Foreword.

In Walch's old edition, this volume contains 2983 columns, of which only 385 are originally written in German, namely "der Psalter deutsch", "die Summarien über die Psalmen" and "die Auslegung über die sieben Bußpsalmen"; everything else has had to be edited from the Latin. Completely newly translated are "Luther's works on the first 22 Psalms" (operationes in psalmos), the "short interpretation on the 23rd, 24th and 25th Psalms" and "the interpretation on the fifteen songs in the higher choir", together 2216 columns. Revised from the Latin are "Luther's short interpretation of the first 25 Psalms" and his "short interpretation of several other Psalms", 382 columns. Why such an extensive new translation was necessary will be seen from the following.

Luther did not want to eliminate his first translation "in the manner of the Hebrew language" of 1524 by the changes he made with the Psalter translation up to the year 1531, but rather the same, as he says in the final speech to the Psalter edition of 1531,

"We also leave it as it is, for the sake of those who wish to see our examples and footprints of how to get closer and closer through interpretation. That is why we, like Walch, have added this translation to this volume.

In the "Summaries on the Psalms" we have been able to gain a clearer understanding in some places by comparing the Latin translation of Jonas.

Of the translation of the first nine Psalms of the operationes in psalmos and of the 22nd Psalm by Stephan Roth (Roth) we have already said in the first note to this writing that it is all too free and extremely incomplete. It would rather be called a free adaptation of Luther's writing than a translation of it. We have given proof of this in the note to § 69 of the first Psalm. Large sections are missing at the end of the first and second Psalms, more than a third of the third Psalm is omitted, and about half of the fourth Psalm. In the fifth psalm, at § 294, six pages (of the Latin Erlangen edition) are omitted-

In the eighth Psalm, §§ 8 and 9 do not make up one column in Roth, but seven pages in the Latin; § 12 and § 13 are placed there. Such arbitrariness and omissions are found throughout in large numbers, but also several times very gross errors, since not only a word, but the whole sense is missed, which we now want to prove with some examples. The Latin is given according to the exegetica opera of the Erlangen edition, Roth's translation according to the fourth volume of Walch's old edition.

In § 36 of the first Psalm Luther says: "But this will [voluntas, the desire for the law] comes from faith in GOD through JEsum Christum", and then continues (Art. XIV, 25): Ceterum voluntas, quae metu poenarum extorquetur, servilis est et violenta, quae autem cupiditate praemiorum allicitur, mercenaria est et simulata, that is: On the other hand, the will, which is wrung out by the fear of punishment, is a servile and forced one; but the will, which is brought about by the request of reward, is that of a hireling and a pretended one. Roth (Col. 287, § 36): "The other desire, which is forced out of fear of punishment, is a fictitious, coerced, and hypocritical desire or will, which looks only to the promise and to the reward or merit." - Ar! XIV, 29: [qui] suas beatitudines despiciat == who despises their [the world's] blessedness. Roth (Col. 293, §48): "that.

he despises his own righteousness (sic) (of which the hypocrites alone know)". - Ar. XIV, 265: si interna videas - when you look at what is inside. Roth (Col. 595, § 268): "when you look at their outward walk". - Erl. XVI, 244: Neque enim sub lege ceremoniali factus est tantum = For he [Christ is not merely done under the ceremonial law. Roth (Col. 1640, § 17): "But he is not alone put under the law, that he should stand in ceremonies and outward pomp". At the end of the same paragraph he has taken odium as nominative, while it is accusative. - Ar. XVI, 249: in quae mersi sumus Roth (Col. 1648, § 30 z. E.) refers the quae to necessitate instead of mala, thus letting it reign in the nominative. - Ar. XVI, 263: haec tria, which refers to Ps. 22, 5. and the two parts of v. 6. Roth (Col. 1668, § 73) understands from v. 4. - Erl. XVI, 275: et leviathan vocatur, Roth (Col. 1689, § 115) refers leviathan to the law, while it should be understood by the devil. - Erl. XVI, 297: tamen res gesta subintelligi doceret - yet the fact would teach that it [the missing verbum should be completed. Roth (Col. 1730 §184): "nevertheless the thing itself can be understood by it". - About a passage quoted (Ar! XVI, 332) from the 35th Psalm according to the Vulgate, Roth says (Col. 1787, §283): "according to the Greek text".

What now the translation of the remaining

The text of the first Psalms, from the tenth to the twenty-first, by M. Joh. Jakob Greiff, is indeed correct, as the Leipzig edition states in its preliminary report to the fifth and sixth volumes, and Walch, Vol. IV, preface p. 9, about "his having used praiseworthy diligence" and "having followed Latin exactly. 9, state "that he has applied praiseworthy diligence" and "has followed the Latin exactly", but it cannot be denied that his understanding of the Latin words, although his translation is mostly literal and possible according to the words, does not correspond to Luther's meaning in many cases. This can already be proven in the first preface to this writing "to the students of theology" (Col. 2U f.), since in it, as short as it is, multiple proofs for our assertion can be found. In this preface, Luther appeals to the slanderers and blasphemers who accuse him of being driven by ambition to be seen as an interpreter of the most difficult and most important books of Scripture, to the fact that the teaching office, the doctorate, was given to him, which (despite his incompetence and unworthiness) required him to proclaim God's word in wider circles. He also expresses the same in his letter to the Elector. Greiff did not recognize this main purpose of the preface, and therefore also missed the correct translation. Creditum est, that is (Gal. 2, 7.), "it is trusted to me [the Magisterium]", he translates: "One has believed until now" 2c. - The words: quam lingua per regiones vagari == as far wander around with my speech through the countries (the opposite is: to murmur in the corner), Greiff translates: "than to let speak of me in all countries". - eo magis mihi displicet professio - the more we dislike my teaching ministry. Greiff: "the less I am pleased with my profession". This translation is not wrong, but because he did not translate the word professio, it is insufficient and doubtful, because professio can also mean monastic vow. - quando eo mihi venerit, ut gravioribus intento == since it has come to this with me, as one who subjects himself to grave things. Greiff: "when it will come to that with me that I will be challenged with harder temptations". The word ut is here adverbium similitudinis, but Greiff takes it as consecutivum and yet constructs it with the indicative; intento, which is participium perfecti passivi of intendo, he takes as first person Ind. praes. of intentare and translates this by the future tense. - Hoc vos agite is translated twice by Greiff in the two possible ways: "kehret euch nicht daran" and "thut diese Liebe an mir". The correct translation here is the former. - All of the above occurrences are in the Latin (Erl. XIV 14) in the range of less than one page, so we have omitted to indicate the location here,

An interesting example from Melanchthon's preface demonstrates in a striking way how fundamentally wrong an approach to the quo- rundam [librorum canonicorum] talis damnandum censeam, aut ecclesiam Dei est conditio, ut in reliquos vel elenchi vel calumniari velim, quod usa sit hac commentarii vice esse possint - some [of the canonical books] are of such a nature that they can serve as an instruction or instead of an interpretation for the others. Greifs (Col. 267¹): "and some are of such a nature that they can be used by the others, either instead of a refutation, or interpretation". So he lets poor Melanchthon say that some canonical books can also be used to refute other canonical books!

The translation of the interpretations of the Psalms themselves, which Greifs provided, is teeming with errors. Erl. XV, 146: Si quem nostra translatio movet, . . . potest eo fugere - If someone takes offense at our [Latin] translation, . . . he can thereby get out of the offense. Greifs (Col. 892, § 24): "Whoever likes our translation,... can refer to the fact that" 2c.; he thus regards "our translation" as Luther's translation. - Likewise XV, 150: quod noster dixit - that our [Latin] translator has said. Greifs (Col. 898, § 34): "What we have translated here." - This mixing and confusion of Luther's translation and the Vulgate runs pretty much through Greiff's entire translation. Url. XVI, 8: Xostrā autem translatio, etsi abundet suo sensu, Hebraeo tamen an quadret videbimus, non quod ideo translatione tanto tempore == Although our [Latin] translation follows its own sense very much, let us see if it agrees with the Hebrew. Not that I think it should be rejected for that reason, or that I want to blame the Church of God for using this translation for such a long time. Greifs (Col. 1271 f., § 13): "Although our translation is only made according to our discretion, we want to see if it does not rhyme with the Hebrew text. My opinion is by no means this, as if I wanted to condemn the Hieronymum because of this, or blaspheme the Church of God, because it has used this translation for so long." He seems to take "our translation" for Luther's translation, because it is "only made according to our discretion", and for the Vulgate, because "Jerome and the Church of God have used this translation for so long". - Erl. XVI 13 f.: Sequitur alius versus - "Now follows the other verse." This translation, which Greifs also has, is of course correct, but he adds (Col. 1279 z. E.): "which in the Latin Bible thus reads". Now Luther did not give the following text according to the Vulgate, but in his own translation. - Col. 1327, § 97 at the beginning (Erl. XVI, 45) takes Greif's nostram (the Vulgate) again for Luther's translation.

