Christ's kingdom is in judgment, so that he has brought down his dear saints 2c.

But he secretly indicates that the poor and lowly desire the gospel; like Matth. 11, v. 5: "The poor have the gospel preached to them.

v. 16. And the Gentiles will fear your name.

30 He desires such a future and kingdom of God, since not only the Jews, but also all Gentiles are inside, Ps. 2, 8: "Heische von mir" 2c. Therefore one can see what kind of Zion he means.

And all kings on earth your glory.

That is, through the gospel they will know and honor your power and might in Christ with fear and humility.

v. 17: That the Lord build Zion.

That is, the city of God, the holy Christianity that began in Zion, is not built with the doctrine or works of men, but with the word and grace of God alone.

And appear in his honor.

That is, he is revealed through his word and spirit, so that he may be known, as he alone is and does everything, but we are nothing. Isa. 11, 9: "All the earth is full of the knowledge of the Lord. Ps. 19, 2: "The heavens declare the glory of God."

v. 18. He turns to the prayer of the abandoned.

34. his kingdom's way is to have miserable, calling, praying people who suffer much for his sake; so his way and regiment is not different but to help, hear and assist such poor, miserable, dying and sinners, Is. 61, 1: "I am sent to preach to the poor" 2c. Matth. 11, 28.: "Come to nrr all you who are weary."

And do not spurn their prayer.

(35) It is not a worldly kingdom, where one must help, give and assist the authorities, but a spiritual kingdom, where everyone is helped out of all kinds of distress in body and soul.

v.19. Let this be written on the descendants.

(36) These things shall be preached, written, spoken, and remembered for ever and ever, and shall cease no more until the 1) last day: this and no other shall be the preaching unto all the children's children.

And the people who are to be created will praise the Lord.

(37) As Ps. 72:5: "Under the sun his name will reach to the descendants. It is a peculiar kind of this teaching: when the teachers are strangled, the teaching goes on first among the descendants, there God is preached and praised inwardly.

v. 20: For he looks from his holy height.

For Christ's kingdom depends on God alone, whom He sees and knows, and He knows it again from heaven. And this verse also means that it is a heavenly, spiritual kingdom, that all miserable people are helped by God.

And the Lord sees from heaven on earth.

39. it is a secret, spiritual kingdom, and yet it is on earth among men, but hidden in faith and spirit.

v. 21: That he might hear the groaning of the prisoner.

40] This is, as it is also said above [§ 34], the nature of His kingdom is that God lets His own suffer much, and be children of death and sheep for slaughter, as Paul says [Rom. 8, 36]. But they are not forsaken, but are sure that he hears their groaning and misery.

And redeem the children of death.

41. children of death are called, in the Hebrew way, the people who are handed over to death; as one says, child of life, child of wickedness 2c. For the Christians are given over to death, Rom. 8, 36.

v. 22: That they may preach his name in Zion.

(42) Not the names of men; for so is the glory and name of God extolled in all Christendom, when it is said and known that he is the helper of all miserable and dying Christians.

1) "den" only in the Jena (2).

And his praise to Jerusalem.

(43) If the work is, the name is worthy of it; if the name is, the praise is worthy of it; and if the praise is worthy of it, the honor is worthy of it.

V. 23: When the nations come together and the kingdoms to serve the Lord.

44 He says this again, that it may be known how his kingdom begins at Jerusalem, but yet goes among all kingdoms; that as the word, and his grace to forgive sins, is common to both Jews and Gentiles, so also the cross, and the help of it, is in strong exercise in all places, both among Jews and Gentiles; for the kingdoms may not come together bodily in one place.

V. 24. He humbles my strength on the way.

(45) Thus it is in Christ's kingdom, according to the outward man, that he causes his dear saints to be broken, punished, humbled and tortured manifold here in this time, so that they are not strong and vigorous outwardly, but inwardly. But the world, which he raises and strengthens in its way; that is, in this time, he will humble in the end. Therefore the prophet and the spiritual people comfort themselves that they will be oppressed with Christ in time and in the way, not in the end.

He shortens my days.

46 For he breaks off the old man. This verse especially refers to the holy martyrs. For thus says St. Peter [1 Ep. 4, 17] that now is the time for judgment to begin in God's house, that is, in His saints, but the end will go out in the devil's house.

V. 25. 1) I say, my God.

(47) Though he break me and press me, I will not therefore run from him, but will run all the more.

hope in him more, and call upon him, and pray; [as all his saints do.] 2)

Don't take me away halfway through my days.

(48) That is, let me not die unprepared. For those who are full of life and desire death, as David [1 Chron. 24, 1.] and Abraham [1 Mos. 25, 8.] and Paul [Phil. 1, 23.], are accepted at the end of their days, for they have given leave to life and demand death. But those who still cling to this life and love it, are still in the middle of their days, as King Ezekiel said Isa. 38, 10. f., these die unwillingly and hardly bear the judgment and suffering of Christ. y)

Your years last for and for.

49. This is, z, but behold, thou art eternal, and I live so short a time, therefore no man can escape thee; but time may soon escape me, that I should lack mercy. But thy punishment cannot fail; for thou comest yet well, as thou art eternal.

V. 26. You founded the earth before, and the heavens are the work of your hands.

50 For Christ, according to the Godhead, is a creator, with the Father, of all creatures, as the apostle Heb. 1:10 introduces this verse.

V. 27. They will pass away, but you remain; they will all pass away like a garment, and if you change them like a garment, they will be changed.

y) I To notice that the common text says much differently, namely in these two verses thus: He answered him in the way of his strength. The shortness of my days make known to me, do not take me away 2c. This may thus be concordirt: That outwardly oppresseth and maketh cry unto him, to him he answereth, and heareth them in the way of his strength, that he strengtheneth them inwardly with his strength. For he outwardly breaks their strength, and so they desire to know the shortness of their days, that is, that they may not be precipitated with death.

z) Instead of the following in s 49: eternal, without end; for Christ's kingdom is without end, yes, he is also without beginning; as then follows:

1) Here the Erlanger has not set a verse number, therefore in the following wrong counting. The Jenaer (2) has only 28 verses in this Psalm, because the superscription of the Psalm is not counted as a verse. In the first edition, the third verse (of our Bible) is divided into two verses; therefore, it brings it without the first verse to 29 verses. We were forced to follow the counting of the first edition, because we have united both relations with each other.

The heavens, too, will be transformed; they will not perish and be destroyed, but will be renewed.

v. 28. But you are the same.

52. you will not be his other or new God, as the Jews will say; when they hear that you are man and] 1) God, they will reproach yours: they have a new God, and another than the one who founded the earth in the beginning. But heaven and earth may become different; you remain in the same essence.

The sixth penitential psalm, in the number of one hundred and thirty.

O God, to you I have cried from the depths, O God, hear my cry.

2 Oh that your ears would heed the cry of my supplications.

If you are mindful of sin, O my God, O God, who can stand?

(4) For with thee alone is all remission; therefore thou alone art to be feared.

5) I have waited for God, and my soul has waited, and on His word I have made my bed. 3)

My soul that is waiting to God from the morning watch until the morning watch again.

7. Israel waits for God, for the chain of mercy is with God, and with Him is manifold salvation.

8. and he will redeem Israel from all their sins.

V. 1. Out of the depths I call to you, O Lord.

1) These are fine, fierce and very thorough words of a truly repentant heart, which is turned in its misery to the very deepest, 4) indeed, not possible to understand, except for those who feel and experience it. We are all in deep, great misery; but we do not all feel where we are.

I call to you.

2. crying is nothing else but a very strong earnest desire of God's grace, which does not arise in man, because he sees in what depth he lies.

v. 2. Lord, hear my voice; let your ears be attentive to the voice of my supplication.

(3) That is, you keep silent, rely on, despise my miserable cry, when no one can help me here but you alone. Therefore let your

4) "is" is missing in the Erlanger.

Ears pay attention and perceive my cries. The word speaks the soul, if it feels that no creature does not want to hear its lamentation, yes, also God and all creatures strive against itself. Therefore follows:

V. 3: If you want to be careful about iniquity.

(4) That is, if thou wilt reserve sin, and look upon it, and not forgive, who alone art a gracious and powerful forgiver, and without thee no man can forgive.

Lord, who will stand?

(5) What is the use of all creatures being merciful to me and despising and remitting my sin, if God respects and keeps it? And what harm is it if all creatures remit and retain my sin, if God remits and despises it? This is what the following [penitential] psalm also says [Ps. 143, 2.]: "O GOD, do not enter into judgment with your servant, for no living man is found righteous before you." And this verse expresses what the Psalm is made of, namely, of the reputation of the severe judgments of God, who can and will leave no sin unpunished. Therefore, he who does not look at God's judgment does not fear; he who does not fear does not cry out; he who does not cry out does not find mercy.

Therefore, in a right man there must always be fear of the judgment of God, because of the old man, to whom God is hostile and against, and next to the same fear hope for the grace of mercy, which is favorable to the same fear for the sake of the new man, who is also hostile to the old, and thus agrees with God's judgment. So fear and hope are related to each other. And as the judgment of God works fear, so fear works crying; but crying obtains grace. And while the old man lives, the fear, that is, his cross and killing, shall not cease, and the judgment of God shall not be forgotten. And he who lives without the cross and without fear and without God's judgment does not live rightly, as it says of them in the 10th Psalm, v. 5, 6: "They are gone from his eyes.

done thy judgments, and saith, I shall never be moved, no evil shall befall me."

V. 4. For with you there is forgiveness.

7 Therefore there is no refuge in another, if anyone wants to stand or remain; for, as St. Paul says [Rom. 8:31], "If God is for us, who will be against us?" So, who wants to be for us, if GOD is against us? For with Him alone is forgiveness [so that even good works do not help; but whoever wants to be something before God must insist on His grace alone, not on merit]. 2)

That you are feared.

8] This is what is said above [5]: He who does not fear God does not cry out, nor is he forgiven; and therefore, to obtain God's grace, he alone is to be feared, and he alone is to be feared, just as he alone forgives. For he who fears anything but God desires the favor and grace of others, and does not ask for God; but he who fears God desires His grace, and does not ask for anything that is not God, for he 3) knows that if God is gracious to him, no one will do it for him.

V. 5. I wait for the Lord.

(9) Up to this point he has described the fear, the cross of the old man, how to bear and have it. Now he describes the hope, the life of the new man, how one should have it; for these two things are taught in all the Psalms, indeed, in all the holy Scriptures. For God is so strange in His children, that He makes them blessed alike in disgusting and discordant things; for hope and despair are contrary to one another. Nor must they hope in despair; for fear is no other than the raising of despair, and hope the raising of salvation.

(10) And the two unnatural things must be in us, because there are two unnatural men in us, the old and the new. The old must fear and despair and perish; the new must hope and treasure.

2) Addition 1525.

3) Erlanger: the.

1) In the old editions: "vorlest" (Weim.); "verlest" (Witt.); "verlesst" (Jen.).

The two are done in one man, yes, in one work at the same time. Just as the maker of an image removes and cuts away what should not be in the wood for the image, he also promotes the form of the image. Thus, in the fear that cuts away the old Adam, grows the hope that forms the new man.

11 Therefore he says: I have waited for God, that is, in this cry and cross I have not run back or despaired [nor relied on my merits], 1) but for God's grace alone, which I have desired, I wait, and wait if it please my God to help me. Now there are some who want to tell God the goal, to set the time and the measure, and to suggest to Himself how they want to be helped; and if it does not happen to them in this way, they despair, or if they like, they seek help elsewhere³). These do not wait, they do not wait for God, God shall wait for them and be ready immediately, and shall not help them in any other way than as they have proposed. Those who wait for God ask for mercy, but they leave it up to God's good will when, how, where and by what He will help them. They do not doubt the help, but they do not give it a name, they let it be baptized and called 2) God, and even if it is a long time, it will be forgiven without measure. But whoever gives a name to help, it will not be given to him, because he does not wait and suffer God's counsel, will and forgiveness.

My soul is waiting.

(12) That is, my soul has become a waiting or waiting thing, as if he said, "All my soul's being and life has been nothing else but a mere waiting and waiting for God; that is what one would say in Latin: Sustinui Dominum, sustentrix seu expectatrix fuit anima mea, a harrier has become my soul; to express a firm, constant waiting, in which the soul feels nothing but that it waits or waits, as in the 40th Psalm, v. 2: "I have waited for the Lord. God's so steadfastly endured that my soul has become a hardship sufferer, and its life is entirely one of waiting, hoping, and waiting.

And I am waiting for his words.

13) That is, on his promise and vow [for to hope and wait without God's word is to tempt God]. 3) Now this is the nature of the inner man, that he carries a constant waiting, hoping, trusting, believing in God; therefore God does not leave him, who has promised grace and help to all those who trust in him and rely on him and wait on him. And the same word and promise of God is the whole content of the new man, who does not live on bread, but on the same word of God [Matth. 4, 4].

v. 6. My soul waits for the Lord from one morning watch to 4) the next.

14) That is, my soul rises up to God in the face of all things, and firmly waits for His future and help [however long it may last], 5) as in the 123rd Psalm, v. 2: "Our eyes are steadfast to our God, until He has mercy on us." [For this verse shows the length of such endurance, just as the next shows the measure, namely, the word]. 5)

(15) Scripture divides the night into four parts, and calls the parts of the night watch or watchkeeping. Just as the watchmen of the city keep watch at night, watching and waiting to see that no one comes or goes. Every watch has three hours: the first from 6 to 9; the second from 9 to 12; the third from 12 to 3; the fourth, which is the morning watch, from 3 to the day, that is, to 6. Leaving aside the deep interpretation, it is said enough that from one morning to the next we must wait on God, that is, steadily and not let up; even if God would forgive the whole day, we should also wait until the next day.

(16) The reason why he indicates the morning watch or time more than the evening watch or night watch is that in the morning all works are begun, and in the evening they are ended, and at night they rest. Now if he will say, "Hebst

If you begin to trust in God, do not stop again; let the evening and the night pass, stay in waiting until morning comes again; for the new man, whose work is nothing other than waiting and waiting for God, should not stop, as the outward man does and must do. And this is the life in the high three virtues, as faith, hope, love, which virtues kind and nature is described in the Psalms, id est, affectus et opera eorum.

Therefore, in this little psalm, the whole life, work and conduct of the inner man is described in a masterly way, so that it is nothing other than a leaving in God and being completely at God's will.

V. 7. Israel waits 1) for the Lord.

(18) That is, everything that is spiritually and inwardly new to the people is so, as it is said that their whole life is a trusting, relying, waiting, waiting on God. For Israel (b) was the special people of God, to whom such a

1) Erlanger: wait.

b) Instead of the following to the end of §20: in Hebrew, a man who sees GOD, or who is of GOD, means right. These are they whose hearts are rightly set on GOD, and look to Him at all times, taking heed, perceiving, and not bending in themselves. For äirootus eunr Deo, or <1ir6etu8 Voi, svu Ooo, is called one who is right to GOtt. Therefore, no one waits for GOD, for those who are right to Israel are those who are right to GOD. But these are the ones who see God through strong faith, hope and love.

For mercy is with GOD.

To those who wait his, and are Israel. Israel, the right man, does not run to himself, not to his strength, not to his righteousness and wisdom; for they are not Israel, but crooked in themselves and wrong. For help and grace is not with themselves; they are sinners and condemned with him, as he also saith by Hoseam [Cap. 13:9], "O Israel, with thee is nothing but condemnation, but with me is thy help." Now Israel knows well that with himself there is wrath, disgrace, sin and sorrow, as he described and lamented above; therefore he runs from himself, and runs to God; with whom is grace, salvation, righteousness, and not of merit.

And diel is salvation with him.

That is, with him alone is redemption from the many depths, of which s§ 1s said above, and no other redemption. Although the hopeful want to find satisfaction and redemption in themselves, to work themselves out with their works, to be their own helper, redeemer, merciful, and to acquire truth and righteousness for themselves. But what follows in this decision?

Harren is due. In addition also the name is correct. For Israel is called a fighter with God. All those who now wait so firmly that they immediately fight with God over it are true Israelites.

For goodness is with the Lord.

19. To know God rightly is to know that goodness and mercy are with Him; therefore Israel also waits for Him. But those who think that God is angry and ungracious do not yet know Him well, so they flee from Him and do not wait for Him.

And much redemption with him.

20 That is, with him alone is redemption from the many depths of which is said above [§ 1], and no other redemption; though our sins are many, yet his redemption is much more, as 1 John 3:20 says: "Whether our heart punisheth us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things." Although the hopeful want to find satisfaction and redemption with their own works, work themselves out, be their own helper, redeemer, merciful, and acquire truth and righteousness for themselves. But what follows in this decision?

V. 8. And he will redeem Israel from all their iniquity.

21. he, God himself, and not they 2) themselves, will redeem Israel. °) Notice, Israel has sin, and cannot help it itself. What does Moab and Ishmael take before them, the hopeful saints, who do not want to know that righteousness, of which we are to be righteous 3), is nothing other than a gracious gift of the pure, undeserved mercy of God? Therefore we should not be merciful to ourselves, but serious and angry, so that God may be merciful to us and not angry. For whoever wants to be merciful to himself, God will be merciless to him, and whoever is merciless to himself, God will be merciful to him.

O God, hear my prayer; receive into your ears my supplication in your truth; hear me in your righteousness.

but rejects them. Therefore this psalm is easy to understand from the previous ones, because it is all one voice. [Here it is to be known that this Psalm is spoken and will be spoken in the person of the whole people of Christ, and of each one in particular, which people's daily enemies are the worldly wise and self-justifying, who neither know nor want to know about God's grace; yes, they think that no one thinks more of God's grace than they, in blind holiness and good opinion, are led astray.

v. 1. Lord, hear my prayer.

(2) The life of a holy man is more in receiving from God than in giving; more in desiring than in having; more in becoming pious than in being pious; as St. Augustine says that faith acquires what the law demands. Therefore, asking, desiring, seeking is the right nature of an inward man; as in the 34th Psalm, v. 11: "They that seek God always shall not lack any good thing." And in the 105th Psalm, v. 4. No one honors him; indeed, everyone dishonors him, and he is considered a useless, unfit, harmful person in all the things that people do. And whoever has not yet come to this, and does not yet have such enemies, who consider all his good works, words, counsel, and opinion to be foolishness, wickedness, and unrighteousness, has not yet properly come to Christ.

(12) That is, they are in the light and are known and famous to men, and appear and are pleasant. But he puts me completely in contempt and in disrepute, like a dead man who never appears before the world. So he also said above [Ps. 102, 7.], "I am become like a night trot, like a solitary bird in the wilderness." So it goes: the pious are not needed for life and office, even for that they are not remembered, they are not wanted to know or to be known; but the seeming saints are gawked at by everyone.

V. 5 And my spirit is troubled within me, my heart is troubled within my body.

This is the right sacrifice that pleases God, as stated above in the 4th Psalm of repentance [Ps. 51:19]; when a soul is desolate from all creatures, even abandoned and persecuted by itself, so that it waits for nothing but only God's grace; these are the blessed who weep, for they shall be comforted [Luc. 6:21].

V. 6. I remember the former times.

14) That is, the seeming [saints], 2) who are exalted and in the light of men, do not want to be grieved and saddened,^f) do not have their comfort and joy in the present walk and works of their own strength, wisdom, righteousness, may God. But I, who am completely destitute of these things, know no other consolation, except to remember that 3) God has made all his saints lack in time past, and has never yet made any of them lack by his own works, ability, knowledge, piety, or by his own strength, wisdom, and righteousness.

as in the 44th Psalm, vv. 2-4: "O God, we have heard, our fathers have told us, the work which thou didst in their days, how thou didst drive out and smite the heathen, that thou shouldest set them in their land. For, verily, it was not with their sword that they possessed the land, neither did their strength avail them; but thy strength, and the gracious shining of thy countenance, because it pleased thee so, and they deserved not."

I remember the former times, I despise your works.

(15) I have not regarded the works and words of men, as they always shine and are loved by the world, because I know that they do not save anyone, nor are they useful except for false vain glory; but all comfort, help and salvation are in your works alone. If thou doest our works, and our works are not ours but thine, they are acceptable unto thee, right, true, and good. But these, the works of thy grace, know not them which do and magnify the works of their light, their strength, and their wisdom.

16 But that he says, "Of^s all your works," when God's works are innumerable, is to be understood in such a way that the works, so that he may be concerned, are all God's, and does not want to praise the work of a man. For no man's work, but only God's works are anything. Therefore, in these words he describes the nature of grace as opposed to the nature of nature. Item, the little word meditabar, which is here translated "to look at," often means in Scripture to preach or speak, as Psalm 37:30: "The mouth of the righteous shall consider (that is, preach thoughtfully and wisely) wisdom." For from this preaching of God's works and grace springs all the strife and persecution of which he lamented above 9. 10], that the hopeful leave themselves not in God's graces and works, but in their own works, help, counsel and fortune; these are their thoughts.

And talk about the business of your hands.

017 That is, I have told them, and made them mindful of thy works, that they should

3) Added by Walch.

They did not esteem their works great, but they were displeased, and therefore became enemies to me. "The business of God's hands" are the pious, whom he gives birth to and creates by grace. This happens without any cooperation on their part, for they are and become new creatures in Christ. The works, however, are the doings and sufferings that God works through them, thus created, in which they are co-workers. These are the two works of God, since Ps. 28, 5. also says: "They have not understood the works of God, nor the business of His hands" 2c. Item, Ps. 19, 2: "The heavens preach the glory of God, and the firmament proclaims the works of His hands," that is, the apostles preach only about the righteousness that God works in us, and not at all about the righteousness that men are able to work.

V. 7. I spread out my hands to you.

(18) That is, because it is so, that it depends on your work and grace, I do no more, for I seek only grace, and never be sure of my actions, as my enemies do, who do not stretch out their hands to you, even put them in their bosom, and desire nothing from you, but are pleased with^s themselves. To stretch up one's hands to God means. Prayer to GOD (spiritually, however) that all our works may be attributed to GOD.

My soul thirsts for you on earth. Sela.

19. as a dry field thirsts for rain, so my soul thirsts for your grace; as in Ps. 63:2 [Ps. 42:3]: "my soul has thirsted for you." And this happens from the knowledge that all works are nothing without God's grace, that the trusting saints do not believe; therefore their thoughts, words and teachings stand in their works, and are completely full, not thirsting for grace, nor lifting up their hands to God, their life seems to them to be just enough.

V. 8. Hear me soon, O Lord, for my spirit is failing.

(20) As stated above [§13], a desolate soul that finds nothing in itself is the dearest sacrifice to God, especially when it cries out to His mercy, for God hears nothing dearer,

s) in for crying out and thirsting for his mercy. But such thirst may not have he who finds in him much good life, andⁱ) does not fear God's judgments. Now he speaks: I have thirsted and longed for mercy until I can never. I am weary of persevering, therefore it is time, come quickly now, and hear me speedily. This is a lesson to us, that we should wait patiently for God's mercy, and not despair whether he will forgive.

V.. 9. hide not thy face from me, lest I become like them that go down to the pit.

This is what the delay of divine grace and help does, that the soul worries that it is abandoned and condemned, but for this reason it becomes so tense that it desires grace more and more thoroughly, and thus receives grace more fully. Now this is a Christian, truthful person, who is inwardly full of discontent and sorrowful spirit, in constant desire for God's grace and help. And yet, if he also wants to say this cross to others and teach them, he not only deserves no compassion or consequence, but also ingratitude and hatred, and is thus crucified with Christ inwardly and outwardly. For the hopeful stand in their presumption, that they are like unto them which go up to heaven; such fear of hell and thirst of grace have they not.

V. 10. Let me hear your goodness early.

22. as in the 4th Psalm of Repentance, [Ps. 51, 10.]: "Let me hear joy and comfort", let me hear your grace, which speaks into my heart: your sins are forgiven [Matth. 9, 2.]. Thus, God speaks peace into the heart of His people. And the "early", that is, hurry, do not consume; for I am weary and can never wait.

Because I hope for you.

Let this move you, that I seek no other comfort than you alone. That is a great thing, not to seek a shell from any man or creature in suffering, but to press on and suffer, humbly waiting for help in God's hope; there are few of them on earth.

V. 11: Tell me the way I should go.

(24) As it is said in the other psalm of repentance, (Ps. 32:8) "I will give thee understanding, and teach thee the way wherein thou shalt walk. For it is not possible for man to guide himself in his life. The reason is this: for he must become blind and leave God to himself in right faith; but faith sees nothing, but is the dark way, whereof Ps. 18:10: "Darkness is under his feet." Therefore they are horses and mouths that follow the light of reason, and no further than as far as it seems right, godly and good to them. But what they regard differently (than in faith), they flee from.

For I lift up my soul to you.

(25) That is, I am already surrendered, let into your will. For God can teach and guide those who surrender their souls to Him and allow themselves to be guided; but those who draw their souls into themselves and hide them, He cannot guide. Therefore it is to be known that the word, "to lift up the soul to God," is to sacrifice the soul; for the sacrifices in the law are lifted up to God. Now the meaning is: I do not offer you silver or gold, nor calves, nor sheep, but my heart and my soul, which you alone respect for your sacrifices; as Proverbs 23:26 says: Praebe, fili, cor tuum mihi, "Son, give me your heart"; the heart, the reason, is what God wants. ^{u)}

(26) This verse is a great prayer, but very useful, that a man may say to his God, Behold, receive my heart, and lead me according to thy will, and I will yield myself wholly unto thee.

V. 12. Lord, save me from my enemies.

27. these are the wise and the holy, that they overcome me not, and draw me from thee unto them; as Ps. 19:14: "If the strangers become not mighty" unto me, then will I remain pure." For, as I said before, the persecutors of the pious seek only how they will overcome them.

u) t So Ps. 119, 109.: nrea in inunibns lead them and drag them into their own way, which alone seems right to them. And therefore God's guard and help is necessary, that they may persevere in the persecution, as the Jews did to the apostles, who sought nothing else with all their storming, but to confirm their ways and manner according to the law, and to bring the Christians to them by force.

In you I have refuge. Teach me to do according to your good pleasure.

28. my enemies, they may not be your teaching nor yours, therefore they do not flee to you, yes, they teach and tell me what I should do, and want to be master of all; [but it] is vain deceit. ^{w)} Therefore keep me from them, and deliver me from them, and be thou my master thyself. Thus Ps. 120:2: "O God, deliver my soul from deceitful lips," that is, false doctrines and crafty tongues that teach error under the guise of truth. Which preachers also today exceed the measure^{x)} many are in Christendom, few who preach the reason.

For you are my God.

029 That is, I make no idol of my wisdom and righteousness, as mine enemies do; but I cleave unto thy grace, and take of thee wisdom and righteousness which is in thee, and abideth for ever.

V. 13. Your good spirit leads me on the level land.

(30) Let them not lead me, nor any man: for they lead crooked ways, and thy spirit, the evil one, leadeth them. [Here it is to be noted that both spirits are of God, the good and the evil; the evil one is given by God to the faithful, as it is written of Saul [1 Sam. 16, 14. 1 Sam. 18, 10.] that the evil spirit of God rules him, that is, the wrathful, raging spirit, so that they defend their rights and truth, and persecute the good ones; as also Rom. 11, 8: God has given them a 1) prickly spirit. ^{y)} The good spirit is the Holy Spirit, which makes gentle, mild and

For so it may be said, God is kind, gracious, merciful; these are his names to be praised. V. 14. Lead my soul out of trouble for the sake of your righteousness.

Ropes and error, as Pf. 124, 7.: "The rope is broken, and we are delivered." ^{b)}

For I am your servant.

35 That is, in grace I live, and therefore all my life serves thee, and not me; for I seek not myself, but thee and thine own. But they that live in their righteousness cannot do this; but serve themselves, seeking their own in all things.

(36) If any man say unto me, Canst thou not speak more than of the righteousness, wisdom, and strength of God, and not also of [the righteousness, wisdom, and strength of] ²⁾ men, always expounding the Scriptures of the righteousness and grace of God, and so strum no more than one string, and sing but one little song? I answer, Let each one look to himself; this I confess for myself: As often as I have found less in the Scriptures than Christ, I have never been satisfied; but as often as I have found more than Christ, I have never been poorer, so that this also seems true to me, that God the Holy Spirit neither knows nor wants to know more than Jesus Christ, when he says of him John 16:13, 14: "The Holy Spirit knows no more than Jesus Christ. 16, 13. 14.: "He will transfigure me, he will not speak of himself, but of mine he will take it and proclaim it to you."

(37) Christ is God's grace, mercy, justice, truth, wisdom, strength, comfort and blessedness, given to us by God without any merit. Christ, I say, not (as some say with blind words) causaliter, that he giveth righteousness, and [as] he abideth without; for it is dead, yea, it is never given, Christ being there himself, even as the brightness of the sun and heat of the fire is not, where the sun and the fire is not.

038 Now there are some to whom these words of grace are thus lightly regarded, and say, Who knoweth not this, that without grace there is no good thing in us? And think that they understand it almost well; yea, more, if they be asked, Whether they regard their righteousness nothing? they go out quickly, and say, Eia, of that I am sure. That is a pitiful one, grave blindness, that they consider themselves in the high degree of perfection, and have not yet understood nor 1) tasted the lowest. For how can a man be hopeful, for he who may say that he is pure from all hopefulness and all evil inclination. For spiritual hope is the last and deepest vice, if they do not yet find themselves pure from carnal and human inclination.

039 Therefore no saint hath ever been so bold as to say of himself, that his wisdom and righteousness are nothing before him; but in strife they lie, and dispute with themselves about things. So then these come²) with a deceitful word, Yea, but the inclination is not mortal sin; and hold it that they are not blind, but know well what daily or mortal sin is, and almost in the same blindness reach out to Christ for his judgment seat. For it is true that daily sins do not condemn. But sins are not daily sins by nature, only those whom God considers "daily" by grace; but He does this only to those who do not despise them.

(40) Therefore it is very dangerous to speak of daily sins, if one wants to receive security and false comfort from them, who strives against God's fear and teaches to despise God's judgments secretly. For if a man is to give an account of every idle word on the last day [Matth. 12, 36.], who will be so bold that he will not guard or mourn daily sin with fear, and thus in humble fear earnestly long for grace and mercy?

Luther's interpretation of the fifteen songs in the higher choir, Ps. 120 to 134.)

Declared 1531 to 27 Oct. 1533. Published 1540.

Newly translated from the Latin.

M. Veit Dietrich's letter to Prince Georg zu Anhalt.

To the Serene, Highborn Prince and Lord, Mr. Georg, Prince of Anhalt, Count of Ascania 2c., Provost of Magdeburg, his gracious Lord, Veit Dietrich of Nuremberg wishes grace from God.

Already several times I have indicated with what intention I would do what the venerable Father Luther, my extremely dear teacher, publicly said in the school.

I am going to publish the text that Luther has presented. For I believe that it is useful for the church to have the correct and proper explanations of the Holy Scriptures, and since all scholars admire the fullness and elegance of Luther's speech, his writings are not read without benefit by those who are interested in theology. For it is very much a matter of what kind of way to speak

*These psalms, which Luther interpreted in his lectures from 1531 to 1533, were copied by Veit Dietrich in the lectures, but then copied and published in 1540, with a note to Prince George of Anhalt, dated from Nuremberg, March 15, 1540. The title is: In Huindooiin ksalnog dradnrm eornmontarii ex prneleetionibnk O. Nartini l,ntderi, summa üds eolleeti. Hs.v.XO. At the end: küniit Outborns k^aimos Oradnum Vuittenber^ne, anno Domini 1533. the Ootodrin. 27. dk8oripti untern sunt XoriverMO et üñiti anno 1540. the .lanuaris 20. blx otüeina Eratonis Eratomiliani ^rMntoratensie, Nense 8epteindri. ^nno. M.D.XD. By comparing the time given here with the note we gave at the end of the interpretation of the 130th Psalm, the interesting fact arises that Luther interpreted the four Psalms 131-134 in the short time from October 1 to 27. On the basis of this, we assume that the beginning of these interpretations was set too early. A second edition appeared in the year

We make use of this in teaching, especially among the common people, who, being somewhat slow by nature, often imagine the most inconsistent opinions if the things have not been sufficiently explained in fact and in many words. When we read Augustine and other old teachers, we often see that even when they say the most familiar things, they are not sufficiently understood because they speak somewhat clumsily, but seem to say quite different things than they mean. This will be experienced especially by those who read the older church teachers, Tertullian, Irenaeus and the like. However, as far as Irenaeus is concerned, the interpreter is rather to blame, since many things indicate that he wrote in Greek. However, although I have by no means been able to express the dainty way of speaking of D. Luther's dainty manner of speaking, for since this had to be caught from the mouth of the lecturer, the hand was often unable to follow the common and rapid tongue of the interpreter, I nevertheless have a certain confidence, because I have almost always faithfully distinguished the order of the thoughts, that this lecture will also be of use to those who have a passion for theology, so that they will become accustomed to a detailed and yet proper manner of speaking when interpreting.

But I have also had this intention: Our age is exceedingly fertile in writers of every kind, and in theology, which after all (considering the greatness of things) occupies the first place among all (reliquas) professions, there is almost no one who does not wish that there should also be something of his, whether this be done out of ambition and a certain vanity of the people, according to their nature, or through a special trait (fata) that lies in our time. But among such a great number of writers, one can find very few who write in such a way that one can read them with great benefit. For besides that, that some have certain

If these people, as Basil says, have corrupted the main pieces of our religion, and almost on every single page impose their dreams on the reader in a peevish way, we see how few there are who treat the doctrine of sanctification 1) properly, for either they neglect it as a common and well-known thing, or if they do touch it once, they wrap it up in such a way that you can nowhere get out of it, for in fact these people prove their art more than their godliness, as Basil says. If now the books of these people should get out of the descendants, dear, what kind of religion will they learn from them? If we are only able to remedy this great damage to some extent by publishing Luther's lectures, will we not then be considered to have used our efforts well? For there is no better concern for our ministry than that the right doctrine be passed on to our descendants. This is the paternal inheritance, which should be preserved and bequeathed to the church primarily by those who are ordained in some part to govern the churches. Careful rulers of communities direct all their efforts and thoughts so that they not only enjoy peace and good rest themselves, but also leave a well-ordered community to their descendants. For our minds, by their very nature, lead us not to be concerned, in the manner of unreasoning animals, only with what is before our eyes, but also to look ahead to distant times (multa saecula). Therefore, as we read in Cicero, the very old peasant did not hesitate to answer the one who asked him for whom he was sowing: For the immortal gods, who wanted me to receive this not only from the ancestors, but also to the descendants.

1542 also at Strasbourg under the same title by the same printer, who at the end, however, calls himself differently, because there it says: Xr^ontorati upnU Eratonena LI^iuiin Xn. iil.v.XHI. Moose Murtio. "The interpretation of Ps. 127 was first published in 1537 without any indication of an editor different from the author" (Köstlin, Martin Luther [3], vol. II, p. 272). Already in 1541 a German translation by Caspar Hedio appeared in Strasbourg under the title: "Auslegung v. Martin Luthers über die 15 Psalmen der Lieder im höhern Chor, in Latein genant Dkalmi Kradnuna, verdeutscht durch O. Caspar Hedio. XU O^orAinna, Luvuriae Oueem. Strassb. 1541." Another German translation, which has passed into the collections, was later made piecemeal, as we see from the Wittenberg edition. In Ps. 120-123, neither the name of the translator nor the time is given. M. Jakob Brunsberger translated Ps. 124. 133 and 134; the last two in 1555. XI. Mauritius Helling the Psalms 125. 126. 129. 131. 132, without indication of time. I). George Major the 127th Psalm in 1535 and Ps. 130 in 1539. M. Stephan Agricola the 128th Psalm in 1552. In the Latin collections our writing is found: in the Wittenberg (1549), Dom. III, toi. 571; in the Jena one (1570), Dom. IV, toi. 409 b and in the Erlangen, oxeA. oxx., Dom. XIX, p. 155 and Dona. XX xor toturn. In the German editions: Wittenberger, vol. VIII, p. 1; Altenburger, vol. VII, p. 488 and in the Leipziger, vol. V, 431. Because the old translation no longer suffices for our time, we have retranslated.

hand them over. What must we do, therefore, who have been commanded by the Lord to be laborers in His vineyard and stewards in His churches? Must we not be active, strive and do everything that is in any way useful for the preservation and propagation of the salvific doctrine? For this is what the Lord intended us not only to receive, but also to pass on to our descendants. Therefore, I hope that those who love pure doctrine and are concerned about the welfare of the church will approve of this work of mine, which I have now spent many years on so that what Luther taught publicly in the school could also be seen, read and known by those who have never seen Wittenberg, the highly blessed workshop of theology and all good studies. I also have no doubt, if only there is some peace, and not everything is destroyed by war and bloodshed, that posterity will also feel some nets from this work of mine.

As far as these songs in the higher choir are concerned, I wanted them to be published mainly because they are not only delightful due to the diversity of their content, since almost every single psalm contains a special piece of Christian doctrine, but also because they are very recommendable due to their brevity. And since they are very well known because of the old usage that the pope has brought to bear in the churches, it has seemed useful to me for this reason that what was very well known through usage should also be put more to the heart of those who make use of these things through a proper interpretation.

But I wanted to attribute these psalms to you, Sublime Prince, before others, not only because you occupy a prominent place in the ecclesiastical hierarchy, for many princes have that in common with you, but also because you have combined the knowledge of the good arts and various languages with zeal for the true religion, and it was mainly through the efforts of E. F. G. that six years ago, as difficult as the times were, a true improvement of the churches in your territory was undertaken. Although this valiant action had inflamed my mind with a special love for E. F. G., it became much stronger after that, when I was allowed to read the learned

I had the opportunity to get to know the speeches and extremely charming customs. This had often been praised to me by the extremely credible man, Georg Helt. Although I never believed that his speeches were untrue, everything was surpassed by the peculiar benevolence with which you received me and the other friends who were in the company of our teachers, D. Luther and Philip, at Dessau. In the other brothers, John and Joachim, the noble princes, I admired their Latin speech, which is very unusual at courts, the rich knowledge of all histories and the exceedingly great respectability of manners, without all courtly ambition and without all indulgence. While E. F. G. had this in common with your brothers, one had to marvel at the fact that your speech clearly showed that you have read and know most diligently everything that is available in the old church. Then, who should not admire that a prince has such an exact knowledge of the Hebrew language? Now others have great titles, that they are primates, born legates, archbishops, even cardinals: but what truly befits a bishop, and what in you all the godly rightly admire, - how many is it that has this? Your schools have other exercises and other arts, of which it is not necessary to speak. Therefore, Most Serene Prince, allow us to love you because of your truly pagan virtues, which are exceedingly befitting for a good prince and a holy bishop, and receive this small gift with such a heart as it is offered by me. We learn that it is true what St. Paul says: "Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, but what is foolish in the sight of the world, that God has chosen." Therefore, since most of the bishops and princes either persecute or disrespect the Gospel, it is an exceedingly lovely spectacle for the churches to see that you, with such great ancestral splendor and in such high rank, are taking hold of the right doctrine, and with exceedingly holy zeal are engaged in propagating the true religion. Christ keep E. F. G. and guide you also further to the spreading of the honor of his name. Amen. Given at Nuremberg from the parish of St. Sebaldus. March 15, 1540.

Interpretations of the fifteen songs in the higher choir, from the lectures of D. Martin Luther with the greatest fidelity.

Preface [Luther's].

In the entrance to my lectures I have often indicated beforehand with what intention we set out to interpret the holy Scriptures, namely, not because we wish to bring forward something new, or what is not known to others, for our theology is so widespread both in Latin and in German, that it seems that exhortations are needed rather than doctrine, but because the diligent preaching of the Word of God is the true worship of the New Testament, which is much more pleasing, holy and better to God than all the worship and sacrifices of the Old Testament. That is why the holy prophets, even at the time when the Law was still in force, cast far away the burnt offerings and other sacrifices of the Law, and praised the sacrifice of praise. But we must perform this service with all the greater zeal and diligence, because after the great darkness in which we have lived, the divine wisdom has risen again and shines on us like the sun at noon.

Therefore, just as before that time it was considered a kind of servitude to listen to a holy discourse, and this service was performed by men like other works, so now it must be considered quite differently, namely, that those who teach, read, write, and hear the holy things are true priests of God, who pay their God His well-deserved and pleasing honor. This, then, should incite us to the continued treatment of the word of God, although it is also true that we cannot have such a complete knowledge of the holy things that it should not be necessary for us to learn them anew every day, to experience them and to be strengthened in them, because of the constant temptations of Satan with which he afflicts us, so that, just as the cause of the fall does not cease, so also we do not cease to constantly contemplate God's word for our edification and that of the church. For nothing is so pernicious as what many do nowadays, that, having acquired a small knowledge of this divine wisdom, they immediately think that they have become masters. For since this does not lie in the fact that one can speak of it however well, but in custom and experience, which is not guided and governed by human reason, but by the Holy Spirit, those are truly mistaken who are content with mere knowledge, which can never be sufficient without application. In the Old Testament, only the holy Ten Commandments were prescribed, with the learning and practice of which God wanted His people to be occupied. But who has ever been among the saints who could boast of having attained the wisdom presented by the Holy Spirit in the ten commandments? And we, to whom the whole Scripture is presented in the New Testament, wanted to boast, namely, that we had known it completely?

Therefore, we should give up this self-love and humble ourselves before the Holy Spirit and confess that this wisdom is infinite and cannot be exhausted, even if we spend our whole life learning the Scriptures. For even though we have some knowledge through God's grace, we must always return to this source, yes, to this fire, because we are daily overwhelmed with clouds of temptations, as it were, so that we may be warmed again and not give in either to Satan or to our flesh, so that the firstfruits of the spirit are destroyed. In the schools it was called acedia (sloth) (which the unlearned have called by the corrupt word accidia), which is actually the weariness of words, which arises from the presumption that one knows it well, and which nowadays among the common people is all too common.

in the swing goes. Against this vice Moses commands [5th book 6, 7th] that the law should be sharpened for the descendants, that is, that it should be practiced and practiced daily, although it is completely known. For something will always shine forth that was hidden from us before, something will always please us in it that we neglected before as something unpalatable.

So also for this reason we will interpret the Psalms, so that we may both drive out this devilish lust and strengthen and nourish the spirit by the use of the holy things, although this is the highest thing, that we know for certain that God is pleased with this service, if we act his word with teaching, reading, writing, hearing 2c. This alone should keep us doing the word without ceasing. For what is doing God's word other than constantly offering, constantly serving God, constantly practicing the fulfillment of the first, second and third commandments? The number of those who constantly blaspheme God, either by teaching other things or by pursuing the right doctrine with their sword, is exceedingly great, God be lamented. Therefore, it is highly necessary that we, who are far fewer in number, serve and praise our God, who has given us both this life and the life to come. Then we are also warned by our Danger, so that we are not overwhelmed by laziness and weariness as satiated people, without even becoming aware of it. For contempt follows weariness; but God punishes contempt in such a way that he takes away the word completely, as the pabstry is an excellent indication for all times, since we see that this is what happened in it.

I have explained the reasons why I have undertaken the interpretation of the songs in the higher choir, namely, so that we may consecrate this hour to our Savior and offer sacrifices to Him, and fulfill the first, second, and third commandments to the best of our ability through the preaching of the mercy of God, while otherwise the whole world sins against these commandments by blaspheming against God. And I also gladly admonished you against sloth and idleness. For if anything threatens our doctrine, it is this vice. Although heretics and sects do much harm, their effect is to force us to diligently search the holy Scriptures. But this corruption, the weariness of words, arises in ourselves, and brings all the more danger with it, the less it can be perceived by us. But then the devil is sure of victory when we snore and have begun to be secure and full.

From the title of the songs in the higher choir.

First of all, the question arises here about the title of these psalms, why they have the inscription: "Songs in the higher choir" (psalmi graduum [StufenpfalmenP, or as others translate it: Songs of Ascent (adscensionum)]. However, the opinions of the exegetes are different, all of which are not worth telling here. Lyra states that they are so called because the Levites or priests sang them when ascending or on the steps of the temple. For in the history of the kings it is written that they went out on steps to the temple [1 Kings 6:8]. Now he invents that there were fifteen steps, and on every step a psalm was sung. Whether this is true or not, I do not care much about it, but it seems to me not to be according to the truth. It cannot be denied, of course, that the Hebrew word $\text{sn}8^{\wedge}$ means steps or ascents. Therefore I stick, as far as it can be done, to the quite simple sense, and hold that they are so called because they used to be sung by the Levites or priests on steps or in an elevated place, as with us he who publicly sings or preaches in church is generally in some higher or loftier place, where he can be heard by all.

can be easily seen and heard. For I think that these psalms were not sung by the whole crowd that was in the temple, or by the rest of the choir, but by certain people who were to sing to the others, they were sung or at least begun by a higher choir (e superiore loco), as then also some others have the title, that is, of the precentor, of which we have spoken elsewhere. But who could know all their customs, especially since there is now so much time between them, in which they have gone out of custom and the people from 'the memory?

Since with such a large number of psalms, when the law was still in force, one psalm was sung with this, another with another ceremony, according to the occasion of the time and the place, sometimes also as it had become customary, it is sufficient for us to say that the title here does not refer to any doctrine, but only to an outward use of the singers, whatever it may have been for a ceremony. In our school the psalms are sung; some of the boys sing the first verses, the servant the prayers. Furthermore, in the morning something is read from the Epistles of Paul or the Gospel, in the evening the Psalms. For what is done in public cannot proceed without ceremonies. In this way

In that nation everything was done in proper order and with certain ceremonies. For there were twenty-four orders of the priests [1 Chron. 25, 3. ff.], therefore it was possible that they sang sometimes in the choir without the people, sometimes single, sometimes also choruses, after that also the people sang something to it. This we cannot know for sure, after everything has completely fallen away. Because this also serves little to understand the Psalms, I think that we should bear it with equanimity that these things cannot be completely known.

Therefore, I also pass over this, why there are just fifteen in number, and this title is rather prefixed to these Psalms than to others. Because even if we struggle a lot, the matter remains uncertain, and since this matter has no particular use, one struggles in vain. But I also wanted to note that some interpret "psalms of ascent" (adscensionum) to be as much as "to the conclusion" (completionum), because they were sung at the end, when the people were already to be dismissed, and the sacred act was completed (completa). And 1) indeed, because they are short and always contain important (insignificant) teachings, they are suitable for the end. But I will also leave the Hebrews their judgment here.

1) Instead of at, probably ae should be read.

The hundred and twenty-third Psalm. *)

From the content of the hundred and twenty-third Psalm.

I believe that this psalm is an invocation of divine help against evil tongues, or against the harm that evil tongues, that is, heretics, do to the church when they teach against right doctrine. For this challenge is to be put first, as it were, when the doctrine suffers. For the devil has a twofold way by which he can destroy the Church, the heresies, and the violence or the sword. Therefore Christ also calls him a liar and a murderer. Hence it comes that the prayers in the Psalms generally come down to these two main things, that they pray either against the devil as a murderer, or against the devil as a liar, that is, either against the pernicious doctrine, or under the cross and the persecutions against the tyrants.

*) This title is in the Latin edition only before the first verse.

Furthermore, there are many kinds of murder with which the devil plagues the church: some with the sensation of death, others with slander, others he tortures with harming the enemies, with hatred, with dangers and other misfortunes; all this belongs to violence. But to lying belongs what he does through his servants, especially within the church itself, by means of false teachings, with which he confuses the consciences, and likewise by inward temptations, when he wears the godly with his poisoned arrows of despair, of mistrust, of blasphemy, and so kills them under the name of God and drags them to hell. For all this comprehends the lie in itself. And we see that the church complains about these dangers not only in the Psalms, but also in all of Scripture, that she is attacked by force, by cunning, by mobs, by heresies 2c.

This psalm, however, as I have said, in my opinion actually belongs to the second temptation, with corrupt doctrine, although it also concerns the first temptation. For it cannot fail that lying teachers are also cruel and bloodthirsty, because they are eager to defend their ungodliness, and the devil sows the lie for the sake of it, so that he gives cause for murder, as the examples show both in the rest of the church and in the first parents in paradise; for by lying the devil deceived them, so that they perished by death. But since the church today suffers similar trials, since it is attacked and assailed from all sides by lying and slanderous tongues, and suffers the bitterest hatred with dangers of all kinds, only because it holds fast to the pure doctrine and is busy bringing God's word to light, therefore it is also necessary for us today that we pray against these corrupt tongues in our times, so that they do not do as much harm as they want. But it is a great blessing that we also have the words that the Holy Spirit has prescribed, which the godly can use in this danger. But now let us go to the Psalm.

v. 1. I call to the Lord in my distress, and he hears me. 1)

More correctly [than in the Vulgate, which uses past tenses] this verse is translated by present tenses: "I cry unto the LORD in my trouble, and he heareth me." For though the Hebrews also have the distinction of the three tenses, yet the past tense, because it is the first or root form (thema) of the verb, is often more properly translated by the present tense for the sake of clearer understanding, that it may not be merely the description of a past event or an example, but to a teaching in which it is shown what we should do in these temptations of the lying tongue, since we feel and experience that we struggle in vain with the heretics, and it is not possible to bring them back to the right way. For we have learned this through long experience, that it is true what Paul says [Titus 3:10, 11], that such people have condemned themselves, and that therefore, after they have been punished or admonished once and again, they should be let go and avoided, because they are so caught up in their opinions that they cannot be turned from them.

And this we learn especially from the authors of heresies or ungodly opinions; nothing can be said to them or presented to them by which they would be improved. There is no lack of hope that they will give room to the truth, as it is certain that they can be convicted, but they do not convert. For if you shut them up in one place, they will soon find something to murmur against, as not only the histories of Arius and other heretics show, but also we can testify by the examples of our time. Therefore, it is impossible to silence the mouth of a heretic forever. But it is possible for us to convict and refute them, and likewise to protect our people from their error, as from a very effective poison. For a bishop must be able to instruct not only the simple, but also to refute the false ones. With this we shall be satisfied that those of us who have been warned persevere in the right doctrine; but that we also convert the authors of the heresies, that we have no hope of. How often did Christ convict the Pharisees, not only by the revealed Scriptures, but also by God's fingers and miracles? And still they remained in their godlessness. Arius was obviously overcome before Probus, and yet he continued his error with even greater confidence and better success. What shall we say of our papists? Do we not experience the same in them?

1) Vulgate: Ad Dominum, cum tribularer,

Therefore, we should let go of those who sin not out of error but with will and do not want to convert, after they have been admonished once and again, and should fight against them with prayer according to the example of David, just as we must pray for our own, so that they are not deceived by the beautiful appearance. Apart from this, there is nothing left for us to do. For the author of heresies, the devil, is so slippery, and in a thousand ways a Proteus, that he cannot certainly be tricked or caught. If one crack is blocked, he finds ten others through which he can escape, and like the trapped wind he searches everything and penetrates everything so that he can escape. One fights against him primarily when one has to do with heretics. Therefore, nothing is accomplished by disputing, although disputing is necessary and the servants of Satan must be convicted and rejected by disputations for the sake of the rest of the church. But prayer must also be connected with the outward word, by which the malicious spirit is pressed to the utmost and driven into a corner. This has subdued Arius, Manichaeus, Sabellius, this has shattered the Pharisees and the unbelieving synagogue, this has in our time brought to naught the authors of ungodly opinions, raging as they were. For it so happens that those who will not hear those who admonish and refute them must feel our prayer and cry, in which we cry out to the Lord for the sanctification of his name and the coming of his kingdom.

This is the only way to victory, that even though they seem to have the upper hand for a while, the corrupt tongues are finally eradicated. Therefore, we must act wisely and cautiously in this danger, and we must abandon all confidence in our wisdom, although it is the word of God that we have for ourselves. For we do not have to fight with flesh and blood, but with the evil spirits. If we had to deal only with flesh and blood, we would fortify and strengthen ours in such a way by reason that nothing could be brought against it. But now we find out that, after they have been convicted by reason and by the sayings of Scripture, they nevertheless stubbornly hold on to their error and are only concerned about how they can defend it and spread it far and wide. Therefore, I use to compare their sin to the sin of Judas. He could not excuse his intention to commit treason, which he had decided against Christ, and yet he continued to carry it out, because the devil urged him to do so. Completely in this way, the devil does not let go of the originators of ungodly teachings, which he once got under his control, nor does he let them rest.

That is why one must add prayer, that is why one must fight primarily with prayer, as David does here in a very beautiful and comforting example, and says: "To the Lord I cry in my distress", as if he wanted to say: In this danger of ungodly doctrine I undertook in vain that the false prophets should be converted and recognize their error. For Satan, who possesses their hearts, is so slippery that he cannot be caught. In addition, I was weaker, if one looks at the number, because the smallest part stood by me; on the other hand, those who opposed me were greater in number and stronger in power. What should I do now, this wretched man? This, of course: After I have diligently inculcated the word of God as much as God has given me, after I have warned my own and reminded them of their error, I go out to my God through prayer and present my distress to him, and I am sure that he will hear me.

Thus, David presents us with his example of what

He himself has always done this, and this is easily said, but experience testifies that it cannot be done without extremely difficult efforts. For first of all, the damage done by the father of lies by means of ungodly teaching cannot be viewed without the greatest sorrow. In addition to this pain, there is also a kind of despair of healing, because the appearance of the ungodly doctrine that is raging is more frightening than that of a raging conflagration or an erupting river that suddenly sweeps down and overturns everything. Therefore the heart is frightened in both directions, both by fear of future misfortune and by the feeling of present harm. If, in addition to this, there is also inner distress, that the heart feels that God is angry, then it seems quite impossible that one can pray, and truly, an untrained person, who is presumptuous of the word and its teaching, will accomplish nothing but useless work and endless complaining. For it is not enough to teach, it is not enough to refute and convict, but God must give prosperity, so that not only we with our brethren may be preserved in the wholesome doctrine, but also those who teach otherwise may be cut off and perish.

But this is accomplished by prayer alone; but that this prayer is not something easy, we will now show. Teaching the word and hearing the word are also great and divine works that require the Holy Spirit. But the use of faith, namely, to turn to the Lord and pray, and to trust that the prayer will be well answered, and that God will hear it, is an exceedingly difficult matter, especially since the fearful conscience generally resists this confidence and despairs of healing, especially when the consciousness of sin or unworthiness is added. For there it commonly happens that the heart first debates within itself whether anything can be accomplished by prayer; those who allow themselves to be led into this question will never pray, especially if they measure it according to their feeling of worthiness. On the other hand, you must do this so that on this occasion you do not pay attention to your condition.

but rather look to the promise, to the necessity of prayer, to the danger and the cause itself. For in this way it will happen that, although your conscience draws you back from praying, the greatness of the danger will drive you to pray. For if someone (for the sake of the example I speak thus) has fornicated, and on his way falls by chance from a bridge into a river, should he not pray in such great danger for the sake of it, because he is conscious of sin? Rather, the greater the danger and distress, the more the heart must be inclined and ready to pray. In this way, even in this danger, we must do more, however we are made up, to consider that Satan is causing so much misfortune through ungodly teachers, rather than that we are unworthy of being heard.

The promise also serves this purpose, that in Christ we not only have the promise that we shall be heard; but Christ himself has prescribed for us the words, even the syllables and letters, which we are to pray; yes, his commandment is also added, so that it is no longer at our will to pray or not to pray, but it is a commanded work.

When we think of this, and after that also the need or danger is considered, then the hearts become ready, and the challenge of one's own worthiness is shaken off, and the conscience is swallowed up, as it were, as it also happens in sudden dangers, when someone is either attacked by highwaymen on a journey, or falls into water under danger 2c. Before someone thinks of his worthiness, he either breaks out into these words or has this thought: O God, help. For here is true what the physicians say, that the appetite is irritated by hot spices. For there is no better master to teach to pray than necessity. But since we are safe and walk along blindfolded, as it were, and do not feel the present evil, it is not to be wondered at if we either do not pray at all, or if our prayer is quite cold. It is the case with me that I feel that I never pray better than when I am in need. This is the pungent spice that, even in David (that I say so), makes hunger go away.

and whets the appetite for prayer, as he says, "I cry out in my distress."

Therefore we are to learn from this verse that David used this remedy in the peril of false teaching, that he first raised himself and his own by teaching, and then prayed. We are to do the same, only in confidence in the cause or the need, which the Lord's Prayer also indicates to us. For because the name of the Lord is defiled, because consciences are corrupted, because the confession of the gospel is in danger, there is truly great cause for us to say, "Hallowed be thy name," that there may be an end to abominations and blasphemies; "thy kingdom come," which is almost suppressed by the kingdom of Satan 2c. He who prays in this way prays in such a way that he easily fills heaven with his groans, whereas otherwise, except in distress, our mouths are scarcely filled, as the papists' prayers and songs are; for how should those be able to pray who live in supreme security? This cause David indicates, since he says, "I call in distress." For it must be an urgent need that drives; as there is our and our brothers' blessedness, eternal death, our sins, our harm, the glory of God, the kingdom of God, likewise peace, war and the like. All of this is presented to us in the most beautiful order in the Lord's Prayer, and they are truly hardships that teach us to pray; indeed, if we are able to consider these dangers, they also force and press us. We should consider this and break through the clouds that take away from us the sight of God favorable to us, and should certainly consider that prayer is the most pleasing sacrifice to God, and such service to God as He requires of us. Some think of a means, and rely on the prayer of the brethren; this, of course, is not to be blamed, for the prayer of many is stronger. But it is necessary that you also pray and become a part of the church that prays from one mouth: "Our Father. For he does not want to be just this or that person, but also your father.

But expressly is added: "to the Lord", against those thoughts which once tormented me too, and today still torment those who, for instance, are among the papists.

sten are simple-minded people. Because I thought like this: I am a sinner, therefore I cannot pray to God who is angry with me because of sins. I will seek mediators to whom he is gracious, Mary, Peter, Anna 2c. For fearful consciences are terrified when they hear the name of GOD. And truly, it is a great majesty, but you must not imagine it so great that you would not pray for its sake. For when you look at the majesty, why do you not also look at the fact that the majesty itself has commanded that you should pray? Truly, you are not so little or nothing that the prestige of the one in authority should not bind you. Consider this commandment, and commit thyself to the grace of him that commanded it. Say: Lord, it is not in my will whether I should pray or not pray (as we dreamed as monks). You have commanded^ therefore I recognize that I must obey you. If I am unworthy, yet thy commandment and will is worthy that I obey the same; thy promise is worthy that I trust it. Therefore I ask, not on my worthiness, not on Mary's, not on Peter's, but on the worthiness of the name of JESU and of GOD, who commanded and commanded.

The whole papacy does not know this way of praying, and I can confirm by my example that, just as I, when I was a monk, never prayed a single Our Father correctly, so also today the papists do not pray even one syllable in faith. This may have happened so that God heard the inexpressible sighs of my heart, as I believe there were many others who also had these sighs, although they did not recognize them. But apart from these sighs, no part of the prayer has been properly understood or pronounced as it should be, and as we, by God's grace, now pray and teach others to pray.

There is a saying of a hermit who was famous among the monks, who said that no work is so great as the work of prayer. This is true when we look at the law of praying without faith, which was given to the missal monks, but it is even more true when we speak of prayer in faith, that the heart resists conscience and despair, and yet dares to pray.

trusting in the mercy of God, although this difficulty is lessened not only by the promise given to those who pray, and likewise by the commandment [that we should pray], but also by the need that drives us to it. But as to the matter itself, prayer without faith is in truth impossible. For these two things make prayer strong, the promise of God and our need. In this practice, and also get used to secret prayer in the closet, as Christ commands. Now if Satan, as he is wont to do, tries to hinder this prayer, let us close our eyes and say: O Lord, behold, here is trouble and fear, here I stand in danger; this my brother stands in such danger, so he is plagued by the devil, the time does not suffer me to think of myself, whether I be good or worthy, help me in due time according to thy word 2c. If in this way the cause and the promise are considered, the devil is overcome, and to this way of praying David calls us by his example, not only in the danger of ungodly teaching, but also in all troubles. And it pleases God, if you are only quite impudent here in trusting in His mercy and promise, after the word: "And He hears me", as if He wanted to say: In this way God declares that our prayer is pleasing to Him, which we make in trusting in His promise and mercy, namely, that He hears it.

And here see to it that you learn diligently the name of God, which David gives him here, that he may be a hearer of prayer, and beware lest, when you pray, you snatch this name from him through distrust, as we commonly do. For as it is said in the German proverb that a good end makes everything good, so very many miss it at the end of the prayer, and spoil the prayer. For since "Amen" should be added, the doubt that is in the heart changes the Amen into a No, and holds that it is nothing. Against this doubt David fortifies us here by his example, and holds out to us, in addition to the promises we have, his experience, so that he may stimulate us to pray in faith, so that we may believe that God will grant us amen.

He will certainly hear, since he is the hearer of all the sighs of those who pray in faith. Even if he does not answer so soon, he will answer in his own time. If he does not answer in the way you want and desire, he will answer in a better way. If not by the person you wish, he will do it by a more suitable person 2c. So Bernhard says somewhere, and I do not remember to have read anything in the writings of all the moderns that was said about prayer in a more beautiful or godly way: Dear brothers, he says, do not doubt about your prayer, but know that when the word goes out of your mouth, then your prayer is written before the eyes of God, and either what is asked will happen, or it is good that it does not happen. What could be more Christian, what could be more comforting, than that God, as it were like an exceedingly lenient king, answers all petitions with nothing other than: Let what is asked be done.

But, you will say, the opposite often happens. How often is a prayer made for a pregnant woman and for a woman in childbirth, and yet she dies in childbirth? Do you think that Jacob did not ask for his Rachel, who died in such danger? So David prayed with the greatest fervor of spirit for the son Bathsheba bore him, but the prayer was in vain. We also see such examples in the saints daily in great numbers. I answer: However this may be, it must be stated first of all that God is a hearer of prayers; this title must never be taken away from God, as the first child prays most beautifully in this faith, which thus believes of God that He hears and gives everything. The children hold on to this faith without any doubt in the most beautiful certainty of faith. That is why I value their prayer very highly and often use it as an example. For although the children learn the form of prayer and the words from us, we could nevertheless learn the power of prayer from them, for the sake of the perversity of our nature, and also for the sake of our poor teaching of youth. Therefore, first of all, it must be stated without exception that our prayer has been answered.

Secondly. The answer must be understood in this way, not that God always does what we desire, but that he does what is useful to us. For since God is good, He can give nothing but what is good. But we often ask for our children, often for our friends, often for ourselves, not what is good, but what seems good to us. In such things God hears even when He does not do what we ask. Therefore, in the Lord's Prayer, we ask for the sanctification of God's name, for the coming of His kingdom, and for His will to be done, rather than for what is ours and what serves our life, so that in such matters God will not do what seems good to us, but what is truly good. Therefore, a distinction is rightly made between the things that should be asked; namely, in the things that concern the glory of God and our salvation, we should hold without condition that we will be heard, whereas in those that belong to this present life, we should also hope for salvation, but with surrender of our will to God's will, so that God will do in such things according to what seems good to Him and is useful to us. For He knows what is good; we do not know, as Paul also says [Rom. 8:26]. In this way, our good and faithful God shall retain the title of being a listener to prayer, as David preaches about Him here.

V. 2. Lord, save my soul from the lying mouths and false tongues.

This is what this psalm has to do with, because it prays for the pure doctrine and the holy word against the heretical tongues. But I said at the beginning that this psalm should not only be taken as an example to imitate or to teach, so that we learn what David did in this danger and what we also have to do, but that it should also be taken as a consolation against the immense distress, that wherever pure doctrine begins to blossom, it is to be taken as an example, Wherever pure doctrine begins to flourish, thieves and robbers soon rise up, whom Satan has aroused to be enemies of the wholesome doctrine, so that it may not seem to be something new to us that where the gospel has risen, Anabaptists and similar stains on religion have risen up.

but lay down our guard and watch, seeing that he who looks upon us neither sleeps nor ceases, and that we have to fight against the spirits of wickedness, with whom the saints have always been at war. Abel had Cain as his enemy, Isaac had Ishmael as his enemy, Jacob had Esau as his enemy. The author of this enmity is the devil, who persecutes God and His Word, not only with murder, but also with lies. That we know this is a great comfort, so that we do not lose heart in such dangers, but as soon as we are called to the service of the Word, we fortify ourselves against this danger and guard with the greatest zeal against security, which lying tongues and false lips do not permit. Therefore, we must be ready against those who practice the art of inference (dialecticantes) in a lying way and exercise their art of speech in a false way, not only to contradict boldly and to punish them, but also to pray diligently and to remember that the Lord is shown to us here by David as Savior, who alone can preserve us in such danger and bring the adversaries to ruin. For constant practice of the word and prayer must be connected with each other. A Hebrew expression is: "Save my soul", that is, save me.

V. 3. 4. What can the false tongue do to you? And what can it do? It is like sharp arrows of a strong man, like fire in junipers. 1)

Although these verses are easy to understand, they have been treated by the fathers in quite different ways, which is due to the unrhymed [Latin] translation. But especially Augustine struggles here very much. Quid dabitur tibi? he interprets in this way: It means: By what means will you be delivered? and he answers: Put arrows on me, or give me arrows, that is, the Gospel, and with these coals (carbones), that is, examples of the fathers. This he discusses in many words, but we will let it be worth as much as it is worth. For though it is not suitable, yet it is neither heretical nor harmful, if one takes a not suitable-

1) In the Vulgate: Quid detur tibi, aut quid apponatur tibi ad linguam dolosam? Sagittae potentis acutae, cum carbonibus desolatoriis.

The saint's words are to be tolerated, but let us follow the proper meaning, as it is proper for interpreters. These inconsistencies of the saints are to be tolerated that I say so, but we want to follow the actual sense, as it is proper for interpreters. Now these two following verses must be translated thus: Quid poterit in te lingua dolosa? aut quid efficiet? Est ut acutae sagittae potentis, ut ignis in juniperis.

The question serves to encourage him and, as it were, to provide him with an opportunity to accuse the false tongue, as he indeed describes in two excellent parables in the most forceful way how harmful the ungodly doctrine is and what God and spiritual men judge of it. First, he compares it to an arrow, not a blunt one, but a sharp one; then to one that is hurled, not by a weakling, but by a strong one, so that there is danger on both sides, both from the arrow that is ready to pierce and from the one that hurls the projectile with great force. Therefore, the devil, the father of heretics, is presented to us here as a skilled and strong warrior, who has fought against the church since the creation of human nature, and although he has often been defeated, yet he does not desist, but returns ever more earnestly and cautiously; and the more armed, holy, and learned are those against whom he wages war, the more strongly he sets himself against them, the more fiercely he attacks them.

Therefore, the Holy Spirit speaks here according to the sensation of the flesh, that is, according to the thoughts that the saints have in this danger, and calls an ungodly teacher an arrow in the hand of a strong man. For when one looks upon the adversaries' multitude, boldness, boasting, zeal, pretension, obstinacy, sagacity, cunning, with which they mock or slander that which is sacredly spoken, it seems as if they were oppressing the church, which in many respects is thought to be inferior and weaker. Therefore, it seems that Satan, like a projectile that no armor can stop, will gain the victory, but if you expect the end, you will experience the opposite. For just as the church, looking at the multitude of enemies and the small number of her own, because of

If Satan is afraid of their weakness and fears their downfall, he puffs himself up because of his success, since he sees that everything goes well for him at the first attempt. For the ungodly doctrine eats away at itself like a cancer, and grows enormously from hour to hour, so that in well-ordered congregations, as, by God's grace, this church of ours is, everything is soon turned upside down if any fanatic were given the opportunity to teach. In such a way, this arrow tears through. Why? Because it is driven forward by Satan, and the great multitude is, as it were, a workshop of Satan, because of the surfeit and contempt of what is there daily. 1) But because the heretics depart from the old and daily way of teaching, and always bring new things, what Moses says [Deut. 29:19] happens, "that the drunkard goeth with the thirsty," and these arrows break through by force.

Furthermore, this is also a common way of speaking in Scripture, that by "arrows" the word is understood, as can be seen from Ps. 45:6, and in our language "arrows from another's quiver" are called the speeches or advice that another has given. However, this name is actually given to false doctrine because, as I have said, it penetrates extremely easily. Thus, Muenzer's arrows were the inflammatory speeches by which he tried to put down the rulers, igniting the hearts of the simple by the example of Gideon, Joshua and similar people who, by God's command, drove the Philistines out of the land. He blamed the authorities for either following the word or not living according to the word; therefore he taught that no obedience was owed to them, that no interest was due to them 2c. These arrows pierced the minds of the simple. The arrows of the Anabaptists were that baptism was effective on believers, but infants did not believe, so they should not be baptized. Likewise, people must first be taught, and only then baptized.

1) In the original: auotiäiuni, which the editions (also the Erlangen) have wrongly changed to quotiäianum. - Cf. Tischreden, Cap. 20, s 6, Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XXII, 597.

According to the words: "Go and teach all nations and baptize them" [Matth. 28, 19]; but the children are baptized before they can understand the teaching, so they must be baptized again. Some have belittled the dignity of baptism by saying that water contributes nothing to the forgiveness of sins, while Christ in the rebirth of John 3:5 connects water directly with the Holy Spirit. Pierced by such arrows, the hearts of the inexperienced have accepted even such foolish errors.

The same happens to us with the Sacramentarians. For they also have their arrows with which they have wounded the hearts of many. Although they cannot deceive the sensible people, who know that one should not rely on any man's judgment, but simply stick to God's word, they nevertheless wound many careless and inexperienced people, because their arrows are sharp. They use the parables: I am the rock, I am a vine, I am the way. Afterwards they want the words of Christ to be understood in the same way: "This is my body", that is, the sign or image of the body. This they paint and adorn with sayings of the Fathers. Augustine describes it thus, that a sacrament is a sign of a sacred thing; therefore, here the sacrament is of the body of Christ, that is, the sign, not the body itself. But I ask you, what would they say if they either did not have this saying of Augustine, or if the term sacrament had never been used in Holy Communion? as we see also in secular writers who have used the term sacrament far differently.

This is almost the main thing that the wretched people bring to overthrow Christ's words. For that they gather together the testimonies of the fathers, and with great effort endeavor to show that the ancient church had this opinion: whom should this so move that he should therefore renounce the words of Christ? especially since we can prove not only that the ancients also spoke of the sacrament in the same way as we do, but also that if someone alone

If he were to base his argument on the reputation of the ancients, he would inevitably prove many things that obviously conflict with the pure doctrine. Therefore, this way is dangerous to reverse Christ's words, because the ancients seem to have spoken of them differently than we do, who say that Christ, as the words read, when he gave the bread, gave his body, and when he gave the wine, gave his blood. For we must judge of these words as the apostles judged when they heard these words from Christ: "Take, eat; this is my body." It is not necessary to think of what this or that one said when the matter was not yet in dispute. For we see that the fathers spoke quite differently in the strife than out of it.

Moreover, at the very time of the Fathers, on whose reputation they rely, a good part of the pure doctrine was corrupted, as the books of Origen in the Greek Church and those of Augustine and Jerome in the Latin Church testify. But that this opinion of ours has been confused by sophistical quibbles, and desecrated by ridiculous questions which the sacramentarians wantonly raise, what is that to us? For we retain the words of Christ without all dispute and rightly prefer them to the opinions and judgments of all men, even to those of the ancient church, just as they themselves refer to the ancient church, while they must confess that many sayings of the ancients prove our opinion. Because they interpret them in a sophistical way, they show by this very fact how easy it would be for us to do the same in the interpretation of the things they cite, if we had a desire to proceed in this way. But to them has happened what the Greek poet says: οά άδίκος λόγος νοσών έν αυτη φαρμάκων δειται σοφών.

[Because an unjust thing is sick in itself, it needs skillful remedies; or, An evil thing needs much mending]. And yet they pierce the hearts that are not well fastened, like arrows; for the simple are deceived by the fair semblance and color with which these neck-stiff-people adorn theirs. Therefore, it is necessary that we combine right doctrine with prayer to extinguish the fiery arrows of the wicked, as Paul seems to have called them on the basis of this passage, Eph. 6:16. This is the first simile of the arrows in the hand of the strong, which can be easily understood by these examples.

The other simile also has an excellent indication of the power and speed [of false teaching]. But here we need Hebrew grammar; for they do not call "coals" burnt wood, even if it is extinguished, as we are wont to do in our language, but the flame itself, as the 18th Psalm [v. 13 in the Vulgate] calls the lightnings fulgura cum carbonibus of color, because they seem to be nothing but flames. But he uses the simile of juniper because this tree, besides very dense foliage, also has a great greasiness. Therefore, it is easily seized by fire and burns very well. It is therefore believed that these fiery arrows cause a great conflagration. For they are not shot into water, but into a substance that is very easily ignited, as the Scripture also speaks in other places of a great conflagration: "Like a fire of thorns among pots," when it wants to indicate such a flame or conflagration, which spreads exceedingly easily and widely. This, then, is the opinion that men are turned away from the right doctrine by such lies, which are very powerful, as he who first stirred up the controversy about the Lord's Supper, kindled such a fire with that little word that even nowadays it is not yet completely quenched. Afterwards others joined in, pouring oil on it as it were, so that the fire of their arrows had its course among the people with great rapidity, as it were in a forest of junipers.

Therefore, this painting is a kind of lament that the tongue of heretics sweeps through everything with such great success and so suddenly, as it happened to Paul. Since he had happily established many churches with very great work, immediately after he had turned his back, all of Asia was turned by the false prophets.

have been. What is the cause of this evil, especially since the fire of the Holy Spirit is so slowly kindled? Undoubtedly this, that the heretics deviate from the Word and bring such things that seem to appeal to reason. This is the fatness which easily catches fire, and which has in its nature the tinder for fire. Therefore she is fond of these arrows and considers them the most delightful medicine, indeed, fire sent from heaven. Therefore this is the misfortune at all times, that those, what godly teachers build up with much effort, suddenly overturn, because they find the right lid for such a pot. For the flesh hears and accepts gladly that which it can understand. But because the word teaches things that have not entered the heart of any man, reason quickly turns away from the truth and seizes what it likes and seems likely.

But this is taught for our comfort, that the false tongue is never moved without causing a conflagration, just as the color of the tongue is the color of fire. Now this fire is a good one when it teaches God's word and the faith in the church; on the other hand, it is an evil fire when it departs from the word and teaches what is according to reason. This we must see and tolerate, that if anyone sits against them and admonishes them, they ridicule him and persecute him with deadly hatred: They persecute him with deadly hatred and become angrier every day. Therefore, we should comfort ourselves with these examples that this is foretold, written and pictured in such a way, as this Psalm testifies, and give thanks to God at least for the people we still keep; then also for the gift that we can judge that such teachings are Satan's arrows, however beautiful their appearance may be, and agree with the wisdom and righteousness of the flesh; likewise that they are a fierce fire, as it is wont to be in the juniper, which we must all extinguish with all our strength.

These are the spiritual battles, which the world does not know are much greater than any physical battle, in which equals generally fight with equals, that is, men with men. But here we, who are few in number, are not only over-

We are not only confronted with many who are well equipped with malice and power, but we also have to fight with Satan and the spirits of the pants by which they are driven. Therefore, we need God's help and the protection of the angel Michael to overthrow them, as it is written in Revelation Cap. 12, 7. And this is the reason why in such danger the prayer and the groaning of the godly is necessary, so that we say: O Lord, we would like to teach, but help us also. We have this hope in view of the great success and speed with which the ungodly doctrine is spread, that what comes quickly will also perish quickly; then no heresy has ever remained victorious to the end, but the victory has remained for the word. Cain, Ishmael, Arius, Manichaeus and all the others have perished, so have the Gentiles and the Jews who resisted the Gospel perished, also the Pabstacy is now perishing, but "the word of the Lord abideth for ever" [Isa. 40:8], according to that golden saying of the Psalm [Ps. 129:2]: "Often mine enemies have pressed me, but they have not prevailed against me."

But here it may occur to you who these heretical or false tongues were in the time of David, against whom he prays here. In the kingdom there was Ahitophel, there was Shimei, there were many others who reviled him and inflamed the hearts of the subjects against him with cunning advice. But it is sufficiently evident that David is talking about a more serious danger. Here the question is what kind of danger it was. Although the sacred histories sufficiently show how much the true prophets always had to contend with the false teachers, as the history of Jeremiah teaches, David himself indicated here and there in the Psalms the matter for which he had to fight the most. The fiftieth Psalm does this beautifully, in which David preaches against the merit that the unbelieving Jews expected from the sacrifices. For as it is today, so it was at all times that people hoped to become righteous by their works. This opinion increased the sacrifices in the people of Israel quite extraordinarily, of which the testimony was present that they were commanded and approved by God. For they had confidence that through these sacrifices sins would be blotted out, even if their hearts were impure and without faith, just as our opponents praise, keep and defend their sacrifice of the Mass with this title, that it proves its power in itself, that is, by performing the work (ex opere operato).

Therefore, against these arrows, David taught earnestly that one could not do anything great for God by sacrificing an ox to Him, since God not only created and gave the ox, but is the Lord of all creatures, and has no need of anything, let alone an ox. Therefore, those who want to sacrifice rightly must acknowledge their sins and the goodness of God, who promises blessing through the blessed seed, and give thanks for it, praise God, call upon and praise His name 2c. Thus, David refutes this heresy of works in the passage tremendously. Most other heresies have been similar to this one. For, as is also seen in Jeremiah, not only did this happen, that the Jews worshipped the gods of the Gentiles, but they left the temple and ran to the places where the fathers of old had sacrificed, although the Lord had appointed as the place for sacrifice and prayer the tabernacle that was erected in Jerusalem. Some chose, according to their own counsel, groves and hills where they sacrificed.

Since all this was contrary to the will and word of God, but was done with great zeal by the idolaters, it was necessary for the godly to teach against it, so that people would not either choose a way to worship God, or follow another way of righteousness than that which was to be given through the blood of the Son of God, whom John calls the Lamb for this reason, because he was to be the atoning sacrifice or the sacrifice by which the sins of the whole world were to be blotted out. So we see that there has always been the same dispute about the same things between the false and the true church, and also the same dangers. Therefore we must also

We are to use the same means of healing, that we may give glory to Christ through right doctrine, and that we may exhort men to the practice of the word; then that we may pray with David against the false tongues and the lying lips. Now the prophet adds a lament to the prayer:

V. 5. woe is me, that I am a stranger among Meshech; I must dwell among the tents of Kedar. 1)

Moreover, that this is badly translated [in the Vulgate], the order of the verses has also been confused. Therefore, let us translate the text thus: Woe is me, that I am a stranger among Mesech, that I must dwell among the tents of Kedar. This verse has been interpreted from the desire to be redeemed from this body, as if he desired to depart and be with Christ [Phil. 1, 23.], and actually attributed this desire to the monks; but this is not only unsuitable, but also tasteless and quite unrhymed. For the meaning is this: He has hitherto mentioned his danger and that of the church, and asked for salvation; now he adds a lamentation that the church is in the midst of enemies who dispute the doctrine by force and by cunning. So now he says: "In this danger there is nothing I can do but these three things: first, that I teach with the greatest fidelity; second, that I pray with the greatest zeal; third, that I suffer. I teach so that the word/public may remain; I pray so that the word may be preserved and gain the victory, but in the meantime, until it gains the victory, one must suffer what there is to suffer. Whoever does not want to do this must inevitably be defeated. Thus in our time we have suffered the Sacramentarians, the Anabaptists and the Epicureans; we have also suffered the suppression of the word, which has been done by force and by cunning, and also among us are many, especially the noble centaurs, who with a quite sure mind not only despise the whole office of preaching, but also wish that it were abolished. This is truly very bitter for all the godly who have to see and suffer this and do not change it.

1) Vulgate: Heu initū, Huia ineolatus meng prolovMtus est, liaditavi cmin tmytantidus Leckar, ruulturQ iueola tuit aniruu raea.

can. Therefore, we say with David: Woe is me that I must dwell among Mesech.

"Kedar" is Arabia, which lay to the south of the Jews; of "Mesech" some want to say that it is Italy, but it seems to me to be a people which was north of the Jews, as today in the Orient the Tartars. Furthermore, both peoples are savage, ill-mannered, cruel and without all humanity; moreover, they are ready to flee and live in huts or wagons after the manner of nomads. By a metonymy 2) he thus designates by these peoples the enemies of the church, which the church had both then and would have hereafter in the New Testament. For I would rather interpret it in a general way than to draw it as a prophecy to our time, although it is true that the church also has Kedar and Mesech as enemies today, that is, the Turk and the Tartars, the servants of Mahomet. So the meaning is: I have to comfort myself with hope and patience. I would like the churches to be at peace and the shepherds to agree with each other, but this does not happen. Therefore, I will command God the whole matter in prayer and will teach faithfully. In the meantime, these aversions must be borne so that we may overcome evil with good. We see, then, that the most miserable state is the teaching state, because there, in addition to the other misfortunes brought upon the teachers by unbelievers, this must also be borne, that false brethren corrupt the teaching and make the church restless. But this we suffer for the sake of the Lord in heaven, and sing with David that we dwell among Meshech and Kedar, the rapacious and cruel nations.

V. 6. It becomes long to my soul to dwell with those who hate peace.

I have said above that also the verses are confused by the carelessness of the interpreter. Now the sixth verse reads like this: Long is my soul's stay among those who keep the peace. Here he clearly indicates what torments him, namely that he not only has to live among thieves and murderers and suffer them, but also to suffer for a long time.