Such errors as the ones just mentioned impair the understanding of whole, partly extensive, sections. In addition, as already mentioned, Greifs does not lack numerous misunderstandings in detail. Pontifices (Erl. XV, 144 and 148) is Col. 889, § 19 rendered by "popes" and Col. 895, § 29 by "high priests"; in both cases, "bishops" should have been substituted. - Eri. XV, 149: Sed diabolo et iniquitati deputant [verbum et opus Dei] - but assign it to the devil and to iniquity. Greifs (Col. 896, §31): "they dedicate it to the devil and their wickedness". - Erl. XV, 167: conscientia malae fidei-his [of fraud] evil conscience. Greiff (Col. 923, § 72): "one to whom his evil conscience says that he does not have the right faith." - Eri. XV, 181: Peccatorem et peccatum pro impio et impietate dixit- The Latin translator has said "sinner" and "sin" instead of "the ungodly" and "ungodliness". Greiff (Col. 944, § 109): "The Holy Spirit has here set the word, sinner and sin, before the ungodly and ungodliness." He makes the Holy Spirit the subject of this sentence, although Luther, immediately after in the same sentence, states that Jerome spoke more correctly. - Erl. XV, 195: Si unus est, qui elabatur -- If there is one man who escapes them. Greiff (Col. 968 f. § 18): "If only one arrow (unus [sagitta]!) escapes them." - Erl. XV, 198: Qui sordent, sordescant adhuc

-- He who is unclean, de33r be unclean after all [Revelation 22:11]. Greiff (Col. 972, §21 z. E.): "That those who are deaf may become still more deaf." - Drl. XV, 199: Non enim latine dicitur --- That is not how one speaks in Latin. Greiff (Col. 974, §24): "hat der lateinische Uebersetzer gar wohl gegeben." - Erl. XV, 201: Coelum et terra nihil differunt nisi fide et specie - Heaven and earth are distinguished in nothing but in faith and specie. Greiff (Col. 976, § 26): "Heaven and earth are distinguished by nothing but by faith and specie." - Erl. XV, 226: non habet satis nec audisse nec obedisse - he does not have enough in that he neither hears nor obeys us [but also wants to rule over us]. Greiff (Col. 1014, § 26): "he is not content with this, that he has the honor to hear and obey us." - Erl. XV, 283: fiduciam -- a trust. Greiff (Col. 1100, §62): "no trust". - Erl. XV, 288: et Paulo opus est credi ----- it is necessary that one believes Paul. Greiff (Col. 1107, § 71): "just as Paul also had to have faith". - Erl. XV, 306: partis frui - to enjoy this part [that works]. Greiff (Col. 1132, § 112): "to enjoy a part of it". - Erl. XV, 310: crucifixi --- of the crucified. Greiff (Col. 1138, §124): "of the crucifix". - Erl. XV, 311: ne temporalia temporalia sint -- so that the temporal goods are not temporal [but spiritual. Griffin

(Col. 1139, § 124): "so that the goods lent for a time may bear perpetual interest", - Erl. XV, 319 the author of the epistle, is taken by Greifs (Col. 1151, § 143) as Judas Iscarioth. - Lid. XV, 325: suffragia - way of help [that is, intercession]. Greifs (Col. 1163, §14): "canonization." - Erl. XV, 332: pro palliis --- for the pallia [which we must buy from them. Walch, St. Louis ed. vol. XVIII, 1008, §7]. Greifs (Col. 1174, § 33): "for our [wool and] coats, stie they take from us,]" - Erl. XV, 333: Annon movetur persona paupertatis, . . . oppressionis eorum? - Does he [the righteous] not let himself be moved by their [the godly's] low standing, which they have because of their poverty, ... their oppression? Greifs (Col. 1174, §34): "Does not the contemptible reputation of his person, according to which he is poor.... and oppressed?" - Erl. XV, 337: Ita etiam eos damnat -- So they also unanimously condemn those. The subject of this sentence is omnium sensus. Greifs (Col. 1182, § 43): "So also GOtt condemns those". - Erl. XV, 360: Consummationem et abbreviationem faciet Dominus, that is (according to Is. 10, 23. in the Vulgate): because the destruction, and that the destruction is controlled, that will the Lord do. Greifs (Col. 1220, §43): "for the LORD will do this, and make your great multitude smaller, and bring them to nought". - Erl. XV, 369: ut intellectus sit id ipsum consilium --so that intillectus [in the Vulgate] is just the council. Greifs (Col. 1236, § 69): "that the intellect would be: this very rath" 2c. - Erl. XVI, 19 f.: qui sciam, quam soleas me dignanter audire --- since I know how you graciously hear me. Greifs (Col. 1289, § 38): "as I know how thou art wont to hear me according to dignities." More dignified here is: condescending, graciously, not: according to dignities; the latter would violate right doctrine. - Lrl. XVI, 35: ut non sit impius - that the wicked be no more [that is, no longer exist]. Greifs (Col. 1312, § 74): "that he be no more an ungodly man." - Erl. XVI, 44: quibus nihil non impendunt --- to whom they turn everything. Greiff (Col. 1325, §92): "to whom they may turn nothing".- Erl. XVI, 59: irreparabilis poena --- a punishment that cannot be averted. Greifs (Col. 1353, §33): "an irreparable punishment". - Erl. XVI, 122: Coram hominibus, ubi exemplum valet, non videtur nisi via ecclesiae esse ----- Before men, where the example applies, it seems to be only the way of the Church [not of God]. Greifs (Col. 1446, § 173): "Before men's eyes, where their exemplum counts for nothing, it seems to be no other than the general Church's way." - Erl. XVI, 135: Docemur christianum esse ----Uns is taught that it is Christian. Greifs (Col. 1465, § 209): "We are taught to be Christians." - Erl. XVI, 142: facere quod in se est - that man does as much as is in him. Greifs (Col. 1478, § 17): "the doing out of one's own strength, which is already in us. Greifs seems to have lost the context of "of one's own strength" and then translated quod in se est by "that is already in us. - Erl. XVI, 158: ad revelationem gentium paratus - [Luc. 2, 31. f.] prepared to enlighten the Gentiles. Greifs (Col. 1503, § 53): "who has been prepared for the discovery and revelation of the Gentiles". - Erl. XVI, 173: quam plurimi and plures -- "very many" and "a great number." Griffin (Col. 1527, § 86): "not many" and "fewer". - Erl. XVI, 175: [Testimonium] de non parentibus docet - The testimony teaches of the things not seen [Heb. 11, 1.]. Griffin (Col. 1530, §91): "it teaches of those who are not obedient to it". That parentibus must be translated here as we have given it proves §61 ff.

Since there are so many gross, palpable errors in Greiff's translation, one will not be mistaken if one concludes that there is no lack of lesser errors. However, we hope that the reader will gladly refrain from proving this, since he certainly has enough of the given evidence. In addition, here and there quite clumsy expressions are chosen, e.g. "an elevated silver" (Col. 1029, §54) instead of: purified silver (argentum sublimatum); "in which [Haderwasser] the judges

A pleasant contrast to this work is the excellent translation of the following text, "Luther's Short Interpretation of the First 25 Psalms", the best that the present editor of Luther's writings has come across so far. It is made by Basilius Faber, the same who also translated the first two parts of Luther's great interpretation of the first book of Moses, as he rightly says, "in the most simple and faithful way". Only rarely is there an oversight, which, by the way, could also have happened to another good translator. Because the errors are so few, we place them here in their entirety, Erl. XVII, 64: verbo Dei institutus Faber (Col. 1917, § 5) translates: "instructed and kept with God's word", which is correct according to the words. But according to the context it should have been translated: [David is] instituted by the word of GOD [to be king. - Col. 1920, § 12 the word majoribus (Erl. XVII, 66) is translated by "their ancestor", it should mean: their superior. - Erl. XVII, 80: in fide, since it continues a German speech, Faber took for a German word and therefore put (Col. 1942, § 5): "im Friede" instead of: im Glauben. - Erl. XVII, 142: tum Faber translates (Col. 2030, § 21): "in their time" [of the prophets]; it should have been said: then [at the time of the exodus from Egypt], - Erl.

xvii, 167: Sed hoc est nihil dicere -- But that is nothing said. Faber (Col. 2064, § 26): "But what is this but that one says." - Twice he has thoughtlessly followed the original, namely Col. 2148, § 38: "not to reckon," where it should be "to reckon," and Col. 2153, § 55, where it is "the sin of reconciliation," instead of: the reconciliation of sin.

With such good condition of this writing it was not necessary to translate it anew, but we could limit ourselves to improving it. However, one must not think that this was done by inserting these few corrections. Several times there are obsolete, now no longer comprehensible idioms, which had to be replaced by more acceptable ones, e.g. Col. 1906, §15: "Is mildly spoken", that is: this is an exaggerated speech (εστὴν ὑπερβολή); Col. 2041, §61: "wandelhastig", that is, not without change, corrupt (corrupti). Often, in order to make the translation more accurate and the expression more appropriate for our time, whole sentences had to be rearranged. We will also give an example of this. One sentence, Col. 2028, § 17, reads in Faber: "I have, he says, suffered perilous hardship, at the same time by force and cunning, and have been assaulted with mighty and deceitful deeds, even to the death, and so that I have also often been overpowered, that I have thought I must remain. Our translation (Erl. XVII, 140): I have suffered dangers both by force and by guile, and have been attacked by force and by guile, to the death, and so that they have also often had the upper hand that I have thought: I must stay. - Likewise, at the end of the same paragraph; Faber: "Now he continues to tell his opportunity." Our translation: Now he adds a narrative. - Furthermore, there are a large number of different readings, which, according to all appearances, are to be put on the printer's account. In Col. 1877, we find the superscription: "Faith and suffering. These words read in Latin (Erl. XVII, 37): Crede et patere -- believe and suffer, and should form the conclusion of § 10. - Col. 1907, § 17 should be read instead of: "sin" hour; Col. 1917, § 7 instead of: "someone" those; Col. 1924, §5 instead of: "prayer" Gebäu (this reading is confirmed by Col. 1933, § 6); Col. 1935, § 9 instead of: "unworthy" immature; Col. 1951, § 34 instead of: "bleibet" leidet; Col. 1955, § 4 instead of: "der Worten" der Orten (this correction had already been made by Walch); Col. 1959, §16 instead of "Kind" Kunde; Col. 1970, § 8 instead of: "wir" will (this correction had been made by Walch; but the Erlanger has put the wrong reading back into the text, Erl. Vol. 38, p. 113); Col. 2037, § 50 instead of: "leidlich" leiblich (corporale); Col. 2105, § 58 instead of: "rühmet" rühret; ibidaselbst instead of: "behavior" herhalten. All these things, taken together with the necessary comparison, reading and rereading, require such an effort of time and effort that the ver-

The new translation of such a good manuscript is almost equivalent to the new translation of a manuscript that is half as large.

It is not necessary to say anything here about the following writings of Luther, because at the beginning of each of these writings the necessary information has been given in the form of a note to the superscription, sometimes in great detail. However, we consider it our duty, and we are sure that the friends of Luther will be grateful to us, to put in a good word for the last text of this volume, "Die Auslegung der fünfzehn Lieder im höhern Chor". The conditional praise of Seckendorf (Hist. Luth., lib. III, § 81, p. 301), which Walch reproduces in his preface, p. 20 f., as follows: "although Lutherus could not exactly [have] overlooked this work because of his overloaded business, nevertheless one finds much in it by which one can recognize how godly and spiritual Lutherus was, and therefore such explanations can be read with edification," is also printed in the Latin Erlangen edition, tom. XIX, p. 155, without adding anything itself. This faint praise, which is more like a rebuke, may well have some justification if one forms one's judgment according to the very different German translations. Seckendorf used the German Altenburg edition almost throughout and also quotes from it. Some of these translations are, however, highly deficient, and especially those of the man who has the most famous name among the translators of these interpretations, Georg Majors. Our judgment, which is based on the Latin original, is completely different. Veit Dietrich has rendered Luther's interpretation in an excellent manner. We believe that this work is on a par with the "Detailed Explanation of the Epistle to the Galatians", which Georg Rörer copied, and with the Hauspostille, which also did not come from Luther's own pen, but was recorded by M. Veit Dietrich. In the same way as these two aforementioned writings, this one can also become a rich treasure trove for theologians and provide them with material for sermons of various kinds. However, every householder would like to use it with rich edification for himself and his family for home worship.

God grant that we may faithfully use these and other writings of Luther for our salvation and that of those who are commanded to us. Amen.

VI. D. Martin Luther's Interpretations on the Psalms.

1. the Psalter,

2. Germanized by D. Martin Luther after the manner of the Hebrew language.*) 1524.

Foreword to the Psalter.

The Hebrew language is so rich that no language can attain it sufficiently; for it has many words that are called singing, praise, extol, honor, rejoice, afflict, 2c., since we hardly have one. And especially in divine holy things it is rich in words, that it has ten names, since it calls God, since we have no more than the one word:

God, that it may well be called a holy language. Therefore, no interpretation can go as freely as it does in Hebrew itself, without what is left of the fancy words that are called figuras. 8, in which it also surpasses all tongues. But in order that the Psalter may be the brighter in some places, I will further delete some words here.

*) This writing is the first complete German translation of the Psalter. There is a threefold arrangement of the Psalms: 1524, 1528 and 1531 (Knaake with Köstlin, Martin Luther [3. Aufl. P. Bd. 11, p. 659 uck p. 252]. The first translation, which is closest to the Hebrew, is our scripture. Luther continually improved it, so that even in the three editions published in 1524 there are several changes. Then, in 1528, he made sweeping changes to the Psalter edition, but finally, around Easter of 1531, as he says in the preface to the Summaries, he "improved it for the last time, and we intend to leave it at that". Why Luther changed and improved so tirelessly, we can see partly from his letter to Wenceslaus Link of January 15, 1531 (De Wette, vol. IV, p. 214): "We will take pains, not to make David better than before, but to make him sound more purely German, by giving the slanderers cause to have something by which they can exercise and sharpen their raging hatred of our translation, but still not be satiated," and also from Luther's postscript, which is appended to some Psalter editions of the last revision: "If anyone wants to be clever and pretend that we have drawn the Psalter too far from the words, let him be clever with himself, and let us leave this Psalter unblamed. For we have done it knowingly, and certainly kept all words on the gold scale, and translated them with all diligence and fidelity, and have also been learned people enough. But we also leave our previous German Psalter for the sake of those who desire to see our example and footprints, how one comes closer and closer with interpretation. For the former German Psalter is in many places nearer to the Hebrew, and farther from the German; this is nearer to the German, and farther from the Hebrew. Of this further, if God will, in the Summaries." (The last sentence is added after Köstlin I. e. Vol. II, p. 659 nck p. 252.) Luther's intention, then, was to speak in a truly German manner, to bring the Psalter ever closer to the understanding of the German people. The text of 1531 has also become part of our German Bible. - The first edition of our text appeared in Wittenberg in 1524 in quarto. At the end of it are the two coats of arms of Luther, the lamb with the flag of victory and the white rose with the cross in its heart. Below it is noted: "This sign is witness that such books have passed through my hand; for false pressures and book spoilage are now much industrious." This first edition follows the basic text most exactly, and it is therefore given preference over all others. I. G. Zeidler printed it in the Hallische Theile (1702) p. 475 under the title which we have placed above this text. From this, it has passed into the Leipzig edition, Vol. IV, p. 341, also into Walch's edition. The second edition in folio is: "Das Dritte teyl des allten Testaments. Wittemberg, 1524" (the Book of Job up to the Song of Solomon); Walch has marked it "zu rathe gezogen". The third edition in octavo has the title: "Der Psalter deutsch. Martinus Luther. Wittemberg 1524", and is by the General Superintendent of the Duchies of Bremen and Verben, v. Joh. Dieckmann, in the 1701 to

In the Psalter, and elsewhere from time to time, these two words often occur together, "mercy and truth", which are wildly and desolately drawn by some, which I have translated thus: "goodness and faithfulness". And is actually that we say in free German: love and faithfulness, when we use to say: He has shown me love and faithfulness. But I did not dare to translate so freely. Because that they have translated mercy, and I goodness, actually means that, if one someone shows friendship, love or charity; as Christ himself interprets Matth. 12, 7. from Hosea [Cap. 6, 6.] and says: "I delight in mercy and not in sacrifice", that is, I want people to show friendship, love and charity rather than sacrifice.

Thus "truth", "faithfulness" means that one may rely on one and have refuge in him, and that he keeps what he has said and that one relies on him. So God also boasts against us in the Scriptures

The Bible has been included in the folio edition of the Bible published in the second volume, and is based on the Erlangen edition, B^a. 37, p. 104. In 1525, the first edition of the Psalter was reprinted several times, namely: "Der Psalter teutsch zu singen, mit sleyß übersehen vn gebessert. Martinus Luther. M.D.XXV." At the end: "Gedrückt zu Nürnberg durch Fridurychen Peyp, Nach Christi gepurt. 1525. am. 22. tag des Mähens"; then with Johann Petreius at Nuremberg in folio: "Der Psalter teutsch," without giving Luther's name and omitting his preface and glosses. At the end: "Getruckt zu Nürnberg durch Joh. Petreium, Anno M.O.XXV." Furthermore, at Wittenberg in 1525, there is an edition in large print in which there is a postscript of which the Erlangen edition, vol. 37, p. 248, states that it is not yet in a complete edition. But this writing is not only printed in Riederer's "Nachrichten", but also in the German Wittenberger (1553), vol. III, p. 73 b with the caption: "Kurze Anleitung: wie der Psalter nützlich zu lesen sei, D. Mart. Luth.," in the Altenburger, vol. II, p. 521; in the Leipziger, vol. I V, p. 431; and in Walch, old edition, vol. IV, col. 267p. In all these editions, it is placed as a preface to the translation that Stephan Roth made of Luther's oporntiones in pssbnos in 1527, immediately before the interpretation of the first psalm; we have also left it in the same place. From a Low German edition published at Wittenberg in 1525: "De Psalter diidesch. (with Luther's preface) Item: Eyne vnderrichtunge, wo me den Psalter recht lesen unde vorstahn schal. Luther. Wittenberg. 1525." Krasft in his "Anderes hundertjähriges Jubiläum der evangelischen Kirche", p. 79 has printed this refrain. In the Erlanger, it is included in high German under "Nachträge zur Einleitung in die Psalter-Uebersetzung," vol. 37, p. 248 f. - We have only scanty news about the second edition. Le Long in the Vidliotbeos dibleiu that an octavo edition of the year 1528 mentions. Furthermore, Niederer in his "Nachrichten" from Joh. Georg Palms DsmMutiontz eoäieuin sunrorrn p. 46 ff. cites the following title and description of a Latin Psalter edition: "...Usalteriurn Drnslationig Voteris 6orr66tium. 1Vitt6mb rAN6 spit cko. bullt. 1529. 8." Hon ynoHuo kkulteriuru n bntbero uckornutnm 6t bjusckeru notm ruar^nulibus instruetuin ost. butbori praskntio: MM he "teiiiäul. et smrots pati-ikE, 1^/terrum onuckdu,? senpturao iiH maAnisiee eomEnckurunt 6te. prasmittitur, 6t in buo dckitioho "wn mn eonspieitur, ouni in skktionibus Aorinatiois, i?8u1t6rrii skktioni oorreetns et 1531. 8vo ilnprensa" äeinuln sfolte Wohl heißen: ckenuof praeüxa est. kickitio nerts rarissimn, ot puums knotenns nota. In this Latin translation of 1529, we thus already encounter the preface, which is written by Luther in German and begins with the words: "Es haben viel heiliger Väter den Psalter sonderlich vor anderen Büchern der heiligen Schrift gelobet und geliebt" 2c.; in it we see the "UrsssAtio novu I) mentioned by Olearius in his uuto^rspbis butlwri p. 30 as having appeared especially. M. in ksalterium, Int. reckckita por cknstuin kconam. IVitteb. 1529. 8." In Latin it is found in the Wittenberg (1549) Dorn. After this title there follows the superscription: Draekatio in librnm psalrnornnr. Thereupon the preface according to the wording given before: Nniti ex veteribus eto. In German, this preface is found in the Wittenberg (1553), vol. III, after the index, immediately before the folio numbered leaves; in the Leipzig, vol. XII, p. 9; in Walch, old edition, vol. XIV, 23 and in the Erlangen, vol. 63, p. 27. It is this preface that is found before the 1531 edition and therefore also in our Bibles. - The third edition first appeared under the title: "Der Deudsch Psalter D. Luthers zu Wittemberg. 1531." At the end: "Gedrückt zu Wittemberg durch Hans Lusft. M.D.XXXj." In 1533, another print came out in the same Officin under the same title. Further: "Der Psalter mit den Summarien" 1533 and later in many editions, partly under somewhat changed titles, which we will indicate in more detail at the next writing. Especially an edition published in 1545 is to be mentioned here, because Luther gave it its own preface. It is the following: "Der Psalter D. Mart. Luth." Then follows a woodcut: David kneeling before God with a rosary in his hands. Below it: "Xoubui-Sm-.