2) Metonymy - an interchange of names; here "Mesech" and "Kedar" instead of: savage, cruel peoples.

be forced. For this is what the evil spirit is wont to do: which he is not able to conquer by the greatness or quantity of the temptations, he overcomes them by weariness. Therefore, many who are inexperienced in spiritual warfare fight bravely in the beginning, but in the end they become weak and fall away. David also complains about this danger. Long, he says, will be my stay among those who hate peace, that is, who trouble the churches, and will not cease from writing and shouting until they have made a confusion. It is therefore a twofold pity: that such people are both powerful, as he said above, and persistent, thinking to gain victory at last by their obstinacy. Thus Job was not broken down by one kind of misfortune, but as one messenger after another came, one misfortune pressing upon another and seizing him, his heart gradually began to be troubled. This is the wickedness of Satan. Therefore, we should give up hope of peace altogether as long as we live here, and be sure that if we overcome one kind of challenge today, another will follow tomorrow. If you take one objection (argumentum) from an Anabaptist, a Sacramentarian, a Mintian today, tomorrow he will think up and bring ten others. For the heart of Satan is exceedingly fertile in lies.

But here behold the cunning of the world. The Holy Spirit calls the heretics haters of peace; but this is the very name they drive upon us. It is you, they say, who confound Israel, for before you arose, zeal for religion flourished, there was peace; but what is now but dreadful confusion? In this way, those who confuse the churches accuse the right church, but they call themselves lovers of peace and harmony. This is what one must suffer. Therefore, we must be satisfied with the testimony of our conscience, which excuses us before God for seeking the peace of the churches, which those people even annul, as follows:

V. 7. I keep peace, but when I speak, they make war.

This is the testimony of my conscience that I am peaceable and seek peace. From where did these riots and this war come from? Of course, it is my fault, but it is not my fault. For if I were to keep silent and let these disturbers of the peace speak and do as they please, peace would remain and they would not do anything against me. But how can we keep silent what we have seen, what we have heard [1 John 1:1], even what we are commanded to preach, not in the chambers but on the housetops? For thus says Christ [Marc. 16, 15.], "Go ye, and preach the gospel to every creature," likewise [Matt. 5, 15.], "No man hideth the light under a bushel." This makes the word in our mouths like a glowing coal, which cannot be held, but which compels us to open our mouths. Hence arise those troubles, that they abrogate the commandment of God, and want us to be silent. But why do they not rather follow ours? This should be our comfort in such danger, that we are peaceable, even though we receive the judgment as if we had given them the cause for unrest. It is not easy to overcome those troubles, since either the devil or the wise people make them great and blame the cause of them on us, that we have caused them by resisting too stubbornly; we should rather have given in than let the hearts become so bitter, as Erasmus says in his Diatribe that there are very many diseases for which it is better not to touch them at all than to try a remedy with such great danger. This is wisely said, and we ourselves see enough the harm of such aversions, we see the enormous contempt of the word, we see the licentiousness and lack of discipline, which was not so great under the papacy. But what does that matter to us? For that we speak, that we fight with the word, we do by command, and it is not fitting that we should degrade the reputation of the Lord who commands us to do so. Here, then, is what Christ says in the Gospel, that the house is at peace as long as the strong man alone holds it [Luc. 11, 21. f.]; but when a stronger man comes, then there is unrest. But why does not the strong man rather give way to the stronger?

Therefore, this is our consolation, that no matter how much turmoil there may be in the church, we can

We can, however, rely on the testimony of our conscience that we do nothing other than speak. But we do not do this according to our will, but by God's command according to our ordinary profession. Therefore they do not accuse our life, not our works; only the doctrine has to bear the guilt, which is not ours but Christ's. If, then, they become unwilling for this reason, what is that to us? For we must speak, we must confess God the Father, His Son, Jesus Christ, and the Holy Spirit; men must be taught rightly, not only about the use of the sacraments, but also about their nature, what they are in truth, and what they are not in truth. For if this is not taught and interpreted, what will remain of the kingdom of Christ? Therefore, sooner than anything should perish from the kingdom of Christ and his glory, may not only peace perish, but also heaven and earth. These wise men do not see this danger. That is why they make so much of the loss of peace that seemed to be under the papacy, which was nevertheless necessary. We, on the other hand, want to praise the glory of God and the fruits that grow out of pure preaching, and despise the words with which these epicureans complain to us, who can praise nothing but peace and tranquility. Behold, they say, how many evils have suddenly come upon us! From where? Certainly through the teaching of the Gospel. For before there was nothing of the kind; there were no sacramentaries, no Anabaptists, no rebels; now these things have got so out of hand that it seems there will be no end to them. - What then do you [papists] advise us to do? - To this advice these admirers of tranquility and the Epicureans take refuge.

But open your eyes and look not only at the outward damage, but also at how much unrest there was in the papacy, how many and how great abominations of ungodliness there were. Nowhere was even one pure word heard about sin, about grace, about the merit of Christ and faith, about the practice of holy works, about the authorities, about other estates. Everything was sullied with harmful

The same is true of the glosses. Besides, how great was the desecration of the masses, how great a fraud with indulgences, purgatory and similar abominations, which were devised for the sake of profit! To me at least, when I look at the papacy as it was before the preaching of our Gospel, people seem to have been deliberately and wilfully thrown towards the devil and eternal damnation by the godless teachers. For as far as the ministry of preaching was concerned, the whole doctrine was in abeyance, except for the text of Scripture, which was neglected, and the administration of the sacraments, although one of these was not only mutilated, but the people were also never properly instructed about the proper use of it.

Now judge here which of the two is the best. For there is unrest there, and here there is also unrest. Is it not a thousand times better to keep the speech or the word of God than to lose the word and to keep peace, even if, as I say, it were a heavenly peace? I, at least, would not like to live without the word, even in paradise; but with the word it is easy to live even in hell, as we live, as it were, in hell in this world and comfort ourselves only with the hope that the word of God shows us, and through this hope overcome harm and cross of all kinds. Therefore, we must get used to the fact that we do not look with the Epicureans only at the visible troubles, and neglect the invisible troubles (which are, after all, the greatest and eternal), then it will happen that the troubles aroused by the sectarians will seem to be easier. It would be desirable that there should be no unrest, but since this cannot be obtained, it is better that a thousand Anabaptists, a thousand Sacramentans, a thousand rebels should arise than that confusion and impure doctrine should run through all the churches at the same time. For even though there is confusion now, there are still some churches that are in a good state of disarray, which did not exist under the papacy and during that peace. Now, at least in some places, the teaching is pure and the sacraments are administered purely, whereas at that time neither the teaching was pure nor the sacraments were administered properly.

Therefore, let us keep this consolation, which the Holy Spirit shows us here and which is needed above all by those who teach rightly: namely, that we are not the cause of agitations, hatred, unrest and rebellion. There must indeed be agitations, there must be people like Lucianus, 1) despisers of religion, disturbers of the churches; but blessed are those who are not the cause of these evils, who are teachers of peace, who seek peace and love with all zeal. Among the number of these people today, by God's grace, are also us, whatever the world may think of us. If we had felt like increasing or favoring unrest, how easy it would have been for us to keep up with those who either hostile our teachings or bring up new ones. But this was our only concern, and it still is, that the people would be taught purely and correctly about Christ's merit and grace, and likewise about the sub-

The pledges and seals of grace, which we call sacraments. In this endeavor, let us also pray to the Lord that He may graciously preserve us in this until our last breath, amen.

In this way, the Psalm paints for us the heretics and the fate of the true church, so that we arm ourselves against these dangers and give thanks to God for this holy consolation that He does not attribute everything that is stirred up to those who teach, but to the Word. The word, however, is not ours, but Christ's, therefore we can be sure that whatever may finally come about through pure teaching. Those who love peace may remain silent, but we will confidently proclaim the great deeds of God and will not be disobedient in our profession. When evil tongues and unrest arise, let us pray with David against them and surely command God his church. He will give the word to his church and consume the ungodly tongues with the conflagration that they think will burn the church. Amen.

1) Lucianus of Samosata, around 180 AD, mocked all religion.

The one hundred and twenty-first Psalm.

I lift my eyes out. *)

The previous psalm was a prayer for the preservation of pure doctrine against the tongues of heretics and ungodly opinions, for this is the greatest and main battle of Satan against the church; but I hold that this psalm was composed to admonish the faithful. For it contains the doctrine of faith. But faith is the knowledge of things that cannot be seen and that must be hoped for, and it clings to the promise and the word of God. But because the word of God is above all human comprehension, and what it promises is either inconsistent or impossible or even unbelievable to reason, faith is the knowledge of things that cannot be seen and must be hoped for.

For this reason, constant exhortations are necessary for those who have begun to believe, so that they may be stirred up against the flesh, which contends against faith and the Word, lest the spirit, weighed down as it were by this burden of the flesh, be completely unmindful of invisible things and become completely absorbed in present and visible things. For our life is moved to and fro under constant storms, like those who sail on the sea. For every day we are tempted by the winds of temptation, as our hearts are troubled either by riches, or by the darkness of the sea.

*The first words of the Psalms from here to the 134th Psalm are not to be regarded as text, but as names of the Psalms, which belong to the superscription. For it was customary to name the Psalms with their initial "words"; e.g. the 118th Psalm was called the Confitemini, because it begins in Latin with this word.

The first one is the one who is in the middle of the world, the one who is in poverty, the one who is in honor, the one who is in shame, the one who is in sadness, the one who is in joy. From this follow much heavier temptations (passiones), namely either security or despair. Therefore, when these storms blow, they must be resisted by the exhortation of the Word, and faith in the Word must be insisted upon.

In this way, I understand this psalm to be, as it were, a teaching by which we are reminded that in this life faith must be exercised continually through exhortations, lest, taken up with the cares of this time, we forget the eternal goods.

V. 1. I lift up mine eyes unto the mountains from whence cometh my help.

What he says in front of the mountains of salvation includes a contradiction, as every doctrine of faith and every promise includes a contradiction, if one looks at the flesh. The godly are promised that the Lord will be with them; but if one looks at the outward appearance, Christ also seems to be abandoned on the cross. In this way, a very beautiful contrast is also shown by this whole psalm, as if the prophet wanted to say: When trials and tests of faith occur, one runs here, the other there; many consolations, many helps are sought. If one thinks that he needs friends, he runs to the friends; if he needs the prince, he runs to the prince. Thus you can see that among my people some run to BethEl, others to Gilgal, others to BethAven, as if they were the mountains of salvation, as among the papacy some run to Rome, others to Compostella, still others elsewhere. For countless are the different kinds of protection and consolation that a heart believes and seeks when it finds itself in a difficult situation, and, what is to be wondered at, it admits much more easily and more readily another protection and consolation than the one and true consolation of God alone. This is the praise of faith, that it looks up in danger to the one mountain of help, which is in Jerusalem, and lets go of the protection of all other mountains. In this way, he sees the wicked as it were with a scornful eye.

Eyes that left the faith and the true shelter of divine mercy that was then at Jerusalem and sought their help on other mountains.

Similar is what we have seen in the papacy. For there were various sects of monks: one kept the Rule of Augustine, another the Rule of Benedictus, another the Rule of Francis; but by their vows they sought nothing but the consolation that they would attain eternal life. The fear of the wrath of God and the anxiety of conscience seemed to them to be removed by those consolations. This is a constant habit of human nature at all times. Therefore David says: Others leave the temple, have an abhorrence of Mount Zion, but I remain in the simple way of true religion and faith, which is on the mountain of salvation, which the LORD Himself has appointed. He calls it a mountain of help in order to reject and condemn all other mountains, which have a semblance of help, as there is also visible help in idolatrous worship, but they still do not have true help. Thus the Jews said that Baal helps more readily than the Lord in the temple. Therefore they cry out in Jeremiah [Cap. 44, 16-18]: We will sacrifice to the queen of heaven, but we will not obey your speech. For since the time that we desisted from sacrificing unto the queen of heaven, the sword, famine 2c. hath taken us. So they left the temple and the true worship and fell into ungodliness.

But, you say, why does God allow idolatry and ungodly worship to flourish? Of course, it is so that He may test us to see whether our faith is true, whether we truly believe in and worship One God according to the Ten Commandments. Idolatry is fine, but only for a while. Thus Ahaz says [2 Chron. 28, 23.], "The gods of the kings of Syria help them; therefore will I sacrifice unto them, that they may help me also." But what does the text say? "The gods of Syria were a case to him and to all Israel." That. 1) is the end of this false refuge. In

1) Erlanger: His statt: Hie.

In this way, gold or mammon helps people: he is a great God who often saves, makes happy, inflates, gives hope; but for how long? Of course, only as long as we live here, but in death he not only abandons his servants, but also plunges them into hell. Therefore, whatever human and visible consolation there is, it is all uncertain and deceives man, and yet it torments the hearts in a strange way and leads them into such darkness that they do not care about God, who is an eternal God and does not tickle with vain consolation, as the world's protection does, but fills them with eternal joy, while the world's joy hardly lasts a moment. For thus He says [John 16:22], "I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man shall take from you." So we are to learn to abide with our GOD and with the invisible consolation. Even if there is something to suffer, if we seem to be forsaken and without joy, it will happen that when God will show Himself that He still cares for us, we will also consider "that this time's suffering is not worthy of the glory that will be revealed in us" [Rom. 8:18], as Paul comforts.

This is therefore the opinion of this verse, that faith is the knowledge of invisible things, which nevertheless must be hoped for, so that we do not think it is a mere speculation, like that of Thomas about the angels. It is the things that we must hope for that we experience, namely, a good conscience, a cheerful mind, an unconquerable faith that stands firm against poverty, envy, the aversions of the world, against error, and even against death. In this way one must learn the nature of faith, namely that it is a will, or a knowledge, or an expectation that hangs on the word of God; this word shows and proves invisible help, which is certain and infallible, but must nevertheless be expected; although it is delayed, it will nevertheless come. It is not necessary to assign a place, time or person to it, because it is invisible, but nevertheless certain. This is where the words of the Psalm really belong: "I lift up mine eyes unto the mountains, from whence cometh my hull."

Here he indicates that he lacks the pod and yet looks up to the mountains in the hope of help and awaits the invisible assistance.

This is the way we have to behave. I do not see what I shall eat, what I shall drink, how I shall pay the expenses, I do not see how I shall escape the danger of disgrace; therefore the heart throbs as if we were completely deprived of help. Here we must believe that help is certainly prepared, although we do not know when it will come; therefore we must believe and expect. But here we learn how difficult it is to believe, since we have to determine something against what we see, hear and feel. I have often been in the gravest dangers, when it seemed as if the whole world had conspired against my head. For the pope, who is my and Christ's enemy, did not cease to stir up everything against me that there was anywhere in violence and terror. Here the world and reason would rather have advised that I should keep silent than that I should teach under such great danger. For it sees nowhere the help of the Lord, which is invisible and hidden from the eyes of the world; therefore it thinks only what it sees, namely the downfall. But I am silent here about my mind, I will not say anything about my faith and my hope, even though I have often been troubled by these dangers: but the outcome shows that the help, which was invisible and hidden from my eyes and the eyes of the whole world, appeared, so that not only did nothing happen to me from my most powerful enemies, but also that the word of the gospel was spread further and stronger every day through new opportunities. Since the flesh cannot see the invisible, we must get used to the fact that faith says in all dangers: I will lift up my eyes to the mountains; there is certain and ready help, however little I see it, and the flesh or reason sees and expects something else. Thus, these words of faith beautifully depict the nature of faith, what it is and what it is.

But here one asks why he says "to the mountains" and not: to GOD; then, why he speaks in the majority, and not of One mountains, because this plural seems to speak the word of idolatry. To the first question I answer that this and similar passages (as [Ps. 20, 3]: "He sends you help from the sanctuary") actually belong to our theology, which teaches that God wants to be heard, that he should be worshipped, hoped for, prayed to according to his words, and not according to our thoughts. Thus He says in the second book of Moses [Cap. 20, 24.], "In what place I will make remembrance of My name, there will I come unto thee, and bless thee." Therefore all Jews, in whatever place or country they were, were bound to the temple at Jerusalem, so that even when they prayed in their house, they had to turn their eyes toward Zion. The prayer of the pious in Babylon far from the Temple and Jerusalem pleased God, but because they sang and prayed to God, who dwelt on Mount Zion and had set up his tabernacle there. And this was the reason why the prophets condemned the sacrifices and other worship services that were instituted or performed in other places. For it was not enough to say, O GOD, who hast brought thy people out of Egypt, for so also did Jeroboam call GOD, by the right name of GOD, and perhaps prayed more and more fervently than those who were in Jerusalem in the temple. For this is what hypocrisy is wont to do, and idolatry is much more fervent than true godliness. But why did God not like such prayers? It was because the other mountains were not chosen; they did not have the word of God. Therefore, God wanted to hear the prayers only in the One Place, so that they would at least turn to Jerusalem with their eyes and heart when they could not be there with their body. Therefore, when Daniel wanted to pray in Babylon, he turned to Jerusalem, not only because Solomon had asked in his prayer that when they were once driven into exile, they would turn to this place in their prayer, that God would hear them and bring them back to the land, but because God wanted to be worshipped in the place that He Himself had chosen, so that He would increase all arbitrary and self-chosen devotion.

We, in the new testament, are of the be

We are freed from the restriction to external places, as Christ says [John 4:21]: "The time is coming when you will worship neither in this mountain nor in Jerusalem. But it is Christ JESUS who is our spiritual place, because God has decreed that He will not hear anything except through Him, as Christ says [Jn. 16:23], "If you will ask anything of the Father in My name." Through him, therefore, we offer to GOTte the farrows of our lips [Hos. 14:3.]. Therefore, apart from Christ, there is nothing that we should believe, hope for, or obtain. This is the most important part of our doctrine, so we must hold fast to it. There have been many who wanted to please God apart from Christ. Thus Arius, though he took away Christ's divinity, still wanted to be regarded as having the right God. Our monks believe that they please God through their vows and their monastic customs. These all do not lift up their eyes to the mountains on which David looks, that is, they do not look at Christ alone, although this must be held, that Christ alone is our only place, our time and all circumstances that are required for prayer, so that, just as the Jews had no other sanctuary than that at Jerusalem, so also we have no other sanctuary than this One, Jesus, the Son of Mary.

In this way I answer the first question, that David binds the prayer to the holy place, which is ordered to Jerusalem, where the memorial of the name of God was, which he had founded himself [2 Mos. 20, 24.]. Before that time it had been in Shiloh and Gibeah, where the tabernacle had been. In those places he heard the prayers and accepted the sacrifices; but in other places he accepted neither prayers nor sacrifices. For there was not the remembrance of the name of the Lord, which he had given himself, but the remembrance of the name of idolatry, which the godless Jews had invented for themselves. Now, however, in the New Testament, the name of God dwells in Christ and the Church, which is One Body with Christ, where the Word of God is, baptism, the Lord's Supper and the practice of obedience to God. My answer to the second question is that,

- Although he seems to prophesy of the church of the New Testament, in which there are many mountains, not just one, that is, God in Christ hears the prayers of believers everywhere, and prayer and worship are not tied to a particular outward place, it is possible that the prophet uses the plural, either for the sake of reverence, or because there were two mountains in the city of Jerusalem, Mount Zion to the south, and Mount Moriah, on which was the temple. But as I said before, the plural also indicates a contrast, as if to say: The idolaters run to their mountains, but I will stay with my mountains, that is, with the one mountain of the temple, which serves me instead of all the mountains.

But that he adds: "I lift up mine eyes unto the mountains from whence cometh my help" is clearly a word of faith. For the flesh thinks that from these mountains come the devil, the cross, and harm of all kinds. Therefore, the flesh does not call them mountains of help, but mountains of abandonment, because it sees that for the sake of religion it is oppressed by the hatred of the world, by poverty, by temptations of the flesh, by terror 2c. This seems to be an abandonment, a rejection from the face of God and a descent into hell. Faith fights against this judgment of the flesh, and judges not by what it feels and sees, but by the word that God speaks. This commands to believe invisible things, and to become completely, that I say, invisible, so that you believe riches in poverty, joy in sadness, help in abandonment, and a certain and eternal grace in being rejected, as David does in this passage. He is overwhelmed by misfortune, feels no help in it, and yet he says: "I lift up my eyes to the mountains, from which help comes to me. One must therefore lift up one's eyes, not fix them on present adversity. For this means to agree with your eyes and ears, that is, to hear your flesh, which sings to you of the wrath of God, of being forsaken, of the greatness of the danger from which there is no salvation. Therefore, the eyes must be lifted up to the mountains of God.

And the ears must be directed to the voice of the Lord, which speaks and promises that help will come from these mountains. Although it is invisible for a time, it is nevertheless certain and fully ready. Those who are in riches, honor and dignity do not live in invisible things, therefore they easily exalt themselves in their hearts; but those who lack these things and suffer in body and soul, let them lift up their eyes, that the help which is invisible may become visible to them, as it is promised in the word.

These are the words of a man who is experienced in spiritual things, who has felt what we feel, namely, that our senses feel it burdensome when we see no help in abandonment, when we suffer not wealth but poverty, not honor but shame. Under these evils, the heart is like a very heavy burden that presses down the eyes and the head, so that it neither thinks nor sees anything except earthly things. So he exhorts by his example that we should then lift up our eyes and look toward the invisible things, of which the word promises that they are in complete readiness. In this way, this psalm explains the nature of faith. Now follows an interpretation, as it were, of which mountains he speaks:

V. 2. My help comes from the Lord who made heaven and earth.

I am talking about the mountains, not which the physical eyes see. For who could either see so keenly or be so wise that he could see with eyes that Mount Moria is the holy mountain? The eyes see a heap of earth, but they do not see the holiness that is placed on it, because the word of the Lord is there that God said He would dwell there, because He established the memorial of His name in that place, that He would be found there and not in heaven. For he who has departed from that place has not been able to find or take hold of God in heaven, just as, after God has revealed Himself in the man Christ, we rightly ask and believe that all those who do not take hold of this man born of Mary cannot take hold of God in general, but rather that they cannot take hold of God in heaven.

Although they say that they believe in God, the Creator of heaven and earth, they in fact believe in an idol of their heart, because apart from Christ there is no true God. Therefore, David does not look at the mountains of Jerusalem with bodily eyes, as a cow looks at her stall, but with the eyes of the spirit, that God dwells there through His Word. Therefore, these mountains are no longer clay or earth, but mountains of the Lord and a fullness of the Godhead, so that apart from these mountains nothing that is God (nihil Dei) can be found. Therefore, he rightly says that his help comes from these mountains, that is, from God who dwells there, as we believe that Christ is the throne of grace in whom everything is found, but apart from him nothing is found.

But that he does not simply say "of the Lord", but adds the phrase: "who made heaven and earth", indicates the contrast, in order to reject all other protection, which people seek. Mammon, too, is a god, that is, he is worshipped by men as a god, and he also helps men at times; but what is he good for if there is a lack of grain? No one can satisfy a hungry stomach with money. So also, what good is it in drought? What use is it in sickness of the body? If mammon cannot help in these physical ills, what can it do when the conscience is tormented by sins and death? Mammon, then, is such a piecemeal giver of joy that it could not be piecemeal: it only delights the eyes, like a hastily painted table, to such an extent that among the Germans the saying has also arisen: Geldrede traurige Rede; while, on the other hand, antics of the very smallest things are more exhilarating. To these and similar aids, which the world seeks, David now opposes the Lord, who not only made gold and silver, who not only made the fruits, the water, and heaven and earth, that is, the angels, men, and all creatures, and also forgiveness of sins, faith, righteousness, gladness, and peace of heart, together with eternal life itself. This, says David, is my almighty God.

I ask for the help of the Lord, who is able to give me not only health for a few years, but also a life with a calm conscience, and after this life, eternal life. I ask this Lord for help, who can give me not only health for a few years, but a life with a clear conscience, and after this life, eternal life. 2) In this life he gives me to despise death and all the rages of the world.

In this way the prophet heats himself up and sharpens his faith for us as an example, so that we too may esteem our gifts and our hope great. For if the peasants can make their pennies great, which last only a moment and cannot help in the slightest dangers, if they can rise and puff themselves up because of their riches, why should we not also be puffed up in confidence in the so great God who made heaven and earth, who has everything in his hand that is necessary for this and your future life? But because these are invisible things, they are generally neglected by us. But we must learn that even if we have to fast and miss this help for a while, we still hope that it will surely come.

V. 3. He will not let your foot slip, and he who guards you does not sleep. 3)

This [the Vulgate text] would be more correctly expressed by the future tense: Non dabit, ut moveatur pes tuus, neque dormitabit, qui custodit te. But this verse is connected with the previous ones. For since the prophet has here given an exhortation to faith, he is intent on using these words as promises to urge and exhort people to hold on to their confidence in divine help. But it is extremely necessary not only to exhort others

2) In all editions: seä aeternam vitam ennr seenritate eonseientiae, et po^t Kurie vitaur. Instead of this we would expect: secl vitam enm sseenritate eonseientiae, et post karre vitam aeteriranr vrtain. According to this conjecture we have translated, because the expression: "the eternal life with calm conscience" seems to us to be inconsistent, and the words: et post karre vitam would float in the air. The old translator has helped himself by omitting the waiting "enrn seenritate eonseientiae et".

3) Vulgate: Xon riet irr eornnrrotationem pecieur tuunr, nec^{ne} ckornttet, <ni eustoait te.

but also to ourselves, because of the visible and present dangers and plagues. For since that which grieves is present, while that which comforts is absent, it is necessary that we be encouraged by the word to perseverance and patience, as long as that which afflicts us continues to be present. For this experience must be connected with the teaching. For our eyes are far too dull to penetrate to the invisible things and see the end of the present tribulations. Therefore, nature is always looking around for a way to be saved, and since it does not see it, as it is hidden and invisible, it is martyred. Therefore exhortations are necessary, so that this (I may be permitted to speak so) brevity of nature, or the narrowness of our heart, may be enlarged, made greater, or prolonged. This can be done by the one who sees the end of our temptations; his word must be heard, our heart must not be heard, which only feels and sees the beginning of the temptations, but does not see the end of the suffering.

Therefore, the Holy Spirit now makes use of the art of speech, so that the exhortation becomes all the more urgent. And here we must first remember that if the opposite were not to happen and be felt, this exhortation would be in vain. For if the end were to come immediately with the challenge, or if the Lord were to give soon, when we begin to need something, what would be the use of promising anything? So there is no need of teaching in the things we know beforehand, nor of exhortation when we are without danger and temptation. That he therefore says, "The Lord will not let thy foot slip," evidently expresses this concern that hearts in temptation are in danger of being utterly ruined and forsaken. Here, therefore, exhortation is needed so that faith will not be completely extinguished.

Reason judges that it is abandoned, and experiences what a certain man of war used to say, that no one was more in danger and harm than those who served God and the emperor faithfully. Since this is so the word of faith must be applied. First of all, it says "that all who want to live godly in Christ must suffer persecution" [2 Tim. 3:12]. It holds up Christ as an example, who through the cross entered into glory, and reminds us "that we should be conformed to the image of His Son" [Rom. 8:17, 29], that is, "suffer with, if we would also be exalted with to glory"; hence tribulation and the cross are present. Then the word also shows what one must do and what remedies one should seek in such tribulations, namely, that one must pay attention to the word; this divides the challenge into beginning and end, that is, it promises that the challenge will not last forever, as our heart judges. Furthermore, the word "beginning" means that the temptation lasts only for a moment. Thus Christ calls it [Joh. 16, 16.] "a little one" and compares [v. 21.] the tribulations of His own with birth, where death and life are very close to each other. For the woman, who had already despaired of her and the child's life, immediately forgets all pain as soon as the child is born. So also Paul says [Rom. 8, 18.]: "Sufferings of this time are not worthy of the glory that shall be revealed in us."

You must follow this judgment of the Word and not your sense, which judges that the evil is infinite and in fact makes an infinite circle or an infinite line out of a mathematical point. Our reason is so unlearned in this divine and heavenly mathematics that it describes what God judges to be a moment, a point, a droplet, a spark, as if it were an eternity, an infinite sea, a conflagration. But, you say, I feel and experience it so. That may be after all; but which of both do you believe? Is your opinion more correct, or is God's vision more certain and better? Therefore we must do this, that we do not judge according to what we feel, but according to what the word says and judges, or God himself in his word.

In this way the Histories show: when Julianus persecuted St. Athanasius and threatened him with death, Athanasius had said,

This danger is like a little cloud that gradually consumes the sun. Dear, what could have been said more contemptuously of such a great power as the head of the Roman Empire held? It could have been more correctly compared to a sea or a tremendous conflagration. But as Athanasius said and believed, so it happened. For Julianus was killed shortly after in a desert in Persia, but Athanasius remained unharmed. Following the example of this man, we too should watch our dangers and learn to look to the word of Him who promises, so that we may not depend on ourselves and our feelings, but on the promise of the Lord. Death, pestilence, hunger, the hatred with which the world hates us, shame and other evils are indeed evils, and are rightly compared to a tremendous and terrifying storm. If we consult reason here, we will be defeated, but we must lift up our eyes to the mountains and hear the voice: I am the LORD your God, therefore magnify my word and my help. When this happens, the greatness of the danger becomes small, and on the other hand the word of God and the promise become great in the heart, so that you can say: However great the storm may be, here is God, here is His word. In this way, all the raging of the devil, even sin and death, will be annihilated, and what before seemed to be an infinite mass will become a tiny dot.

In this way we must learn the discernment of the Holy Spirit. If your father, your son, your wife dies, if you lose your property, your honor, your health, your confidence of heart, and sometimes even your Christ, these are certainly great things; but beware that you do not make a circle of heaven (sphaeram) out of the time when you feel this, and an infinite line out of this point. For however great the evil may be, God is certainly infinitely greater. Therefore, if he is still standing, if he has not perished, as he cannot perish, what is it great that your wife has died to you, that your children have died to you? What is it great that your body and your life perish? For what is that.

when you compare it with God and His grace? Of course, everything that we have and are is only a mathematical point when compared to God and His riches, which He promises in His word. Therefore, we should look at this and learn to rightly divide or distinguish in the challenge, namely, that the challenge and the cross in itself, that is, according to the flesh and the feeling of our heart, is something infinite. For if Christ and God are nothing, even the slightest evil could not be overcome by us, but would oppress us. In this way, all misfortune is infinite.

But is it not a lie that God and Christ are nothing or are nowhere? Therefore, if he lives and is God and Christ, as it must be necessary, one must not judge the cross in itself (absolute) according to our heart, but according to the category of relation (relationis), that is, one must hold it against God's help; then it will happen that the category of greatness (quantitatis) will fall away altogether. Sickness is a great challenge to the flesh, it is unbearable to die, to be thrown into the fire 2c.; it is a great thing to lose wife and children, if you look only to yourself. But these things must be viewed in comparison, with regard to the Almighty GOD, namely, that although we have lost these things, GOD nevertheless lives and reigns; even though He leaves us "a little" afflicted, He still wants to make us blessed. Thus He says in Isaiah [Cap. 54, 7.s: "I have left you a little moment." This moment seems to the flesh to be something infinite, but, as I said, the eyes of the flesh are deceiving. Therefore, the judgment is to be made according to the promises of the invisible things, and one must look at what God says in His word.

This is the exercise of faith to which David reminds us in this passage, that we are to learn to look to the promise and the Word, and to judge according to the eyes that are lifted upward, not according to present things. But we learn here that theology is an infinite wisdom that can never be fully grasped or understood.

can be unlearned. For we see the change which sudden cases cause. Today I am completely healthy, tomorrow I die; this danger makes heaven and earth seem too narrow for us to grasp, and all creatures become, as it were, hell for us. For this is what the flesh, to which the devil also gives his thoughts, is wont to do, that it sees neither God nor life, but judges that evil is infinite. But this is not a judgment, but a lie of our flesh and of the devil, against which one must fight, and believe that even in our death God remains, and our King Christ lives, before whose eyes my death, with all its tribulations and dangers, is nothing. For what is death, what is the loss of children and the like, if you hold it against God?

But who has learned this art sufficiently? We can speak and teach to some extent, but a theologian must become a theologian through practice and experience, so that we can say with David: "He will not let your foot slip," that is, he will not let you fall. For the flesh sets itself against it, because it feels that not only the foot slides, but that it is completely trodden underfoot. Behold the Son of God, what he suffered! See John the Baptist, Mary, the apostles, the prophets, what they suffered! Look at the Church today, what she suffers daily! This experience has given rise to a proverb: The greater mischief, the better fortune. That is why the world, fearing these dangers, is moving away from the Gospel. Thus the opposite of what David promises in this passage is in view, for it seems that the Lord lets the foot slip. But it only appears so, in truth he does not, and it appears so to the flesh; whereas the spirit and faith judge that this is an exaltation before God and an honor; they judge that the death which one suffers because of the confession of the gospel is the beginning of a better and eternal life; they judge that the shame is an unspeakable honor in the eyes of God. This is the judgment of faith, although the flesh feels differently, but according to the feeling of the flesh no judgment must be made. For what else should the teaching of the

What is the purpose of the Word and such exhortations and promises? Therefore, evil must be turned into good, and where the flesh concludes that it is daily given up to be trampled into the dung, faith, according to the word, must pronounce that it be made like the Son of God and conformed to Christ. For these things are to be believed as invisible and also impalpable, not to be seen and felt.

But those who do not want to believe, but follow their feelings, they choose the little point of honor and the pleasures of this world. But how miserable will be their situation, if they will be surrounded by eternal pain and tears after this moment of the most essential joy! How much better it would be to be sick with Lazarus here for a little while and to suffer lack, than to have abundance with the rich man here and to be tormented in eternal fire there! This teaching, then, belongs to those who want to believe and do not feel, so that they make a distinction between their dangers and God, and do not merely fix their eyes on the present misfortune, but lift them up to the invisible help promised in the Word. For these dangers, to which the believers are exposed, certainly make the foot slip, but faith causes the foot not to slip into a trap, but that we, as it were, jump over those cliffs of danger, and compare the little point of affliction with the other things, which are infinite, as God Himself is, His power, grace, finally the eternal life, which He has promised to those who believe in Christ.

It is necessary that we know this, so that we can comfort ourselves and our brothers when we are hated, despised, robbed and killed because of the Word. Where shall we run in these troubles? For they overcome all the power of our reason and nature. Certainly to the point that we say that God is greater than our misfortune; God therefore does not die and perish when we perish. Therefore, we must trust in His goodness and power from the bottom of our hearts, and elevate the feeling of the spirit (that I say so) above the feeling of the flesh and our hearts. Those who do not want to do this may enjoy their pleasures, but they have to expect that they have to drink the yeast of the cup, which the godly drink only in a small part, as the prophet Ps. 75, 9. says, although this also often happens to the godly that they receive physical help. For God does not neglect His own so completely that He should never show in this life that He takes care of them. Thus David, who had been driven out of the kingdom, is restored to the kingdom; Hezekiah, who had been afflicted with a deadly disease, is restored to health; the people of the Jews, who had been scattered among the Gentiles, are brought back. But also here the faith has its place that this help is expected. For it is not immediately available when we need it, or wish it to be. Just as the saints receive help in such dangers, the wicked do not always fare well, but often have to suffer terrible punishments for their wickedness in this life.

Now the aristocracy is doing its will against the poor shepherds of the churches and despises and hates in an ignoble way all scientific studies. But it is not doubtful to me that such a church servant will be preferred to a hundred such noblemen. Thus the papacy has long flourished, but we learn that much of its old power and wealth has departed, and that the papists are facing the obvious punishments of their godlessness. For God also executes His judgment in such a way, physically or temporarily, for the godly against the godless. We should now rely all the more on the word and expect help by lifting our eyes from this tangible misery to the invisible help. What now follows in the psalm has exactly the same opinion, for the Holy Spirit has abundantly comforted and admonished the church.

V. 4. Behold, the keeper of Israel neither sleeps nor slumbers.

These, too, are lying words, if you look at them according to the flesh. For does "guard" mean when we are thrown into prison and handed over to the executioner to be burned? when we are plagued by the devil and the world with all kinds of misfortune?

yes, when Christ himself is put on the cross? when the Baptist is beheaded according to the will of the harlot? Is it not the utmost absurdity (barbaria) to call this a shelter, where the highest abandonment takes place? The flesh therefore judges that here the words are used in their opposite sense (antiphrases esse), and that by God, who preserves, one must understand one who abandons. Therefore they are words of the spirit and of faith, not of the flesh and of feeling. For according to the flesh, God did not protect the patriarch Jacob when Joseph perished through the cruelty of his brothers, and yet afterwards the outcome showed that he had been so protected that Joseph almost became the king of Egypt.

The Lord does not protect us in such a way that we do not have to die, that we do not have to see the death of our wives, children and parents, that we are not plagued daily by the devil, that we do not have to endure all kinds of injustice from the ungrateful and evil world. Where is the protection seen here? Where is it revealed that God is watching over us? Therefore the eyes must be lifted up to the mountains, where he has decreed his word, there one must hear it, what he speaks of his holy temple, namely, that he is not a sleepy abandoner, as our flesh judges, but a guardian and watchman, who keeps watch for us. Faith takes hold of this word and judges according to this word, no matter how much the flesh opposes it and thinks according to its feeling that God neither sees nor hears, but is like those of whom the Psalm says: "They have ears and do not hear; they have eyes and do not see." Therefore the flesh praises its god Mammon that money is always ready and everything that is necessary for life. This little point admires and grasps the flesh and does not see what will happen in the future when one has to die and leave the goods behind. That is why it does not care about this guardian who protects in faith and word.

Therefore, we who are believers and see this miserable blindness of the world should certainly consider that this hat, which is kept over us in faith and in secrecy is omnipotent. For this is where the Holy Scriptures lead us and teach us that the kingdom of the devil is a kingdom of sin, death and lies; but if this supreme sentence is established, then it follows that the devil at every moment incites people to sin, seeks to kill and seduce them, or at least has to do with the fact that we want to sin, die, and err. Thus we are always in death, always in danger from ungodly opinions and from sin. But what do we do in these attempts of Satan? Of course, we teach, write, read, sleep, eat, drink, and do other things of the body and the senses. Here our theology teaches us through our experience: If God did not watch when I sleep, if he did not care, if I did not worry about anything, if he did not defend and protect me when I am safe, it would happen at any moment that we would die, lose our speech, eyes, ears, hands, feet 2c. The fact that this sometimes happens, that wife, children and friends die or fall into great danger, serves as proof that the devil's kingdom is a kingdom of death and sin. Because we live in this kingdom as long as we are in the world, it happens that we are often plunged into sin against our will. Thus David becomes a murderer and an adulterer, so that we may learn that the devil's kingdom is in this world to cause sin and death. That we are still alive, that we do not fall daily into grave sins, we have to thank the guardian of whom David speaks here. Theology teaches this irrefutably, and the godly believe it. For they learn by their own example and that of the whole church that Satan does not rest until he has killed either the soul or the body; the destruction of the soul he seeks through lies, through ungodly teaching and ungodly worship; the destruction of the body he seeks through innumerable attempts, which we see daily in ourselves and others. That this either does not happen, or does not happen as often as he intends, is not the good deed of Satan, but of our guardian and protector.

Thus, experience also leads us to the conclusion, after having established this supersentence, that the kingdom is

We are protected without interruption from death and other physical and spiritual dangers through the beneficence of Christ, into whose kingdom we have been transferred through baptism and faith. Hence the glorious sermons of the prophets, in which they sing that the earth is full of the goodness of the Lord [Ps. 33:5, 119:64], that His goodness endures forever [Ps. 107:1, 118:1, 136:1], that it cannot be counted [Ps. 40:6] 2c. From time to time, of course, Satan's enterprise succeeds in assailing men with sudden dangers and plunging them into ruin. Such cases should serve us as proofs and examples of the evil he would gladly do to us at any hour, as he does [and would do, 1) if he were not prevented by the protection of our guardian in heaven. For as far as the power of this enemy is concerned, I believe that in one hour he could kill all the people who live on earth. [So if he is able to do it and undertakes to do it, why does it not happen? Without a doubt, because our guardian is watching. But this must be believed, that is why he adds the word "behold", so that it may be evident that the prophet is concerned to impress this guardianship on our hearts.

But here it is to be remembered that God is ascribed this guardianship over our lives, over the kingdoms, the peace, the cities, while he does this through means; first through the angels, then through the princes, the parents, the household 2c. But this is done for the sake that we may firmly believe that these means would be of no avail in guarding and caring if God did not take upon Himself the supreme direction of these matters. He therefore uses the ministry of angels and princes, just as He uses bread and wine. For just as bread and wine do not in themselves sustain life, for otherwise no one would die, and yet are necessary for the preservation of life for the sake of God's order and the nature of our nature, so also the guardianship of angels, princes and other means would be nothing in itself if not the guardian Israel watched and guarded. Because the word reveals this guard, the spirit also believes it. The flesh does not see it, therefore it interprets these words according to the opposite opinion (antiphrasin) to the words: "The keeper of Israel", that is, the abandoner; "does not sleep", that is, he not only sleeps the deepest sleep, but he has absolutely no feeling and he is nothing. For reason judges only according to the points and beginnings of misfortune, not according to the word and according to God, who makes the promise. Because the prophets knew how difficult it was to believe in this way, they exhort against unbelief and the judgment of the flesh with so many words. Nowadays we see that this is generally despised, because it is considered that faith is only a knowledge or a certain acquaintance with history. But it is actually faith that perseveres in the most extreme misfortune and keeps the word of life, thus overcoming all the power of the devil, all trepidation and all dangers, through which it passes with honor and confidence to the immortal life.

V. 5 The LORD keep thee; the LORD is thy shadow over thy right hand.

Though we are protected by the ministry of angels, yet he says, The Lord himself guards thee, and is the shadow over thy right hand, that is, over the things which thou hast to do. For so I interpret it most plainly, and do not approve the opinion that the Lord is over the right hand according to the spirit, but the devil over the left according to the flesh. For he simply says: The Lord directs your affairs. When you teach the churches, when you carry out the works of your profession, when you provide a living for yourself and your family, you encounter many disadvantages: your adversaries harass you, your neighbors envy you; here straighten up and believe that all your affairs, what you do and suffer, the Lord governs and protects you. But here again thou shalt remember what I said above, that these things are said and taught in vain, if we are not left. Therefore, by the very fact that he speaks of the guardianship, he confesses teaches, and promises from the government that the abandonment and lack of care will be felt as if God does not care for us. It is therefore to our comfort that God thus shows that He knows our miseries and tribulations, and commands that we believe that He is our shadow that covers us. But how much greater is God than our dangers, however great they may be? Therefore, we should have joy and confidence in Him, since He promises that He will take care of us in all things that we have to do.

V. 6: That the sun sting thee not by day, nor the moon by night.

Here one does not have to look for a remote sense. The light of the moon is very harmful, because it not only makes the bodies cold, but also addictive (afficit humore); from the sun it is known how it weakens the bodies. He therefore generally designates by the light of the sun and moon all temptations and all dangers [and says] that in the same he wants to be with us, to help and save us, although it seems for a little while as if we alone bear this heat. For if we were alone, the temptation would be eternal, for there is not so much strength in us that we could persevere continually. Now God allows Satan to spew forth the beginning of his fury against us, but he does not suffer that to harm us as much as he desires to harm us. Therefore, because we have this shadow, we must bear the beginning of the pain patiently, because we are sure that even if we die, our life will still be hidden without danger in Christ, and we will overcome Satan's temptation.

V. 7 The Lord keep thee from all evil; he keep thy soul.

What the previous verse said in a figurative speech, he now says simply and without image. The soul signifies life. Therefore, even if you are killed for the sake of the word, you will not die because the Lord guards your soul. According to what is before your eyes, and according to what is in the flesh, you die, but not according to the truth, because your life lives, namely God 2c.

V. 8. The Lord keep your going out and your coming in from now on until eternity.

That is, wherever you go, at home, in the field, I will always be with you and keep you. "Going out" means going to work, "coming in" means going from work to rest. The meaning is therefore this: Whatever you do, the Lord will always be with you; in no place, at no time, in no thing, in no action, by no person, by no work, will I let you perish, but will always be with you as your guardian, who am the God of heaven and earth. In this way, through this psalm, the prophet teaches faith not as a dead state or condition (qualitatem), as the sophists do, but as the greatest work and movement of the Holy Spirit, by which we judge according to the word, against what we feel, see, and experience; likewise, by it we overcome dangers of every kind. Of this faith the papists speak and judge no better than a blind man of color.

The hundred and twenty-second Psalm.

I am glad.

Although the name of the author is not given for these Psalms, 1) the manner of speech sufficiently indicates that they originate from David, the best and highest poet. For there are also other psalm writers, and among them the children of Korah have great praise; Assaph is somewhat darker, Solomon uses a great deal of figurative speech and is, as it were, an innovator in words. But David comes closest to Moses in speech and wisdom and is extraordinarily lovely and graceful. Therefore, he is rightly considered the most distinguished of the Psalm writers. For here happens what Paul speaks of in the [first] letter to the Corinthians [1 Cor. 12, 4. ff.], for although one and the same Spirit spoke through the holy prophets, yet, because he uses different instruments, even when he says the same thing, he uses different speech. Thus all the prophets preached the same gospel, but how much more vivid is Isaiah than the rest of the prophets! It is the same among the ecclesiastical writers that we have, even if they treat the same thing;

1) In the Vulgate, in the 122nd and 124th Psalm, the name of the author. David's, is not given, but in the Hebrew. In the 127th, 131st and 133rd Psalm, the name is also in the Vulgate.

but what a great difference there is between Augustine and Jerome! Thus, the Holy Spirit, one and the same master craftsman, is comfortable with the different forms and characteristics of the tools, and yet, in David alone, we see how everything is perfected (absoluta), and provided not only with extraordinary daintiness of words, but also with exceedingly important content.

This psalm is therefore worthy of its author, for it is a thanksgiving for the gift of God's word. This virtue [of giving thanks for God's word] is all the rarer the more despised the word is in the world, not only among unlearned people, but also among those who claim the praise of wisdom and learning for themselves. Therefore, one often hears blasphemous speeches with which they revile this highest gift of God, since they not only speak contemptuously of the Gospel, but also impose on the wholesome teaching everything that the devil does through his members, such as sedition, mobs, avarice, unchastity and the like. Therefore, this virtue is to be counted among the rarest, that there are at least some who hold the word in honor, who like to hear the sermons, who like to talk about God and His deeds.

We therefore want to advocate that this ge-

The gospel is written, not for dogs and such swine as the papists, heretics, and persecutors of the word, but for the elect souls and godly hearts, which rejoice exceedingly in the present visitation, by which the coming forth from on high visits us, who sit in the shadow of death, through his hearty mercy, as Zacharias sings [Luc. 1:78, 79]. For since all have the word, and the ears and hearts of all are affected by the preaching of the gospel, which is to be public, not hidden in a corner, a great difference arises among men: that some only have the word, others recognize it and feel that they have it, and therefore rejoice and give thanks, while still others care more for riches and pleasures than for the word. That is why Paul considers this to be the highest gift, not only to have gifts, but also to recognize the gifts one has, that is, to use them, to receive them with joy and to give thanks for them.

But among all gifts, the gift of the Word of God is the richest. For if you take this away, it is as much as if you take away the sun from the world. For what will the world be if you take away the word, but a hell and a pure Satanic kingdom, even if there are still rich people, lawyers, doctors 2c.? For what can or do they do without the Word? For the Word alone sustains a happy conscience, a gracious God, and the whole religion (for from the Word flows forth as from one source the whole religion), yes, it also sustains the whole world. For the world would not exist for a moment without the Word and Christ. Therefore, although there are many and great gifts of God in the world that are given for the benefit of men, the one gift by which all others are encompassed and sustained is the Word, which proclaims that God is merciful and promises forgiveness of sins and eternal life. But I ask you, if one had to do without these, would this life still be considered a life? But these spiritual things and this knowledge are revealed from heaven. Because this knowledge does not arise in our heart, therefore it can also only be grasped with such difficulty. But now let us deal with the Psalm.

At the time this psalm was written, the temple had not yet been built, but the tabernacle of Moses was still standing. Although it was not in a certain place, nor was it arranged for one and the same tribe (for it was in Shiloh as well as in Gideon), it nevertheless had the certain promise that wherever it was, there the Lord would be, would hear the prayers, would accept the sacrifices and would be gracious, as the text [2 Mos. 20, 24.] says: "In which place I will establish the remembrance of my name" 2c. Therefore, when it was in Ephraim in the city of Shiloh, there the name of the LORD was invoked, there the word of GOD was heard, there GOD was worshipped in faith, with prayer, with sacrifices 2c. until at last, when ungodliness and idolatry increased, the ark of the covenant was brought from Shiloh into the army against the Philistines and was taken by the Philistines. But when the Philistines were smitten in many ways because of this desecration, the ark was brought to the Gibeonites. When it had been there for some time, David brought it to his city, as it is written in the second book of Samuel, Cap. 6, and then the thought came to him to build GOTte a house. For he judged that it was not fitting for him to dwell in a house of cedar, but that the Lord and King of heaven should dwell under carpets (pellibus). And initially his intention was approved by the prophet Nathan, but by a revelation from God Nathan was warned that David should not build, for this work was reserved for his son, who would be peaceful and not a warrior like David. At the same time, the glorious promise of David's eternal descendants and his true son Christ is added, 2 Sam. 7. It seems to me that this psalm was written by David about the first part of the promise, in which he heartily wishes himself and the whole people happiness that the certain and firm place of true worship is in Jerusalem.

Furthermore, it is certain that the Word of God does not make the temple alone, but also the church and the right worship; the temple, on the other hand, does not make either the Church still the service, according to the saying [2 Mos. 20, 24.]: "In which place I will establish the memory of my name, there I will come to you and bless you." Here it matters not whether the temple be of gold or of wood, whether it be a stable, as at Bethlehem, or a royal house at Jerusalem. For these outward things are nothing, nor are they esteemed of the Lord, as Nathan saith [2 Sam. 7:7], "Did I ever speak unto any of the tribes of Israel, saying, Why build ye not me an house of cedar?" So Jacob built an altar from the stone he had used as a pillow, and called it a house of God, because the LORD had revealed Himself there. The temple is therefore where God always reveals Himself through His word, whether it is made of gold or of clay. Therefore, although David also understands the very house that Solomon built afterwards, he is primarily talking about the benefit of the temple to be built, that there will be the people who teach, pray and sacrifice for the church. This is the joy whose glorious praise we will hear in this passage, that he rejoices because he recognizes the inestimable gift that the Lord gives, that one can hear his word, that he reveals his face, and makes us have a right knowledge of his will toward us. If this gift is there, the carpets of the tabernacle of Moses are more precious than all gold and precious stone; but if it is not there, there is no difference between the tabernacle of Moses and other temples of the Gentiles.

Our bad theologians (theologistae) discourse much about the declarations of the personal presence of God (de definitionibus personalibus divinitatis) 2c. But all these things belong to human reason, and are conceived without the word and right knowledge of God; but they never come to either teach or think what God is doing with us. Hence the frightening sayings that are very common among them: Man does not know whether he is worthy of love or hate. 1) But

1) This saying is Eccl. 9, 1. according to the Vulgate. How this word is to be understood correctly, Luther shows in detail in his larger interpretation of the letter to the Galatians, St. Louis edition, Vol. IX, 507 ff, § 99-106.

I beg you, what is the point of disputing about God if you do not know what He thinks about you or intends to do with you? This is, in fact, to enclose and conceal GOD in such a way that you cannot hear or see Him anywhere. Therefore, it is the Word from which we can determine what is the will of God, what He is doing with us, what pleases Him, what He wants 2c. Those who do not come to this knowledge are not much more skilled in theology than a donkey is in lute-playing. Therefore, this ignorance and shameful ignorance have been followed by other equally inconsistent things, that they believed they would please God if they accepted this or that order of monastic life, if they procured the protection of this or that saint through pilgrimages 2c. Such a tangle of innumerable errors and evils follows where there is not the word and right knowledge of God, which can only be taken from the word 2); if this is lost, one does not know what pleases or displeases God, hence follow those abominations of idolatry that we have experienced under the papacy.

Theft, which is forbidden in the divine law in the seventh commandment, is counted for a small evil, if one compares it with other things, as murder, unchastity, sedition 2c. But imagine, if this commandment were not given, how great a storm of the greatest harm would follow! Our life would be like the raging of wolves and bears, which rob and destroy what they can, or, to say something more shameful, it would be a life among us like it is among sows, which, when they are brought to feed, would devour each separately as much as is enough for all of them, if they could, and take no account of the rest. That therefore ours is safe, and, though not all dangers can be averted, yet not all ours are in danger, is the benefit of the seventh commandment.

But let's move on to the bigger things. What kind of life would it be if our wives were not safe, if our children were not out of danger, if the authorities were not to be told what to do?

Wouldn't this life then be a constant hell? So that there are marriages, that there are communities and laws under which we lead a quiet life in safety, these are all benefits of the word of God, which is presented to us in the second tablet. But what would happen if the first table were not there, if there were no holiday, no church, no place where the Word was taught, if there were no knowledge of God, if there were no calling, but each individual had his idol or devil whom he worshipped? These are infinitely greater evils than those of the second table, but they are less respected because they are spiritual. If we now had eyes of the spirit, and saw how many souls are daily corrupted by the pope and Mahomet, for whom Christ's blood was shed, then we would suffer much more seriously than if we had to expect and suffer danger to our property, even to our lives, at every hour.

We must therefore first rejoice over the small goods that we have through the second table, that there remains a protection for body and goods. For these are small gifts when compared with those of the first table, that God reveals what he will do with us, that he gives the word, gives faith and the Holy Spirit, hears prayer, increases the church daily through the word 2c. These things are so great that no tongue can adequately expound them, and they are so great that souls are saved from the tyranny of Satan, and peace of heart is obtained, a good conscience, pure knowledge of God, by which very many are instructed to eternal life. To this David directs his eyes, this he considers with himself, and is thus moved to thanksgiving, which the movement of joy forces out of him. For only those are truly thankful who receive the gifts of God with joy and are glad in the giver. Others, who do not feel this joy, are and remain ungrateful, even if they decorate this psalm with organs and strings, because they do not understand these benefits.

I therefore mention this all the more gladly, so that everyone may protect himself against the greatest vice and the head of all evils in the world.

Church, namely the contempt of the Word or the disbelief. For that is to become apostate from God, as Sirach [Cap. 10, 14.] says: "That is where all hope comes from, when a man falls away from God." For since all men suffer from this disease of the spirit, it is not possible that even ONE true and pure thought of eternal life, of the forgiveness of sins, and of a spiritual life can be present in their hearts. But we see, God be lamented, that nothing is more common in the world than this evil. The so-called nobility, how surely they despise the Word and its servants! The peasants also follow them, valuing their pennies more than all the preaching of the Gospel. We must look at them like Lot at his Sodomites, who proudly sneered and did whatever they wanted.

It is terrible that David falls into adultery and murder, but how much more terrible it is to buy against the first table in this way, as the angels did who were cast out of heaven because of it. But David repented and returned to the right way. But the more danger all godly people are threatened by this evil, the easier is the case here. For this poison creeps in so quietly, slips in so gradually, that one can hardly notice it. In the monasteries it was called accidia, 1) if someone gave himself up to sleep and came late to the services, which took place in the churches at that time. If we want to interpret the word acedia [sloth] correctly, we will actually apply it to the weariness and contempt of the Word, when the Word is heard, taught and learned exceedingly carelessly. This vice is followed by movements of the heart that are opposite to those found in the godly. For just as the godly strive with all their heart to glorify God's glory, so these are inflamed by infernal fervor to spread ungodly teachings and worship, as we also experience with the peasants. For these direct their desire and their heart, which they should raise to God, toward mammon, and with the greatest comfort they move about in their Corruption and in their damnation. Namely, these things are connected with each other in such a way that those who have given in to this vice are in the realm of the devil at the same time, and yet they are also happy; but such a change (catastrophe) will finally follow as the story of the people of Sodom shows.

Therefore, let us ask God to protect us from this vice, and let us learn to sing this psalm with joy, giving thanks to God and rejoicing in this unspeakable gift, that He has given us the pure knowledge of Himself, in which Christ is revealed, the sacrifice for our sins, and the certain hope of eternal life. Let us handle (ruminamus) and sharpen this word over and over again, and never consider ourselves to have learned it completely. It is true that we have it in abundance, written in Latin and German books, to such an extent that it might seem that this great frequency of the word has caused this weariness in very many, but truly it is not enough that we have heard it a hundred times and read it a thousand times, as we finally come to realize in the dangers of the temptations. Therefore we should encourage ourselves against this corruption, the acedia, and stimulate ourselves to the most glorious virtue, which is called reverence for the Word. For Satan does not rest. But he is never better equipped than when we are filled with disrespect for the word, and with the presumption that we know it well. But now let us go to the Psalm.

V. 1. I rejoice that it is spoken to me that we shall go into the house of the Lord.

A similar saying is Ps. 60, 8: "God speaks in his sanctuary, I am glad." Both verses contain a comparison with other kingdoms in the world that are greater and richer, as if to say: I am a king and have a small and weak kingdom when compared with the power of my neighbors. But I have what other kings and all the kingdoms in the world do not have, that God speaks in my kingdom in His sanctuary. Therefore my kingdom is God's kingdom, it is the kingdom of heaven, therefore I rejoice?c. Thus he says in this passage: "I rejoice." Why then? "Because it is said to me that we shall enter into the house of the Lord," that is, it has been promised to me that we shall be that people who shall enter into the house of the Lord. Should this not make my heart glad? For when I look at other nations, I see that all of them without distinction go into the house of the devil and the temples of idols, I see that they do not have the gift of the first table, namely the true God and his certain worship; even though they may at least have some knowledge of the second table through the guidance of nature, they certainly have nothing at all of the first table. But what is the second table without the first? For the second table lasts only for a short time: parents cease, our bodies cease, likewise wife, children, household 2c. But the things of the first table, namely God, the Word and the service of God, will not cease. So I have sufficient cause to be glad, because I have the promise that I will go with my own into the house of the Lord.

Thus the words are exceedingly simple and extraordinarily humble. But if you ponder them diligently, the highest majesty comes to light in them. Because our papists cannot see it, they sing, read and pray this psalm and others so drowsily that there is no fable, however insipid, which they do not seem to be able to tell or hear with greater vivacity. Therefore, the words must be well pondered and put before the eyes of the faithful. He seems to say nothing great when he says, "We will go into the house of the LORD," because we think only of stones, wood, and gold when we hear the word "house" mentioned. But "the house of the Lord" means something completely different, namely that one has the power or the gift of the present Word, and is in the place where one can hear, see and find God present, because there His Word and right worship is found. Therefore, the description that the school theologians give of the Temple, that it is a house built of stone and wood for the glory of God, is false. What this is, they themselves do not understand either.

times. For Solomon's temple was not beautiful because it was adorned with gold and silver, but its true adornment was that the word of God was heard there, that God was called upon there, and was found there gracious, a Savior who gave peace, who forgave sin 2c. This means to look at the temple properly, not like a cow looks at the doors of its stable, or the larval bishops look at the churches when they consecrate them.

Therefore, this description must be held that "having the house of the Lord" is the same as saying that David had the grace and the gift to know where to go in time of need, where to go when he wished to hear and know what God wanted, what thoughts He had about His people 2c. For the Temple was the place where GOD wished to be, to be called upon, to hear prayers, even to be worshipped, and nowhere else in all the earth. This, therefore, is exceedingly worthy of joy and gladness, that one should have access to GOD in time of danger, and hear the consolation that He says He is our GOD, who wants to help us, save us in dangers, forgive us our sins, and finally also give us eternal life. For this gift, says David, we give thanks to GOtt and rejoice that we come to this place where all this happens, and where GOtt works through His Word. For it is the Word alone through which we know GOD, and through which GOD acts with us. It is this word that faith takes hold of.

Thus David understands by the word "the house of the Lord" the first table, which God, His name and His word, sets before us, for which the holiday is sanctified, so that on it we may rest from other things and hear God speak to us. But when thou hast the first tablet, it shall come to pass that thou shalt also have thy wife, thy parents, protection for the body, authority, and all things, according to the saying [Ps. 112:1], "Blessed is he that feareth the LORD." That is, to go into the house of the LORD and to rejoice and give thanks because of it. For it is an unspeakable gift, which the ungodly cannot comprehend. But the godly alone know what the word is and what it is not.

what they have in the word. But God also demands this, since he so often commands in the law that the people should come together so that they may rejoice; that they may eat before the Lord so that they may rejoice, namely in his gifts, and rejoice that they are thus showered with the mercy and benefits of God. David also calls us to this with his example, that we should rejoice with reverence and, as it were, with trembling.

V. 2: And our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem.

It is the same opinion of Firste in the first verse, only that here he determines the place, namely that it is Jerusalem to which the word and the presence of God is given. As if he wanted to say: Before this gift was in Ephraim, but now it is in my kingdom. From where the name "gates" (atrii - porches) was taken is known. For the tabernacle had a porch, and Solomon made courts in the temple [1 Kings 6:36], in which the congregation or people were to sit out when the sacrifices were offered. Jerusalem is therefore rightly praised as holy because the Lord dwells there, because the people gather there to hear the word of God, because the priests are appointed there to bless the people by God's command, as the blessing is described in the fourth book of Moses, Cap. 6, 24 ff. So what can this Jerusalem lack, in which the place, the people, the ceremonies and the word are given by God for the salvation of the people? Since the Word was nowhere in the Papacy, we have seen with how great zeal and effort people sought certain persons, signs and places to propitiate God. Therefore, not only were various works instituted, but also certain places that pilgrimages should be made to Rome, to Spain, and I do not know to what other places. The wretched consciences relied on these signs with no better success than those who follow will-o'-the-wisps or nocturnal glow on the sea or in desolate places. But now, by the grace of God, we know that the place, the person and the signs are ready, namely Christ, who has instituted certain sacraments of grace for His Church, baptism and holy orders.

The Holy Communion. We have therefore described God in the most certain way according to place, person and sign, where everything is found that is necessary for the salvation of body and soul.

The fact that the prophet uses the word "stand" shows the perseverance or duration that God not only wants to give this, but also wants to preserve and protect it, so that the opposition is against the enemies of the word, who try to suppress the word, but the Lord gives workers, so that even if we are suppressed or die, the word still remains. For this is what tends to happen, what is said in Proverbs: Where God builds a church, the devil builds a chapel next to it (to use a German and common word). For the father of lies and murderers cannot but persecute the Word. That is why he shows false doctrines, as today the doctrines of the Anabaptists and the Sacramentarians are, formerly those of Arius, Manichaeus and others, who lead away from the Word to their own opinions. What else should we do here but pray to the Lord to make our feet stand, that he may continue to spread the word, even if the gates of hell are against it. For this gift is twofold; first, in that he gives the word; second, in that he upholds and defends the word against tyrants and false brethren. For now that the word has been given to us, let us also make this prayer, that the Lord may accomplish in us what he has begun in us, so that our feet may stand in the courts where God is to be found, and we may hear him who calls us, teaches us, comforts us, helps us 2c.

V. 3. Jerusalem is built to be a city where people come together. 1)

I can't help but blame the Latin interpreter for not taking care at all to translate the text so that it could be understood. For the sentence should have been translated thus: Hierusalem aedificatur, ut sit civitas, in qua conveniatur, namely, to worship. But it is an explanation or expansion of the previous verse, as if to say: Jerusalem I call by name, nem-

The city that is built, that is, that blossoms and grows. For when religion and the Word of God flourish, the community must necessarily flourish as well, according to the saying (Match. 6, 33): "Seek first the kingdom of God, and all things shall be added unto you." But in such a way that also what Christ answered Paul [2 Cor. 12, 9.] remains true: "My power is mighty in the weak." For since the world does not cease to weigh down the church by many an injustice, it nevertheless happens that the more the adversaries seek to destroy, the more the word builds up. Therefore, destroying, devastating and exterminating the Church is nothing other than (if you consider God's counsel and the outcome) building, planting, watering and increasing the Church. People like Domitian, Maximin, Decius, how much effort did they put into exterminating the name of Christ? But the word and the church was like the palm tree; the more it was weighed down by pressure, the greater increase it received from day to day, as the example of the people of Israel in Egypt also shows. For thus says Moses in the second book, Cap. 1, 12.: "The more the Egyptians pressed the people, the more they multiplied and spread." So it is a famous saying of the ancient church: by the blood of the martyrs the church is watered. The reason for this wonderful building and growth is this: Wherever one trusts in God and has His word, there is inevitably victory, even if the saints are disturbed, killed and perish, even if God Himself seems to have abandoned them and to be suppressed at the same time as the saints. For this is what God does: when He is weakest, He is most powerful, and when He is suppressed in His own, He lives most in His own, is exalted and increases by being destroyed.

David also speaks of such building here, that although Jerusalem was in the midst of so many enemies and different services, nevertheless the word proved its power there and the right service flourished. Who can therefore be against us if God is for us in such a way? Does not this mean building Jerusalem? "Kings are against her but passed by one another," as it says in Ps. 48:5, "and could do her no harm. We have also learned from our experience today that the more the opponents of the Word rage, the less they can do against the Word, indeed, the more the Word is spread. Thus, even though the sectarians seem to do great harm to the church, they are the cause of the word becoming daily brighter and purer among us, as Augustine says in the eighth book of his Confessions: "The disapproval of the heretics clearly reveals what the opinion of the church is and what the pure doctrine has in itself. For if we were not so awakened and forced, as it were, to look closely at our treasures and to defend them, we would snore idly and fall asleep in idleness. Likewise, what does our constant enemy, the devil, accomplish with his incessant temptations other than that we should search all the more diligently in the Word, that we should learn to pray, to trust, to hope? It is a common saying that hunger is the best cook. Therefore, the tribulations of Christians are also the salvation of the church; cross and oppression are the exaltation and triumph of the church. Therefore, let the enemies of the church do as they please, but this is certain: the more we are oppressed, the more we rise. For Christ, our Duke and our Head, in truth does not yield to any evil, for he has an infinite power by which he raises the down-trodden, makes the dead alive, makes the oppressed such that they oppress. For because he is God, this is his real office, to make everything out of nothing, and out of what is something. To make nothing.

In this way it is preached here in Jerusalem. For this is a gift above all gifts, that it indicates a certain place, person, sign, a certain word, that the Godhead is present, so that it is not up to us to seek a place, person or sign 2c. For if this happens, that we order that GOD be found and worshipped in the right way in this place and with this service, then it is done for us. But when he comes and says [Ps. 132, 14.], "This is my rest, here I will dwell",

Here I will speak, here shall be my word and my spirit, then all is well, then all works, however small they may seem, are more delicious than all the treasures of the world, then the circumcision of the shameful member is an exceedingly pleasant service of God, the lifting of a straw from the earth, if God commands it in His word, is a greater and more excellent work, God also a more pleasant service than all the works of all monks and the whole papacy, which are undertaken without God's word.

The Gentiles did not have this wisdom. Therefore it was easy for them to despise Jerusalem and, seeing that the Jews gathered there at certain times of the year, to say why they went there rather than to other cities. Naaman the Syrian said at first that the waters of Damascus were no worse than the Jordan, but he had no word from the Lord that he should wash in them for leprosy [2 Kings 5:12]. Thus ungodly people judge that the water of baptism is not at all different from other water. So also in our time some people, who distinguished themselves by eloquence and learning, ridiculed all ceremonies, and not from the holy Scriptures, but according to the manner of Lucianus and from the foolishness of their hearts, when they were asked why they did this, taught nothing better than what Cato says: If God is a spirit, then he must be worshipped with a pure heart. From this they drew the conclusion, not only unlearned but also ungodly: So God is not served by external things. This, of course, does not mean to overthrow the statutes of men, which those wise people nevertheless undertook, but to give rise to innumerable superstitions, errors and ungodliness, so that finally not only the papal statutes, but also the ordinances are ridiculed, which were instituted by Christ's word, or at least are not held as high as they should be held by us; I do not know, then, whether such indecent speeches have not also given the Anabaptists and the Sacramentarians cause to despise baptism and to concoct many other errors.

Cato's saying is indeed, if everything else would be simple (ceteris paribus), correct, but you tell me: Where is then the pure heart of which he says? or what is it? Here one answers that it is the restraint of the passions, another says it is ideas or thoughts about GOD, still others answer otherwise. So nothing is said. God does not want one to serve Him with external things. For those who want to overturn ungodly or foolish statutes must approach it in such a way that they come well equipped with the word of God, and that they have reason from the word above all things. Whoever does not consider the word well, must necessarily prefer Rome, as the mightier city, to Jerusalem; he must think that the Greeks are wiser than the uneducated Jews, for that is how the Gentiles regarded them. But what about the fact that Rome, as powerful as it is, does not have the word and promises of God? What about the fact that the Greeks, along with the other nations that have the glory of wisdom, also lack the word and promises of God? So the pure heart that they conceive and speak of is unholy, because they are without God's word.

Thus the priesthood cannot be overthrown with holy water and consecrated salt, as those wise people thought, who could teach nothing but that salt is salt and water is water, therefore it can do nothing for the blessing of the soul; similarly, plate shearing on a monk is a shearing of the head, therefore it can do nothing for godliness. This means to ridicule monasticism and the consecration of the priesthood, but not to abolish it. But these things are annulled when one asks where a promise of God is given for the plate, for the consecrated salt and the holy water? where is that which David says: "I rejoice in that which is spoken to me"? For you must have him who speaks from heaven, that is, God, who commands and promises; if you do not have him, whatever you order is in vain. In thine eyes it seemeth to be ordained; it seemeth to be salt and Water be consecrated; but it is not thou of whom the Scripture saith [Ps. 33:9], If he speak, it shall be done; if he command, it shall stand." Thus a priest of the Jews had his garments; the priests of the Gentiles perhaps dressed either more deliciously or more simply. Here it is not a matter of what reason judges, but rather of the fact that the Jews dress their priests according to God's commandment, while the Gentiles do not follow the word of God, but their reason. Thus the papacy is almost nothing else than the foolish work of anointing the priests (as they call it, while in the New Testament this name [of an anointed one] is attached to no one but Christ alone), with garments, with churches, with holy vessels. But also under the law the priests were anointed, the garments, the temple, the utensils of the temple; but ours anoint without God's command, those did it with God's command. Therefore, the anointing of the Jews in the eyes of the whole Church and the angels was something exceedingly glorious, while the anointing of the Papists in the eyes of God and the Church is more abominable than any filth or filthiness.

Therefore, it is not necessary to say that God is not served by external things; for this reason, everything that is external must not be laughed at in the service of God. For when God speaks of a splinter, the word gives the splinter as great a significance as if He spoke of the sun. Therefore, it is ungodly to say that the water of baptism is only water, since the water of baptism has the word with it and is similar to a glowing or fiery iron, which, as it is in fact iron, is also in fact fire, and does everything that fire tends to do. But only the godly see and recognize the word in water; a cow or a dog sees only water. Such dog- and cow-eyes bring such disputants to the holy things, who judge the ceremonies only as they see them, but they bring no ears to hear whether they have God's promise or command.

Therefore David praises his Jerusalem. Looking at the walls and other buildings, Rome is far nobler and more worthy that

But if you look at the word, you will see that this earthly Jerusalem is in the bosom of God, and all its stones are more precious than all gold and precious stone. So, if you follow the eyes, you will see that Mary is with child and is carrying a child like other young women; for what should the eyes judge otherwise? But if you follow the word that says that she is pregnant by the Holy Spirit and that she is carrying the Son of God in her womb, by whom heaven and earth were created, is there not an enormous difference shown here between Mary's pregnancy and all other pregnant women? Here everything is human, but there everything is divine, and it is rightly said that Mary is a sanctified temple of God, in which God Himself dwells bodily, and it is rightly said that her body (uterus et latera) is a heavenly body. Thus there is also a tremendous difference between the church and the Gentiles, not, of course, as far as outward appearance is concerned (for according to this there may perhaps be a preference among the Gentiles), but the church has the word; according to this it must judge when it baptizes, when it teaches, when it distributes Holy Communion, when it comforts, punishes, absolves, puts under ban 2c. The Gentiles have no word from God about their religion and all their works.

So David praises his Jerusalem that it is built, first spiritually, because there is the kingdom and the priesthood, -the word and the service of God; then also physically, that it has walls and houses, peace, laws 2c. But he does not speak of this in particular, so he adds: Jerusalem is being built to be a city, so that all may participate in it at the same time (in participationem omnium simul), that is, that the people may come together there for worship. For there was no place in all the world, nor is there any place in any holy nation, where the people should assemble for worship, but in the one place, Jerusalem, and that not according to human will, but according to divine will, since God Himself commanded and ordained it so. For it is, as it were, an interpretation of the word in the second book of Moses [Cap. 20, 24.]: "In which place I will call My name.

I will create a place of remembrance," as if he wanted to say: This place is Jerusalem, where the people of God must gather, where God dwells, where all in all distresses come together to call upon Him, to hear Him, to sacrifice to Him 2c. Therefore, you see where it comes from that even when they prayed in other places, they turned their faces toward Jerusalem, because they knew that this place was chosen so that God would hear the prayers of His own there. This is the honor of this place, which no honor in the world can equal. Therefore it is called in Matthew [Cap. 4, 5.] "the holy city" and here it is praised so gloriously by David, although it was desecrated by the Gentiles afterwards for the sake of sin. But why do people gather there?

V. 4: When the tribes go out, the tribes of the Lord, to preach to the people of Israel, to give thanks to the name of the Lord. 1)

Because the things, of which the prophet says, are hidden to the judgment of the reason, therefore the Latin interpreter could not translate clearly. But it is clearly the same opinion with what is written in the second book of Moses [Cap. 20, 24.]: "In the place where I will establish the remembrance of my name, there I will come to you." But "memorial" means the whole service of God with the word, that is, the preaching of the promises and the law, the service of the priests, not only in the legal sacrifices, but also in the supreme sacrifice of the preaching of the name of God, in which the spiritual consolations were held forth of the victory over death and sin, and the temporal consolations of the kingdom and world government. These gifts he praises, as he says of your going out, and makes the contrast: Other cities may be more prosperous in wealth and power than my Jerusalem, but this is the city to which the tribes go out, not par excellence, as there may be tribes in other nations, but "the tribes of the Lord", which the Lord himself chose to be his people, and he their God, above all other peoples on earth.

1) Vulgate: IHue eniin aäseenänt tribus Domini, in testimoninm Israeli, et aä eonütencinm noinini Domini.

whole earth. Furthermore, he does not exclude the Jews (proselytos) who had joined this people from the Gentiles. For he says par excellence of those who go out to hear the word and call upon God, as what follows shows:

"To preach to the people of Israel, and to give thanks to the name of the Lord." These two pieces indicate nothing else than that a place in Jerusalem was appointed by God for the teaching and praying of the Word. But this should be written in golden letters, that David says of no other places of worship than these two. He does not say that the temple was intended by God for the slaughter of sacrificial animals, for the offering of incense, or for the offering of food and drink, so that each one might show gratitude to God with his gifts. He mentions nothing of this, although it was commanded that these sacrifices should take place in the temple alone; he only remembers the sermon and the thanksgiving or the prayer. This was undoubtedly condemned by the sacrificers among this people as an exceedingly harmful heresy, that he did not speak differently of the service of God; just as our papists cannot stand it when we teach that church building is cursed (anathemata), that gold and silver ornaments on them are not worship. Therefore, if David were to preach today about our churches as he does about his temple, he would be condemned and burned as a heretic, because he neglects all the great splendor of the tabernacle, all the outward worship, as if he did not see it, and although he does not rebuke it, he nevertheless says that the main thing in the worship of God is to hear and call upon God. Of our papists it is certain that they did not build monasteries and other ecclesiastical buildings for the sake of it, nor did they teach to build them so that God's word would be heard; the main thing was that masses would be held there and that they would accumulate great riches while appealing to the eyes with this magnificent adornment. Daniel Cap. 11, 38. seems to have prophesied of this, when he says: "He will honor his god Maussim with gold and silver."

The churches may be decorated honestly, but this thing must have a measure. This is the most important thing that David praises in his tabernacle, and what we should look for in our churches, that the tribes go out to preach to the people of Israel, that is, to teach and hear God's word. For the Hebrews have many words by which the office of teaching or doctrine is signified, as they also have many words by which they express "wrath" and "rejoice." To speak, to promise, to confess, to sit, to judge, to witness, to teach, all these mean almost the same thing as with us the word to preach or to make an edifying speech (con-cionari). But the word "witness" has a beautiful derivation (etymologiam). For the teachers are, as it were, witnesses among the people to an unknown thing, which is not seen nor felt, but only believed. Then witnesses are also those who hear the word; for when they hear, they bear witness against the devil and the kingdom of the world, against sin and death, then also against the rebels, the adulterers, the murderers, the false brothers 2c., for GOD, for the glory of GOD, for the kingdom of GOD, for peace, obedience, chastity, love 2c. For GOtt is invisible. Therefore, when one hears those who teach, one hears GOtt. For He can be heard only through witnesses, and, as Paul calls it, His ambassadors, for he says [2 Cor. 5, 20.], "We are GOD's ambassadors." Thus the thing about which men are instructed in the church is also invisible and not present, and it is therefore grasped by the testimony of the Word alone. Thus the whole Gospel is a testimony; it speaks of absent persons and things and is a sermon of faith. This is what I wanted to say about the word "testify" for the sake of the simple.

This is why David boasts that his Jerusalem was built for the purpose of preaching the word of faith there, so that people might be instructed about the will of God, so that they might know what God intends to do with His own, how He intends to punish the impenitent.

The preacher calls this sermon "a testimony to Israel". He calls this sermon "a testimony to Israel," that is, such a testimony that is preached to the people of Israel who are gathered there. 1) For he distinguishes this people from all other peoples, as also in another Psalm [Psalm 147:20], where he says, "He does not do so to a Gentile." Therefore, we too should recognize this benefit and consider it the highest good that in our Wittenberg and in other places, as in Jerusalem at that time, the Word of God is taught purely, that the promises of God are heard, on which the godly base themselves with hope and confidence; Likewise, the threats by which the wicked are called to repentance, but the godly are preserved in the fear of God and in the slaying of the old man, being assisted by the Holy Spirit, whom the Father pours out through Christ and for Christ's sake on those who accept this testimony.

This is a part of true worship, that we learn what is the most excellent way to serve God, and to render to God the service by which He is most pleased, namely, to teach the Word of God and to hear God through His witnesses. And this is also the reason why the devil desires to hinder nothing so much as the preaching of the Word and the hearing of the Word. Therefore, as we have heard in the first Psalm [of the songs in the higher chorus, Ps. 120:2], he stirs up lying mouths and false tongues, he stirs up the world so that it undertakes to suppress the godly with sword and force; finally, he also tries against ourselves to do away with this service of God through contempt and weariness, where, on the other hand, he suffers with equanimity that churches are built and decorated. For he knows that his strength and power will not be broken by such things. But when eternal life is preached, the forgiveness of sins and the righteousness that is given to us through Christ, this teaching destroys his kingdom. That is why he rages so much and tries everything that he thinks could hinder the course of the word.

The other part of the service is that one gives thanks to the name of the Lord. This is an activity, the other a suffering behavior (activum - passivum). For the first thing is to receive the word or to be taught by the word. For although this is despised in the world, yet God so greatly esteemed it that all the temple utensils and all the manner of dress that was in the law and in the temple were figures and models of this ministry. But after we have heard the word, the next thing is that we also give thanks to GOD. This second service is directed by David, as he praises his Jerusalem. And here again it is to be noted that he is silent about the sacrifices and the slaughter. Though, as I said before, he does not reprove these things, yet he has a mind that discerns well, and esteems all the rest as chaff and broken pieces, and praises these emeralds, the word and its fruit, thanksgiving. If he had named the slaughtering of oxen and similar things, it would not have been in the capacity of each one to have been able to serve GOD with this kind of service. Therefore, he demands what all have and can do without great expense; and yet very few do it. He did not condemn the building of the temple, which would be done by Solomon, but desired it most. But here you see the reason why he desired it, namely, first, so that the word of God would be taught there, and second, so that God would accept our prayers there, our thanksgivings and our praise for the benefits we have received.

But why does he use this expression, that he rather says: "to give thanks to the name of the Lord", than: to give thanks to the Lord? Because they had nothing there but the name of the Lord and the mere word. God was not seen personally, but He had established the memory of His name there through the word and the promise; therefore it was also called "the house of the Lord" [1 Kings 8:10], because God had given testimony through His word that He would dwell there [Ps. 132:13 ff]. In this way, baptism in the New Testament is rightly called baptism or the water of the Lord, because the word of the Lord is there that God wants to be there and be effective. Thus, the oral word is rightly called the

1) Erlanger: xraeäieitur instead of: xrneäleatur.

The word is called the word of the Lord, even though it is spoken by a man, because the Lord promised that he would be with the word and work through it. Thus David declares that the noblest and greatest service of God is to teach and hear the word and to give thanks for it.

After this also follow the works of the second table, that one should help the poor according to his ability, that especially the mighty should use their goods, so that the church servants can wait for their office. These works also have their promises, that the Lord says [Matth. 25, 40.] that what we have done to the least of these is done to him, and that he who receives a prophet graciously will receive his reward. On the other hand, the judgment of the wicked will be all the more severe because they direct all their actions to the suppression of the word. In this way the divine services are to be well distinguished, or the most important parts of the worship of God from the less important ones, so that each one is placed in proper order and in its proper place. For this means to teach purely and rightly, and not to throw everything into confusion, as the unlearned and godless papists do.