XbV." At the end: "Gedruckt zu Neuburg an der Thunaw, bey Hansen Kilian, fürstlichem Renntschreiber. Xno H).XOV." This edition was initiated by Count Palatine Otto Heinrich, who sought to bring the Psalter into use and practice among his subjects instead of the papal prayer books. At the request of the Count Palatine, Luther wrote the preface, which begins: "Billig sollte ein jeder Christ" 2c. It is found in the Hallische Theile, p. 466; in the Leipzig edition, Vol. XII, p. 10; Walch, alte Ausg, Vol. XIV, 28, and in the Erlanger, Vol. 63, p. 32; also in some editions of the Bible, e.g., in the Bible edited by Calov and in the already mentioned Bible by Dieckmann zu Stabe; further in Hieronymus Weller's witty and edifying interpretations of several Psalms, in the first part of his German writings, p. 269, and in Joachim Mörlin's sermons and interpretation on the Psalms, Erfurt 1580. Fol. Part 2.

that he is merciful and faithful, that is, that he demonstrates love and faithfulness, and shows us all friendship and kindness, and we may rely on him comfortingly, that he does and keeps faithfully, when one relates to him. Such faithfulness and truth is called XXX. Hence comes XXXX, which St. Paul himself interprets from Habakkuk [Cap. 2, 4]: faith; Rom. 1, 17: "The righteous lives by his faith." And in the Psalter it is often said to God, "Thy faith," or "in Thy faith"; because He gives such faith, and builds on His faithfulness. That the two words "truth" and "faith" in Hebrew are almost the same, and almost one is taken for the other. Just as in German we say: He keeps faith who is true and faithful; again, he who mistrusts is considered false and unfaithful.

Then come the two words, "judgment and justice," which we cannot well give either. For the word "judgment", when it stands alone, means a judicial office, as Ps. 7, 7: "Awaken the judgment that you have commanded"; and "to judge" means to govern. For example, it means God's command, as Ps. 119:12: "Teach me your judgments." Item, a custom or right, as Ex. 21, 9: 1) "He shall do to her according to the judgment of the daughter," that is daughter right, or as one is wont to do to a daughter 2c. But if it stands with the word "righteousness," it is half of the work of the court, namely the judgment, so that the ungodly and unrighteous are condemned, hated and punished. And "justice" is the other part, so that innocence is protected, preserved and promoted. I would like to say all this in German: "recht und ehrlich. As one says: He has won the matter rightly and honestly. But I was not allowed to go so far from the words.

Now if in the Psalter or otherwise it happens to you that he speaks not badly of judgment and righteousness, but of God's judgment and righteousness, or speaks to God, "Your judgments and righteousness," then by the "righteousness" you must understand faith, and by the "judgment" the slaying of the old Adam. For GOD through His word both does. He condemns, condemns, punishes and kills what is flesh and blood, but justifies and makes innocent the spirit through faith. This is what God calls judgment and justice. He exercises judgment through the word of His law, Rom. 7, 11: "The law kills"; righteousness through the word of the gospel, which the spirit accepts through faith, Rom. 1, 16. 17, just as the flesh must suffer death through patience. In time, more of these things will become clear and recognizable through the exercise itself.

The 1st Psalm. 2)

Blessed is he that walketh not in the counsel of 1 the wicked, nor treadeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of scoffers, but delighteth in the law 2 of the LORD, and speaketh of his law day and night.
He shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, 3 which bringeth forth his fruit in his season; and his leaf shall not wither, neither shall he prosper in his work. But this is not how the wicked will fare, but like the chaff that the wind scatters. Therefore the wicked 4 shall not stand in the judgment of^a, nor sinners in the company of the righteous. For the LORD knoweth the 5 way of the righteous: but the way of the wicked shall perish. 6

The 2nd Psalm.

Why do the nations rage, and the people speak 1 in vain? The kings of the land rebel, and the 2 councillors counsel with one another against the Lord and his anointed. Let us break their bands and cast away their cords. But he that dwelleth in heaven 3 shall laugh at them, and the LORD shall mock at 4 them. Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath, 5 and with his fury shall he make them afraid. But I have set my King on my holy mountain Zion. I will 6 preach of the sentence, that the LORD hath said unto me: 7

2) The marginal glosses to the Psalter are marked with letters, other notes with numbers. The verse numbers are missing in the old editions.

a) Judgments. That is, they will have neither office nor remain in the Christian community, yes, they will weave themselves together like the chaff from the grain.

1) Erlanger: Exo. 20, [22.]

8 You are my Son, today I have begotten you. Cry 9 out from me, and I will give you the nations for 10 your inheritance, and the end of the world for 11 your possession. Thou shalt smite them with the 12 scepter of iron, as a potter's vessel shalt thou break them. Be wise therefore, ye kings, and be ye chastened, ye judges of the land. Serve the LORD with fear, and rejoice with trembling. Kiss^b the Son, that he be not angry, and ye lose your way. For his wrath will soon burn, but good to all who trust in him.

The 3rd Psalm.

A psalm of David when he fled from his son Absalom.

1 O Lord, how many are my enemies, and how 2 many set themselves against me. Many say of 3 my soul, He hath no help with God, Sela. But 4 thou, O LORD, art the shield of me, and thou that 5 settest me in honor, and settest up my head. I 6 will call upon the LORD with my voice, and he 7 will hear me from his holy mountain, Sela. I lay 8 and slept, and am awake, for the LORD contains me. I am not afraid of a hundred thousand people, who are lying about against me. Arise, O LORD, and help me, O God, for thou smitest all mine enemies in the jaws, and breakest the teeth of the wicked. With the LORD is thy help, and thy blessing upon thy people.

The 4th Psalm.

9 A psalm of David, to be sung on high on stringed instruments. °)

1 Hear me when I cry, O GOD of my 2 righteousness, who comfortest me in error, be 3 gracious to me and hear my prayer. Men,^d) how 4 long shall my honor be put to shame? How long 5 will you love the useless, and seek after falsehood? Sela. Know ye that the LORD leadeth his saints in a strange way: the LORD will hear when I call upon him. If ye be angry

b) Kiss, that is, accept him with honor.
 c) As one sings with two voices, one above the other in pitch.
 d) Men, that is, you who are now not children and should be reasonable.

Do not sin, speak with your heart in your camp, and wait. Sela. Sacrifice rightly, and hope in the LORD. Many say: Who will show us what is good?
 But, O Lord, lift up the light of thy countenance upon us, that thou mayest give joy to my heart:
 and they shall be great when they have corn and wine for themselves. I will lie down in peace and sleep, for you alone, O LORD, make me dwell in safety.

The 5th Psalm.

A Psalm of David, to sing high for the inheritance.

O Lord, hear my word, heed my speech. Take heed to my cry, my King and my God, for I will pray before you. O LORD, in the morning thou wilt hear my voice; in the morning I will send and look up. For thou art not a God to whom wickedness pleases; that which is wicked shall not abide before thee. The foolish shall not come before thine eyes; thou art hostile to all evildoers.
 You will kill the liars. The LORD hath abhorred of the bloodthirsty and the mischievous. But I will enter into thy house upon thy great goodness, and worship against thy holy temple in thy fear.
 O LORD, guide me in thy righteousness, for mine enemies' sake, direct thy way before me. For in their mouth is nothing righteous, their inwardness is vanity, their jaws are an open grave, with their tongues they dissemble. Blame them, O God, that they fall from their nobility; cast them out because of their great transgression, for they are disobedient to you. Let all who trust in you rejoice, let them glory forever, for you protect them; let all who love your name be glad.
 For you, O LORD, will bless the righteous; your favor will surround them as with a shield.

The 6th Psalm.

A psalm of David, to be sung on high on stringed instruments of eight strings.

O Lord, do not punish me in your anger, and do not chastise me in your wrath. Lord, have mercy on me, for I am weak.

4 Heal me, O Lord, for my bones are troubled, and my soul is greatly troubled. O Lord, how long?
5 Turn, O LORD, and save my soul; help me for thy goodness' sake. For in death thou art not 6 remembered; who shall thank thee in hell? I have labored with my sighs, I have washed my bed all 7 night long, and with my tears I have softened my bed. My frame is decayed from the wrath^e) and is grown old, for I am troubled in all places.
8 Depart from me, all workers of iniquity; for the LORD hath heard the voice of my crying. The 9 Lord has heard my supplication, the Lord has accepted my prayer. All my enemies must be 10 ashamed and afraid, turn back and be ashamed suddenly.

11

The 7th Psalm.

The innocence of David, of which he sang to your Lord, because of the words of the Moor, the son of Jemim.

1 In thee, O LORD, do I trust, my God, save me from all my persecutors, and deliver me, lest like a lion he take my soul, and rend it, because there 2 is no deliverer. O LORD my GOD, if I have done these things, and there is iniquity in my hands; if 3 I have wronged those who had peace with me, or stripped my enemies without a cause; let my 4 enemy pursue my soul and seize it, and tread down my life in the earth, and lay my honor in the 5 dust. Sela. Arise, O LORD, in thy wrath, rise above the fury of mine enemies, and raise up 6 unto me the judgment^f) which thou hast commanded. And let the congregation of the people gather around you, and come up again 7 for their sake. The LORD judges 1) the people.
Judge me, O Lord, according to my righteousness and godliness. Put an end to the 8 wicked, and promote the righteous;

e) Wrath, which is God's anger and punishment.

(f) Judgment, that is, restore me to the office which thou hast commanded me, that so the people may be restored unto thee.

1) The third printing of the year 1524 has here the marginal gloss: judges, that is, not I nor anyone, but GOD Himself alone rules in the people.

For you, righteous God, test hearts and kidneys.
My shield is from God, who helps the upright from 11 the heart. God is a righteous judge, and a God 12 who daily prophesies. If a man will not turn, he hath sharpened his sword, he hath bent his bow, 13 he hath aimed, he hath laid up deadly shot, he hath made his arrows to burn. Behold, he hath 14 evil in his mind, he is with child in misfortune, he shall bring forth a fault. He has dug a pit and 15 carried it out, and has fallen into the hole he made. His misfortune shall come again upon his 16 head, and his iniquity shall fall upon his crown. I thank the LORD for his righteousness, and will 17 praise the name of the LORD Most High.

A Psalm of David, to sing high above Githith^g).

O LORD our Sovereign, how glorious is your name in all the earth, since they give you thanks in heaven. Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast prepared a power for the 1 sake of thine enemies, to silence the enemy and the avenger. For I shall see the heavens, the 2 work of thy fingers, the moon and stars, which thou hast prepared. What is this man, that thou 3 art mindful of him, and the Son of man, that thou lookest upon him? You will make him a little lacking in God; but with honors and adornment you will crown him. Thou wilt make him ruler over 4 the work of thy hands: thou hast put all things under his feet, sheep and oxen, and the wild 5 beasts, and the fowls of the air, and the fish of the sea, and all that pass through the channels of the 6 sea. O Lord our Sovereign, how glorious is your name in all the earth. 7

The 9th Psalm.

A Psalm of David, to be sung on high, of the Son's 8 youth.

I will give thanks to the Lord with all my heart, 9 and I will tell all your wonders. 10

g)What this githith is, is still unconscious; but it is called a winepress in German.

3 I will rejoice and be glad, and praise your name, 4 O Most High, because you have driven my enemies behind you; they have fallen and perished before you. For thou hast judged my 5 right and my cause: thou sittest on the throne a righteous judge. Thou hast reproached the 6 heathen, and destroyed the wicked: thou hast destroyed their name for ever and ever. The swords of the enemy are ended; thou hast turned 7 back the cities; their memory is perished with them. But the LORD abideth for ever: he hath 8 prepared his throne for judgment. And he shall judge the earth aright, and the people shall reign 9 uprightly. And the LORD is the poor man's refuge, a refuge in time of trouble. Therefore they 10 that know thy name shall hope in thee: for thou 11 trustest not them that seek thee, O LORD. Praise the LORD that dwelleth in Zion, that sheweth forth his doings among the people. For he 12 remembereth and asketh after their blood; he forgetteth not the cry of the poor. Be merciful 13 unto me, O LORD; behold my affliction among mine enemies, thou that liftest me up out of the 14 gates of death. That I may tell all thy praise in the gates of the daughter of Zion, that I may rejoice in thy salvation. The heathen are sunk in the pit 15 which they have made; their foot is caught in the net which they have set. The LORD is known to 16 do right; the wicked is entangled in the work of his hands. Sela. The wicked must be turned to hell, all the heathen who forget God. For he will 17 not so utterly forget the poor, and the hope of the wretched shall not be lost forever. Arise, O Lord, 18 lest men get the upper hand. Let all the heathen be judged before thee. Set them, O Lord, a 19 teacher, that the heathen may know that they are men. Sela.

The 10th Psalm.

21 Lord, why do you step so far away, hide yourself in time of need? When the wicked get the upper hand, the poor suffer; they do their will as they choose. For the wicked stirreth up

The wicked man will do as he pleases, and the stingy man will bless himself and blaspheme the 4 Lord. The wicked, because his wrath continues, does not ask for anyone; all his proposals are without God. He is always doing what he does. 5 Your judgments are high from him. He deals defiantly with his enemies. He says in his heart, 6
 "I will never be overthrown; there will be no need.
 His mouth is full of cursing, guile and deceit;
 under his tongue is toil and labor. He sitteth in 7 wait in the courts; he slayeth the innocent in secret; his eyes are upon the poor multitude. He 8 lies in wait in secret, like a lion in the den; he lies in wait to catch the wretch, and catches him when he draws him into his net. He crushes, and 9 bends, and he falls the poor heap with his violence. He says in his heart: God has forgotten, 10 he has hidden his face, he no longer sees it.
 Arise, O Lord God, lift up your hand, do not forget 11
 the wretched. Why should the wicked blaspheme
 God, and say in his heart, Thou inquirest not? 12 Thou seest, for thou seest the affliction and misery, that it is given into thine hand; the poor 13 company shall restore it unto thee; thou art the helper of the fatherless. Break the arm of the 14 wicked, and seek the wicked, and his wickedness shall never be found. The LORD is king forever and ever: ye heathen shall perish from his land. Hear the desire of the wretched, O 15 LORD, and their heart shall be turned, that thine ear may know it. That thou mayest do right to the fatherless and to the poor, that man be no more 16 wicked in the earth.

The 11th Psalm.

A Psalm of David, to be sung on high. 18

I trust in the LORD: how then say ye unto my soul, Let it fly as a bird upon your mountains? For behold, the wicked draw the bow, and put their arrows on the string, to shoot in the dark at them that are sincere of the Lord. 1

3 hearts. For they have overthrown the foundation, what shall the righteous do to it?
 4 The Lord is in his holy temple, the Lord's throne is in heaven, his eyes look upon it, his eyelids test the children of men. The LORD tryeth the 5 righteous, his soul hateth the wicked, and he that loveth iniquity. He will rain upon the wicked rope, 6 fire, brimstone, and the wind of tempest he will pour upon them 1) as a reward. The LORD is righteous, and loveth righteousness, that their 7 faces may look upon that which is right.

The 12th Psalm.

1 A psalm of David, to be sung high on eight strings.
 2 Help, Lord, the saints have diminished, and the faithful are few among the children of men.
 3 One man speaketh vain things with another, and speaketh hypocrisy with a divided heart. The 4 LORD cut off all hypocrisy, and the tongue that speaketh proudly, saying, Our tongue shall have 5 the preeminence, it is ours to speak: who is our Lord? Because the wretched are desolate, and 6 the poor groan, I will raise up, saith the LORD, I will establish a salvation that shall act confidently in it. The words of the LORD are pure, as silver 7 burned in the crucible of the earth, proved seven times. Thou, O Lord, wilt preserve them, and keep 8 us from this generation for ever. There are wicked men about and about, when the lots are lifted up 9 among the children of men.

The 13th Psalm.

1 A Psalm of David, to be sung on high.
 3 Lord, how long will you forget me? How long will you hide your face from me? How long shall I seek counsel in my soul, and bear sorrow in my 4 heart? How long shall my enemy rise up against me? Look and hear me, O Lord, my God; enlighten my eyes, that I may not be lost in death.

 Let mine adversaries not rejoice that I am overthrown. But I hope in your goodness; my heart rejoices in your salvation. I will sing unto the 6
 LORD, that he hath restored me.

The 14th Psalm.

A Psalm of David, to be sung on high.