So far we have heard how the prophet praises the inexpressible gift and benefit of God, namely the word, and gives thanks for it. For only this is a gift of which one recognizes and knows that it is God's gift. The whole world, as we see, has abundance and enjoys daily the benefits of God to the full, and yet this blindness remains in the hearts that they do not believe that they are gifts of God. Therefore, the world enjoys them no differently than the swine enjoy food and drink. But David sees that he has been given a kingdom in which the pure word and the pure worship of God are going on. He recognizes this gift and is therefore so full of joy, and praises his Jerusalem that it is the city where people come together, that is, that it is the place appointed by God for people to gather there to hear God's word and to give thanks to God; apart from this place, one cannot find God. For the pagans, of course, have did not have the will to serve false gods or idols, but since they did not have the word of God and this hearing of which David speaks here, they could not find God. From this it is easy to see how terrible a sin it is to despise the word or to be weary of it. For this surpasses all the abominations of Thyestes (omnes Thyestes) and everything that is only horrible in all tragedies, that a human being, such a vain and weak creature, rises to such hopefulness that when the divine majesty speaks and most kindly invites us to listen, he still does not want to hear. And yet we see that among all classes of men nothing is more common than this sin.

But this happens for the sake of the larva, that God no longer speaks in His majesty, as He once spoke on Mount Sinai, where the people almost died of fright [2 Mos. 20, 19.]; and yet, how short a time lay between, when they forgot the Lord and murmured against Him and Moses! In this majesty he no longer speaks, but speaks through a teacher, through the father, the brother, the schoolmaster; therefore he is despised. That now Sodom was consumed by fire that fell from heaven is appalling. That the whole world perished by the flood of sin is also terrifying. The daily examples of crimes, such as patricide, cannot even be heard without tremendous shock to the heart. But however this may be, it is far more serious and frightening to despise God who speaks to us, which almost the whole world does, not only those who pursue the word with obvious violence, but also those who are among us, and in the beginning received this teaching with great applause. For how many are those who spend more effort on foolish fables than on holy sermons? on the pursuit of money than on the pursuit of words?

David therefore exhorts us in this Psalm to gratitude and appreciation of this supreme benefit, and warns us to beware of despising God. Although no one who wants to have this name is a despiser of God, it is nevertheless certain that all those who despise God are despisers of God.

who despise the Word of God or the worship of God, who in our time disturb the congregations with new teachings, but boast with a full mouth that they seek God's glory. But they are all in this sin, for they esteem their thoughts higher than the Word of God. But how much more desirable is it to suffer pestilence, famine, sword, how much more tolerable is it even for David to become a murderer and an adulterer, if only the reverence for the word remains, which repentance necessarily entails, than to fall into despising the word? For this is the greatest wrath, as against it is the greatest grace to have the word with David, and to know how great a gift it is.

Now it is indeed presented to the world in great abundance: it is taught in the churches, it is written in books, it is presented in psalms and hymns, it is also painted on the walls, but what happens? The authorities take care of other things and ridicule our anxious concern to spread the word; most of the princes and kings pursue it in an ungodly manner and curse it; the citizens neglect it, the peasants love their Jáchymovs more than all the sermons and pastors; yes, we ourselves snore. Do you think that this could please GOtte? After that, when we are harassed by the Turks, when there is a fear of grain theft or war, we complain. These are indeed great evils that afflict the world today, but what is it compared to crucifying the Son of God and spitting out your Savior with a very sure heart? For what is that but to receive the word of God, which is revealed and offered to you for the sake of your salvation, disrespectfully, and to prefer peace, money and other very small advantages of this life? Those who do this, and yet with a sure heart disregard such a great sin, may not care for the punishment of being devastated, robbed and killed by the Turk! But this we do not do; we make our dangers very great; why then do we not also make the dangers of the kingdom of God great? Why do we not also grieve over the contempt of the Word, as we do over the grieve because of the tyranny of the Turk? For it is certain that sins shall receive their wages, death and other punishments which God inflicts. Thus Paul says [2 Thess. 2, 10. f.]: They have not accepted the word of truth, therefore God has sent them powerful errors, which make men's hearts foolish with great power. Likewise the 109th Psalm, v. 17: "They did not want the blessing, so it will remain far from them."

Therefore, to say briefly what it is about: Just as it is the highest joy and the highest good to hear and know that God speaks to us, proclaims grace and peace, so there is nothing sadder, nothing worse, than to see the contempt of the Word, than to reject God, who desires to speak to us, and to spit at Him as dung. No man can bear to be so despised as God must daily tolerate. For he is patient, and waits for conversion or repentance, but at last he punishes severely, as the fall of the synagogue and the destruction of Jerusalem is an example. For obviously Christ indicates this cause of such great calamity, that Jerusalem did not recognize the time in which it is afflicted [Luc. 19, 44.]. We are therefore to learn, warned by these examples, that it is the highest gift when one can hear God speak, and when He, as a mother does with her children, sweetly speaks (confabulantem) to us. For this is what David praises when he mentions it, that the tribes go out to the place where the people of Israel are witnessed to, that is, where the Word is taught, and those who hear it say Amen to it and give thanks to God. This is the city that should be adorned with emeralds, this is the people of whom Christ says [Luc. 8, 15.]: "Blessed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it in a fine good heart." Here is the kingdom of heaven, here is paradise, here are the gates of heaven open. Now follows:

V. 5 For there sit the seats of judgment, the seats of the house of David.

Augustine was troubled by the Hebrew way of speaking, as it is even ridiculously said that the seats or the chairs sit.

But it is a common image that the Hebrews say "sit" for remain, as 2 Kings 2:2. Elijah says to Elisha [Vulg.], "Sit here," that is, remain here. It could therefore have been translated in Latin thus: There are, remain, are found the chairs for judging, that is, the Lord has blessed this place that there should be judges. This can be understood of the world government and the church at the same time, although he is speaking mainly of the church. But it is a common way of speaking that the Hebrews put "judge" for teach. The meaning is therefore this: This is the glory of this people, that in this city there is a seat or chair where the word of God is taught, consciences are instructed, people are governed to blessedness. Thus it is said in the first Psalm, v. 5: "The wicked do not remain in judgment," that is, they do not persevere in the teaching of faith, but invent their opinions, therefore they are scattered like chaff. I think that even today these expressions are used in the Hebrew way: the Roman chair, the chair of Mainz, the chair of Trier 2c. And it is true that in these places they were chairs of the Lord; but now, because of ungodly doctrine and idolatry, they are chairs of Satan and seats where the scoffers sit.

This is therefore the correct meaning: In this place the word of the Lord is fulfilled, who promises that he will establish a memorial of his name. For here is, here dwells God; therefore here is life, blessedness, forgiveness of sins, righteousness; the tyranny of Satan is extinguished and removed 2c. For all this he says, calling it a seat of judgment, that is, the administration of truth, the service of faith, the voice of divine majesty, as GOD speaks with His people 2c. For, as I have said, "judgment" denotes the pure doctrine, which of the grace of GOD, of good works, of authority, of civil laws, teaches men rightly. Where this is, there are the chairs of judgment, as we can also boast today of our Wittenberg because of the wholesome teaching, by which men are taught rightly from the Word about righteousness, about sin, about grace, about the Faith, from obedience to parents 2c. This teaching is like a sun by which the churches are illuminated. On the other hand, where the word is not, there are the chairs of unrighteousness and Satan. For the word establishes and makes the chair, but is not made by the chair, as the popes ungodly claim.

But that he repeats: "The chairs of the house of David", this is the reason that he looks at the promise, made to David, that the seat of the tabernacle or the temple of his son should be built in Jerusalem, where judgment should take place, that is, the consciences should be comforted, frightened, instructed by the word of God. This is what David praises so much. That this is not so highly respected in the world, but is held in contempt, is the reason that we do not have such eyes as David had, otherwise it would happen that, just as the peasants now almost trample their pastors underfoot, they would treat them with the highest reverence. Is not a brother, through whose mouth God speaks to you and calls you to the eternal goods, to be highly respected and honored? But men do not consider this, they admire more the money and the splendor of the world than these rays of divine light and the most beautiful stars, as Daniel calls them [Dan. 12, 3.]. But it behooves us not to make ourselves equal to the world, and to recognize these gifts with David and pray that God may rather strike us with pestilence, famine, sword or wars, than let us fall into such contempt against His Word and its servants as we experience and suffer in the present world.

V. 6. Wish Jerusalem happiness: may it be well with those who lent you.

David first saw in the spirit this appalling contempt of the word or ministry of preaching; then he also saw that the honor of this gift could not be preserved by human power or diligence; therefore he turns to stir up hearts to prayer that this gift may be preserved, as if to say, "It is indeed the chair of divine judgment here, but how few there are who can use the same with due honor and

Most of the world hates him and wants him to be overthrown. Therefore I admonish you at least, you little host, that you be favorable to him, that you wish and ask for peace, that you greet him peaceably and lovingly and say: God bless you from Zion 2c. For this means to ask for that which is for peace, to wish that Satan does not hinder the course and the fruit of the word.

The cause of this exhortation is this, that as long as this city flourishes, you have God speaking, saving, giving victory against all the attempts of Satan, against sin, the terrors of the conscience 2c. Who, therefore, should not pray that these gifts may be preserved? And yet David learns that the kings of Syria, of Egypt, the Ammonites, and other neighboring nations hated no plague so much as Jerusalem, and the worship that was in Jerusalem. Therefore, he prays and wishes that all would have such eyes as he himself had, just as we nowadays exhort the popes and bishops, because they have the goods of the church, to use them for the spreading of the true service of God and the Word. But we learn that they do and intend the exact opposite, namely, how they would like to eradicate the Word and all our churches from the ground up. Therefore, this remains a prayer of a few people who recognize the gift of the Word and prefer it to all the treasures and power of the world.

Furthermore, this is a Hebrew idiom [in the Vulgate]: "Ask what is for peace" [instead of: "Wish for happiness"], because peace denotes what is good, wholesome and useful. Hence the greeting, "Peace be with you," that is, well be with you, good things befall you. But this verse has a beautiful fervor (affectum) in it, as if David wanted to say: Ah, why then do you hate this city, in which GOD dwells with us, talks with us, gives all blessings, spiritual and bodily? But this is the very reason why the devil and the ungodly hate it, because they cannot stand the Word and the true worship of God. The devil would rather have the parents sacrifice their children, he would rather have Mammon worshipped instead of God, he would rather have the children sacrificed than God, he would rather have the children worshipped than God, he would rather have the children sacrificed than God.

He also warns that other shameful deeds will be committed. Because the Word warns and guards against these things, he hates and curses them.

That he adds the wish: "May it be well with those who love you" is easy to understand. For he wishes all blessings to those who are favorable to the word and this chair of judgment, that God will again do them good. And this wish is also very necessary. For we have learned that those who accept the right doctrine are in danger in many ways; indeed, because today some do not rage against us as the popes and bishops would like, they too are in danger, and must experience even unjust disfavor (voluntates) from others. I am silent about those who teach the word and try to spread it; they are subjected to all curses. It is not hidden how the popes and the bishops feel, namely that they would rather endure the rule of the Turk, the devil and all evil spirits with equanimity than to see us remain unharmed. Therefore, the Church needs this prayer at all times, that the Lord will let those who love the Word and the service of God, or who are not opposed to it in any way, have abundance and be showered with all goods.

V. 7. Let there be peace within thy walls, and happiness in thy palaces.

What the Latin interpreter has translated: in virtute tua, is more correctly translated thus: "Let there be peace within your 1) walls." For after the prophet has admonished all who promote and are favorable to Jerusalem that they should not wish her ill, nor hate her, nor persecute her, he now turns to the city itself, and not only wishes her well, but also indicates to others a form of such wish. The short epitome, however, is that he asks that the service of God may flourish, and the ministry of the word be defended, and the ministers of the word be preserved against the false prophets, likewise that harmony may remain among the teachers; then also.

1) Erlanger: tua instead of: tuos.

that the world government and everything that belongs to it will be directed correctly. But daily experience teaches how necessary this prayer is. For where these two things are, namely worldly peace and harmony in the church, there is nothing more that could be asked for. That is why the devil opposes so fiercely, so that he disturbs this peace on both sides. That is why there was such a large number of false prophets among this people, and always such a large number of rebels, as the histories testify. Therefore, David, instructed by experience, prays for these two pieces, without which the world is truly a desert and barren sand.

Very close to us is the example of the times when we lived under the pope, before the light of the Gospel. Because the right teaching of the Word was missing, dear, what could all the theologians, monks, priests, lawyers and physicians accomplish? What verse in the whole Psalter did they understand correctly? Therefore, it happened that they could not even resist the obvious impieties and idolatries that took place in the places of pilgrimage, where they approved of palpable abominations and obvious silliness and forced the people to worship them. If anyone contradicted them with a single word, the monks would call him out as a heretic. So completely true is it that when the word is lost, the whole world is caught in the densest darkness, and cannot but abuse God's gifts. Scotus, Thomas and others had great gifts, but did they not completely misuse this gift for godlessness? Thus the jurists have misused the glorious gift of secular laws for their lusts and contempt of the Creator. Thus the physicians, among others, have generally despised godliness and admired that lovely delusion of Epicurus: Eat, drink, play, after death there is no pleasure. Thus it was necessary that people without the word either fell into obvious godlessness, combined with the highest security, or into despair. If this happens, what is the use of riches? of great gifts? of great power and other things that the world admires and seeks? This is what Da vid, and as an excellent poet he closes his poem with the wish that this Jerusalem may have peace, and the faithful servants in the church be preserved, and godly princes in the world regiment.

In general, it happens that this wish remains only a wish, because very rarely we see that it is fulfilled. Because it never happens that a whole people is improved. That is why David said: "Let there be peace within your walls", but it did not happen. For with human powers this cannot be maintained. Thus, if our cause had been in our will and in our powers, we would never have suffered the sects opposed to our teaching to arise. But this is governed by God in such a way that even the devil does not rest. Therefore, prayer is necessary, and what this prayer does not attain, no human wisdom can attain. Therefore, in addition to the need to persevere with teaching, work, and effort, prayer must also be added if this fruit of peace is to follow otherwise; and yet it will happen that not (to put it this way) the whole circumference will follow, but only the center, that is, the greater part will always resist; but the little host, as Christ speaks [Luc. 12, 32], accepts this peace and loves it; just as it never happens in the world regime that all follow the prestige of the laws; it is enough if there are only some, the rest must be kept in check by punishments.

V. 8. For the sake of my brothers and friends, I will wish you peace.

Here David shows the common complaint of all those who are at the top, both in the church and in the world regiment as well as in the household, that always the greater part is so completely wrong and evil that the hearts of the good are often stirred to despair. He who teaches in the church and is most eager to heal the infirmities of men sees that the greater part is only more provoked to it. When a godly authority carries out its office with the greatest diligence, it finds people who oppose it with great zeal and do the opposite.

part. It is the same in housekeeping. How often are you deceived by servants whom you thought would perform their duties with the greatest fidelity? When people experience such things, they are provoked to anger and impatience. A person who teaches in the church thinks of another profession in life, a person in authority would like to throw off the whole care for the community in such a difficult situation, a householder praises the monastic life, which does not seem to have such a complaint as those have to suffer who have to feed wife, children and servants. This impatience is, as it were, born with us, and yet it cannot be otherwise. For we have the devil for an enemy, who neither by day nor by night ceases to sow discord and harmful delusion in the church, disobedient and rebellious citizens in the world government, careless and unfaithful servants in the household.

Here, therefore, with David, one should have patience and not look at the greater part, which is always evil, but at the brothers and neighbors. Thus Paul says in the second letter to Timothy, Cap. 2, 10: "I endure all things for the elect's sake." For if these were not, who would desire to teach in the church? But these the Lord has strewn, as it were, as precious stones in the very deepest muck. Therefore, you should not think that you are preaching only to the precious stones, which one would certainly wish. But reason does not suffer this, since they are placed in the midst of the muck. So, if you are appointed to a civil authority, to a householder, first of all consider this, that it will not happen, that everything is only precious stones, gold and silver. That is enough for you if you see only one vein of silver in a whole mountain, as happens in mines; that is enough for you if you find only one or two small gems in a very large pile of mud. For the greater part in the church is always heretical and godless, the lesser part in the world regiment is obedient and loves virtue. That is why everything is full of troubles, because the most wicked successfully work against the most beautiful undertakings and advice.

But for this reason, do not leave the place and position in which the Lord has placed you, do not disobey God for this reason, and do not throw away from yourself the care that is commanded you. Think like this: God has said to me to be a ruler; he has set me to be a ruler of the people, of a family 2c. I will not abandon this profession, for then I would sin against my God, to whom I owe obedience; but even if the greater part should be evil, I will still carry out my office for the sake of the elect; for the sake of my brethren and neighbors I will pray for peace, I will exhort my own, I will do as much as I can, not for the sake of the great multitude, but for the sake of the brethren who shall be made partakers of our teaching. Among the nobles, among the peasants, among the citizens, among the adversaries, there are some good people, or at least those who are not completely wrong; for the sake of these, I will speak what is best before God and men 2c.

This is how I interpret this verse, that it may be a comfort to the secular and ecclesiastical authorities against the great multitude of wicked people and the troubles they cause to the godly. Our monks do not understand this at all. For they do not know any other trouble except that which they bring on themselves by not respecting the marriage state, namely, the rut of unchastity; but they do not feel the ecclesiastical and those of the worldly regiment. Because the prince of the world does not oppose them, but gives them everything abundantly, it is easy for them to rule. But now, through the Word, the churches are being purified, and the authorities are being properly instructed about their office; Satan rages in the palace as a mighty one, until a mightier and stronger one comes over him. In these troubles the heart must be fortified, and it must be remembered that, just as it was not begun at Satan's command, neither, if he opposes it, must it be thrown away, or that the profession must be abandoned, but that we must first serve our Lord, and then also our brethren and our neighbors, whom we often neither see nor know. For this reason, the churches must be instructed, the

But the commonwealth must be governed, not for the sake of the world, which is not worthy that a thief should be hanged, or a murderer's head cut off. But the Lord in heaven and the brothers and neighbors on earth are worthy of this office of authority, as follows:

V. 9. For the sake of the house of the LORD our God, I will seek your best.

The first reason why he prays and desires good is that he may serve the brethren, not the ungrateful and perverse world; the second is that God may also be served, and the house preserved, in which God speaks, prayers heard 2c. This should be profit enough for the godly; if some evil ones despise this or even dare to harm the godly, they will have to suffer severe punishments for their contempt and godlessness. Let this be enough for us, that we have sought the salvation of our neighbor and the preservation of the worship of God. For by the house here we must not understand stone and wood, but the service which was performed in this house. For it was not such a house in which nothing was done: the people prayed there, the Word of God was taught there, but God heard the prayers and gave answers (oracula), as is also said above [at v. 1.

But why does he add: "of our God"? Of course, so that it may be recognized that he speaks of such a God, who had made this circumcised people his people. This is also the reason why he does not, as the world does, seek to bring misfortune upon the people, or let his courage sink through the troubles of the world and church government, but after he is called to be prophet and king of this people, he endures and comforts himself with these two things: that he serves the brethren, then also his Lord, that he is not a useless servant, since he bears fruit to God, that he may be praised, and to his neighbor, that he may be saved. In this way we must also think that, even though not all are good and

We must be satisfied that at least some of them are good. If not all churches accept our doctrine, it should be enough for us that there are at least some who bear fruit for God and the brethren; for it will never happen that all become good. Whoever cannot bear this, let him become a monk, then he will certainly not have to suffer any hardships. Therefore we should remember that we should pray with David for the sake of the brethren and the house of the Lord, who, as this psalm shows, rightly recognized the power and honor of the word. Therefore he gives thanks, therefore he rejoices, not because of the amount of gold and silver, which he did not lack, but because of the word and the service. When these are there, all other damages can easily be healed. For then God remains, and the salvation of the brethren is sought; what more do we want than this? On the other hand, if the Word is not there and there is no proper worship, then we have lost God, mercy and the salvation of the Church or the brethren at the same time, and nothing remains but the blasphemous crowd, which is condemned.

Therefore David admonishes us in this psalm that we should learn to honor the word and seek its progress through faithful prayer, and not be frightened even if the majority is ungodly. Therefore, let others be godless at their peril, but let us give thanks to God that he gives peace and godly teachers who govern the churches with the Word. For where this is not, there must necessarily be troubled consciences, idolatry, ungodliness, murder, adultery, and similar abominations, which the Lord JEsus will turn away from our churches, and he will preserve for us this rest, the people who hold the priesthood and kingdom in honor. For these two words, though in common use and known, contain much more in them than the world and our adversaries understand. Therefore, they cannot pray for the preservation of these things, which they do not recognize.

The one hundred and twenty-third Psalm.

I lift up my eyes to you.

This psalm, as you see, is quite short, therefore it is a suitable example, which shows that the power of prayer is not in many words, but in the spirit. For even a few words can comprehend great, important things, if the spirit and the inexpressible groaning of the heart are added, especially if such distress lies on the neck that there is no time to speak a longer prayer. There are indeed wordy and long prayers in the Psalms, and outstanding among the other prophetic prayers is that of Daniel Cap. 9, 4-20. But every prayer is long enough when there is a strong fervor and recognizes the distress that befalls the saints, which does not have to do with small things, as the world considers the greatest, when one has to stand in danger because of his food or similar things, but when the church is oppressed by the weapons of tyrants, when the name of the Lord is desecrated by unrighteous teaching and the like, which actually concerns the honor of God and the salvation of souls. These dangers can almost not be expressed in prayer, which is why the saints pray in truth when they see and experience these things in the world with sadness of heart and anxious spirit, and seriously think about them.

In this way, this psalm is a prayer against the hopeful and secure, as the last verse shows. These are not only among those who adhere to ungodly doctrines, but also among those who want to gain honor with words and right doctrine, who rejoice in the title that they are God's people and the church, and who want to be made partakers with us of the name and honor of Christ, and yet are secure spirits who either ridicule or afflict those who teach rightly. There was a great multitude of such people among the people of Israel. For they had established the kingdom and the service of God by the word of God through Moses.

The prophets and teachers were so numerous that they had an abundant preaching ministry. But how they used to treat the prophets is shown in the histories. When Elisha sent one of the children of the prophets to Jehu in 2 Kings 9:1 ff, the others said, "Why has this madman come to you?" and the Psalms and the sermons of the prophets sufficiently prove that when they taught the people about faith and justification before God, they were ridiculed by the crowd, even condemned as heretics, because they seemed to take something away from the sacrifices and the legal worship. Thus, David was considered a rebel under Saul, and the accusation was brought against him that he was faithlessly seeking the kingdom. Afterwards, when he brought the ark of the covenant to Jerusalem and made known his joy out of a fine, good heart, he was received by his wife Michal with these words [2 Sam. 6:20]: "How glorious has the king of Israel been today, who has uncovered himself before the handmaids of his servants, as loose men uncover themselves!" But we must not think that it was Michal alone who thus evil interpreted the king's doings; there were doubtless other people at court, distinguished by wisdom and dignity, who judged likewise. For, whether you be a king or a prince or a teacher of the church, if you take the word seriously, the world will judge you to be senseless and a fool. The histories show that it has always been so in the world, and our time teaches us the same.

Therefore, this Psalm gives us a useful example, because we need to see and experience this hope and security, so that we may pray with David against the hopeful, that is, first against the pope and his whole kingdom, because these people not only despise us with a very sure heart, but also condemn us; then also against the false brethren.

and the defenders of new doctrines or old errors, whom we see so filled with hatred against us that they do not even let what is rightly said pass without blasphemy; finally, against the secure ones in our churches, as today there are the noblemen and the peasants who have money (nummati). For all these make believe that they will be fortunate if they ridicule us, do mischief, and even, if they are able, can inflict blows on those whom we try to teach rightly and godly in the church. Against them this prayer of the despised and afflicted children of God is to be prayed, who are considered by the world as fools, rebels, heretics and shameful people. But at the same time, we must hold on to this comfort, that because the Holy Spirit has so prescribed this prayer for us through David, it will certainly happen that we will be heard, and we will be transformed from despised people into those who are glorious in the kingdom of God. But this delay seems long to us, and it grieves us that we have to suffer that God allows us to be scorned by the evil and secure world for so long. Therefore, the commandment of Christ is a necessary one [Luc. 21, 19], that we should hold our souls in patience. But now let us finally come to the words of the Psalm.

V. 1. I lift up my eyes to you who sit in heaven.

This is a heavy sighing of a heart that is anxious and looks around everywhere, seeking patrons, friends, comforters, redeemers, but finds nowhere. Where then, he says, shall I flee, wretched and despised man? I have no strength with which to protect myself, I have no wisdom and no counsel, since my adversaries are so many. Therefore I come to you, my God, to you I lift up my eyes, you who sit in heaven. Thus he calls GOD, as the scholastics spoke, in individuo vago, or by a general appellation, an inhabitant of heaven, to indicate that all was full of scoffers, and that the godly are trampled under foot by all who dwell on earth, in the air, and in the clouds, that they are sweep-offerings [1 Cor. 4:13.] or the sweepings of the whole world; therefore let him alone remain who dwells in heaven, from whom he could hope for help and assistance. This greatness of the danger is expressed by the affectus, that he says, having looked around everywhere, he finds no help nor counsel but from him who dwells in heaven. This increases the temptation very much. That is why he prays in temptation with such words, which he himself perhaps did not fully understand at the time, as Paul also says [Rom. 8, 26.] that we do not know what we should pray. The Spirit indeed knows and understands these words, but man cannot grasp them sufficiently at the time of the challenge according to their greatness, since faith is still weak and in the struggle. But after what we want has been given and the prayer has been answered, then faith has its power, and we understand more fully both the challenge and the prayer that we have used in the challenge. In this verse, therefore, David sets the dweller in heaven against the dweller in the earth and the air, that is, against Satan and the world, and thus asserts that although the race is great and mighty, God is still greater. What is it then, if the world mocks thee and afflicts thee? Rather, see that God, with all the angels and His saints, looks at you, praises you and glorifies you. This verse indicates this with words that, as you see, are quite humble, but full of all the fullness of comfort, if one could only believe it. The Spirit, of course, who gives these words and awakens this groaning in the hearts of the afflicted, understands with how great earnestness this is prayed.

Furthermore, we have said in the second song in the higher chorus [Ps. 121, 1.] that the saints in the old covenant, when they prayed, did not pray to the God of heaven as such, as the Turks and the Jews still pray today, but that they turned body and soul towards the temple in Jerusalem. Therefore, what he says here: "To you, O Lord, I lift up my eyes, you who dwell in heaven," must be understood in such a way that he also confesses with his heart and mind that this inhabitant of heaven truly dwells in the tabernacle at Jerusalem. I have considered it good to repeat and remind you of this here, so that I may ward off the thoughts which, out of their own iniquity ascend to a mere GOtt and imagine that one must invoke GOtt in heaven. For the place must be paused where GOd wants to be worshipped. This was the place of the tabernacle in the time of the law and is rightly called in heaven, just as the servants of this place and these services are called "stars", and the people "the host of heaven", as Isaiah and Daniel speak, Isa. 34, 1) 4. Dan. 8, 10. 12, 3. We have said that in the New Testament there is not any physical place, but the fullness of the Godhead is in the one man and GOD, JESu Christo, and is found in him. His people or the believers are called the kingdom of God, as Christ 2) says [Luc. 17, 21.]: "The kingdom of God is within you," namely because Christ, the King of Heaven, reigns in the saints through the Spirit and His Word. So Paul says in the letter to the Colossians [Cap. 1, 12.] that we are seated in the heavenly goods, not that we are in heaven according to the body, but because the King who reigns, lives, speaks, works in us, is the King of heaven 2c.

This is necessary to know for the sake of keeping us on the right but nevertheless narrower road, and not to think that David, when he prayed, despised the temple. For those who did so were robbers of God and apostates, as they are called by the prophets. Therefore, let us add this gloss, since David says, "He who dwells in heaven" is the same as saying, "He who dwells in Zion or in Jerusalem. So with us there is no prayer apart from Christ, but everything we pray we pray in the name and confidence of our Lord JESu Christ, who so dwells in heaven, that nevertheless he is with us on earth according to his word and Spirit, and reigns in our hand, tongue, and all our members. For all the works of the saints are works of Christ who reigns in them. For heaven must not be separated from earth, just as David separated the Himmel and Zion or Jerusalem does not separate. For in Christ heaven and earth are joined together, or the same; in Christ all things are fulfilled, and in Him we possess all things. Therefore, whoever has Christ and believes has heaven and earth and all that is in them, just as God brought all things together in the place of the tabernacle in Old Testament times.

The swarming spirits always invent their own services, as the Jews looked for valleys, groves, lovely waters 2c.. These also wanted to be regarded as raising their eyes to God, who dwells in heaven, but they were mistaken. How, you say, is not this the heaven that is above our head? That's right. Isn't that the seat of God? Is God not found there? No; for GOD is in such a way an inhabitant of heaven, as he said in his word that he would dwell in the place of his tabernacle. Seek him, Saul, Ahab, Baasha, Jeroboam, and there you will find him according to his word. Nowhere else, neither in heaven nor on earth will you find him. The Turks also pray to God, the Creator of heaven and earth, but they do not find Him, because they do not believe or seek God in Christ. So the pope prays to the God of Augustine, of Franciscus, of Peter, of Paul 2c. But such a God is nowhere. For it has been His good pleasure that in Christ all fullness dwells; whoever prays in Him finds God's ears opened, whoever prays apart from Christ, to him God does not incline His ear. Therefore, one can easily judge the prayers of the papists, which are almost all based not on the name of Christ alone, but on the merits and intercessions of the saints. Therefore, it is impossible for them to pray this or any other psalm properly. For if one loses Christ or puts Him behind, then God is lost with all creatures, with the Scriptures and everything else that exists.

So this is an epithet of God, not as He is glorious in His majesty, as the papists think, but of the revealed God; not (that I say so) of a speculative one, or one that might be found by us, but of the God who is revealed by His Word, in which He reveals Himself as the revealed such a dweller of heaven, who would dwell with the ark of the covenant in the tabernacle. He is in fact the dweller of heaven, but not for me, since he tells me something else by his word, namely that he then wanted to be found and be in the temple, now in the man Christ. The idolatrous Jews, Turks and Papists do not know this rule of praying and worshipping God, nor do the founders of self-chosen religions, who think that they want to find God and serve Him according to what their hearts tell them. God does not know such worshippers and does not accept them, just as they do not know God. For God cannot be grasped by us merely (nudus); but the circumstances, namely time, place and person, do not have to be taken from our reason, but only from the word of God. Whoever has God in this way, as He is described according to the circumstances that are presented to us in His word, can then without danger name Him according to His majesty as the One who sits in heaven, as the God who dwells in a light that no one can approach, as the Creator of heaven 2c., as the prophets and apostles also sometimes use to do.

1) In the editions Lsa. 40, but this does not fit. There can hardly be any doubt that the passage we have placed is meant, for Luther placed the same marginal gloss to it as to Dan. 8, 10. 2) In the Latin editions: kanlns. It is possible that Luther had 1 Cor. 4, 20. in mind.

See, as the eyes of the servants look at the hands of their masters, as the eyes of the maidservants look at the hands of their wives, so our eyes look to the Lord our God until He is gracious to us.

The prophet makes use of two parables with which he ignites his fervor and at the same time makes the prayer more fervent, as if he wanted to say: The Lord postpones help; he makes those scoffers and sure, proud despisers flourish before our eyes, who boast that they are children of Israel and sit on the throne of Moses, and are therefore feared and honored. This delay seems to us to be long and burdensome, but nevertheless we should do what righteous servants and righteous maids do, that in this contempt and other dangers we do not avenge ourselves out of impatience, but look to the Lord and expect his hand. Thus the holy man confesses that God delays the help and prolongs the delay.

Nor does he determine the way or time in which he will help, but leaves the saints under the impression that the time and the way are without end, so that it seems as if they are suspended between heaven and earth. This is very difficult and makes the challenge exceedingly great. Therefore, one must hold on to the comfort that the prophet shows here, namely that the temptation will have an end, but not according to our determination, so that we do not dictate the time or the way to God. For God is, as in his nature, so also in the way of his acting and in his power, infinite, therefore he does not suffer that he is put in limits by us. Here, then, an example of patience is held up to us, that the hand of the Lord must be expected, and that we should not doubt the divine help, or that the hand of the Lord will surely assist us. For as soon as the first syllable or rather the first sigh of prayer begins, God grants and answers us: Let it be done. But we do not have to determine where, how, when, through which people he should give what we desire. For all this must be left to God to determine; we are to do what is our duty, namely, to pray and to look as a servant to the hands of our Lord.

In this way David teaches us by his example and reminds us that we should also wait, not lower our arms nor turn our eyes away from the Lord, but that we should press, persist, insist, as Christ also admonishes by the parable of the poor woman and the unjust judge [Luc. 18, 3. ff.], who, although he feared neither God nor man, yet by undue persistence is overcome and brought to decide the matter. For if the very worst man is not so wicked that he cannot be overcome by persistent supplication, what then should we not hope from GOD, who freely offers Himself to hear supplications, but also drives us by His command that we should ask, yea, that I may say,-what it is about, who is more ready to give than we are to receive? For that delay with which he postpones help does not take place in order that he may show that he does not want to hear us, but in order that he may give our

We are to practice faith, and we are to know the many and varied ways of divine help, which are so high above what we can grasp and understand. Therefore, we must see to it that the thing we ask for is postponed, but not denied, and we must never let ourselves be moved to interpret this delay as if he did not care about us. For the Lord wants to deal with us in such a way that he keeps his name, which David attributes to him in another place, namely that he is a protection in times of need [Ps. 9, 10]. This adversity is determined by him, it cannot be determined by us.

But in passing this is also to be remembered, that the Holy Spirit confirms at this point the household regiment; that it is permitted to have servants. And at the same time he indicates that it is a good state to be in service if only faith is involved, since the servants are introduced here to comfort the servants of God, and the patience and faith they have toward their masters is praised in them, so that they do not immediately run away at the first harsh word, nor are they so frightened by the severity of the masters that they throw away all hope in their goodness, but look to their hands and expect mercy. But David truly speaks of better servants and maids than they are today. For there is no kind of people more deceitful, negligent, and unmerciful, even when the most just causes are there to rebuke them. Therefore, those who want to be good must remember this example and this rule, which, as the Holy Spirit says here, is kept by the good servants, that they are not impatient, not stubborn (difficiles), but faithfully do their duty and look to the hands of their masters.

In this passage, however, the pronoun is to be especially noted, that he does not simply say: "Our eyes look to God the Lord", but he adds: "to the Lord our God", that is, to the God who has revealed and made Himself known to us in His word. For if it were without this, he would not be our GOt. Thus the gods of the heathen and the idols, which each one invents for himself, are called our gods, as such, which are invented and made by us, but they are not true gods; but this God is our God, who revealed himself to us in his word and promised to be our God 2c. Therefore, a Carthusian monk has no God, because he invents a God according to his thoughts, which are thoughts of the devil and not according to God's words. For he thinks so of GOtte, that he will look at his cap, that he will have pleasure in it, if he stands so long in the church, if he does not eat meat, if he does not go among the people 2c. But God is in truth not of such a nature, but it is absolutely an idol of his heart and a human opinion without the Word, even contrary to the Word and planted by the devil.

In this way always understand the word "our God", that is, the one who has revealed himself in his word, whom we have not formed, but who has formed himself and depicted in the word how he wants to be worshipped, adored, feared 2c. This true God of ours often seems to be a foreign God, who does not look at us, does not care for us. That is why godless people turn away from Him, seek the protection of the saints, of James, of Peter, sometimes also of the devil and the magic arts, since our God tends to postpone help, because these things help more quickly. But our God delays help so that He may test us and train us, and so that He may first bring us to self-knowledge, that we may recognize the corruption of our hearts, how easily we can be diverted from the true God; then that He may bring us to His knowledge, that we may learn how He wants to help us, as well as how He can do this in a much better way and easier way than human reason could ever have thought. -

V. 3. Be gracious to us, O Lord, be gracious to us, for we are very full of contempt.

This is what the psalm is dealing with (propositio), and the reason why he prays, namely, the contempt of the proud and secure people, which we also experience nowadays beyond all measure, and could not overcome it if we did not have such exem-.

We are only complaining about our evil, but something greater is that it troubles the hearts of the godly. But we only complain about our misfortune; something greater, however, is that it troubles the hearts of the godly, namely, that they see that through this contempt of the word and the church servants it will gradually come to pass that no one will want to take upon himself the office of governing the churches. For what gifted young man will want to lose his time and his possessions for the sake of it, so that he will finally get nothing but hatred and contempt for his efforts and his godly zeal? It is the same with those who are already in the service of the church; when they see that there is more prestige (dignitatis) and profit in other professions (professionibus), they are led by this contempt to think of giving up the care of the churches and retiring to private life, which is less burdensome and more profitable. Thus this contempt will deprive the churches of their rulers. But it is easy to imagine what will happen if the ministry of preaching falls away, namely that the honor and the kingdom of God and the blessedness of mankind will inevitably fall away at the same time.

Therefore, exhortations are needed so that we will not be overcome by this contempt, but let such despisers laugh at their peril and be secure in hope, but we remember that "he who sits in heaven" still lives. Therefore, as faithful servants, we are to do our duty bravely in the hope of the promise that he is a priest forever, and will lay his enemies at the footstool of his feet [Ps. 110:4, 1]. Whoever can drive this priest from his seat will also remain unpunished in that he has ridiculed the word and the ministry of preaching. The histories of the ancient prophets also teach us that they were similarly afflicted; and our Head, Christ, beloved, how was He mocked and treated by the haughty Pharisees! Therefore, we must not be offended by this scorn, but set our foreheads like a rock against the arrogant, and direct our ministry with teaching; then we must also pray that the Lord will preserve the ministry of preaching, which in this way, it seems, will surely fall away.

But even if it should fall away here in Wittenberg, in Nuremberg, and in other places for the sake of ingratitude, it will not perish everywhere. The Jews did not want the apostles, therefore the Gentiles admitted them; so also, although the places where the gospel is now taught should lose this teaching because of their ingratitude, God will raise up teachers and hearers elsewhere, so that this high priest may keep his kingdom. But the people who have so despised the godly teachers will be punished by seducers, as the examples of many great cities are before our eyes today. It behooves a good and faithful servant not to be discouraged, but to persevere, even when he feels that he is overwhelmed with contempt and is, as it were, urged to leave his profession. For the prophet uses a figure that is taken from a cup that is so full that nothing more can be poured into it, to indicate the reluctance that contempt forces out.

V. 4. Our soul is very full of the proud mocking and the proud despising.

This adds to the sorrow that people who are such despisers seem to do this with impunity, since they have an abundance of everything and are great and glorious in the world; therefore they also do harm by their example, dragging others into the same contempt. David and others were also rich and powerful, but we see that they were plagued and challenged with so many accidents and misfortunes both in their house and abroad that it did not even occur to them to be hopeful or secure. But it is different with the wicked; they seem to get riches, dignities, reputation, etc., as a reward for their safety. On the other hand, the saints are in affliction and misfortune and are taken for fools and fools by these secure people, as the examples of the highest prophets testify, and as we experience every day today. With the utmost diligence we try to dissuade people from avarice, security and other vices; they ridicule us, and when they hear about God's judgment and future punishments, they think that we are a

They tell a fable, as Aeneas tells it in Virgil's account of the underworld. If they too had to suffer misfortune and, as the ninth Psalm, v. 21, prays, had a master who taught them that they are human beings, they would judge differently. But because this does not happen, and they think that they have cause for safety and contempt, they must suffer and pray with David against them.

Thus, this Psalm is both an example and a consolation, that we may refrain from zeal for the Word and the confession of the Word or

We should not let ourselves be dissuaded from the preaching ministry because of the certain despisers, but rather comfort ourselves with the power and the promises of God, and think that if the wise men of the world, heretics, popes, Pharisees, most certainly ridicule us, they will in turn be ridiculed by the angels and the whole host of saints, but we, if we persevere in our ministry, will wear the crown that Christ himself has placed on us. Let the godly teachers hold on to this hope, and in the meantime bear and swallow the scorn until the wicked learn whom they have scorned. Amen.

1) VirAilü lik. IV, v. 242

The one hundred and twenty-fourth Psalm.

Where the Lord would not be with us.

That this psalm was written by David proves firstly the fervor of faith in theology, secondly the peculiarity in grammar. For these are the two main pieces that he has before others who have written psalms. But this psalm is a thanksgiving for the gift and mercy of God, that he preserves the kingdom and the priesthood, or, to put it more clearly, the whole nation of Israel. For, as you know, and Moses says to the people (Deut. 7, 2) 17, it was not because they outnumbered all the Gentiles that the Lord joined them, since they were fewer than all the nations, but because the Lord had chosen them and kept the oath he had sworn to their fathers. But the histories testify, and it can be sufficiently shown from the description of the holy land, that this people was situated in the midst of the Gentiles like a flock of sheep in a completely desolate forest. For all around were the kings of Syria, Egypt, the Ammonites, the Ishmaelites, the Moabites, 2c., who all with one accord persecuted them with the utmost hatred, Satan stirring up hatred with the intention that he might wish to destroy the service of God and to suppress the word of God. Even though the people of Israel were numerous, compared to the neighboring peoples, they were like one city compared to a very large kingdom. David sees this danger and thanks God for preserving his people against the fury of so many lions and dragons that, although they hate it with the bitterest hatred and all unanimously desire that it be destroyed and uprooted, they undertake this in vain. But it is truly a great miracle, if one considers this rightly, that this people could have remained, since so many devils raged against it; but since the thing itself is gone, and one reads this only written in books, it seems to be only a small thing and does not move the hearts much.

So the summa of the psalm is that it exhorts his own to thanksgiving and praise to the Lord their God, who sustains, defends and saves this little people against the persecution and violence of so many nations and kingdoms around, who hate and persecute it. It is also rightly sung by us, not only against our adversaries who publicly hate and persecute the Word, but also against the evil spirits. For we know from the Gospel [Matth. 12, 43. ff.] that seven evil spirits are now chasing us, while before we were threatened by only one. These do not cease to stir up the whole world against us, as the second Psalm, v. 1. f., says, so that there is almost no person in authority, however small (contemptus), who does not publicly show that he is hostile to the Gospel. But, as I have said, it would be tolerable if we had only the world for enemies, and not also the devil with all his angels and the gates of hell raging against us. But even that is not enough trouble and danger, there is even a third enemy, which is in us, which we carry around with us everywhere, nourish and even hold tenderly, namely the exceedingly holy mistress, the flesh, the old whore, which plagues us with sins over and over again, takes away our peace, fights against the faith, finally fights against the spirit in our members.

Since the church must endure these dangers, let us also sing this psalm to the praise of Christ, so that he will continue to protect us, his members, from all these enemies. For it would be extreme ingratitude if we did not recognize this miracle, that the church continues to exist, that there are people who teach, confess and believe in Christ, no matter how much Satan rages, how much the world and false brothers persecute, how much our flesh, like a wild beast, resists the word and the faith. This is the good deed that David praises here, and he wishes that his own people would also learn to recognize this and give thanks for it. Therefore he speaks:

v.1-3. If the LORD were not with us, say Israel, if the LORD were not with us, when men set themselves against us, they devour us alive, when their wrath is kindled against us.

Here you see immediately in the entrance how he addresses the people and admonishes them that they should sing these words with one accord and recognize this miracle and praise and thank God for having preserved this kingdom so wonderfully. But it is not only a teaching that they should do so, but also a wish and prayer in which he asks and wishes.

that they would do this, and it is true that this prayer or affectus indicates that Israel is of such a nature that it lets David sing what he likes, but that it itself completely reverses this song and does not ascribe these benefits to the Lord, its God, but to the kings of Egypt, Syria, its covenant partners, the Edomites" 2c., and that it says: If the king of Egypt were not with us, if the king of Syria were not with us, then our enemies would have devoured us alive. For it is known from the histories how much they always trusted in the help of the heathen and the neighboring kings.

Therefore this word of David is a word of faith, by which he insists on the first commandment, and endeavors to instruct his people by experience to practice the first commandment, that he teaches them that they are not indebted to their sword, not to their bow, not to their walls, not to their confederates, that they live, breathe, are safe and secure, and enjoy peace, but to the Lord alone. The flesh does not believe this, therefore it perverts this song to this day, and sings it in other words, as our people also prove by deed. These fortifications and ramparts with which they surround this city, what else do they say but that foolish men rely on this protection and think that they are strong enough to defend us by them against the power of the enemy? But if the divine protection of which David sings were not there, One Hour would teach that these fortifications could not withstand even the attack of a fly. For though fortifications, bulwarks, swords, implements of war are there, which we can use against the enemy, yet the word of the Lord teaches that chariots and horses cannot help [Ps. 20:8], that bows and swords, that someone's legs and the strength of horses cannot save [Ps. 44, 7. 33, 17. 147, 10.], but, as David says (who also had the kingdom, who struck down Goliath, who killed the bear and the lion) 1 Sam. 17, 37.: "The Lord, who delivered me from the lion and the bear, he also will deliver me from this Philistine," likewise, as he says here: "Where the Lord would not be with us" 2c.

Now if the Lord makes use of our weapons and swords, yes, if he governs and guides them, then they are happy; if he does not guide them, then they are also harmful. This was also recognized by the pagans, who had nothing but confidence in their own wisdom and powers, and yet they realized that neither wisdom nor powers could do anything in themselves. Therefore they attributed everything to fate, which they said was the deciding factor in war, and in the choice of a war leader (imperatore) they did not pay so much attention to his prudence (industriae) and bravery as to fate and luck. Thus, instructed by experience, they had the matter, but they did not recognize the cause, which is shown to us by the holy Scriptures, which say that it is God who gives victory to kings [Ps. 144, 10.], as David also testifies here that it is only the good pleasure of the Lord that this people, which was oppressed in so many ways, could not even be oppressed, but was victorious. If he does not give the victory, then the weapons are in vain; if he gives it, then everything is also in vain, which the world only always undertakes with weapons and all violence against it. In this way he goes back to the first commandment and excludes everything that is not God, namely armies, swords, weapons, fortifications, wise, prudent, brave people, money, which is called the main thing (nervous) in war, and says that all these together could not have preserved this people, but that the Lord had saved it.

We too must learn this, so that we know on what protection we can rely in truth and certainty. We want to let others who sing a different song enjoy their hope until they learn and experience that it is in vain. As the pope sings: If not the King of France were with us 2c. So sing our bishops: If Duke George were not with us 2c. For it is these in whose wealth, power and weapons the godless people trust. May they therefore sing as long as it pleases them, at last it will happen that their voices and the song they started so high turns into a hoarse braying of donkeys. We are indeed few and despised, whereas they are glorious, many, rich and great, but we will prevail and remain unconquered by God's goodness, if only we have the Lord with us and do not rely on human protection, but on the help of the Lord. For it is impossible that he who believes should be forsaken. Thus David inculcates the first commandment in this little verse.

Now this is a great synecdoche in the word "Israel". For the greater part of the people sang as I have already said, as our papists sing: If it were not for the king of Egypt, if it were not for the king of Syria with us; but to God, who is the right and only protector, they did not attach this praise, that he should protect. For this is not done by all Israel, but by the seven thousand whom the Lord had left [1 Kings 19:18], the rest of the multitude attributing it to wealth, power, effort, and the strength of men. Therefore David exhorts and repeats, "Where the LORD would not be with us, say Israel." But what would be the use of this repeated admonition if all of them freely recognized this good deed of God, and if it was not the greater part who thought that there were other causes of this good deed?

But here David shows that he is also an orator. As a dialectician he said that one should thank God for the preservation and defense of this kingdom, now as a rhetor he makes this danger great, since he says: "Men set themselves against us." For there is an emphasis on the word: "men," as if he wanted to say: We Jews are, as it were, the lowest scum of the earth and the least of men. But men stand up against us, that is, kings, princes, rich men, wise men, and all that is mighty and great in this world; all these are enemies to us, and hate us in a most tremendous manner: they set themselves against us in such a way that they seek to destroy and oppress us utterly. For if you turn to the east or to the west, to the north or to the south, and see how many and how great kingdoms surround us, all of them of deadly

If our enemies are inflamed with hatred against us, we are rightly considered like a sheep around which a hundred wolves are standing, seeking at every moment to pounce on it and devour it. Now that we are unharmed and the efforts of our enemies are in vain, recognize, O Israel, that it is God's good pleasure who defends and preserves so small an army by such a glorious miracle.

In this way, we too must confess, if we consider the wonderful divine government in ourselves today, that the power of the devil is so great that one of his angels could kill all of us who teach and confess Christ in an instant and involve the whole world in bloodshed. Now it is obvious that there are many princes whose whole aim is to oppress us. These are incited and assisted by the godless mob of the pope, the popes, the bishops, the monks 2c. What else can we say that it is that keeps us and defends us against this so great power, than that the Lord has closed his hand upon us very firmly, which stands firm like a brazen wall, and catches and averts the mighty arrows of the world and of Satan, with which we are attacked at every moment. That we thus live, that we still teach the Word of God, that you hear it, that there is a place in the churches where we baptize, that there are church ministers who administer the sacraments and govern the churches with the Word, of all this it is certain that the devil cannot stand it. Therefore, he sets the gates of hell in motion and yet has to suffer it because of the power of our King Christ, who sits at the right hand of God. This could not be defended and maintained in any way by human forces. That the devil's efforts sometimes succeed in confusing the churches, killing the teachers, and doing other such things, happens so that God may show us what Satan could do at any moment if he were not resisted by divine power; namely, so that we may walk in the fear of God and, recognizing with David that this is God's good pleasure, constantly ask God for it.

Therefore, we are to learn to sing with David:

"If the Lord were not with us, when men set themselves against us, they would devour us. For it is not strength, not riches, not wisdom, not our righteousness that sustains us, but the strength and power of Almighty God, which is held up to us in the first commandment, so that we may put all our trust in God, but despair of ourselves and our strength, and turn to a more certain and better power, which is in the power of God. For when we feel that we are weak, we must not despair for that reason, but look to Christ and have hope, because Christ is almighty, as He comforts us in the Gospel of St. John [Cap. 16, 33], when He says: "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world," that is, do not look to yourselves to see if you can overcome the world, but look to Me, and hold that My victory is your victory. So in temptations, when we are plagued by the devil, we should have good confidence for this reason, because Christ says: "I give them eternal life, and no one will snatch them out of my hand," John 10:28.

In the meantime, however, we must not omit or neglect what is our duty in the church; we must hold fast to the hope of divine help, and yet we must assist the church as much as we can with teaching, exhorting, comforting and praying. So the secular authorities should hold on to the hope of divine help, and yet not refrain from fortifying weak places and appointing guards at night and closing the gates. Thus a householder should not lack work and diligence in any respect, and yet he should be so minded as another Psalm commands [Ps. 127:1]: "Where the Lord buildeth not the house, they labor in vain that build it." For these are not only permitted, but also commanded means by which he will preserve the stewardship, the world government, and the church. But where these means are too weak to be able to withstand the dangers, God tends rather to prove His power by a miracle than to leave those who trust in Him. Thus, in the Church, God's power is before our eyes, which He exercises through godly shepherds who, through right teaching aversions. This means is in itself too weak to be able to completely eliminate the aversions, therefore, after His visible power, God also shows His invisible power, so that Arius is subdued by a sudden accident, Cerinthus is immersed in a bath, still others perish in other ways, by which God shows His Church that He disapproves of ungodly teachings.

In this way, David depicts in this passage the danger of the church and the godly, that the whole world sets itself against them, and not only that, but also has a raging anger, so that you can see that with the ability to do harm is also the will, the desire and the zeal to harm. So everything is full of danger on all sides: Satan walks around like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour, the princes of the world rebel and have a raging anger, and in addition there are terrible sins in our flesh and conscience. That we therefore do not at every moment either fall into despair or perish in some other way, is because He who is in us is greater than our heart [1 John 3:20] and the whole world, as David confesses: "If the Lord were not with us, our enemies would devour us alive." Now he adds a glorious similitude by which he further emphasizes the greatness of the danger and the power of the wicked.

V. 4. 5. So water drowned us, streams went over our souls; waters went all over our souls.

It is a well-known, but extremely puzzling and significant simile. The appearance of a conflagration raging is terrifying, but even more terrifying is a river that flows out and rushes impetuously, for it cannot be mastered by any force, by any power. Just as, he says, a river rushes with great impetuosity and sweeps away and destroys everything in its path, so is the raging of the enemies of the church; it cannot be contained by human strength. Therefore, we should learn to use the protection and help of the Lord. For what else is the church than a little ship tied to the shore, which is swept away by the violence of the water? or a shrub hanging on the shore, which the flood plucks up without any effort? Such was the nature of the people of Israel in David's time in comparison with the neighboring peoples. Such is the church today in comparison with its adversaries. So is every one compared to the power of the wicked spirit; we are like a little shrub which has sprung up by chance and has very little firm hold; but he is like the Elbe which comes out of its banks and with great impetuosity throws down everything far and wide. We are like a scrawny leaf hanging loosely from a tree; he is like a fierce north wind that uproots even the trees with great force and throws them down. How can we preserve or protect ourselves here with our strength?

Therefore, we must learn to throw ourselves on the word with faith, for our victory is nothing other than faith. For even though fortifications and weapons have their place, there is no protection in them if there is no confidence in God, which the first commandment holds out to us. For there we are shown that God wants to be our God. But we know that GOD has such power that nothing matters whether a strong wind or the great force of a river attacks a hut, however small, that lies in an open field. This should be our confidence and the epitome of our help, that God is our defender, so that the rivers and torrents do not take us away. The wicked do not know and do not believe in this defense and preservation, for they attribute everything to their strength, counsel and wealth. But Solomon was also a king who was well equipped in this protection, as the Scriptures gloriously praise his wisdom and wealth, but nevertheless he sings: "Where the Lord does not build the house, those who build it labor in vain. Where the Lord does not keep the city, the watchman watches in vain." What we have translated, "waters too high," in Hebrew means proud, swelling, impetuous waters that cannot be borne.

Up to this point David has instructed his own and at the same time exhorted them to give thanks. For he has taught us who our sustainer is, and Wherever we have to flee in danger, to whom it may be ascribed that we live, that we sleep safely, that we have healthy eyes, ears, hands, and that we have wife, children and other things which the Lord has given us, so that of course we have to write this verse over everything: "Where the Lord would not be with us. For it is not in our counsel or in our strength that we are safe together with what is ours, but it is the power of Almighty God that makes us able to stand in the midst of the floods of proud waters, as the example of our experience suggests that we may rightly sing this verse with David.

The Roman Pope Clement had set all the seas in motion, as if he wanted to swallow up all the churches with one breath; the devil, too, had done his utmost and sent many thousands of devils to Augsburg to incite the princes to oppress us. So there were floods of water there, but the Lord of the pope and the devil wanted their ungodly thoughts to be in vain and prevented it from happening. Thus we have been preserved by a manifest miracle beyond the ordinary, but our adversaries, as the seventh Psalm, v. 15, says, have born a fault. This is our experience, which we saw in the previous year. That we now have ours in peace after these attacks and undertakings of the wicked, that we still teach the gospel today, and the devil must be silent and the world must be still, all this happens through the beneficence of the Lord, not through our wisdom and power. Therefore we rightly sing with David: If the Lord had not been with us when men sat down against us at Augsburg, they would surely have devoured us alive. For it is not hidden how cruel counsels the bloodthirsty and false bishops had taken. Now these are the common miracles that no one sees but David and those who have the right knowledge of the first commandment, in which God says that he wants to be our God and defender, who wants to show mercy to many thousands who love him. Now follows the thanksgiving.

V. 6. Praise be to the Lord that he does not give us into their teeth to rob.

Here he does not admonish, as above, when he said: "So say Israel", but gives thanks for the benefits, for the defense and preservation, which he has thought of until now. Furthermore, the verbum (dat) is correctly read in the present tense, not in the past tense (dedit), as the Latin translation has it, in order to indicate the constant perseverance with which the guardian of the church watches without ceasing, so that we may be safe and secure from the persecutions of the devils and the godless people, who, like a hungry lion, seek predation at every moment and desire to tear apart and devour the church. The carnal Israel does not see these dangers, but lives securely and never thinks of the enemy, as the great crowd almost always does, especially when wealth and power are added. Then the people think that they live among the roses, do not give thanks to God for this protection and other gifts with which they are showered, but think that this happens out of a kind of natural necessity, so that they can enjoy peace and increase their goods; but for the sake of the elect, the wicked enjoy such great benefits. Afterwards, when either a pestilence or a war breaks out, and Satan is given the power to rage against people, only then will they learn to realize that they have been preserved and protected by God's power until now. Therefore, we should be careful not to disregard the benefits of God in such certainty, but sing with David and give thanks to the Lord our God, who is with us and prevents the hungry lions that have sharpened their teeth to devour us from harming us. Without this divine protection, there is no way in which one could resist Satan and his members, even for a moment.

V. 7. Our soul has escaped like a bird from the bailiff's rope, the rope is broken, and we are free.

Although, as I have said above, here are preterites, it is nevertheless rightly understood from the stopping of the dangers that the devil persecutes us without ceasing, and prepares stalkings from which we escape by the grace of God, like a bird that is already caught in a torn net. For the devil is so close on our heels that it seems as if he already wants to seize us, and yet we escape through the help of the Lord, even though we seem to be caught already. But here I must remind you to pay attention to the peculiar way in which the Holy Spirit, as the very best painter, paints the adversaries of the Word. He has already expressed the greatness of the danger above sufficiently, since he compared the anger and the raging of these people to the flowing waters that rush along with great force and impetuosity, not only for the sake of showing what the adversaries intend, but also so that he reminds us of ourselves that there is not so much strength in people that they could bear it, or that they could not be so strong, that they could endure this, or that we could defend ourselves with human strength against such a great host, namely, so that in such dangers we would not only forget the human protection that seems to be available ¹⁾ but also completely despair of it, and only base ourselves on what he said in the beginning: "Where the Lord would not be with us." But here, as it seems, he paints not only the danger, but also the authors of the dangers themselves, that is, the enemies of the Word and the adversaries of Christ. First of all, he compares them to wild animals that seize their prey with their mouths or teeth. For before other wild beasts, those that tear with their teeth are more cruel, fierce and savage, like wolves and lions, especially when they are also provoked by hunger. Therefore the Holy Spirit indicates that in the opponents of the Word there is a special fearfulness, ferocity, cruelty, rage, which cannot be satisfied unless the confessors of the Word are torn to pieces and killed, just as a hungry wolf that comes among the sheep is not satisfied because it has killed and torn the sheep. This is the first part of this painting, how for Scripture everywhere calls them without image bloodthirsty, cruel people, quick to shed blood, and all the histories of the people of Israel and of the church among the Gentiles testify to the same.

1) In the original edition: npxom, which has been changed in the editions to opponi, which seems unnecessary to us.

But the opponents of the word do not show this so wild, merciless and cruel heart, but cover and adorn it with the hypocritical pretense that they are endeavoring to seek harmony, to heal the discord, as this other parable of the birdcage shows most beautifully. A birdcaster does everything fraudulently that he can: he scatters food in front, he has a number of little birds that surely sing as if it were well with them, even the birdcaster himself whistles something, so that, if one looks at the appearance, everything is arranged in the friendliest way. But who does not know what great danger is caused to the poor little birds by these hypocritical services? For the ropes are hidden. But even if they were in plain sight, they would not have the frightening appearance of drawn swords or the bared teeth of wolves. But why is all this done by the birdman? Is it not so that he can wring the necks of the captured birds and strangle them? Thus this picture shows in the finest way the cunning, the slyness, the deceitfulness and treachery with which the adversaries of the word cover their rage and their cruelty, while in fact they intend nothing else than to catch and kill us.

Such a diabolical fowling they practice over and over again, and with the highest cruelty they combine the utmost cunning, as they have shown by obvious examples. I say nothing about the Edict of Worms, but I have already mentioned the Diet of Augsburg. There, the devil's bird-catchers, the pope and the bishops, who were, as it were, engaged in bird-catching, had Carl, the noble and peace-loving heart, come to Augsburg as a night owl suitable for their bird-catching, not out of zeal for harmony, as they pretended, but so that, if they were to join them, they would suppress the rest of us, as they dismissed the rest of us with this final answer: they would not only pool their power and goods, but also their blood, to suppress our doctrine. There, finally, the treachery and cruelty of these fowlers of the devil became evident, but they were countered by the mildness and kindness of the very good emperor, in that God thus broke the rope and freed us. So this experience of ours and the exceedingly puffing pictures of the Holy Spirit, with which he depicts the adversaries, agree with each other that they are not only cruel, but also cunning, and that there can be no other protection against them than that the Lord breaks the rope and rescues the godly, according to the words: "Where the Lord would not be with us.

Furthermore, such dangers and salvations are also perceived in private life. How often it happens that those are preserved who already seem to be overwhelmed by death! How often do such people emerge from the water, for whom there was no hope! How often does it happen that people who take a dangerous fall are not injured? We rightly attribute this to the protection of the good angels, by which they protect us from Satan's persecutions by God's command. For we are preserved without our counsel, even when all our strength and all our counsel force us to despair. These are private matters, but they are nevertheless signs of public comfort, which David remembers here, that God is there and sustains when it seems that we are already perishing. Thus it is said in Ps. 94, 17: "If the Lord did not help me, my soul would almost lie in silence." For this is what we experience in those who are weighed down in spirit by sadness; when they already seem to despair, comfort shines upon them, as it were, at the last moment 2c.

So now our life is exposed to the snares of the devil, and we are like the foolish little birds to whom Satan sets nets, not only that he may take our life, but that he may plunge us into sin and entangle us in other misfortunes. If he can kill, he does it; if he cannot, he at least causes us to fall through danger. For he is the father of lies and a murderer. That we therefore are not deceived, but are protected from lies and sins and live safely, all this is God's gift.

For this reason it sometimes happens that Satan works out what he wants and does harm either to the bodies or to the souls, so that God may remind us of such dangers and awaken us to faith and prayer, so that we may implore His help against these endless and innumerable snares and, when we are saved, give thanks to Him.

V. 8 Our help is in the name of the Lord who made heaven and earth.

This is the conclusion of the thanksgiving, which contains the glorious teaching that against sin, death and other dangers there is no help but the name of the Lord. If it were not for this, he says, we would fall into all kinds of sins, blasphemies, errors, even into all dangers. But our help is in the name of the Lord, who protects us against these things and preserves our faith and life against the devil and the world. Like the previous verse, this verse also proves that God allows His saints to be challenged and in the challenge, as it were in the water, to get into danger in such a way that it seems as if we would have to sink. But he comforts us that he will finally not abandon his own, so that we may learn from this as an example of the divine will and seek salvation in the Lord, who therefore tests his own in the furnace of Egypt, so that he may kill the old man with his confidence and the trust he has in his righteousness and his powers.

All these experiences belong here. For it will never happen that someone becomes a Christian through his thinking (speculative) and his teaching; the practice is necessary, that is, the cross, which must destroy the flesh, so that man despairs of its help and throws himself on the divine help and awaits it in patience and hope. For this is the will of God, and it does not take place that we imagine another God than the one who wants to help the weary and those who are burdened with despair and other misfortunes. To know this teaching is a part of this victory. For those who do not know it will immediately, when temptation comes, do just what the devil seeks and desires, that they either despair or seek other help. Therefore, we are to learn from this Psalm that God deals with his saints in such a way that he exercises them and lets the waters fall upon them, likewise that he allows ropes and ambushes to be laid, and makes every effort, not to destroy us, but to show us himself and teach us to hope for his salvation. But good for him who recognizes these things in this way. For the flesh looks at the power and the multitude of the adversaries and its abandonment and weakness; but that it should hope in God and expect His help, it does not.

Therefore, this command is necessary: "My help is in the name of the Lord, who made heaven and earth. This is a short word, but it presents us with a very important teaching and comfort, of which we are in great need, especially in these last times. For we see with what fury the pope and most of the princes persecute the teaching of the Gospel. Dear, what are we against this great mass of the world? Yes, even if there were no power of men to fear, what are we to do against so many devils and the gates of hell? And yet, even if we are seized and oppressed, we experience that we are not abandoned to the utmost, but are safe in trusting in the help that is in the hand of the Lord. But it is impossible for us to attain to this wisdom without constant tribulations, by which confidence in carnal protection must be destroyed. "For affliction teaches to take heed to the word," as Isaiah says [Cap. 28:19], that we cry out: O Lord, it is come to our aid! So in the last hour, when death comes, neither the emperor's nor the kings' wealth and power, neither righteousness nor anything else can calm the heart, but only in this help of the Lord's hand can one find right and safe rest. Those who then say, "My help is in the name of the Lord," die blessedly and are out of danger. Thus this Psalm belongs to the first commandment, that we should learn what it is to have a God, namely to come to rest in trusting in the mercy and help of God in all dangers.

So these are words of a victorious and triumphant faith: "My help is in the name of the Lord, who made heaven and earth", as if he wanted to say: My God and my helper is he who made heaven and earth. You, my adversaries, show me one who is like this God! What then are your cords against this God? what the threats, the power, the counsels 2c.? Thus he opposes the greatness of the dangers, the floods and inundations of the temptations with this eternal God and devours, as it were, with one breath the whole raging of the whole world and of hell, as a drop of water is consumed by a great conflagration. And indeed, what is the world with all its power, weapons and riches, when you look at Him who made heaven and earth? Therefore may it rage and be unwilling, if only this help remains for us; even if we have to bear and endure something, we will finally retain the victory. Amen.

The one hundred and twenty-fifth Psalm.

Who hope in the Lord.

The preceding psalm was a thanksgiving and a sacrifice of praise for the saints to know that they are being helped faithfully and in due time; this psalm, which follows, has almost the same content. For it belongs to the doctrine of faith, and exhorts To the Faith and hope based on the help of the Lord, which he adorns and praises with glorious promises. Now it is also easy to understand this psalm from the foregoing. For all this wisdom is based on the fact that we have lost sight of all this.

We are to set forth what the flesh can comprehend and, according to the word, to hold the very opposite of what we know, feel and see. For this psalm is actually directed against philosophy and human reason. It is necessary, says Aristotle, that he who has insight conceive ideas (phantasmata speculari); but here it is quite different. For a Christian does not have to conceive anything at all, and yet he must have insight and be wise, since he sees, hears, and experiences the opposite. He who lies on his bed in the face of death cannot, according to his reason, bring about anything else with his thoughts (speculari) than the idea of death. But a Christian abandons this idea and knows that true life is there. But, you will say, he sees, feels and experiences death, he does not feel life. Quite right; but because he clings to the word and judges according to the word and not according to his feelings, he sees nothing but life even in death, and nothing but the brightest light in darkness. For just as God makes everything out of nothing and light out of darkness, so does his word, that even in death there is nothing but life. Those who therefore adhere to the word of God that promises and follow it, will finally experience what David says elsewhere [Ps. 33:9]: "When he speaks, it comes to pass; when he gives, it stands." But before one reaches this experience, one must suffer something; therefore such an exhortation is necessary, as this psalm holds out.

v. 1. Those who hope in the Lord will not fall, but will remain forever, like Mount Zion.

That he uses the simile of Mount Zion comes from the fact that Jerusalem (in which Zion was), since the temple was built there, had glorious promises of God, as they are everywhere encountered by us in the prophets, that it should stand invincible against all adversity, because God dwelt in it and was there, as it were, a citizen, who had his hearth or his fireplace in this city, according to the promise which says [Ps. 132, 14.]: "This is my rest." Therefore another Psalm [Ps. 48, 5.] boasts: "Kings are gathered there, they saw them, and are with one another

The same is true of other kings, as the histories show, which relate that Jerusalem remained unharmed in the most extreme dangers, not through the bravery or the counsel of the citizens, but through the power of God, who dwelt in her, and thus adorned and defended her commonwealth. In this way, the prophet uses the name of Mount Zion. Just as, he says, Mount Zion and our holy city Jerusalem do not fall, but remain unharmed and emerge safely from the greatest dangers, so he who wants to be saved, to live, to be healthy and unharmed against all dangers of the world and the gates of hell must trust or hope in the Lord.

Pay careful attention to this teacher, who does not command any work, as in the papacy monasticism, pilgrimages, fasting and other foolish services have been imposed on people in danger, but leads them in the simplest way to God and to the first commandment, and says: this is the highest salvation, that one trusts and hopes; only through this service is a favor done to God. For this is God's way, as I said before, that He creates everything from nothing. Therefore, in death he creates and shows life, in darkness light. This is exactly what faith believes, according to its nature and its very essence. Therefore, if God finds such a person who rhymes with his nature, that is, who believes in help in dangers, life in death, riches in lack, righteousness in sins, and only for the sake of God's or Christ's mercy, God can neither hate nor abandon such a person. For he is a true servant and worshipper of God, since he trusts in the mercy of God. In these alone: God's services are pleasing to him, because he takes pleasure in making something out of nothing. This is how He created the world from nothing, this is how He raises the poor and oppressed, this is how He justifies sinners, this is how He makes the dead alive, this is how He makes the damned blessed.

Therefore, one must hold on to this rule: Whoever agrees with the nature of GOD and obeys His will by er-

Waits where there is nothing, it is he who pleases God and who will not fall. But here we need to be warned that we should not invent a false hope for ourselves, which is contrary to the Word and our profession, just as if someone did not turn to the bridge and wanted to cross the Elbe on foot, trusting in God, he would surely drown. Likewise, if a minister of the Word were to neglect his office and, trusting in God, were to go to war and engage in warfare, he would be acting foolishly and would deservedly perish in the danger he loved. For this is the first thing, that every man may be sure of his profession, his doctrine, and his life. If you do this and do your duty, even when dangers appear, trust and hope, and your hope will not be in vain. Thus he who lives in marriage and in a certain state has his profession. If Satan hinders this, or the neighbors, or the servants, or even his own weakness of heart, he must not give way, nor let down his courage, but if he meets with any accident, he must hope in the Lord. If then the Lord does not bring help in his time, let him call me and David liars. For here, namely in the works of the profession, God has commanded that one should hope and trust in His help. But if a work is chosen apart from the calling, of which you cannot be sure that it will please God, there is no hope, but rather presumption and temptation on God's part, so it cannot go out well.

Therefore, this confidence in the Lord requires that you be in the place, in the work, in the conduct that is proper to your calling. Thus, whoever is called to teach the churches is certain that he is in such a state in which he should faithfully carry out his ministry according to God's will. But the devil prevents this in many ways. He fills peasants and citizens with hatred against the preaching ministry, then he also arouses the enthusiasts. Here remember that your ministry is going on, and that you hope for help and do not let yourself get tired, since you know that God wants this. Even if you have to put your life in danger, do not refuse, because God will not suffer your hope to be in vain.

Thus, those who are in the office of authority know that it is God's command to execute the evil-doers, so that licentiousness does not get out of hand and the good are safe. If a person in authority strives diligently to do this, he cannot avoid hatred and enmity. For those who want to see this go behind themselves and would rather resign from office than endure such great hatred. Thus they allow themselves to be driven out of their profession by these horrors of danger because of the weakness of their hearts and would rather keep the favor of men than be obedient to God's will. Above all, if a teacher of the church wanted to look at this, he could see through his fingers in such a way in very many things and moderate his speech in such a way that he would not be rebuked by anyone. But this is not allowed in any way; rather, since you are sure that you are called to administer a magisterial office, exercise your office without any fear of danger. But if any thing befalls thee, commend thyself to God, and think, if God will have thee perish in this manner, that thou bear it with equanimity. If everyone would bring this hope to his state, everything would be arranged far more beneficially. Now there are very few who do this; the greater part would rather leave their office than hope in this way and put themselves in danger. That is why so much damage is occurring everywhere, both in the church and in the world government, as obvious punishments for this mistrust, from which this psalm admonishes us, and for disobedience.

Therefore, one must see to it that this article of faith in the mercy of God and divine help is not stained by presumption or temptation of God, which is found in a false profession, for there fall and ruin must inevitably follow, just as, on the other hand, he who hopes and trusts in obedience and in his profession will remain unmoved like Mount Zion, even if Satan undertakes and tempts everything. He will indeed do harm and cause grief, and the cause will be that it seems to you as if you are abandoned by all creatures, and yet in the end he must go away as a conqueror, if you have only put your trust in the Lord. Thus, at the last Imperial Diet in Augsburg, because the princes were so unanimous, our cause seemed to be completely lost, and yet we are still alive and enjoying desired peace, against the will of the devil, the pope and all enemies of the Word. We must get used to this conflict, so that we do not immediately lose heart when we see that our cause is being defeated; but the more danger there is, the more steadfastly we must hope; so it will finally happen that we, as the defeated, will be victorious, and the victor will declare himself overcome.

This is that the Psalm sings, "They that hope in the Lord shall not fall, but shall abide for ever as Mount Zion." Truly a glorious promise, that it is certain that we shall abide. Therefore, if we do not remain, it is our fault, because we do not persevere in faith. For this promise must necessarily be true. For just as it is impossible for God to deny Himself [2 Tim. 2:13] and not be God, so it is impossible for Him to abandon those who hope in Him. But we need not fret over the delay that intervenes. For God's power cannot have a place until we have come to the uttermost, to use the words of Scripture, emptied and stripped of all protection. In this way the Lord reveals Himself only when the little ship seems to be already completely covered by the floods, 1) and receives it, since it is already sinking, I say, as the two histories in the Gospel, the one of the little ship [Matth. 8, 23. ff.], the other of Peter's danger [Matth. 14, 30. f.], testify. As long as it seems that the danger can be averted by our counsel, divine help is not necessary.

V. 2 There are mountains around Jerusalem, and the LORD is around his people from now until forever.

1) In the Erlangen edition the words are missing here: viäetur üuotibus, turn vominn 86 revelIM.

First of all, notice the extremely strong synecdoche that David uses when he says: "The LORD is about his people." For where there are a hundred thousand times a thousand people, there are barely seven thousand among them who have or believe in God, and yet for the sake of these seven thousand the whole multitude is called "the people of God." Thus, even though most of the people of Jerusalem were wicked and ungodly, Jerusalem is called holy, not only because of the few holy people who dwell there, but in truth more because God Himself dwelt there. Thus, even though Lot alone, like his two daughters, was righteous in Sodom, the angels could not destroy Sodom with fire as long as Lot was there. In this way, where there are four, five, ten holy people, a whole city is considered holy. For these are the precious gems of God and the cornerstones and chosen stones, which God holds in such high esteem that He regards many thousands of people as nothing in comparison to them, even doing good for their sake to those who do not deserve it.

This people now, he says, is surrounded by God's protection as Jerusalem is surrounded by mountains. So also in Zechariah [Cap. 2, there is a prophecy of the city whose wall shall be a fire. These pictures depict the Church of God, the weak little people, or rather the small army, that it is invincible against Satan and all dangers. This promise we should include in our hearts, who today have the word of God, in whom God speaks and is believed. For where this is, everything is exceedingly well fortified, not with mountains and walls of brass, but with the Lord Himself. Who can destroy or overthrow this fortification, this bulwark? But all these things must be judged, not by what we see and experience, but by word and faith. Therefore, it is far easier to teach than to believe that we, who have the Word and believe, are surrounded with divine protection. If we saw walls of brass and fire around us, we would be safe and defy the devil, just as there is no one who does not believe that he is safer when he has a band of horsemen to accompany him than when we walk alone through uncertain regions.

have to travel. But it comes to faith that one does not rely on what the eyes see, but on what the word indicates. Even though this is not seen, one must believe it and consider it as certain as if one saw it with one's eyes, for God cannot lie. So there is one thing missing, that we do not have eyes of the spirit, but only follow the eyes of the flesh. Otherwise, we would not be more afraid than those who, within the walls of an impregnable fortress, fearlessly await the futile attempts of the enemy. Therefore, we should not doubt that as long as we believe, we are surrounded by fiery mountains, that is, completely impregnable. But blessed is he who believes!

For if this had did not do so, the state of affairs shows how great the wickedness and power of Satan and the world are. But what are we, who nowadays hold fast and confess the word, against such a great multitude of enemies, who are bent on oppressing and killing us every moment? That we are therefore preserved is thanks to these mountains with which we are fenced and surrounded, so that Satan and the world cannot harm us.

These mountains are the angels, not individual (privati) citizens, but mightier and loftier than all the mountains of the world; if they did not take care of us every moment and protect us, we would have to suffer much more terrible things. All those who know and believe that the devil is a liar and a murderer will testify to this. Since he cannot see, cannot hear, cannot tolerate the godly, but desires that they be destroyed and exterminated, is it not a manifest sign of this protection that the godly nevertheless daily teach, baptize, comfort, and do other such things? It is true that sometimes he hurls his arrows at us, as if through a window, and injures us a little, but he cannot cut us down.

The simile seems to be taken from the story of Elisha, which is found in 2 Kings 6:12 ff. When the king of Syria learned that he was at Dothan, he sent a large force there to besiege the city and capture Elisha.

Early in the morning, as the prophet and his son were about to set out on their journey, the boy saw the enemies pursuing them and was terrified by the danger. The prophet comforted him and exhorted him not to be afraid; there was greater power with them than that the great multitude of enemies could do them any harm. But since the servant saw the multitudes of the enemy, and could nowhere see with his eyes the help of which the prophet spoke, he could not put away the fear which the present danger had aroused, until the prophet asked the Lord that his servant's eyes might be opened. The text there says that he saw the neighboring mountains full of fiery chariots and horsemen surrounding and protecting Elisha. This protection, which the prophet's servant apparently saw before his eyes at that time, but which the prophet believed, even though he did not see it, says the Psalm, is around all those who trust in the Lord, just as the 34th Psalm, v. 8, says: "The angel of the Lord camps around those who fear him." But our eyes are closed and do not see these miracles, which we experience daily.

Now this promise of God is not deceptive, if only we do not deceive ourselves. If we therefore believed, we would surely live, sleep, die, yes, what is even more, we would also suffer safely and confidently. For we would think like this: If I have to suffer some kind of accident, it is certain that I will suffer it according to the great counsel of God, not by chance, but for a certain reason, which I do not see and perhaps do not understand now. Therefore, even if Satan punctures the wall in one place, he does not break down the whole wall for that reason. This is how we should think in dangers and take comfort in God's good will toward us. But in ourselves we can take an example of how few do this. If we had a hundred thousand men of war, we would attack the Turk with great courage, but that we should rely on this promise, even if the number of men of war were not so great, does not happen. So we fear and are terrified even in the dangers that hit us in particular (privately), but the security that faith brings with it er-we never go. This is how we suffer the punishments of the unbelief we cherish, even though we are warned against it by so many important sayings in Scripture.

Furthermore, it is not enough that we are protected by fiery walls, that is, by the guard of angels, the Lord himself wants to be our wall, that we should be fenced in and defended all around by the Lord. Above us the Lord is a heaven, on the sides he is a wall, under us he is a solid floor on which we can stand: so we are well protected on all sides. Now if Satan hurls a projectile at us through these fortifications, he must necessarily wound the Lord himself rather than you. But woe to our unbelief that we hear this in vain. But it must be taught and learned, so that we may not be without all counsel when it is needed. For it is certain that the hour will come when we must either learn this or perish.

But one must also note the emphasis of the word, "For his people." For he calls the people of God the people who have God (Deum), that is, who trust in God and believe God. Thus, the people of God who sacrifice in Jerusalem and walk in the law or customs of Moses are not God's people per se, but the people who have already become God's people, who can also perform these legal things and give thanks. For it is something much more sublime and greater to be God's people than to accomplish these legal things, as our conscience also testifies to us. For it fears that it should, as it were, exalt itself to this pride, that it should boast that we are fey children of GOD and servants of JEsu Christ; and yet the first commandment attaches both to us, since the LORD says: "I am your GOD." The real (specific) difference of the people of GOD is therefore, not that they do lawful works or even the works of the second tablet, for these can be feigned and deceive, but that they believe and have GOD; this characteristic does not deceive. That he adds: "From now on until eternity", does not actually show eternity, but an indefinite time. For even the bodily promises would have been eternal if the people had kept the commandments of God. But because they took it upon themselves to cut off the promise of Christ through their unbelief, they also lost the bodily promises for this reason.

v. 3 For the scepter of the wicked shall not remain upon the company of the righteous, lest the righteous stretch forth their hand unto iniquity.

Here you see that David obviously admits that the people, who sit in such strong fortifications and safeguards, are challenged according to the flesh and are very much exposed to dangers, even though they are extremely well fortified according to the spirit. There it is guarded by very high mountains, which the devil cannot leap over, but according to the flesh the old man is exposed to all the arrows of the world and of the devil, namely because God wants to afflict the flesh in this way, so that sin and the lack of understanding of the flesh may be killed, and spiritual wisdom and the inner man may grow gradually. This is the reason why we are like a broken fence according to the flesh, and like a city whose walls are broken down, so that one can enter from all sides. Therefore, no class of people is so despised that they should not think they can take anything against the servants of the church. Hence come the insults, blasphemies, revilings, executions, even the murder of the saints. For the flesh has no walls by which it is protected, but the Spirit. Therefore the flesh is exposed to all winds and storms, and is trodden down and worn down by the wicked, as it is said in Isaiah Cap. 51, 23. "They said unto thy soul, Bow down, that we may pass over; and lay thy back to the ground, and like an alley to pass over." These plagues must be suffered and overcome by patience, and we must be careful that the inner man is not weakened by the outward plague, but here we must hold fast to the confidence that we will firmly hold that the Lord will not forsake us,

But that we are in the bosom of the Father, and that the strongest fortifications are lifted up about us; so that, though our goods, our wives, our children, and even our very lives be snatched from us, yet our Christ shall not be snatched from us, by whom we shall be so fortified that even with the temptation shall follow the going forth and the end, as Paul's saying in the Epistle to the Corinthians testifies [1 Cor. 10:13].