The fools^h) say in their heart, There is no God;
 they are corrupt and abominable in their doings; 1 there is none that doeth good. The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if any had understanding, and asked after God. But they were turned aside, and all of them 2 were unfit together; there was none that did good, seek not one. Do not the evildoers who devour my people realize that they have only food to eat? 3
 They do not call upon the Lord. Thereⁱ they fear; for God is with the generation of the righteous. Ye 4 have mocked the poor man's counsel, that GOD is his refuge. Who will help Israel in Zion? When the LORD turns away the prison of his people, 3
 Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad. 6

The 15th Psalm.

A Psalm of David. 7

Lord, who will dwell in your tabernacle? Who shall dwell in thy holy mountain? He who walks without change, and does right, and speaks the truth from the heart. He that speaketh not after his own tongue, and doeth no hurt unto his neighbor, and bringeth no reproach upon his neighbor. 1
 The unrighteous are despised in his sight, but he honors those who fear the Lord, who swear to their neighbor and do not change it. He that giveth 2 not his money usurpingly, and taketh not gifts of the innocent. He who does this will be well. 2) 3

h) The Scripture calls fools raw, loose people who do not ask about God.

i) Fear, that is, they make consciences, since there is none, serve God, which He has not commanded.

2) In the Erlanger, "werden" is added, which we, like Walch, have omitted.

The 16th Psalm.

A golden jewel of David.

2 Keep me, O God, for I trust in you. I have said
3 to the Lord: You are the Lord, I am not well
4 pleased with you. All my delight is in the saints
5 that are upon the earth, and in the excellent. Their 6 idols are many, and they hasten after them. I will 7 not offer drink offerings to those who are of blood, 8 nor will I use their name in my mouth. But the 9 LORD is my goods and my portion; thou shalt 10 receive my inheritance. The lot is fallen to me in 11 a lovely way; a beautiful inheritance has been 12 given to me. I will praise the Lord, who has 13 counseled me, even my kidneys have chastened 14 me at night. I have the Lord always before my 15 eyes; for he is at my right hand, therefore I shall 16 dwell. Therefore my heart rejoiceth, and my glory 17 is glad; my flesh also shall lie down secure. For 18 thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, nor suffer thy 19 holy one to see the pit. Thou wilt make known 20 unto me the way of life: before thee is fullness of 21 joy, and sweetness of life at thy right hand for 22 ever.

The 17th Psalm.

A prayer of David.

O LORD, hear righteousness, heed my cry, hear my prayer, which cometh not out of a false 1 mouth. Let my judgment go forth from thee; let 2 thine eyes see what is right. Thou hast tried my 3 heart, thou hast visited it by night, thou hast 4 purged me, thou hast found nothing. I have 5 purposed that my mouth should not transgress. I 6 have kept myself in the word of thy lips, from the 7 works of men in the way of the spoiler. Hallow my 8 walk upon thy footsteps, that my footsteps slip 9 not. I cry unto thee, O God, that thou wouldst 10 hear me: incline thine ears unto me, hear my 11 speech. Show thy loving-kindness, O Savior of 12 them that trust in thee, against them that set 13 themselves against thy right hand. Protect me an eyeball in the eye, shield me under the 9 shadow of your wings, from the wicked who 10 disturb me, from my enemies who stand around 11 and around after my soul. They have resolved 12 with their fat^k), they speak proudly with their 13 mouth. Where we go, they surround me; their 14 eyes they direct to bow us to the earth. He is like 15 a lion desiring a prey; like a young lion sitting in 16 the den. Arise, O Lord, overpower him, and 17 humble him; deliver my soul from the wicked with 18 thy sword; from the men of thy hand, from the 19 men of this life, which have their reward in their 20 life, whom thou fillest the belly with thy treasure, 21 which children have the abundance of, and 22 leave the remnant unto their young. But I will 23 behold thy face in righteousness; I will be 24 satisfied when thine image shall rise.
14 like

The 18th Psalm.

A psalm to be sung on high, of David the servant of the Lord, who spoke the words of this song to the Lord at the time when the Lord delivered him from the hand of his enemies and from the hand of Saul, 1 saying:

I am your refuge, O LORD, my strength. O
LORD, my rock, my fortress, my deliverer, my God, my refuge, in whom I trust, my shield and horn of salvation, and my refuge. I will call upon the LORD with praise, and I shall be delivered 2 from mine enemies. For the pains of death
3 compassed me about, and the rivers of Belial
4 terrified me. The torment of hell compassed me,
5 and the distress of death overwhelmed me.
6 When I am afraid, I call upon the Lord, and cry
7 unto my God, and he heareth my voice from his 8 holy temple, and my cry cometh before him in his 9 ears. The earth quaked and was moved, and the 10 foundations of the mountains moved and shook, 11 because he was angry. Steam went up from his 12 nose, and consuming fire from his mouth, coals 13 burned.

14 tion of it. He bowed the heavens and descended, and darkness was under his feet. And he 15 mounted the cherub, and flew. He floated on the wings of the wind. He covered himself with 16 darkness around his tent, with dark waters in the thick clouds. His clouds passed away before his brightness, hail and coals of fire. And the LORD 17 thundered in heaven, and the most High let out his thunder, hail and coals of fire. He shot his 18 arrows and scattered them. He caused great lightnings and terrified them. Then water was poured out, and the foundations of the earth were 19 opened, O LORD, by thy rebuke, by the breath and snort of thy nostrils. He sent forth from on 20 high, and fetched me, and drew me up out of great waters. He delivered me from my strong 21 enemies, from my haters who were too mighty for me. Who overcame me in the time of my 22 calamity, and the LORD became my confidence.
And he led me out into space. He plucked me out, for he had pleasure in me. And the LORD will 23 repay me according to my righteousness. He will 24 pay me according to the cleanness of my hands.
For I have kept the ways of the LORD, and have 25 not been ungodly against my God. For all his judgments are before me, and I will not cast away his judgments from me. But I will be without 26 change with him, and keep myself from my sin.
Therefore the LORD will reward me according to 27 my righteousness, according to the cleanness of my hands in his sight. With the saints you will be 28 holy, and with the unchanging you will be without change. And with the pure you will be pure, and 29 with the perverse you will be perverse. For thou wilt help the wretched people, and the high eyes 30 lowly. For thou shalt lighten my lamp: the LORD my God shall make light my darkness. For with thee I can smite the people of war, And with my 31 God leap over the walls. God's ways are without change, the words of the LORD are purified, he 32 is a shield to all who trust in him. For where is a GOtt, without the LORD? or a refuge, without our 33 GOtt? God has girded me

with strength, and hath made my ways without change. He hath made my feet like the deer, and 36 set me on my high place. He maketh my hand to fight, and maketh my arm to draw the bow of 37 brass. And thou givest me the shield of thy salvation; and thy right hand strengtheneth me; 38 and when thou humblest me, thou makest me great. Thou makest room to walk under me, that 39 my ankles slip not. I will pursue after mine enemies, and seize them, and will not turn back until I have slain them. I will smite them, that they 40 shall not abide; they shall fall under my feet.
Thou wilt arm me with strength for battle. Thou 41 wilt cast under me them that set themselves against me. Thou givest me mine enemies to 42 flee, that I may destroy mine haters. They cry 43 out, but there is no helper; to the LORD, but he does not answer them. I will crush them like dust before the wind; I will cast them away like the 44 dung in the streets. Thou wilt save me from the heretical people, and set me for a head among the heathen: a people that I knew not shall serve 45 me. They obey me with obedient ears, but the strange children deny me. The strange children 46 are outworn, and shall go limp in their bonds.
The LORD liveth, and blessed be my Hori, and 47 the God of my salvation shall be exalted; the God that giveth me vengeance, and compelleth 48 the nations under me; that delivereth me from 49 mine enemies, and exalteth me from them that set themselves against me. Thou wilt save me from iniquities. Therefore will I give thee thanks, O LORD, among the heathen, and sing praise
50 unto thy name. Who¹ hath shewed great 51 salvation unto his king, and hath shewed mercy unto his anointed, David, and to his seed for ever.

The 19th Psalm.

A Psalm of David, to be sung on high.

The heavens tell the glory of God, and the firmament proclaims the work of his hands. One day tells another, and one night makes known to another. There is no language nor speech, where one does not hear their voice.

1) In the Erlanger, "the" is repeated.

5 Their guide has gone out into all the earth, and 6 their speech to the end of the world; he has made
 7 a tabernacle for the sun in them. And it goes out
 8 like a bridegroom from his chamber, and is glad 9 to run the way like a hero. It rises at one end of 10 heaven, and returns to the same end, and 11 nothing is hidden from its heat. The law of the 12 Lord is without change and restores the soul. The 13 testimony of the Lord is sure, and makes wise the 14 foolish. The essays of the Lord are right and 15 gladden the heart. The commandments of the 16 Lord are clear and enlighten the eyes. The fear 17 of the Lord is pure and abides forever. The 18 judgments of the LORD are righteous, all just.
 19 They are more precious than gold and much fine 20 gold; they are sweeter than honey and 21 honeycomb. Thy servant also is made careful by 22 them: for he hath great reward that keepeth
 23 them. Who is mindful of the error? Cleanse me 24 from the secret ones. Keep thy servant also from 25 the proud, that they rule not over me: then shall I 26 be without change, and innocent from great 27 iniquity. Let the speech of my mouth be 28 acceptable unto thee, And the conversation of 29 my heart before thee, O LORD, my refuge and 30 my redeemer.

The 20th Psalm.

A Psalm of David, to be sung on high.