In this way we see how the Holy Spirit presents the consolations to those who believe the word of God. Because they have to expect another life than the present one, be it in whole or in part, everything here is full of danger, death follows death, as Paul says [1 Cor. 15:31]: "We die daily," one temptation follows another, until finally all dangers come to an end through bodily death. But this verse belongs to the consolation that we should think that we will suffer many things, but in such a way that we will finally be saved and set free; if not immediately, at least in the future and eternal life. For what else can we expect from this diligent guard of the angels, yes, in the guard of God Himself, who is around His people? But, as we said above, here faith is needed to make the judgment, not from the present cases and temptations, but from the word of the Promised One. But what would be the use of promises if there were no temptations? Whether they be inward in the spirit or inward in the flesh, it will come to pass that at last the victory is ours through Christ, as this verse, which is exceedingly full of consolation, promises.

Furthermore, this promise is unbelievable on both sides, both to us who suffer and to those who persecute and torment us. For if one judges by feeling, could one think that anything is so false as this? For the opposite is true. For look at Christ, is he not so forsaken on the cross that the rod or scepter of the wicked remained over him? So it is with the prophets, so with the apostles, so with other holy martyrs. Therefore, if we follow the eyes, the matter is far different from the words. For they promise.

that this will not be, that the scepter of the wicked will rule over the godly, and yet all histories and all examples testify that it will happen. Therefore the Holy Spirit directs us to his word and his thoughts, and commands us to look not at what we suffer or see, but at what he himself is thinking in heaven. But art belongs to this, so that one can tear oneself away from the temptations and go to the will of God and rest on the same. Those who do not know this do not understand anything in theology. For what kind of knowledge is this if you do not know that God is such a God who will not suffer the righteous to be oppressed by the wicked? For because he says, "I am the LORD your GOD," he truly wants to do this, that he will not let what is his be snatched away by the world or by the gates of hell. Therefore, if he remains, those who are his will also remain. To hold on to this and to grasp the invisible things in this way is the true and theological wisdom which this verse presents to us, so that we may hold on to this saying of the invisible counsel of God: God hates the wicked and loves the righteous, therefore He will condemn and destroy the wicked, but save and preserve the righteous. But we see that what is best in the Psalms and the Prophets flows from the promise of the first commandment: "I am your GOD."

Now we must learn to apply this verse correctly. 1) For theology must be quite practical. We are plagued in many ways by the bishops, by godless princes and others, who are monopolizing the word of God and our doctrine. But these are childish things when compared to the plagues that Satan, our sin and our weakness excite in our minds. Therefore, you must learn to hold that all these things are the rod or scepter of the wicked, and to oppose them to the Lord, who reveals His will here in the Word, and says that He will not suffer that the

1) Instead of: äiseamus applienrs we have. inus assumed. Cf. Col. 1886, where a cijnUchn Inxsns is found, as here.

The scepter of the wicked shall remain over the company of the righteous. Since this is spoken by the prince who has everything in his hand, what more do we ask? For if there is anything to suffer, it is certainly his will that he should make us suffer, but he will not let us be trodden down and perish. So we should use this exceedingly sweet consolation.

As far as grammar is concerned, the way the word "rod" is used in Scripture is well known. Children are chastised with the rod in their early youth, but when they grow up they are chastised with the stick. If they do not want to mend their ways in this way, the iron rod finally follows. Hence it comes that the rod designates all authority or government, which serves for the improvement and chastisement of humans. Thus it is said in the 110th Psalm, v. 2: "The Lord will send the scepter of thy kingdom out of Zion," [virgam virtutis.] that is, thy kingdom. For he denotes in this place such a rod with which kingdoms and nations are ruled. In this way, the Holy Spirit here concedes to the ungodly the dominion or tyranny over the godly, which the godly must suffer, as we must not only see, but also suffer, the tyranny of popes and bishops who kill Christians and rage with every kind of cruelty; likewise, we must endure the tyranny of Satan, who plagues and terrifies my heart and that of all the brethren who believe in Christ. The Holy Spirit calls this rule or tyranny of the wicked the scepter of the wicked, and gives the consolation: "As the Lord lives, this tyranny will fall and not remain over the company (sortem) of the godly.

Sors means a part; sors justorum, that is, a small group of the godly, an assembly of the godly, as Christ calls them [Luc. 12, 32] a small herd, and Paul [Rom. 12, 13] the poor saints. Although, he says, the tyrants rule over them, their rule will not endure. Although the persecutors of the gospel oppress the faithful, they will not do it forever, nor will their counsel have the success they think it will. For they think that they want to eradicate this doctrine; they will not succeed. Meanwhile you must suffer, says the Spirit, but know that it is my will that all who believe should be preserved. Therefore you have this, that in the midst of temptation you may hope 2c.

But behold, what a whimsical demonstration (αιτιολογίαν) or reasoning of the Hei spirit is attached to it. This, he says, is what God must do to help the godly, for otherwise he would lose his church and the righteous would stretch out their hand to the unrighteous. Thus in Jeremiah [Cap. 25:12] it is promised to the people, before they are delivered into the hand of the Babylonians, that they will return to Jerusalem after seventy years, so that they will keep their trust in mercy and not completely despair and fall into paganism. Thus it is said in the 85th Psalm, v. 9: "Lest the saints fall into folly," that is, lest they blaspheme or become impatient. This is the reason why God has to connect the promise of the word and the execution with the deed, because otherwise it would happen that the godly would despair. We see how many fate strikes, since people lose their goods, 1) their children and other things that are dear to them. Therefore, if hearts were not first raised by the Word and then helped by deeds, many would say that there is no God. Therefore, it is necessary that God prove that He is God, not only by word, but also by deed. Thus David had exceedingly great promises, and yet he is deprived of the kingdom by his son. This was such a challenge as perhaps no one among us could bear. For it is an exceedingly grievous thing for a king to be deprived of the kingdom by his son, and to flee barefoot and bareheaded [2 Sam. 15:30.]. Therefore, even the richest promises he had would not have lifted up his heart if God had not Himself led him out of this danger. In the same way, if there were only promises against the pope and the opponents of the Word, and if God had not also led us out of this danger with the deed

1) In the editions there is (probably erroneously) a comma after Nominos.

If we were to defend ourselves against them, our courage would be broken and we would be led to despair. Therefore, the Lord does both: He raises up by the word and saves by the deed, so that, as Paul says [1 Cor. 10:13], the temptation is not beyond our ability and has an end, but we learn from experience that the first commandment is true.

Therefore, to say, "Lest the righteous stretch out their hand to unrighteousness," is the same as saying, "Lest the righteous fall away;" for God is concerned with both, first, that believers may endure temptation, which He does through promises and the Word; second, that temptations may not go on and on, but have an end. This we must also do, 1) that according to the certain promises we have of God's goodness toward us and of eternal life, we also expect that it will happen that we will be saved and our adversaries will perish, although we see no indication (vestigia) by what way God will do this. It is that this verse says that God is so concerned about the salvation of His own that He seems to fear that they will fall away, and that He will have no people, and so not be a God. For God is a God of the living and must have a people; therefore, there must always remain some who praise and serve Him. If these must remain, then it is also necessary that he put an end to the temptation.

But here we must be careful not to determine the time of salvation. For God allows us to be challenged to the utmost, so that beforehand all counsel and all trust will be completely exhausted, and we will be close to despair. When it has come to such a point that there is nothing left but despair, then he sends salvation; in the midst of death he shows life, in condemnation he makes blessed, in short, from nothing he makes everything, and when things are completely desperate, he sets everything right again. The God of this world cannot do that. Therefore these are in truth God's works, that when you think you are completely destroyed and lost, you are unharmed and shine like a bright morning star. Therefore, our God alone is the Lord, and we, whether we live or die, are also lords. Therefore, it makes no difference whether death or life befalls us, since our GOD is able to do both, if he leads to hell, he leads out again, if he kills, he makes alive again 2c. This is easily said, but in experience we learn how far this is above and beyond the reason and powers of men, and how we can hardly believe that God makes everything out of nothing, that He is concerned about us, whether we suffer tribulation in the flesh or in the spirit, that He is more anxious to redeem us than we ourselves are. Therefore, this must often be inculcated, so that we may learn the heavenly wisdom which the first commandment holds out to us, that our God is such a God who is wont to make all things new out of old, rich out of poor, glorious out of despised. And we would all like to have the latter, but it cannot happen if it is not preceded by contempt and lack.

This is therefore a glorious promise and comfort, as if he wanted to say: "The rod of sin is hurting you, but hope and endure, you who are my people, because I will not suffer the temptation to become so strong that it takes away all trust and hope from you. Storms will arise and it will seem as if the floods are already sinking your little ship; but I will not allow it, I will set a measure and a goal for the rod of the wicked. If Satan and your conscience accuse you as if you were the most unjust people, yet my justice will not leave you in the lurch. In this way, the temptations teach the custom and practice of the first commandment, which no one can know without temptation.

Furthermore, we are also instructed here about the greatness of the danger that lies in our impatient departure from the word and faith, since God indicates here with such great diligence that He prevents it from happening. For it is certain that those who depart from the word are far more wicked than

They were before, as Christ also testifies in the Gospel [Luc. 11:26], that seven evil spirits enter into them. Therefore, we must remain firm and persevere, and rather endure everything, even the utmost, than fall away from the gospel and become a prey to seven evil spirits, and we must hold fast to the trust which this verse praises to us, that God, if we are so minded, will not leave us to fall back into this ungodliness. For here is a manifest promise and description of God's care and concern for us, namely, that He is anxious that the temptation come to an end, if only we persevere. Now when the poet says: 1)

Durate et vosmet rebus servate secundis [Just wait, take courage, preserve your future happiness,

How much more must Christians encourage themselves to persevere, whether the danger be in the flesh, or in goods, or in the conscience, since we have the Lord who can preserve us even in death, in hell, and in the midst of sins. In this way one must learn the first commandment 2c.

V. 4. Lord, do good to the good and pious hearts.

To the consolation he adds a prayer and a prophecy at the same time. Furthermore, this prayer also contains a secret lament. Because he prays that the Lord may do good to the pious and the good, he secretly laments that the good are in a bad way here, and again that the wicked have rich blessings, as we see today that the popes, bishops and other enemies of the Word have the highest dignities and also a lot of goods. In the past, the Romans used the power they had against the saints and the church. This is a great annoyance. Therefore, the Church needs this prayer that God may also be good to the good who trust in Him and seek His glory from the heart, so that they will not turn away to unrighteousness, prompted by this trouble. This prayer includes the promise and the prophecy, that it will happen in such a way that, just as blessings are asked for the righteous, so also the fulfillment of this request will finally follow.

V. 5 But the LORD will drive away those who turn aside in their crooked ways with the workers of iniquity; but peace be upon Israel.

"He calls those who do not persevere but gather around the scepter of the wicked, either for gain or other advantages, as those do today who abandon the Gospel in order to keep their rich benefices and canonicates. They do not wait for the promises of God, but because of their indulgence they turn to the crooked way and are overcome by the adversities, that is, by the misery and misfortune of the godly. These, he says, "the Lord will drive away with the transgressors," namely the disciple with the master, so that they perish together. But few care about this threat, they think they can very well be blessed, even if they do not confess our teaching, if they only keep pleasant and good days; but in God's judgment they will experience it differently.

But those who persevere and are the right Israel will have peace, that is, all will be well, however much they may seem to be afflicted people. Thus we see that the prophets were well practiced in this article of faith and the practice of the first commandment, and were quite fortified against those who, moved by adversity, preferred to seize and expect bodily benefits rather than God's promises. And no doubt David, Hezekiah and similar holy princes learned by experience how easily people deviate. Therefore, in this psalm David exhorts us to trust in God, and warns us that we should not be angry if many deviate daily, for they will receive a very severe and hard judgment. So we should learn to stand firm and persevere in faith; even if the delay seems long, we should remember that the Lord promises that he will not abandon us. Amen.

1) VirA. Ud. I*; v. 207.

The one hundred and twenty-sixth Psalm.

When the Lord will redeem the captives of Zion.

Theologians argue about what kind of captivity this psalm is talking about. Some understand it of the Babylonian captivity, others, like the Jews, of the Roman. Some cry that it is to be taken in general terms of all captivities and redemptions of this people, according to the promise of Deut. 4:29 ff. which promises that when they are led away captive because of their sin and repent afterwards, the Lord will have mercy on them again and bring them to their own land. Those who give this word [prison] this arbitrary interpretation (catachresi uti) will apply this psalm to all captivities. But in my opinion, those understand this psalm more correctly who interpret it as referring to the greatest general redemption of the human race, which took place through Christ. For the prophet uses a far too powerful way of speaking to fit the special captivities that belong to only one time. For what is it great that this handful (that I say so) of Jewish people is redeemed, compared to that glorious and greatest salvation, by which the whole human race is saved, not only from temporal enemies, but from eternal ones, from death, from the devil and from hell? Therefore we hold that this psalm is a prophecy of the salvation that was to come through Christ, and of the proclamation of the gospel, by which the kingdom of Christ is extended, death and the devil are overcome, and all evil is done away. If this general conception is held, it is then free to apply the psalm to any salvation, both physical and spiritual.

Furthermore, it is known from the prophets that the word of the gospel, as well as Christ Himself, will come from Zion, that is, from the people, who, as it says in Rom. 3:2, were entrusted with what God had spoken, such as

For the Psalm [Ps. 147:20] also gloriously praises this benefit of the word, saying, "He does not do this to a Gentile. For although the promise also included the Gentiles, the promise was not made to the Gentiles, but to the Jews alone. Therefore, since this promise is peculiar to the Jews, it follows that Christ was necessary to them against the spiritual captivity in which they lay while their kingdom still existed and was in bloom. For it was not Moses or the prophets who redeemed them and brought them into the eternal kingdom. Hence the 14th Psalm, v. 7. at the very time when the kingdom was in bloom under David, utters the wish, "Oh that help would come from Zion." A strange speech to ask for this when the kingdom existed and the priesthood was in its highest bloom. But he answers, "If the Lord would redeem his captive people, Jacob would rejoice and Israel would be glad." Here you hear that this people had not yet been blessed, nor saved, nor redeemed, when the law and the service of the law were going on; yes, the law held them captive under sin, death, and the devil. Therefore he says: When the LORD will redeem this captivity, then Jacob will rejoice. Thus it is said in Ps. 68, 19: "He has gone up on high and has taken the prison captive." There he also speaks of the captivity of which this Psalm deals, namely of the captivity of sin and death, which will continue among that people, although they had the law, and divine services, instituted by God Himself. Therefore, let us leave aside the particular captivities and explain this Psalm about the general captivity of the whole human race, and about the redemption that has taken place through Christ's blood and is proclaimed in the Gospel.

v. 1. When the Lord shall redeem the captives of Zion, we shall be as those who dream.

These are noble words, not as they are used in the comedies and low. Therefore the word "Zion" has an emphasis, so that you should understand that he is talking about the people who have the promise of Christ. For redemption and salvation were first shown to the people of Zion (Sionico) and to the children of Abraham according to the flesh. These were kept closed by the law, and were prisoners of death and sin by the law. If now this people laments because of its captivity and sighs for redemption, what shall we then judge of the Gentiles, who lived without law, without worship, in idolatry and their lusts? He could not, therefore, indicate a more general and severe captivity than by saying that his people awaited this redemption in Zion, which was very holy in appearance and flourished most beautifully under David and Solomon.

But see how he pictures the joy that will follow this redemption. He says, "We shall be as those who dream." For with a new word he expresses the greatness of the thing, to indicate that the joy and gladness will be so great that the human heart cannot contain it, as if to say: When we shall hear this redemption from sin and death, yea, when we shall experience and feel it, we shall be as it were stupefied and senseless with joy. For this is how it tends to happen: lighter emotions cause either joy or sorrow, but great ones cause consternation, as that Egyptian testifies in Herodotus. When he was asked by Cambyses why he was crying now, since it concerned his friend, while before he had been able to look at it with dry eyes, that his son had gone to his death and his daughter had been treated shamefully, he answered: the friend's misfortune allowed tears, but the misfortune of his own relatives had been too great for him to cry about it. Just as a great sorrow cuts off the way for tears, so too an overflowing joy, when it comes suddenly above expectation and hope, so overcomes the hearts that they think they do not know, and doubt whether what has happened is true or whether, as it were, a dream is deceiving them.

This image, then, indicates the unspeakable grace by which we are redeemed through the blood of the Son of God, who spared not his life nor his own, that we might be free from the power of the devil, from the wrath of God, from the rage of the world, and from our faintheartedness. And truly, the human heart is far too narrow to grasp these things. But the more it grasps, the more courageous and stouthearted man becomes in all dangers; but the less it grasps, the more man is wearied by terror, until at last, like the Israelites in the desert, he looks back to Egypt and seeks the righteousness of works, in which at last he will find nothing but toil and labor. Therefore, one must strive to make the heart abandon all other endeavors and be satisfied with this redemption, and we also attain a part of this taste, which the prophet compares to an exceedingly sweet dream.

Furthermore, he who wants to prove himself as an orator here has an exceedingly rich material when he emphasizes this benefit of Christ or this redemption by talking about the person of the redeemer, about the person of the redeemed, about the crowd, about the things or dangers themselves, about the power of the devil, about the greatness and the terror of death, about the power of sin 2c. For these things have engulfed the whole human race, and could not be overcome otherwise than by the Son of GOD. This is the glorious and unspeakable redemption, which makes the heart overflow with joy. Those who do not feel joy have not received this blessing, but the word is as foam in their hearts.

V. 2 Then our mouth will be full of laughter and our tongue full of praise. Then they will say among the Gentiles: The Lord has done great things for them.

As I have said, this psalm has a peculiar sublime way of speaking, therefore it uses many images. For "laughter" he calls here the voice of the gospel, as the gospel should be nothing else than laughter and rejoicing, especially if we compare it with the law.

For the law terrifies and kills, because it actually belongs to it, that it crushes and softens the hearts of the impenitent, 1) as Ezekiel [Cap. 11, 19.] speaks. For these must be crushed with this iron scepter [Ps. 2, 9.] and led into hell, as the 9th Psalm, v. 18., asks: "Oh, that the wicked might be turned to hell, all the heathen who forget God." For because they have a heart of iron and, as the prophet says, a forehead of brass, they must be terrified with the lightning of the law, that is, made to fear God and filled with the terror of death, as happened to the people of Israel at Mount Sinai when the law was proclaimed by the voice of the Lord. But those who have a heart of flesh, that is, a very tender heart without bone and hardness, and a mere mass of flesh, must not be killed with the law, but made alive and raised up by the other kind of teaching, which the Holy Spirit here calls laughter and rejoicing, that is, with the Gospel. This is what Paul reminds us, that the word should be rightly divided [2 Tim. 2, 15], that hard things should be presented to the hard, but soft things to the broken and soft, so that those who are secure without fear begin to fear, but those who are more than sufficiently oppressed by fear begin to trust and hope.

This is the well-known difference between the law and the gospel, but in use it is not so common. For we are so weak that we more easily follow the feeling of sin and death than this laughter and joy of the gospel. For, to speak of myself, my heart is not so struck by salvation and the life given by Christ, as the heart is struck by a word of the law, or by a remembrance of sin and the judgment of God. This is because this difference between the Law and the Gospel cannot be sufficiently learned by experience. It is written and taught, but it is not felt in the heart, otherwise it would happen that frightened hearts would banish all sadness from their minds.

For, as we have heard, it is the voice of laughter and joy that appeals to such people, not the voice of terror and sadness. But here we also feel our adversary, the devil, who disputes with us most sharply about the law, and uses such grounds of proof that we cannot deny. For we must confess our sins; though we sometimes cover them before men, yet our conscience speaks against us as a thousand witnesses, and suffers not that they be forgotten or covered. Doubt therefore often arises even concerning holy works; I am silent concerning those which are manifestly shameful.

With these thorns the devil pierces soft hearts and wounds them exceedingly severely, only because we do not know this difference in custom and practice as well as it is known to us in our thinking (speculative). For if we had the practice, we would distinguish between the teaching of the Law and the Gospel, likewise between disciples of the Law and of the Gospel, and would refute the devil in this way, that the devil as a lying spirit confuses and entwines hearts with lies, since, where there are stony hearts, he does not kill them, but flatters them, so that they become more hardened, and fills them with promises and hope that do not belong to such hearts. This is sophistry, for in a lying way the kinds of doctrine are thrown together. On the other hand, where there are such hearts that are more than sufficiently frightened, they should be raised up with the promises of God, but then the devil makes the greatest effort to frighten them and is bent on completely shattering the minds that have already been shattered before. Therefore, a Christian must strive to get into the habit of making this distinction clear in his heart, and answer the devil: Lift yourself away, Satan, with your lies. When I am without fear of God, sure and hard, then come and inculcate the law in me, then I will gladly hear you, for then it is in the place to teach the law. But now that you come with the law, when my heart is already terrified by death and sin, I will not hear you. For your teaching does not concern me, but Laughter and rejoicing, not terror and death. Therefore lift yourself away 2c.

This is how one should answer the devil when he frightens. But we learn that the heart cannot give such an answer when it is most needed, no matter how often it has heard these things. The reason for this is that by nature the opened jaws of hell frighten us more than the open heaven delights us, that a thought of our sin causes us more grief than all the preaching of the merit of Christ as a whole delights us. 1) Therefore, we must strive to learn to practice this, at least to some extent, and to establish ourselves with these words, namely, that the gospel is a laughter and rejoicing that belongs properly to the captives, that is, to those who feel the captivity of sin and death, to the hearts of flesh that are terrified by feeling the wrath and judgment of God. These are the disciples in whose hearts laughter shall be planted, and who alone shall hear the voice of joy in the tabernacles of the righteous [Ps. 118:15.], by the operation of the Holy Spirit, which this verse indicates. For it indicates that this people is in Zion, and according to the outward appearance of the kingdom and the priesthood, is in beautiful flourishing. But if someone looks at how it is according to the spirit, he will see that it is in miserable captivity, and therefore the tongue is full of sadness and weeping, because the heart is frightened by the feeling of sin and death.

This is the tongue of Moses, or the mouth of Moses, which is full of wormwood and bitterness of death, with which he must kill those who are too animated and secure, and despise God. But those who recognize their captivity, let their mouths be full of laughter and rejoicing, that is, let the redemption from sins and death, which was brought about by Christ's blood, be preached to them through the gospel. This is the opinion of the Holy Spirit, that the mouth of such people should be filled with laughter, that is, that he should preach and make heard nothing but the supreme joy and songs of triumph of Christ, who overcomes the devil and death and pays for our sins. For the fact that he says, "Our mouth will be full," indicates not only that there will be a voice and a sound, but that the mouth will sound nothing but the laughter and consolations of the Gospel. Thus our tongue, that is, the preaching, will be full of rejoicing, that is, the whole preaching ministry will be full of consolation. This is said first to the Jews, for this laughter had to be offered first to this people who had the promises. Now he comes to the Gentiles, whom he also calls to the fellowship of this laughter.

"Then it will be said among the Gentiles: The LORD hath done great things for them." He calls Gentiles those who by nature hated and detested the Jews, and could suffer nothing less than their worship of God. These, he says, will be amazed when this laughter is preached, and will praise the great deeds of God. Namely, this miracle will be caused by the laughter that is preached through our mouth and tongue. Furthermore, the Gentiles would not do this in any way, nor would they consider it a benefit, if they themselves were not also partakers of this benefit. Therefore, because the Holy Spirit says that we would praise and admire this blessing, that the captivity of the Jews was lifted, He clearly indicates that we will also share in this salvation, as Christ says in the Gospel [Marc. 9, 39.]: "Whoever does a deed in My name is not against Me, but for Me." In this way he says that also the Gentiles will praise this redemption from death and sin, as also the testimonies of all other prophets generally testify the same. In the prophet Zechariah, Cap. 8, 23, it is written that ten men from all the languages of the Gentiles will seize a Jewish man by the tail and say, "We will go with you, for we hear that GOD is with you." This passage seems to be copied, as it were, from this Psalm. Thus it is said in Isaiah Cap. 2, 2. f.: "All the Gentiles will come to the

1) The old translator already correctly added the words: "uns erfreuen".

And many nations shall go and say, Come, and let us go up into the mountain of the LORD, unto the house of Jacob the God, that he may teach us his ways, and we will walk in his paths" 2c.

This serves to comfort us, who are not Abraham's seed according to the flesh, that although the promise did not happen to us, we will be made partakers of it after it is fulfilled, but still through the Jews, according to the words of the promise [Gen. 22:18]: "Through your seed all nations shall be blessed," and Christ says [John 4:22]: "Salvation comes from the Jews." Therefore it is certain that we Gentiles belong to this salvation, even though God did not owe it to us. For it was not promised to us, but came to us out of mercy through the laughter that was preached, not only in Zion, but also among the Gentiles, who will praise and have all things with the holy people, as follows:

V. 3. The Lord has done great things for us, and we rejoice.

Here you see that one church is established from Jews and Gentiles, who praise God's benefits with one voice, so that, as Paul says Rom. 15, 6, with one mouth God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ are praised. For that which the church of the Jews sings, "The Lord hath done great things for us," the same also the church of the Gentiles sings, and the same fruit follows on both sides, and the true sign of the people of the gospel, namely, that they are a people of rejoicing and gladness, as they say, "Of this we are glad." Now, see for yourselves how terrible an abomination the kingdom of the pope was, in which nothing else was heard, seen, taught, read, nothing else was practiced but the statutes of men, which by their nature can do nothing but cause sadness and torture the heart. One rule gives birth to another, one observatio to another, and these all become, what is worst, cords of the conscience; they do not remain mere burdens for the body, as they should be, where they are used in a useful way. Therefore, in the realm of the pope, there was also

Not a drop of this teaching that could have produced joy and gladness. Therefore, if there are frightened hearts, they will not find comfort. If they are in fear and doubt, they cannot make the distinction we said above.

Therefore, we should give thanks to God for this immeasurable benefit, so that we know that now the teaching of the Gospel is actually a teaching of salvation and comfort. Now as much as everyone feels joy in his heart according to this word, so much life and salvation he also has. But if you still feel sadness, it is a sign that the devil has not yet ceased to torment you. Therefore the heart is to be instructed in this exercise, that thou mayest know that the law is to be used against the impenitent and hardened. For there it is in its right and proper use, but in wrong and improper use, when it torments and afflicts the hearts that are already terrified. Therefore, the frightened hearts must not hear the law and not allow it. For to them belongs laughter and rejoicing, that is, the preaching of the gospel or the forgiveness of sins, which is given in Christ. By these also we are sanctified; by the law we cannot be sanctified, but rather become guilty, as Paul says in the Epistle to the Romans [Cap. 3, 19. J says.

V. 4. Lord, turn our prison, as you dry the waters at noon.

So far, the prophet has prophesied of the kingdom of Christ and of the redemption that would be established through Christ and then spread over the whole human race and the whole world, so that Jews and Gentiles would become one church, in which nothing would be preached but laughter and rejoicing, praise and thanksgiving. Now he goes on to describe the same church and shows what follows this fruit of redemption and this fellowship of Jews and Gentiles, namely that prayer is necessary, just as Zechariah [Cap. 12, 10] connects the spirit of prayer with the spirit of grace, that is, with the redemption that has come about through Christ, the prayer of the faithful and already redeemed. For even though redemption has taken place and we are truly redeemed by the blood of the Son of God, it is necessary that we daily ask for redemption, just as Christ commands in his prayer that one should ask that the name of God be sanctified, of which it is certain that it is holy and sanctified; that the kingdom of God come, which has come and is here 2c. Likewise Christ says [John 12:28], "Father, glorify thy name," and the Father answers, "I have glorified him, and will glorify him again." Likewise Paul [Phil. 3, 13.]: "I count not myself yet to have apprehended it" 2c.

For it is as I have reminded you above, that the blessing of the gospel and the immeasurable gift of our redemption and eternal life is easy to speak of, but difficult to believe in, because in this life we have not the tithes, but only the firstfruits of the spirit, but the fullness of the flesh is still alive almost entirely and intact. We do indeed enter God's kingdom, and, that I say so, with one foot we are sure to attain the promise; but one must not stand still like this, one must also drag the other foot, that is, grow and increase daily in this knowledge of grace and in faith. Therefore, says Zechariah, the spirit of prayer is poured out, which requires this increase, and Paul says [Rom. 8, 26. 22.] that the spirit groans with inexpressible groaning, yes, that the whole creature also groans for the deliverance of the children of God. Therefore, as long as we live in this body, which weighs us down and holds us back so that we cannot fully grasp this, we have not only the spirit of grace, but also of prayer, so that we at least know that we are in grace for the sake of Christ, in whom we believe, and yet we should pray constantly that God may accomplish what He has begun in us [Phil. 1:6].

Therefore, no one should be so presumptuous as to think that he is a theologian when he has heard this once and knows it completely. For this presumption makes swarming spirits, which, like the dog in Aesop, chase after a shadow, and lose what is true. 1) True the word, baptism, even Christ himself, are complete, perfect and whole; but we are not dealing here with the things themselves, but with the grasping of them. Thus eternal life is in truth perfect, as Christ says [John 14:2], "In my Father's house are many mansions," but as long as we live here we do not yet sit in these mansions, but possess them only in hope, and in the meantime are plagued with sins, with despair, with sorrows, with toils 2c. And sometimes faith is quite firm, but again it happens that it is exceedingly weak; there we are sunk, as it were, into the deepest mire, from which we cannot work our way out without sullyng ourselves of all ropes. Such is the life of Christians who have already received the firstfruits of the Spirit. These learn by experience that these things cannot be so fully grasped, nay, that it often happens that they fall, get into danger, and need lifting up, as Christ answers Paul [2 Cor. 12:9.], "My power is mighty in the weak." The weakness is ours and remains ours as long as we live, but the power is Christ's alone.

We did not know this under the papacy. For we also believed about the saints, although the histories of the holy scriptures show it quite differently, that they were completely pure, and we thought about ourselves that if someone, I say, had only one small piece of grace, he would be blessed. And truly I do not deny the latter, and yet it is true, especially in the struggle and in the temptations, that such people often fall, and that the little spark of the spirit is completely extinguished, as happened to David with the adultery. Therefore, this opinion of the papists must be abandoned, by which the hearts become secure and think that it is enough once this has been started. But Christ says [Matth. 10, 22.]: "Whoever perseveres to the end will be saved." Now if someone were taken away immediately after being baptized with water and the Spirit, he would be blessed. But because we live longer, it cannot happen otherwise than that we are very often challenged by the devil, who seeks to destroy and make unstable the hope, faith and best virtues that are in us by the grace of God.

But the devil has the advantage here that grace has begun in us, but is not yet fulfilled and perfect. The things are indeed whole and perfect, but we are not yet whole and perfect. Therefore we cannot take hold of the whole and perfect things, as Paul says [Phil. 3, 12.]. But the devil attacks these beginnings for this reason, because he fears that they will become complete, and fights against hope, faith and love.

In this danger, the Church takes recourse to prayer, saying: "Lead us not into temptation"; likewise: Give the victory that my faith may not cease, that my hope may not be put to shame, accomplish the good work which thou hast begun in me 2c. Such people are the Christians who have a perfect salvation and the certain hope of eternal life and the forgiveness of all sins, and the right deliverance from the devil, death and hell. These things they have, and of the things there is no lack, but the lack is in me and in you, that we do not yet fully grasp these things. For flesh and blood and the remnants of sin still live, therefore St. Paul exclaims [Rom. 7:23], "I see another law in my members, contrary to the law of God." This is the reason why a Christian cannot be sure. For he sees that he has not yet overcome all the dangers which the enemy daily devises. But as for Christ, whom he takes hold of in faith, it is true that he has everything. For in Christ the devil is cast down, the law is fulfilled, the wrath of God is taken away, sin is paid for, and death itself is overcome. This is how it is with these things when we look at Christ in whom we believe, but when we look at ourselves afterwards, we must confess that we are not yet pure, because faith is not yet perfect, which could take hold of these gifts perfectly. Therefore, we fear in battle, give way to the enemy, suffer that hope may be taken away from us, allow ourselves to be moved to sadness, to impatience 2c. Thus, Christians are warriors and true soldiers of God who are in the line of battle and cannot be sure; therefore, they pray diligently and implore God for help. In contrast

Those who are sure do not pray, because they think the devil is far away, and so they also lose faith without realizing it, and after that they are like a dry leaf in temptation.

This is what this verse says, namely that in the church one must always stop with prayer, if not with the mouth, then with the heart and sighing, according to the commandment of Paul [Col. 3, 16. Let the word of God dwell among you richly], so that it is not only sharpened daily by public and special teaching, but also by praying and, as Moses says in the fifth book [Cap. 6, 6-9], talking about it, whether we stand, walk, watch, eat, etc., or not, Not because there is any doubt about the matter, but because our adversary walks about like a lion, seeking whom he may devour. But we are weak, and carry such treasure in earthly vessels [2 Cor. 4:7], yea, are still weighed down with the flesh, which is full of sins, in which faith is like a young rice, which is not yet ripe, and may easily be moved by the winds, or be plucked up. Those do not know this who, before they make the attempt in battle, think that they are Christians and believe. These will either become heretics, by sacrilegiously taking hold of everything, or become completely nefarious, as is already the case with the large number who can recite our doctrine to some extent according to the words, but they are like a sow turned toward the fire; in truth, they ask nothing of the word, but are even angrier now than they were before. These people do not understand that it is necessary to grow daily, so that we can stand in the daily battles against the arrows of Satan, who drives us to despise God and man. Therefore, one must watch and pray according to the command of Christ [Matth. 26, 41].

In this way, I understand this prayer not in the person of the prophet, as if he were praying for the revelation of the future redemption, but in the person of Christians, who need to pray and say this verse daily: Lord, you have delivered me from captivity, deliver me also further; you have only forgiven sin, forgive it also further; you have slain the devil, slay him also further, you have abolished the law, abolish it also further. For that must be required which we have before, until we are made perfectly clean, which will be when this body of ours is dead, in which sin reigns here. It is therefore the opinion: "Lord, turn our prison," that is, redeem us, who have begun to be the beginning of a new creature, so that, as the redemption through Christ has taken place completely and perfectly, so also we may grasp and feel the same completely and perfectly. For there are many things in this life that oppose this redemption, therefore it is necessary that we be so defended that we do not fall back into captivity, lest our faith be overthrown by the devil. For the flesh is weak, but the devil is powerful; therefore, if God did not defend us and keep us, we would have begun to be redeemed in vain. In this way we must always pray, so that the firstfruits of the Spirit may be increased in us, and we may be renewed day by day, until the old man is completely destroyed by death. For then it shall come to pass that the captivity shall be utterly turned away, as the rivers or the waters are dried up at noon; whether thou understandest the Red Sea or the Jordan, for there is little in that. For the same is this: As thou by thy hand didst marvelously cause the sea to be dried up by a dry wind, so dry up completely all that is still in captivity in us, that it may be taken away completely, like the streams which overflow their banks in winter, but dry up completely in summer. For it indicates a drought, regardless of whether one wants to understand the one that was in the Red Sea and in the Jordan, or the one that tends to occur with streams.

This is why I exhort that we get into the habit of constant prayer and meditation on the Scriptures. Those who have not fought against the devil do not know how necessary the spirit of prayer is. For gradually carelessness and certainty grow, like rust on iron, and the word, as it were, gradually slips from our hands before we realize it. If this then the devil has already won half the victory. For he does not sleep, but watches every moment and then attacks when he notices that the heart is empty of words. Then he easily stirs up a tremendous conflagration in the conscience, as it were from a tiny spark. Before this can be extinguished again, and Christ and the Word are seized again, we are oppressed by pain and torture, or completely killed. For he is a murderer, and all his counsels are directed toward killing us. It is necessary, therefore, that we continually press on (ruminare) the word, and pray, whether we rise or go to bed, lest the enemy find us idle and unequipped, and snatch away this salvation from us altogether.

I am also a theologian who has gained quite a bit of custom and experience in the holy scriptures through various dangers. But because of this gift, I do not raise myself in such a way that I should not daily pray the Catechism together with my children, that is, the Ten Commandments, the Christian faith and the Lord's Prayer, 1) and contemplate them with a devout heart, not only running over the words, but also paying attention to what each individual word means; and truly, if I do not do this, and am burdened with other business, I certainly feel a disadvantage from it. For the word is given by God for us to sharpen it, as Moses says, and to practice it. Without this exercise, our hearts become as it were rusty, so that we lose ourselves. We see it, and daily life is ample proof of where men are to go and what dangers they are exposed to. But what else is the cause of this than that they are secure, do not pray, do not hear the word nor consider it again and again (ruminant), and are content with having it in books and being able to read it. The devil gradually instills in them a contempt for the Word. Then he throws them either into sudden despair or into other dangers. For what is left when the word is lost, by which man can could fortify or defend himself against this enemy? Therefore, it is incumbent upon a theologian to learn constantly, to practice constantly in word and prayer, not only because the matters are so great that they cannot be completely enclosed in the heart, but also because our adversary tempts not once, but constantly. Therefore, we must constantly fight and pray against him with the word. Thus, prayer belongs to Christ's people and the Church or the redeemed and sanctified. For the unbelievers and the wicked do not pray.

1) Instead of: Neeei" praeoexta mccura we have assumed <low> Meam orationkiQ, which must stand here without doubt.

V. 5: Those who sow with thirst will reap with joy.

This is also a part of those who actually belong to the redeemed, that they are subjected to many trials according to the saying Apost. 14, 22: "We must go through much tribulation into the kingdom of God." Therefore, theology is rightly called a state of the holy cross. Thus Christ, the Head of the Church, had to suffer; and the prophets, as Peter says, 1 Pet. 1:11, "have testified beforehand by the Holy Spirit of the sufferings that are in Christ, and of the glory that follows." And how would it be possible that Christians should not suffer, since there is no office in the world which is without the cross? To be a person in authority and to govern others, is it not the most miserable state? so that Demosthenes, an exceedingly wise man, after having endured very many dangers and hardships in the Athenian state, said: if two ways were presented to him, one leading to hell, the other leading to the government of the state, he would rather go the one leading to death and hell. Therefore Bias said that this state is the most certain rule by which one can judge about the nature (ingeniis) of any man; regiment shows (he says) what kind of man one is. For if you are not a man, and have unconquerable courage, you cannot endure all the dangers and hardships that this life entails. For how many are there who, rather than incur hatred and cause offence to others, deviate from right and truth! Hence it comes that very few in authority are good in their office. But if some are good, they generally reap ingratitude and extremely great dangers for their laborious work. For a just administration always arouses hatred and envy. So, if you take a wife, what a multitude of troubles you will encounter! what a swarm of worries (των φροντίδων άορυβός), for the sake of the bias words

The man is in danger of being attacked, whether by the servants or the children, or by other inconveniences in the trade, or even by the neighbors. What shall I say much? You will not find a state that is not exceedingly full of complaints, if you do not want to be unjust. But if thou strive earnestly to live righteously and holy, it cannot fail that the devil will soon lay the cross upon thee and afflict thee.

But these things, as we see, are temporal; how much more, therefore, will the same thing happen in the church, where one must fight with the teusel because of righteousness and eternal life? For if the devil cannot suffer civil righteousness, how should he suffer eternal righteousness, by which, as he knows, he will perish for eternity? Christians therefore have the devils as their bitterest enemies, who persecute and torment them day and night. Therefore their life is very miserable, more than that of all men, whether one looks at what they suffer in the flesh or in the conscience. In civil affairs there is at least some semblance of happiness and pleasure, but those who want to be Christians are and remain in sins that make both the body and the conscience guilty before God. In the sight of the world, however, they are worms, an abomination and filth, subject to the hatred of the devils and the whole world; therefore, the world rages against them with every kind of torture. Therefore, whoever wants to see the true image of a Christian with his eyes, let him look at Job, who was possessed and plagued by devils, with tortures of the body and hideous swarms. What shall we do now? If we want and desire to attain eternal life, this must be borne. If we want to confess salvation and that Christ Jesus is our Redeemer, we must know that devils are be-

We are not afraid of those who pursue our righteousness and our lives.

Therefore, as Sirach reminds us [Cap. 2, 1], we should send our souls to the temptation and offer our backs to the plows, as the 129th Psalm, v. 3, says. For every one that confesseth that he is baptized, and rejoiceth that he is called by Christ's name, let him also confess that he is no better than his Lord Christ. For they must be conformed to the image of the Son of God. If Christ wore a crown of thorns, we should not hope that wreaths and roses will be placed on our heads. We may seek peace and tranquility, and give the world no just cause to rage against us, but the hatred of the devil is not quenched in this way, but only inflamed more.

Behold, therefore, this miserable figure of a Christian who is yet redeemed. He is full of sins, sadness, death, therefore he displeases himself completely. Then he is like Lazarus at the rich man's doors, he is, like Job, overwhelmed by innumerable dangers and evils. Here you may say: Who should wish to be a Christian? Hear therefore what Peter says, 1 Pet. 4:12, 13: "Beloved, let not the heat," or the temptation, "which befalleth you, 1) that ye be tempted, alienate you, as if some strange thing did befall you; but rejoice that ye suffer with Christ, that ye may have joy and gladness even at the time of the manifestation of his glory." For this is the image of Christ, the Church, and all the brethren, that they suffer. But look not only at the suffering and the tribulations, but also at the fruit that tends to follow, namely, that those who sow with tears reap with joy. What can be more sweet than this consolation to those who bear the cross of Christ and are tormented in spirit by the devils, but in body by the world? For the devil challenges faith and makes us murmur against God, or oppresses us with sadness so that we do not know what we are doing or where we are, and yet it is true that we are holy and saved.

are redeemed. But salvation is hidden, and temptation is felt in the spirit and in the flesh. Then temporal things are added: the adversaries of the word slander ours, and belittle it lyingly, and seek a thousand causes to harm us.

When this is felt, the heart wriggles and cries out with David: Lord, have mercy on us, have mercy on us! The Holy Spirit calls all this "sowing in thirst, walking and weeping and bearing seed. It cannot be otherwise than that a Christian should be such a sower, sowing, not with laughter, but in the bitterest sorrow and with tears.

But, you say, where is the laughter that is preached to those who are redeemed, of whom David said just before? In spirit. For as much as you have faith, so much laughter you have. But at times the laughter is taken away, yet we are not left entirely, because the promise is there that we shall reap with joy. Furthermore, this does not mean that we should understand the word "sow" only from the ministry of teaching, as Paul uses it [1 Cor. 9:11]: "As we sow to you spiritual things," but indicates the whole way of life of all the pious, and all the actions they perform, on the basis of their calling. For they are, as it were, seeds of the life to come, which we have and possess in hope. For we are blessed and victorious over death, but in hope. Meanwhile, however, as long as we wallow in this life, we are in tears, as Christ says [John 16:20.], "The world shall rejoice, but ye shall weep and wail; but your sorrow," he says, "shall be turned into joy." This must be expected, and the sadness and the plagues are to be borne and overcome in this hope. For we are in the eyes of God like wild beasts which he causes to be afflicted by hunts, so that we seem to be nowhere safe; for a Christian without afflictions is of no use. Thus we see how he has Peter, Paul and other saints persecuted by the hunters, that is, by the synagogue, the emperors, the princes, so that they might learn to be humble and patient in themselves and not to become hopeless.

1910 L- xx, 44-46. interpretations on the psalms. W. iv, Wis-E. 1911

Since all who want to live godly in Christ must suffer persecution [2 Tim. 3:12], we must hold on to this consolation, by which we as it were season these plagues, namely, that the Holy Spirit here indeed prophesies that it will happen that we sow in tears, but we must have confidence. For the more abundant and bitter the tears are, the greater laughter and joy they will bring forth, as the opposite example also shows. The world sows in laughter, but afterwards it reaps in eternal sadness and pain, but we are only challenged here for a little while. Therefore, we should endure and hope that we will reap eternal joy for the laborious sowing of this short time.

Then there is also comfort in the fact that, although the whole of life is very sad and in truth a sowing with thorns, yet God in the meantime does not allow any affliction to be a constant one, but, as the seasons change, so always after fog follows clear weather, and after hardship comes rest. Thus, when we have been plagued in our hearts with thoughts of despair, mistrust, impatience before God and before the world for one, two, three days or more, we learn that after this follows that the hearts are again aligned with intimate spiritual comfort. For just as parents, after chastising their children with the rod, then speak kindly to them again and entice them to themselves with sugar or other stimulants, so God also acts with us, so that, if there were no refreshment, we would not flee from Him forever. Therefore, Paul also reminds us that children should be chastened in such a way that they do not become shy [Col. 3:21], that is, estranged from their parents; and parents who keep a moderate temper are therefore wont to add friendly speeches and small gifts to the rod, which prove their love, so that the children, feeling the blows, do not think that there is no longer any place for forgiveness. This is the way God uses to do it. For if the temptations continued on and on, who could bear them? Therefore, they are mixed with consolations, so that we may realize that God does not want us to be completely consumed by sadness. He wants to chastise, as the Psalm [Ps. 118, 18.] says, but not handed over to death. He lets us stumble, but he also offers us his hand with which he lifts us up [Pf. 94, 18.]; he leads us into hell, but he also leads us out again [1 Sam. 2, 6.]. In contrast, the devil and the world burn with endless hatred and insatiable anger. These say [Ps. 137, 7.], "No off, pure off, down to the ground." This is not the nature of God's wrath, which chastises to blessedness.

We should therefore learn that we must bear the temptations, and sow with thirst, so that when a temptation comes, we may not be vexed and despair as by a new and unusual thing, but retain this consolation, that we have the harvest in eternal life, which we shall accomplish with joy, besides that also in this life the temptations are so relieved that one can bear them, according to the words of Paul [1 Cor. 10, 13]: "God is faithful, who does not allow us to be tempted beyond our ability," but with the temptation He also provides an exit or an entrance.

an escape. It is true that it seems to us that we can no longer bear the danger, but God's power is mighty in the weak [2 Cor. 12:9].

V. 6. they go and weep, and bear noble seed, and come with joy, and bring their sheaves.

How could the situation of the Church and the way she walks under the holy cross be more clearly depicted? So that we may fortify our hearts, so that we do not lose that laughter which we have grasped through faith, but grow through the cross, and feel that this laughter is increased. For the faith and life of Christians is not a hypocrisy like that of the monks, who also presume to reach perfection through their thoughts of spiritual union (unionis spiritualis), as they call it, but, as I have learned from my own example, in vain. For although I have dealt with them seriously, I have never felt any taste of such thoughts. They are therefore nothing but dangerous fables and hypocrisy. But this is the Christian life that is described here.

that is, to be exercised through the cross and temptations and to take hold of the word. This is the true and real union we have with God, and in this union we must daily increase for the sake of the flesh, the world, and the devil who daily tempts us. For if we did not have recourse to the Word and prayer in these dangers, we would be defeated. Therefore, the cross is the means by which God wants us to be exercised, but not devoured, so that we may be purified more and more every day.

Furthermore, as far as the text is concerned, it matters little whether one interprets this verse in such a way that it is a repetition of the first verse, or whether one makes the difference that this verse speaks of the consolation of this life, but the above verse of the consolation of the life to come. But it seems to me that he actually also wanted to indicate that the tribulations do not just happen once. For although consolation comes in between, one trial follows another, so that the whole life is, as it were, a chain of trials. So it is in the church: when one heresy is overcome and eradicated, another has arisen; when one tyrant is subdued by the hand of the Lord, another has followed. So also in private life: when one despair is overcome, another follows 2c. This uninterrupted continuation the prophet, it seems, also intended to indicate by the doubling that he says [in Hebrew], They go walking; for there is no end of tears before we descend into the grave, though we are allowed a time to breathe again.

That one translates "noble seed", there may watch those who are masters in the Hebrew language. For this image is too far away. It seems to me that it rather indicates the "lengthening", so that the prophet expresses the continuation of the challenges, of which I have already said, or the emphasis. Otherwise XXX, as we said above [Ps. 120, 5.], are the Tartars. But this does not fit this passage. Now the sense is, They bear a long-drawn or wide-spread seed, that is, they lead a toilsome life; from day to day they are plagued with new dangers and calamities, without ceasing, so that the long-drawn seed is the same as if it were said, persistent, successive, or alternating, afflictions. But what is the end of this long duration? Certainly that they will possess eternal joy, as the epistle to the Hebrews gloriously says: "All chastening, when it comes, seems to us not to be joy but sorrow (here you hear the tears), but afterward it will give a peaceful fruit of righteousness to those who are exercised by it" (here you hear that they will soon come with joy). Therefore, even though the seed is long and prolonged, it is not eternal; but the joy will be eternal. Thus the kingdom of Christ is not in the power of the world and treasures, but in eternal redemption, which we must obtain under great afflictions and countless crosses, but in which we are nevertheless sustained by the word and prayer until we are saved. Amen.

1) Instead of: paratl88iilLa.ni in the Erlanger is to be read peatissiLiaiL according to the Vulgate.

The one hundred and twenty-seventh Psalm.

If the Lord does not build the house.

This psalm has the title: "Solomon's", and it is indeed probable that Solomon is the author of it. Because we see in all books of Solomon that he is in truth a teacher of the world regiment (doctor politicus), and not the main article

He does not deal with the subject of his father David, of justification, or of Christ, the heir and grandson of David, but he deals with what he had to deal with and what he was appointed to do by God, namely things concerning the world government. This is what he does in this way, that no worldly wise man has ever taught about the world government in this way. For he transfers the whole government of the world to faith, and everything that is done in the state or in the household he refers to the divine government, which other writers do not do, whether they are philosophers or orators. For although they make laws and prescribe the manner in which a state may be rightly administered and the household well governed, they do not know where to look for prosperity, so that what is rightly advised may also have progress. For they know only the material and the formal cause [i.e., what is necessary for this and how they must be arranged], both in the case of world government and in that of domestic affairs, but they do not know the purpose and the effecting cause (finalem et efficientem causam), i.e., they do not know where the world and domestic governments come from and by whom they are maintained, likewise what they aim at.

Therefore, although Aristotle, in his books on morals and the state, as well as Lenophon, Plato, Cicero and others, have written excellently about the state, they do not touch upon the right cause and the final cause. For they think that the best and noblest final cause is worldly peace, honorable life, glory 2c. They put a wise man or a prudent person in authority as the effecting cause, or, as they themselves speak of it, a good man and citizen. But we shall hear that Solomon speaks of it quite differently and quite actually. The philosophers therefore have the formal cause quite right, how the state must be governed, that justice must sometimes be followed according to equity (justitia commutativa), sometimes according to retribution (distributive); that according to the latter the guilty are to be punished, the innocent are to be protected, according to the latter contracts are to be made 2c.

They act this cause very beautifully and well, but this is not enough. For if this is so ordered, then prosperity is also necessary. We see that the wisest people become very indignant when they see that their most beautiful counsels are unsuccessful. For they have the most just and honorable laws, and they lay themselves with the utmost power to see that those laws

But they come to a standstill when it comes to the cause and the final cause. For since they assume that the final cause is honor, peace, wealth, but this does not always happen, and often even turns out quite differently, it is obvious that these successes (hos eventus) are not the final cause. On the other hand, some one else, however wicked and negligent, is all the more fortunate; this moves the good very much to impatience. Therefore, it is important for us to know how it happens that the good are usually the worst off, while the worst are the best off, just as many disorderly and malicious fathers of households are prosperous, while the best are in want.

So it is clear that the philosophers and the pagans cannot teach about the state system and the housekeeping as the Holy Spirit does. For they have only reason and follow it, but Solomon also has the Holy Spirit, who teaches him about the final cause and the effecting cause of the kingdoms and the housekeeping, likewise he also had reason and experience, for he ruled both a kingdom and a house. Therefore, he speaks not only from the Holy Spirit, but also from experience, because he had to deal with the greatest things and had great experience in the most important things. But this psalm must be all the more precious to us because such a great man made it about the world government and the household. Although it is short, for there are only six verses, it is nevertheless full of 2) special teaching. But 3) he does not emphasize the formal and the material cause. For he sees that houses are already there, that states are already ordered and well kept with very good laws and authorities. But is this not enough? Not at all. For two main things are still missing. For as far as the formal cause is concerned, it is possible that the laws among the Gentiles would be better than among the Jews, and there

1) Erlanger: Wittenberger and Jenaer: clieers. The former reading is confirmed by the conclusion of the second following paragraph.

2) In our Bible, this Psalm has only five verses. Luther, however, has made two of the first verse in this interpretation. We keep the counting of the Bible.

3) Instead of ue in the editions, at should probably be read.

It is possible that some of the authorities of the Gentiles would be better than those who were among the people of God. But this is only matter and form.

Therefore one must come to know the principales causas of the state and the household: who it is that makes the state and the house, as well as why he does it. These [principales causas] the heathen and reason do not see, but reason looks only at the thing itself (materiam) and its form (formam), and because it does not know the effecting cause, it presumes to govern these things with reference to the purpose which it itself has ordered by its own power, as if it were itself which could order such great things. Hence it comes that it starts and deceives itself. Thus Demosthenes approached the state system, which he found well ordered in laws and customs. Therefore, he rushed in, so to speak, with unwashed hands and feet, and undertook to become the effecting cause of the Athenian state, that is, he wanted to govern it as a wise man, according to his advice. To what end? Certainly, in order to strengthen public peace and to prepare honor and a peaceful life for himself and the fatherland, and that everything should turn out as he had wisely thought it out and considered it. But because God hates hopeful advice, He does it quite differently. Therefore, there was no mistake in the matter itself and in its form, but in the final purpose and the cause, the extremely wise man is mistaken.

The same thing happened in the Roman state to the great man Cicero and also to Julius Caesar. Hence it is, because they neither recognize the causation nor meet the final cause, that they cry out that everything happens through fate and luck, which almost always go against the right counsels. For since neither by virtue, nor by wisdom, nor by diligence can they achieve the end they desire, and since they also see that the ignorance and malice of men harm the commonwealth more than they are sometimes helped by right counsel, they have invented a third and intermediate cause, namely fate (fortunam), which has an uncertain origin.

They had to say that the government of commonwealths was something too great to be guided by human counsel, for besides counsel, luck was also necessary, which God bestowed on this one and that one. And this is the reason why the greatest men among the pagans could not teach properly either about housekeeping or about government.

Therefore, here comes in a teacher who has another mind, which is connected with experience, and teaches the whence and the wherefore, that is, which is the right effecting cause both in the world government and in the household, and which is the final purpose of the same. For he understands both and teaches that if a man wants to govern both the house and the state blissfully, he should not make himself the main thing, otherwise he will overthrow everything. For in both states man encounters so many dangers, so many troubles and worries that torment the mind so much that, tired and despairing, he abandons everything and becomes unwilling, saying that he was plunged into these troubles by Satan; and it serves him right. For why does he fail to govern what is beyond his power? So Demosthenes said at last, after he had been afflicted by many accidents in government: if two ways were presented to him, one to the government of the state, the other to hell, he would rather take the one that went to hell than the other. This is how it is in the household. He who enters into marriage promises himself that everything will be smooth and lovely for him. For he intends to follow a certain way of accustoming his wife and bringing up his children and governing his servants. Since this turns out quite differently in experience, and either the wife is not at all tractable, or the children ungrateful and disobedient, the servants negligent, the neighbors burdensome and annoying (for the burdens of the married state are innumerable), then they become unwilling, and begin all too late to complain: if they had known this, they would never have taken a wife. The life of the monks is much more lovely, who would not have these troubles 2c. With such words foolish men lament their situation, just as if you had indeed, if you became a monk, thrown off all inconveniences with one another; rather, even if you hide yourself in a monastery, you will not be able to be without all inconveniences, for just as you are under heaven and on earth, in whatever place you are, so you must be either under the household or the worldly regime, wherever you may live, it cannot happen otherwise.

Therefore, prepare yourself to be able to overcome and cope with these troubles, and learn to cast them on another cause, which is outside of you, stronger than you. But the Holy Spirit alone is the teacher who teaches and reminds us to throw ourselves completely into the lap of God's mercy and trust Him to take a wife in His name, to take care of our family, to govern the community, to make laws 2c. If this comes to pass, it is good; if it does not come to pass, it is also good, for this is God's will, that once you have entered into the world or household government by God's appointment, you remain in it and persevere, but by calling upon Him.

And this is the main teaching of this psalm, which the papists sing at all times, and yet do not understand the things of which it speaks. For they flee the rule of the world and the rule of the home, and yet are completely immersed in both. For no one has any more to do with worldly affairs and with housekeeping. For the pope and the monks have also ruled great sovereigns and princes in the most insolent manner, and the marriage affairs have been judged by the officials, then they have ruled individual houses as well as kingdoms and authorities through confession. Thus it came about that both estates were almost destroyed by inexperienced people. For they condemned those who lived in the government and in marriage as worldly estates, and gave the advice to rather take up the monastic life, like the philosophers of the pagans, who took up the private life,

That is, that which was best apart from marriage and the rule of the world; then they gave such laws, which they themselves did not keep.

Against this foolish and godless life of the papists and the philosophers, God comforts us in the Holy Scriptures, in which we see that there has never been a saint who has not been either in the world or in the household. For God has drawn the greatest men to the courts of princes, as Elijah, Elisha, Isaiah, Daniel 2c. I am now silent about the exceedingly holy kings, David, Solomon, Hezekiah and others. Yes, also John the Baptist had to become a courtier and a royal counselor, as the text says [Marc. 6, 20.]: "Herod obeyed him in many things." Thus God threw all His saints either into the world or into the house regiment, except Christ alone, who was the wisdom of the Father. He neither took a wife nor ruled a worldly kingdom, because he had to be something special above all others; and yet he honored both states, namely marriage (nuptias) [Joh. 2, 1. ff.] and authority [Matth. 22, 21.].

The life of the monks is therefore in truth devilish, because they flee the housekeeping and the world regiment. And in this, of course, they act wisely. For who would not much rather flee somewhere into solitude, and live by himself, and get his life from other people's goods, enjoy idleness, peace, rest, good days and other goods, on which the opinion hangs that this is holy, than be thrown around in the world among the so miserable and miserable worries, of which our human life is exceedingly full? That is, in truth, to pick out what is most delicious, and to leave to others the yeast, to leave to others the exceedingly heavy toil of bringing up the children, of governing the houses, of administering the state 2c.

But for this laziness they bear the deserved reward of being inexperienced people who have no knowledge of human affairs, as they have then confused the world with their hypocrisy and their vain thoughts (speculationibus), and have misled both those who preside over the household and the world government, indeed, have brought it about that those who are either in the

1) vei is missing in the Erlanger.

The people who lived in matrimonial or governmental positions were reluctant to hold the offices to which they had been called by God. For when either a householder or a person in authority approached them and complained about the hardships that occurred in the household or in the government, they not only did not console him and encourage him to bear those burdens, but like swarming spirits they drew such people away from these extremely good positions and persuaded them to become monks, until it finally came to such a point that the dead were dressed in monks' robes and buried in them. They did not know that these estates, the married state and the authorities, were created and ordered by God. They did not know that such people had to be exhorted to steadfastness and patience, namely, that they had been placed by God in the marriage state and in government, therefore their office was pleasing to God, and one did not have to leave these states, but if things went differently than they wanted, they should bear these hardships for God's sake and command everything to God. In this way, one would have taught rightly and comforted the minds. But the papists could not do this before that time, nor can they do it today. The reason for this is that they are not in the office, custom and experience of these things, and have only idle thoughts about them; moreover, they do not have the Holy Spirit. Solomon, however, has both, both a very great experience in government and housekeeping, and the Holy Spirit. Since he had these teachers, he learned that things cannot be governed by human wisdom, but that everything is governed by God.

Naaman the Syrian not only brought great wisdom with him to the office of government, but the text says that the Lord gave salvation in Syria through him [2 Kings 5:1], that is, that great wisdom would not have accomplished much good if God had not prospered it. Thus, if someone is to become a great and good ruler, he has this not by natural endowments, nor by his education or teaching, but it is God's gift. But experience and custom teach us that things very often turn out differently than we expected. In the same way a husband. For how often does advice go wrong? Therefore, it is true what they say: Man thinks, but God directs, and what Solomon says, Proverbs 16:9: "Man's heart sets his way, but the Lord alone gives it to go on." You take counsel with yourself, in which way you want to help your things. Things turn out differently, and just with these counsels, in which you put so much trust, you spoil your cause more than you or other people would have thought. This thing, however, creates a great impatience. Therefore you must learn that you cannot govern your own body with your counsel; how then should you govern other people's bodies and wills, even in one house, city, duchy or kingdom? Therefore learn that, as Jeremiah says [Cap. 10, 23], the way of man is not in his power, yes, that the body, which you take care of and carry around, is not in your power.

This is what is rightly taught about the world and domestic regimes, namely, that one should indicate the causative and the final cause. But this teaching is all the more necessary because we are all either in the government or in the household. For even if you are not a husband, you must still be in some part of the household. For you are either a son, or a servant, or you have children, servants, neighbors, or are in some other position in the house or in the society of men. But it cannot be prevented that many burdensome things should not happen to you. Therefore, you must learn how to behave in these positions, where they come from and what their final purpose should be. But this knowledge is most needed by those who are in a higher position in life, and who are to govern either the state or the house, so that they may know what the final purpose of this government is.

This psalm therefore actually belongs to Ecclesiastes, and not only has the same teaching, but also almost the same words. In Ecclesiastes it says [Cap. 1, 14. 3, 12. 19.]: I saw that everything is vain, that neither in the household nor in the government of the world was there happiness, but in both there was misery. Therefore, nothing is better than to be joyful in God and with God.

Enjoy the thanksgiving of the present gifts, which he gives, and do as much as one is able. This Psalm, therefore, seems to be, as it were, a short epitome and summa of this book, in which it teaches both what is the effecting cause of the world and house government, or of the state and house government, and to what end this government must be directed, namely, that we are only servants and co-workers of God, nor are we the effecting cause, but the cause serving as an instrument (instrumentalis causa), through which God works and directs that, as Wisdom says sSprüchw. 8, 15., "Through me kings rule." Thus, a father is the instrument to witness, but GOD is the source and author of life. Thus, the authorities are only an instrument through which GOD maintains peace and justice. A husband and wife in the house are tools through which the house and property are increased.

Knowing this brings great comfort. For if things turn out differently, and we do not reach the goal we have set for ourselves, we can say: I am only a kind of tool, and these things are not in my hands, but are governed by another, higher power and wisdom. Therefore, if the wife dies, if the children die, if the peace is disturbed, or any other harm occurs, say: These things are not in my hand; I am an instrument. I do as much as I can; I work, I am diligent, I give orders, I watch: thou Lord, in whose hand all these things are, grant that they may prosper, otherwise all effort, all labor is in vain 2c. For if the first cause is not there, the second cause by itself accomplishes nothing. Thus the psalm teaches of the effecting cause.

In the same way, he teaches about the final cause, so that it may be known that everything is God's gift, and serves for the glory and service of God, not for our peace, well-being, honor, 2c. that we say: The Lord has done this, he has given me this happy outcome, to him be praise and glory forever. I am only the instrument; it is therefore his gift, not my work. I am to cultivate the field, I can be the tool; but that I am not the tool, I cannot be the tool.

The fruit that comes forth from you is God's gift, not my work. For if this were our work, then the seeds would never perish through floods, through heat, through downpours 2c. Thus, in marriage, it becomes apparent that the children are a gift of God only when the woman does not give birth. The knowledge of these causes is necessary for a Christian, therefore let us now hear the Psalm itself.

V. 1. Where the Lord does not build the house, those who build it labor in vain.

These are sublime words by which he condemns our work altogether, that it is not the effecting cause of the benefits for the sake of which it is undertaken. But look at the histories of all peoples, the sacred history, the Greek, the Latin, that of all other peoples, and you will see that God has given to many that they began to set up the world government and housekeeping in a laudable way; but because prosperity did not follow, they lost courage, and have sometimes experienced the utmost ingratitude for the highest endeavor for the good of the state. How many of the greatest men were in the Athenian state, how many in the Lacedemonian state, how many in the Roman state, who were condemned and banished by the ungrateful citizens! This takes place to such an extent that it is almost the common fate of all those, both in private and in public life, who act righteously and want to advise things with the highest zeal, that they, hindered by the envy and persecution of others, cannot accomplish what they want to do. For the devil arouses against good men so many obstacles, so many adversaries, so great hatred and so many stalking tactics that they either, overcome by impatience, throw away this concern for the state, or, moved by displeasure, rage in a cruel way against those whom they see as their opponents, and so they sin either through despair, that they throw everything away, or through presumption, that they want to penetrate by force. They begin in a praiseworthy manner, and delight in their counsel; but when they see that they have no

If we have no progress, either rage or despair will follow.

Therefore, we should learn to walk on the middle road, and if God has called us to govern a family, we should say: "Lord, you have given me a wife, a household, children, and I am in charge of them by your power. Now I will do as much as I can so that everything will be governed in the right way. If now not everything succeeds as I want, then I will write: Patience, according to the well-known saying of the monks: Let it go as it goes, there is no other way, because it goes. But if it goes as I wish, I shall say: Thank God. Lord, it is not my work, not my labor, but your gift. The same should be done by the one who is called to the regiment, in which, because of the greatness of the difficulties and work, this holy counsel is much more necessary. But whose heart is thus prepared, he can enjoy marriage, and even the administration of the commonwealth, with peace, and remains calm in peace and a confident heart, even when the highest dangers threaten. This is not done by the stubborn and obstinate (capitosi - köppische) people, who simply say: This is how I want it, this is how I command. 1) Afterwards, when things turn out differently, they do not want to overcome those evils by patience; but furiously they either put the communities and the houses in confusion, or say that they cannot bear those troubles and labors, and resign from office. Hence comes the licentiousness (anarchia), that they let everything go as it pleases, not resisting the arbitrariness of the nefarious people by laws, not by punishments. This is the devil's counsel, that through this difficulty, which is in both estates, everything should fall into licentiousness, or that it should come to tyranny, since they do not want anyone to deviate from their counsel by a single nail, but no one should keep to the middle road. Therefore, I often teach and exhort that one should begin both a magisterial office and marriage with invocation to God and prayer, that the one who wants to take a wife should first of all call earnestly on God and implore Him for help, that He may also give him a good wife, and thereafter live the whole life.

rule. For if this does not happen, one takes a wife in the hope that he will have such a life as the first love imagines. Afterwards, if in experience the matter turns out differently, that the woman either has some infirmity or some other difficulty, then he either becomes a lion in his house, as Sirach 2) [Cap. 4, 35.] says, and it repents him of what he has done, or he neglects his house; he goes this way, the woman another, and forsakes everything. For because he had thought that everything would turn out beautifully, he becomes displeased when things turn out differently, and accuses the marriage, but unjustly. For it is your fault; you are not to blame for the household, but for your foolishness, because you want to be the cause of the household. Since this is not granted to you, you should only be the cause serving as an instrument.

Therefore, submit yourself to another master and say: Dear Lord, teach me that I may manage my house and the state properly. Govern thou, stand thou by me, that I may not tarnish. For I will do as much as I am able; if it comes to pass, I will acknowledge it as thy gift and give thee thanks; if it does not come to pass, I will bear it with equanimity. For you are the first cause, I am the second cause; you are the Creator and All in All (fac totum), I am only the instrument. If we ruled with this heart, everything would be right. But now, whether you look at the authorities or at a new husband, you will see the highest presumption. For they arrange everything as if it were impossible that it could turn out otherwise than they think; they go along as if they were the first and effecting cause, and arrange the thing so that it shall turn out for their honor and for their good life. But God says: Either do not do so, or you will come to grief; and rightly so, for they are robbers of God and blasphemers, who intrude on what should be the first cause. For if either the pen will teach the scribe how to make the letters, or the axe the carpenter, like a tree has to be hewn, nothing will be done right. The same thing happens here when we want to govern that which is God's alone.

2) In the text: Solomon. This is one of the many places where Loolesiasios and Leolosiasiou" is confused.

1) 8io volo, they ^5oo, the saying of tyrants.

But it is useful for you to consider the examples of this foolishness, of which all courts of princes give us a great many, all cities and almost every house. For all of them put themselves in this way: I am the author and master of this housekeeping, this state system 2c. Therefore they are rightly restless and unwilling that everything does not go well. Then they seek revenge for having to suffer, and are clearly such people, with whom one can find neither human love, nor counsel, nor help, but it is either a licentiousness (anarchia) or a tyranny, and on both sides there is no good work, but both are harmful. This is also the case in marriage, when neither the husband will yield to the wife nor the wife to the husband; besides the fact that marital harmony is broken up, there is also the fact that the husband either becomes a tyrant or neglects everything.

What should one therefore do? The pope answers and advises that one should leave the regiment (politiam) and flee somewhere into solitude or into some monastery. No, says the Holy Spirit, that is not God's counsel, but the devil's; rather, do so: Think that you are an instrument, and believe that there is another authority or another father of the family who is the principal cause, who is called the Lord; if he is not the principal cause, then what the Psalm says here will happen, that the house will not be built, and neither the state nor the household will prosper. It is the same with the final cause. If you want to bring everything to the end you have set for yourself and think that your plans (rationes) will not fail you, you are mistaken, as experience teaches. One goes to the government to increase his power and dignity, and the opposite happens. Another hopes for pleasure from marriage; he seeks a beautiful, young, obedient wife, but the opposite happens. It serves you right. For why do you approach government and housekeeping as if you were a god, and

Do you think that your wisdom and your power are sufficient to govern these things, and that it is not necessary for you to lift up your eyes at times to the one who is above and look at him for his shell? Therefore, when thou shalt know the contrary, thou shalt learn to sing this psalm: "Where the Lord buildeth not the house, they labor in vain that build it. Before, you did not believe that there was another Lord besides yourself who was needed to build the house.

Others who do not come to this realization either wage war with their wives every day or leave their wives and go away. Rightly, rightly! quite justly! quite holy! For why did you undertake this as if you were a god, since you are dirt, and started this heavenly and supernatural government with a natural mind? Therefore, it is right for you to start. Why don't you rather say: Lord, you have given me a wife, children and servants, help me with your help, you rule, otherwise my efforts will be in vain 2c. But since the Scriptures teach us this, and experience agrees that without God's help everything we do is in vain, we should therefore learn this.

"In vain," he says, "work those who build it." The reason is that they either become tyrants or fall into despair and leave their office; then both the state and the household go to ruin. But what kind of frenzy is it to rule in such a way that either your family or you perish? We should rather keep to the way which the Holy Spirit teaches here, so that both you and the family remain. This happens not when you become a monk, but when you learn to recognize the main cause, and God as the right father of the house, and call upon Him, and trust Him, and say: You, Lord, have created me to be a father of the house, You have given what belongs to the house. But the burden is too great for me to bear; therefore take my place, for I will humbly yield to you, and be you the father of the house. Then God will hear you and say: I will do it; only send thee in such a way that thou mayest overcome by patience, if there be any

Do not despair or become a monk, and do not abandon the state to which I have called you. Because you call upon me and recognize what I have given as my gifts, I will gladly preserve you and your family. If, however, difficulties arise, then one must suffer something; therefore it is not to be feared that everything will collapse. What household was more miserable than David's household? And yet it remained until Christ was born of it. Therefore, if it seems that something is lacking, command me as the Creator and Controller of these things.

Thus this verse teaches mainly of the household, and you must well note the emphasis, "They labor in vain." For there will be either tyranny or licentiousness out of it, and they will either leave their office or tarnish and be presumptuous. But on both sides are great dangers and damages. For they either ruin themselves or leave their own in the queue, because they want to work without the Lord, that is, to govern these things by their wisdom, and to be the main cause. Thus also Cicero, Julius [Caesar] and other exceedingly wise people run, who nevertheless, if everything had gone well, would perhaps have fallen into tyranny, because with great success tyranny almost never stays away.

Now as far as grammar is concerned, I think you know that "to build" in this place does not mean to erect a building of wood and stones, but it denotes the whole scope (corpus) of the household, namely to govern, to lead, to take a wife. To beget offspring, to bring up children, to govern the servants, to provide for them, to bring about goods 2c., so that the building is a well-ordered household, where there are very good and fruitful parents, who live in good peace and have obedient children, who then become good young men and excellent men. This is the house that is built from parents, children and well-ordered servants, namely a very beautiful gift of God. Otherwise, people generally live in such a way that, although the father of the house commands many things in a good way, there is no one to obey him. But such a house is dilapidated 2c.

So "to work" is to toil, and to want to govern everything with one's strength, wisdom and will, so that it will never fail in anything, that the servants everywhere will diligently do their duty, that the household will not suffer any damage in any part 2c. This, he says, is "working in vain," or throwing everything away in a kind of desperation. How then must one arrange it so that one does not work in vain? Certainly in such a way that you do as much as you can with advice and strength; then that you command everything to God and trust Him, who made you a husband, who gave you a wife, children, and house. If all goes well, thank God for His gifts; but if at times things turn out differently, overcome the adversity with patience and think that God is trying you, whether you think that He is the right householder in whose hand prosperity is, or whether you attribute this to yourself and your advice. Therefore this is the teaching of the Holy Spirit, that neither the house can be built nor the city preserved by human diligence, wisdom, power and strength. But this is preached in vain, and in truth a story told to a deaf man. For the world is, as it were, captive to ears and eyes and acts according to its own way, namely, it does the exact opposite of this teaching. Therefore, this divine saying is sung for the few, to instruct them who are godly and believe in Christ, who let themselves be instructed in the Lord. Others follow the present things and think that those matters are theirs and can be governed by their power and wisdom. Hence they have nothing but ruin, futile sorrow, and continual distress. Although they experience and hear this, they do not become wise. Now follows the second verse.

Where the Lord does not guard the city, the watchman watches in vain.

Just as above he called the family system and, as we say, the married state or the household a "house," so here he calls it

1930 L. xx, ss-67. interpretations on the psalms. W. iv, E-ssss. 1931

-City" means a commonwealth, whether it be a kingdom, or a duchy, or a city, or any commonwealth, whether it be large or small. But although this seems to be in our power according to the flesh, it is in fact much too high for us, and a godly heart must be instructed so that it knows that in this government, whether in family life or in public, it is, as it were, only an instrument of God. Therefore, one must look to God and firmly believe that everything will go according to His government, higher and further than we can even think. Whoever does not want to believe this will receive the reward that is held up to him here, namely that all his efforts, advice and actions will be in vain.

But he says with special care: "Where the Lord does not keep the city", he does not say: build, as he said above about the house, because if the domestic and private government is well ordered, then it will also be good for the state. For the home is the source of the state. For if there is no father and mother, no wife and husband to beget and bring up children, the state cannot exist. From the house, therefore, the city is maintained (propagatur), which is nothing other than many houses and families. The cities become a duchy, the duchies a kingdom, which unites all of them. Of all these, the household is the source that God created in Paradise when He said [Gen. 2:18], "It is not good that man should be alone"; likewise [Cap. 1:28], "Be fruitful and multiply." So Solomon does not teach in this psalm how to found states and how to give laws. For all this is already before in nature, and was not first brought forth or indicated by the lawyers, but sprouted from the source of human reason and divine wisdom. For the rights have not made the human wisdom or understanding, but vice versa, the human wisdom or reason has produced the laws and rights, as also all other arts, which we have, have sprouted from the human understanding or reason. But as the Creator is rather than the creature, so reason is rather than the creature.

Arts, the geometer is rather than geometry and as it were the father of it, and the rights have not produced what is civilly just, 1) but just men have produced the rights.

Solomon as a theologian therefore does not deal with the giving of the laws, also not with things that are to be done. Because this has been planted in the paradise of God as it were in the nature. For thus the text [Gen. 1, 27.] says: "GOD created man in his image." Then he explains this image [v. 28.]: "Rule over the fish in the sea" 2c. This text obviously indicates that the: Man is implanted by God with law and the knowledge of things, agriculture, medicine and other arts. After that, competent people wrote down what they had by nature, sharpened by practice and diligent thought, as we see. These are the powers of human wisdom, which were created and implanted in paradise, as can be clearly seen. Therefore, the Holy Spirit does not care about these things, he only approves these laws and arts as an exceedingly beautiful and noble treasure for this life, and says: All these things are my creation.

After that he wants to raise up our blind and fallen nature and call it away from carnal trust, so that we do not attack something above our strength or take it for ourselves, because through the fall of Adam human nature is so corrupted that it does not see that the gifts are gifts from God, but a lawyer or another man in public life (politicus) thinks he has everything from himself, and does not look upwards, also does not give glory to God as the giver of such gifts, but says: This I have done. In truth, the "I have done this" becomes real yeast. Since states and households are established, since laws and arts are created for man by divine order, nature generally abuses these things by saying: I want to do it, I want to govern it, I want to bring these gifts to the end, I want to seek my pleasure, my honor, my peace 2c. with them. Through this presumption God will

1) Erlanger: vivilianssta; Wittenberger and Jenaer: jnra; we have followed the former reading.

He has given the field that you should cultivate it, not that you should govern it according to your will. For as he created the sun that thou mightest enjoy it, not that thou mightest rule it at thy pleasure; so he gave the field that thou mightest cultivate it, not that it should bear what thou wouldst, and as much as thou wouldst, but what it should yield, and as much as it should yield. So also he gave the commonwealth, reason, wife, servants, and all the rest. But this is the constant infirmity of human nature, which is so corrupted by Adam's sin that it does not recognize the gifts of God. For the gift it should speak with thanksgiving: This I have received, but proudly and blasphemously she says: This I have done. She should have said: This the Lord, my God, has given me and sustains it, but she says: This I, man, have accomplished and will govern it according to my wisdom.

Therefore the little word "the Lord" in the first and second verse must be read with emphasis, that it refers to the contrast: "Where the Lord does not build, the Lord does not keep" 2c. "The LORD," he says, not: man or us. For it is not we who beget children, who govern wives and servants, but the LORD, as the text in the first book of Moses also proves [Cap. 2, 19/: "The Lord brought them to man, that he might see how he named them" 2c. Adam indeed gave all creatures their name and received dominion, but he received them from GOD. He neither created them nor brought them to Himself, but gave them their names after they were created and brought to Him, and is set over them as Lord, 1) but in such a way that He should be ruled by a higher Lord. So here the Psalm says: The LORD is he that buildeth the house, that giveth wife, children, food, that keepeth the city, that giveth public peace, that keepeth the laws 2c.

Therefore, the words: "Where not the Lord" should be written with large letters, because human nature is very much against them, and that is because of the guilt of Adam's fall, that we attach to ourselves all that we have received from God, and everything.

which must be attributed to GOtte, as ours. And also the devil drives our nature, which is already inclined to it by itself, even more. Hence it comes that we are also unhappy and can never be calm. For if we were without this infirmity of presumption, 2) we would have more tranquility and happiness. For God would say: You have me as your Creator and Giver, therefore I will bless you. But because we do not do this, he showers us with all kinds of heartache and misfortune, sends the devil against us and, as it were, opens hell, so that confusion arises in the household, and war and murder in the state. Because we do not want to listen to him when he reminds us through the word, he wants to teach us through punishments and our misfortune, so that we, after the manner of the Phrygians, when we receive blows, 3) begin to become wise and learn that we are not masters of these things.

Thus Cicero sang at last this song: O miserable man, who never was wise, and yet without reason was once taken for what I was not; how much have you, O Roman people, been deceived by your opinion of me 2c. For he governed the Roman state according to his counsel in such a way that at last his head was cut off. This is our infirmity, and not the Creator's, which we have from Adam's first sin and original sin, that we do not recognize that the Lord gives and governs, but do everything without fear, trusting in our own powers. Thus, in housekeeping, he gives a haughty young man a beautiful wife, who either becomes an adulteress, or is unskilled in all domestic business and a constant burden to her husband. The same thing happens to princes in the world regime, that they cannot wriggle out of dangers by any advice; and rightly so. For why do they not want to have the Lord who gives, but want to be builders themselves? But even though the world hears this, it does not care and does not believe it.

1) Wittenberger: Sxpositus instead of: positus.

Therefore this alone is said to the godly: "Where the Lord does not guard the city, the guard watches in vain", as if he wanted to say: The Lord is the guardian; if he is not there, everything that is done in the community goes wrong. When I was studying in Erfurt (discerem), I often heard Martin Sangerhausen, an experienced man, say this: Erfurt will remain invincible as far as its wealth and fortifications are concerned, but the powerful and rich city will lack people. This was a very wise saying, by which he testified that communities are not sustained by wealth and power if there is a lack of experienced leaders. Therefore, people may build, and, if it were possible, fortify the cities with iron walls, they may heap up mountains of gold: all this is in vain without a ruler.

First, therefore, God must give that the citizens be good, then that those who preside over them also be good and experienced men, and likewise that the rulers be such people as serve and fear God. These are the true and lasting fortifications of kingdoms and commonwealths; when one has received these from God, then one can also think of building walls and ramparts. But, because this does not happen, that is why empires and kingdoms fall away, one after another. And I am completely of the opinion that reigns (monarchias) would have lasted much longer if the rulers (monarchae) had omitted this few pronouns "I", that is, if they had not been arrogant in the confidence of their power and wisdom. Immediately, when the ruler of Babylon, Nebucadnezzar, in presumption of his powers, in pomposity speaks [Dan. 4, 27. ff.]: "I have done this," he must eat grass for seven years, like a beast, and wanders about in the field. Thus also the rule of the Persians, so that of the Greeks, so that of the Romans was disturbed because of presumption. As soon as they sang: I have done this, it was soon followed by this: I have perished. Look around you at all the kingdoms, princes and commonwealths: as soon as they attached to their deeds the word, "I have done this," they fell.

because through this arrogance they exclude God as if he were foolish and put themselves in his place. That is why human advice, power and our strength fail. So today we would not lack walls or other fortifications if we did not lack people. There is a great lack of them now, and those who are at the top cannot bear the present fortune, but are proud of their power and riches, trusting in the fortifications they have, as if it were really difficult for God to disperse even iron walls and mountains of gold.

But I am not saying that cities should not be fortified and protected against violence, that laws should not be made and public discipline should not be maintained. We say that it is done and must be done by right. We do not condemn the jurists, we do not condemn the men of war, but we condemn the addition they attach to it, namely, that they paint on their foreheads: I. God does not want to suffer this addition, nor can He suffer it, nor does He have to suffer it. But because the world cannot leave it out, therefore one kingdom after another, one prince after another, one commonwealth after another falls. Thus Sanherib boasts in Isaiah [Cap. 36, 18.] that his hand was unconquerable against all gods; therefore the mighty defeat soon follows, by which he is struck to the ground [Is. 37, 36.]. But of Cyrus the text says [Isa. 45, 1. f.], "I have taken him by the hand, that I may break the doors of brass." For there is no power so great, no fortification so strong, that GOD cannot conquer it. How difficult do you think it would be for Him to bring Venice, the exceedingly powerful city, to extreme poverty, either by war, or by famine, or by pestilence, or even by drying up the sea?

Therefore, set up defenses, build a house, take a wife, set up a household 2c. This the Holy Spirit does not condemn, but wants us not to add original sin to it. Therefore, keep the creature and use it, but take away your original sin, by which you offend God. Wife, children, servants, laws, possessions, etc. are creatures; they are good things and in truth God's gifts, the use of which God grants us. But you attach your original sin to them and want to govern them according to your wisdom, while you despise God and do not call upon Him and do not believe Him who granted them to you. You want to walk in this presumption par excellence: It is I who govern these things. It happens therefore rightly that wife and children and servants are disobedient. Well be with you, Lord Regent, who wanted to govern these things without having greeted God first!

The same happens in the world regiment. Therefore the Psalm says: "Where the Lord does not protect" 2c. He puts] therefore the word "the Lord" in the category of relationship against our original sin and against our natural presumption, as if he wanted to say: I say indeed thus, that a city is wretchedly preserved, if the LORD does not preserve it; but it is another Lord who wants to govern these things, namely, our wisdom and presumption, which, despising GOD, misses the government of so great matters and excludes the LORD, and admittedly succeeds at times; but it is a twofold wrath when GOD gives prosperity to the ungodly. For it is an exasperation that both angers the godly and ensnares countless other people who set out in the hope of accomplishing the same thing, but they do not succeed. Thus Augustus ordered the state well; he escaped the terrible (tragicos) accidents of other kings, as far as his person was concerned, although he was very unfortunate in that which concerned his household. After his example, others attacked the government and thought that they could do the same; but see how few succeeded, so that the word of Juvenal is very true:

Ad generum Cereris sine caede et sanguine pauci Descendunt reges, et sicca morte tyranni.

[Few kings are those who escape assassins.

Rarely do you find even tyrants ohn bloody end].

1) In all editions: xons, but one would expect xonit, he sets, instead. Compare the end of the following paragraph.

But I mention this so that we may learn that we are not the rulers of these high things, of the world and domestic regiment, much less of the church, where everything is infinitely greater and more difficult.

"To guard," that is, to resound. He does not speak here, as I have reminded you above, of the giving of laws, for, since reason can give them, he presupposes that they exist in a state, but he admonishes and instructs the rulers that they should call upon God and administer the affairs with fear, so that, if the counsels do not progress, they will realize that God is doing this to restrain their arrogance, so that they will not trust in their wisdom and power. For that would be a cause of innumerable misfortunes if everything were to succeed. But now, when wisdom is deceived and power is of no avail, they learn by their own experience that another must be called upon as Lord and be superior to the states, who will help and govern, and give prosperity to that which is wisely conceived, so that they may take refuge in prayer and say: Help, O Lord, reign yourself 2c.; so that they may know that they have a rich promise, that the Lord, when He is called upon, will hear and help. Therefore the word, "Where the Lord does not keep," is set against those who do not call, but by their own wisdom and strength want to build the house and keep the city. It is said to them that they will work and guard in vain.

But he calls a "guardian" a king, a prince, a person in authority. For in the small word he understands great things, and indeed the highest in the world. For God is a great Lord, who has a wide mouth, and with small and weak words presents to us the greatest things. Therefore, he calls the kings and princes "watchmen" who are appointed to govern the states. But they watch in vain, he says, if the Lord himself is not there, nor do they achieve what they want with their toil and sour labor, but if the Lord is not there, they will get nothing from it except that they crucify and torture themselves in vain. This is what the prophet calls by his words "um-otherwise work". Thus, when I was still a young man, I saw quite a few people who labored day and night without ceasing, and yet they did not get so much out of it that they could have lived on it. They left themselves no time for rest (otio), no time for pleasure (ludo), and yet they were miserable with wife and children. When other wealthier fathers of the house saw them and regretted their fate, they reminded them that they would never become rich through this incessant work; in addition to work, one must also have a good reputation (industriam); this was more important for the acquisition of goods than work. For a householder who has only a little good reputation will be able to make better use of one florin than another of two. For it is so arranged by nature, that good care has better prosperity.

But those who gave this advice to those poor people did not see themselves that even good housekeeping (industriam) is a gift of God and is given to man by God; as it is evident that a woman who is experienced in housekeeping and has good housekeeping lives with the same expenses for a whole year together with the household, which would hardly suffice for half a year for another who does not have good housekeeping. But the good reputation is so important because it takes care of people, place and time, and does nothing carelessly. Those who do not pay attention to this, whether in the household or in the state, must often be absent. Therefore, it is not surprising if for a careless and negligent person even great goods are not enough, because he does not pay attention to the appropriate time and place. Therefore, as I have said, those people gave this advice, that a good attention must be added to the work, because the work has no prosperity without a good attention.

Solomon, however, speaks of this in more detail and says that it is not the good attention that is the cause, but the Lord. For this is precisely God's gift, that one governs the state or undertakes something with good attention, that one does not fall into it carelessly, but waits for all opportunities. Of such a kind (ingenium) was the highly praiseworthy Prince Frederick,

Duke of Saxony, Elector. He was a man who in truth had a good attention (industrius), who did not say everything, did not do everything that he could have said and done immediately, but waited for the appropriate time, person and place, overlooked many things, but in his time and in his place he accomplished more by one word than many others without this good attention with force and the greatest powers. Such are people who have a good attention (industrii), who can turn a blind eye (dissimulare) and wait for the appropriate time, in which One Word strikes more than at another time many swords would strike. But this is human and not divine wisdom, therefore it is not sufficient to guide such great things, but prayer must be added that the Lord may be present and take the watch upon Himself, otherwise even the good watch, however great, will watch in vain.

So also Duke Frederick, although he was a very wise man, failed many things and could not prevent them, which often moved him very much. For perhaps he did not have this wisdom in the early days, so that he could say: Lord, stand by and help me in my work. For the monks, who at that time had taken the minds of the princes, could teach nothing of the kind. But after he learned from this teaching of ours that the authorities were appointed by God, he took a special pleasure in it. Our people today hear this and know it, and yet they walk according to original sin and their inclinations, and strive for the ends that they set up for themselves. Therefore, it will happen that one day they will get so entangled in their advice that they will not be able to wriggle out of it. But this is an even greater sin, because they so arrogantly despise this divine wisdom, which they hear. For this light is given so that men may recognize it and become better from it, but they become angrier and twofold more arrogant. Therefore it will happen one day that they will have to suffer the very severe punishment of their presumption, as the text threatens: "He watches in vain," that is, he torments himself and other people in vain. For because they want to do everything according to their own counsel and do not want to

They are angry when they do not succeed. They know that they are in authority and have been appointed to office, so they think that they are a terror to everyone, and they go on with their counseling; that is how they get started.

Thus this psalm instructs us about the principal cause (de principali causa), by which all counsel and all affairs are governed, and forbids that we do not throw the causes one upon another, lest we make of the principal cause the second cause, or no cause at all. Otherwise, he says, it will happen that the second cause will not become a cause. For it does not stand thus: He made it, and then went away, says a certain philosopher of God, and quite rightly. For God did not make the marital state and the state system in the same way as a master builder makes a ship, who, having completed his work, departs from it, leaving the skipper to govern the ship, but God is with his creature and governs both the state system and the domestic system. People do not know this, and think that God does not care what we do, but leaves it to us. Against this false opinion, Solomon instructs us to fear God and to learn to govern with a calm heart and to call upon God and say: O LORD, thou hast made me a husband, therefore stand thou by me; or if I should rule the chariot alone, it would sink so in the mire that it could not be brought out again 2c. Likewise, he reminds us not to be presumptuous of our wisdom, power, fortifications and riches. All histories are full of examples, then also our daily experience testifies the same, that presumption is unfortunate, and yet the world remains world and does not believe. Therefore, only the godly benefit from this. The world, however, since it does not want to hear and obey, may at least be shocked by it until it learns that it is watching in vain, working in vain, and wearing itself out in its labors. Quite right, quite justly. For here it is written: "Where the LORD is not"; that they throw away. Therefore God also throws away their protection and their building; so only the "in vain" remains.

v. 2. it is in vain that ye rise early, and afterward sit long, and eat your bread with sorrow; for he giveth it to his friends sleeping.

It is quite right that, as the matter taught in this Psalm, so also the [Latin] translation of the Psalm has been quite obscure. For the papists were not worthy to have translated even one sentence correctly, since they were so far from the matter. Therefore translate thus: It is in vain that you look before daylight, and go to bed late, and with great labor bring about your food. For this means "the bread." Jerome translates: panem idolorum [the bread of idols]; but it is nothing else than what we say in our language: "He makes it sour for him." The Hebrews call it the bread of affliction or pain. The opinion, therefore, is this: that both in the home and in the world regiments the sorrows, the efforts, the ceaseless labors are in vain unless they are blessed from above. For he wanted to indicate the excessive effort and work, the excessive worry and sorrow by these images: "to rise early" and "to sit long", that is, to toil by day and by night, as if he wanted to say: Your strength and effort will not do it, but the blessing of the Lord will make you rich. God does not want to give success out of work, not even for the sake of your work, just as He does not want to make idle people rich without work, but one must work, and yet one must leave everything to God and command Him who blesses.

But the text here seems to read as if it forbids work, against the word in the first book of Moses [Cap. 3, 19]: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat thy bread", and against the word of Paul, Rom. 12, 8: "If a man rule, let him rule diligently. Here the opposite seems to be said, since he says that work, getting up early, worrying is in vain, although idleness and laziness are condemned in other passages. Here it is from-

1) Vulgate: Vanum voüis ant" lucom surMrs, 86<l6riti8, aui maiMuentis pausm äoloriö. The following is drawn to the following verse.

You need to distinguish between faith and works, or the spirit and the flesh. With the heart you must trust in God and call upon God. Now if you have taken a wife or entered into a magisterial office, that is right; that belongs to the outward man; to the flesh, not to the spirit; to works, not to faith. There you must work, and give the old man to work, that you get up early, go to bed late, that is, that you are careful according to the old man, how you acquire food, govern the state, give laws, prepare protection and fortifications. When war threatens, take care how you arm yourself against the enemies, procure weapons and armies, and this only according to the outward man, that is, that your heart be carefree (vacuus) and free. For worry and distress must not go beyond the outward man, that is, the outward man must not be idle or sluggish, but must diligently carry out his office with work, concern, invention, worry, like a tool that the hands work; but the heart must look from the work back to the Lord and ask for help, so that while the outward man is busy with work, the heart or the new man may put prayer in the place of worry and say: Lord, I follow your call, therefore I will do everything in your name, you rule 2c.

This consolation is so great that it cannot be expressed in words; for even if it turns out badly, you still have a calm heart and say: It pleased God so much, I did as much as was in me. If it has turned out differently than I had intended, it is without my fault, since I am not the main cause, but only an instrument. For just as, if in doing a work you injure your hand with an iron or some other thing, nevertheless the hand remains the same as before, and therefore is not thrown away: so also, if the servants are disobedient, command the thing of God, and do as much as you can; then you do both under God's pleasure, that you rise early and do not rise early, that you work and yet do not work in vain.

For according to the old man you eat your bread with sorrow, but the heart is quiet and calm in the hope of God's help and blessing.

Although we teach this every day, the greed of men is now so great that there is no end to the accumulation of goods, by whatever right or wrong it may be, and not even the laborers are allowed to rest on holidays. But when one should go to church to hear God's word, they calculate the time exactly, and estimate the damage of the work they do, and rather leave the service than their work, and do not see that they, by neglecting the word, cause ten times greater damage to their goods. Even if this does not happen immediately, it will happen one day that the goods, which have been gathered with great labor, will perish either by theft, or by war, or by conflagration, when God finally steps in to punish them, or they will not come to the heir whom they have destined. But in the papacy there was this conviction in the hearts of the people that they believed that if they had heard a mass, everything would go out better that day; but this was reprehensible, that they did not trust in God as the ruler, but in their own work; and yet the success corresponded to their expectation, in that the devil promoted this godlessness. Therefore, they wrote this verse on all the walls:

Nec unctura rotam, nec tardat missa diaetam.

[The grease would not have the wheel on, The fair not the food run.]

To this they added fables by which they strengthened this superstition: Many people had made a journey with each other. Since they had come to a village by chance at the time of mass, one of them would have stopped and heard the mass. The others, however, because they wanted to hurry, would have left the godly (as it was considered at that time) service standing, and would have fallen among the robbers and been killed. But the one who had heard the mass would have received the reward for the godly delay he had made in the church.

They taught this publicly in the papacy, and I am telling it so that we may see all the more our unbelief that we cannot ascribe to God what they conquered to their works. Therefore, as a punishment for sin, it will happen that the world will fall into greater scarcity, and from day to day the poverty of goods will become greater, as we see that now there is also a greater theurality in all things than in times past. What is the cause? Certainly, that we rise early and sit long and eat our bread with worry. We take pleasure in troubles, worries, and work, and in the meantime we neglect God and His Word. Therefore, it will come to pass that God will lavish on us worries, labors and troubles, for that is how we want it.

But I come back to the text of the Psalm, in which you see that we are commanded to rule the house and the world, but in such a way that we should know that we are instruments of the divine majesty and administrators (organa) or co-workers, not originators, root causes or first causes of these divine things. Therefore it was not enough for him to say in an affirmative way: The Lord Himself rules and makes the city, the Lord Himself builds the house and establishes the family, but he also puts the negative speech: You do not do this. For this is what befits a good teacher. But, as I said, the world cannot stand this negative speech and wants to say: I want this, I have done this, I will do this; it wants to be a ruler of the commonwealth and stand in God's place. It therefore brings forth the fruit it deserves, that it undertakes futile things, that all its labor and undertaking is in vain, as the 78th Psalm says [v. 33, Vulg.], "Their days faded away, that they obtained nothing," that is, they died sooner than they could accomplish what they undertook. For because they do not want to believe that God governs everything, they experience that they gain nothing, and have vain labor, and rightly so. For why do we presume to be the first and main cause, since we are the second causes, and even the tools? as if the axe presumed to be the carpenter, and the plow presumed to be the cultivator.

the pen a scribe 2c. Therefore, let each one of us remain in his order and in his position, and let us know that God requires this of us, that we say: I believe in One God, that is, God wants to remain God, the Creator and Maker of all things; but He wants us to be co-workers or rather tools, not authors. But because we demand to be creators, it happens that we get nothing out of it, and eat our bread with sorrow.

Furthermore, this expression ["to rise early" and "to sit long"] is to be understood broadly, and to be applied to all classes of men, and not to be limited merely to the manual laborers who rise early to do their work; not as if it were evil to rise early and go to bed late, not as if it were evil to be busy with work all day, for that is what God requires of all, whereas laziness and idleness are cursed; but work and presumption must be distinguished. He does not condemn work, but he condemns devilish presumption, because we, not satisfied with work, snatch the divine care and sorrow that he has for us, and he wants to snatch the divine majesty from our hands, of which we presume by this care; he does not want us to let the work stand. For this challenge is inherent in our nature, that we strive for the divine majesty and interfere with it. This evil first began in Paradise, when the devil said to Eve: "You will be like God," and it continues to cling to this flesh, and cannot be avoided as it should be, even though we are taught and taught about it, but we want and strive to be gods. This, then, is in truth the hereditary disease of the creature.

Against this presumption and this concern, which actually belongs to the majesty itself, the Holy Spirit fights, because he says that it is not our task to govern these things, but God's, but we are only instruments. But nothing is aligned with the ungodly, indeed, even the godly very often sin against it. For we are not satisfied with our lot, we also want to be rulers.

has taken it; the name of the Lord be praised!" In this way they can also enjoy the present gifts and overcome all misfortune. The flesh can do neither; it pays no attention to the present, but is only concerned with the future; while it strives for this, it also loses the present, as it happened to the dog in Aesop 1) who, as he swam through a river, snatched at the shadow, and lost the flesh which he held in his mouth at the same time as the shadow; and it happened to him quite rightly. For who would dare to condemn this judgment? The dog is therefore a picture of the whole world. There you can see one who is a householder, to whom God has given wife, children, servants, goods, 2c. This is the flesh in the mouth of the dog. What does he do now? He does not care about the present gifts of God, nor does he enjoy them, but in the meantime he tortures himself with other vain worries about things that are not there, that he will never attain, and he is quite similar to those who strive to escape in dreams, and yet, as it seems to them, cannot even move a foot from the spot.

But this cannot be learned from books; but experience is the only explanation (glossa) which can interpret this psalm. For even though I understand this and can teach it to others, it often happens to me that I also struggle with futile efforts and undertakings. The reason for this is that the divinity, which was once sought in paradise, cannot be completely discarded, even by the saints. Thus it comes about that the more you have of this inherited poison, the less peace and tranquility you have, as Augustine says: "You have besought it, O Lord, and so it happens that every heart that does not stand right (inordinatus) has in itself its punishment. For as drunkenness brings with it its punishment, a desolate and painful head, so also the mind that is not right, that is tormented and troubled with worries, brings with it bread with worries and futile effort. We see examples of this even in great princes.

This is what I have said, that this saying is to be taken not only from the manual laborers, but from the whole mass of the human race in all offices, that it is in vain to get up early, that is, it is very forward (curiosum) and presumptuous, in whatever office it may be. Thus a person in authority rises early when he is concerned that everything be done to the end he has set in his heart, according to his counsel and will. Thus in all states "rising early" means that one has no time free from worry and counsel if one does not accomplish what one has set out to do; but this is in vain. I have seen innumerable examples of this, and you will see them too if you live longer. For because youth has no experience yet, it does not yet understand these things, but in time you will see in all classes, in peasants, in the unlearned and the learned, in princes and kings, that they rise early, that is, that they are very anxious, and set up goals, and set themselves to work causes, and want to govern everything according to their wisdom; but in vain.

This also the pagans saw, therefore they said that fortune governs in all things. For if wisdom were sufficient to govern things well, Cicero and Demosthenes would not have been deceived by their exceedingly wise and honest reasonings; if wisdom and strength were sufficient, Hector, as the poet 2) says, would have preserved Troy, Julius Caesar the Roman Empire. For these great men did not lack wisdom, not power, not care, not diligent attention; they did not lack early rising and late going to bed, not bread with care, and yet they all perished miserably and failed. That is why they were forced to say that happiness reigns in all things; likewise, that everything happens by chance. For the wiser they were, the more foolishly they governed everything in general, and Ty-

The more the mind is lost, the more luck there is than the greatest men in the state; as Aristotle has also said: The less understanding, the more happiness. For although Aristotle has a different opinion, it is nevertheless true that the highest wisdom destroys the greatest empires, as is also said in the proverb: A wise man does no small foolishness.

Although the pagans, who were not enlightened by the word of God, but only instructed by experience, confessed that things were not governed by wisdom and power, but by luck, they did not abstain from presuming on their wisdom and power, but wanted to govern land and people according to their own advice. Later, when things turned out differently, they recognized their error and attributed everything to luck. We must not ascribe these things to luck, unless you want to call it luck, when the wise and mighty and those who rise early have their counsels turn out differently than they presumed, but to the judgment of God, who punishes presumption in such a way. For why do men presume to be wise and mighty in things that are above (supra) the wisdom and power of men, and which are governed by God? Why do they not use their wisdom and power where God has willed it, namely in the things that are beneath them, of which the first book of Moses Cap. 2, 19. f.? They rightly deceive themselves and cry out that everything happens through luck. But this they do all too late, namely after country and people are already ruined and the empires are overthrown. For this is the song of fools, that they say, "I did not mean that," and then accuse fortune.

For it is not luck that our advice is lacking, but your foolishness and ignorance of God and yourself, first that you do not know who you are, then that you do not see what God's commandment is, and how far he wants you to preside over things. Thou beginest the song too high, after the manner of asses, therefore thou hast an evil cessation. When you see this afterwards, you cry out: There is no God, there is no

Divine providence. For the wisest princes do not carry out what they have wisely planned, the most powerful kings do not carry out what they are able to do. So God is unjust, or not a God at all, because otherwise he would look at the wise men and everything would be carried out as we have determined. Truly, excellent words, as if it were fitting for God to be such a God, who, when he sees that you, as the father of the house, have arranged everything wisely, should step up and say to you: "Father of the family, you have advised everything correctly; you are a very wise man, since you can rule even without me. Meanwhile, where is the honor and majesty of God? Where is God Himself when you foresee, rule and direct everything? If your wisdom and power do everything, then of course the divine wisdom and power is made nothing in this way.

Yes, rather, your advice must be destroyed, your power and wisdom must come to shame, so that you learn by experience that the wiser someone is, the less he accomplishes what he wants, the more foolish and unhappy he is. On the other hand, where there is sometimes the least hope, there it succeeds most easily, so that you recognize that the wisdom and the power in which you trust is nothing, is not able to do anything, but rather does harm. Not as if God condemns wisdom and power, for they are gifts of God that He gives to men, but that He condemns that wise and powerful men, trusting in these gifts, exclude God from the government of things, and strive to govern everything by themselves. Thus Cicero, Julius [Caesar] and Brutus take advice to set up the state well, and think: This is what I will do. Who? I, Cicero, Caesar, Brutus. With what do you want to do it? With my wisdom, my power. They do not see that this arrogance and presumption is sin. Afterwards, when they see that their wisest thoughts are lacking, they become blasphemers, and think that there is no God, or that God is unjust, that he does not give honor to the virtue of men and does not grant success to wisdom. For this reason, however, they are unhappy because they go beyond the limits of their wisdom, and they are not satisfied with being made masters.

are over the beasts of the field, and over the fish of the sea, and over the fowls of the air, and [over] all the beasts of the earth. Over these things man is granted dominion, Gen. 1, 28 [2, 19, 20]; but they also want to rule by their own power over man, who is like them, over the house, the wife, the children, kingdoms, empires, and that by their own power and wisdom, without welcoming God for it, without calling on God's help for it.

Therefore, this verse is the design and image of the whole world. For what is the whole world with all its pretensions but "rising early for nothing"? Look at the princes, look at the authorities, look at the fathers of families and stewards, and you will see people who get up early, but in vain. Therefore, from the highest to the lowest, they all sing this song, a ruler as well as a maid in the house: "I rise early and toil, and eat my bread with sorrow. Very few are enlightened by God, who have this grace that they realize they are instruments, but God is the ruler, and who consider success a gift, not a work of their wisdom and counsel. All the others go along in presumption, and ascribe everything to their work, as if they were the masters of things. Hence it comes that they tarnish. Thus Cicero, Demosthenes, and other great men did not fail in the state system by being wise, as in the kingdom of Israel Ahaz and Ahab, of whom it is evident that they were well experienced people (politicos viros) in the world regime, but they sinned in that they thought that those things and the rule were subject to their wisdom. Cicero saw that he was the only orator in the Roman state, and he saw what should be done, how everything should be governed. But because he was without fear of God, and attributed everything to his counsel to the exclusion of God, God wanted to show him through experience that it was not enough to advise well, and that even human understanding was not sufficient for the government of such great things, but that the blessing of God from heaven was necessary. Therefore, Cicero not only did not help the state with his advice, but he brought about ruin.

ing, both for themselves and for the state.

The same happens with wealth and goods. Goods are not evil, but a gift of God, like wisdom. God now grants us and concedes to us the use and possession of them. But that the rich man wants to add: This shall be mine, this I have brought about by my diligence and my work, and regards these things only as acquired from him, that is evil and is a devilish striving after the Godhead, which our parents in paradise, deceived by the devil, accepted, and afterwards we, who are begotten by them, all bring into the world with us. Therefore, just as it is impossible to get rid of this flesh of ours that we carry around with us, it is also impossible to completely get rid of that desire for the Godhead. But the saints fight against it and kill it more and more every day, until it is finally taken away completely with life through death.

Now the godly, who have been given goods, say: I have gold, I have silver, but it is not my work, but your gift, O Lord, which you have given through my work. But however much I might have worked, I would have nothing if you had not given it 2c. But the world says quite differently: I have a beautiful wife, I have lovely children. By whose good deed? Certainly by mine. For I am worthy to have such. But, says God, if you miss it, you are lying. As a sign of this, I will cause your children to die or be put to shame, and your wife either to lie ill or become an adulteress or to lose her possessions. 2c. Another has magnificently built houses. When I ask him, Where did you get them? By whose work? By whose power did you acquire them? He answers: By my power. No; and that thou mayest see that this is true, I will destroy them by fire, or thou shalt die before thou enjoy them at thy pleasure. Another governs the commonwealth, the duchy, the kingdom in peace. By whose power? By weeping, he says. No; and that thou mayest see that this is true, I will allow sedition to be stirred up, War or other unrest, that you should be surprised and say: Who could have even suspected that this would happen?

Against this presumption, this Psalm teaches that we should say: Wife, children, servants, goods, peace, kingdom 2c. are gifts from God. I will enjoy them with gratitude as long as it pleases the Lord and as long as the Lord gives them. If the wife dies, or the children, if there is any disturbance in public life: dear Lord God, I was the owner of these gifts; you gave them, you also took them away. I will therefore gladly suffer this loss, otherwise this possession could not have been an eternal one 2c. If your heart is so equipped, it can well bear the adversities that the wicked must bear with the greatest pain. But the world does not hear, therefore it experiences what the Psalm says: "It is in vain that you rise up early," and they are against themselves torturers and devils who toil themselves, but in vain. Rightly so, for why do they not listen? Therefore, look at all the kingdoms, all the commonwealths whose histories exist, the Roman, the Athenian, Lacedemon, Thebes 2c., and you will find a very true picture of this verse.

To his friends he gives it sleeping.

After he has sufficiently punished our presumption and the striving after the Godhead above, he now goes on to the second part of this psalm, in which he teaches that everything lies in God's blessing. For only that is called right teaching, if one first tears down what is wrong and then builds up what is well-founded and solid. For one could ask: What should one do, since our power and wisdom do nothing? as we see in Cicero, who had such great wisdom as can only be granted to a human spirit, and yet through this wisdom did nothing, but harmed himself and others. Through ignorance he certainly did not fail as far as the things themselves are concerned. For reason can see what is useful to do and what is not; and as we can by nature hold numbers against each other, and know that ten is greater than five, so also Cicero can pronounce with certainty (what the

The author is not lacking in wisdom, which is a good creature of God. He certainly does not lack wisdom, which is a good creature of God.

What is he lacking in? Certainly, that he adds the presumption that he thinks that the management of this by far most difficult matter is a work of his wisdom. Therefore, although Cicero (as I said before, and what is available of him also indicates) has as much wisdom as a man can have, he is not up to the task he has taken upon himself. The reason is that Cicero uses his wisdom to govern other people. If they thought and wanted the same things that Cicero thinks and wants, then things would be fine. But among a hundred thousand there is hardly one or two who approve of Cicero's advice and want the same; all others are of a different mind or follow a different path. Although Cicero shouts a lot here, and the case also speaks for him that his advice is very honest and of great benefit to the state, the greater part nevertheless gains the victory over the better part, and the few who follow Cicero come with him, the author, into danger of their lives and goods, because they pursue their advice too stubbornly.

Now, in the beginning of my cause, when I wrote against indulgences and other abuses, I had received this gift from God, that I took such a great cause upon myself alone, and considered that I had to rely solely on God's help, and did not think that I had to do something in reliance on others; otherwise, the same thing would have happened to me that Münzer and other enthusiasts encountered. But I relied on the good cause, that is, on God's word itself. I believed that it could not be overpowered by the gates of hell, even if the adversaries could easily oppress me and those who were with me by tyranny. And truly, the excellence of the cause caused an immense applause from all, even from those who are now our bitterest enemies. If I had been so foolish here now, and had thought that I had innumerable supporters of my opinion, and, trusting in the crowd, had begun to do something, as Muenzer did, my end would have been exactly the same as his, although in a better cause. But I preferred to follow St. Paul, who admonished me in his letter to the Galatians, Cap. 6, 4: "Let every man examine his own work, and then he will have glory in himself and not in another.

And it is also useful to pay attention to this commandment in more important matters of the world order, that when someone subjects himself to some great matter, he does not do it at all by trusting in others, but considers that he must take it upon himself alone, and therefore appeals to God for his help. Others, who rely on the favor and help of their friends, never think of divine help, and for that reason always have an unhappy outcome. Thus a certain man in Swabia, when he was executed because of certain plots he had undertaken in the state, said very wisely: "What one man alone could not raise, he should leave alone," that is, one should not do anything by relying on others. Taught by his own experience, he saw that what is undertaken in reliance on others is not undertaken happily. But to come back to the point, Cicero, Demosthenes, the greatest men, did not foresee the outcome in their dealings. That the matter turned out differently than they themselves thought, did not happen because they did not care wisely enough for the state, but because of their own fault, because they wanted to have fame, not only in themselves, but also in others, that the citizens should say: Behold, this man we have followed, who has accomplished these things 2c., as this little verse of Cicero also testifies:

O fortunatam natam me consule Romam! [O how fortunate was Rome, since I became its consul
Was this not an exceedingly presumptuous word, and worthy of rebuke? Therefore, at the end, he sang another song, as can be seen in the letter to Octavius. But this means to make the gift of God a work of human, or rather devilish arrogance.

If now already Cicero and Demosthenes ask, since the wisest counsels have failed them, what one should do, whether one should put wisdom aside, and throw the rule from oneself 2c.? then Solomon answers: No, but you must rule and govern the state with counsels. Thus he commands a householder to take a wife, to acquire goods, to build the field 2c., but in such a way that this is established: "To his friends he gives asleep", that the word "he gives" remains, that is, that everything that falls to him is recognized as a gift; likewise, "that he gives to his friends", and as it were "gives asleep", so that it is a gift, given to the friend and easily given. This is the shortest epitome, and shortest interpreted, which he will afterwards further elaborate according to its parts, so that you recognize everything on which your eye falls, yourself, your life, your body, your wife, your children, peace, good success, 2c., as a gift of the Creator, which he has given to none other than his friend.

Hence the faces and the image of the world in the previous verse, where there are not friends, but nonsensical people with an innate desire for divinity and a carnal mind, who want to rule and direct everything according to their advice. These have no gift; for although they have it, they do not recognize it as a gift and do not say: God has given this. But although Cicero and other philosophers sometimes call these things gifts of God, they do not believe it, but make of themselves a kind of gods and creators, who by their counsel fortify the states, preserve the rule, avert impending calamities 2c. By this presumption they challenge God to send Hannibal or Pyrrhus, or to provoke a civil war through Sulla and Pompey, or a conspiracy of shameful men through Catilina, so that they realize that they are not the leaders of such great affairs. So also the wicked have gifts from God, although they do not realize that they are gifts. But we must learn this; as, if you have taken a wife, if you preside over a commonwealth or any other thing, well-

Be wise, hear the word of God, and know what you are and what you are not; your wife, your children, your servants, your goods, 2c. adorn them with this title, that the Lord has given them, that is, that you heartily believe that they are God's gifts, which God has given, and require nothing else in return than that you acknowledge with a grateful heart that they are His gifts. But to recognize this is also a gift of God, as it says in the Book of Wisdom, Cap. 8, 21: "But when I learned that I could not be chaste in any other way, unless God gave it to me: the same was also the highest wisdom, to recognize that such a gift is."

Whoever now believes that wife, children, authority 2c. gifts of God, is not puffed up by success, because he knows that it is God's gift, not his work, not his virtue and his honor. Thus I hope that Emperor Carl, to whom God has bestowed great good fortune, will consider that so many and so great things have been gloriously accomplished by his own, not solely through his or his own diligence, but through God's gift; as it is reported of him that he attributed the glorious victory, since the king of France was captured at Pavia, solely to God with thanks. 1) Thus, a husband who is so equipped has pure joy in his wife and children, because he believes that they are God's gifts, and enjoys them with thanksgiving as long as God allows him to do so. If God takes them away from him again, he bears it with equanimity; he does not toil, he does not eat his bread with sorrow, but he sleeps, because he is the friend whom God wants well, and lives as if he were asleep. His net is drawn as it were while he sleeps; so it was said of Timothy. For the pagans also saw that fortune ruled, as the poet says: Fata regunt orbem [fate rules the world], but they did not know the reason why it happened that the wisest people were mistaken, and others, who did not have a special fame of wisdom, everything went as they wished.

Since the empire first fell upon Carl, our

1) This entire sentence, which deals with Emperor Carl, is omitted in the Wittenberg and Jena editions.

The Pope, the Frenchman, and the Venetians, admiring their own wisdom, ridiculed us and thought that there was nothing in Carl that was equal to it. But what happens? The admirable wisdom of which the enemies of the empire boasted is destroyed with shame; Carl is victorious everywhere. Now they cry out and reproach him with his good fortune as an insult, that he did not have this war glory of his own accord, but that it all fell to him, as it were, in his sleep. But you see where this happiness comes from, and you will find that it is the gift of God. Because Carl recognizes this (as I hope), and his deeds and sayings testify to this, God loves him, and, as the Psalm says, everything is given to his friend as it were in sleep. If now and then (which God forbid) some misfortune should befall him, then he will say, if he is a Christian: The Lord has given good success for so long, now he takes it away; the name of the Lord be praised! 2)

Thus, a godly man enjoys the things and the dominion granted to him by God in the second chapter [v. 19. f.] of the first book of Moses. He eats, he drinks, he sleeps; he delights in his wife, his children, his goods with thanksgiving and says: Dear Lord God, it is your gift, it was your gift; if you take it away, it is yours again 2c. Thus the heart is quiet and still in a right and godly way. But the wicked have their bread with cares, and sleep not even at night. But a godly man sleeps not only at night, but all the time of his life, that is, he is calm (otioso) of heart, and in his kingdom he sleeps as in a soft bed. He leaves the supreme government to God and enjoys his gifts, and knows that he is God's instrument, and thus has everything, as it were, through sleep in idleness, giving glory to God; and since he does nothing, he judges everything, and when he does everything, he judges nothing.

2) This entire paragraph, which deals with Emperor Carl, is also omitted in the Wittenberg edition, but is found in the Jena and Erlangen editions.

Now that he has thus sufficiently condemned presumption on wisdom and human powers above, he finally teaches the right cause and the supreme lord and regent of the world and house regiment, namely, the Lord Himself. But it is an extraordinary brevity, "To his friends he gives it sleeping." But the sleep of which he speaks is to be referred to the rest and quiet of the heart or conscience, not to the rest of the flesh and body. One must work with the body and let it sour, but with a cheerful conscience and trusting in the divine blessing, as it is written in the first book of Moses [Cap, 1, 22, 28.] that all things endure through GOD's blessing, not through our care. Now he continues, and explains more extensively what he has briefly stated, in the same order that he has maintained above, that he says first of the household, then of the world government.

V. 3. Behold, children are a gift of the Lord, and the fruit of the womb is a gift.)

Through the fault of the Latin translation, there is an extraordinary darkness in this verse, and it is not possible for a Latin-speaking person to understand it. For not only the words, but also the way of speaking, which the Holy Spirit and the Scriptures use, is from God. The meaning is this: Behold, this is the wisdom, rule and way of keeping the household right, that children are an inheritance from God, that is, God's gift, and that the fruit of the womb, that is, what is born of the womb, is a gift, that is, a gift from God. But it is not at all an inconsistent opinion, if in the first place, in order to make a distinction, sons are understood, namely, the male sex, and in the second place "fruit of the body" is understood of that which is female in all living beings, but especially in human beings. For the matter comes to the same thing, namely, that one is father and mother is not based on human but on divine power, and although the man begets through the woman, and the woman conceives through the man, both are a gift of God and a divine blessing, as the text says [Gen. 1:27]: "God created them male and female." "He created," he says, to indicate that they are not their own regents and image-makers, but that both male and female are GOD's creatures. After this he adds [v. 28.], "And blessed them, saying, Be fruitful and multiply." From this passage in the first book of Moses flows this verse of the Psalm. For that God gives children is not due to our works, but it is the divine blessing. But although the world experiences this, it does not understand it, nor does it pay attention to it. Because this witnessing of descendants is a daily benefit, it is not considered very important. Thus the world, as swine do, wallows in the dung of its doings and lusts, and does not recognize and admire these supreme benefits of God in which it lives and walks.

It should also be noted that God has not blessed man without distinction (promiscue) as He has blessed the other animals; But He has adorned man with a special blessing, so that we may more easily believe that it is God's gift when we have sons and daughters, and that the husband does not presume to impregnate the wife, nor does the wife presume as if she were conceiving from a natural and inherent power, but that they learn that these are truly divine works. For this reason it sometimes happens that healthy and beautiful women, who are united with strong and healthy men, who sit in great goods and prosperity, are nevertheless barren, namely, so that God may show that childbearing and procreation come from His blessing, and do not lie in human strength or nature. On the other hand, another, who can hardly protect himself against hunger, has a house full of children. Therefore, our Germans, when they speak of children, rightly say: "Our Lord God has given me a child," God has given me children. Although all have this word in their mouths, there are still few who admire or understand this blessing, because it is obscured by the wretched lust for pleasure and by other disgusting things (foeditibus) of the flesh,

1) Vulgate: Dees UeroaitM Domini ulü merees, truetus vsutris. Luther gave this verse in Latin like this: Lees ulü UsrsäiMs Domini, ot truetns ventris sst meress.

1) namely accidents, dangers, toil, work 2c. These so obscure the divine blessing that it seems not a blessing but rather a curse. For when either the children are disobedient, or the wife stubborn, or the parents die and leave the children orphans, or the wife dies 2c. the curse seems stronger than the blessing. Therefore, the Holy Scripture calls us to it, and commands us to look at the matter itself and the essence (substantiam) of marriage, which is the divine blessing, so that when we look at it, we may consider (absorbemus) all that there is of misfortune and misery in marriage to be nothing.

On this occasion one sees our weakness and our unbelief. For we are all of such a nature that we are more moved by one disadvantage than by a hundred advantages, as we see when someone has been granted a healthy body that he bears more sorrow over a sore that has arisen at the knee or at the elbow than he rejoices over the health of the whole rest of the body, as the German proverb says: "If you were to carry someone out of the back all the way to Rome and set him down unkindly, all thanks would be lost. We see this also in ungrateful children. After the parents have brought up the children with the greatest effort and many costs, they either wait for the death of the parents, or become disobedient and forget about all good deeds. In this way it also happens in marriage that the blessing is obscured by the curse. That is why the Holy Spirit eliminates the blessing, so that we may look more to the Lord and to the author and creator than to the troubles with which this extremely holy state is overwhelmed. Therefore we should remember and cling to this word, which we read in the first book of Moses: "And he blessed them" [Cap. 1, 28]. By this word we are to strengthen ourselves against those evils and speak: If this state of ours is God's blessing, I will rejoice in the Lord who blesses me, whether it go out good or evil, and I will believe, that this work may please him. For I know that wife, children, house and servants are his gifts; so that you write on everything you have and possess this title: It is God's gift, and by placing the blessing and majesty of God in your position, you disregard all misfortunes, dangers and troubles.

The heathen, however, and those who do not have God's word, can think nothing less than this of marriage, but think that man and woman are joined together by chance, and that children are born to them, as to swine. If they have children, they bring them up in the hope of wealth and goods, but it usually happens that the children of very great people are the most out of sorts, as many examples show, not only in sacred history and that of the Gentiles, but also in our daily life. The Holy Spirit therefore instructs us in God's Word, which is in the first book of Moses, so that we may learn that our bodies are not ours, but if you are a man, that you recognize that everything that is male (masculinum) about you is a gift from God; so that children celebrate God's gift, not your work. Therefore, remain a creature of God and tell yourself that your male body and your life are pleasing to God, then you can enjoy what God has given, namely your life, your wife, your children, your goods, with a clear conscience; and if any difficulties arise, you can also overcome them by holding the other gifts against them, of which you will find more in your state than disadvantages.

Furthermore, he calls "children" not only the fruit of the womb, but everything that is necessary to feed, educate, care for and provide for the children. For he who gives the children also gives and creates at the same time that with which they are nourished, otherwise the children could not last long. God gives these things to the one abundantly, to the other less abundantly, but in such a way that no one dies of hunger, unless he tries some in particular. But as God generally and ordinarily acts, the children who are born bring food and clothing with them.

so that they do not die from lack. Although it sometimes happens that mothers eat their children out of unbearable hunger, the rule is not abolished by one or two such examples. For these have been special examples of God's wrath and punishment. But it is different to speak of God being angry and sending plagues than to speak of God leading and governing us. That is why we see that the children of those who eke out a miserable existence on bread and water are of the best physique and red-cheeked, while the children of many who are rich and prosperous walk along like shadows and look sickly pale. Why is that? Because the children are a gift of God, which God Himself created. Therefore, He also gives that which the children cannot do without, as the first creation of man shows us. For before Adam was formed from the earth, God the Creator Himself prepared the earth for him as a house in which he should dwell, and did not leave the house empty and useless to him, but adorned it for him with every kind of good and pleasure, so that He might show us, the descendants of Adam, that He would be our Father and govern us, and provide us abundantly with everything, if only we believed.

Thus, the fruit, while still living in the womb, is nourished without all its labor and care, by God alone. For what should the fruit do, which lies there without all understanding? After it has come into the world through birth, the child has a filled cellar, the breasts of the mother prepared as a source for it, it has a well-stocked kitchen, baths, diapers and other things that it needs, and there are not only women who care for the child through their work, but also the angels, as many exceedingly clear examples show. Where does all this come from? Of course, because God receives His gifts Himself, He also gives abundantly the things by which they are received. Therefore, at this point, "children" must be taken not for children alone, for flesh, skin and bones, but for everything that belongs to children.

In the same way, by woman and man are not to be understood the mere bodies, but a Dwelling, a stove, food, drink, and all that is necessary for housekeeping. These are God's gifts, whether we have them abundantly or only sparsely, for God does not distribute them in the same way. But for this very reason, even if they are given only sparsely, they are still great and rich, because they are God's gifts. For just as we value the gifts of princes, however small they may be, more according to their good will than according to their value, so also to you, however small a gift God has bestowed upon you, so that you can feed yourself and your family poorly, God's good will and divine blessing should nevertheless suffice, so that you know for certain that God is favorable to you and has bestowed these gifts. If he takes them away again, you can bear it with equanimity, because you know that it was not yours, but God's property. Thus you are calm and quiet of heart, whether you have abundance or lack, and since you attract God in such a way through His benefits, and that I say, incorporate them into yourself, those benefits become richer and greater, however small they may be in appearance.

And this may be enough about the opinion of the prophet; it remains that we also touch a little on the grammar, which is somewhat darker because of the Hebrew way of speaking. For what the Hebrew says: the inheritance of the LORD is children, the Latin would express it thus: children are a gift of GOD; and: the fruit of the womb is a reward (merces), could be said in Latin thus: Children are a gift from GOtt. For the word "inheritance" has a very broad meaning with them. Heir they call the land, which was distributed among the people by Joshua [Deut. 1, 38.], therefore the word is transferred to all gifts. For the land of Canaan was simply given to the people of Israel, therefore they call all possessions, property and gifts "inheritance". Thus it is said in the Psalm [Ps. 119, 57. 111.]: Your law is my inheritance, that is, the gift you have given me, "my highest inheritance." We use the word inheritance a little differently, from a thing left to us by our parents, but to the Hebrews it means a gift and a portion given by God.

The word "reward" (moreeäis) is very common in Hebrew. Jer. 31:16 [in the Vulgate and Hebrew: "It is a reward for your labor," and in Job, "This is the reward of those who sow to the wind," and Ps. 109:20: "So be it done to those from the LORD who are repugnant to me." 2c. But it means a gift, the reward of labor, a divine gift. Thus it is written in Isaiah cap. 40, 10. and 62, 11. So also Paul writes to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. 15, 58. "Be firm, for your labor is not in vain."

Now this is the teaching of the Holy Spirit for the home and a proper Christian household, that one believes that children and everything else is a gift from God. When this knowledge is certain, that we receive everything, as it were, from the hand of God, who gives it, then we will soon learn, by a beautiful deduction, which the inference of the Holy Spirit teaches us, how to bear and overcome all dangers, misfortunes, and miseries, so that we, may our wife or children die, or other misfortunes befall us, can say with Job [Cap. 1, 21.], "The LORD gave, the LORD hath taken away; the name of the LORD fei praised!" For reason, already enlightened by the Word, recognizes blessings and gives thanks, but in adversities it does not resist the will of GOD. Not as if we should lose God's gifts without pain of the flesh, for we do not comfort the flesh but the spirit, but also the saints feel those adversities and are struck by them, but not overcome, just as Jacob, after he had lost Joseph, was greatly afflicted, but did not despair, did not blaspheme, but bore the misfortune, because he saw that he had been a gift of God and had been snatched away from him again. Therefore, he who is so equipped never lacks anything.

But it is not enough to learn this doctrine from a book, but it is necessary to apply it and experience it, without which this home rule will never be learned, as we see in those who have nothing in mind but happiness and misfortune. Since these enter into marriage with such a heart that they indulge in their lusts, that they have their children through who bring their wisdom to great goods and dignities, will experience the opposite in all things, that they themselves with their children, with their wives and fortunes will perish, because they do not know that the divine blessing is necessary. On the other hand, those who accept these gifts as God's blessing will be of good cheer and a calm heart, even if fortune is not favorable to them.

V. 4 As arrows in the hand of a strong man, so do young children go.

This is a simile taken from warfare, and somewhat obscure, but belongs to the world regiment. The bow in the hand of a strong archer is not drawn in vain, as David says of Jonathan, 2 Sam. 1:22. [Vulg.] "The arrow of Jonathan never returned," that is, it never missed, but strikes and penetrates. Hence Isaiah calls the apostles arrows; likewise Zechariah. Hence the meaning is: it is God's gift to rule inwardly in peace without turmoil and to have victory outwardly. For without this gift there is no happy government at all, nor victory in war. For in government there are always more enemies than friends, then the greater part is always evil, and generally defeats the better part if God does not help. Therefore, it is God's gift if the state of a community is blissful both internally and externally.

The Latin translator has given it: Filii excussorum, but it is: Filii juventutis [the young sons], who are to protect the state with weapons and wage the wars. These are, as it were, arrows that strike because they are sent and given by God. For old men are not good for wars, as the old verse teaches:

" Εργα νέων, βουλαῖ δέ ρέβων, εὐχαί τε γερόντων

[That with the young, counsel with the men, prayers with the old],

That is, the work in the state must be done by the young men, but those who are middle-aged should give good advice, but those who are old should assist the state with their prayers. As he therefore above

In the case of the household, he placed filios masculos [people of the male sex], so here he places juvenes [young men], in order to understand both, nourish and defend, because these two parts are necessary for civil and physical life.

But listen to how he adorns the defense of the state with a very honorable title, that he calls the young people a gift of God, which God makes into victorious arrows that penetrate the enemies in such a way that they carry off the victory. For experience has also taught the pagans that victory does not depend on great men (vires) and power, but that it is given by God, and that it depends more on good attention and counsel than on the force of arms (in armis). Thus it has often happened that the greatest armies have been put to flight by a small team. Not that one should not make armaments and raise armies, but if necessity urges an authority to wage war, let it, whether it have many or few men of war, neither be presumptuous nor despair for the sake of it, but let it consider its profession that it is compelled by office to fight and to strive for victory, and let it ask it of heaven and say: O Lord, with thee is strength and victory; stand thou with me 2c. So again, if you are superior to the enemies in number and power, you shall not promise yourself a certain victory for that sake, but shall ask it of GOD: O LORD, thine is the victory; if thou wilt give it, I will thank thee; but if by defeat thou wilt punish our sins, behold, here am I.

If such confidence should be in the leader alone, who recognizes his calling and appeals to God for help, he will undoubtedly gain the victory, as Jephthah did. He was in office and would have liked to live in peace with his people, but Ammon did not allow him to do so. Jephthah therefore presented this need to God, that he could not avoid fighting, and asked him for help against the enemies, and so he was victorious. For he recognized that the victory was not his work, but God's gift [Judges, chap. 11]. Thus David won many glorious victories over his enemies, one after another. From where? He had weapons,

Horsemen, footmen, but these, he said, do not help to bring about the victory. Therefore he asked and expected the victory from the Lord; on this faith the certain victory followed. Solomon therefore teaches in this verse that victory is in truth a gift of God, and, just as arrows shot and hurled with strength penetrate, so also the young men in war succeed by the blessing of God, not by their own strength or presumption. It is a Hebrew way of speaking: Filii juventutis, that is, young men, as those destined to die are called children of death 2c. Now he concludes:

V. 5: Blessed is he that hath his quiver full of them; they are not put to shame when they deal with their enemies in the gate. 1)

Translate like this [instead of the old Latin translation]: Beatus vir, qui implevit pharetram suam talibus, non confundetur, si quando cum hostibus in porta res erit, as if he wanted to say: This is a blessed prince, this is a happy state, which has this blessing, and recognizes that it is a gift of God; there must necessarily be victory and peace, inwardly and outwardly. Although it happens that some perish and are killed (that is, as it were, a sore and blisters on the skin), the body is saved and victory is achieved. For victory is hardly ever achieved without all bloodshed, but the greater the danger, the more glory is given to the warriors, and the joy over a difficult victory is greater than the sorrow over the shed blood. In the same way, domestic life is not without harm, nor is any part of life at all. But it is not to be considered a harm that the skin (for I like to use this simile) is easily afflicted with a bark, but the whole body is well. Therefore it is certain that those are blessed who have such young men to defend them, even if some of them perish, that is, those who have this gift and know that it is God's gift.

1) Vulgate: L6atu8 vir, Hui imxl^vit äesiclerium suuM ex ipsis, non aorüunäetur, aum lo^uetur inimi<^8 8UI8 in porta.

"Speak in the gate" is a Hebrew expression. For it means not only to speak, but to speak in the affairs of the commonwealth (politic), that is, to give laws, to govern according to laws, to let out commandments (edicta), to keep offenders in check 2c., as if he wanted to say: Where such young men are, they know how to speak in the gate; that is, in the affairs of the commonwealth they act in a right way, they are regents, founders and upholders of the state and the laws. But listen to what he adds, namely, that they not only have enemies who attack them, but also adversaries who attack them. Therefore a person in authority must learn to bear these enmities; otherwise, if they are deterred by hatred, and wish to hunt after the favor of men, chastisement (anarchiam) will ensue, as we see in the courts of princes. Because everyone there wants to be in favor, they do not dare to blame anything, to condemn anything, lest they fall out of favor with the princes. But why do they strive for the office of authority, why do they live at the court, if they do not have their troubles in mind, but only wages and honor? That is why there is no proper form of government anywhere, and everything is administered in the worst possible way. But those who do not want to expose themselves to the disfavor and hatred of men should stay away from the magistracy.

Who ever ruled an empire in a more holy way than David? And yet his rebellious son Absalom, accusing him among the great multitude, easily found such people to believe him. Why is that? Because David was an exceedingly holy king and did not look through his fingers at the transgressions of his subjects, but dealt with them harshly with punishment as they deserved, so this first attracted the hatred and envy of the mob to him. After that they could easily be tempted to apostasy, since the son was added as leader and author of the sedition. For it cannot be otherwise than that he who carries out his office in a position of authority with earnestness should incur the hatred of the wicked people. For this reason, our people are wise, who hold positions of honor and offices of authority without laborious Desire to keep work; but to great danger to the community.

Therefore, one must not take these words:) "Acting with the enemies in the gate" must not be taken so simply (nulle) as if it were an idle matter. For it means giving laws and carrying them out accordingly, forcing wrongdoers with prisons, gangs and severe punishments, arousing the rage of malicious people against them 2c., so that he who presides in a community should preside in such a way that he is never without fear of the gravest dangers, as far as the audacity of bad boys is concerned, because to govern is nothing other than to invite hatred upon oneself and to get involved with this snarling (dentatam) and exceedingly furious wild animal (the mob). Thus also Aeschines said, when he left the government at Athens, that he was glad that he was now delivered from the government, as from a raging dog. And Bias said: Regiment shows what kind of a man he is. For how many cities are there nowadays that can keep their citizens, how many princes that can keep their nobility in their duty? For governing is by far the hardest of all human works. But just as he who takes a wife for the sake of pleasure and enjoyment falls far short, and is involved in troubles of which he has never thought, so also those who enter into a magisterial office, lured by the hope of rewards and honor, find everything quite different, if only they will carry out their office. Hence it comes that, broken by the greatness of the toil and by impatience, they become unwilling and throw everything away.

Therefore, you must learn to hate in government all these impulses (vitia): Hatred, rebellion, insubordination, disobedience, ingratitude, a thousand dangers, disturbers of peace and tranquility, which pursue your life, your goods and your dignity. What should a person in authority do here? First of all, of course, that he knows that the authorities are an order of God, and that he firmly believes that he has entered upon the office of government according to the will of God; then, after he has established this, that he also strengthens and fortifies the courage against all dangers, and does his duty, whether the citizens are displeased about it or not. Then it will be done.

God will give his blessing and help you and not the enemies, as he says here: "You will not be disgraced, even if you have to deal with the enemies and with disobedient and rebellious citizens. Likewise the 144th Psalm, v. 2: "Who compels my people under me." Likewise the seventh Psalm, v. 9: "The Lord is judge over the people," as if he wanted to say: "It is not in my power, my wisdom or prudence to govern this people. Therefore, it is the Lord who gives obedient citizens and preserves the people, who by nature hate the authorities. For all want to be free, and suffer with reluctance that their licentiousness is restrained by the bonds of law, as we see today in the aristocracy, who want everything to be free to them with impunity. If a prince wants to keep them in check, they fall away.

Against these dangers, the Holy Spirit comforts the authorities in this passage: If you have given laws, he says, you will not be put to shame, for God will give you young people who can help you. For in a commonwealth, often a good man, or two, by his earnestness and severity, keeps all the rest of the citizens in their duty. Others, however, who turn a blind eye to everything, lest they incur spite, are not persons of authority, but only wicked men.

Now you have this psalm, which deals with the worldly and domestic government, how a godly heart in both states should be prepared, so that we do not either fall into security through good prosperity, or, broken by adversity, depart from the ministry. Both of these things happen to the wicked, who, without the fear of God, fall into either marriage or worldly rule. Because they do not know that these things are governed by God, they want everything to be guided by their advice. That is why they either start in a dangerous way or get so far into security that they cannot be brought back to sound advice. Therefore, we must make an effort, who are either already placed in these positions by God, or will be placed one day, that we, as this teaching is necessary and useful for all, also learn it diligently. In this way we will bring great benefit both to ourselves and to the community. Then our ministry will also be pleasing to God, who, as he has promised, will make it prosper and prove by deed "that he is pleased with those who fear him and with all who hope in his goodness" [Ps. 147:11]. Amen.

The hundred and twenty-eighth Psalm.

Blessed is he who fears the Lord.

In the previous psalm, the prophet taught about the two states, namely, the world and the domestic regime; here he also acts almost the same, but in a different way. For although here he also connects the domestic regime with the world regime and asks for blessing and peace for both, in this psalm he looks more at the domestic or marital regime, because this is, as it were, the source and origin of the state. For the boys whom we raise and educate in the home become those who come after us, once have as regents of the state. For this is how it happens: houses or families become cities, cities become countries (provinciae), countries become kingdoms. It is therefore rightly said that the household is the source of the world's government, because if the household is disrupted, neither dominions nor cities can be founded, just as if the individual beings (individuis) are gone, neither species nor genus can exist. Therefore, we want to give this psalm the title that it is a kind of ipithalamium and wedding song.

through which the prophet comforts the spouses and asks and promises them all happiness from God. This can then be transferred, as it were, from the species to the state; for just as God wants to bless through marriage, because the marriage state is a divine order and a state that is extremely pleasing to God, so also the authorities are appointed by God and have the certain promise of divine blessing.

But in this psalm it will become apparent how good a poet and speaker the Holy Spirit is, who knows all the rules how to speak and convince in the best way. For he most carefully covers up what is burdensome or hateful in this state, and with great diligence selects and compiles only what is very suitable for convincing, and what alone and truly is good in marriage. The world does it differently, for it not only does not know the proper goods of marriage, but if it sees them, it covers them up with the existing difficulties. Therefore it is not to be wondered at that, when ungodly men speak of this state, they are wont to use words quite different from those which the Holy Spirit is wont to use. For they follow only the sense of the flesh, and see in both the worldly and domestic regimes nothing but what is burdensome, burdensome and troublesome, and not only that, but the truly divine goods that are in these states, they pay no attention to, because of the little troubles of the flesh. Hence these sayings have arisen: There is no city without hardship, that is, without women; likewise: A woman is a necessary evil, and similar invectives against the female sex, of which there are many among the Greeks. Thus one cites a vituperative saying of a Greek poet: Ἔνδοξα βάλπειν χρεῖσσόν ἐστω ἡ γαμέτῃ [it is better to bury a woman than to have one free], and also a Roman said: if we could be without women, we would be rid of a great trouble. The cause of this judgment is that the flesh is so corrupted by original sin that it cannot bear these penalties of sin with equanimity, but seeks only what is pleasant, but flees troubles and toils. Therefore it avoids the

He either completely abuses marriage and public offices, as the Epicureans do, or abuses them only for his own pleasure. It is so blinded by original sin, by the lust for pleasure, honor and wealth. Therefore it was necessary to add a remedy for the corrupt nature, and to hold down the horny flesh a little by these troubles, which are in the state of marriage as well as in the office of authority.

Since we read this praise of marriage in the Holy Scriptures, we must contrast it with the judgment of men and add this correction, that this is true according to the Holy Spirit, but not true according to the flesh. When he then says of a godly husband [v. 2], "Blessed art thou, thou hast it good," the flesh takes quite a different view of it, and judges that marriage is something quite wretched, and that the husband is in a very bad way, because he is compelled to provide a livelihood by hard work. For the world does not understand that which is of the Holy Spirit, and does not see the goods that are both in the household and in the world's government, but only clings to the creature; but God, who created, governs and blesses it, does not see it. The Holy Spirit, on the other hand, looks at the Creator; and the blessings of the Lord, however much they may be covered with many a tribulation, he exalts most gloriously; but the troubles he either passes over (dissimulates) altogether, or makes them exceedingly small; this the world cannot do.

Thus, we see in the histories that the wiser the people were, the more they were careful about dealing with public affairs and the government. The same thing happens in the marriage state. Young people find it very difficult to put on this yoke, as the old man says in the comic poet: Omnes, qui amant, graviter sibi uxorem dari ferunt falle Bühler go reluctantly into the marriage state. And if some, moved by love, bend their necks under this yoke, then, if afterwards everything does not go according to their will, but other and other inconveniences occur, which they, blinded by love, did not foresee, bitter complaints follow, and they regret all too late what they have done.

And it happens that others can much more easily bear all the infirmities of a harlot or an adulteress than a husband can bear them of his wife, just as a wife, if she is not particularly righteous, more easily overlooks the gross faults of her adulterer than the minor impulses which the husband gives her, because nature cannot suffer these fetters indifferently, unless hearts, instructed by the Word and enlightened by the Holy Spirit, look up to the Creator, who has established both the world's and the house's government, and wills that both be governed by this wretched flesh. Those who do not have this knowledge, or have it in such a way that they only think of it above, are easily moved to impatience if everything does not go well. Therefore, the minds of the godly must also be instructed, admonished and raised up so that they should look a little beyond the difficulties that first fall into their eyes, and that, setting aside the judgment of the wise men of the world, they should look at the true and highest goods that God has hidden in these states and take them deeply into their hearts: then it will happen that they will both more easily endure these difficulties and also gladly obey God, who tempts them in many ways. And to this end, let us now interpret this wedding song, so that we may see the spiritual goods that God hides in the marriage state and marvel at them, lest we become like the world, which sees the works of God and yet does not understand them, which hears the divine blessings and the sweetest promises and yet does not believe them.

V. 1. Blessed is he who fears the Lord and walks in his ways.

First of all, notice that the prophet does not immediately go on with the promises of marriage, as if they had been given for the sake of marriage, but he starts from the first table and praises the blessed one who fears the Lord. But he does it for the sake of showing that the world does not understand what it is to become a spouse or to take a wife. That is why, when difficulties arise, it cannot bear them with equanimity;

Therefore she is not blissful but miserable. But whoever fears the Lord, whether he enters the government, if he has been called to it, or takes a wife, he is blessed, however it may go in the marriage state or in the magisterial office. For it may happen that even those who fear the Lord do not prosper in marriage, but are united either with wicked or with strange wives, or are oppressed by other burdens, such as the premature death of a good wife, or degenerate children, or a childless and barren marriage. If there is a godly and God-fearing heart here, it will easily get over these troubles and think: "Behold, you have been given a wife who is troublesome to you in many respects, with whom another could not live a day in peace; but God has given you this, that you may know that God is your Creator and Father, and learn to bear His will in patience. 2c. With this gift, the little thing, 1) a sad marriage, is balanced, since this gift helps to overcome not only the troubles of marriage, but also other evil bonds.

Now the prophet begins this wedding song like this: If thou wilt that it may go well with thee, and that thou mayest be blessed, and thou hast set thy heart to enter into marriage, thou shalt know this: God will give you a wife, he will give you a house, he will give you children, and other things; but let this be your first concern, that you fear God, and in the name of the Lord begin this state. This is a useful teaching, which the Holy Spirit brings forth immediately in the beginning, that the one who is not given to abstain, begin marriage from the first commandment, and beg God for help, come before God and say: Dear Lord God, you say to me in your words that you want to be my Lord and God: now you have created me as a man, and you have also created the woman; this is your creature and work; I did not make myself this way, nor am I prepared this way by chance. Give now to your creature thy prosperity, and grant that I may be a happy husband, that I may be a happy wife 2c., that we may thus begin in the fear of God, not being sure or presumptuous, nor rushing impudently into this state like peasants and unwise people, but calling upon Him who created us for this state; then it will come to pass 'that all may go forth happily.

Now the Holy Spirit begins his wedding song in a different way than other poets. For he exhorts that we should first call upon GOD and take up a trust in his goodness in our hearts. For God will not listen unwillingly that you call Him your Creator, but will again acknowledge that you are His creature, and will not deny that He has given it to you to be a man or a woman. He has forbidden presumption, and does not want you to begin this state on your own advice, but wants your counsel to be suspicious to you, and thinks that God will not let it go out happily if you do not take it to counsel. He therefore rightly says, "Blessed is he who fears the Lord." For we have the examples daily before our eyes, that at first there is a very fierce love among the spouses, which is afterwards very easily extinguished, that they either live with each other entirely in enmity, or one leaves the other. Sometimes they are so drowned in pleasure and wealth that they live completely without any fear of God; this is a twofold greater misfortune and misery. But this happens to them rightly, for why do they not also add that they fear God?

Therefore, learn here that you live in the fear of God, who created you so that you could be a husband or a wife, and also wants to govern your marriage. If you do not want to allow him to rule, and even your wife and servants rule according to your will, without prayer to God, it will happen that you will either ruin everything, or, having become senseless through continued success, you will fall into greater misfortune. God wants to be feared and revered, that is, He wants us to confess that we cannot begin or govern anything blessedly without His help and counsel.

It is useful to have this teaching of the Ju

I want to inculcate this in them so that when they become husbands and wives, they will learn this and follow it. The reason is this: Because marriage is in the world and in the flesh, that is, in the midst of devils, the flesh soon grows weary of the woman, as a certain old man, who was a mischievous man, said to the bridegroom, who at the wedding kept looking at his bride, "Dear friend, do not look at her so often, for after a few months it will happen that you would rather sleep with your maid than with your wife. What is the cause of this? Certainly this, that marriage has to do with the flesh, which is completely corrupted by sin. The devil inflames this afterwards either by hatred from the slightest causes or by jealousy. Therefore, if you do not look to the will of God, marriage can neither last nor be long-lasting.

Therefore, the youth must be taught properly about marriage, so that if anyone takes a wife, he may live with her in God's grace and blessing, and say: Dear Lord, you have given that I should be a man; you have also given me this wife; but we are both in the world and in this exceedingly weak flesh, and in the midst of the devils, the interrupters of conjugal love: therefore give your blessing, so that even if there is any offense, your blessing and the admiration of the gifts that are in the state of marriage may overcome it. 2c. This is the reason why he begins this song with the fear of God, so that he may take away our presumption, lest we think that everything will happen in the way we have imagined in our hearts. For it will not happen that way, or if it does, it will be to the greater misfortune, namely, to the suppression of the word and knowledge of God. The middle way, however, is to fear God and trust Him, and to begin the marriage in the name of God with humble prayer, be it as it may.

Under the pope, they have profaned the marriage extraordinarily. They called it a secular state and instructed the spouses to list marital intercourse among their sins in confession. Therefore, among the school theologians a disputation on the "venial sin between spouses" and the mortal sin in carnal intercourse (copula carnali), as they called it. But these were useless and foolish disputations, in part also godless, to which Augustine seems to have given the occasion, since he says somewhere of the venial sin that it is equal to the sin of the spouses, for whom one prays: "Forgive us our debt". It is true, of course, that this intercourse of husbands and wives must be moderate in order to quench the heat of the flesh; and just as one must be moderate in food and drink, so godly husbands and wives must not indulge the flesh too much. For that lust of the flesh and the shameful lust by which the flesh burns is sinful. Therefore, as a punishment for this lust, the wormwood of very many worries and concerns is added, because of the food, because of the children, because of the administration of public affairs; likewise, arguments with the servants, with the neighbors 2c. This is added, as it were, as salt, to dampen the will of the flesh, whose weakness God wanted to counsel through marriage; he did not want to stir up the flesh's ardor. Therefore he also wanted the members to be suitable for the production of offspring, just as he created other members for other uses: for the nourishment of the child the breasts, for carrying the arms 2c.

This, then, is the first doctrine, if otherwise the marriage is to be a happy one, a sweet one, and one that pleases God, that the spouses should fear God, that is, that they should lay aside presumption in their counsel, and lie down in humble prayer, asking for a pious spouse who is chaste and obedient; likewise for success in other things; and if anything should come to pass contrary to their will, that they should bear it with equanimity, that their hopes and thoughts should be deceived.

But he does not demand this alone, which is required in the first commandment, that they render to God his service, that is, fear God and trust in his goodness, for this is the reverence we owe to God, but he adds, "Blessed is he who walks in his ways," that is, who also performs the works of the second tablet, who gives to parents and who is obedient to the authorities, who does not kill, who does not injure others, who does not defile himself with fornication and adultery, but for this reason takes a wife, so that he may live chastely and guard against such sins.

The papists have sung this psalm and still sing it today, but they do not understand it. They follow Jerome, who quite unchristianly and clumsily makes this conclusion against marriage: If married couples are blessed, then it follows that Isaac before his fortieth year, and other saints who did not have wives, did not share this blessedness. But we know that this Psalm does not speak of those who were given a special privilege (de privile-giatis), as Jeremiah had the commandment not to take a wife [Jer. 16, 2.], and John the Baptist also abstained from marriage for specific advice, as did Christ. These may go their way and keep the course given to them by God; But the others, who do not have this gift, and are without this privilege that these supreme people had, let them learn this song, that is, to become husbands and wives in the fear of God, and to walk in the ways of the Lord, and to know that in this state they can so live, that they may fear God and walk in His ways, contrary to the vain and ungodly delusion of the monks and of the whole papacy, who pretend that the married state is such a state that is contrary to religion or does not fit in well with it.

V. 2. You will feed on the work of your hands; prosper, you are well off.

This also should be taught to the spouses, that they should work, because the natural right entails that the husband should support his wife and children. For if the husband and wife know this, that they should fear GOD their Creator, who created them, and as to his creature gave the blessing to them, this must be the second thing, that they begin something of the kind, that they may not be idle, as Hesiodus also reminded: Οιχον μεν πρώ-τιστα, γυναιχά τε, βουν τ αρπηρα [firstly ver create the house, then the wife and the plowing ox. For he wills that one first choose a certain dwelling place, where one can live with wife and children, then to seek a wife, but so if you have a plowing ox, that is, if you have the host with which to feed yourself and yours. For although neither our effort nor our labor is sufficient to feed the family, yet God uses our effort and labor as a means by which He wants to bless us. Thus, leather does not provide the shoemaker with what he can live on, nor sowing with the farmer, nor preaching with the teacher, and yet by these things, or rather with these things, GOD provides sustenance. Therefore, He wants every husband to live by the sweat of his brow and to toil in labor to subdue the flesh and to kill the lusts of the flesh. For those who live in idleness do not walk in the ways of the Lord, but of the devil. For they are not and do not live in the order of God, for God has ordered work.

And here see the intention of the Holy Spirit. Work is also one of the inconveniences of married life, but how beautifully he conceals this inconvenience, since he first shows that work is God's commandment, and then promises that God wants to bless through work, however burdensome and unpleasant it may seem to be. This means to mix wormwood with sugar, as Jesus Sirach [Cap. 7, 16] also adorns work with this name, saying that God created it and that it is pleasing in the eyes of God. But this reminder is also necessary because of our corrupt nature. For it is true what the comic poet says, that all men are by nature so constituted that they have more inclination to pleasure than to work. That is why it was the custom of some immoral peoples to expose their wives and children to shame, just so that they could live in idleness.

So this wedding song reminds the bridegroom and bride at the wedding, first, that they should fear the Lord and believe Him, nor be presumptuous because of their wealth or wisdom; then, that they should know that they will have this hardship, that they will have to work, and that they will not be able to do it.

eat their bread from the work of their hands. Now the fact that pleasure is mixed into the flesh that unites the spouses is not the most important bond, as it is soon severed by other troubles. But these are the true bonds of marriage, that one may know that this work of the hands and the care for the family are also a sacrifice pleasing to God; that the woman, when she gives the child her breast, the man, when he toils his body with domestic work, so that the sweat runs from his brow, render such a service to God, which is far more glorious than all the services of the monks and than all the exercises, however arduous. For, beloved, behold what the prophet says: "Blessed art thou, thou art well."

Is not this a very great and exceedingly sweet price of labor and of the whole married state? You are a husband, he says, and you work so that you may feed yourself and your family honestly; hear what this work of yours is: it is an exceedingly holy thing in which God is pleased, and through which he will bestow his blessing upon you. This praise of work should be written on all the tools of the laborer, on the forehead and the nose that sweats from the work. For the world does not think that work is a blessing, therefore it flees and hates it. Hence come the complaints and the terrible imprecations which godless husbands and wives utter out of impatience when they are compelled to do one thing and another. But the godly, who fear the Lord, work with a cheerful and joyful heart, because they know God's command and will. Thus a godly farmer sees this verse written on his wagon and plow, the shoemaker on leather and awl, the craftsman on wood and iron: "Blessed art thou, thou hast done well." The world turns this around and says, "You are miserable, it is bad for you. For these things must always be suffered and borne; but happy are they who in idleness pass their lives, and without labor have that by which they can live, as Martial praises the goods which are not obtained by labor, but by inheritance. The devil scatters such invectives about marriage more than about the worldly authorities, for even though there

Even if there are some difficulties, ambitious people can easily eat them up (devorant), because they gain honor and dignity.

Therefore, this consolation is necessary against the world's trouble, that the spouses know that God has ordered this state in which they have to sweat and work and bear the curse of original sin, which is imposed in paradise; then, that they also know that the Holy Spirit says here that those are blessed who do their duty and work diligently. This is something so great that the godly will easily bear the discomfort of work. For what more do you want? First of all, you hear that through work God wants to give you food and other things that are necessary for the preservation of life through His blessings; then you also hear that He is pleased with your work and approves of it, and that He wants to accept it as a sacrifice and an extremely pleasant service to God, since it is not work per se, but a work of obedience or profession. The wicked do not know this, so they either indulge in idleness or are impatient with the necessity of work, because they do not see with the eyes of the Holy Spirit, but judge according to the eyes of the flesh; but these eyes see nothing but inconveniences and troubles, and rightly so. But the Spirit raises up the godly and comforts them, that God wants to bless through work (for although He gives something to the idle, He gives it to them to ruin), and that this sweat and work pleases God. This twofold advantage stands against one disadvantage, which the flesh alone sees.

But here it must be remembered that "labor" is not only called that by which the limbs are weary, but also the affliction and worry. For the prophet uses such a word, which not only means to work, that one does something with one's hand, but it also understands the troubles that we suffer under work, as such things occur very much in the household. Often, when the husband is doing his duty with great effort, the wife is peevish and begins to quarrel, the children are taken ill by sickness, and the husband is not able to do his duty.

The servants not only fail through negligence, but are also often disloyal and secretly steal money or household utensils. Even in hard times, the authorities burden them with taxes and service. We do not call these things work, but burdens, and yet the prophet includes both in the word "work," so that when we find ourselves burdened either by doing or by suffering, we may bear this with equanimity, and remember that God did not create this life for pleasure. For this is why He says to the woman [Gen. 3:16], "I will cause thee much pain when thou art with child; thou shalt bear children with pain." For even the time before birth is exceedingly full of the greatest troubles, but birth itself is very little different from death. Thus he said to the man, "Cursed be the field for thy sake; with sorrow shalt thou feed thereon all the days of thy life." Here you hear that not one day, not one year is set aside for sorrow and labor, but the whole lifetime.

Therefore, you say, because the matter is so, it is better to lead a celibate life and to fornicate. Try it, and see if you can thus wriggle out of these troubles; rather, you will get more entangled in them and be left with graver dangers. For in this way you will bring upon yourself an angry God and an evil conscience, and will condemn yourself and your life. For while you pursue the lust of the flesh and the pleasures of the flesh, you fall into bitterness of spirit; what that is, you will know in its time. For one drop of evil conscience, that I say so, consumes a whole sea of worldly joy. What will happen if you have to bear an evil conscience through your ungodly life, not just for one day, but for many years? On the other hand, where there is a happy conscience, which is sure of God's favor and blessing, there is also eternal joy, which absorbs and consumes those little drops of human inconveniences and complaints as the sun consumes the dew at noon.

Is it not shameful, then, to fear and flee those little drops and sparks of labor, seeing that God has filled them with honey?

That is, in this psalm he says to all who labor and bear the common hardships of marriage, "Blessed art thou, for thou hast it good. That is, that you are in this state, that you labor, that you are challenged in various ways, and that you accept (devoras - swallow) sometimes this, sometimes another hardship, not only pleases me, but is also useful to you, so that in this way the flesh is killed and original sin is subdued, and that you learn in marriage as in a school this most perfect worldly wisdom, that you bear God's will patiently, and have a thousand opportunities to show your patience and love, which you would not have apart from marriage in an unmarried life. Those who live in this way in marriage, even if they are completely burdened with all kinds of accidents ((calamitosissimi), are nevertheless truly blissful, and on the other hand those who do not live in this way are truly unhappy. For the labors and troubles, without which one cannot be in this life par excellence, bear them in such a way that they heap pain upon pain. That is why quarrels arise even among spouses. Hence comes the weariness of not being able to walk, talk, eat, drink together; that is quite a devilish life. Therefore, this admonition must be diligently learned and practiced, that we bear the work and all troubles with equanimity and overcome them by patience, content with this gift, that we know that God is pleased with our state and will bless us for his sake. In this way, the family can be governed with a good and cheerful conscience and overcome all troubles.

v. 3. Your wife will be like a fruitful vine around your house, your children like the olive branches around your table.

We have heard two praises of holy matrimony when the spouses fear God and walk in His ways, namely, that this life is pleasing to God and that He will bless it. Therefore, one must bear with equanimity the hardships and labors that God has placed on this state for its own sake, so that the infirmity and sickness of nature may be healed all the time, while it is healed by such hardships.

is subdued, humbled and kept in check. For the fact that the monks have pretended from their thoughts (philosophati sunt) that one must flee from work and seek rest and a solitary life, this psalm proves sufficiently that this is not pleasing to God; but that it is pleasing to Him that we are thrown into work and hardships, and think that we are set by God to endure these active and suffering labors, which then, of course, marriage brings with it, as he says: "You will feed on the work of your hands. He does not say that one should live in idleness and feed on the labor of others' hands, as the saints of the Pope do, that is, the epicureans and tender martyrs.

Furthermore, I have touched above that Jerome and after him also others dispute from this Psalm, why David praises so much the life of the blessed man, if he has a wife, since in the holy scriptures there are so many saints who have lived celibate, such as Elijah, Elisha and similar people were, although one cannot claim this of them with certainty; of Jeremiah one can. In the New Testament, however, there is a far more respectable example of almost all bishops, especially if one looks at later times, even of some married couples, as is reported of King Henry and Cunegund, who abstained from carnal intercourse (a copula carnis, as they say) and lived chastely. Then they say: Are not all these blessed, since the Holy Spirit praises here only the married couples blessed? Jerome here turns to the secret interpretation and follows his master Origen, and makes of the wife the church, as afterwards this opinion was common, since Paul says [1 Tim. 3, 2.], "There shall be a bishop of one wife's husband," that they interpreted it: that is. Of a church; likewise [v. 4.], "Who hath obedient children with all respectability," that is, respectable disciples or hearers. In this way these people answer. Now when some see how ridiculous this is, they resort to saying that the prophet spoke according to the manner of his time, where marriage was more common. But even this cannot be enough for an intelligent person.

We therefore answer thus: This psalm is only about instructing godly people about this state that God has established, but it is not about forcing or commanding everyone equally to take a wife, but that those who are free or want to be free may recognize what they have when they have wives, so that they remain free to live both without marriage and in marriage. For who would compel him to marry who has no need of marriage? Those who are such people that they can grasp this word [Matth. 19, 12] may remain celibate and boast in the Lord, just as those who are not called to the office of government remain private citizens, and those who are not called to the office of preaching remain among the listeners. Here it is quite the same. If they are not compelled by the weakness of their nature to marry, but belong to the number of those who can do without marriage, they do right to abstain from marriage and not to burden themselves with the burdens they can do without. On the other hand, those who, by a gift of God, are not so strong, but are aware of their own weakness that they cannot live chastely and outside of marriage at the same time, must value their need more highly than the inconveniences and discomforts of marriage.

Now the answer to this disputation is not difficult, if one first states that the Psalm only expresses and praises this gift, not urges and compels to marriage, so that we are not senseless, like the first swarm spirit, 1) which arose in our school. He wanted to prove from the passage in the letter to Timothy [1 Tim. 3, 2/ that no one can be a pastor if he is not also a husband; as if you wanted to say that no one can be a prince or a person in authority if he does not have a wife. This is neither the opinion of Paul nor of this psalm, in which the Holy Spirit praises marriage and teaches how those who are in it can use it properly. By the way, the same one shares

Some spirits give their gifts to some in this way and to others in another way. We are indeed in one body and are adorned by one and the same spirit, but not in the same way. Therefore, those who cannot live chastely without marriage may take a wife, and should know that they have a high and glorious gift created by God to help their weakness, as Scripture calls the woman [Gen. 2:18] a helper of the man. But those who have the gift of chastity may live without marriage, so that, although we are unequal in gifts, we may each serve God with our gifts and live without sorrow for the benefit of our neighbor.

This is therefore the correct solution: that this psalm praises this state. He therefore does not deny that those are blessed who have lived a holy and chaste life apart from marriage, but he obviously resists that marriage is censured. The eye, of course, is a more precious organ than the ear, and yet the service of the ears cannot and should not be despised. Thus it would be inconsistent for a theologian to praise his profession in such a way as to condemn the profession of lawyers. So also a jurist must not emphasize his profession in such a way that he thereby disparages medicine, or a poet in such a way that he disparages the profession of an orator; the gifts are different. Therefore, let each one praise and honor God in his gift and use it for the common good, and let others also help the community in their own way, to the best of their ability. A theologian is certainly greater than a grammarian and an astronomer, but for this reason he should not despise a grammarian and an astronomer, much less speak ill of them. They should love each other as brothers, and be a godly family of the highest house-father, and each in the way of his profession serve the Lord. This is not known to those who think that David, while praising and beatifying the married couple, is denying blessedness to others who live holy lives apart from marriage. For the Holy Spirit praises the gifts of God in a pure way, without reviling other gifts, and does not beatify the married couple in such a way that he should condemn those who do not live in marriage.

1) This is the name Luther gave to Carlstadt, who, during Luther's absence from Wittenberg, had publicly presented the doctrine mentioned by Luther here on June 20, 1521. Compare Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XX, Introduction p. 6.

But since the married state is reproached in the world in many ways and its right praise is obscured, first of all by the mind of the flesh, then also by the devil's inducements and the mockeries of the world, the Holy Spirit wants to elevate and magnify this gift, which is so despised by those who have it, but in such a way that it does not take anything away from other gifts. Let widows, let virgins remain in their state. For the Holy Spirit did not intend now to speak of widows, not of virgins, but of marriage, so that those who are in marriage may know their gift.