1 May the Lord hear you in your time of anguish,
 2 may the name of God Jacob protect you. He shall 3 send thee help from the holy place, and 4 strengthen thee from Zion. He shall remember all 5 thy meat offering, and thy burnt offering shall be 6 fat, selah. He give thee that which thou hast in 7 mind, and fulfill thy purpose. We will boast of your 8 salvation, and in the name of our God we will 9 raise up panels. May the Lord grant all your 10 requests. Now I see that the Lord helps his 11 anointed, and hears him in his holy heaven. The 12 salvation of his right hand is mighty. They rely on 13 chariots and horses, but we will remember the 14 name of our God. They have fallen down, but we 15 stand upright. Help, O Lord, let the King hear us 16 at the time when we cry out.

The 21st Psalm.

A Psalm of David, to be sung on high. 1

O LORD, the king rejoiceth in thy strength, and 2 how glad is he of thy salvation. Thou hast given 3 him his heart's desire, and hast not hindered what 3 his lips have asked, Selah. For thou wilt shower 4 him with good blessings; thou wilt set a crown of 4 gold upon his head. He has asked you for life, 5 and you have given him long life forever and ever. 5
 He has great glory in your salvation; you will 6 place praise and honor on him. For thou wilt set 6 him for a blessing forever; thou wilt make him 7 glad with the joy of thy countenance. For the king 7 shall hope in the LORD, and shall stand firm 8 through the goodness of the Most High. Thine 8 hand shall find all thine enemies; thy right hand 9 shall find them that hate thee. Thou wilt make 9 them like a furnace of fire in the time of thy 9 countenance. The LORD shall devour them in his 10 wrath, and the fire shall devour them. Their fruit 11 thou shalt destroy in the land, and their seed 11 among the children of men. For they would do 11 thee evil, and devised devices which they could 11 not perform. For thou shalt make them thy 12 shoulder¹; thou shalt bend thy sinews against 12 their face. Arise, O Lord, in thy strength, and we 13 will sing and praise thy might. 13

The 22nd Psalm.

A Psalm of David, to be sung on high, of the hind, 14
 the morning glories.

1 My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?
 2 The words of my howling are far from my 3 salvation. My God, I call by day and you do not 1 answer, and by night I have no rest. But thou art 2 holy, and dwellest under the praise of Israel. Our 2 fathers hoped in thee, and when they hoped, thou 3 didst deliver them. To thee they cry, and are 3 saved: they hoped in thee, and were not put to 4 shame. But I am a worm, and not a man: I am the 4 scorn of men, and the contempt of the people. All 5 who see me mock me, 5 shut their mouths and shake their heads. Let him 9 complain to the Lord, and he will help him, and 10 save him, if he has a desire for him. For thou hast drawn me out of my mother's womb: thou art my confidence, when I was yet at my mother's 11 breasts. Upon thee am I cast from my mother's womb. You are my God from my mother's womb.

 Do not be far from me, for fear is near, for there 12 is no helper here. Great bulls have surrounded 13 me, fat oxen have surrounded me. They have opened their barges against me, like a roaring 14 and ravening lion. I am poured out like water, all my bones are cut asunder, my heart is melted in 15 my womb like wax. My strength is dried up like a potsherd, and my tongue sticks to the roof of my mouth, and you lay me in the dust of death. For 16 dogs have surrounded me, and the evil one's pack has made itself around me; they have dug through my hands and feet. I would count all my 17 legs; but they look and behold me. They divide my garments among them, and cast lots for my vesture. But thou, O LORD, make thyself not far 18 off; my strength, haste thou to help me. Deliver my soul from the sword, from the hand of the 19 dogs my lonely one. Save me from the lion's mouth, and hear me among the horns of the 20 unicorns. I will tell thy name unto my brethren; I will praise thee in the congregation. Glorify the 21 LORD, ye that fear him: let all the seed of Jacob glory in him, and let all the seed of Israel be afraid 22 of him. For he hath not despised nor disdained the affliction of the poor, neither hid his face from 23 him, and when he cried unto him, he heard it.
 From thee shall be my thanksgiving in the great 24 congregation; I will pay my vows before them that fear him. Let the poor eat, that they may be filled;
 and let them praise the LORD that ask after him: 25 let your heart live for ever. Let the end of the world be remembered, that they may turn unto the Lord, and worship before him all kindreds of 26 the Gentiles. For the Lord has a kingdom, and he is a Lord among the Gentiles. Let them eat and worship

 32 people that are born, that he may do it.

The 23rd Psalm.

A Psalm of David.

The LORD is my shepherd; I shall not want.
 He maketh me to feed where there is much 1 grass, and leadeth me beside the waters that cool me. He restoreth my soul; He leadeth me 2 in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake.
 Yea, though I walk through the valley of the 3 shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me. Thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me.
 4 Thou preparest a table before me against mine enemies; Thou makest my head fat with oil, And pourest me out full. Surely goodness and mercy 5 shall follow me all the days of my life: I will dwell in the house of the LORD for ever. 6

The 24th Psalm.

A Psalm of David.

The earth is the Lord's, and the things that are therein; the ground, and the things that dwell therein. For he hath founded it upon the seas, 1 and prepared it upon the waters. Who shall ascend the mountain of the LORD? and who shall stand in his holy place? He who has 2 innocent hands and is pure in heart, who does 3 not lift up his soul in vain, and does not swear falsely. He will receive blessings from the Lord 4 and righteousness from the God of his salvation.
 This is the generation that seeks him, that seeks thy face, O Jacob. Sela. Lift up your heads, ye 5 gates, and arise, ye doors of the world, that the King of glory may enter in. Who is this same King 6 of honor? It is the Lord, strong and mighty, the Lord, mighty in battle. Ye gates, lift up 7

m) Fat ones are the rich and great; those who lie in the dust are the poor and lowly; those who do not let their soul live are those who die or are ready to die. All of them are to worship Christ.

Lift up your heads, O doors of the world, that the King of glory may come in. Who is this same King of honor? It is the LORD of hosts, it is the king of honors, Sela.

The 25th Psalm.

A Psalm of David.

1 To you, O Lord, I lift up my soul. My God, I hope in you; let me not be put to shame, lest my 2 enemies rejoice over me. For no one is put to shame who respects you, but those who spurn 3 without cause are put to shame. Show me thy ways, O Lord, and teach me thy paths. Guide me in thy truth, and teach me: for thou art the God of 4 my salvation; daily I wait for thee. Remember, O 5 LORD, thy mercy, and thy lovingkindness, which was from the world. Remember not the sin of my youth, nor my transgression: but remember me 6 according to thy mercy, for thy lovingkindness' sake. The Lord is good and right, therefore he 7 will instruct sinners in the way. He leadeth the wretched aright, and teacheth the wretched his way. All the ways of the LORD are goodness and 8 faithfulness to them that keep his covenant and testimony. For thy name's sake, O LORD, be 9 merciful to my iniquity, which is great. Who is he that feareth the LORD? He shall instruct him in 10 the way which he hath chosen. His soul shall dwell in goodness, and his seed shall inherit the 11 earth. The secret of the LORD is among those who fear him, and his covenant he will make 12 them know. My eyes always look to the LORD, for he will pull my foot out of the net. Turn to me, 13 and be gracious to me, for I am lonely and wretched. The anguish of my heart is great; lead 14 me out of my distresses. Behold my affliction and misery, and take away all my sin. Behold, my 15 enemies are so many, and with a free hatred they hate me. Keep my soul, and save me; let 16 me not be put to shame; for I trust in thee. Keep me bad and right, for I wait for you. God, deliver 17 Israel from all her distress.

A Psalm of David.

Judge me, O Lord, for I walk without change.
I hope in the LORD, therefore I shall not go astray. Examine me, O LORD, and try me; purify 7 my kidneys and my heart. For thy lovingkindness is before mine eyes, and I walk in thy truth. I sit 8 not with the vain, and have not fellowship with the deceitful. I hate the assembly of the wicked, and 9 will not sit with the wicked. I will wash my hands in innocency, and will be, O Lord, about thine 10 altar. That I may hear the voice of thanksgiving, 11 that all thy wonders may be told. O LORD, I love the place of thy house, and the place where thine 12 honor dwelleth. Take not my soul with sinners, nor my life with the bloodthirsty, in whose hand is iniquity, and their right hand is full of gifts. But I will walk without change; deliver me, and be gracious unto me. My foot is upon the plain; I will

The 27th Psalm.

A Psalm of David.

The Lord is my light and my salvation, of whom should I be afraid? The LORD is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid? For 3 when the wicked, my adversaries and enemies, came to devour my flesh, they ran and fell. If an army comes against me, my heart will not fear; if a battle arises against me, I will rely on it. One 4 thing I have asked of the Lord, and this I will require, that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the pleasure of the Lord, and to seek his temple. For he hath 5 covered me in his tabernacle in the evil time; he hid me secretly in his tent, and lifted me up upon a rock; and now shall I lift up my head above mine 6 enemies that are round about me, and I will offer sacrifices of glory in his tabernacle; I will sing and praise unto the LORD. O LORD, hear my voice when I call; be gracious to me, and hear me. My 7 heart
8 has said of you: Seek my face. O Lord, I will seek 9 thy face. Do not hide your face from me, and do not reject your servant in anger, for you are my help. Do not leave me, and do not turn away your hand from me, O God of my salvation. For my 10 father and my mother have forsaken me, but the LORD hath taken me up. O LORD, show me thy way, and lead me in a straight path for the sake 11 of mine enemies. Give me not into the will of mine enemies: for false witnesses are risen up against 12 me, and speak iniquities unfeignedly. I believe that I shall see the good of the LORD in the land of the living. Wait upon the LORD, be of good 13 cheer, and let thine heart be steadfast, and wait upon the LORD.