That Jerome now in a very clumsy way makes the objection: Abraham, Isaac and other holy patriarchs took wives at a rather advanced age, and lived in marriage for many years without children, so they were, according to this psalm, not blessed: there the conclusion is to be disputed. For Abraham, Isaac and others were blessed even before they took wives and had children, just as all who believe and are baptized, both widows and virgins, are blessed. But as for the psalm, it simply speaks and teaches about the gift, does not penetrate to the gift, but emphasizes the gift that is so defiled in the world. Therefore, it does not follow from this psalm what those who have a certain hatred for marriage try to bring out. It is true that the monks pretend that they flee marriage for the sake of it [because they love chastity, but they do it in order] 1) that they may be regarded as loving chastity; but it [their pretense] is not true. Rather, one must believe St. Paul, who says that they will reject marriage through the spirit of error, not out of love for chastity [1 Tim. 4:1, 3], especially since a law is now given by which they forbid marriage. Many things indicate that Ambrose voluntarily abstained from marriage; his example may have been followed by others for certain reasons. But Jerome speaks so vituperatively of marriage that he cannot be excused at all, as even nowadays not our papists. So also Gregory cannot be excused, who spread the law of the celibate state and annulment of marriages also in other churches. Both of them are liars when they say that they abhor marriage out of love for chastity, because they are not chaste, nor can they be, as their daily shameful deeds show, but they strive to be free and safe from those troubles, and at the same time, through beautiful appearances and hypocrisy, bring about the opinion among the great multitude that they are holy, so that they are regarded as if they were something worthy of admiration (spectacula) and angels in the world, not men, and therefore worthy of feeding on the work of other hands. This is especially our papists, monks, chasubles and nuns sacred (sacra), that is, cursed chastity.

Those who abstain from marriage in this way are in truth antichrists according to the saying of Daniel, who says that this is an outstanding characteristic of the Antichrist, that he will not respect the love of women [Dan. 11, 37]. This also explains the gloss 2) of the Antichrist, with these words: that he will pretend chastity (simulaturus sit), in order to be able to deceive the easier. But we also add the cause: so that this soft kind of people may escape the trouble, sorrow and distress that marriage brings with it; but this cause suits a godly man well if the Lord gives it to him. But those who can do without marriage without sin may enjoy its gift without reviling those who do not have it. But all others, before they should live in impurity without marriage, should rather choose conjugal chastity, which is purer and better and more pleasing to God than the chastity of all papists can be, even if they abstain entirely from intercourse with women; but how they do this is known. Therefore, if there are some who have the gift of chastity, so that without marriage they do not feel the heat of the flesh, let them remain in their gift. On the other hand, they,

2) This is the Zlossa oi-äiuar much used in the Middle Ages.

Those who are in heat should give counsel to their weakness according to the words of Paul [1 Cor. 7:9] and the ordinance of God [Gen. 2:18], who intended that the woman should be a helpmate to the man, so that even though the gifts are different, we may still remain servants of the same Lord, keeping a good conscience and giving no one trouble.

Thus marriage is a holy, praiseworthy, good and useful state, therefore it deserves to be praised, as the Psalm does here, although the flesh and the world cannot praise it because of the difficulties it has, but rather admires and praises the celibate life. But this is not following the word of God. For the flesh praises and distinguishes the gifts according to its judgment, and holds that one serves God better and purer in the celibate life than in marriage, as Jerome does in the pernicious books against Jovinianus, who, it seems, had more learning and judgment in one finger than Jerome had in his whole body. For he should not have praised virginity in such a way that he thereby reviled the married state, but rather should have said that those who find virgins should serve God in their gift, therefore marriage is not to be rejected, but to be praised as a state that God created, even at the time when nature was still unharmed and not yet corrupted by sin. But Jerome did not have so much godliness nor judgment, but broke out plainly, as the unlearned monks still tend to do: It is good for man to be thus [1 Cor. 7, 1. 8. 26.], therefore it is evil to be married. Likewise: The virgin Eustochia 1) is a precious jewel to the church. Dear, what kind of word is that? The jewel of the church is that one believes in Christ, is baptized and placed in the fellowship of Christ, but virginity is not the same.

1) In Latin: Lonuni monilo ecreiesine LustoviiM, in all editions. Here Imstoelriurn is in any case the nominative. Also in the Tischreden, Cap. 57, tz 12, Aurifaber has the form Eustochium, which is changed in the editions to Eustochiam. Compare our edition vol. XIX, 1564, note - The old translator, Stephan Agricola, has here: "Item, die Jungfrawschaft, dear Eustochium ist ein köstliche Kleinod der heiligen Christlichen kirchen." (Wittenb. Ausg. Bd. VIII, Bl. 91b.)

To be a wife or to be married, these are different gifts, which are equally pleasing to God. For what they oppose in regard to marriage: that such people will have bodily tribulation [1 Cor. 7:28.], we readily admit. But this is not the fault of marriage, but of sin, which is also the fault of those who are not married, Gen. 3:18 ff.

This is what I wanted to answer to the opinion of Jerome, who, with his Origen, fools and fabricates spiritual fathers and children by unrhymed secret interpretations. By these speeches they have given the pope the opportunity to make himself the bridegroom or husband of the church. Thus one error gives birth to another. But I would rather that this bridegroom be buried in hell hanging on a tree with Judas than that he should take his name from Christ in this way. For only one is the bridegroom and husband of the church, Christ Jesus; all other saints are friends of the bridegroom, as the Baptist calls himself [John 3:29]. The church is the bride or the wife, the children are the believers who are added daily. These also become the bride through faith, because they have a share in the goods of the bridegroom, and obtain the righteousness and the merits of Christ through faith. If the pope is good, he is in the number of these people, not the bridegroom, not the husband, but the bride who receives from the goods of the bridegroom; but if he is evil, he is the bridegroom of the devil and the friend of Judas.

So the sum of our answer is that this psalm does not force marriage, as if it were necessary for everyone to live in marriage, for it is not contrary to the words of Christ, who says, "Let him who can grasp it grasp it," but simply praises marriage against the flesh and the corrupt examples of the world, which all challenge this state for the sake of the hardships that befall the married couple. Those who have set themselves to flee from them defile themselves with fornication and adultery, and so also do harm by their example. The psalm fortifies the hearts against these viper's tongues and evil examples of the world. The world calls woman a necessary evil, and Peter calls her an evil for the sake of the world.

for the sake of certain causes, yet without dishonor, a weak instrument [1 Pet. 3:8]. But see what the Holy Spirit says here, how he adorns and praises the woman, comparing her to a fruitful vine, and the children she bears to her husband to olive branches. But say, whether there be in any scriptures such dainty and significant and lovely similes as these two are? yea, is it found in other places of the holy scriptures? For he takes the two noblest trees, the vine and the oil tree, from which two exceedingly delicious liquids are gathered, and with these he compares those things despised in the sight of the world, the woman and her fruit, the children. If you look at their nature, the woman is a weak buttock, and her sex is far below what the male sex is able to do, especially if you make the comparison in the things that are directed by men, but cannot be directed by women. But the Holy Spirit looks at the gift, and under the richness of the gift hides all that is difficult in the female sex, and showers it with the most glorious parables.

But in order to see to some extent the reasons why the Holy Spirit praises this sex so much, we must imagine that we all are not married couples, since the world abhors the married state, but celibate people; indeed, let us imagine that there is neither a man nor a woman, but a certain individual being who is sexless, so that therefore the celibate state could be thought of as all the more perfect: Dear, what would arise from such a world and the happy and pure sexless state? How long would this sex (species) last? Would not within twenty years the whole world have the appearance of a desert and a vast wasteland? What use will gold be? What use will silver be? Yes, what will be the use of the sun, the moon and everything that grows on the earth, since suddenly the human race will cease, when in this way marriage will be abolished and, if it pleases the gods, the blessed celibate state will be established? Yes, look here, where will the preaching ministry be then? What fruit will the good deed of Christ produce?

Why then do you praise the celibate life in such a way as to diminish the dignity and exceedingly great fruits of marriage? Rather, praise both according to their dignity and merit, and especially see in this passage how the Holy Spirit teaches you to regard your wife, namely, not as a weak flesh that (with permission, for I am forced to speak so because of the blasphemous despisers of God's creature) pees, sweats, and does other natural things. For why do you not do the same with the vine? Why don't you despise it because of the dung that is brought to the roots? Do you not take more care of the sap that is brought out of the vine in this way? In the case of the oil tree, no one is offended by the pungent taste of the bark and the fact that the root has to be provided with manure and fattened, as it were. For we all look primarily at the fruits. Who, therefore, should not be seriously displeased that the prudence of men is such that in other things, which are inferior, they choose the best, and either cover up or disregard the evil, because of the greater good or benefit, and yet do not do this in the case of the noblest creature of God, the woman? as if women could not also blame such detestable things (for so [foeditates] these tender people call it) in men.

With the children, we can make a distinction between the children and the dung, festering and diseases, and whatever else it may be. For who throws away a child because it is defiled with dung? Yes, who throws it away because it is either disfigured by dung, or afflicted with the plague or some other contagious disease? Is the dung not washed off? Is it not carefully cared for in sickness, that it may be preserved to us? Thus we cover the natural infirmities with the greatness of the good, which, as we think, is in the preservation of the children. Who would not laugh at him, who would not curse him, who would say that for the sake of manure or because of an illness, even the most serious one, a child must be thrown away? how these fine and tender people would not have the services in spite of themselves.

The way that husbands provide for their wives without burden when their state of health requires it. Should we not remember that she is God's creature and partaker of the benefits of Christ, and that she is given to us by God to be our helpmate?

Therefore, these are devilish words with which the wicked mock the intercourse of husbands and wives, so that they may be considered men and rightly despise these things. For if such people were worthy of becoming fathers, they would realize that it did no harm even to a father of high dignity to kiss his sick child and wait for him to fester. For if the children, either sick or polluted with dung, should be thrown away, I pray you, where would I be, where would you be? Therefore the world is exceedingly blameworthy, that even in the best things it is wont to look only at the infirmities, and not also at the good (virtues), and since it cannot do without the custom of this good, and has it daily, as it were, in its hand, yet is so blind that it cannot see the same. But this is original sin, that one is blind even with respect to the most glorious creatures, and does not understand what good there is in them, but rather stumbles at far lesser difficulties, so much so that it is necessary to teach against this blindness, and yet people hardly believe it.

Therefore, one must do here what Cicero says that he did when he had to conduct matters in court, namely, that he covered up what was bad, but where there was something good about the matter, he emphasized it, moved completely in it and, as it were, lived there. For who would want to take less care of his body for the sake of it, because he has either a swarm on his chest or some other ailment in another part of the body? Do we not for that reason wait for the body with all the greater care? Yes, you see our courtiers: if they, well fed, carry around a body full of excrement, they do not pay any attention to the disorder, but despise it, and go along in gold and silk, as if their whole body were pure balm. Thus we carefully conceal the infirmities, but what is respectable we let be seen. But why do we not do the same in the state of marriage, that we cover up and conceal the infirmities and look at the advantages and benefits? Here we all do the opposite, not because things are to blame, but because of original sin: it makes people's hearts so blind that in the best and holiest things we pick out only what we can slander. We do the same with the word of God and in all things that belong to the kingdom of God. For since God gives the sun, grain, a healthy body, healthy eyes, etc., no one pays attention to them, no one gives thanks for these gifts. But as soon as a plague breaks out, or a lack of grain, or even only a tooth hurts, then it happens that this one center or point of pain obscures or completely takes away the whole scope of God's benefits. Such is the world and our reason: it is more moved by one evil than by a thousand good things, as our papists also tend to do. From the best gifts and virtues that our churches have, they pick out only that which they can slander; they do this to such an extent that they overwhelm all the virtues of the Word with it.

But the Holy Spirit does the opposite: he covers the infirmities, and what is good in a thing he adorns with the praise it deserves. Therefore, he paints the woman in such a way that he commands her to be regarded as a vine planted and given to you by the Lord in your house, whose fruits are in truth God's plants, far more lovely to look at and better to use than the olive trees. For although some are degenerate and evil, it cannot be denied that they are God's gift; this must be acknowledged. That is to teach a married person rightly. But those who have the gift of chastity may be without this vine, and may enjoy their other tree and other fruits. But we are now about to praise this state; in it the woman is like a vine, and the children like oil trees, for so the Holy Spirit teaches us, and the thing itself testifies the same, though the holy Scriptures do not teach it. For the Gentiles also have

The German songs of our people also testify to this, in which the fidelity of the married couple is praised with the highest exaltations, because this life has nothing more lovely and more glorious than a woman who loves her husband. All men of understanding confess this with one mouth, not because of the lust of the flesh, which is greater in fornication, adultery and defilement, for there the lust is kindled, but in marriage it is extinguished, but because this is the highest lust, that the woman has a fatherly, motherly and filial love for her husband, that is, the very highest love. This is the excellent gift, and worthy of admiration and praise in women, of which those swine know nothing, who think that woman is only a sour puddle of dung for pleasure. She is a far better and more worthy instrument, which God has planted to be in your house like a fruitful vine. Therefore, men should love their wives and children more than their lives.

Therefore this glorious praise belongs against the poisonous tongues of the devil and of men, with which they attack this state, as well as against the judgment of our corrupt flesh, by which it happens that we are provoked either to weariness or to impatience, because our eyes are blind, so that they cannot measure the advantages, and only hang on the infirmities and troubles. But not even the more sensible of the heathen did this. For they saw the natural affection for the children and the mutual love and faithfulness of the spouses toward each other, and praised both with glorious testimonies. Thus, through the small number of understanding people, God also overcame the great multitude of viper's tongues against this state. But how much more does it behoove us to protect marriage, since the Holy Spirit invites us to do so with such clear and glorious parables, by which He shows that God is so pleased with married life that He not only gives His blessing to sustain life, but also "blesses the breasts and bellies," as Moses calls it [Gen. 49:25]. God would certainly not do this if He had hated the husband and wife. But to Adam he said [Gen. 1, 29]: Everything that grows out of the earth shall serve as your food. After the flood of sin he also allowed the use of pure animals, yes, to the married state he also gives everything that there is in the world of goods and treasures, and everything that has this nature at all. These are all living testimonies that God approves of this state, even if the Holy Scriptures do not show it. Finally, who does not see that even the procreation of the sex was created and ordered by God? Therefore, we should be mindful of these parables against the slanders of our own thoughts, the devil and the viper's tongues, which exalt their void nature and their exceedingly great impurity, but undeservedly reproach these highest gifts of God.

Behold, the man who fears the Lord is blessed.

Hitherto we have heard the glorious prize of the married state, which the Holy Spirit holds forth to fortify and comfort those who are placed in that state, that they may patiently suffer the troubles, trials, and afflictions of the married state, and not follow the judgment of the world, which follows the carnal sense no differently than a mule and an ass, and suffers to be hindered by those hardships, but does not recognize the good that God has given, but sometimes even curses and abhors it. Thus, you will find many who find the great number of children disagreeable, as if marriage were used only for sour pleasures, not also for the sake of the exceedingly delicious services with which we serve GOD and man when we wait for and raise the children that GOD has given. These do not realize the exceedingly lovely thing that marriage has. For what is greater than the love of children? especially since you hear here that children are the most important part of the divine blessing.

But here again faith is necessary. For the world does not consider it a blessing that it must seek nourishment through work, that it must bear the burdens of wife and children, 2c., of which there are many. All this holds the world and the

The Holy Spirit praises all that he has said so far with this very sweet name. But in order to fortify the hearts of the godly, the Holy Spirit praises all that He has said so far with this exceedingly lovely name and calls it blessings, so that He may awaken us to rightly recognize God and His gifts, so that we do not, as the world is wont to do, which always looks at the present with distaste and desires what is not there, fall into overindulgence in the midst of God's gifts. Therefore, we must pay careful attention to this emphatic expression (emphasis) that he calls this life, which is miserable and full of misfortune according to reason, a blessed one, since he says: "Behold, so the man is blessed," as if he wanted to say: "What more do you want? This, that you have a wife, that you have children, that you nourish yourself with the work of your hands, this is truly God's blessing. Therefore, not only should you not be offended by it, but you should also thank God for His blessings.

But how few are there who believe this? And even if some believe, they are often distracted from this faith by their weakness, and forget the blessing as if they were under a curse, and become impatient. Therefore, it would be desirable for the godly to have this word of the Holy Spirit as an exceedingly great comfort always before their eyes and ears. For how can a more certain reason be given for proving that the life of the spouses is pleasing to God than that their whole life should be a blessing? It is true that they are often challenged with sins of impatience, for the sake of the sins of the servants and the children, and also with hatred against the neighbors, but what is the matter with that? In this weakness, everything cannot be so pure and perfect that one would not often have to experience faults or shortcomings in the house or outside the house. But these sins of impatience are erased by the daily prayer of the godly, and godly spouses must always hold on to this consolation that they firmly believe that they are sitting in the blessing and have a life blessed by God. The firmer and richer this faith is, the more joy there is. For even though there are many hardships, even though sins sometimes overtake us

Even though the word of the Almighty God is not in dispute, the word of the Almighty God is there, and therefore those who faithfully keep it are victorious in all disputes.

Therefore, one must take hold of these words as if God Himself were speaking them down from heaven, and one must become accustomed to holding this state in due honor, since God Himself has poured out His blessings so abundantly upon it. This must not only be understood in such a way that we praise it with words and recommend it to other people, but we, who are in marriage, should, each for himself, praise it to ourselves, so that we, may poverty, or sickness, or accidents in the household, or other hardships befall us, bear it with equanimity, satisfied with the exceedingly rich comfort that the Holy Spirit calls it a blessed life. And this is experienced, known, and done by those who fear the Lord and serve Him in truth, as it is said, "Thus is the man blessed who fears the Lord." For the true service of God is to fear God, to trust in God, and to put all hope in God. These movements of the heart are followed by obedience in our profession and in other things that are commanded to us by God, for all this comprehends the fear of God in itself. Those who do not fear the Lord do not understand this; neither does the Holy Spirit sing about them here.

V. 5 The Lord will bless you from Zion, that you may see the happiness of Jerusalem all your life long.

After this excellent praise of marriage, the Holy Spirit adds a very glorious prayer, in which he asks that God bless this blessed state even more, and also for the sake of such spouses make the worldly regime a peaceful one and give happiness to it. Furthermore, all such prayers also contain the promise that it will happen as we ask. For it is not necessary to think that the Holy Spirit either prays or prescribes to pray such things that are not approved by God and that he does not want to hear. But that he expressly adds: "The Lord from Zion", he does this because at that time the service in Zion was was. Therefore, those who wanted to pray did not only look with their hearts to this place, as we have shown above several times, but they also turned their faces there [Dan. 6, 10.], because God had promised that He would dwell there and accept the prayers and sacrifices [Ps. 132, 14. 2 Chron. 6, 6. 7, 14P Hence come these expressions: "praying before the LORD" [Ps. 5, 3.], "offering before the LORD" [2 Chron. 7, 4. 1 Kings 8, 62.], "appearing before the LORD" [Ex. 23, 15.], that is, in the tabernacle where the Ark of the Covenant and the mercy seat were, to which God had committed Himself that He would be found there. Therefore they called this place strength, kingdom, glory, honor, beauty or adornment, likewise the rest of the Lord, as can be seen in the Psalms and the other prophets.

After Christ appeared and the gospel was preached in all the world, this place ceased. Therefore we do not sing now: "The Lord will bless you out of Zion" or his holy temple, but: through Christ our Lord. For he is our true mercy seat, of whom he was the shadow or model in the Old Testament. For in Christ the Godhead dwells bodily [Col. 2:9]. Therefore, when we pray to God, we ask that we may be heard in the name of Christ, just as, according to the example of the ancient Church, all public prayers were concluded with these words: Through Christ our Lord. But we have said this several times above, although it cannot be emphasized enough. For this is the Christian knowledge and wisdom, that we have not (that I say so) flying and scattered thoughts, but that they are gathered together upon one object, that is, from Christ. For as in the Old Testament the people were gathered to the Ark of the Covenant or the Tabernacle, and were not permitted to sacrifice in Dan, Bethel, Gilgal and other places (which the godless idolaters chose against the Word), so today one must not seek a way to God through the invocation of the saints or any other worship and works, but only through Christ and in Christ, according to the saying [John 16:23]: "If you ask the Father anything in my name, I will give you all the things you need.

he will give it to you." For the hearts must hold on to the fact that God is not in the monasteries, not in the places of pilgrimage, not here, not there, not even in heaven, but is found and worshipped only in this one person, who was born of Mary, that is, in Christ Jesus. This is the right seat of grace and the certain throne of the Godhead, where the Godhead dwells bodily and is found, as the sayings of the Gospel teach [John 14:6]: "No one comes to the Father except through me." "I am the life, the truth and the way."

Those who do not have this object, their hearts wander and wander about in innumerable opinions, as is evident from the example of the monks: some have chosen Franciscus, others Dominic, others Benedictus, others still others protectors, by whose rule they would like to come to life as in a certain way. What have all these done? Search their hearts, and they will tell you as if from one mouth that they wanted to seek God; but they thought that God in heaven was such that He would hear them and be gracious to them if they were dressed in a robe, if they abstained from eating meat, if they lived without marriage, if they did not touch money 2c. Thus they have forsaken the right and one way, which is Christ, and have gone astray, each in his own way, according to the same manner as the Jews. Although the one way was presented to them how they should find God, namely when they went to the tabernacle, worshipped and sacrificed there, they left this one and right way and ran here and there, to groves, valleys, rivers 2c. There they suffered twofold harm. For since they thought they would find God, they were mistaken, and since they thought they would reconcile God, they offended Him even more, as the revealed sayings in the prophets state, in which God says that He rejects the ways they choose for themselves and that He will not let them find Him. For why do they not remain on the right and infallible path shown by God's Word?

This is what I am saying so that we can get that, that he is saying:

"The Lord from Zion" without taking offense at it. For he mentions this place with necessity to prevent idolatry. For God had revealed that he wanted to be worshipped in this one place. Therefore, under the cover of the promise, they also worshipped Christ there, whom the promise included. But now that Zion is buried and destroyed, the treasure is opened, namely Christ, who was then hidden in the promise as in a cover. Therefore you should be aware that such passages must all be drawn to Christ, as experience also teaches us that in temptations there is no consolation by which hearts can be lifted up, not even in God, except the One Consolation in Christ. For it is not only dangerous but also frightening to think of God apart from Christ. For besides the fact that the devil can then very easily overpower us through the splendor of God's glory, there is also danger for this reason, because God does not want to be taken in these ways. Therefore, we must cling to that one object in which God shows Himself and His mind to us, in Christ. But those who seek something else besides Christ will learn in their temptation, at their peril, how little that is certain.

But, do you say, how will the LORD from Zion continue to bless? 1) Namely, "that you may see the happiness of Jerusalem," that is, the Lord will give worldly peace for the sake of good husbands and wives who fear God, which is useful not only to make it easier to obtain food, but even more to raise children properly. And this was the reason in the beginning that cities were built in order to ward off the violence of men and wild animals with united forces, and so that they could nourish themselves and their own in peace. After that, since there was not enough protection in one city, several joined together. Thus principalities and kingdoms came into being, only for the sake of peace, which is necessary for the spouses, and reason imagines that nature has arranged and taught it this way, but the Holy Spirit shows here the right cause, i.e., that the people of the kingdoms and of the kingdoms are not the same.

The first blessing is that of fearing the Lord, the second that of having a wife and children, and the third that of enjoying worldly peace. They must acknowledge that the first blessing is to fear the Lord, the second to have a wife and children, and the third to enjoy worldly peace. What do you want more than that? Thou shalt therefore think that for thy vine and for thy olive branches, which thou hast in thine house, the Lord will give kings, princes, judgments, laws, and all things necessary for the preservation of the commonwealth and of peace.

Therefore, we are rightly reminded that it is certain that the princes and authorities serve the fathers of the house, but that they are entitled to the good for this service, that they are given womb and customs and the like, which the authorities need, since they watch over the preservation of peace. For they are "servants of God," as Paul also calls them [Rom. 13:4], who are given by God so that you may enjoy peace. How great a blessing peace is, however, is testified to by a common saying of the Germans, in which they say that a householder who has two cows should give one so that he can enjoy the other in peace and keep it. For what good is it if you have a house full of goods and cannot protect it against robbers or thieves? Now, since this is done by the authorities, indeed, since courts and laws restore to the rightful lord that which has been unlawfully snatched away, honor is rightly due to it, and it is rightly paid womb as the steward of the blessings of God which He has given to husbands and wives. For this is enumerated here by David as the third blessing of the married state, that through marriage they shall see the happiness of Jerusalem, that is, that they shall see Jerusalem flourish, first, through right worship and pure doctrine, second, through good government. For these are the goods not of one house only, but of all Jerusalem. Thus the Holy Spirit praises the gifts of God to us in the most beautiful order. The first is the fear of God; this comprehends in itself what belongs to the first table. Then, for the sake of the fear of God, God gives and sustains the house and the household. Finally, for the sake of the well-ordered and in the fear of God

1) Erlanger: UensäieU instead of: dLueäioet,.

For the sake of God's guided stewardship, the third blessing also follows, namely, a blissful world regiment.

Furthermore, the flesh judges these blessings in the world regime in quite the same way as it judges housekeeping. For it does not want to suffer any laws. Therefore, from the ropes of the great crowd come hatred, imprecations, and vituperations against the authorities, even if they perform their duties with the utmost care. For when is the great multitude not exceedingly impatient when taxes are imposed on them even for the most just reasons? as if, in fact, that were the only thing with which the authorities have to deal, that they collect money and use it for their own pleasure without any difficulty or burden. Dear, who is there who serves for free without pay? What ingratitude is this, then, that one does not want to give to the authorities, who serve the community with the greatest danger and in an extremely arduous condition, what their work deserves! Or do you think that this service should be rendered to you in vain, that you should dwell in this or another city, enjoying peace, jurisdiction and the church, without any cost? The godly truly do not demand this, but recognize that the authorities are instituted by God for the sake of peace, therefore they are willing to pay them honor, lap and duty, as angels of peace who guard us and watch over us.

Therefore, the Scripture reminds us of a more serious duty and imposes it on us, namely, that we should also pray for the authorities. Those who do not do this, and even bear the public burdens unwillingly, deserve to have tyrants instead of good princes, who force them to bear even heavier burdens, and impose extraordinary burdens, since they either take the ordinary ones upon themselves with impatience or pay them unfaithfully. These are just punishments for disobedient citizens and for the great multitude who, in danger, take refuge in the authorities alone, and against them, as it were, spew forth what hurts their souls and is annoying to them. The authorities have to leave their own business in the queue and

The most important thing is to listen to the complaints of each individual and to seek redress for them, and it is then that the greatest concern arises when public complaints have to be resolved. Are not therefore those worthy of tyrants, and of such lords as are wasteful and negligent, who will not give thanks to a godly and careful authority? For the tyrants afterwards bring it about that such people learn what a good authority is, so that they punish themselves that they have sinned by disobedience, that they have sinned by paying the ordinary taxes unfaithfully, by blaming the authorities 2c. If God does not punish this in this way by tyrants, He does it by rebellion and war, so that these sows do not go unpunished for not having been obedient and not having honored the authorities. For as the sows are only bent on satisfying their greed, so the peasants think that they are only born to enjoy peace, to gather goods and to satisfy their avarice; but that they should give away something of the goods they have gathered for the common good, they do this either unwillingly or unfaithfully.

Therefore, we should be accustomed to learn to recognize and be grateful for these benefits that come to us through the authorities, so that we do not, like the rabble, resent the burdens that we should gladly take upon ourselves for the sake of the commonwealth; then, that we learn that this benefit of a good authority is bestowed upon us for the sake of godly husbands and wives, after which the wicked also enjoy it, like swine their food, without thanksgiving. For just as the destruction of Sodom was postponed for the sake of Lot, so the Lord often blesses a whole community for the sake of a godly house or two, and the Lord gives happiness to a whole empire for the sake of a godly ruler or two.

V. 6. and see your children's children. Peace upon Israel.

The gift of children is given to many in the world, but many do not receive it. Therefore, we have rightly said above that it is a price, not a promise, that each individual receives.

but the whole estate. Thus it happens to some that they see their children's children or grandchildren, some have a barren marriage, as the Lord distributes this to everyone for his own good; and yet one must wish this for godly married couples, and it usually happens to them. And it is worth admiring, especially in the case of old people, the special love they have for their grandchildren. For they love them more dearly than their own children. Since the psalm is concerned with glorifying the married state and wishing the spouses all the best, it adds this as the highest delight, that they should keep their offspring even in the distant future, so that it does not omit anything of what is given by God to the spouses, even if not to all, but to most of them. Although we have said above that such prayers also include promises, it is known how it is with the bodily promises, namely that the Lord gives them in such a way as is useful to each individual. Therefore, we will draw this promise, which is included in this wish, to the whole estate, not to individual husbands and wives, that godly and God-fearing husbands and wives will have a great posterity, and that the blessing will flow over to the whole nation for their sake, as he adds: "Peace upon Israel," that is, all salvation will come to Israel for your sake.

Thus this psalm praises us the marriage state against the blasphemies of the flesh, which only judges according to its feelings. As it is annoyed by the difficulties and burdens of marriage, so it is also annoyed by the world order, where one must obey the laws, pay taxes and take other burdens upon oneself. For it would like to live in such a way that it could enjoy everything that is very good in the marriage state and in the world regime completely and without all troubles.

As we see that people of pleasure (delicatos) enter into marriage for the sake of it, because they, not knowing life, think that there is only love and pleasure in it. In the same way, people can be found whom dignity and the pursuit of honor make so nonsensical that they seek or enter into it only out of ambition for offices of authority. But since afterwards in marriage innumerable hardships have to be borne, and in the magisterial office envy, hatred, curses and insults, they cry out that they have been deceived in their hopes. This is how it must necessarily come about, because they regard as nothing that which is noblest and best in both states, namely, the blessing of the Lord. Therefore, one must look at the blessing and have the will of the Lord and His word before one's eyes, and because everything else is full of dangers, tribulations and plagues, one must rest on the will of God. It is the same in the Church. Dear, is not everything full of the most oppressive troubles with such a large number of godless and worldly-minded (profanorum) people? But all this is easily borne and overcome by looking to the will of God.

In the state of marriage, we should also consider first the word of God, secondly the gift that the Lord gives when He gives a wife and children, and thirdly the blessing of the world's government and peace; for these gifts, which we recognize, we should also give thanks afterwards. Thus it will happen that God will be provoked to continue to give His blessings; but where this does not happen, God will thereby be challenged to take from us again also the gifts that we have. In this way, great empires, cities and communities could flourish longer, but because they do not give thanks to God and despise His word, they perish because of their ingratitude. We should therefore learn to be thankful, and the blessing of the Lord will be abundantly upon us. Amen.

The hundred and twenty-ninth Psalm.

They often pushed me.

This psalm has two parts. In the first, he gives thanks for the constant defense and salvation of God's people; in the second, he prays against the adversaries, and in praying, he prophesies at the same time. Both serve to instruct us and to exhort us to patience, which is not only necessary in one age or at one time, but, as the whole history of the church shows, must be present at all times and in the whole of life. Furthermore, we understand here the twofold church, that of the Gentiles and the Jews, together, as Paul also connects them in general with each other, since he says (Rom. 1, 16.): "The Jews first of all and also the Greeks." For as for the church of the Jews or the Jewish people, it is known from the histories that they were situated in the midst of their enemies, like a beautiful rose among thorns. From the south they were beset by the Ishmaelites, the Arabs and other savage nations; from the west by the Egyptians, the Moors, the Troglodytes 2c.; from the north by the Philistines, the Assyrians 2c. Thus, after the fall of the synagogue, the church is surrounded on all sides by enemies, and Christ reigns, as the Psalm says [Ps. 110, 2.], in the midst of his enemies. So it is true on both sides that they were often harassed. But God also shows here the miracle that He has always delivered those who have been so oppressed. Thus the kingdom of Israel, I say, has been quite a miraculous kingdom; when the Lord wanted to chastise it, he gave victory to the Philistines, Edomites, Moabites, Assyrians, Babylonians. Again, when it seemed that the Jews were totally oppressed, they were free victors over their enemies. Thus this kingdom remained against the will of its neighbors and even of Satan, as can be seen beautifully in the books of Kings and Chronicles. But because both of the tribulations and of the salvations there are threats and promises.

it was a great consolation for this people that they knew, even though they had to suffer tribulations and were disturbed, that this was not simply according to the will of the enemies or with their power, much less because of the justice and merit of the enemies, but simply according to the will of God, who punished the sins of His people in such a way, even threatened and foretold this through the prophets, that He would punish the disobedient. This comfort is not small, that you may say in adversity: This is God's rod, which so punishes my sin; it is not the wrath or the merit of my adversaries.

Now we must also apply this to ourselves, so that when we succumb, we do not succumb through the power of death, sin, hell, or any creature, but according to the will of God, our Creator, who gives us over in tribulation and punishes our sins and ingratitude, but in such a way that he leaves us the paternal promise that he will not abandon us. But such a picture of the whole kingdom of Christ is shown to us in the Revelation of John. For how many things does he speak of the evil angels, of beasts and similar things that are destructive to the church, which would rage against the church and the kingdom of Christ, since the Lord allows such things? But it always happens that the misfortune is followed by consolation, and the church, no matter how much it may be afflicted and oppressed, nevertheless remains and finally triumphs.

And truly, this Psalm is especially appropriate to our time, when the Church is most severely afflicted and, as it were, destroyed by both the Turks and the Popes, so that, if one considers the matter carefully, the situation of the Jews in Babylon seems to have been better than that of the Church under the Antichrist. The proper use of the sacraments had been abolished, the benefits of Christ had been obscured, the faith itself had been completely eradicated.

Right worship, right good works were not shown or practiced; in short, everything that belonged to right religion was either destroyed or obscured. As therefore the Jews in Babylon were deprived of the sight and custom of the temple, the sacrifices, the ceremonies, and the whole world regime, so the church under the Antichrist had not the right preaching ministry, no worship, not her own kingdom, but was forced to keep the papist customs, which are quite Babylonian and pagan. Thus, on both sides was the same wrath and almost the same punishments.

It is therefore necessary to hold on to this consolation that, as the Psalm says, we may be challenged, cast down and trampled underfoot, but we will not be defeated. For the church will remain invincible, even though its victory is hidden under incredible weakness. For so it was under the pope: on all chairs, in all churches, nothing else resounded but the godless and blasphemous doctrine of the popes and the dreams of the monks. This was indeed what the 74th Psalm, v. 9, complains about: "We do not see our signs," and yet even then the Lord had his church, albeit very thinly sown and disfigured in many ways. Before the godless empire of the popes began, how great was the multitude of heretics! The church was also severely attacked by them, just as the neighboring pagans attacked the Jews while they were still in their country. But as that attack was followed by imprisonment, so the kingdom of the popes was in truth the imprisonment that followed the attack of the heretics, and into which all the evil that had ever existed in the church flowed together as into a dung pit. Now, by God's grace, this captivity is beginning to turn around, and the temple of the Lord and His worship are being restored.

Now, in my opinion, the Psalm speaks in general terms of all such dangers to the church that have been at all times, that the kingdom of the Jews, while it was still under good kings, was contested daily and yet not conquered, that it was subsequently completely devastated by the Assyrians and Babylonians, and that the people were led away, yet not completely abandoned. For the Jews have been delivered from captivity and have obtained in their land the promise that was made to them by Christ. Thus, this psalm sings first of all about the church of the Jews, then it also understands as a prophecy how the church will fare and the condition of the church of the Gentiles, that God will preserve it against all heretics, against all the rages of the world, against the kingdom of the popes or the Antichrist, finally also in individual life (privately) against the temptations of all sins. In this way, this psalm is to be extended to the church of all times and all accidents, and all dangers on the part of the world, the flesh, sin, the law, death, yes, even the gates of hell. For the world attacks it with violence and wisdom, the devil with despair and doubt, the heretics with error in faith, and the conscience with sins. In all these dangers we say [1 Cor. 10:13]: Praise be to God, the Lord, "who does not let us be tempted beyond our ability. We must be tempted, but at the same time as we are tempted we are saved, except that God gives us the strength to endure temptation until the time of salvation. David praises this blessing and shows us how his people fared, so that we may learn this comfort: just as the Lord preserved that people, so it will happen that we will also be preserved. For we have the same God, the same Spirit, the same Word, the same promises, in short, we have everything in the same way. Therefore, we can say and sing with David:

V. 1. 2. They have often pressed me from my youth, so say Israel, they have often pressed me from my youth, but they have not overpowered me.

He does not name a specific enemy, so that he understands all and every one. But the fact that he says: "From my youth on" also understands the whole time from the beginning of their church, a primitiva ecclesia, as we call it, that is, from Moses on, when Israel first began to be God's people. For although we always praise the earlier, as the Church is rightly praised in its beginning, it is obvious that God is not concerned with this sub-

I do not care about the difference, who gave the people of Israel splendid prophets even in the last times: before the captivity Isaiah, who is probably the most distinguished among them, after the captivity Haggai, Zechariah and others. In the middle time between Moses and these were the excellent prophets Elijah, Elisha 2c. Thus we see that although the church in its beginning was exceedingly pure from heretics and ungodly opinions, nevertheless also at the end some glorious prophets and men arose, and since the root of Jesse seemed to be already withered, nevertheless Hannah, Simeon, Zacharias and Elizabeth 1) arose. For God sustains His Church, however much it is attacked and afflicted, according to His promise; we only need to open our eyes and see where this comes from.

But we must not look at what the world admires, we must look at the church that is oppressed, afflicted, overwhelmed with misfortune. For this is her adornment and actual title, that she is weak, besieged, and surrounded with all the assaults and rages of the devil, the world, the flesh, sin, death 2c. Whoever will not look at this, but flee, will never find the church. For this is not its appearance, which is given to it by the painters, who paint it either as a dainty virgin or as a well-fortified and adorned city. This painting is true, but not according to the eyes of the flesh. Spiritual eyes see this beautiful figure and exceeding daintiness, because Christ is her bridegroom, and has given her birth through the Holy Spirit, and has adorned her with His blood, merits, and righteousness. Of these things the flesh cannot see or judge, because it sees something quite different, namely how she is subjected to the bitterest hatred, envy, the greatest tortures and chastisements. Therefore, if someone wants to paint her as he sees her, he will paint an unformed and poor maiden sitting in an uncertain forest, in the midst of hungry lions, bears, wolves, pigs, yes, poisonous snakes, likewise, in the midst of raging men, which sword,

1) In the Wittenberg and in the Jmaer, "Maria" is added. The old translator added "and others".

The church, as a lonely virgin, flees from the old serpent or the dragon, who pursues her and her child. This is why these words, which David uses here, "My enemies often press me. Therefore, these words that David uses here are also true: "My enemies have often urged me, they have often urged me."

This affliction, however, has the appearance of being an overcoming, if one follows the flesh, as if the enemies of the church were victorious and retained the upper hand after the church had been defeated and oppressed, as each one of us experiences in his own battles, which we, each for himself, endure in our hearts, when the devil frightens the consciences and puts them to shame. Here such great trepidation is aroused that no one can judge otherwise than that the victory is on the side of the devil, who overwhelms us with thoughts of sadness, with blasphemies, with troubles, and thus takes away all the comfort that Christ's merit and the Word offer us. According to this view, one rightly reads [with the Vulgate], "They have often overcome me" (expugnaverunt). For it seems to be not simply an affliction (oppugnatio), but an overcoming (expugnatio). As we, each one for himself, experience both of these, so also the whole body of the church confesses to all lines that it was surrounded and oppressed by the armies of all nations and by preparation from all plagues or temptations from youth on, that is, from the time when they, saved from Egypt, began to be separated from the rest of the nations and to be God's people.

But here the church straightens up, since it has often experienced the same thing, that God has proven His power in these adversities, and both the sin and the punishments were averted in such a way that the church remained, and the attacks of the enemies were in vain. Therefore, the prophet repeats the danger, and then exhorts with words that come from an exceedingly great joy.

2) Instead of utriHus in the editions Wohl *utra*us should be read.

That all the individual members of this body may praise the good deed of God and say: "They have not been able to overcome me. This comfort must be held fast, not only for the Church, but also by each one of us in our dangers, against the great expectations which our adversaries boast and cherish. Heretics and mobs boast that they will prevail; the pope, basing himself on his and the princes' authority, cries out: We will be victorious; the devil also accedes to these, mixing the quarrels in such a way that their victory does not seem doubtful. This not only worries each individual in particular, but also fills the whole body with grief and pain, as we experienced at the recent Diet of Augsburg, where it seemed as if the adversaries were suppressing us. But did we not also experience this word, which is exceedingly full of comfort: "They have not succeeded"? This consolation must be held fast even when we are killed, as the examples of the church in its beginning testify. For by the blood of the blessed the church is, as it were, moistened, so that a more abundant seed of Christians may sprout.

As this is rightly applied to the persecution by the sword, so it must also be applied to the attack of the heretics and the mobs. For it is peculiar to these that they boast of victory and sing songs of victory before they have achieved victory. But where are they now who first stirred up trouble for us because of baptism and the Lord's Supper? We must therefore do this: Let the adversaries boast in whatever way they wish, but let us do only this, that we keep the word pure, and do everything we can to spread Christ's kingdom and the word. Then, when afflictions and struggles follow (as they surely will), let us sing with David, "They have not been able." For even if they kill us, neither the heretics, nor the pope, nor the Turk, nor even the devil himself, will destroy the Word; nor will they prevail against us if we remain pure in the word. This must be admitted to the devil, that he is greater in strength and afflicts us in many ways, for the afflictions of the righteous are many; but nevertheless the Lord delivers them from them all [Job 5:19]. Why? Because it is the word of God that they follow and teach, and the cause of God that they defend. Therefore, even though the pope does many things and tries to stir up the whole world against us, even though the false brethren who do not walk in the pure doctrine do not cease, even though the devil himself does not cease to move the gates of hell, we will still sing with David to the end: "They have not succeeded," only for the sake of the word.

V. 3. The plowmen have plowed on my back, and drawn their furrows long.

See, how unequal things are, which he connects and almost says the opposite. He wonderfully comforted that the enemies would not be able to do anything against the church, that it would be insurmountable in truth, and here he complains that plowing is done on the back of the church, and such furrows are drawn that they seem to be continued into infinity. Now this is the trouble that torments the godly exceedingly severely, that God lets the devil and the world rage so long that he gives happiness to their advice, that he gives success to the wicked even when they would have thoroughly deserved to be plagued with punishments and all misfortunes. On the other hand, the more the godly pray, the more persistently they hope, the less the outcome corresponds to their hope and their counsels: every day they are more and more afflicted, and less and less hope remains for them. The similitude that they are compared to a land that is constantly plowed, and on which very long furrows are drawn, is therefore quite fitting, as if there were no God [who would approach to see] either their misfortune, or the godlessness and unjust cruelty of the enemies of the Word. He thus indicates that a perpetual patience is needed, which must be constantly present, not for one day, not for one year, but for one year.

The word of God is the foundation for the whole of life, so that those who have the word must establish this in themselves, that they do not want to leave it, even if they have to bear and suffer it for a thousand years. In our time we have seen how many have fallen away, because the fruit of the word has been hindered by persecution, which, like the sun, dries up the seed on the rocks; indeed, even those who have stood firm for a while often fall.

Therefore, it must be learned that the patience of Christians, as described in this verse, is one that is ready to offer its back to the plowmen, and to suffer not for a day or two, but throughout life. For he compares the tribulations to a ceaseless (prolixae) plowing on the backs of the godly, as Christ expresses the same when he says [Matt. 10:22.], "He that endureth to the end shall be saved." For it is not enough to begin, for the patience circumscribed by certain limits may also be found among the heathen, but the patience of Christians is an eternal (aeterna) one, that is, such that it seems to be infinite, since its end does not appear, just as there is no end of divine consolation, so that in this way what seems to be most opposed to each other is united, that is, the longing of the furrows on the backs of the godly, and the victory of the godly, who sing of those who lead the plow: "They have not succeeded."

This longing of the furrows also includes this annoyance, which no carnal wisdom can overcome, namely, that the wicked are long in happiness and seem to get a reward, as it were, for their persecution and hatred of the Christians. For if GOD tolerated their tyranny for a day or two and punished them immediately according to merit, we would all say that GOD looks upon His own and is angry with the ungodly. Now, however, when godlessness is happy and unpunished for many years, what Diogenes said about Harpalus happens, that they seemed to bear living witness to the fact that there are no gods. Thus the godly are also challenged by this delay.

that they sometimes fall so low that 1) they think that God is not looking at them. Therefore, we must get used to the fact that even though the furrows are felt, we do not get angry because of it, but when one challenge is over, we prepare ourselves for another one, since our backs must be ready to endure the furrows.

This is the first part of the psalm, in which he confesses the divine miracles and the power of God, by which he sustains his own, not only against the world, but also against sin, death and the devil, and gives thanks that he gives victory to the conquered, but brings down the victors. He commands us to expect this outcome and exhorts us to patience. Now he goes to prayer, and not only prays, but also promises that the enemies of the church, even though they persistently continue to do harm. They will do so without blessing, even to such an extent that they will never be able to get up again, as experience shows. For, dear one, tell me, what kingdom from the beginning of the world has remained unharmed? The place on earth is still there, but the kingdoms, as he says in the fable, are gone (ο^εται). On the other hand, the raging has not been so great, the power of the kingdoms of the world has not been so great, that they could have suppressed the church; for this still continues and will continue until the fall of the world, as follows:

V. 4. The LORD, who is righteous, has cut off the ropes of the wicked.

This contains the prayer in such a form that the saints cannot have anything more excellent or better in danger. For here we learn that it is stronger than all armor and than all walls. Therefore see first why he calls the Lord "just," and you will see that he does it for this reason, because, if you look at the matter itself and the divine government as it is according to the flesh, God seems to be quite unjust, since he graces the tyranny of the wicked with goods, power, dignities, 2c. but heaps honor and applause on the heretics among the populace. Since reason sees this they do not judge otherwise than that if there is a God, he is unjust. For reason concludes, first of all, that if there is a God, he can resist the wicked and destroy them. For to be God is to be omnipotent. Now this is also true: If there is a God, he must know what is happening in the world. For it cannot be found in God that he does not know something or that he is foolish. But what follows from this other than this, if God knows that these things happen in an unseemly way, and he can prevent it, that he must certainly also want it. Otherwise, if we assume that he does not want it, since he knows and is able to do it, it would follow that he is not good but evil, not just but unjust.

1) Erlanger: st statt: M.

Now summarize this. If God has power, wisdom and goodness, if he can help, knows how to help and wants to help, why does it happen in this way in the world that the godless even receive a reward for their godlessness, power, goods and dignities? on the other hand, the godly are plagued in many ways by the godless because of their godliness? Thus these things, as we said above about Diogenes, are, as it were, a living testimony against God. This proof reason of Epicurus and similar people is completely irrefutable. Therefore, blind reason, entangled as it were in these conclusions (nexibus), inclines to the opinion that either there are no gods, or they do not care about human affairs, as Vellejus disputes with Cicero according to Epicurus' opinion. This, which is in itself exceedingly difficult even among sensible people, Satan sharpens still further. For since we must ascribe omnipotence to God, also wisdom and goodness, the devil concludes against us from the principles we have conceded, and precisely what we must ascribe to God, he as it were snatches out of our hands again, so that we, defeated by the government of present things, that either there is no God, or that he is weak and impotent, as Aristotle almost falls into this opinion, that although he does not call God foolish, he nevertheless holds that he knows nothing of all things, that he understands and sees nothing of our affairs, has nothing in mind but himself, and delights only in thoughts about himself. Although this does not mean to ascribe foolishness to him, it is certainly to take away his knowledge and to represent him in such a way that he knows nothing about human affairs. But what is such a God for us, or what is he good for?

Against this annoyance, the Holy Spirit reminds us that he is "righteous", one who does not like unrighteousness and ungodliness. Therefore, although he allows the ungodly to flourish for some time, he finally cuts off their ropes, that is, he brings their power to ruin with themselves; but the godly he delivers and snatches out according to the saying [Ps. 5:5.], "Thou art not a God to whom ungodly beings please." Therefore, we should learn to answer this reason of proof with this commonly known saying, which is used by musicians: In the end you see which is the right key (in fine videtur cuius toni). For a Christian must not judge according to what he feels in the present, but according to what the Word promises about the future, namely, that the wicked, having plowed much and plagued the good in many ways, will finally perish because God is just; therefore, His justice will not suffer the righteous to be oppressed to the end.

V. 5. Oh that they should be ashamed, and that all who love Zion should return.

I said that it was a prayer, but you know that in every prayer there is a promise. This promise is also indicated in the previous verse by the word "righteous" with special emphasis, so that we do not grumble or blaspheme God, as if He had forgotten us and did not take care of us. Furthermore, that he says here: "Oh, that they should be put to shame and return" is a kind of explanation of what he said above, that it will happen that their ropes will be cut off, that is, that their kingdoms, power, goods, laws, yes, also their whole worldly rule (corpus politicum) will be taken away, as it happened to Babylon, Nineveh, Jerusalem, Athens, Corinth, Thebes, Rome, in short, to all kingdoms.

and regiments that did not submit to the gospel. Because they stiffened their necks and opposed Christ the King, as if they wanted to suppress him by their power, they perished. In this way we too must pray and expect a certain revenge on those who today oppose the gospel, so that finally the pope, the bishops and their whole sect (factio) will be put to shame, with all the kings and princes who presume to promote and defend their ungodliness. But the gospel, or the word of the Lord, shall remain forever, with all that is instituted by the word, namely, baptism, Holy Communion in both forms (integra), absolution, and the like. For the name of Christ shall not be suppressed, but, being called upon by the faithful, shall be present, and shall cut off the cords of this wicked and that wicked 2c.

In this way the Holy Spirit comforts us in many ways and instructs us. For after we have learned that the devil is such a spirit that does not cease to challenge us, but, since he is unable to do so by the greatness and quantity of the plagues, at least seeks to overcome us by perseverance and the length of time, he wants us to take comfort in the fact that, although it lasts a long time, it will not last forever. For since both the long duration and the end are foretold, it is easier for those who know this to endure it. It also belongs to this that he expressly adds who are those who are wished ill, namely those who are grudging to Zion. This must not be taken as if he curses such people out of human selfishness, as people are wont to wish evil on those who do not want to approve and love what they love and approve of, but David indicates that this hatred with which they hate Zion is a hatred against God. For that the devil hates the church, he does not only for the sake of men, but much more out of hatred against God, whom the church praises. Furthermore, Zion was the place of God. Therefore, as God had chosen this place to love him, so the devil had chosen the same place to hate him, that I may say, and to hate him.

enemies. In this way not only the devil hates us, but also the church of the pope, not as if we were evil in the world or in the house regime, for they could suffer that, yes, they would also rejoice if they heard that we were fornicators, adulterers, murderers, as they are, but the cause of hatred is in truth this, that they are sorry that we are innocent in the second table, and obey the first table, in which we are commanded to praise GOD, to hope in His mercy, to fear Him 2c.

V. 6. Oh, that they should be like the grass on the housetops, which withers before it is plucked up!

It is truly a beautiful psalm, because of the frequent and exceedingly appropriate similes with which it almost scoldingly traverses the so great majesties and principalities in the world that resist the Gospel. He compared them above to the plowmen who ceaselessly plow furrows, not, of course, for the reason that they are allowed to abuse their power and wealth for so long, but according to the sense of those who have to suffer the plowing, the wounds and the trampling underfoot. For to them the plowing seems long and, as it were, without end. Therefore, they wish to be freed, and any delay, however short, seems unbearable to them because of what they feel. Against this state of heart (affectum), he now comforts them with the simile of the grass on the roof by a poetic embellishment (fictione), as if he wanted to say: Why does the delay seem so long to you? Why don't you finally understand what your adversaries, those ploughmen, are? Have you never seen the grass on the roofs? Who has ever complained that it is too long in bloom? Who has ever taken the trouble to pull it up, as if it did not wither of itself? Learn, therefore, that your adversaries are entirely in the same position 2c. In this way he argues with the one likeness against the other. But if someone could believe that this likeness was made by the Holy Spirit, and completely enclose it in his heart, he would not fear the Turk, not the pope, not the bishops, not the raging princes, but would despise them all, and care as little for them as for the grass from the roofs.

But look at the appearance that this grass has. If a child saw it, he would think that it is better than all barley, because it does not grow on the earth like other plants, but in a higher and nobler place and weighs down the roofs. But take a man who understands these things: he will judge that it is nothing but appearance, without any fruit. Thus the Holy Spirit has chosen this similitude to teach us that we should not wish tyrants to be like grass, but that we should certainly think that they are like the grass on the housetops, which has the appearance of barley, but before the time of harvest it perishes without any human intervention. Therefore, since we see that the bishop in our neighborhood despises us in the highest way, and decorates his churches after the manner of children, we will firmly hold to this; likewise, since we see that the princes in our neighborhood 2) oppose our doctrine with all their might, and strive to suppress it: that they green and blossom like the grass, not on the ground, and that for this reason they are borne like splendid roses in wreaths and worshipped by the highest people, for this is the grass that grows not on the ground but on the roofs. But since they rage to the utmost, and it already seems as if they are suppressing Christ and his word, let us speak with the Psalm: These great princes will be like grass, and already are (for the prayer and the promise are the same).

But it would be desirable that we could take this idea into our hearts in such a way, and firmly hold to it, as the Holy Spirit declares, that princes, kings, citizens, peasants, in short all who are opposed to the word, are like the grass. Sanherib, who besieged Jerusalem, had, as it were, flown over all the kingdoms, trampling them all under foot and oppressing them, so Hezekiah and others could not to think that he was grass, and yet he was put to shame before he could accomplish what he intended [Isa. 37, 27. ff.], and had to lift the siege with the utmost terror and an exceedingly great defeat of his own. Thus it looked as if Pharaoh grew not on the earth but in the air and on the housetops, but the wretched Jews were oppressed. This is an appearance like not the withered grass, but the flowering grass. But how quickly it withered! When he thought to suppress them, he perished in the water.

Such a picture of tyrants shows us here the Holy Spirit in this place; why then would you fear? why tremble? why lower your courage? as if you had really never seen that grass, which is in the most beautiful bloom, withers of itself in the course of a few days, yes, that it has such a nature that it cannot last long? Thus Athanasius said, when Julian plagued both him and the whole church in many ways, and fought not only with cruelty but also with cunning against the godly, and others, as in a great storm, let their courage sink: this persecution of Julian was not a storm, but a little cloud. This was indeed a heart full of faith, which could certainly believe that Julian was not like a great storm that rages with great violence, not like a dense cloud that envelops everything in darkness, but like a little cloud that consumes the sun without effort. In this way, we too should reduce the power of the adversaries and consider their raging to be nothing, not because of our power, but because they are truly a bubble of water by nature, grass on the roofs, and rather a shadow than a human being, except that they also challenge God against themselves, against whose power their raging is even more insignificant than the grass on the roofs and a bubble on the waters. For it is in truth nothing but a completely empty appearance, which looks as if it were something, but is nothing. Thus, the intentions of the adversaries are threatening, but in fact they do nothing.

This is the wisdom of Christians, that they make small the strength and power of the adversaries.

On the other hand, the word and the help of the Lord are emphasized and made great. So the devil, sin, death and other spiritual temptations are certainly great and powerful, but a Christian makes a difference with regard to the greatness. For, to speak scholastically, something is called great in one way if it is before the eyes (quoad oculum), in another way if it concerns reality (quoad veritatem rei), that is, it is a twofold greatness, one of the eyes, which the eyes judge by appearance; the other of truth, which faith judges by word. Therefore, the greatness of sin, death, godless kings, princes, bishops and popes is only a greatness measured by the eye, because God, who says [Joh. 16, 33.]: "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world", likewise [Matth. 10, 28.]: "Do not be afraid of those who kill the body and do not like to kill the soul", because this GOD, I say, alone is the true greatness; if you compare with this the devil and all the raging of the whole world, what is it but a water bubble? what is it but a very small straw? But when this is looked at apart from God, it is truly frightening by its appearance and seems to be great.

Therefore, Christians must judge things, not according to opinion, but according to truth. An opinion, however, is that which reason imposes without the word; but the truth is taken from the word, which judges that this raging and the power of the world, which rages against the word, is like the grass on the housetops. This promise, when it is properly closed in the heart and impressed upon it, fortifies the heart against the supposed power of the world and of the devil, while, on the other hand, when the word is not there, the minds, frightened by the splendid appearances and the reasoning of reason, are oppressed by fear.

Furthermore, this must not be taken as if we condemn the powers of princes and the world per se. We judge them to be creatures of God, so we do not condemn the powers per se, but the presumption of the powers and their misuse, because they are based on them, to fight against God and His Church. They may be princes on earth, they may use their powers on earth; but that they dare to fight in heaven, and to attack and suppress the word with their powers, is rightly condemned, and he speaks and judges rightly who compares them to water bubbles, grass, stubble, even to nothing. For why are they people who argue against God? Or do they think that we do not know what God is and what man is? what the creature and the Creator are?

They are therefore rightly compared to the grass on the roofs, although the Holy Spirit could hardly have spoken more contemptuously. For this grass is of such a kind that it withers in a short time before the sickle is used, yes, no one considers it worthy of the sickle, no one cares about it, everyone allows it to enjoy this short-lived hope and to be seen from the roof in front of people as if it were something, while in truth it is nothing. Thus the godless persecutors of the Word in the world, who are thought to be so terrifying in appearance, are exceedingly contemptible. For Christians do not think of uprooting them, they do not persecute them, they do not avenge the insults, but they let them grow and be hopeful as they desire. For they know that they cannot stand against the blast of a violent wind; indeed, though all is calm, yet tyrants perish on the slightest occasions, just as the grass on the roofs is gradually scorched by the sun. By suffering, therefore, Christians bear them and overcome, but they perish and are defeated by action, as all histories of all times prove.

V. 7 From which the reaper does not fill his hand, nor the binder his arm.

Here the Holy Spirit makes a comparison between the grass and the right fruits and fruitful seeds, in order to put this likeness more to our hearts and to draw our minds away from the fear and trembling which the outward appearance arouses in us. Fruitful seeds, he says, are the

So that he who reaps them fills his hand with them, and he who gathers the sheaves has something to put in the barn. Here is truth, not empty pretense. But the grass on the rooftops lies by its very appearance, for it is without all fruit. Thus the tyrants, the popes, the bishops have the resemblance or the appearance that they are the church; they keep the dignities, the incomes, the benefices, just as the grass has its stalk and its ear, but in truth they are not the church, just as the grass is not grain. For it withers before it can come to fruit.

For this is the chief ground on which they fight against us, that they arrogate to themselves the title of the church for the sake of this appearance of which I have spoken; and, of course, if any man will be satisfied with appearances, he will be deceived. But we have the commandment that we should not be satisfied with appearances; indeed, we are reminded that appearances can even become the occasion of the greatest dangers. For Christ commands and reminds [Matt. 7:14], "Beware of false prophets, which come unto you in sheep's clothing." Likewise [v. 20.], "By their fruits ye shall know them." That they therefore arrogate to themselves the name of the church, Nnd for the sake of the appearance which the greening grass on the roofs has, want to be the right grain, we do not concede to them. For if they are grain, they may fill the reaper's hand. But they are not; they are indeed the useless grass, and worse than grass, because they do not even keep up appearances, since they live in the impurity of their lusts, and because of the barbarous cruelty which they exercise against the true church. Since, therefore, there is nothing but appearance among the adversaries, and even that is disfigured in many ways, nothing but hypocrisy, we judge that they are not the church of Christ, but of the devil, and therefore, like chaff and stubble, they are prepared for the fire, however much they plague us under the appearance and semblance of the church.

V. 8. And those who pass by, do not speak: The blessing of the LORD be upon you, we bless you in the name of the LORD.

This also belongs to the parable of the grass, in order to make it important and to explain it to us. For the right fruits have this praise, that they are a blessing from God. Therefore, when they sprout, those who look at them accompany them with their good wishes. This, says David, will not be said of that grass by the tyrants and enemies of the church, but rather they will be cursed by the whole human race, and so God's curse and man's curse will be joined together and heaped upon them. This is how the church of Pabst flourished before our doctrine was preached. But since the gospel now takes away its appearance and shows that it is without fruit, it happens that no one wants to remember the pope, the bishops, the monks and all the damned hypocrisy, no one wants the former state of religion to return, but their remembrance with them has perished with the godly. Thus the prophet prays and promises at the same time that the wicked, whatever their appearance may be, are in truth nothing and will perish, and also that they will lack the blessing of God and of men, just as the memory [Ps. 9:7] of the Pharisees, of Judas, of Cerinth, of Arius, of Pelagius has perished. For they are dead, both according to their cause and according to their name. The same will happen to those who today have disrupted the churches with falsified teachings of baptism, the Lord's Supper and other things. They seem to flourish, but because there is no blessing, they will inherit nothing but the curse, and will perish with their whole cause and the fame they now seem to have, so that none of the godly will wish to be among their number.

Therefore, we who, by the grace of God, have the doctrine in all its parts sound and in harmony with all Scripture, should be mindful of this parable, so that we do not fall into terror when we have to take on spite and injustice of every kind for the sake of the Word, but judge that the pope, the bishops, and the servants through whom they carry out their cruelty, the ungodly princes, are nothing but Grass on the housetops, which seems to be something, but in fact is nothing, and therefore lacks all blessing; and it will be said to such people with that rich [Luc. 16, 25.] in hell: "Remember, son, that you have received your good in your life." For if we consider the whole history of the whole Church from the beginning of the world, we see that this has been the constant custom and manner of the divine counsels, that tyrants, like grass, have not come to maturity. Therefore, we too should persevere in such dangers when the grass is still green, and wait in patience, since the outcome shows that it has been nothing but grass, and that contrary to expectation it has suddenly withered away. The wicked enjoy all blessings for the sake of the church, just as the grass on the roof enjoys the rain and the sun just as much as the seeds in the field, but apart from the fact that they will not bring their days to the half [Ps. 55:24. They will also be a constant mockery of the people, and no one will wish them well, as today the memory of Judas, Pilate, the godless Jews, Diocletian, Maximin and other tyrants lacks all honor.

This consolation is presented by the Holy Spirit with such images (ideis) and rough parables, so that we can at least grasp the nature of the divine works with our hearts, since we are not yet able to judge the matter itself according to truth, but because of the splendid appearance that they are doing well for so long, we think that they are the best wheat. Therefore, we must cling to the word that illustrates this matter with such parables, 1) and our senses must be turned away from the appearance and semblance, so that we do not judge the opponents of the word differently than the very smallest and most insignificant grass that grows on the roofs and is considered by all to be nothing. For so the spirit and the faith speak, but our senses speak differently.

The same should be done in other temptations. When conscience comes to accuse us and oppress us by its testimony, when we are oppressed by dangers of death, and here we follow appearances, we judge that these enemies are all in all (fac totum) and will oppress us completely. This is the greatness before the eyes or according to the senses, which arises from opinion, not from truth. But if we look at the true greatness which the Word holds out to us, we are compelled to say that death, sin, the devil with the gates of hell are in truth nothing but the grass on the housetops, a straw and a bubble floating on the water, which is broken and disappears by the slightest occasion. So this must be extended against all kinds of temptations, may it be persecutors of the Word, the world and princes, or may it be sin, death and the devil. We are to learn to reduce all these things as much as we are able, namely because Christ lives and we hold fast his word. For it is he who can swallow up all these things and say that they are nothing.

But if we look at these things apart from the Word and Christ, in terms of ourselves and our powers, then they are truly not grass, but great and insurmountable mountains. But we have to be dialecticians, and if we have to fight against the enemies, we have to move from the simple and unrelated (absoluto) category of being into the category of relationship, that we do not fight par excellence as a man consisting of body and soul, but as a Christian baptized in the name of Christ, who has the gift of the Spirit and the Word. Therefore, the devil, death, even hell, the world with all the angry princes, compared to a Christian, are in truth GraS on the rooftops, and so something even lesser and more contemptible can be said. For he has the Word, which is omnipotent, since it is a power of God [Rom. 1:16], likewise he has Christ Himself. Therefore, Christians are invincible, even when they are defeated.

1) Erlanger: non The non is omitted in the Wittenberg and in the Jena. The old translator offers: "nicht abmalt, wie wir es sich abmalt."

and succumb, for Christ's power is mighty in the weak [2 Cor. 12:9]. In this way the holy prophets and martyrs fortified themselves against the world and the kingdom of the devil, therefore they took on dangers of every kind with such great courage, and firmly believed that the victory would not be with the grass, which withers of its own accord without the help of men, but with the Words of God. For it is true what Basil writes when he comforts the Christians of Alexandria against the raging of the Arians: ὅτι ἐν τοῖς παρά των ἐχθρῶν διωγμοῖς πληϋ-όνεται ἡ ἐκκλησία καὶ μάλλον βάλλει [that the church in

The same thing we have experienced, and may God grant that we may experience it even more. Amen.

The One Hundred and Thirty-Third Psalm.

From the depths.

We also count this psalm among those that are particularly outstanding. For it deals with the most important doctrine for our salvation, namely justification, the pure knowledge of which alone sustains the church, for it is the knowledge of truth and life. On the other hand, if this knowledge of justification is lost, Christ and life and the church are lost at the same time, and no judgment remains, neither about doctrine nor about the spirits, but darkness and blindness take over everything. Therefore, in order to give this light to our descendants to the best of our ability, let us also go to the interpretation of this psalm.

In the beginning, however, I must remind you of what you have often heard from me elsewhere, that the prophets, when they speak of God or call God, speak of their God, whose promises and services they had, so that you may not think that the access to God is open to us through our thoughts, which we make of God without His word, as the Turks, Jews and Papists make of God, either entirely without the word, or by perverting the word and drawing from the right opinion to the imagination or speculation which they have invented for themselves. For the prophets knew that the true God, although infinite by nature, was nevertheless enclosed in the mercy seat to which he had tied himself by his word. Although they therefore the God of Heaven and the Creator of all things, they had this as a closer and therefore more certain sign of the true God, that they knew He dwelt in Zion. Therefore, when they prayed to God or preached about God, they did so according to the way God Himself had revealed Himself to them in words and promises.

Although, therefore, no mention of the tabernacle and the promises is added in this passage, but he seems to speak to GOD par excellence, yet this saying is to be recorded, that he speaks only to the GOD as he is in his word and service, just as we today do not have to think nor speak of GOD in any other way than as he is in our true mercy seat Christo. For thus Christ says to Philip [John 14:9], "He who sees me sees the Father." Likewise [v. 6.], "No man cometh unto the Father, but by me." If this knowledge is held fast, then God, the Creator of heaven and earth, can also be worshipped without danger, and will certainly be grasped. For although He is incomprehensible and infinite according to His nature and apart from this revelation, He is nevertheless finite and comprehensible in His words and promises in which He wraps Himself. Therefore, the Jews who worshipped at the Ark of the Covenant worshipped the true GOD of heaven and earth. For God had indicated by His word that He would be there and hear the prayers of His people.

When we look at Christ in this way and worship Him, we are worshipping the true God, for God has revealed Himself in Christ. Therefore Christ also says [John 16:23], "If you ask the Father anything in my name, he will give it to you." Those who therefore pray to God, and do not fix their eyes and hearts on Christ, err and do not attain to God, but worship the thoughts of their hearts instead of the true God, and are idolaters. For God does not want to be sought and found, nor even heard, except in our mercy seat, Christ. Therefore, if we want to find God rightly, to know God rightly, and to come to Him with certainty, we must look at Christ according to the saying [John 14:9]: "He who sees Me sees the Father." Likewise [John 14:7], "If ye knew me, ye knew my Father also." In this way the Word gathers the wandering thoughts of our heart to this One Person, who is Christ, God and man, so that we are to hold that apart from Christ there is no God and can be found. "Do you not believe," he says [John 14:10], "that the Father is in me, and I in the Father?"

In this way it is to be noted that the holy Jews also prayed to God who dwells in Zion. Those who did not care for this place nevertheless committed idolatry, even though they performed the same services and used the same words for prayer, for no other reason than because they were going against the rule that God had commanded to be worshipped in Jerusalem. This, therefore, is a general rule to be observed in all the Psalms and in all Scripture, that in the Old Testament God was only in Zion, or in the place of the Tabernacle, and that all prayers were addressed to God sitting and dwelling above the cherubim [Ps. 80:2]. But after this temple was destroyed, God set up another temple, which is Christ, in which He wants to be sought, worshipped, venerated; apart from this temple God is not, but the devil is sought and found there, and hearts fall either into despair when an evil conscience is added, or into presumption through hypocrisy, like the idols servants, 1) the Jews and our papists are very presumptuous about their righteousness and God's favor.

These sayings and similar ones in the Psalms and Prophets belong here. David says [Ps. 121:1], "I lift up mine eyes unto the mountains"; likewise [Ps. 128:5], "The Lord shall bless thee out of Zion." In this way must be taken the other sayings in which the indication of place or temple is not expressly added, as in this place, "Out of the deep I call unto thee, O LORD." He does not call the Lord simply the Creator of heaven and earth, as the Turks also call Him, but He who dwells in Zion, whose promises and word they had that there He would accept and hear the prayers. So he walks along in completely pure trust in the mercy and grace of GOD, even at the time when the Law of Moses was still in bloom, but of the GOD who is in Zion, and who said to the devil [Gen. 3, 15.], "I will put enmity between you and the seed of the woman." For GOD does not want us to seek him with our thoughts. For if we could do that, what need would there be of the word? Why then would the place be revealed and determined in the Law, and the person of Christ in the New Testament? See what our opponents, the papists, encounter. They pray a lot, recite psalms, say: "Our Father, who art in heaven," 2c., but because they despise the word of Christ, yes, because they even persecute it by force, therefore nothing but idolatry is hidden under these exceedingly beautiful words (vocalibus), which they recite from the psalms. The same happens to the Jews, the same to the Turks, even when they say that they worship the living God, the Creator of heaven and earth.

Therefore, I often and gladly inculcate this, that you close your eyes and ears apart from Christ and say: that you know of no other God than the one who was in Mary's womb and sucked her breasts. Where this God is Christ Jesus, there is the whole God or the whole Godhead, there will be the Va-

Apart from this Christ, God is nowhere and will not be found. I have known many monks who, believing that God could be seized by human speculation, fell into very grave dangers, and if God had not freed me from this challenge by a special act of kindness, I would have fallen suddenly into ruin. But it is useful for life that one becomes more careful through the dangers of other people.

Although the prophet, as I have said, does not explicitly mention the temple here, you will see in what way he includes the promise of Christ. For this is the content of this psalm, that there is no salvation, no grace, no justification except with the God who forgives and pardons sins. But is this God different from the one who said [Gen. 3:15]: "The seed of the woman shall bruise thy head"? So he understands the God who makes the promise, and thus shows that Christ was promised by the Father to be the sacrificial lamb for the sins of the world, and treats the most important doctrine, namely of Christian righteousness; likewise of Christian wisdom or of the glory of Christ. This David treats at the time when the law and the legal services were still going on and flourishing, and leaps over from the enclosure of the law into paradise, or rather straight into the heaven of grace and mercy. For why should we not call grace heaven, since through it we go to heaven, and it cannot be grasped by laws, not by deeds, not by any efforts, but like an exceedingly wide heaven grasps us who believe that we are righteous by imputation before God through Christ? In this way David treats the doctrine of justification, and although he does not do this alone (for all the great prophets, Moses, Isaiah and others, have touched on this doctrine), he does it with special diligence and in great abundance.

From this, the content of the psalm is evident,

David wants to teach us by his example about the true way to righteousness, life and salvation; likewise, he wants to show us the right way to escape from death, sin and the wrath of God, so that we may enter eternal life from this life. He does not teach this like the sophists in the schools, who teach about holy things without any experience, but he brings his own experience with him, and presents his heart to us, which the Holy Spirit has exercised and instructed through many trials, so that he might arrive at this teaching, which he has also set himself to teach us here. The sum of this teaching is that it is based on the hope of God's mercy and on the trust that sins will be forgiven. But this will become clearer in the treatment, so let us now tackle the Psalm.

V. 1. Out of the depths I call to you, O Lord.

In the beginning there seems to be a lot of useless words, but if you look closely at the matter that distresses the prophet, it will be easily recognized that even by as many words as possible neither the movement of his heart nor the danger can be sufficiently expressed. For he is not oppressed by a common and ordinary temptation; he does not complain of the dangers threatening him from Saul, Absalom, false prophets, and others; He does not speak of other temptations that come from the envy and hatred with which the world persecutes the godly, but he indicates the sickness of conscience and the real fears of death, when hearts, overwhelmed as it were by despair, feel that they are abandoned by God, when they see their unworthiness and their guilt accused before God's judgment seat, when it seems that God has not only abandoned them but also rejected them for their sins and hates them. These temptations are much more unbearable than others that usually occur, because here it is a matter of the danger of the soul and of eternal bliss. That is why he uses this way of speaking, saying: "Out of the depths I call to you", as if he wanted to say: I am oppressed by extreme misfortune, because

1) That is, Christ's. Cf. Col. 2034.

I feel my sins and the righteous anger of God; I do not know at all how I could remedy this. For hatred, as well as for other misfortunes that afflict us, help can be found among men, but this is in truth an evil that cannot be cured unless help is sent from above.

And truly, other damages with which the godly are afflicted can be overcome by patience, as when goods, dignities 2c. are in danger, yes, even in lesser sins, as the sins of youth are, the heart can be straightened up again more easily. But these knots are felt and are unsolvable when these infernal thoughts take over the heart, so that man feels nothing but that he is rejected by God for eternity. Those who therefore feel such temptations have an example here, that David suffered and experienced the same. For this also increases this challenge, that such people think that they alone suffer this. Therefore it must be learned that all exceedingly holy men have suffered the same, and have been afflicted with the terrors of the law and of sin unto death, as we see David here, as it were transported into hell, crying out, "Out of the depths I cry unto thee, O Lord." But we must not stop there, that we not only endure such trials and dangers, but we must also learn the way by which those who have suffered the same have come out again. But you see what David is doing. You see where he goes in this difficult situation. He does not despair, but cries out as if there is still some hope of help and comfort. Therefore you should also think and do the same. For David is not challenged for the sake of despair. Therefore, do not accept temptation with such a heart that you are consumed with sorrow and despair. If you have been led into hell, believe that there is a Lord who will bring you out of hell [1 Sam. 2:6]. If you are crushed and broken, know that there is a Lord who will restore you and heal you [Hos. 6:1]. If your soul is full of sorrow, you shall again expect comfort from Him who promised that a troubled spirit would be a pleasing sacrifice to Him [Ps. 51:19]. But it is of great benefit if in such violent attacks (paroxysmis) a brother is present who comforts us with the word, for God willed that the church should be of such a kind that one should comfort the other, and promised that He would be the third when two are gathered in His name [Matth. 18, 20.]. And truly nothing so raises up so wounded a heart as to hear from a brother that such terrors are laid up, not that we may perish, but that we may be humbled, and know grace, and receive the same with thanksgiving. If we lack such assistance from the brethren, we should do what David does in this passage, namely, we should call out and pray this psalm with David, in which you see the sighs that depict the highest anguish of the heart, from which this by no means unnecessary abundance of words flows, so that he not only says that he is crying out of an abyss, but also reminds God of his promises that he will hear the one who calls to him; And even this is not enough, but he repeats the same thing in other words:

V. 2. Lord, hear my voice; let your ears be attentive to the voice of my supplication.

He talks, as I said before, to God, whose dwelling place was in Jerusalem, as we talk to God and call him Father, who is only in Christ and is worshipped in him. To this GOD he asks to be attentive to his prayer. Now if we think that we cannot pray with the same heart and fervor as these words show, let us remember that even David did not pray in this way at the time when he was suffering from temptation (in paroxysmo). For a despairing and sorrowful heart does not pray as long as the temptation and sorrow lasts, but then blasphemy and murmuring against God is felt, and the heart cannot have the right opinion of God. But when the attack (paroxysm) subsides, only then does this crying and that begin.

The heart is very much assisted, as I said before, when it hears a brother who holds up the word of God in a fitting way. The heart, however, obtains very great assistance, as I said before, to whom: it hears a brother who holds forth the word of God in a fitting manner: Why do you grieve, dear brother? Do you not hear that God does not want the death of the sinner? Have you forgotten that it is commanded that we hope in God and believe in Him? Look at the first commandment; what is it, or what does it demand but that we serve God with faith and hope? Why would you not trust in His goodness? Why would you despair? For this is nothing else than heaping sin upon sin, and since you are a sinner against the commandments of God, which belong to a lower level, you now place yourself on the highest level and add despair and unbelief to the rest of your sins. Now, when in this way confidence in God and the mercy of God are inculcated in the anguished heart, the little spark of faith rises up and the groaning of the heart: O, if only I could! The spirit comes to the aid of this inexpressible sighing, and the sensation of joy finally follows. For God cannot despise this sighing or leave it unnoticed. We see, as it were, the shadow of these sighs in these first verses. But why do you sigh? What is it that you are sorrowful about? Hear:

v. 3. If you will, O LORD, impute sin, O LORD, who shall stand?

This verse, as you know, is used very often in our theology, and I do not see how either our adversaries or even the devil himself could overturn the same. For what is there to doubt? David has the testimony [Sam. 13, 14] that he is a man after God's own heart, and he is truly an outstanding example in every kind of Christian virtue. For although he is infamous for the murder of Uriah and his adultery with Bathsheba, is not his humility extraordinary and his faith fervent, since the prophet punished his sin and restored him to his former glory?

established? Then see how great patience he had in adversity, how great care and diligence he used to establish and propagate the service. What shall I say much? David is not one of many, whether we consider his faith and life or God's testimony about him, and yet this man, so great and so holy, says explicitly and obviously: "If you will, O Lord, impute sin, O Lord, who will stand?" Does this not mean to deny all righteousness, holiness and purity? As he also in the 32nd Psalm, v. 6, apparently calls "the saints", and yet says: "For this all the saints will ask you", namely, that you may forgive their sins.

But where are those who praise the righteousness of works so much, since David throws away all works and all righteousness before God, and simply asks that the Lord not impute sin? And truly, our adversaries now speak much more moderately than in the beginning. For they no longer deny outright that faith justifies, but they add that faith, which justifies, must be formed by love; for so they let misunderstood words be heard like magpies. But let faith be formed as one pleases, this is a universally valid saying: "If thou wilt, O Lord, impute sin, O Lord, who, who shall stand?" Certainly no one. For if anyone could stand, truly David also would have stood, such a holy man who was so learned in the word of God, who was so often led to faith and the fear of God through so many misfortunes and dangers. For I do not believe that anyone among all the papists is so impudent that, looking at the righteousness of works, he should not lower himself far below David, and yet David says: Righteousness does not come from works, for: If you add sin, no one will stand.

Therefore, we should learn that we should not come to the judgment of God trusting in our works or our righteousness, even if we had done everything we could have done. It is said

1) that when Arsenius was on his deathbed, he was extremely depressed in his mind for three days. When his disciples saw this, they came and comforted their master: he had no reason to be afraid, because he had lived according to the will of God. Then Arsenius said: "In truth I am afraid, for although I hear from you that I have kept the commandments of God, it is certain that God judges very differently from men. You see that the man who thought about God's judgment did not want to trust in His righteousness and His works. Thus it is said of a certain other hermit that when he was called to comfort someone who was already in the last stages of death, he told him to suffer his death patiently, for in this way it would happen that he would attain eternal life, as our monks used to comfort people who were being led out to the death penalty. There, either little or nothing was said about the merit of Christ; they spoke only of the death that the condemned should suffer, that through it they would enter into life. But what happened to this Comforter? When the one whom he had comforted in this way had died, he was afflicted by an exceedingly severe affliction. It occurred to him how little reliable comfort he had given the brother, since he had told him to trust in his own patience and not rather in the merit and death of Christ. This worry consumed the man within three days, so that he also died.

Countless examples of this kind can be seen in our daily life, which proves that our righteousness and our willing death are not enough, but that faith in Christ is necessary. We can safely base ourselves on his death, because he is the sacrifice for the sins of the world. Our death, if we

We must also suffer him patiently, and all other obedience that we render will be counted as sins if we set aside Christ's merit and consider that we thereby stand in the judgment of God.

Therefore, no godly person should take upon himself death and the judgment of God, trusting in his merit or his righteousness. Nor, of course, do I believe that there is anyone among the adversaries who should dare to suffer the judgment of God by trusting in his righteousness, and yet they teach, proclaim and exhort that others should do so; but we, who teach the opposite and divert the church from this to trusting in the merit and death of Christ, they condemn as heretics. Is this not the utmost wickedness? They themselves do not do what they teach, that they die trusting in their own merits, and want to force others to do so or condemn them as heretics. Thus, the experience of all reasonable people teaches that no one can gain victory before God through his works or his righteousness, and yet the whole of nature, when it is out of temptation, looks around for works and seeks how it can propitiate God through them. But here the simple and clear doctrine is presented: If you impute sin, no one will stand. Who, therefore, should desire to enter into judgment in such a way as to be overcome and condemned?

Therefore this is the summa, that we all (David, Peter, Paul 2c.) are born as sinners, live, are and die as sinners. But this is our glory and our salvation, that we, instructed by the gospel about the mercy of God and the merit of Christ, leap out of the law and our works, as it were into another circle of doctrine and into another light, and confidently stand before God and say: O Lord, we cannot quarrel with you in judgment, we cannot dispute with you about our righteousness and sin. If you now want to impute sins, if you want to ask as in a court of law whether we are righteous, then we are lost. Therefore we appeal from this judgment to the throne of mercy. If we have anything to hei

1) Erlanger: Xrsenius (here and immediately following) instead of: Arsenius. The same narration about Arsenius is found in the detailed explanation of the Epistle to the Galatians, Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. IX, 616, s 38. In contrast, in Luther's "Arbeiten über die ersten 22 Psalmen", in this volume Col. 464, K 219, what is narrated here is attached to Agathon. The old translator (v. Georg Major) also put Agathon instead of Arsenius here.

If we have done it by your grace, we have done it by your gift. Therefore, look upon us with the eyes of your mercy, not with the eyes of the justice of your judgment. For if you do not look upon our sins and close your eyes to them, so that you do not see them, we will not be saved 2c.

We see that David followed the light of this teaching in the darkness of the Law. Our situation is better today, because we see clearly that it is presented to us in the New Testament. For what do we teach today but that we are saved by faith in Christ alone, that our sins are covered and taken away by the merit of Christ alone, according to the saying [Ps. 32:1], "Blessed is he whose transgressions are forgiven." The forgiveness of sins, therefore, is the heaven under which we dwell in confidence of the merit of Christ. For he who believes is not judged, but has passed from judgment into eternal life [John 5:24]. David does not clearly mention Christ, and yet, because he hopes from reconciliation, he rightly looks to this mercy seat, which will be more clearly revealed in the New Testament. For do you not see that he indicates that he would have to despair if God wanted to look at sin? For apart from the forgiveness of sins or the knowledge of grace, what is there in which we can trust or be sure?

Therefore, those who do not trust in this one thing, that through the death of Christ sins are taken away and God's eyes are closed, as it were, so that he cannot see our sin, will undoubtedly perish. For the Holy Scriptures set before us this one thing, that our life is only under the forgiveness of sin, under the forbearance, the toleration, the indulgence of God, so that we know nothing but the righteousness of Christ, not as if one should not do good works, not that sin is not there, or that God does not hate it, but that God says and promises that he will not impute our transgressions, because we believe in Christ and trust in Christ. Those who hold up this shield and are hidden under it are considered children.

because they have the reconciler; those who do not have him must despair. For what do they accomplish by running to the places of the apostles? what do they accomplish by putting on the caps and miserable plagues of the body? since David says plainly, "If thou wilt impute sin, O Lord, who shall stand?" Therefore, everything lies in what follows:

V. 4. for with thee is salvation, that they may fear thee. 1)

This verse is exceedingly badly translated [in Latin], and the interpreter seems to have had in mind that we are righteous if we keep silence to the Lord, or had the law, while yet there is no consolation, nor hope of blessedness, but in that God has promised forgiveness of sins through Christ, rejecting badly all other laws and righteousnesses. For this is also confirmed by the first part of this verse, when it says: "For with you is forgiveness." Therefore, you will not find forgiveness in Moses, not in the law and the doing of the law, not in the vow of the monastic life, not in a hard and laborious life, not in alms, not in St. James, not in St. Peter's church in Rome, in short, nowhere will you find forgiveness, because it is nowhere but "with you". Forgiveness is not our merit or our righteousness, but the forgiveness of sins by grace, free of charge, the pardon and remission through Christ. Even if you toiled a thousand years in the monastery, you would still not find it in the monastery and in your other works, as conscience sufficiently proves, which feels despair even in the holiest and hardest life. But in this one thing the conscience comes to rest, that it relies absolutely, without all addition of its own worthiness, quite simply, that I say so, on the quite simple mercy of God through Christ and says: O Lord, I have your promise that righteousness comes from mercy alone; but this righteousness is nothing else than your forgiveness, that is, that you do not want to impute sin 2c.

1) Vulgate: Hniaapud te propitiati est, et propter loZeiL tuum suktiiui to, Domina.

Therefore I commend to you this description which David gives of Christian righteousness, that "to impute sin" is to condemn, whereas "not to impute sin" is to justify or declare righteous, and that righteousness is when sins are not regarded, but forgiven, bestowed, and not imputed, as he also describes in another place a blessed man [Ps. 32:11, and Paul very appropriately adduces this description [Rom. 4:8]: "Blessed is the man to whom God imputes no sin." For he does not say, Blessed is the man who has no sin, but: To whom the LORD does not impute the sin that he has, as it is also said here, If sin is not imputed. These testimonies we must diligently gather, that we may see how this doctrine is founded in the holy Scriptures, and how all reliance on the righteousness of works and of the law is cut off in the judgment of God.

For this doctrine makes all men equal without distinction. For if we are righteous only by imputation, it follows that we are not only all sinners, but that before God there is absolutely no difference between a husband and a monk, between a hermit and a burgher, between a prince and a peasant. For this difference of status is of no use to men before the judgment of God; that alone helps them to have their sins forgiven. Now if this doctrine had been diligently presented in the church, there would have been no monastic state, no other kinds of life introduced, of which the foolish people believed that God would be more pleased. For whatever life may be, in this the situation of all is the same, that we are in need of forgiveness of sins, as Paul says in the Acts of the Apostles that God tolerated the way of the fathers in the wilderness for forty years; ἐτροποφόρησεν αὐτοῦς [he tolerated their wise, he says, Apost. 13:18, just as a good husband tolerates the ways of his wife, a teacher the ways of his students, a prince the ways of his courtiers. If this civil life requires such moderation (epiikia) that people do not act against each other according to the strictest law, how much more is this necessary.

that God tolerates our ways (τροποφόρος), in our so great weakness and depravity? Daily he would have cause to reckon and punish, but he will not take sharp notice of us; he wants us to believe in Christ: then he himself will tolerate the way (τροποφο-ρεῖν), he will turn a blind eye to our weakness and forgive and consider us righteous because of faith in Christ.

In this way, David turns from despair to trust and a certain hope in mercy. For when we look at our sins, we inevitably fall into fear and despair. But we must not fix our eyes on our sins alone; we must look here, to the mercy seat, so that, although we cannot deny that we are sinners, we do not deny the forgiveness of sins either. Why then is the forgiveness of sins promised if sinners are not to receive it also? Yes, that David calls it "forgiveness," by which he testifies that he is a sinner, and that forgiveness properly belongs to him. But, you will say, sins make a man unworthy of God's mercy; therefore David, Paul, Peter may have hope, as people who are holy and worthy, but I am a sinner, I cannot hope 2c. You should flee such thoughts as a real plague for your soul, and rather think like this: Because I am a sinner, therefore the forgiveness of sins belongs to me. Therefore I will not despair, I will not be consumed with sadness, but I will turn to the Lord who promised forgiveness, who commands to hope and believe 2c.

Thus, in these two verses, David presents the brief epitome of the whole Christian doctrine, and the sun that illuminates the church. For when this doctrine stands, the church stands; but when it falls, the church also falls. But for this reason I inculcate it more often, because I know that the devil desires and does nothing so much as to take this knowledge away from the eyes and hearts. This is the main reason for all the troubles he causes in public as well as in private life. We see how great an evil he has caused the church through Sacramentarians and Anabaptists, that not only have the people who seek new disputations almost forgotten this article, but also many who are deterred by the discord have even begun to hate this teaching. Therefore, it behooves a good pastor not to let any disputation distract him from the diligent action of this doctrine. But how often does it happen in private life that through the thoughts of the law and of sin this thought of the forgiveness of sin is either lost or in danger? Therefore, in this psalm, David not only presents his own experience, but he also adds exhortations and promises, as we shall hear, so that it is evident that he has anxiously labored to preserve this doctrine; and truly the greatness of the danger must still stimulate and increase this zealous endeavor, for when this article is lost, then the hearts are overwhelmed with temptations of all kinds.

Thus it was written in the Pabstthum when this article was lost. For what was so strange (monstrousum) that it would not have been accepted by all with equanimity and with willing ears? I am ashamed to say that it would not have taken much for the impudent sacrilege of the monks to have held up their stench for our adoration. On the other hand, if this knowledge is held fast, heresies of every kind can easily be overthrown; and the papacy is an excellent example, which has been overcome and driven out of the hearts of men by this single passage. For even if you attack the life of the papists, and investigate their shameful greed, avarice, cruelty, 2c. and uncover their godless nature from the evil works they do against the law, 1) you will accomplish nothing, for the pope admits all this, just as he cannot deny the obvious shameful deeds of his own. But, he says, nevertheless our profession, our doctrine and our rule (regnum) are holy, even if the life is stained with sins. In this way, even the devil can cannot be overcome in the area of the law (in lege) and the works. For he treats both the laws and the works in such a way that he tears through them as through a spider's web, without his power being broken. But then he is overcome when the doctrine of faith and this article are insisted upon, that the papists have not only lost Christ and the right way of justification, but have also sullied and buried them with shameful doctrines. If this head is attacked, then both the pope and the devil must take to their heels. For they have nothing with which to protect themselves if they are convicted that their teaching is false.

Therefore, let it be your concern that you recognize this main article well and have it firmly established, and let no one among you be so presumptuous as to think that he has completely learned this divine wisdom. For as long as the devil and the world, as well as our reason, exist, we will never be perfect in this knowledge, and because we stand like men of war in the line of battle, dangers are daily thrust upon us, in which neither human strength nor wisdom is able to stand. Therefore, the summa of this verse, "For with thee is forgiveness," is that it concludes that God does not want to deal with us according to the law, so that we too, in turn, are not to deal with God according to the law, but to speak with the publican [Luc. 18, 13.]: "God, be merciful to me a sinner!" Those who go outside this enclosure of grace, leave this rich grace and want to argue about the law, that they have done this and not done that: the further they go, the deeper they sink into hell.

Not for nothing do I make this reminder. I see what happened to the excellent man Bernard; if you search his writings carefully, you will find that he teaches two things. For when he is at home in the faith, he teaches Christ very beautifully, praises his good deeds, sets hearts on fire to take hold of Christ: nothing but roses and honey come out of his mouth. Again, when he disputes from the law or about the law, he disputes no differently than any Turk or Jew who has heard Christ.

either does not know or denies. Whoever wants to read his disputations on the monastic life, on obedience to the abbots 2c., will see that I speak the truth. The same has happened to all other teachers. When they are alone, without disputations, they teach Christ purely; but as soon as they cross over into the field of the law, they dispute as if there had never been a Christ who had instituted the forgiveness of sins, even had purchased the same with his blood. We experience the same thing when we get caught up in legal things or in the statutes of men. Therefore, we must remain in this paradise or heaven of grace and not go anywhere else, so that we may remain with David on this simple confession: "With you is forgiveness."

But why does he add, "That you should be feared"? This is how the second part of this verse must be translated. Certainly, so that he shows us against whom he is fighting, and so that he makes the meaning all the clearer by adding the contrast, as if he wanted to say: By experience I have learned why forgiveness is with thee, and why thou dost give thyself this title, that thou art merciful and gracious [Ps. 103:8. For because thou gatherest all things together in mercy, by grace freely, and leavest nothing to human merit and works, therefore thou art feared. Now if all things were not in thy mercy, and we could take away sins with our powers, no one would fear thee, but the whole world would proudly despise thee. For this is testified by daily experience, that everywhere where this knowledge of God's mercy does not exist, people walk in presumption of their merits. Look at a monk, but especially at a barefooter (minoritam), - this kind I have always hated the most because of this hopefulness, - because he has a rule and a law by which he lives, he is without all right fear of God and walks in the highest security. Very few are those who come to the realization of their sin and feel despair. For those who feel despair are very happy to admit that forgiveness is with God. But they also pursue the doctrine of forgiveness with sword and fire.

law. For this is what the law does: it makes presumptuous, hopeful people and despisers of grace, as Paul shows very well with the Jews, Rom. 2, 17: "You are called a Jew, and rely on the law, and boast of God" 2c.

Those who are such people are not moved by the prestige of the apostles, not by Christ's miracle that raises the dead, but stand immovable like the rocks. For in such security they do not understand forgiveness, but even persecute it. Such people are therefore twofold worse sinners than the publicans, and rightly says Christ [Matt. 21:31.], "The publicans and harlots may well enter the kingdom of heaven sooner than you." For these are easily persuaded that they are sinners, and that they need forgiveness by grace for nothing; whereas Annas, Caiphas, and the other Pharisees laugh when they hear this, and cannot bear to be taught by anyone.

But as far as both are concerned, God has decided in the most just way that justice should be weighed, not according to our works, but simply according to mercy and the forgiveness of sins. For if righteousness came from works or from the law, despair would necessarily follow if one had not kept the law holy, or presumption if one had. In despair, however, fear is greater than it should be; in presumption there is no fear at all. The middle way, therefore, is that GOD includes everything in mercy. True, He does not abolish the law, for without the law this life cannot exist. For what kind of community would it be if murder, adultery and theft were allowed to go unpunished? Then also the godly practices and works must be governed by God's word. For this use, God lets the law remain, and accepts it as an obedience in those who believe. But as for sin itself, He commands that we lay aside all trust in the law and hope only in the mercy that God shows in Christ Jesus, who suffered for sins. Thus presumption is abolished, and the Leave fear, not as it is in desperate people, but as it can be found in well-bred children against their father. Therefore, no monk will be blessed because of his rule and hard life; neither will I be blessed because I preach Christ with the greatest fidelity and zeal; a prince will not be blessed because he presides over his own with care and protects his own. And in the case of the monks you can easily prove this to be true, because their whole state is without the word of God. But to teach the churches, to govern the commonwealths, though they are exceedingly holy and high works, yet they are works of the law, which in themselves produce either despair or presumption. Therefore, blessedness does not come through works, even if they exist, but only through the fact that forgiveness is with God, that one fears Him.

Therefore, God rightly decreed everything to be sinful, so that He might have mercy on all [Rom. 11:32, Gal. 3:22]. For if one leaves something to human nature by which it could earn something from God, then no one will fear God nor serve Him, but all will come to God like the monks, by bringing their fasts, prayers, obedience and the like. But in this way one loses GOtt, and instead of GOtt an idol of the heart is worshipped. For if a monk thinks that it pleases God to hang from a tree rather than to be girded with it, if he thinks that it pleases God to observe other human statutes, 1) is he not abandoning the true God and putting the thoughts of his heart in God's place, thinking that God thinks as he does? Therefore, from the righteousness of the law follows a true idolatry, which invents another God and loses the true one. For the true God is forgiveness through Christ; but the saints of works want their works to bring about forgiveness. God, therefore, rejects all works and holds out to us His mere mercy, so that He may be feared, so that He may not be despised by presumptuous people, since all cause of presumption has been taken away.

Therefore, we are to learn from this verse this principle that if the doctrine of the forgiveness of sins, grace or reconciliation is lost, it necessarily follows that idolatry reigns. For the prophet says that when grace is taken away, the fear of God is also taken away. But what is "fearing God" other than serving and worshipping God; likewise, acknowledging that He is good and obeying Him for His sake? I lost this God when I was a monk and walked in the confidence of my righteousness. For I can prove by deed and word that nothing else can follow from the most perfect justice of the law than either despair, which is rarer, or presumption, which is more frequent. For nature and the devil cannot avoid presumption.

How is it then, you will say, shall one not do the law? shall one not do good works? Certainly one should do them. For this reason God has established the church in the world, for this reason He has established the government of the world and the government of the home, so that there is no lack of opportunity to do good. But who does not see, even if he does this most diligently, how much impurity still remains, especially when he brings his deeds before God's face? Therefore, the main part of this whole business is attributed to mercy, which we take hold of through faith in Christ alone, and we, who are useless servants through our works, become children of God through the grace shown to us in Christ, John 1:12. Thus, the true fear of God, the right worship, the right reverence, yes, the right knowledge of God is based on mercy alone, so that we have the confidence that God is merciful for Christ's sake. With this service of God, despair and presumption fight more fiercely than fire and water fight with each other. Since the law causes either despair or presumption, it is rightly concluded that neither righteousness nor the right service of God comes through the law, and yet the holy ten commandments must be kept. For [Rom. 12, 8.]: "If a man rule, let him be careful"; if a man is a subject, let him obey. Here are ranks and persons who are quite unequal among themselves, as a prince, a teacher, a church servant, a councilman, a citizen, a servant, a maid, a father, a mother, children 2c. But every man in his state owes obedience to GOtte, that he do as much as he can with the greatest diligence. But because these are works of the law, by them we are only servants, and receive the promised reward according to the thing (ex pacto); but by forgiveness or grace we become children and heirs of the kingdom of God. Therefore, the works that follow do not make heirs or children, but they are done by the heirs and children to show their thanksgiving and obedience.

Therefore, I lay these conclusions on your heart, that where there is no forgiveness, there is no God; likewise, where God is not, there is no forgiveness; likewise, where there is no forgiveness, there is no godliness or worship, but idolatry and the righteousness of works remain. As long as the law and nature exist, this cannot be otherwise. Therefore, Pabstism, Mahomet's religion, Judaism, monasticism and everything of this kind, because it does not recognize or believe in forgiveness, is idolatry before God, even if it seems to be quite excellent in appearance, because apart from forgiveness there is no fear of God, but presumption. Christian doctrine, therefore, does not deny or condemn good works, as our adversaries impudently slander us among ignorant people, but teaches that God does not want to impute sin, but that he wants us to believe or trust in mercy, because with him there is forgiveness, that he may be feared, and that he may remain our God. All who therefore believe that God forgives and pardons sins for Christ's sake, render to God right and reasonable service [Rom. 12:1], do not dispute with God about the law, works and righteousness, but lay aside all their own trust and worship Him because of forgiveness, and thus become children who receive the Holy Spirit, and in truth begin to do the law. Now follows what David learned concerning this doctrine, and exhortations.

V. 5. I wait for the Lord, my soul waits, and I hope in His word. 1)

I cannot but accuse the [Latin] interpreter very much, whoever he may have been, that he has translated so carelessly, although those are to blame for these errors who have translated this book into the Greek language. In the previous verse, he has brought just the opposite sense and also confused the verse division. For what he has given: Propter legem tuam sustinui te, Domine, gives no sense at all, and actually belongs to this verse, for the verses must be so ordered: With thee is forgiveness, that they may fear thee (that is, that thou mayest remain GOD, and that that they may serve thee. For those who do not know God [in this way], that with Him is forgiveness, do not know God at all, nor can they worship Him properly). I wait for the Lord, my soul waits, I hope in His word. The verse has many words, but they are not idle. For this verse serves to strengthen the prayer and the exhortation and, as it were, to inject them. For first, he has presented himself as an example of this doctrine, which he desires to be preserved in the church, and has asked to be heard. Then, having received forgiveness, he felt that he had been heard. Now, therefore, he adds the exhortation by which he incites himself to persevere in this knowledge of grace, and never to be led away in any other way of teaching, as if to say: I know that forgiveness is with God; I have learned this main article to some extent; now I must do this, that I wait (expectem) (but "wait" means the same as "hope"), so that I remain in this knowledge, that I have the highest comfort in the forgiveness of which I have felt that it is with God, and constantly hold on to this hope of forgiveness.

But the prophet shows in this passage how easily hearts are led away from this knowledge and fall into disputations, whether public or particular. For when we were in the best course of establishing the right

1) Vulgate: kostillili to, Ooiune, siistillilit Lllima m6L, in vorpo chus sporavit amios mos.

We were prevented from spreading the doctrine first by the rebellious people, then by those who desecrated the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, and finally also by the Anabaptists. Since we are arguing with them, a more careful treatment of this article is almost lost to us. The same danger will befall our descendants, for it is not by teaching but by disputing that the truth is lost. For disputations bring with them the misfortune that the hearts are, as it were, desecrated and, occupied with quarrels, neglect what is most noble. Thus Eve stood quite nicely in paradise as long as she kept the commandment of the Lord. That is why the serpent brings her to another disputation about the forbidden fruit, and so she is led away from the word. Satan, of course, knows that this article of justification cannot be overturned even through the gates of hell. Therefore, what he does not dare to do in a straight way, he does in an indirect way. He starts disputations and blinds us; if we look at it and, with a godly heart, as it were, join in as arbiters to settle the disorder, we ourselves also become involved in the quarrels and are gradually distracted from this right goal (scopo). We must indeed fight against the heresies, but in such a way that we do not deal with them alone and forget this article. David shows this danger, since he points to his example as if he wanted to say: It costs great effort to remain in this teaching. Therefore I will take care of one thing, that I wait for the Lord, and I will take care that this knowledge is not snatched away from me.

That he adds: "My soul waiteth" is a Hebrew way of speaking, as we say in German: I will wait with all my heart. For it is a great thing that he not only says that he will wait for the Lord, but adds: I will wait with all my heart, to indicate the ardent zeal to keep this doctrine. But first of all one must pay attention to the fact that he adds: "I wait or hope for his word." The pope, the heretics,

The Jews also say that they hope, but they leave the word and follow their thoughts. This is a hope in name, but in fact it is nothing. For one must not depart from the oral word. For if this happens, what can one keep from God that would be certain? Especially since God gave the word for its own sake, for the sake of which he appointed servants of the word, authorities, parents, 2c., whose voice he commanded us to follow and whose reputation he commanded us to obey. For he does not want us to hope according to our thoughts, as the profane spirits taught even in our time, who thought that one must act with God without the oral word, without the sacraments, but he binds us to the word, which is commanded to certain ministers in the church.

But here the prophet indicates another temptation, which attacks those who are not careful to keep the knowledge of mercy. For this is the devil's way of dealing with it; he either takes away the word in general (publice), or in particular he hinders this hope in those who have the word. Thus the pope had the word, he also had the sacraments, and yet, while the word and the sacraments still stood, he allowed himself to be carried away on pilgrimages, rules, vows 2c. We have already thought about what we have encountered with the rotas. But who can enumerate the dangers with which the hearts in particular are daily troubled, that they should depart from the Word to other opinions which reason invents for itself without the Word? It takes so much effort to escape these tricks of the devil. Therefore the prophet says: I will not suffer myself to be led away from the word, but I will hope in the word for the forgiveness of sins, and I will not invent my faith from my thoughts, but take it from the word 2c. There is therefore a twofold danger against which the prophet warns us by his example. The first is with those who invent a faith, and lift up the word, like the spirits of the swarming. The second is with those who have the word but do not keep it and are led away to idolatry, like the papists. But the third is the most severe; against these he says:

V. 6. My soul waits for the Lord from one morning watch to the next.

This is the third challenge. For if the devil cannot conquer us by the straight way, that we either leave the oral word and follow our own thoughts, like the heretics, or keep the word and turn to idolatry, like the papists, he deals with overcoming us by fatigue. Therefore, not only great courage is needed to overcome, but also perseverance, so that we will not be overcome by his intrigues. For we often see that those are overcome by constant perseverance who could not be overcome by any dangers, no matter how great, and in warfare nothing is praised so much as to have stood against the enemy (urgere hostem). In this way the Turk nevertheless conquers, although he has often suffered great defeats, because he perseveres. David indicates that this perseverance must be with those who want to keep the doctrine of justification and righteousness itself, and here presents his example that just as the enemy does not cease to attack, so he does not cease to wait and look to the Lord, so that he overcomes not only by a strong and valiant, but also by a persevering faith and untiring hope.

Therefore, we must learn the way to fight from the attacks of our enemy. He never tires in his zeal to attack the church. Thus, at the very beginning, one heresy followed another, one persecution followed another. We, too, had to fight first with the abominations of the pope; after they had been subdued, the sacrament abusers arose, followed by the Anabaptists. These errors did not arise first, but the enemy, who is tireless and extremely well equipped to do harm with attacks, is stirring up anew the evil that was eliminated long ago, so that the afflicted church will not have time to breathe again. For we see how everything is beginning to become full of Epicureans, and there are not a few who are again bringing forward the seeds of the Arian heresy. It is of use to have these

Know the persistence of the enemy, so that we do not fall into security. For it is not enough to be victorious once, but one battle follows another, one victory follows another.

But just as we see this ungodly stopping of the enemy in the history of the church, we also experience it in our own person (privately). Therefore, if you have won today through prayer, do not be sure, because tomorrow he will return stronger and better equipped, therefore prepare yourself for another battle. For it often happens that a thought which we could easily defeat today, keeps the victory tomorrow and traps us. Therefore, a Christian must be equipped, not only with strength, but also with perseverance. For he does not run in a race track that has any end (terminus), but a circle is set before him, where one always runs back to the beginning. Therefore Christ says [Matth. 10, 22.]: "Whoever perseveres to the end will be blessed." Therefore, we must not allow ourselves to be broken by ungodliness or to be defeated by excess, but we must fight not only against power and cunning, but also against excess, that we may cheer ourselves up by this faith, that just as the devil neither sleeps nor rests, so also our Lord and God neither sleeps nor rests.

In this way David sets his example before us, so that we, fortified against the temptations that follow the forgiveness of sins, do not give way to the devil. Although it is quite certain that forgiveness is with the Lord, that sins are remitted, that we are baptized into the death of Christ and called to the fellowship of the saints, and refreshed with the rest of the members of Christ with the body and blood of Christ, although all this, I say, is quite certain, there is nevertheless great danger that we may be deceived by the cunning enemy who pursues us on every side. On the right he threatens us with hypocrisy and security, on the left with tyrants and despair. In addition, his ungodly zeal is such that he is nowhere far away. Therefore the prophet says: "My soul waits for the Lord from morning watch to morning watch", and this is the patience of the Christians. The saying of the pagans is well known: From one Patience that is often violated becomes anger. For when patience suffers something, it suffers out of a kind of despair, so that hearts think it is borne in vain; therefore patience turns into anger and is suppressed by despair. But the patience of Christians cannot be suppressed, but endures from day to day, from year to year, and so it finally triumphs and overcomes. It is a great thing to keep a heart in the worldly regime, which cannot be overcome by the daily troubles that occur, but to persevere in the evils which David shows by his example threaten Christians who already have the forgiveness of sins, To keep hope in sins and accusations of conscience, to endure other plagues with which the devil torments a believing heart without measure, this is a divine power and such a struggle to which the unfading crown of honors is promised [1 Petr. 5, 4.]. Now follows the exhortation to imitate this example and to take hold of this teaching.

v. 7. Israel hopes in the LORD, for with the LORD is grace, and much salvation with him.

This is truly a golden verse, and worthy to be known with the greatest care, because it desires and exhorts that the whole people, according to its example, rest and remain in the certain hope in the mercy of God. For faith is not to be as insignificant as the papists teach, who dream that faith is a quality that resides in the heart (haerentem), with which the heart deals, as it were, in sleep, after it has learned to say these syllables: I believe in God. For those who never experience the struggles that faith has to go through even ridicule us when we say that faith is the chief virtue by which alone we are justified, freed from sins 2c. For it is true what the wise man said [Proverbs 18:2], "A fool delighteth not in understanding, but in what is in his heart." Therefore, what we attach to faith, they attach to love, preferring the same to faith. But if one

If faith is painted correctly and with its true colors, it surpasses love by far. For look at what faith has to deal with (objecta). In front of God, it fights against the devil alone, who never lets up, but always attacks, because of death and eternal life, because of sin and the law, which accuses us, because of grace, which forgives sins. If one compares love with these things, which has to do with relieving people of their misfortunes, whether it is comfort or help that is needed, who does not see that faith is far superior? For how great is the difference between God and man, between human needs and eternal death? These, then, are the exercises of faith, that it may fight with the devil in the highest dangers before God's face, for, as we said above, the godless enemy leaves us no peace (ferias). Therefore, although love is not only a beautiful virtue, but also an exceedingly broad one compared to the other moral virtues, faith is infinitely greater and more sublime, whether we consider the things it has to do with or other causes.

For this is the fruit of faith, that the heart feels that death has been overcome through the death of Christ, but sin has been atoned for and the law has been done away with through grace and forgiveness. This is quite certain in itself, but our weakness is so great that we cannot grasp it with certainty; therefore we are still frightened by thoughts of death and sin. Now if this trust in the grace of God were perfect, no sadness could ever take hold of a believing heart. Therefore, David uses this exhortation that Israel, having forgiveness, may persevere in waiting and not be deprived of trust in mercy. The word he uses actually means "to wait". But he is looking at the struggle when the heart begins to doubt God's mercy because of certain hardships by which it is affected. In this struggle, hearts fall into despair because what the Word promises and faith believes is not immediately felt in such a way. Against this challenge

Here he reminds them to be mindful that one must wait; one should not depart from the word or do anything contrary to the word, and he adds the reason: "For with the Lord is grace." The flesh holds in temptation and in dangers that with God there is nothing but wrath. Therefore, the Spirit comforts us and strives to take away this ungodly opinion of God, proclaiming that with God there is mercy or kindness, if only we do this, that we wait. But we need this testimony, for if we follow our feelings, we will experience the opposite. But we must not make our judgment according to our feelings, nor according to what is presently there, but we must follow the word, and firmly hold that these things are to be believed, not experienced. For believing is not experiencing; not as if what we believe should never be experienced, but experience must be preceded by faith, and the word must be believed, even when we feel and experience it quite differently, so that when hearts in distress think that God is angry with us, does not take care of us, but hates us, faith, on the other hand, firmly holds that, that with God there is neither anger, nor hatred, nor punishment, nor guilt, but, although he allows us to be afflicted, that this does not happen to do us any harm, for with him there is [grace], and he is intent on pure goodness, that he saves us from misfortune, that he kills sins, that he increases other gifts in us 2c. If this does not happen to the wicked, what is there to wonder? For either they believe not at all, or if they believe, they persevere not. Therefore, we who believe should add hope to faith, so that even if we feel and experience the opposite, and it seems as if God were inflicting punishments on us like an enemy, we nevertheless believe no experience more than the Word and the Holy Spirit, which proclaims that with God there is grace or kindness, that He loves us, and desires to do us good.

This is 1) the truth of the Holy Spirit, that we think, yes, most assuredly, that there is no wrath with God, but that even if some outward troubles occur, hunger, sickness, heartache and such distresses, we overcome these challenges by faith and hope, by showing God our patience, and hope for salvation in due time, as Paul commands in the letter to the Romans, that we should also boast about the tribulations [Rom. 5, 3]. For if God did not love us, the devil would not hate us; if we did not have life, our enemy would not pursue us with death. Thus, Satan most assails those who are most righteous and holy, because they hold fast the confidence of the forgiveness of sins, with an evil conscience on account of sins, to such an extent that he sometimes makes such a sin out of the drinking of a cup of wine, out of a word that has escaped unawares, that he thereby takes out of sight baptism and all the gifts that we possess. Yes, he often slanders good and holy works in order to plunge the heart into sadness. All this, I say, the saints experience. But how long would we go astray if we always put the word second and followed our feelings and experience? The devil does not do this to the papists, but does the opposite: he adorns their horrible atrocities and atrocious crimes as if they were the highest godliness. On the other hand, we who desire and strive to live according to God's will, who also teach in the holiest way, must often have such a conscience as if we had led an extremely evil life.

Therefore, we must learn in theology that this happens to the godly and must be overcome by the thoughts that the Holy Spirit holds up here, that we should think of ourselves in this way: I am called to fellowship in the merit of Christ, and am baptized. Although this daily life has sins, they are to be taken away through trust in forgiveness. The doctrine cannot be other than true, although the world slandered it and heaped abuse upon it. This doctrine shows that after we have believed in Christ, we are to be forgiven.

1) Erlanger: et instead of: 68t.

I do not want to be deprived of this knowledge, even if I have to die over it, but I firmly believe that God is nothing other than XXX or goodness, that God cannot do anything else but love and do good. Even if, according to my feelings, the opposite seems to be true, I do not worry about it, and I do not want to be deprived of this knowledge, even if I would have to die over it, but I firmly believe that on earth and in heaven there is nothing but pure goodness. But this I conclude, not from a feeling or from what is presently present, but from the word which says that with the Lord there is grace upon me and upon all who believe, but upon those who do not believe comes his wrath. Therefore I will overcome my thoughts by the word, and write this promise in my heart, that having believed in Christ Jesus, and not doubting that my sins are forgiven me by his blood, I shall not be put to shame, though all my senses and experience hold it out to me and prove otherwise. I feel the wrath of God, the hatred of the devil, the extreme anger of the world, but the Holy Spirit does not lie, who commands to hope, because "there is grace with the Lord, and much salvation with him.

"Redemption" (redemptio) means deliverance, and a general one, both from guilt and from punishment, though most of all from guilt. Of this [redemption] he says that it is great and much, because our heart is so narrow. For when we ask for redemption, we pray in such a way that we think we want to be satisfied with very little. Thus, those who are afflicted with sadness of heart wish to have only one day's rest; those who are oppressed by lack think that they want to be satisfied with daily bread. But GÖtze is not enough, for he gives above all that we can understand or ask [Eph. 3, 20.], and it is quite true that we do not know how or what to pray [Rom. 8, 26.]. I like to use my own experience. For what and how much hath he done in me, who am a certain man! I wish no more than that this one abuse of indulgences might be remedied. But what a flood of wonderful and exceedingly great benefits has followed! So it is also generally true, that no one dares to desire as much as God is willing to give. The cause of this is the faintheartedness (angustia) of our heart, the small measure of our hope and the weakness of our faith. 1) Thus, the rich redemption is infinitely beyond our asking. Therefore, the Lord has also provided a way to pray. For if it were not so prescribed by Christ, who of us would have dared to ask so many and so great things? Therefore, through the merit of Christ, we are not only made victors over sin, hell and death, but we also feel the goodness of God manifold in this life, and even though we would never have dared to ask for something so great, the Lord has nevertheless given it to us, and will give us other things as well.

Therefore, the prophet says that "much salvation" fei, which is beyond our comprehension. For as we believe very little (exiliter), so we ask very little. But the Father in heaven sends an abundant rain on the little specks of our prayer and the little drops of our faith, and makes up for the delay with a great abundance. For though we must wait, yet afterward salvation is all the more abundant. Jacob, who is Israel, waited for the Lord, and what came of it? That people transformed almost the whole world by growing from such small beginnings. Or do you not think that if Abraham had seen all his descendants and the great miraculous deeds, he would have said that he could never have hoped for this in his heart? He believed God, who gave him the promise, but he could not believe such a wonderful and glorious figure of his descendants, because of the faintheartedness of the human heart. Thus, after the time of Christ, the Church prayed for the Kingdom of God; this prayer was followed by the fall of the Roman Empire, which, it seemed, was insurmountable. Nowadays we also pray for salvation; therefore, the day of the Lord will come and destroy the whole world with all the power of the devil and hell. Therefore, we should only take care of it, that we persevere in hope and faith, then the Lord will prepare a glorious exit from all dangers. For God will not leave us if we have not first stopped hoping and praying.

1) The preceding, as far as Luther speaks of his own experience, has been omitted by the old translator, Georg Major.

Therefore, Christians should hold on to this comfort that the oppression is never as great as the salvation will be. Those who think otherwise, do not think correctly. For this is the summa of the first commandment, that he says here, "With GOtt is much redemption." For this means in truth, to be GOD, that He redeems and saves, and that with greater glory and splendor than a human heart can think.

V. 8. And he will redeem Israel from all their sins.

This promise is the conclusion of the psalm, in which he again shows what cause he has to pray, and what we should hope for in similar danger. But it is exceedingly sweet to see the goodness of God, not only in that he gives, governs and sustains this life, but much more in that he shows that he is an enemy of sin and death, and has to do with redeeming us from these and making us blessed. For this is what makes the other gifts of God acceptable. For even though we know that we are God's creatures, we still cannot enjoy God's gifts with joyful courage, because of sadness, fear of death, an evil conscience, and other such evils. That is, to paint God with His proper colors, so that this life and all creatures will become pleasant to us, when He is painted according to this verse, that He wants to redeem His people from sins, that He wants to kill death, destroy hell and trample Satan. Such a God is the God of the faithful; of the faithful I say for the sake of those who deny and despise Him. For even though those who believe are fainthearted and afflicted from the devil and from death, they know that God is their Redeemer, who redeems them from all sins. Therefore, they straighten up and hope, and wait for the redemption that is promised to them in the Word.

Therefore, you may use this verse to serve as a description of what God's office is, or what He actually wants to do, namely, that He wants to deal with sinners so that He may take away sins and bring about life, righteousness, joy and all good things. But you know that the means by which God does this is Christ, whom He sent into this world for this reason and subjected to the death penalty, so that those who believe in Him might receive forgiveness of sins and be made children of God.

Thus, the whole Psalm does not teach about outward life or good works, but only about faith and hope in God through Christ and about the final victory against the devil, sin and death. For this is not in human works or in our powers, but it is God's work and power, but it is imparted to us because there is grace with the Lord and much salvation with Him. This is the only cause and the only way to reach this victory. The doctrine of works has another purpose, and it must be insisted upon in such a way that nevertheless nothing is taken away from the honor and merit of Christ, as by God's grace we have everywhere rightly treated this doctrine. But may Christ grant that the same light may also shine to our descendants. Amen. 1)

1) In the Wittenberg and in the Jena it is found here: "1533. usus" oetodri." According to the title of the edition of this Psalm together with the 51st Psalm (Lrl. 6xe]. opp., tom. XIX, p. 1), this information is to be understood in such a way that Luther finished the interpretation of the 130th Psalm on October 1, 1533. There it says: I?iniit VnnttonbsrMs prima oetodris, Ximo 1533.

The one hundred and thirty-first Psalm.

Lord, my heart is not hopeful.

This psalm speaks of almost the same subject as the previous psalm, except that it expresses a little more clearly the contrast by which it shows that the heart is depressed by the feeling of sin. Hence it has become a proverb among theologians in the general saying: "To walk in great things that are too high for one," that is, as one usually speaks: to fly too high, to undertake something that exceeds one's strength, and thus to put oneself in danger. Thus, in general, according to a not improper inauthentic use (catachresi), or rather according to the [just mentioned] general saying, this psalm has been used against all hopefulness, the common fault of the human race in which we all are; and this can be removed by no other remedy than either by divine grace, or by God's wrath or anger, that is, when the godly are afflicted either with afflictions, or the godless with punishments. In this way, presumption, the vice inherent in all men by nature, is cured. Otherwise, it is impossible that a man should not be presumptuous, either of his power, or his wisdom, or his justice.

This hopefulness then gives birth to strife and quarrels, as we see, concerning the glory of the spiritual gifts (ingenii); in how many ways do men chase after this glory! Not only do they want to be considered wiser and more learned than their contemporaries, but they also direct their attacks on the earlier times and, as they say, gouge out the eyes of the crows. 1) What do you think will become of it, if such spirits then set about the sacred things? In such a way the hearts will be heard by power, that they will

They do not keep any measure in their hopeful suggestions and thoughts. The same happened when the Pharisees and the hypocrites (for these are the ones to whom this is really attached) had caught the delusion of their own holiness and righteousness. In short, hopeful and presumptuous people, as they say, are destroyers, not only of themselves, but also of the world regime, of the church, of domestic life and of all things. Those who know the histories see how much misfortune ambitious people have always caused. Thus, in the church, the heretics, incited by the conviction of their own wisdom, are the destroyers of harmony and peace. The same thing happens in the home; hence the fine and good saying in German, in which they say: let the fall evil befall him who does it better than he can. 2)

But, dear, who are these people? All the world. For who is content with his gift, and does not sometimes presume to do something better and more accurately than he can? Hence follows the third, that as presumption abolishes peace and harmony, but gives birth to strife and strife, as a fruitful mother, so at last it follows with necessity that all is vain, and ungodly efforts are in vain. Wouldn't our neighbor, Duke [George], have enough to do with ruling his country and carrying out the work of his profession? But the presumption does not let him rest, that he also submits to governing the church, which he is not commanded to do. Thus, those who first caused us the unrest concerning the sacraments were not satisfied with the ministry in their churches; they also arrogated to themselves, as it were, dominion over the whole of the sacred Scriptures, so that they thought that it was theirs to govern them according to

1) Oorninum oeuolo8 eonÜMrs actually means: to outsmart clever people; here as much as: to want to be better than the best.

2) IVlalo äiZnum 6886, yni nonatur, yuoü non pvt68t pra68tar6 he is worthy of misfortune, who subjects himself to what he cannot perform. For our translation, compare Walch, old edition, vol. V, 1218, s24.

to interpret their will, and, as Basil speaks, τὴν ἀλήθειαν παρασύρειν [the truth. to drag aside].

This is how far this vice extends, and it is, as I have said, completely incurable unless it is cured either by the grace of God or by His wrath. Grace is when we are brought back to moderation or humility through tribulations; wrath is when the Lord showers punishment on the hopeful and takes them away as he took away Pharaoh. Pharaoh's obstinacy and stubbornness could not be cured in any other way than by sinking in the Red Sea. So the children of Benjamin did not cease their raging until they were almost destroyed [Judges 20:46 ff]. Absalom did not stop until he hung on a tree [2 Sam. 18, 9]. Thus Arius, Cerinth, and many innovators of doctrine in our time did not cease until they found the destruction of which their deeds were worthy. Thus it happens that when the wicked, like a mad horse, have begun their course out of arrogance, they do not stand still until they have perished. The same happens to the saints of works. The Pharisees did not stop pursuing the gospel and relying on their righteousness until Jerusalem, the kingdom and the priesthood were destroyed from the bottom up. This is the end of presumption, unless it is stopped by the Word. Therefore, it is true that this plague cannot be cured in any other way than either by grace or by wrath.

In this way, almost everyone interprets this Psalm in a general way against hopefulness or presumption, but I believe that it can be more correctly interpreted by spiritual pride or the hopefulness of righteousness. For, as I have shown above, these three things, namely power, wisdom, and righteousness, generally make people hopeful. Therefore, if any man will, let him make a threefold hope according to these three objects. For the gifts are distributed among men and have their measure and manner. Therefore the mighty are mighty according to their measure and cannot be mightier; the wise are wise according to their measure and cannot be wiser; the righteous are wise according to their measure and cannot be wiser.

They are righteous to a great extent and cannot be more righteous. But arrogance makes them want to be and seem more powerful, wiser and more just than they really are. Therefore, when the matter comes to dispute, and sin fights with righteousness, which does not remain in its gift, way and measure, the latter is defeated, and righteousness becomes despair, which often drives the hypocrites to take up the rope. Thus it happens that weakness struggles with power and conquers, but power is put to shame, as happened to the Israelites when they fought against the one tribe of Benjamin [Judges 20:21, 25].

What is the cause of this unexpected outcome? Of course, it is because people do not trust in the Lord, but are presumptuous in their own righteousness, power and wisdom, contrary to the word and will of God. For God wants us to trust only in His power and mercy, but people do not want this, and think that they are powerful, just and wise for this reason, so that they trust in these things and are presumptuous because of them. They are therefore justified in coming to grief. For why do they not do what they are able, and do what they are not able? Therefore they are worthy of their misfortune, as the German proverb says, because they undertake what they cannot accomplish. Therefore, let us remain humble and temperate in our gifts; let us not judge others or oppress them; let us not focus our attention on the work of others, but let us each do for ourselves what is our calling, and resist this vice all the more carefully, the deeper it is in the nature of all of us, although it is more evident in some and less in others, as the histories of the pagans also show. Cicero is more ambitious than Demosthenes, perhaps because he lived in a larger empire and in an exceedingly powerful monarchy. Julius Caesar is more ambitious than Augustus. So it goes also in the sacred history: Pharaoh connected the stubbornness with the hopefulness. But all the examples of the holy scriptures as well as of the pagan histories show the same outcome.

and end, namely, that they fall into misfortune contrary to their expectations, become disgraced and perish. But, as I have said, let us leave this general view and interpret this psalm from the spiritual hope that stands in the delusion of its own wisdom and righteousness.

V. 1. O Lord, my heart is not hopeful, neither are mine eyes proud, neither walk thou in great things that are too high for me.

That David boasts here, he does as one who is instructed by experience, as if he wanted to say: I have come to realize how great an evil it is to be exalted in heart and secure in righteousness, therefore I will no longer be proud, no longer boast of my own righteousness. For the haughty Pharisee, who boasts that he is not like other people, falls at the first word of conscience that accuses him, and becomes lifeless with terror; he cannot even stand against the slightest sin, let alone the mountains and seas of sins that destroy the presumptuous and secure people in an instant. Therefore it is good, he says [Ps. 119, 71.], that thou hast humbled me, and hast instructed me through tribulations, lest I should be hopeful, lest I should think myself holy, lest I should raise myself up to be an avenger (executorem) of righteousness, judging and condemning all. For this is peculiar to all saints of works, that they judge others, and make themselves, as it were, the executioners of others, as is shown by the example of the Pharisee in the Gospel [Luc. 18, 11. f.], who cannot be content with simply remembering his virtues, but at the same time condemns the poor publican. This is the very real sin of natural, legal and civil justice, that it condemns others, that it interferes with God's judicial office and passes judgment against those of whom it sees 1) that they are, as it were, on a lower level. Whoever is a good citizen, whoever is a well-learned lawyer, admires himself, and all that is lacking is that he makes himself a kind of idol for himself; but he judges others and despises them in comparison with himself. If a peasant, who is not entirely stupid, finds any fault in

1) Erlanger: viäss instead of: viäst.

of his authority, he thinks like the servant in the comedy [of Terence] who rebuked his master's stinginess: O, I should have been king!

These civil things are full of vanity and the greatest folly, which nevertheless no one can abstain from, unless the Holy Spirit guides and governs the hearts, and teaches us that this righteousness, whether it be natural or moral, is like a kind of handicraft, through which we are no better before God. And, of course, no one is so foolish that he should consider himself a better Christian and more pleasing before God because he is a tailor, a cobbler, a potter, a blacksmith 2c. But, although it is quite the same with righteousness, whether it be moral or natural, there is no one who should not be presumptuous because of it, unless the Holy Spirit brings him back to the right way. For it has a semblance of holiness; hence hearts are puffed up until they are humbled and learn that in this righteousness there is nothing on which they can rely before the judgment of God. How often have we seen that great theologians, who walked among men in a great pride, finally, when they were close to death, in a kind of despair took refuge in the greatest folly and put on a monk's cap! Thus I remember that a great man who had a famous name among the jurists, as he was dying, said: O, if only I had been a swineherd rather than a jurist! For he felt that in this emergency even the careful handling of justice could not help. This is how it was with Cicero. When he realized that he was in danger because of the power of Augustus and Antonius, he realized that all his science could not help him, but all his erudition and the immense diligence he had spent on philosophy vanished like nothing. The same happened to Demosthenes when he fled from Antipater. In short, all such examples teach that what Solomon says [Proverbs 17:19] is true: "He who makes his house 2) high runs after misfortune."

2) Instead of ostium in the Vulgate and "Thür" in the German Bible, Luther put äomum here.

But our courtiers do not believe this. They complain that the scribes (for that is what they call learned people) are used for the business of the princes, but the nobility is neglected. But when they are called upon to do business, they manage it in such a way that it is like a wagon that has sunk into deep mud and can be moved neither backward nor forward. It serves them right. For why do they subject themselves to what they cannot accomplish? This is the cause that in general the rulers (imperia) are nothing but destruction and murder. Who is he that looks closely at the government that was under the first [Roman] emperors, and should think that the Roman empire could have lasted even one day? For, as Livius says, it seemed neither to be able to bear its infirmities nor its remedies, but simply to collapse through its mass, like an all-too-high building.

But there is far more danger when men are proud-eyed in religion and walk in great things that are too high for them, that is, when they please themselves because of their holiness and think they are sitting in the bosom of God, and yet know nothing of the atonement and of the forgiveness of sins, but walk in their works par excellence, that they fast twice a week, that they tithe, that they are not adulterers, robbers 2c. although their hearts are full of every kind of shameful desire. This presumption remains until the danger of death masters it. Then all those aids fall away from the hands, and the words of despair follow: I have lived shamefully, I have not kept our vows, I have not kept our rule 2c. Why then did you become a monk? Was it not so that you might ascend to righteousness? But so you descended to hell because you wanted to exalt yourself. Now those who are not exercised by such temptations die like cows.

v. 2. If I did not sit down and nurse my soul, my soul was weaned, as one is weaned from his mother.

Here he speaks clearly of his experience, that he had seen how great a danger

If anyone is presumptuous about his righteousness, it is in this. Therefore we are to learn what it is that the epistle to the Hebrews [Cap. 12, 1.] αμαρτιαν εὑπερίστατο[^], which everywhere gives us and not follow the iniquity of the great multitude, who, if they have not heard many sermons, think that they have learned the whole gospel sufficiently. Perhaps you have heard it in full, but you have not yet believed it in full, you have not yet had the experiences of faith, of prayer, of the cross, which are the noblest for a Christian, of which David preaches here very earnestly, as the greatness of things and the movement of the heart require. He says, I have stilled my soul, and sat me down; I have said unto my soul, Be still, boast not, but be silent. For that he says, "I have quieted," or, as the Hebrew phrase is, "I have made silent," really means to make to nothing, as in Hosea [Cap. 4, 5. Vulg.], "At night I have made silent," that is, I have made desolate and solitary, that there no noise nor sound should be heard. So it is said in another Psalm [Ps. 46, 11.], "Be still," that is, do not provoke the Lord by your stubbornness and hopefulness, but be obedient, obey 2c. So also here: If I did not make my soul silent, that is, if I did not humble myself, if I did not abstain from presumption and trust in my own righteousness, in the righteousness of the law, even in God, whom I had served through the law; if I did not humble myself and confess that, though I had kept the law to some extent, yet I wished that the Lord would not enter into judgment with his servant; I say, if I did not do this, then I was in truth like one weaned.

The prophet speaks of an exceedingly great thing, and yet the likeness seems to indicate something small and quite insignificant. For why does he prefer to take the simile from a small child rather than from a man who already has his full powers? But this image is not only a very suitable one, but also extraordinarily lovely. For what danger, what harm could befall a child that would be greater than if it were to fall to its mother's breast?

would be deprived? This seems to be, as it were, a verdict of condemnation and death for the child. Thus, he says, when I was seized by the spirit of hope and security and lost the mother's breast of divine grace, forgiveness of sins and reconciliation, I was in truth like a child who has lost its mother and cannot live without the good deed of the mother, that is, I was in the very certain and extreme danger of death.

Therefore, the prophet directs us here to the necessary difference between the law and the gospel. For the law is the doctrine that is necessary to break that hope and the rebellious wickedness of our sin, which (quam) gives birth to the presumption of our righteousness. There is indeed, as I said above, a presumption of riches, power and wisdom, but this can be countenanced in many ways. But this, which is presumptuous because of one's own righteousness, is quite incurable, and cannot be lifted unless this weaning comes, of which David speaks here, that the conscience, awakened by the law, should examine our life and our works. But because we must confess that we have sinned against the law in many ways, evident despair follows unless Christ, like a kind mother, gives us the mother's breast of grace and restores the afflicted soul. Thus Judas, by the sight of his sin, is made to confess himself [Matt. 27:5, 1. For there is no means by which a conscience troubled by its sins can be healed but this one thing, that we may firmly stand for it, as the preceding Psalm sings, that with God there is grace and much salvation [Ps. 130:7]. This is the voice of the gospel, which must follow the law, and for which the way is paved by the law. For just as our sins require punishment and accusation, so the fright which accusation produces requires consolation. Therefore, the right consolation and the right reconciliation, which are presented to us in the Gospel, belong to the right sins, which sink into hell when they are committed.

not be healed by the confidence in the mercy of God, which is presented to us in Christ. For mercy is not for imaginary sins, but for true sins that kill and condemn.

We must be careful of this change, so that when we boast and are sure of our own righteousness, the law comes and Moses with his horns or his shining face, which cannot bear our weakness, and yet cannot escape it or avoid it. But after the law and Moses have thus performed their office with accusations of conscience and threats of God's judgment and punishments, then it is in place and the most opportune time for Christ to come with the mother's breast of grace and to refresh the weaned child who desires milk and cries out. It is therefore a fine similitude, which first of all shows us our weakness, that in us there are no powers at all with which we can resist the devil and heal our conscience; then the mercy of God and the power of his word, through which he nourishes her child with milk like a mother and drives away the tears. Thus, the gospel is also the womb of God, in which we are carried and formed by the Spirit of Christ; it is also the mother's breast, through which we are nourished. Therefore, if this is lost, we are like the weaned.

Some think that they understand this well, but beware of this presumption and count yourselves among the number of disciples. For the devil is such an artist of thousands that he can easily abolish this distinction, and substitute the law for the gospel, and again the gospel for the law. For how often does it happen to those who are in the throes of death that their poor consciences take hold of some sayings of the gospel that in truth belong to the law, and through them lose the comfort of the gospel! Such is this saying [Matth. 19, 17]: "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments of God." Likewise this [Matth. 7, 21.]: "Not all who say to me, Lord, Lord, will enter the kingdom of heaven." By such sayings the minds are sometimes so shattered that they see nothing but what they have done and what they should have done, what God demands and what He forbids. When the hearts look at this, they forget all the things that Christ has done and that God has promised to accomplish through Christ. Therefore, let no one presume that he has fully attained this; in word this distinction is easy, but in death and danger we learn how little good dialecticians we are, namely, when the dispute arises as to what we have done and what we ought to have done, when the law reproaches us: The Lord commanded you to do this, but you did not do it, but did the opposite; therefore you will be condemned according to the judgment of the Lawgiver [Deut. 27:26]. He who is a good dialectician here distinguishes between the law and the gospel, and admits that he has not done the law, but he says: "From this proposition it does not follow that for its sake I should despair and be damned. For the gospel commands me to believe in Christ and to base myself on Christ's works and righteousness. Whoever thus holds the difference, and grasps this mother's breast of the gospel, is saved and overcomes; whoever does not grasp it, perishes and despairs.

Therefore, in this doctrine of righteousness before God, there is very great danger; therefore, one should not be presumptuous, but act with fear in humility. For if presumption in worldly things, where hearts are puffed up by confidence in wealth, or power, or wisdom, never goes off without danger, it is by far most dangerous in theology, and yet it is there that it is found most. For the devil comes to the children of God and endeavors with all diligence to seduce them into presumption and security. Therefore, one must fight daily against this hidden plague, and be especially careful not to please oneself, as if one had well grasped the difference between the Law and the Gospel. You may have it, but see to it that you hold it fast, so that it may be taken away from you.

It cannot be snatched from the conscience and from the devil. Paul at least freely confesses [Phil. 3, 12. ff.] that he has not yet grasped it, but that he is pursuing this knowledge, as it were as a goal in the race course. We are all like this; we turn our faces to the goal, and are anxious to reach it, but this does not happen until the flesh is drawn out and buried. In the meantime, therefore, let us walk in fear, praying that the Lord may not put out the light which he has shown us, but may daily enlighten our hearts more, and accomplish the work which he has begun in us [Phil. 1:6]. Those who do not do this will fall into despair and become like the weaned.

V. 3. Israel, hope in the Lord from now until forever.

This verse clearly shows that this psalm speaks of presumption, which is actually against faith and is called presumption of one's own righteousness. Therefore, he exhorts them to trust in the Lord and learn to be steadfast in humility, and to put to death the trust that is based on the support of the law and their own worthiness. This, he says, will happen when you trust and hope in the Lord, not only today or tomorrow, but from now until eternity, that this is a kind of eternal presumption (to speak so) on the mercy of God, the forgiveness of sins and the righteousness that is given to us through Christ; on the other hand, never be presumptuous, not even for a moment, because of your works, even though they should be holy and conformed to the law of God. For this is to remain the sole and entire (nudissima nuda) trust, which is called the trust and hope in the mercy of God shown in Christ. This trust is reliable. For God does not lie, but faithfully keeps what He has promised; you should only trust in Him constantly and faithfully. But here is danger from the devil, who strives with all his might to dissuade us from this firm trust. Therefore, we must fight, and practice this doctrine in daily conflict against the devil and evil spirits.

-which do and intend nothing else than to first pull us up to presumption, but then again to plunge us down into despair.

On the other hand, God first terrifies us with His law and brings us down, so that He may raise us up; He leads us into hell, so that He may bring us out again [1 Sam. 2, 6. He also sometimes withdraws the mother's breast of grace even from the righteous, so that we may learn what our own righteousness tends to do, namely, that it tends to bring us down through despair, so that, having experienced this, we do not follow our feelings, but raise ourselves up by trusting in Christ, through whom the dead are made alive and saved.

will be. This mercy is like the sky, which always remains fixed over us; if we are covered by it, we are safe wherever we may be. Thus Isaiah calls [Cap. 4, 6J that we are covered by the mercy of the Lord against wrath, despair, the devil and death. Those who leave this shade will suffer unbearable heat. In this way, this verse teaches that David is speaking of the damnable presumption of one's own righteousness, and he exhorts that one should fight against it by the hope of eternal mercy and by eternal faith. This is the only way in which we are preserved.

The one hundred and thirty-second Psalm.

Remember, O Lord, David.

This psalm, whether it was written by Solomon, as some think, or by David, is a prayer for the kingdom and the priesthood. For these are the two most noble gifts in this life and in this world. Therefore they need the prayer and help of God to defend them against the devil, whose twofold title you know, which Christ attaches to him in the Gospel of John [Cap. 8, 44], where he calls him a liar and a murderer. For he does not rest, but tries and undertakes everything to involve the world in lies and murder. Against these cunning plots and kingdoms of the devil, God has set up two other kingdoms, for so they may be called, the worldly regiment and the church, or the kingdom and the priesthood, so that the worldly regiment may fight against murder, and the priesthood against the lying teachings. Thus David and all princes must work in the administration of the worldly regiment so that their subjects can lead a peaceful life, so that marriages, the education of children and other domestic offices can exist in peace and can be defended against the Rebels and the lust of men. The priesthood, however, serves to lead the growing youth to the kingdom of heaven, and the ministers of the church, like the angels, are appointed to defend the truth, so that the devil's kingdom, the father of lies, may be destroyed. This is the real ministry of the priests, who have always been present in the world among the faithful, waging a constant war against the heretics.

Thus the patriarchs had to fight against the Cainites before the flood, against the children of Esau and others after the flood; the prophets waged war against the false prophets, as their sermons testify, the apostles against the false apostles. For Satan does not desist. Furthermore, the kingdom of the devil was always the greater, because if you look at the church, there were always more unbelievers than believers. Thus, in the worldly regime, the portion of those who disobey, who stir up unrest and wars, is greater than those who do their duty and are obedient. Therefore, since the devil's kingdom is far greater in number, then

Both the secular government and the priesthood are things that are far beyond human strength and therefore cannot be defended and preserved with our strength, it is obvious how necessary this prayer is, in which David asks that both may prosper and be preserved.

And here first see the difference between the king David and other kings of the world. Others find and see this also, that human communities cannot be maintained by force. Therefore they have said that he must have a special divine inspiration who wants to rule well and blissfully, and although they did not know that this is directed by God, they nevertheless preferred happiness (for that is what they called the blessing whose cause they did not know) to wisdom, power, justice and all rulers' virtues. For since just men are generally oppressed, but the unjust have dominion, they judged that justice is not the noblest cause that sustains empires. Otherwise Cicero would not have been defeated, but Antony would not have been raised to such great power. But if the empires were preserved by power, Themistocles would not have defeated Leres. Thus, many famous rulers did not lack wisdom and diligence, and yet they were unfortunate. These experiences also led the pagans to attach to the great rulers a deity who should govern wisdom, power and justice, and this they called happiness.

But now look at David here. He also sees that it is not in his power to preserve the kingdom, but he does not believe that it is luck that preserves the kingdoms, for he judges that God is the cause. Then he firmly holds, as we shall hear, that God, for the sake of His mercy, will not abandon those who pray to Him. The pagans know neither. Furthermore, the same distress that lies on the neck of the authorities, that one must pray for the temporal government, lies also on the church, so that one must pray for the church. The apostle John could not prevent the rise of Cerinth; in later lines, the Church could not prevent Arius, Sabellius, Nova tus and other heretics rose. Today, we have not been able to prevent the emergence of the abusers of Holy Communion, Baptism 2c. We have taught the congregations with all diligence and have not lacked anything that belongs to our ministry, but that was not enough. What must we do? Certainly what this psalm says, that we say, "Remember, O Lord, David," that your name may be sanctified, that these abominable desecrators may receive their punishment for disturbing the peace and the church 2c.

In this way, the Psalm is a prayer for the ancient people that God would preserve the kingdom and the priesthood for the sake of the promises made to David. But it is also useful for us, because we also have our David and an Ephrata, in which we find the dwelling place of our God; for the matter remains the same, only the meaning of the words must be changed. But as they [the people of old] stood in danger in both things, so we also stand in danger. Therefore, we rightly sing with one another this "Remember". Furthermore, I will simply follow the sense of the letter as the Psalm was prayed by the people of the Old Testament. For afterwards it is easy to apply it also to our times. As the kingdom was twofold, a physical and a spiritual kingdom, so also the psalm is divided into two parts. First, it prays for the church, then for the world government.

V. 1. Remember, O Lord, David, and all his sufferings.

The word 1) means tribulation, humiliation, oppression. Jerome translates it almost everywhere by meekness, but the circumstances prove that he is speaking of David, who suffered much because of the divine promise. For as the history of the kings shows, Saul pursues him with inhuman hatred. But why? Because he was anointed king by Samuel while Saul was still alive. Hence those persecutions, hatred, envy, reviling and all kinds of dangers came upon him. But that either his son Solomon or the whole people remembered these things in prayer and before God did not happen in the way the papists think that David intercedes for them as their intercessor, but they speak of David, who has the promises, and remind God of those promises through David, just as Paul also speaks of Abraham. Therefore, the name of David is not to be taken in and of itself (absolute), as if it speaks only of his person. For he does not speak of David as such, but in relation to something, that is, to the promissory David, that I say so, or to the one who has the promise and is clothed with the divine promises, so that one must understand the form rather than the matter. For teaching half I call the promise "the form", but "the matter" David himself, to whom the promises happened.

1) In all Latin editions ivn is erroneously put here instead, nizp in the Bible text is the infinitive pual.

Therefore this is the meaning: Lord God, we pray for the kingdom, not as if we were worthy and deserved to be heard, but as Daniel [Cap. 9, 18] says: "We lie before you with our prayer on your great mercy", basing ourselves on the fact that you promised David that you would provide that our kingdom would be a lasting one [2 Sam. 7, 16]. Thus, he beautifully lifts up the prayer by immediately pointing out the promise in the entrance. This example is exceedingly useful, so that when we want to pray, we appear before God as poor sinners, not trusting in our merit, nor basing ourselves on our worthiness, but clothed, as it were, with His mercy and His promises, not like that one [Luc. 18:12] who says, "I fast twice a week," but: Remember, O LORD, thy promises. For the promises are nothing else than the mercy and compassion, which is offered to us free of charge by grace.

In the same way, when he remembers the sufferings, he does not do it in and of itself or in general, but in relation to something. For he actually understands the sufferings he endured for the sake of the promises. In this suffering he held fast to the and did not let them be snatched away from him. God also kept them for David. As the Psalm says that you preserved David, who suffered everything for the sake of your word and relied on your word, so also preserve us, who rely on your promises, so that you will accomplish what you have begun in us [Phil. 1, 6]. For everything must be referred to the promises, as Moses also does when he says [Ex 32:13, Deut 9:27]: "Remember Abraham, Isaac" 2c. For he did not call Abraham and Isaac, as the unlearned papists dream, but he draws on the promises that happened to them of the seed or descendants. How can GOD be reminded of them more properly than when those are called by name to whom the LORD has made the promises? The saints put these promises against their unworthiness, their sins and their debts.

This must be diligently inculcated, so that we do not get out of sorts and fall into the inconsistencies of the papists, whose scholastic theology knows nothing at all about the promises of God, but even though they are the most important part of the holy Scriptures, they still do not understand them. But the other part, namely the law, they teach sparsely and incompletely. Therefore they interpret such sayings as if the Psalm said: Remember David, how holy and good he has been, and let us have the kingdom through his merits, which he has too much of and has overflowed upon us (quae in nos supererogavit) 2c. But this opinion is obviously idolatry, because it takes hold of the mere matter without the form, or only of the active person; as the Jews think that they want to obtain the Messiah through their merits. In this way, the religion of the Turks, the Jews and the Papists is completely one and the same, for they base themselves in the same way on their own worthiness. But we, as soon as it comes before God's face, throw away the active person and want to have the suffering person who is clothed with God's promises, that is, such a David who does not sprinkle his merits on us, but the promises that were given to him and kept in all sufferings. One who-

The papists do not know the active David. Therefore, because they only know the active David, they subsequently make an idol out of him. They do not know that he is holy in the same way that the whole church is holy, not because he has good works, but because he has the promise of grace, which is truly the womb and womb in which the church and all of us are carried.

v. 2. who swore to the Lord and vowed to the Mighty One of Jacob.

This seems not inappropriate to refer to Solomon as the author of this psalm. For he wants to say: You promised the kingdom to David, David in turn promised you the temple; it is now completed and the vow fulfilled; now you also keep what you promised, that you help in this place and this people. In this way he holds up the temple and the ark of the covenant to God, believing in the promise made to David about the light that would not go out [2 Sam. 7:16, 1 Kings 11:36], and asks that this promise be kept. The scripture does not speak of this vow, because it only contains the consultation with the prophet Nathan, 2 Sam. 7, 2. [1 Kings 8, 17.] But the author wanted to praise the will of David with the words that denote an oath and a vow, that he had firmly in mind to show his gratitude in this way and to testify his faith in the promise of God.

Where the Latin interpreter has put: Deo Jacob, there the Hebrew reads: XXXX, which means great and powerful. This is sometimes attributed to angels, often it is also used adjectively for other things that have a certain strength or power, like the ox 2c. But here it is a special word of faith, that God is the power or strength of his people. For faith alone attributes this to God; reason and the flesh attribute it more to wealth and other fleshly help, which they themselves understand. But all that there is of such carnal help are in truth idols that deceive. But this [faith] is the virtue, the power and the strength of the people, because he has GOD. This virtue has preserved, in the midst of the enemies, this handful of people, the Jewish people. It is also for this reason that this word is attached to God, so that it may be known that it is He alone who gives valor and victory. So it is said in another place of the text [Ps. 20, 8.], "They rely on chariots and horses, but we remember the name of the LORD." So Paul says [Eph. 6:10.], "Be strong in the power of his strength." For this strength is eternal and does not deceive; all other strength, besides that it deceives, is also only momentary. Now follows the form of the oath:

v. 3-5. I will not go into the tabernacle of my house, nor lie down in the bed of my bed; I will not let mine eyes sleep, nor let mine eyelids slumber, until I find a place for the LORD, for the habitation of the mighty one of Jacob.

This is a prolix way of speaking (περυσσολογία), as it is common among the Hebrews when they want to express a great zeal; we would say all this with one image: I will not rest until I have found a dwelling place for the Lord. But it is also not necessary to answer the childish question here, how this oath could have lasted, since David neither built the temple, nor, if he had built it, could the work have been completed, unless he had often gone to his bed and slept. For he speaks of the will or heart as David had been minded to complete this work. Furthermore, the will or the heart of a work master comprehends all causes in itself: the material, the formal, the final cause and also the effecting cause. Since, therefore, as is shown in the books of Samuel [2 Sam. 7, 2], David considered it inequitable if he dwelt in a house of cedars, the ark of the covenant being above under the carpets, this image expresses the supreme will that he wished to abolish this inequity.

Furthermore, you must note here again, since he speaks of the dwelling of the Mighty One in Jacob, that the holy fathers and prophets did not have thoughts par excellence of God dwelling in heaven, but thought have to do with God, who can be grasped at a certain place and is, as it were, associated with a person. For God in Himself is an infinite being (natura), therefore He cannot be grasped and circumscribed by thoughts per se. David therefore looks to the word with which God bound Himself to the Ark of the Covenant [Ex 25:22J, which, since he wanted to place it in the Temple, he calls the Temple the tabernacle or dwelling place of the God of Jacob. Here the wise Jews disputed: God is infinite, therefore it is foolish to think that He is better worshipped in this place than elsewhere. But the eyes of David, Solomon and other godly people are to be praised, who did not wander into infinity with their opinions, but followed the word of God and sought him only in the place where he wanted to be found, as he had revealed in his word. Those who sacrificed there were said to be sacrificing before the LORD; those who worshiped there were said to be worshiping before the LORD." Thus Adam, Abraham and Jacob had altars where GOD had revealed Himself, and confirmed by signs from heaven that He was there. For since no one can escape the sin of idolatry unless GOD Himself indicates the place and manner of worship, therefore at all times the godly have been shown a certain place in the world which had the promise that GOD would be there, hear, speak 2c. Today we have no physical place, but everything is in Christ. To Him alone should our eyes and hearts be directed, for He alone is the object of our worship (nostrum σέβασμά), so that it is rightly said that apart from this man JEsus there is no GOOD. Therefore, whoever takes hold of Him in faith has God; whoever does not take hold of Him has no God and cannot have Him. In Hebrew the name of the dwelling is in the plural [ηνακ/Ω], namely because of the parts of the temple. For there was the mercy seat, before which the high priest was allowed to appear only once a year. Then there was the Holy Place, into which only the priests were allowed to enter. The third part was the forecourt, in which the other tribes were allowed to worship, that is, the common people and the princes alike. However, only the priests were allowed to enter.

Even though it was impossible for them to enter the holy place and the mercy seat, the promise was common to all that they would be heard if they worshipped there. Therefore, even though they were not in Jerusalem, they turned their faces and eyes toward the temple, trusting in the promise that the Lord had made to the tabernacle.

V. 6. Behold, we hear of her in Ephrata; we have found her in the field of the forest.

That is, the vow of David is now fulfilled. For it is preached that the LORD dwells in this temple built by Solomon, which is of such a nature that it cannot henceforth be moved to other places, as has happened until now; soon it was in Gilgal, soon in Shiloh, soon in Gideon. Furthermore, wherever the Ark was, there was also God. For the promise followed the Ark wherever it might be. Now, he says, the place is fixed and permanent, where the Ark and the Temple will remain; now, if it will not be in that place, it will not be anywhere in the whole world.

But what is this that he says it was "in Ephrata"? For nowhere does it read that the house of the Lord was in Ephrata, that is, in Bethlehem. Although the picture is a little hard, it is certain that by Ephrathah the kingdom of Judah is meant, to which David the Ephrathite was the head, so that "in Ephrathah" is the same as in Jerusalem, where David the Ephrathite had moved the royal residence. Therefore, from the king who was an Ephrathite, Jerusalem is called Ephrata by interchanging the names (per metonymiam), as we also often do in German, as when I say: Saxony has freely confessed Christ at Augsburg before the emperor and the whole empire. Here, "Saxony" means the most illustrious Duke John, Elector of Saxony, who is worthy of being constantly remembered in the church, who was of Saxon lineage. So I say: Pomerania rules the church at Wittenberg, that is, Johann Bugenhagen, the Pomeranian. But the prophet wanted to use this image in this place, so that one would know that the temple was not praised for the sake of Solomon, who built the temple.

not because of the present people who gathered at the temple, but because of David, who had this promise. For, as I reminded you above, the promise is the supreme thing to be considered in all things; it is to this that he looks here, indicating that the temple was given because of the promise, not because of the merits.

It is a repetition or tautology that he adds "in the field of the forest," for he calls "the field of the forest" Jerusalem, as the prophets often call it Lebanon, because it is built of the cedars of Lebanon, and the trees of Lebanon seem to have migrated, as it were, to Jerusalem. The former name ["Ephrata"] was therefore attached to it by the person [David], but this ["Lebanon" or "the field of the forest"] by the material. But these images serve to teach us how great a gift it is to have a place where the Word of God is taught. For there is the church, and there it is preserved, that is, the kingdom of heaven. This place, he says, we have here, where the temple is built by the divine promise. For here we hear the word, here God speaks to us, here we pray and do everything that belongs to the service of God; here the devil is overcome and all his cunning plots, ravings, lies, by which he seeks to disturb the church and to harm the honor of God and the church.

V. 7. We will enter his dwelling place and worship at his footstool.

This proves sufficiently that he is talking about Jerusalem, since he is talking about the things that happened after the time of David, after the vow he had made had been fulfilled. It is therefore a word that contains a congratulation and at the same time an exhortation, as if he wanted to say: since we now have a place that is indicated and confirmed by the word of God, why do we hesitate? Rather, let us go there to hear the word of God, to pray, to give thanks to God, to praise His mercy and goodness. For these are all things that are properly done in the house of God or in the Temple.

to be worshipped. The word "worship" indicates the gesture, namely, as the worshippers generally do, that they bow down and turn their faces toward the Lord or the temple. What the Latin interpreter gave: In loco, ubi steterunt pedes ejus, means in Hebrew: "We will worship before His footstool," that is, before the mercy seat or ark where God had promised that He would dwell there. But where the Word is, there in truth is the footstool, the dwelling place, the camp and the altar of God, as the prophets generally indicate by the Word that God is present, just as, on the other hand, when the Word is gone, in truth God is not there either, and we are like sheep in the desert that have no shepherd.

V. 8. Arise, O Lord, to your rest, you and the ark of your power.

Here he again calls the place where the Word is, the rest of God, that is, the tabernacle, the dwelling or habitation of God, as Christ says [John 14:23], "We will make our abode with Him." But this is a prayer which he adds to the preceding, as if to say: The temple is built, and now we place the ark in the same: arise therefore unto thy place, and make thy abode with us. For this is thy rest, because thou wilt be worshipped in a certain place and in a certain manner, and it is not pleasing unto thee to have divers opinions and divers services, as men invent them. You are indeed the God of heaven, and heaven is your throne, but that is not how you want us to worship you. You want us to know that you dwell here, and that we should seek you in this one place 2c.

Furthermore, according to the thoughts of the hearts of wise people, it is foolish and ridiculous that God should be bound to this place and placed like a malis in this darkness of the holy of holies, that he should be worshipped only there and nowhere else. This is how it was with the neighboring pagans, to whom the religion of the Jews was known: it annoyed them greatly that the infinite being should be enclosed in a corner in such a way. But God does not only not care about the thoughts of men, but also condemns them, and decrees that we should form our thoughts according to his word. He says [Ex. 20:24], "In the place where I will make a memorial of my name, there will I be," as if to say: I know that this place in Jerusalem is too narrow to contain me. For whom all the heavens cannot contain [1 Kings 8:27], how can a cave and so small an ark contain him? Rather, for my majesty and person, I have no need of any place, but you have need of it for your blessedness, that there be a certain place where you worship, find me, hear the word, receive the blessing 2c. Your need requires this, lest, if I do not designate such a place for you, the devil deceive you, and while you think to worship and adore me, you worship and adore the devil. This danger of yours requires that I designate a certain place where my memory shall be. Dear one, how great was our folly and foolishness [under the papacy] that one ran to Rome, another to Spain, as if God were not present to us everywhere who call upon Him in the name of Christ! Furthermore, how great was the diversity of opinion, in that each chose a particular way to worship God. So that this would not happen among the people of God (as the prophets nevertheless show that it did happen), God appointed a certain place where they should come together, not as if it could not be elsewhere, but so that the people would have a place where, if they came there, they would surely find God.

The ark was indeed a physical thing, just as the churches in our country have a material from which they are built. But because God had bound His presence to this physical place through His Word, it was in truth God's dwelling place. Thus we know that the Word became flesh. Therefore, the body or flesh of Christ is a true body and true flesh; His humanity is a true humanity. But in this flesh, body or humanity, as in a mirror, God is shown and held up to us. God appears in this flesh in such a way that

He does not want to be worshipped outside this flesh and cannot be recognized. Therefore, we also worship before that ark which is now there, before our mercy seat, the man Christ, and firmly hold that those who worship God outside this mercy seat are sinners and idolaters, just as those sinned and were idolaters who at that time sought and worshipped God elsewhere than in the Temple. Therefore, even though they were not in Jerusalem, when they prayed, the godly turned their faces toward the Temple and Jerusalem, just as the Church today, which is scattered over the face of the earth, nevertheless agrees that it prays in the name of Jesus, on whose sufferings and merits it relies, and so, through faith in Christ, there is only One Church. Therefore, such sayings, which bind God in such a way to a certain place, are to be carefully observed. For they serve to resist all idolatry and to judge all doctrines, just as the Jews could establish this generally valid sentence that all worship outside that place of the Tabernacle would be idolatry. Thus the patriarchs could judge from the altars they erected in the places where the Lord appeared to them. For it was not to set up one temple against another, not one altar against another, but it was One Temple, One Ark, One Altar, as we have One Christ, in whom God dwells and is found.

Therefore he calls it with a glorious title: "The ark of power", that is, of the kingdom, as in the 110th Psalm, v. 2, sceptrum virtutis [the scepter of the kingdom] means. Likewise Ps. 8:3, "Out of the mouth of the young children thou hast prepared a power." Thus is the ark of strength or power where GOD mightily rules, helps, defends, and exercises his divine power for the blessedness of men by hearing them, forgiving sins, comforting, helping against enemies, the devil, death 2c. This divine power, he says, is tied to this ark, therefore it is rightly called "the ark of power". It was tied to the altars of the fathers; now it is tied to the man born of the Virgin Mary. Whoever comes to him, he will be his-

If he dies, he will find life; if his conscience weighs him down with sins, he will find forgiveness of sins; if he is tormented by the devil, he will find peace; if he is opposed by the world, he will find safety and victory. For Christ, whose kingdom is, does not reign for the sake of lavishing us with goods, of making us rich in oxen, horses and fields, for these we have from the first chapter of the first book of Moses, but that he may demonstrate his divine power and deliver us from the evils from which we cannot save ourselves with our strength, just as he delivered the believers of that time from all dangers. For the ark was to them like a heaven, where they found salvation from all calamities. Therefore the people were the kingdom of heaven, and the saints among the people were the stars of heaven, as the Scriptures and the prophets gloriously adorn the religion of that people, and here the ark is called "the ark of power," that is, of divine power. For where GOD dwells, there is the kingdom of GOD. But He dwells in this ark and in this people, therefore the ark is heaven, and all who are in this people, where GOD has His abode, are the kingdom of heaven. Therefore Daniel [Cap. 8, 10.] says of Antiochus that he casts down the stars. For it is rightly held that wherever the Word of God is, there is the Kingdom of God, the Kingdom of Heaven, the Kingdom of Life, which triumphs over death, sin and all evil. In this way, one must exalt the word that is held in contempt in the world.

V. 9. Let your priests be clothed with righteousness, and your saints rejoice.

This prayer is the same as the one we use in our sermons when we pray that the Lord may give holy and good ministers of the Word, and grant that godless teachers may not take place among us. For God is, as it were, an emperor in His kingdom. As the princes of the emperor are servants, and as it were the most distinguished part of his kingdom, so in the kingdom of Christ are the angels of peace [Is. 33, 7] or the servants of the Gospel. The therefore for God's kingdom must necessarily pray that God will give faithful servants, as He says elsewhere [Matth. 9, 37. f.]: "The harvest is great. Ask the Lord of the harvest to send laborers into his harvest." The work of these laborers is that they administer the sacraments and lead the teaching, comfort, threaten 2c.

Now, in order that this may be done properly, it is necessary that the workers be clothed with righteousness, not only with the special (privata) righteousness that belongs to an individual person, but especially with the public righteousness that belongs to the office or the word, which can never be corrupted; for even if a person can be evil, the administration of the word and the sacraments is not itself evil. For the Word does not take anything from the person, neither do the Sacraments. Therefore, if I were the most wicked person, and yet baptized according to my office and profession, baptism would not have been defiled for the sake of the wicked person, but would retain its purity and be purer than the sun. Thus, the Word, because it is the Word of God, is also purer than the sun, however stained and sinful the one who teaches it may be. Thus the sacraments are entirely holy and entirely pure, even though they are administered by an unworthy man. In this way he speaks of the righteousness that rules and reigns in this kingdom, not of the personal righteousness by which we as individuals are righteous in our works. For since this righteousness is never without blemish, according to the saying [Ps. 32:6], "For this shall all the saints pray thee," therefore another righteousness is needed, which never has blemish. This is the righteousness by which the kingdom of Christ is governed, namely the word and the sacraments.

Therefore, it is easily recognized how childishly the Jews disputes about this righteousness, who understand it from righteous garments and the splendor of Aaron. For even though the priests were not allowed to dress differently than was ordained by God's word, this was not the kind of righteousness by which this kingdom is promoted. But then the priests are clothed with righteousness when they administer a righteous office that is means, if they teach the word purely, as Peter says [1 Ep. 4, 11]: "If someone speaks, he speaks it as God's word", if they administer the sacraments correctly, so that everything they speak and do is either God's word or God's work. When someone baptizes, he does not do something that is his own work or that he himself has invented or thought up, but he baptizes in divine power. Thus he who comforts a sorrowful soul does so not according to his own will or choice, but according to a certain precept of the divine will. Therefore, he who hears this word must not receive it as the word of a man, but as a voice that sounds from heaven. Thus the ministry of preaching is righteous, because it is in truth directed in divine power, and this is true righteousness.

On the other hand, those who teach in such a way that they command to trust in their own merits and works, so that they prescribe a certain way of dressing, eating, fasting 2c., as then the righteousness of the Papists and the Turks consists entirely in these outward things: such priests are clothed with wickedness, unrighteousness, blasphemy and profanation of God. For they have lost the noblest adornment of their office and the right dress, because they do not teach rightly, nor govern rightly, but rather deceive men by the appearance of government and their preaching office, driven by the devil, who hates this righteous administration and perverts the priests. This misfortune takes place in the kingdom of Christ; as we see, also in the kingdom of the world. For even though Carl is emperor, in some places sedition and wars are instigated by those who prefer tyranny to righteous administration. But in this way it also happens that good citizens love a just administration all the more and pray for it all the more diligently. The same happens in the kingdom of God.

The sum of this prayer is that those who are with the ark of power may rule righteously, lest the most beautifully ordered worship of God fall away, and so the fruit of the Word may endure and the timid hearts be lifted up, the necks of those who have been in the ark of power may not be destroyed.

The weak are strengthened, the simple and inexperienced are taught, as this is diligently done with us by God's grace. This does not happen with the Anabaptists, the Sacramentarians and others; because they have corrupted the doctrine, they lack this holy ornament of righteousness. And it cannot be otherwise than that where the shepherds err, the people also follow the error of the teachers. But this is the greatest wrath, when the priests, who should be clothed with righteousness, are clothed with an ungodly nature and blasphemous doctrine, just as it is the highest gift to have priests clothed with righteousness.

What now follows: "And your saints rejoice," shows quite nicely what God has in mind for us or what His intention is with us, namely, that God does not delight in the unrest or sadness of the heart, that is, in an evil conscience, which produces sin, and the fear that naturally follows sin, just as, on the other hand, a good conscience is joyful and cheerful and produces a heart that is secure in a godly way. Since there are two kingdoms, the kingdom of death and the kingdom of life, or the kingdom of hell and the kingdom of heaven, he desires that the saints may be preserved in the kingdom of life and enjoy a good conscience, which is primarily brought about by the righteous administration of the priests. The apostolic prayer with which the apostles generally begin their epistles agrees with this prayer: "Grace to you and peace from God our Father" 2c. [Rom. 1:7, 1 Cor. 1:3]. "Grace" is the forgiveness of sins; this is necessarily followed by peace or a good conscience, which David here calls "joy." The meaning is therefore this: Your saints, that is, the people together with the priests, after they have heard the right word of the righteous preaching ministry, should be joyful in this word, they should be secure, triumphant 2c. But he calls them "saints" because of the use of the word and the preaching ministry, which is holy. Thus the Jews were called holy because, as I said above, they belonged to the people who had the ark and the word of God, truly holy and sanctifying things. Thus

He also calls our church holy, not primarily for the sake of personal holiness, which must necessarily be there, but rather for the sake of the holiness that the Word and the sacraments confer on those who use them properly. For these he asks for joy, that they may be glad and confident in the Lord.

Therefore, the meaning of these words ["Let your saints rejoice"] is this, that our King Jesus Christ has given us the word for this reason, has commanded that we should be baptized and use the sacrament of his body and blood, not because he wants to kill us with poison, as it were, or make us sad, but so that we may be joyful, confident and secure, having peace and a good conscience through his merit. Therefore Christ's kingdom is a kingdom of joy and salvation, as another Psalm [Ps. 118:15] also indicates, "In the tabernacles of the righteous"; that is, in the church, "they sing with joy," because they know that this is what their King Christ wants, that through him they should have comfort, life and security, and victory against death and the devil. Now this is the Christians', or, as he calls it here, the saints', joy and triumph. For why should a Christian be sad or grieved, since he is called by the gospel to the kingdom of Christ and grace, baptized and refreshed with the body and blood of the Lord, and daily raised up by the word against despair and despondency? Therefore, if there is still sadness left, it is not the fault of this kingdom, not of the Word and the sacraments, but my fault and the devil's fault, because I do not take hold of the Word in true faith and do not believe it completely. For why should I be despondent if I truly believe that I am baptized, called, communicated, and thus transferred into the kingdom of life, received into grace and enclosed in the mercy of God? These are therefore the tricks of the devil, who does not allow us to see our riches and our glory, but invents temptations and crosses where there is no cross, but salvation and victory.

Therefore, that maiden is rightly praised who, when challenged by Satan, answered that she was a Christian, and was thus satisfied in this man, Christ.

For you do not have to give the devil many words. If he accuses you of your sins, it is just enough 1) if you hold your baptism against him, of which he cannot deny that you have it. Likewise, if you hold up to him the word by which you are called into the kingdom of grace, how could he deceive you, because this word is the word of God? In this way, sadness cannot take place in the believer, because he has baptism, the word, the fellowship of the body and blood of Christ, the grace, favor and mercy of God. How then should he not rejoice and be glad? But because we often let ourselves be deprived of the word and these gifts of God and turn our eyes elsewhere, fear, sadness and despair must arise. But this happens partly through our fault, partly through the fault of the devil, who leads us away from the Word without us even realizing it, so that we think either of our merits or of our debts, likewise of the raging of death, of the burning of hell. When we think of these evils, we must perish without Christ, consumed by sadness and sorrow. For that is to lose the ark of the covenant. Those who speak out again in such dangers are saved, and, following the example of David, they say to themselves in amazement at these things [Ps. 42:6], "Why are you grieved, my soul, and are so troubled within me?" Since I am in the kingdom of Christ, that is, in the kingdom of peace, gladness and eternal joy, only that it is hindered to some extent by the devil and our flesh, which regards sins and our own unworthiness more diligently and makes them greater than baptism and the very sweetest promises of God. This is the wisdom, or rather the plague, that is hidden in our flesh, that we are more moved by our impurity than by the purity of the Word and the Sacraments. Therefore, those who remain firm in the Word, in truth, make their voyage in the harbor, safe from these storms and terrible tempests.

1) Instead of: rscte satis in the Erlanger, which we consider to be the correct reading, the Wittenbergers and the Jenaers have: rsote kaeis.

Therefore, we must pray that we have good pastors and faithful stewards over the Word of God. For these provide us with such good. For this is the order of Christ's kingdom. Christ sits as an emperor in the church as in his temple or on his throne, the teachers are, as it were, the princes of his kingdom and administer the word loudly and teach rightly. Their office or government is not in vain. Therefore, the church triumphs, defies death, sin and the devil, because she knows that she is in grace under the Emperor Christ. This is the true peace, namely the peace of the heart. For in the world she is afraid. In this way the prophet asks as the highest gift that the priests clothe themselves with righteousness and that the people rejoice. This is the first part of this psalm; now follows the second part.

V. 10. Do not take away the regiment of your anointed one for the sake of your servant David.

This is a new prayer, which he undertook entirely in reliance on the promises. For here, as above, "David" does not actually mean the essence (substantiam), but rather a quality (qualitatem), that is, the David who is clothed and adorned with the promises of the kingdom, as if to say: I pray thee also to preserve and bless our kingdom, and to succor us; but this I ask not for my own sake, as if I were worthy that thou shouldst bestow it upon me, but in reliance upon the promises which thou hast made unto David my father, saying [2 Kings 8:19] that the house of David should not lack a lamp 2c. But this belongs to the example and to the teaching that also we, if we want to pray, should look mainly to the promises, as we have already reminded a few times above.

Furthermore, this passage reminds us of the difference between the spiritual and the physical promises, because the condition of our works is attached to the physical promises. Thus, the kingdom of the flesh is promised to David if his descendants would abide in the word and will of God. The other promises of the law are also like this. For they are based on it:

if the people were to keep the covenant of God, as seen in the books of Moses. The spiritual promises, however, are not based on the condition of human works, but par excellence on the mercy and truth of God. Therefore, even though the people of Israel are deprived of the kingdom and expelled from their land, the promise of the seed of Abraham is not annulled. For thus says the text [Ps. 89, 33. 34.], Though I cast them out and destroy them, yet will I not turn away my grace from them. So also Isaiah says [Cap. 10, 23.]: "The Lord will let a destruction go, and yet he will control it," that is, the Lord will make an end and destroy the people because of their sins, and yet he will preserve the remnant because of his mercy, from which a new church will arise. Thus the promise of the house of David at this point is a conditional one, and the outcome shows that the whole kingdom is destroyed, and yet what the angel says [Luc. 1, 32. f.] is also true: "He shall sit on the throne of David forever." This contradiction can never be balanced unless we make such a distinction among the promises of God. But all the error of the Jews lies in this difference. They see the glorious promises of the land and the kingdom, then also what is promised of the spiritual kingdom, and refer the latter to the physical kingdom. Hence arise with them the joyful expectations to which they so stubbornly cling, that the kingdom shall be restored, but it is easy to see how grossly they err. But now let us return to the psalm.

Why he remembers David, we have said. So he asks, for the sake of the promises made to David, that the regiment of the Anointed One (Christ), that is, the King, may not be averted or taken away. For it is [the anointed one, Christ] a generic name (appellativum nomen), which simply signifies a king or anointed one, as David says [1 Sam. 24:7.], "I will not lay my hand on the anointed one (Christ) of the LORD," that is, on Saul, who is anointed according to the word or by the command of the LORD. Furthermore, faciem regis he calls the presence-

The king's authority or the regiment (regnum) itself, which is given and instituted by God, as if to say: "Preserve, O Lord, your people, justice, righteousness, equity and the whole worldly administration, so that everything is done in proper order, so that peace is not disturbed by sedition and discord within (intestina odia), so that discipline is not disturbed or defiled by adultery and other offenses. For this and similar things belong to the regiment; for to desire the kingdom is not merely to seek the crown, but to want to have a beautiful and well-ordered regiment, in which innocence is safe, while shameful living and crimes are severely punished. The psalm demands all this, asking that the regiment of the anointed one (facies Christi) not be taken away.

The reason why he asks this in the first place is that in this people is the church and the word of God, which cannot stand in honor, where everything burns with murder, wars and contempt of the laws. So Paul also commands that we pray for the kings [1 Tim. 2, 2.], so that we may lead a calm and quiet life. Nowadays, under Emperor Carl, we have some well-ordered churches, in which the wholesome doctrine and the right administration of the sacraments are going on. Therefore, we must pray that God will not take away the regiment of His anointed, and will not let the Church be harmed by wars. For if the emperor is at peace, the Church is at peace. To this prayer we diligently exhort our people. How can ungodly people presume to accuse us as if we were disturbers of peace? I have no doubt that if peace and tranquility are maintained through anything, it is primarily through the prayers of our churches. For what should the adversaries pray, or what should Christ grant to his enemies, and to his persecutors? for they do not even know how to pray.

v. 11. The Lord swore a true oath to David; he will not turn from it: I will set on thy throne the fruit of thy womb.

We have said that the second part of this psalm began with prayers for the temporal kingdom. For these two kingdoms, the temporal and the spiritual, although they are very different from each other, are so connected with each other that one can hardly exist without the other, or not at all. For where peace is lacking, godliness cannot be cultivated without the greatest danger; on the other hand, where the word is not, one must err without end. Therefore, prayer is necessary for worldly peace and government. When the Word of God comes to it, there is all the more reason why we should give thanks to God. We have said, however, that this prayer, too, is based on the promise of God, for in prayer one must primarily see to it that nothing is asked for but what is certain and can be obtained. Because of this certainty, not only is the commandment given that we should pray, but also a certain form of prayer and formulated words, concepta verba, as it is called, are prescribed, and also certain things are indicated in regard to which, if we ask for them, we can be certain that the prayer is pleasing to God, as when one asks for the sanctification of God's name 2c. Here it belongs that in this place the promise is strengthened by an oath, so that it would be all the more certain.

As this promise of the temporal kingdom is very glorious, it has also been the cause of death for many holy prophets. For as the promises in their right and proper use raise up the afflicted and godly minds, so also, when they are misused, they inflame the sure and presumptuous, who, trusting in these promises, afterwards persecute the godly, as is clearly exemplified in the prophets. Since they punished the idolatry of the kings and condemned the ungodly worship, and therefore threatened the kingdom and the people with ruin if they did not abandon it, they were condemned to the death penalty as heretics, because they spoke against these and other promises. And according to their reputation, this was a very strong reason for them to contradict the prophets: If the Lord has promised that the

If the sons of David are to sit on David's throne forever, it is impossible for anything of this kind to be done by the king on account of which the kingdom should be destroyed.

Truly, the kingdom of the pope did not have such a glorious appearance, even though he also abused the promises of Christ in the same way in order to strengthen his tyranny and his idolatrous abominations. With how great pride they have boasted that Christ said to his church [Matth. 28, 20.]: "I will be with you until the end of the world", as if this in truth referred to the fact that the tyranny of the pope would never end. Thus the exceedingly beautiful consolation [Matth. 16, 18.]: "The gates of hell shall not prevail against them", has become a cruel and bloodstained word, and has been the ruin of many saints, because the pope claimed the same for himself and his tyranny. For this was the only reason by which they proved that the pope, as the head of the church, could not err. In this way, the godless and secure people of the promises with which God wanted to establish His own, misused against the right church. This was the reason why the priest Amaziah did not like the prophet Amos, and said, Amos 7, 10. 11.: "Amos makes a commotion against you in the house of Israel; the land cannot stand his words. For thus saith Amos, Jeroboam shall die by the sword, and Israel shall be carried away captive out of his land," as if this were indeed impossible, and the king, because he was king, could sin with impunity. But afterwards experience taught that this was a vain confidence, but that the prophet had spoken the truth.

In this way, the wicked misuse the promises of God, presume to have them, while they belong to the true church, and become presumptuous and sure. They do not think of their sins, not of God's judgment, but they certainly rage against the saints, as we see today in the papacy. Thus, of course, the true church is oppressed, harassed by tyrants, challenged by false brethren, has to suffer from the contempt and hatred of the world, and looks quite as if it would already perish. Here it would be necessary for the godly to stand up in the trust in the mercy and the promises of God, because for this reason the promises are given. But here we see a strange reversal. Those who should believe and be comforted and uplifted do not, because the weakness of the flesh does not allow it, which the devil increases by making the dangers and terrors great. On the other hand, the Church of the wicked, which should be afraid because of its sins, is presumptuous, hopes for the best, lives without any fear in the highest security. Thus the pope stubbornly holds on to those promises with which Christ comforted his own, that he would be with them until the end of the world, that the little ship of Peter, even though it was in danger, would not sink [Matth. 8, 24. ff.]. But the true church, to whom alone this is said, does not believe this in such a way, nor does it set itself up in such confidence in these promises. This is the same fate and the same situation of the true church at all times.

But just as the godless persistently hope as long as things go well, so they also despair most shamefully when things go badly. On the other hand, the godly keep hope even in misfortune, however much it may seem that there is nothing to hope for. So this promise of the kingdom of the Anointed One was prevented in many ways by rebellious nations, by enemies and godless kings, until at last, for sin's sake, the city and the temple were laid waste and the people were led away captive, leaving behind only husbandmen and the lowest yeast of the people. At that time, the word, the worship, the customary judgments, in short, the church and the whole world regiment were in ruins. Who could hope that David would not lack descendants? as this Psalm promises. Therefore, this promise was necessary, with which the saints could comfort themselves, namely that it would be impossible for this kingdom to perish before Christ, the true seed of David, appeared. Therefore, at the time when everything seemed to be in desperate straits, God raised up the highest prophets, placed Daniel also among the highest princes; Jeremiah set the number of years to seventy strong [Jer. 25:11], the remnant of the royal tribe, that is, the seed of David, were preserved even in captivity. In this way, the kingdom, which was in truth forsaken by outward appearance, was not forsaken, and the godly retained the hope of salvation where the wicked despaired and perished.

In this way we glow and comfort ourselves today that Christ will stand by His kingdom and His Church until the end of the world, even if the Antichrist, the Pope, triumphs and sits in the temple of God, and it seems as if he will completely suppress the Church. For God has given His promises to the Church for the sake of these dangers and hardships. Although the church cannot believe them completely, it does not deny them outright. But Christ tests faith, even if it is like a grain of mustard seed. It is useful to do this reminder, especially since it will happen, if we are not otherwise surprised by the last day, that the devil, through his own, will do and try everything that serves to suppress the doctrine. Even if we see here only a captive kingdom and ark transplanted elsewhere, like the people of the Jews, we must nevertheless keep the hope that the Lord will give prophets and not leave the abandoned church. For the word of the promising God should move us more than the existing or threatening ruin. For if God, out of great patience, has preserved the Church under the Pope, if He has borne the use of only one figure and many abuses that godless teachers have brought into the Church, if He has finally, when everything was in despair, allowed the exceedingly bright light of His Word to shine forth in the densest darkness, then why should we despair? The mercy of God is greater than heaven and earth and can swallow up the errors into which the elect are sometimes deceived.

There is no one who does not wish that the secular government be quiet, the people obedient and holy. So it would be desirable that the church would be united, that no aversions would be seen either in doctrine or in life, that the princes would keep the word to the people.

They would not hate it nor persecute it. But such a world regiment and such a church may be painted by a skillful artist, but they cannot be found anywhere in this world. Therefore, we should be prepared in such a way that we will never have the sight of such a pure church and such a calm world regime, but we should be satisfied that the church and the world regime (although there are some disturbances and damages) are not completely destroyed, that some majesty is seen in the worldly rule, but pure doctrine is seen in the church, and that a few highly esteem the word, use the sacraments, pray, although the greater part do the opposite. These consolations serve this purpose, so that we do not throw away all hope when it seems as if everything is about to collapse. Now, of course, the appearance of the church is miserable, since the pastors and ministers of the Word, as you can see, can hardly protect themselves against hunger, given the great hatred of the peasants and citizens. Therefore, I often think that the whole preaching ministry would perish by itself, even if it were without tyrants, but the promise should be respected more highly than all appearances that come into our eyes. For behold all history, whether the church was not always hidden by the tyranny of princes and the lies of heretics. In addition, there were the own temptations of sins and the torments of the devil, with which the godly are constantly plagued. If someone looks at this and fixes his eyes on these evils, he will judge that neither the church nor God is anywhere. But you do not have to judge by this appearance. For you will never see such a shape of the church, in which there should be no offence, no irritation, no discord, and not various weaknesses and, as it were, diseases. It would be desirable that these things were not there, and that the church had such an outward appearance as is described here and in other places, where it is compared to a beautiful bride, in which not a spot nor a wrinkle is seen; but you will never see that it is so constituted on the outside, but it is always oppressed by tyrants, contested by heretics, plagued by of inward and outward tribulations, of disobedience, contempt of the peasants, disloyalty of false brethren 2c. In all these dangers the consolation is to be held fast that even the gates of hell shall not prevail against it, and one must continue to teach, exhort, punish, and in other things belonging to the ministry of preaching with great courage. If then some are disobedient, let them go their way and depart; but let it suffice us that there be some to whom Christ and the ministry of the gospel are profitable for the resurrection [Luc. 2:34].

This is how the holy prophets acted, who saw that the Babylonian captivity was imminent, that the temple and the city would go up in flames. This was the outward appearance of an empire that would perish altogether. There was therefore nothing with which they could comfort themselves except this and other promises that it would come to pass that a king would be appointed who would come from the body of David [2 Sam. 7:12], and that God had confirmed this with an oath. And it is truly a glorious promise that He indicates a certain person and does not let the succession be indefinite in such a way that the person would be uncertain. Abraham, Isaac and Jacob also had the promise of Christ, but in such a way that the person was not certain, looking at the amount of descendants. But in this promise there is a certain description that a certain person is named, so that even if the whole people were to be led away captive, they could still keep the hope of the kingdom as long as there was still a descendant of David left. The papal kingdom has no such promise, as if it were necessary that such a pope be in the church, as in that people all were commanded to set their hearts and eyes on the one seed of David. This was, as I believe, the reason why the genealogical registers were kept accurately by the godly, namely so that the succession in the lineage of David would be exceedingly certain because of this hope for the fulfillment of the promise. For this lineage was, as it were, a star in this people; as long as the descendants of the

When the Lord's presence was seen with eyes, it granted a certain hope of future salvation through Christ, even in the Babylonian captivity and all other dangers.

For even though the Babylonian captivity was terrible and bitter, it was far less so than the misfortune in which the Jews lived after the destruction wrought by the Romans. For even though the people were captives, even in the captivity they had a king to whom the eyes of the godly were directed as a pledge that the promise of Christ would be fulfilled. For God testified through the remaining king that there was still a fruit of the body of David. Then the Jews in captivity keep the word and prophets, Daniel, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and no doubt many others. But who does not see that the kingdom was not yet completely deserted and desolate, since there were still people left who were destined for the kingdom and the priesthood? Thirdly, the number of years was also fixed, how long the captivity should last. What can the Jews show today that would be similar to this? Not only do they not have a kingdom anywhere, but they do not even have persons destined to the kingdom, except that they have neither a certain number of years, nor the Word, nor prophets. How glorious remains the people had in captivity! Therefore, it is certain that the Jews have completely perished, and that the present calamity should not be called a captivity, but a destruction altogether, as Daniel also says [Cap. 9:26]: "And after this shall be the end. For how can this people of God, if the promise stands, be altogether without a king of the body of David? For in the Babylonian captivity, though they were without a kingdom, yet they had royal persons, as it were, as a speck of the kingdom, as it is said that there remained then a speck, as it were, of the lamp of David. The Jews do not have anything like that nowadays, so the thing proves that they are damned with their whole religion, or this present promise of the Psalm is null and void.

lying, since it confirms that David will not lack descendants until Christ, whose kingdom is eternal.

Furthermore, we have spoken above of the presumption of the wicked, which has caused all these promises to be stained with blood. For although they actually belong to the godly, the wicked always presume to have them. When the godly contradict them, and God's wrath and destruction threaten them, the godless use force. Therefore, one must learn that under the name of the church, the devil is up to and causes all kinds of harm. Thus we see what the pope has done in the church under this pretext alone, that he has persuaded the whole world that the church cannot err, that the church cannot perish. This word is true, but one should also have added this, that it would actually be described what the right church is and where it is. This description must be taken not from the decrees of the popes, but from the Gospel, in which Christ demands confession as a certain characteristic of His own. He says [Matth. 10, 32.]: "Whoever confesses me before men, him will I also confess before my heavenly Father." Therefore one must look mainly at the word. For there is no confession, nor can there be, where the word is not. Hence it follows that wherever the confession and the word are not there, nevertheless the church is not there, even though there is the great multitude, the power, glorious titles, the appearance of holiness. 2c. In this way, this Psalm must also be applied to our affairs and brought into present use, and the promise of the bodily kingdom must be transferred to the church. Although she is plagued by heretics and tyrants, she will not perish, but remain steadfast even against the gates of hell.

v. 12 If thy children keep my covenant, and my testimony which I will teach them, their children also shall sit in thy throne for ever.

This promise is not an unconditional one (absoluta), because it has a condition attached to it. There is therefore a difference between between this promise and those that are without condition, as they occur in the Psalms "the Lord spoke to my Lord" [Ps. 110] and "God, give your judgment to your kings" [Ps. 72, 1.]. There the kingdom is promised to Christ in an unconditional way, but here the kingdom is not promised to the descendants of David in an unconditional way, but with this condition: if they kept the blind of the LORD. Therefore the kingdom came to Solomon, who was born of Bathsheba, but afterwards almost his tribe died out with Ahaziah, whom Athaliah had brought up [2 Chron. 22, 3.], since Joash alone was left after all the others had been killed by Athaliah. For with this the devil went about, whether he could not in some way hinder the promise of Christ. After that the kingdom came to Joash, who was also of the seed of David, and was protected by the care of his sister, so that he was not killed by Athaliah [2 Chron. 22, 11. f.]. Thus the descendants of David were promised a lasting kingdom, but in such a way that God threatens them with destruction if they do not keep His testimonies. Therefore, the kingdom of the descendants of Rathaas was finally snatched away and taken by the foreigner Herod, until, when the wicked ruled, Christ was born of Mary, who was from Bethlehem (Bethlehemmitide). Thus, for the sake of sin, one descendant after another was destroyed by the devil, and yet there is an unbroken succession or lineage until Mary.

It is useful to consider how the kingdom promised to David was granted to his son Solomon, but is taken away from him again because of sin. The same happened with Nathan, and yet God preserved the little spark from which this kingdom shone forth like a torch. But this happened in order to dampen our destruction. Thus the promise of the Church is there: I will be with you until the end of the world, but the condition is added: If ye will walk in my ways. For those who neglect the Word, God lets go again, and raises up others to be the Church. Thus John says [Matth. 3, 9]: "God is able to raise up children to Abraham out of stones." For since the promise had happened to Abraham, the Pharisees thought that since they were children of Abraham, they would surely be heirs of the promise. This confidence made them puffed up so that they lived securely and without fear of God. Therefore John says, "It is certain that the children of Abraham will be heirs of the promises made to Abraham. But if you want to be sure and disobey the commandment of God, I tell you, it is easy for God to reject you and to bring forth a descendant to Abraham from stones. So the pope is not pope for the sake of it, because he sits in regiment and in great dignity. For if he will not obey the word of God, God will easily find and raise up a church elsewhere. Thus, this promise depends entirely on the condition added against presumption.

"The covenant" is the promise of mercy through Christ. "The testimony" is the will of God, which is revealed at all times through Moses and the prophets. Therefore he demands faith, then also obedience to the law. But he explicitly says: "Testimony I will teach", namely through the priests. For although they had the office of preaching, yet the Lord himself wants to be the teacher, and wants to be heard; he does not want the conciliar to be heard, not the teachers who teach such things as he himself has not taught. In this way, then, we also say of the Church that wherever one believes the promise of God and obeys His word, there is the Church. But those who do not believe the word nor obey it are not to be considered the Church; even if they have titles, professions and other things, they are in truth rejected by God and are not to be considered the Church. For who would believe the pope because he is pope? But for the sake of this name alone, he demands that one believe him, and does not want one to dispute whether what he commands is true and right doctrine (sana); he simply wants one to believe him, because the Holy See cannot err. Those who contradict and contradict his decrees

The people who try to adjust themselves according to the word and will of God are subjected to punishments of every kind. Nowadays, the spirits of enthusiasm claim the same thing for themselves; everything they dream, they want, is spoken from the Holy Spirit. But Basil has said very well: Whether παν Ἰνῦπνιον ὡ&υς προφητεία [not every Dream is also immediately a prophecy].

Therefore, just as these people among the people of Israel perpetuated and defended their errors and ungodliness through the prestige of the kings on whom this promise seemed to be based, so the false church is wont to do at all times. But we answer that the promise is true, but it is a conditional one, and it is said, "If they keep my blind and testimony." For God did not anoint them as kings in such a way that they should do whatever seemed good to them, or that God would approve everything they ordered and taught because they were kings, but He attached the condition to it: If you will keep my testimony. So in the New Testament we do not deny that this word of God is true [Luc. 10, 16]: "He who hears you hears me," but we deny that it is to be understood by all who teach in the church. For some teach not Christ's word, but their own; that these should be heard, as himself, Christ certainly will not, but he also forbideth that they should be heard, saying [Matt. 7:15.], "Beware of false prophets."

Thus Moses commanded in the fifth book of Moses [Cap. 4, 1. 6, 7.] that he [the king] never put the book of the law out of his hands, that he constantly practice it by reading, learning and doing. If this was commanded to the kings in the law, what shall we think of the words of the New Testament? There the popes will surely boast of their conciliarities, fathers, church and dignity, which they have held for so many centuries. All this may be valid in such a way if they teach according to the rule of the Word. For the church that enjoys divine prestige is only that which follows the voice and the word of the Lord. According to this rule, examine the pope who protects himself with the name of the church, and see if the pope teaches according to the law that is prescribed for him by God.

If a man teaches against the law and does not walk in the right way, and yet sits in the regiment, he shall not be put out of his position for that reason, just as Ahaz should not be killed by his subjects for that reason, because he was an idolater; but you shall do this, that you do not follow his rule, that you do not approve of his ungodly teaching, that you do not do what the Roman bishop commands to be done against the Scriptures. For in this case God absolves us all from obedience, for He says thus [Deut. 18:15, 18, 19]: I appoint you a shepherd, and you shall obey him as you obey me. So it can happen that he [the Pabst] wants to abuse the order of God against the word; then I leave you this protection and give you this means in your hand, that you say [Apost. 5, 29.]: "One must obey God more than men." Let them therefore be kings, let them be popes, so far shall they be heard and obeyed, as they walk according to the rule of the word.

Furthermore, we learn from experience that nothing is more frequent and more common than the abuse of power, both in the secular regiment and in the church. Therefore, those who rightfully use their prestige, which they have either in the church or in the secular government, are very rare. The reason for this is that the majority of people serve their lusts and let themselves be ruled and guided by the devil. Hence we see that the pope and the bishops do not care at all about doctrine, but turn all their care to increasing their honor, their dignities, their wealth, their prosperity. What should the subordinates do here? Shall they drive them out by rebellion or kill them? No, but they should let them rule, and only be careful and beware of their mouth, as Christ also says in Matthew [Cap. 23, 2]: "On Moses' chair they sit" (although there is a great difference between those and our popes). Here he allows them to sit and teach, does not want them to violate it, and grants them the key of knowledge 1). But this he condemns, that while they have the key of knowledge and in the Nevertheless, in addition to not teaching themselves, they also seduce others, although the rest of the church should also be mindful of their right. For since our bishops do not teach themselves, nor permit wholesome teachers to teach, and yet enjoy the benefices of the churches and abuse them for their exceedingly shameful lusts, many assert in a very good and true way that the income (beneficium) should not be separated from the office. 2) Therefore, the rest of the church, according to its rights, can take so much from the goods of the papists that godly teachers can live on it. For this must be prevented in every way, so that the ministry of preaching is not completely taken away.

Therefore, the error that the impious teachers of papal law (canonistae) impose in the most impudent manner must be rejected, since they presume to say that one should not take it into one's mind that the great majesty of the pope can err. 3) This is, as it were, the first commandment of the foolish canonists, from which this abomination arose, which we now see and curse in the papacy, that they have unashamedly set up as articles of faith everything that has only occurred to them and has served to bring money. But we say thus: It may be called this tyranny, after all, the summit of the majesty (apex celsitudinis) which he arrogates to himself against Scripture and all equity; and, to ascribe still more to him, we will suppose (fingamus) that he is also pope according to divine order, and occupies the highest position (primatum) in the church. I will add more to him: if the pope demands it, let us make him an angel from heaven; what more glorious can I think of him? But even if he were an angel, Paul pronounces (Gal. 1, 8.) that he is accursed if he preaches another gospel.

Thus, a priest by the grace of God (divinitus) is a priest, a king by the grace of God is a king. We want to concede this also to the pope in such a way as if he is in the first place by right power (praesit). But the condition of which we have said entails the necessity that we must distinguish between the thing and its use. "The thing" I call the divine power (autoritatem); though I concede the same to the popes, yet I do not concede to them the use of it, because they evidently draw the divine thing to their abuse. They use their power not according to the will of God, for the glory of the Word, but for their own glory. Therefore, their power does not bind us, even if, as I said, it were the power of an angel from heaven, but with a good conscience we step away from them, so that we do not disobey the supreme power and majesty, which is God. Now if the popes did not fight against the teaching of Christ, if they held firmly with us that we are justified only by the ransom (pretio) of the blood of Christ, and did not teach men to trade on their own merits and works: then I would gladly acknowledge their power, and confess that they also used the holy cause sacredly. But since the abuse is obvious, it does not help them that they have the holy cause, as they boast.

2) That is, only the one who pays the office should have the income.

For this is summa summarum, that the pope is bound to God's word no less than all other men, if he had the dignity of an angel. Since he now obviously challenges this, defends his godless nature with the utmost cruelty, not his chair, not his dignity, not his power protects him, but he is cursed, as Paul says. For it is quite generally assumed among the teachers of the papacy that the pope is above the Word or above the Scriptures, and can dispense as he pleases in the divine law. Therefore, he has decreed from the church and from cases of conscience what he only wanted. Since we condemn this in confidence in the word of the Lord and, forced by the command of the Lord, seriously refute it, we are banished. From this opinion we are not to give up, but say with this psalm: If the popes keep the covenant and the testimony which the Lord teaches, we will hear them; if they do not keep it, we will not hear them, will also have a

The church will not hold in honor (venerabimur) even the most sacred thing in them, which they abuse in such an abominable and ungodly way. For even if the popes are not, there will be some who will keep the covenant, so that the church will not be completely eradicated. Thus, a hundred years ago, when the popes rejected the covenant of the Lord, John Hus was found to hold it with the greatest reverence. So also today: since the Bishop of Mainz, as the highest in dignity, does not want to keep the covenant, there are others who keep it; and in the eyes of God, the parish priest of the most despicable village is far more pleasant and greater than all the bishops in all of Germany with all the cardinals and popes. For GOD does not concede to men any power over His word. Those who honor it, follow it, and keep it are the Church, however despised they may be in the world. Those who do not keep it are the church of the devil, and the greatness of the title does not help them.

And this is also the reason why it is expressly written in the text: "The testimony that I will teach them". For thus God wills to use in the church the office of teachers, but that he himself be the supreme teacher, and all the ministers of the church, even the pope, even the church itself, be governed and directed by the word; for thus these things must be applied to the present use. For this is not a trade (disputatio) that belonged to a particular and certain time, but it continues to all times. In the people of Israel, the kings and priests, puffed up by their profession, thought that everything was up to them. So today the popes do not think that they are subject to the laws of the Word, but they are subject to it, that they arrogate to themselves the power over the Word and the Scriptures. The matter is entirely the same. Therefore, we must be fortified here that we can say: I believe a council, I believe a pope, I believe princes and kings, I believe a holy and universal church, but in such a way that this holy church, let alone the bishops and popes, is in all things subject to their God and Bridegroom Christ and his word, without any exception. And this I believe in such a way that it is not necessary that God from heaven speaks to me and reveals it to me in a sensually perceptible way. This word, which the prophets and apostles spoke, is the word that must be believed, to which the pope with the whole congregation of saints must be subject, and may not do anything without this word, much less against this word 2c.

In this way the pope must be brought back to order; but we learn that he fears and hates no poison so much as the Scriptures. That is why he opposes with all his strength, even if he is of a different opinion, that a synod or concilium should take place, only because he fears this question, that it might be asked in the synod whether the pope is to be judged by the Scriptures or the Scriptures by a concilium? For the evil conscience that the pope has always calls out to him that the Holy Scripture is the Word of God, therefore it will happen that the Word of God will prevail, and the concilium will decide that the pope is necessarily under the Scripture. If this happens, then it is over for the pope. For what will the pope be able to maintain in all his decrees, ceremonies, and doctrine if he is judged according to the Scriptures? He therefore foresees in his mind a reformation which would be intolerable to him, and therefore he does everything in his power to prevent a concilium from being assembled, although in the meantime he puts himself in such a position, judging by his words, as if he desired nothing more than a synod. But while he is throwing this high, he is entangling and captivating the minds of the kings in such a way that they have more time and desire for all other things than for holding a concilium. O for the malice that would be worthy of eternal fire and the hatred of all good, that the popes want their tyranny to be strengthened to such great detriment of the church!

We have said all this because of the similarity of the trades that are presented to us in this Psalm, that God restricted His kings, who had great divine prestige, and bound them by His laws, so that even though they had greater power than all, they were still subject to God and His word. They had to obey this word, even if it was proclaimed by a lesser one.

as Nathan punished David, and David listened, not because Nathan himself, but because he presented God's word. Whose disciples we must all be. Therefore, when I say to the pope that he should place himself under the mercy of God, which alone is necessary to justify us before God, the pope should submit to the word, not for my sake, of course, who proclaims this, but for the sake of the word. If he does not do this, he abuses his authority, and no obedience is owed to him in the things he commands or teaches against the word.

This conditional statement is made against the ungodly, so that they do not assume an unlimited power against the word. For an unrestricted promise is the one that understands Christ in himself. For this he does not promise under a certain condition, but promises absolutely that he will come from the seed of Abraham. But because, while this promise was fulfilled by Christ, the bodily kingdom continued, it was so fortified by the word of God that a certain condition was nevertheless attached to it. Therefore, many ungodly kings and their entire lineage were destroyed from the foundation and others were put in their place, so that the temporal kingdom would continue in some way until the Most Holy One would come [Dan. 9:24] and the King of kings [1 Tim. 6:15], who has continued this kingdom until now and will continue it for eternity. Therefore, the attached condition serves against presumption, as if he wanted to say: "My promise will come from Christ, and certainly I will secure my David his throne, but you, who meanwhile sit on this throne and administer this kingdom, do not believe that you cannot err, or that God will approve your errors and not rather condemn them. Therefore, either rule your kingdom according to the word, or I will overthrow and destroy you. This promise he now continues in a glorious way.

V. 13: For the Lord has chosen Zion, and is pleased to dwell there.

This is another execution of the promise, as if to say: You have the promise, but now let this be done to you.

that you may be righteous and keep my covenant. For then it shall come to pass that this kingdom shall remain, and I will dwell with you; as he also saith in Isaias [Cap. 31:9], "I will have a hearth in Zion," that is, I will be a householder in both spiritual and corporal kingdoms, and will give all blessings, but so, if ye obey my voice 2c.

But he uses in a special intention the word, which Moses also used Deut. 16, 2. and 26, 2.: "In the place, which the Lord, your God, will choose, that his name may dwell there. For in the beginning the tabernacle had no certain place, but wandered about, not only through different places, but also through different tribes, Ephraim, Manasseh, Dan 2c. Further, by this word he rejects all that men undertake of their own choice, or as Paul calls it [Col. 2, 23.], sselbsterwählte Geistlichkeit), of which there were innumerable among the Jews. For they thought thus: If the priests are free to take the tabernacle from one place to another, why should we not also be free to sacrifice in more than one place? This was surely idolatry; for since God had bound Himself to the mercy seat by His word that He would be there and be found, it was idolatry to believe that He was elsewhere or to seek Him in another place. That is why the prophets fight with all their might against people choosing anything other than what God chooses. For God curses nothing so much as that one should undertake or use something as a service of God which He has not commanded. Therefore, with us there should not be choice, but obedience, otherwise what Jeremiah threatens [Cap. 23, 33.] will happen to us: I will throw down what they have chosen. This serves to refute the self-chosen things we have seen in the Pabsthum. For that one vows himself to this order, another to another, that one keeps certain fast-days, has certain saints whom he calls upon 2c.: if you ask him who commanded it, his conscience compels him to answer that he has so chosen it himself. But this does not mean GOtte, but serving the devil. For

One does not serve God in any other way than by doing what He has commanded. Therefore, the choice is not ours, but GOtte's; but the obedience is for us to carry out what GOtte has chosen.

Then the word "choose" also serves against the presumption of merit. For if he said, I restore you to Zion, or I give you a reward, he would indicate that it was by our merit. But when he says, I choose according to my will, he indicates that he does it without regard to any merit, so that he at the same time condemns the worship that is feigned and the reliance on merit. Therefore, the self-chosen spirituality (xxxxxxxxxxxx) or, as Anselm puts it The factitiae religiones (self-made worship) is called the theology of the devil. For it does not help us that it was performed in good opinion. For this is not a good opinion, which is not based on the Word, but on one's own opinion. Therefore what Ambrose says, that the opinion decides about a work (intentionem judicare opus), is rightly spoken, but it must be rightly understood. For the final intention (intentio finalis) must have the word of God as its foundation and be based on it. For only he has a right opinion who can prove that he is compelled by God's word to undertake this or that. If someone does not have this word, beware of joining him or following him, even though everything would be angelica. This is therefore a very sure rule; if we follow it, we will never go astray; namely, that we should always ask whether God has chosen this. If one answers that Benedictus, Augustine, Franciscus chose it, which were also dear to God, let it flee as a plague and an extremely harmful poison, for it is certain that God does not approve of anything unless He Himself chose it. This is what I wanted to remind you with a few words about the word "choose".

v. 14. This is my rest forever; here I will dwell, for it pleases me.

This is truly a glorious promise, such as he never made about any other place.

has given. Therefore, we see that Isaiah [Cap. 33, 20] and the other prophets conclude that Jerusalem will last forever, that is, until the Messiah comes, who will make the temporal Jerusalem an eternal one, just as the angel says to Mary [Luc. 1, 32. f.] that Christ will sit on the throne of his father David forever. Furthermore, note the implication that this promise clearly entails. Jerusalem lies desolate today, and yet this promise evidently says that this will be the residence of the Lord forever; therefore it follows most certainly that he has come who has made this Jerusalem or this kingdom an eternal one. For though Jerusalem was laid waste in the Babylonian captivity, yet there remained remnants; the time was determined how long the captivity should last; there remained kings and prophets. Nothing of this kind exists now, as we have also shown above.

This is therefore a glorious promise that this Jerusalem would serve the Lord as a dwelling place forever and that it would never be destroyed. Trusting in this promise, they crucified Christ and committed all the atrocities, thinking that this would never happen, that Jerusalem would perish, because of the promise of eternal duration that it had. But we have heard that this was promised conditionally, namely if they kept the covenant and the testimony of the Lord. Therefore Jerusalem remained until Christ; after that it suffered the punishments of its sins, like other godless cities and godless kingdoms. So the prophets promise for sure that the gospel will come out of Zion and a new kingdom of Christ out of Jerusalem, but afterwards they add that this Jerusalem will be greater than the whole earth, its walls will be the ends of the earth 2c. This cannot be understood of the fleshly Jerusalem, which gave its beginning to the kingdom of Christ. But afterward it was desolated, just as the godless descendants of David were cut off; the godly remained until Christ was born.

Furthermore, it is known that this election began under David. For the city of Jerusalem had belonged to the Jebusites before that time,

But under David it was chosen by the promise of the Lord to be the royal and priestly city, so that as before the persons of the priests were not uncertain but certain, so also the persons and succession of the kings would be certain, and not as uncertain as before the judges and leaders were not fixed in a certain tribe. But he also uses the word "choose" here, 1) to punish the trust in merit, which generally clings to the hearts at all times, so that they recognize that by divine grace and the good pleasure of the Lord this city was destined to be the seat of divine service and of the temporal government. For the Jews especially suffered from this devilish vice, that they boasted of their works, their merit and their worship, just as Moses chided them for it, reminding them not to think that they had been granted such glorious benefits because of their righteousness, but because the Gentiles deserved such punishment and the Lord wished His people well. He says: "The Lord brought you into this land, not because of your righteousness" [Deut. 9, 4. ff.]. So we also see this diabolical trust in the Pabst, although under much worse circumstances than in the people of God, who used the service commanded by God. In Pabstism there is nothing but human choices, which are idolatry.

It seems that nothing great is said that God promises that he will dwell in Jerusalem, but one must look at the greatness of him who dwells there, then the place, no matter how lowly and despised, will become exceedingly exalted. For of him whom all heavens cannot contain, the word promised that he would surely be found in Jerusalem. Therefore, it is a glorious promise that one knows and has a certain place where God can be found, so that hearts do not wander in doubt, and everyone chooses a god or a place of worship according to his will. For this undistracted wandering, when the hearts of the

1) Namely in the Vulgate the words: "For it pleases me well" are given by: Hnoniam "Is'ā earn.

The people who arrange a place and a service for themselves, like Jeroboam, are nothing but idolatry. Therefore, it is an infinite mercy that God has appointed a certain place for the word and the whole service. Therefore, the glorious title was attached to this place that it was called the holy city, not because of the holy people who dwell there, but because of the holy Lord who dwelt there and sanctified everything through the Word.

The Church of the New Testament also has this glory, namely, that he is its head; not the pope, as the godless papists say in an ungodly way, but Christ, who sits at the right hand of God, who is with his word and sacraments. This is an immeasurable glory and cause to be proud (superbia), which does not come from our righteousness, but from the mercy of GOD, who accepts, approves and praises everything for the sake of His Son, our Head. But the city of Jerusalem also had the devil as its fiercest enemy for this reason, because it was, as it were, the workshop of God, in which God daily bestowed benefits of every kind and performed holy works. But it was nevertheless miraculously preserved and defended by God, so that it would not be uncertain where he was, where God wanted to be worshipped and heard. Again, we are reminded here that all this comes from His gift, not from our merit, from His mercy, not from our works, since He Himself chose this "rest" and it pleased Him to dwell in this place. So it is not from our merit that we have the gospel, baptism, private and public absolution; all these things are gifts of the merciful God who wants us well for Christ's sake. Now he moves on to worldly or temporal things.

V. 15. I will bless their food and give enough bread to their poor.

Our Latin translation [the Vulgate] has viduam ejus ["his widow" instead of victui ejus], but perhaps this is an error of an ignorant scribe. For the word actually means prey or hunt. But why does the scripture call our food like that?

Of course, for the same reason for which Christ calls our bread daily, that we, just as the animals daily pursue their prey and find it, do not sow, do not work, but everything falls to them, as it were, as prey, likewise also do not accumulate food for many years out of avarice and unbelief, but daily expect and receive the same from the hand of the Lord, but by the means of our work, and be satisfied with what falls to us daily, like the prey given to an animal. For avarice and unbelief are not satisfied with what is present, however faithfully God promises to feed us and give us what we need to live. In this way, Scripture very appropriately and characteristically calls food a prey that falls to us without our providing for it, but by working and leaving the care to our God, as Christ also exhorts in this way, Matth. 6, 25. ff. He commands us to work, to do and carry out everything that our profession entails. For the Hebrews call that work which every day has and brings with it. But he commands that we leave the worrying and the care to God, and he promises that we shall not lack food any more than the birds and other living creatures. For it is not intended that we should be insatiable in this life; for even if we had all the goods of the whole world, we must leave them all behind us with this life. But just as life is not certain, but like a kind of robbery or booty, which we enjoy as long as it seems good to the Lord, so also food is like a kind of robbery, with which we must live contentedly, but not be anxious about the future. Thus, this expression condemns ungodly worry and anxious unbelief, through which nothing is accomplished.

What follows: "I will give bread enough to their poor" is a familiar figure of speech, that "bread" is called what we are also accustomed to call food, that is, everything that belongs to subsistence, food and drink. This he promises, but "to the poor"; so calls

1) Instead of destia in the editions should probably be read dsstias. After that we have translated.

But he looks at his people. For he sees his church as it always is, that it alone hungers and thirsts in the midst of the riches of the world. Thus the Levites lived in a peculiar poverty in the beginning, until they finally sought dominion, just as our popes do. For the devil rules these things in such a way that he seeks to suppress the preaching ministry through hunger and contempt. Because many refuse to suffer this, they fall into the trap of preferring to teach what is pleasing to men rather than to starve, and thus come to great goods and dignities. Therefore, the godly must hold fast to this promise that the Psalm says the Lord will give bread to his poor. For both will happen: they will have bread, and yet they will be poor, because the kingdom of Christ is not of this world. Therefore, those who are in the preaching ministry and the noblest part of this kingdom must bear shame, hatred and contempt, or abstain from the preaching ministry. For the godly are promised a certain and eternal inheritance, not of this world, but of the life to come. Therefore Christ praises those who are spiritually poor, but at the same time have to endure a lot of misfortune. On the other hand, he says of those who have abundance and are full, that they are unblessed, because it will happen that they will have to weep. Therefore, we must make our reckoning in such a way that, if we want to be God's people, we will be content in this life if we have food and clothing, but bear everything else with equanimity and overcome it through the hope of the glory that will be revealed in the children of God.

V. 16. I will clothe their priests with salvation, and their saints shall rejoice.

This promise is far more delicious than the one we have already spoken of, because God promises that He will govern the priests in such a way that they will be pure and holy through the Word, and have a good conscience. If we could have this against the small lack of bodily things, we would bear the same more patiently. I have been a monk and I have lived in a lot of misconceptions and snares of conscience because of the amount of people.

The first hour gave birth to the second hour. Against nature, I was bound to the impure celibate state. If someone had told me at that time how dear I would have been to purchase peace with Christ and the great glory that we have today through the Word and the Spirit of God, I would have humbly prostrated myself to the ground and would have gladly given my life, and would have asked that only my conscience be made free. But now that we are clothed with salvation in truth, because of the exceedingly rich and clear promises of the forgiveness of sins and eternal life, we forget this spiritual riches and complain that we are not also kings in this bodily life; we do not prefer our eternal and spiritual glory [to the bodily one]. But this is great ingratitude, that one takes such offense at outward poverty, and does not rather rejoice and be glad in so great spiritual goods. For who, having such great gifts of the spirit, would not rather beg for bread from door to door than be bishop of Mainz or even pope, of whom it is known that, being enemies of the Word, they are extremely unhappy with the goods of the world? For they lack the forgiveness of sins, the hope of eternal life, the knowledge of Christ, and all other things which we have abundantly through the Word.

Therefore, even though we are despised, afflicted, sorrowful, afflicted, detestable, and poor in the sight of the world, we take comfort in the fact that we have the gifts of the kingdom of heaven, that through faith in the Word we become victors over sin, death, and the devil, because we are clothed wholly in salvation. How many were seized with despair before this happy time! Now, if they had had this knowledge of the grace of God and this comfort of the Word, do you not think that they would rather have suffered the loss of all the goods of the world? For when one feels the wrath of God and despair, then even immeasurable riches are considered nothing. For then what do arts, what cities, what kingdoms and principalities count for? For who would not gladly throw all this away in order to have only a calm heart?

Therefore Paul rightly calls this [1 Thess. 5, 23.] a complete part (*ὁλοκληρία*¹, because everything is based on this knowledge. For if we have to live here also on begged bread, is this not beautifully made up for by the fact that we are fed with the angels with bread [Ps. 78, 25.], and with eternal life, Christ and the sacraments? Whoever does not like this, may at least follow the pope and seek a cardinal's hat with the devil's forges 1). I pursue other goods, which the wise, who are either epicureans or academics, perhaps despise, but I prefer to all the precious stones of the world and all gold. Thirty years ago, if I had had the right understanding of even a single psalm, I would have felt like a kind of god, for at that time everything was full of the most shameful ignorance, abominations and endless idolatry. But now that the Lord has opened up to us a flood of heavenly wisdom and knowledge, we ungrateful people seek worldly goods and are so tender that we do not want to be deprived of what the world has. But in Isaiah [Cap. 28, 20.] it says that the bed is narrow, therefore there cannot be room for both. But we do not reject the goods, for they are God's gifts; therefore those to whom they are given may enjoy them with thanksgiving, and without giving offense to their neighbor. But to those who do not receive them, let them bear poverty with equanimity, as Paul says [Phil. 4:12], that he is able to do all things, to have and to lack, to eat and to hunger, to be praised and to be blamed 2c., namely, because we have another kingdom in heaven and are waiting for the Savior, who has begun to give us these things through the Word and the Sacraments. Let him leave us only the word and the priesthood pure and intact; we do not want to care much about the other things.

This is therefore an excellent promise and consolation, namely that the church and the Word shall remain until the end of the world, and this not from human counsel or wisdom, but by God clothing the priests with His salvation. Therefore, although under Ahaz and other godless kings everything was full of idolatry, there were certain prophets through whom the word was preserved. And in Christ's time there was an incredible blindness, the like of which, I believe, has not been seen among this people, and yet Hannah and Simeon were there at that time, who recognized and preached the newborn Savior. This is in truth God's gift and work, who in this way clothes His priests with salvation, that is, with the victorious word, with the right and holy service, so that we may hear from the mouths of men our salvation and our glory. These are more splendid garments than those of Aaron in Moses, that the teachers are clothed and adorned with the words of salvation and the doctrine of truth, with which they can not only teach their own in peace, but also refute the opponents. For here belongs also the garment of salvation, that is, of victory, which is obtained by the pure word and the wholesome ministry of preaching.

The second is that he also promises prosperity to the word, namely that all who hear those priests and believe the word will be sanctified, and their hearts will be filled with peace and joy, providing themselves with good things to God, which they know are pleasing to Him, and thinking that He is favorable to them. This peace of heart is our kingdom of heaven, which we have in this life. For it is an inexpressible treasure, in comparison with which the kingdoms and goods of the world are dung and dirt. Thus this Psalm connects these two pieces, that God will give the victorious word through the priests, and faith to those who hear us, so that all may be saved, and in the joy of the heart praise and glorify God for being so kind. If someone follows the outward appearance, he will judge that this is wrong, because these are spiritual words, which do not have to be understood according to the flesh. For if someone follows the appearance, he will rather judge from the pope and godless church servants that they are clothed with salvation. For these are sure to triumph, even when they set themselves against Christ and the true church;

1) is perhaps an allusion to Johann Faber.

On the other hand, the Christians or the true church are plagued by the devil inside and out, by heretics and persecutors. Of course, no one will call this salvation joy, but rather misfortune and constant sorrow. But turn your eyes from the outward appearance, and behold that majesty of which he speaks to you in word, and promises that it will be gracious to you. Therefore, if you are in favor with God, if He does not hate you but loves you, if He is favorable to you and protects you: Dear one, what then are all the misfortunes and hatred of the world? Are not all adversities, however great they may be, swallowed up in the abyss of God's mercy? as Paul also concludes [Rom. 8:31.], "If God is for us, who may be against us?" What harm can the devil do me with all the raging of the world, if God is favorable to me, if he receives me as his child and showers me with all spiritual blessings through the word of his victory?

V. 17: There shall the horn of David arise: I have prepared a lamp for mine anointed.

He still keeps the promise of the kingdom and the priesthood, that not only the salvation and the joy of the priests and the saints in the people should be preserved against the fanatical spirits, which were always present in this people, but also that this kingdom should be preserved outwardly against foreign enemies and the pagans, but at home against the rebels. For as among the Levites there were many seditionists and heretics, so among the rest of the people there were many rebels, as the histories show. How many did Saul have who did not recognize him as king, but disgraced and despised him! When he was killed and David was welcomed as king by the tribe of Judah, all the other tribes fell away from him in revolt and followed the surviving son of Saul [2 Sam. 2, 8. ff.] This discord was in truth a revolt, and it lasted seven years and six months, as 2 Sam. 5, 5. is clearly indicated. Who does not know, however, how many adversities through turmoil and wars David afterwards in his kingdom? After Solomon's departure, Jeroboam again caused a tremendous uproar. Against these evils, this psalm fortifies the people and promises that the horn of David will remain there, brought forth, as it were, by the Lord. This was the fate of this kingdom: the holy and pure priesthood was tainted by the devil through mobs that challenged the pure doctrine; in the secular regime he awakened rebels and disobedient citizens. In this way, the devil rages against the spiritual kingdom through lies and against the secular regime through murder, so that there is no shortage of lies and murder.

Just as this kingdom must not be regarded and judged according to outward appearances (for then it would appear as a weak, rebellious, powerless kingdom), so also the church has the promise of peace, but in such a way that it is troubled to its greater part by troubles, persecutions and other tribulations. Therefore, one must cling to the greatness of the promise, to the majesty of the word and the power (auctoritate) of the Promiser, who promises salvation in such a way that nevertheless rebels remain in the secular regime and angry heretics in the church. Here we need a strong heart to firmly believe that the world would love us if we were of the world. For if we wanted to flatter the pope and teach what he approves of, he would love us, not persecute us, not pass the sentence of excommunication on us. In the same way, the heretics and the mobs would not hate us so bitterly if we approved of what they like. For this is the constant course of the world, that those who want to be in the church are disposed to tolerate and overcome these annoyances with great courage, trusting in the promise of God. The promise, however, is entirely based on the fact that we should take comfort in the fact that we have a God who is favorable to us, and that the enemies of the Word should not overwhelm the Church, no matter how much they rage against it, namely because the Lord will bring forth the horn of David there, or as it is called in Hebrew, will cause it to sprout.

Well known is the passage in Zechariah [Cap. 6, 12.] of "Zemah" or the sprout. Therefore, some think that the word "shoot forth" is used here to indicate Christ in a hidden way, in whom the kingdom of David is confirmed in truth, and I do not argue very much against this; but I will still prefer to stick to the simple letter, that it simply promises David a certain place and certain descendants. But he uses the word "sprout" for the sake of indicating growth, just as in our way we call the emperor an increase of the empire (augustum) from "increase" (ab augendo). For if the empires were not preserved, they would perish; and to grow means to be preserved. Thus the church sprouts, even though it seems to be diminished because of persecutions, because the Lord sustains it and increases it daily through the Word and His Spirit. The meaning therefore is that the Lord will bless the horn of David, that is his kingdom, its power and strength, that he will rule it and preserve it. For he hath first of all made known the person, that the seed might be sure of the generation, and of the person, and of the place of the kingdom.

What follows: "I have prepared a lamp for my anointed one" is a Hebrew way of speaking, which is approximately the same as when we say: John Hus is the light of the Bohemian church; Leonhard Kaiser 1) is the light of Bavaria 2c because of his glorious confession of faith and his constancy. About the same the Hebrew calls "a lamp". But this image is used 2 Sam. 21, 2) 17: "Lest the lamp go out in Israel", and 2 Chron. 21, 7. of Joram "But the LORD would not destroy the house of David because of the covenant that he had made with David, and as he had spoken, to give him a to give light, and to his children for ever." For Joram was the last of the descendants of Solomon. For those who ruled after him were of the descendants of Nathan. This seemed to be very close to destruction under the Babylonian captivity, since the city was destroyed and the king was held in bonds. But the Lord chastised both the place and the person, but changed and did not reject them. At the time of Christ's birth, the dominion had passed from the tribe of David to the Maccabees and the Romans. Therefore, as far as the matter was concerned, this lamp was almost extinguished, but nevertheless, according to faith, it was still intact. For there were certain people from the tribe of Judah, from whom Christ was born afterwards.

"A lamp" he therefore calls the preservation of the kingdom, at least as far as the outward appearance was concerned, although as far as the thing itself was concerned, both the place and the person were in danger. For GOD was compelled to destroy and exterminate them because of their idolatry and presumption. Therefore, in Christ's time, the kingdom was taken away from the tribe of Judah. But it was followed by Christ, who built the New Jerusalem, which will never cease. A similar way of speaking is 2 Sam. 14, 7. "They will quench my spark," that is, my heir, that all my posterity may perish. Hence Solomon says in Proverbs, Cap. 31, 18: "Their lamp does not go out at night."

But it is also an emphasis on the word "I have prepared". For it indicates that this kingdom is fortified, not only against the enemies within, but also against all devils and the gates of hell, until Christ, and yet history teaches how it has been humbled by many a calamity. Thus we have the promise of the church that it shall remain until the end of the world, and that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it, and yet everyone knows very well how the church was humiliated and almost destroyed under the pope. It was preached and worshipped, not Christ, but Mary and the apostles. Therefore, if according to Christ's word, the days would not have been shortened, no man would have been saved [Matth. 24, 22]. This is what we must always do, that we esteem the greatness and the power of the Promising One greater than the aversions of the world and of the devil, and not allow ourselves to be deprived of courage when the pope rages against the church with the ban, the world with the sword. For although the church is no match for the adversaries either in number or in power, it will nevertheless remain, but the adversaries will perish. For He who is in us is greater than He who is in the world [1 John 4:4], and the Word will easily overcome all the raging of hell, because it is the eternal power of God.

V. 18. I will clothe his enemies with shame, but over him his crown shall blossom.

Not the king of Babylon, not the king of Syria, not Edom, not Moab, not Egypt, in short, no enemy will be subject to this kingdom, but this kingdom will endure until Christ, but all enemies of this kingdom will be clothed with shame. This light will not be extinguished until he comes who will fulfill everything. This throne, however despised and hated by the whole world, will remain in honor, not only before me, but also before the world. For even the devil, though he dealt solely with it, could not bring it about that the posterity of David should be cut off until Christ was born. The saints leaned on these promises as on a firm staff, yes, as on a rock, in the highest misfortune with which the devil plagued this people in his effort to prevent the promise of Christ. And truly, Antiochus Epiphanes, in front of others, with great difficulty, undertook to exterminate this people, but as this psalm promises, he was clothed with shame because he was an enemy of the holy people.

What the Latin [in the Vulgate] has translated by sanctificatio mea, that should have been translated: "His crown". For this is what he calls the kingdom. And from this word the Nazarenes have their name, of whom 4 Mos. 6, 2. is said. These had a peculiar worship, not unlike that of the monks. They abstained from wine and all strong drinks, they did not shave, either for a certain time, or during their whole life. Although this worship was at the will of the people, it was not of their own choosing, like that of the monks, but prescribed by God. Hence the Psalm takes the likeness; and as such men were Nazarenes, so, he says, shall David, or his kingdom, I say, become a Nazaraeolus, or a little crown, which he shall preserve, and so fortify, that it shall flourish as a kingdom very pleasing to God, and exceeding profitable to the world. For he intends that it will be despised in the world as a small and weak kingdom. But, he says, let not this vex you, 1) for to me it is a deliciously flourishing and fruitful crown, both in spiritual and bodily administration. In this way I understand it simply from the kingdom of David to Christ.

Those who prefer to follow the secret interpretation, and transfer all this to Christ, can do it without effort. For otherwise it is customary in the prophetic writings to add prophecies of Christ at the end, who is the right womb or sprout, and the right Nazarene, who is prepared by God to be an eternal light, which the devil cannot extinguish. For it is known without a doubt that this whole kingdom was a figure of Christ and his kingdom. For it is this one whose eternal throne is confirmed in the house of David, best reign lasts as long as the sun and the moon keep their course 2c.

So the psalm contains a prayer for the word and preservation of peace. For this, if we do not want to be ungrateful, we must mainly ask of God in our prayer. The hearts must be instructed in this way, so that they do not take offense or become angry when either the worldly government is challenged by the disobedience of the great crowd or the inequity of the authorities, or when the church is challenged by the false

Brethren and heresies. For it will not be otherwise: wherever there is the word and peace, the devil, the spirit of lies and murder, will try to disturb both. For this is the cause of turmoil, wars and mobs or heresies. Therefore, we must be fortified so that, since our adversary does not sleep, we may lay ourselves heartily against such aversions, considering them to be a kind of remembrance, often also ruths or punishments, which the Lord sends to make us amend, not that we should perish. For it is better to be plagued by the wicked mob than to be condemned. Therefore, the word and the laws remain, but the greater part of the people follow their lusts and do not care about the word in the church and the laws in the secular government. When we experience this, we have to bear it, because our sins deserve even more severe punishments. May God have mercy on us and bless us. Amen.

The one hundred and thirty-third Psalm.

Behold, how fine and lovely it is.

Although this psalm is short, it is also bright and clear enough as far as the matter and the meaning are concerned, with the exception of two foreign (barbaris) or rather holy and Hebrew figurative speeches (figuris), which are taken from things that are completely unknown among the pagans. For one must not call that which the Holy Spirit has wanted to use strange; rather, we want to call the dainty speech of the Greeks something strange (barbariem), since it is connected with godlessness and ignorance in relation to God. Now, as for the content, he praises the harmony or love in both regiments, the spiritual and the corporal, but mainly in the spiritual, and gives thanks to God for it. For this is not only an exceedingly beautiful gift, that the church is in harmony and the temporal government in peace, but also the source and origin of the greatest goods.

You might ask, where did David learn this, that this is so great and useful? But if you look at his history, it is easy to see that the teachers of this knowledge were Saul, Doeg and other violent people (Centauros [Ps. 52:2]) in the court of Saul, the previous king; likewise Absalom, Ahithophel; that is, David learned through many trials and long experience that there is nothing better than harmony and peace.

a quiet life. For it is true what is said in the proverb: Those have air to war who have never gone through it. For the young people, who still have ardent youthful blood, think that there is nothing more beautiful than war glory and victory, through which they can become famous. These carnal movements easily pass away afterwards, when such people experience their own and their own misfortune. But before the misfortune, the world does not realize what benefit peace creates; and indeed war is something sweet to those who have not experienced it, as the histories show, in which rebellious heads often denounce peace. Because people are generally sleepy and cowardly in good peace, they desire war as a seed of glory and an opportunity to show their bravery.

This attitude is implanted in us by sin, that we utterly disregard and flee the divine, necessary and best gifts of God, and freely pursue the devil's harm and misfortune, as is also said in a German proverb that men often strive to bring about misfortune for themselves, and in the Proverbs of Solomon [Cap. 20, 14.]: "Evil, evil, one speaks when one has it." For hearts are weary of the best things, because there is much of them. Although therefore the

Although peace is in truth the most exquisite of all goods, nature is so depraved that it prefers war. But just as the world cannot stand peace, so it can stand war even less. In peace one complains about the sluggish nature, in war one desires peace again. Now that the heathen call peace a golden one, that they say that through harmony small things become great, but through discord even the greatest fall apart, they do not believe that this is true, although they have learned it by experience, nor do they follow it, otherwise they would not seek an opportunity for war, and disturb the peace. What then should they do in spiritual things, which they do not understand at all, since they do not understand their visible things, both the good that peace brings and the evil that war brings, since they are weary of peace and rejoice at the occasion for unrest and wars, against their own judgment?

Now it is an exceedingly great gift to have peace, both in the world government and in the church, but after that it is also a gift when one recognizes that it is a gift. For one can see many who have peace and obedient subjects, but still do not enjoy this gift. Thus the duke in our neighborhood, 1) an outstanding persecutor and enemy of the gospel, has peace and a well-ordered secular regiment, but in the midst of this peace he has a restless spirit, since out of hatred for the Word he is always seeking new opportunities to reproach and destroy our religion. How much more would it behoove him to recognize the gift of peace and to use it with thanksgiving. We therefore exhort to gratitude not only for this gift, but also toward God, who gives us both peace and other things, so that we may learn how great peace and harmony are, that we attribute the same to God as the author, lest we become like the world, which does not recognize this gift, but forgets even in the use of God's gift, and is restless until it has caused a disturbance. May the Lord therefore grant us a better Life. For God knows that this life is completely and utterly useless, in which we not only do not keep the best things, nor do we seek to keep them, but do not even recognize that they are gifts. For neither the worldly nor the ecclesiastical authorities can ensure that we keep the gift we have, but people, as if they were blind and deaf, do not do what they approve of, but rather what sin in their nature and the devil drive them to do.

Thus it is not up to man, nor even to an angel, who is a better creature, but up to God alone to maintain the rulers (imperia), so that they do not fall completely over the heap through war and rebellion. He not only gave and restored peace, but also maintains it alone, even when we oppose the rebels in the worldly regime, but the swarm spirits in the Church of God. This Psalm calls upon us to recognize this gift, and exhorts us to give thanks for this gift, since it is in God's hands that we at least have some peace. But thanks be to God that we have this knowledge and know that peace is God's gift, even though we cannot govern and maintain it with our own strength. For this is not to make us despair of the lusts and wickedness of men, but rather to make us pray all the more diligently that the Lord may preserve and defend against Satan and wicked men what He has given. But let us come to the Psalm.

V. 1. Behold, how fine and sweet it is for brothers to dwell together in unity.

He has been in dangers and has learned by experience in turmoil and other disturbances not only how great an evil there is in discord and erroneous doctrine, but also how much good there is in harmony and sound doctrine. Therefore, he firmly holds that God preserves, governs and blesses these things. For I understand this Psalm from both areas, namely from the peace of the worldly regime and the church, as they are also connected by nature. For the peace of the worldly regime is also the peace of the church because of it.

1) Duke George of Saxony.

that in peace the word can be spread. He calls both the citizens and the priests "brothers". These are then in harmony when they feed the people with one and the same doctrine, when they do not quarrel with one another, and spread the wholesome doctrine as from one mouth, and the people believe the word. This peace in the church is a special gift and good, which is not only lovely, but also useful and honorable. So also in the secular government, when the reputation of the laws is firm, and the authorities diligently care for their subjects, while the subjects hold their authorities as dear as children hold their parents, and obey their commands (auctoritati). This psalm exhorts us to learn to recognize these gifts and to give thanks for them.

V. 2. Like the delicious balm that flows down from Aaron's head into all his beard, which flows down into his garment.

This is the foreign speech (babaries) of the Holy Spirit; if he is foreign to us, then we are foreign to him. Furthermore, the passage 2 Mos. 30, 23-30. is known, in which Moses is commanded to prepare this special ointment, with the prohibition, which is added, that this be done by no one else, nor be used for any other purpose than to anoint the highest priest. With this anointing oil this psalm compares peace, because it is a particularly holy and divine thing, which cannot be prepared or maintained by any human powers. For even though it is given to the ungodly, as we see in the kingdoms that are outside the church, it is in truth a gift of God and supremely holy, because it is to serve primarily for the holy use of spreading the worship of God, for preserving fidelity in marriage, for raising children, and for taking proper care for the maintenance of all respectability. If this could be persuaded to the fanatical people who disturb the peace of the Church with new and inconsistent doctrines of the Sacraments and other articles, namely, that the peace of the Churches is holy, and GOtte an exceedingly pleasant balm, completely separated from unholy: Uses: mean Wouldn't you think that they would act more carefully? But because they do not believe this, nor do they allow themselves to be persuaded of it, they consider him to be nothing. 1) That which they have sacrilegiously thought, they sacrilegiously pour out, and use this holy balm for unholy uses, that they may gain honor and a great name; yea, concord, the most holy thing, they hold to be a disgrace, and treading it under foot like dung, they do not use it as an ointment for the head. But how much different is the opinion of the Holy Spirit, who would have us esteem peace most highly and consider it the greatest sanctuary, as he indicates by the similitude presented in the most beautiful words.

But he expressly says "from the head", so that he indicates a right and quite intimate agreement. For if you look at the likeness, Aaron is first anointed on his head, then the anointing oil flows into his beard, and finally it comes down into the hem of his garment. So why does he mention the head? Certainly to show that where there is no unity, just as when there is no head in a kingdom, one goes here and the other there. But the church has Christ as its head. Therefore this balm, that is, the united teaching, must flow like a delicious anointing oil through the unity of the Spirit into the beard, that is, on the men who administer the office of teaching. For this means the beard that surrounds the mouth, the instrument for teaching. From there it is to flow upon the hems of the garment, that is, upon the rest of the Church, which is the garment of Christ. In this way the Holy Spirit desires that concord be thought a holy and exceedingly noble thing. But it is well known how few there are who allow themselves to be persuaded of this. For who does not see that the clamorous spirits, of whom Basil says very finely that they hum with their tongues (xx γλώσση βομβαι- vetv), regard this for their some honor, that they destroy concord? These turn back the psalm, and sing in their hearts, Behold, how fine and sweet it is to divide the brethren, that they do not dwell together in harmony, but one falls here, the other there. For they do not consider peace and harmony a balm, therefore they are always seeking new things, and do not think that they can be teachers or shepherds of the churches unless they depart from us and devise something new. We must flee from them and be careful not to be like them, but learn that the unity of the churches is a gift from God, which we must cherish, increase and protect with all our strength. For there is nothing more beautiful in the eyes of God and the angels than when they see that the teachers and masters of the churches are of one mind and teach and believe the same.

1) Here the Latin editions have no jnterpunction sign.

Of course, the pope has a beautiful harmony with his own, because even thieves and robbers are in harmony with each other, like Judas with the Pharisees. But this is not the harmony which this psalm praises. For the psalm praises the harmony that is among those who have the pure word. Therefore, it does not use any term in general, but one that refers to Aaron, who is appointed priest by God's voice, and specifically says of the beard that is joined to the mouth, to indicate that the unity of the teachers is poured out through the whole body of the church, that not only the body itself is refreshed, but the smell spreads everywhere, and the good name of the church is praised before God and the people who recognize this gift.

V. 3. like the dew that falls from Hermon on Mount Zion. For there the Lord promises blessing and life forever and ever.

"Hermon" is a mountain range which is close to Lebanon, therefore in another place [Ps. 42, 7.] he calls the land Hermonim Judea, which is surrounded by these mountains. As for this likeness, I believe that the prophet is speaking in a common way. For since the mountains seem to touch the sky to those who look at them from afar, it also seems as if the dew that falls from the sky or from the clouds falls from the higher mountains to the lower ones.

hill. Therefore he says that the dew of Hermon falls down on the mountains of Zion, because it seems to be so to those who see it from afar. But I think that this part of the verse refers to the worldly harmony, as the previous simile refers to the church, that God refreshes empires and kingdoms by peace, as the seeds and herbs are refreshed by the morning dew. The beginning of peace is with the princes themselves, as with Mount Hermon; from there it flows to the individual (privatos) citizens and the whole community, which is refreshed as by dew, so that everything is in bloom. For as by dew all that grows out of the earth becomes green again and increases, so by concord things increase, however small they may be. On the other hand, just as in great heat and blaze everything withers and perishes, so wars, riots and unrest destroy communities. This experience has also taught the heathen, and still teaches it, and yet we also experience in our people that they are tired of the long peace and are weighed down by it, and they seem unable to bear it, just as if it were an unbearable burden. Therefore, not only diligent exhortations through preaching are necessary, but also unceasing prayer, as the prophet now adds: "There the Lord promises blessing and life" 2c. 1) (For so [vitas] is written in the Hebrew [instead of vitam in the Vulgate]), that is, where GOD will dwell, where there is harmony. This is truly a glorious praise with which He adorns peace, and hearts should be encouraged by this praise to pursue peace, since they hear that GOD wants to dwell with such princes and teachers who love peace and help to achieve it. Therefore, it follows that where there are enemies of peace and who delight in unnecessary wars, such as the violent people at court (Centauri aulici) and the rebellious peasants, the devil dwells there with his angels,

1) Instead of "ete. in the Erlanger, the Wittenberger and the Jenaer read: illis. The latter is undoubtedly wrong, because this is neither in Hebrew nor in the Vulgate. The following remark, which we have put in parenthesis, refers to the word vitas instead of vitini in the Vulgate.

and that there God promises the curse, death and destruction.

There is an emphasis on the word "life," for it is in the majority like Ps. 63,¹) 4 For it denotes in general all that lives, or all the estates of life, priests, Levites, believers, authorities, artisans, citizens, peasants 2c. as if to say: all kinds of life, all estates, and all estates will be enriched by peace. This is truly a glorious promise. But is it not we who despise it so gloriously? Many are deliberately looking for occasions to disturb the churches; in the secular regime we learn how great the contempt for the laws 2) is. Through all this we force God, as it were, that He cannot promise us blessings and life. Therefore, we are subjected to many misfortunes because we despise the blessings that are so abundantly offered to us, even though the world is not healed even by misfortunes and punishments (flagellis). For what was the use of the Jews being so often afflicted with misfortunes of all kinds? Therefore, they finally had to be disturbed from the bottom up. Thus Lot preached to Sodom in vain, Noah preached to the first world in vain. The same danger also threatens us Germans: through Pestilence, war and famine will not punish us, nor will they make us better, so our downfall will follow.

Therefore, this psalm is a price of peace, so that we may consider it an exceedingly high and holy gift, and rather let everything else come into danger than that we should stand by rebellious and nefarious people. For even if one has to suffer something, it must be borne with equanimity, since everything is set right through peace, as someone has said so well that nothing is bought more cheaply than peace, because it bears the richest fruit for the one who buys it. In private matters we often learn that if someone bears a loss of ten or twenty florins with equanimity in order to keep peace, he thereby takes good care of his possessions, while another, who gives peace to it by chasing ten florins with quarreling and strife, often loses a hundred or more. If this happens in private matters, what do you think happens in the administration of communities and great empires? Therefore, we should learn to value peace and be grateful to God for such a great gift in the secular government and in the church. Then it will happen that we too will become aware of the promise of blessing and life, as the Holy Spirit promises. Amen.

The one hundred and thirty-fourth Psalm.

Behold, praise the Lord.

This is the last psalm among those which have the title: "Songs in the higher choir." In them you have heard many important and useful teachings, almost of all the articles of the whole Christian religion, of justification or forgiveness of sins, of the cross, of love, of matrimony, of authority, etc., just as if the prophet had set out to compile in these very short psalms an epitome of that which he had taught.

But now, in this psalm, he seems to conclude what he has set out to treat. This is also what we do when we pray at the end of the sermons that God may preserve His word for us and grant us that we may persevere in it. For if the word is pure, then all is well, holy and pure, no matter how much the gates of hell rage, and we do not believe in

We will not only suffer damage to our property, but also to life and limb. For what harm can that do us, if only our souls are saved? The word is therefore, that I say so, the quite general epitome (genus generalissimum) of all goods, since it preserves all goods. But if this is lost or corrupted, then all goods are lost at the same time. For just as, when the sun and the light of the world are gone, he who walks walks in darkness, so, when the word is darkened, danger also follows for the worldly government. For then neither rulers nor subjects, neither maidservant nor servant, know what they should do, but all is in error and thickest darkness.

Therefore, this psalm exhorts us to pray for the preservation of the word and 1) to strive each one among us to assist the church through this service. For although the church is never without heretics, just as the secular government is never without rebellious people, it cannot be otherwise if the word is still intact than that there are still many goods and at the same time also many pious people left. I therefore take this psalm to be a summa of the previous ones, in which he prays and exhorts that one gives thanks to the Lord for the gift of his word, so that it may also be preserved in the future, especially since, when the word is preserved, there are always some pious people to be found who live holy and pure lives. Therefore he says:

V. 1. Behold, praise the LORD, all ye servants of the LORD, which stand by night in the house of the LORD.

"To praise" does not only mean to thank God in particular (privately), but also to praise God publicly and to preach the Word of God. For this cannot be done without at the same time praising the mercy of God, who is at the same time our Creator, our Sustainer and our Savior, who brings with Him and has laboriously brought about everything that serves our life, not only this bodily life, but also the life to come and eternal life. But although the word

Although the term "servants of God" is actually used of the church servants, it generally refers to all those who confess and follow the right doctrine. For even those who are not in the ministry of preaching have the duty to confess the word and to acknowledge and praise the benefits of God. Therefore, he says, all of you make an effort, one as well as the other, persevere in the word, confess, praise, teach, exalt it, so that, since all the rest of the world blasphemes and desecrates God, you at least may be those who praise him, that he is merciful. Then it will happen that you, even though you are the weaker in number and strength, will still defeat all your enemies.

But why does he explicitly add: "You who stand at night in the house of the Lord"? Did they observe certain hours in the temple after the manner of the papists? It is a Hebrew way of speaking. For it denotes the same thing as we say in German, early and late, that is, continually, as it is also said above [Ps. 130:6. Vulg.], "From morning watch until night." Paul expresses this opinion in other words [Col. 3, 16.], "Let the word dwell among you richly all the time," and Christ says [Luc. 18, 1.], "Pray without ceasing." For since the time of night is appointed for sleep, he that praiseth by night shall do the same by day, and so praise always. There is also in the word "ye stand" a Hebrew way of speaking. For it does not denote the posture of the body, as the Carthusians used to pray standing, but the profession. Therefore, when he says, "You who stand," it is the same as when he says, "You who are ordained and called to the house of the Lord, that you should praise and preach the Lord there, not only by singing, but also by interpreting the word of God, by exhorting the faithful to faith, patience, love. 2c.

V. 2. Lift up your hands in holiness and praise the Lord.

Not unwillingly I would like to translate: Lift up your hands in a pure and holy way; but grammar is against it, although it comes out to the same opinion. For he who prays in the sanctuary must pray purely, that is, lift up pure and holy hands, as Paul says

1) et is missing in the Erlanger.

[1 Tim. 2, 8.] otherwise he will pray in vain. But clean hands signify innocence, especially of blood and robbery. Now the prophet indicates that there are two kinds of people who come to the temple and pray; some come and pray in innocence and holiness, others pray in hypocrisy, and have hands stained with blood, since they are inflamed with hatred against the right doctrine and the whole preaching ministry. Their prayer is sin, as the Psalm says [Ps. 109:7]. In this way Paul also commands from prayer [Phil. 2, 14.]: Pray without murmuring and without doubting, Haesitatio [hesitation] is the same as dubitatio [doubt], namely where there is not the right trust in the mercy of GOD. "Murmuring" is the impatience that the delay or postponement of the answer brings. This is generally connected with the desire for revenge. Likewise Christ says [Matt. 5:23], "If thou wilt offer thy gift upon the altar, and there thinkest that thy brother hath aught against thee, go and be reconciled to thy brother, and then offer thy gift." For this is a common thing, that hypocrites, after having heaped every kind of insult upon the brethren, not only are not conscious of any wrong, and excuse their doings, but also feign a peculiar zeal for religion and holiness, and boast of the gospel more highly than the true Christians, and are sure of being inflamed with hatred and envy against their neighbor.

Against these people the Psalm reminds them that if they want to pray in the holy place, they should be pure and holy. For whosoever prayeth, and is possessed and entrapped either by covetousness, or unchastity, or wrath, or some other devil, unto him saith the Lord, Why declareest thou my statutes, and takest my covenant in thy mouth, when thou hast had discipline, and castest my words behind thee? When thou seest a thief, thou runnest with him, and hast fellowship with adulterers. "2c., Ps. 50:16-18. Such was the prayer of the Pharisee who went out of the temple unjustly [Luc. 18:14.]. For this is a very common pity, that those who are the most impure, should more and more persistently more glorified than the truly godly. This is why the Scriptures explicitly state that some use the name of God uselessly, who are nevertheless defiled and godless in heart and life, and the prophet attacks the hypocrites at this point, who think that God, when they pray, does not see the impurity of their heart. Therefore, it is a necessary request that God first give the word and keep it against the swarms and heretics, and then also that He keep us in innocence and guard us from hypocrisy.

V. 3. The Lord bless you from Zion, who made heaven and earth.

We have mentioned Zion several times in these lectures. For God wanted that not only the customs (ritum) and the persons, but also the place of worship should be certain, so that the hearts would not wander in uncertainty and choose for themselves certain places for worship. But because the matter was not without trouble (for what could be more inconsistent than that the God of heaven and earth should be shut up in that darkness?), therefore, to strengthen the hearts, he says that the Lord who dwells in Zion is the Creator of heaven and earth. This we have often said, and it is useful that it be often inculcated, lest we choose peculiar worship. For just as in the Old Testament there was a certain place, certain persons, certain times, to which God had, as it were, bound His divine service, so with us we find the Father in Christ alone. In Christ the Father is worshipped and found; apart from Christ he can neither be worshipped nor found, but everything is condemned that is worshipped apart from Christ.

Therefore the summa is: To you priests I say, to you I exhort, that you follow the word, and execute your office purely. For if the word and the ministry remain unharmed, there is nothing that can harm you. For even if the devil and the world set themselves against us, what is the matter? For, "If GOD is for us, who can be against us?" [Therefore, let this be your first concern, that you teachers take care of the preservation of the word.

may God help you 1) in this! For this is the right and noblest blessing of God. This could be explained even more extensively, but it may be enough that we have pointed it out. Our task today is that, because the Word shines so brightly to us, we also apply ourselves to the same care and spend all our effort on it, and take care in every way that we do not lose the Word again through our ingratitude. This will happen when also we pray for the churches that God may bless them through His Son, our Savior, Lord and God, Jesus Christ, to whom be praise and glory forever and ever. Amen.

Luther finished the songs in the higher choir at Wittenberg in the year of the Lord 1533 on October 27. However, they were written down in Nuremberg and finished in 1540 on January 26.

1) Erlanger: vos; Wittenberger and Jenaer: nos. Only in the following Luther goes over from the present time, therefore Ww have preferred the former reading.

2) Instead of "so" in the editions, either eas or üs should be read, referring to eeeesüs. In later writers, benkäicere also occurs with the accusative.