The 28th Psalm.

A Psalm of David.

When I cry out to you, my refuge, do not be 1 silent to me, lest, where you are silent, I become like those who go into the pit. Hear the voice of my supplications when I cry unto thee, when I lift up my hands unto thy holy choir. Put me not 2 among the wicked, and among the workers of iniquity, who speak kindly to their neighbor, and have evil in their heart. Give them according to 3 their deeds, and according to their wickedness; give them according to the works of their hands;
 recompense them according to their deserts. For 4 they regard not the work of the LORD, nor the works of his hands: therefore shall they be broken down, and not edified. Praise be to the 5 Lord, for he has heard the voice of my supplications. The LORD is my strength and my shield; in him my heart hopes, and I am saved; and my heart is glad, and I will give thanks to him 6 with my song. The LORD is their strength, he is the strength that helps his anointed. Help thy 7 people, and bless thine inheritance, and feed them, and exalt them for ever.

The 30th Psalm.

A psalm song of the dedication of the house of David.

I will exalt thee, O LORD; for thou hast raised me up, and hast not suffered mine enemies to 4 rejoice over me. O LORD my God, when I cried unto thee, thou madest me whole. O LORD, thou 5 hast brought my soul out of hell; thou hast kept me alive when they go down to the pit. Praise the 6
 Lord, ye saints, and give thanks in remembrance of his holiness. For his wrath endureth for a moment, and he delighteth to live: in the evening 7 there is weeping, but in the morning there is glory. But I said, when I was well: I will abide 8 forever. For, O LORD, by thy lovingkindness thou hast made my mountain strong: but when thou hidest thy face, I was afraid. I will, O LORD, cry 9 unto thee, I will pray unto the LORD. What profit 10 is there in my blood, if I go to destruction? Will the dust also thank thee, and proclaim thy 11 faithfulness? Hear, O Lord, and be gracious to 12 me; O Lord, be my helper. Thou hast turned my lamentation into a rei-

n) Peace, that is, that [it] will be well with him.

13 You have taken off my sackcloth and girded me with joy. That my glory may praise thee,^o , and not be satisfied, O LORD my God; I will give thee thanks for ever.

The 31st Psalm.

A Psalm of David, to be sung on high.

1 O LORD, in thee do I trust: let me never be
2 put to shame: save me with thy righteousness.
3 Incline thine ear unto me; haste thou to save me;
4 be thou a strong rock unto me, and a house for 5 a stronghold, that thou mayest help me. For thou
6 art my rock, and my fortress. And for thy name's 7 sake thou wilt¹ guide and lead me. You would 8 pull me out of the net they have set for me, for 9 you are my strength. Into your hands I commend 10 my spirit; you have redeemed me, O Lord, you 11 faithful God. I hate them that hold vanity: but I 12 hope in the LORD. I rejoice and am glad in thy 13 lovingkindness, because thou hast looked upon 14 my affliction, and hast known my soul in anguish, and hast not delivered me into the hands of the enemy; thou hast set clean feet upon a broad place. Lord, have mercy on me, for I am in anguish, my face is faint with wrath,^p and my soul and my belly. For my life is waxed old with grief, and my years with sighing. My strength is gone from my iniquity, and my legs are fainted. I am become a great reproach to all mine enemies, and to my neighbors, and a reproach to my kinsmen. Mine is forgotten in the heart (as of a dead man); I am become as a corrupt thing. For I hear an evil cry from many; fear is around and around. Since they secretly hold counsel with one another over me, they think to take my soul.
But I, O Lord, hope in thee, and say, Thou art my God. My time is in thy hands; deliver me from the hand of mine enemies, and from

17 to those who persecute me. Let your face shine upon your servant; help me by your goodness. O Lord, let me not be put to shame, for I call upon 18 thee. The wicked must be put to shame, and be quenched in hell. Let false lips be put to silence, who speak against the righteous with hope and 19 contempt. How great is thy good, which thou hast hid from them that fear thee, and hast delivered it from the children of men unto them that trust in 20 thee. Thou wilt hide them secretly with thee from every man's pride; thou wilt hide them in the tabernacle from the brawling tongues. Praise be 21 to the LORD, that he hath done a special kindness unto me in a strong city. But I said in my anguish, I am cast out of thine eyes: therefore 22 hast thou heard my supplications, when I cried unto thee. Love the Lord, all his saints: the Lord 23 keepeth the faithful, and rewardeth him that is proud. Be of good cheer, and let your hearts be steadfast, all ye that wait upon the LORD. 24

The 32nd Psalm.

An Instruction of David. 25

Blessed is the man whose transgressions are forgiven, whose sin is covered. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord does not impute iniquity, in whose spirit there is no falsehood. For when I would have concealed it,^q my bones fainted from 1 my daily weeping. For your hand was heavy on me day and night; my sap dried up, as in 2 summer, Sela. Therefore I make known my sin, and hide not my iniquity. I said: I will confess my 3 transgression against me unto the LORD, and thou shalt forgive me the iniquity of my sin, Sela.
4 For this shall all the saints pray before thee in due time: therefore when great floods of waters 5 come, they shall not reach the same. Thou art my shield, thou wilt keep me from fear, and with the glory of one saved.

o) Glory, my tongue and strings, as I honor you with, Ps.
16, 9.

1) "you" is missing in the Erlanger.

v) Wrath, that is, before the calamity I suffer, as God's wrath.

q) conceal, that is, since I did not want to confess that vain sin was with me, my conscience had no rest until I had to confess it and trust in God's goodness alone.

8 surround me, Sela. I will give you understanding and show you the way you should walk, I will beckon you with my eyes. Do not be like horses 9 and mouths that have no understanding, which must be put in a bridle and bit in their mouths if they do not want to come to you. The wicked 10 must suffer much, but he who hopes in God will be embraced by goodness. Rejoice in the LORD, 11 ye righteous, and be glad; and praise all them that are upright in heart.

The 33rd Psalm.

Rejoice in the LORD, ye righteous: for the 1 upright it is good to boast. Give thanks to the LORD with harps, and sing praises to him on the 2 psaltery with ten strings. Sing unto him a new song, make it good on the strings with sound. For 3 the word of the LORD is right, and all his works 4 are faithful. He loveth righteousness and judgment; The earth is full of the goodness of the 5 LORD. The heavens are made by the word of the LORD, and all his host by the mouth of his Spirit.
6 He gathereth up the waters of the sea, as into a hose, and layeth up the deeps in secret. All the 7 earth is afraid of the LORD, and before him all who dwell on the face of the earth are afraid. For 8 when he speaks, it is done; when he gives, it stands. The LORD brings to nought the counsel 9 of the heathen, and hinders the thoughts of the nations. But the counsel of the LORD abideth for 10 ever, the thoughts of his heart for ever. Blessed are the people, whose God is the Lord, the 11 people whom he has chosen for an inheritance.
The LORD looks down from heaven and beholds 12 all the children of men. From his prepared seat he looks upon all who dwell on the earth. He 13 looks at^r) their hearts in all things; he observes 14 all their works. A king is not helped by his great power; a strong man is not saved by his great 15 strength. A horse lacks help, and is not saved by his great strength. Behold, the eye of the LORD 16 is upon them that fear him, that wait upon his mercy to deliver their souls from death, and nourish them in the trial. Our soul waits for 20 the Lord, he is our help and shield. For our heart rejoices in him, and we hope in his holy name.

21 May your goodness, O Lord, be upon us, as we hope in you. 22

The 34th Psalm.

A psalm of David, when he hid his spirit from Abimelech, who drove him away, and he departed. 1

I will praise the Lord always; his praise shall 2 be in my mouth forever. Let my soul glory in the Lord, that the wretched may hear and rejoice.
3 Praise the Lord with me, and let us exalt his 4 name with one another. When I sought the Lord, he answered me, and delivered me from all my 5 fear. Those who look to him will be enlightened, and their faces will not be disgraced. When this 6 wretch cried out, the Lord heard and saved him from all his troubles. The angel of the Lord 7 encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them. Taste and see how kind the 8 LORD is; good for the man who trusts in him.
9 Fear him, his saints; for they that fear him have no lack. The rich go hungry, but those who seek 10 the Lord have no lack of anything. Hear me, children, and I will teach you the fear of the 11 LORD. Who is he that desireth to live, and desireth to see good days? Keep your tongue 12 from evil, and your lips from speaking deceit.
Forsake evil, and do good; seek peace, and 13 pursue it. The eyes of the Lord look upon the righteous, and his ears upon their cry. But the 14 face of the LORD is upon them that do evil, to cut off their remembrance from the earth. When the righteous cry out, the LORD hears and delivers 15 them from all their distress. The Lord is near to those who are brokenhearted and helps those 16 who are brokenhearted. The righteous must suffer much, but the Lord helps him out of it all.
17 He preserves all his bones, so that not one of them will be broken. The 18

Unhappiness shall kill the wicked; and they that hate the righteous shall be iniquitous. The Lord redeems the soul of his servants, and all who trust in him will have no guilt.

The 35th Psalm.

A Psalm of David.

1 O Lord, contend with my disputants, fight
2 against my contenders. Seize the shield and 3 screen and set out to help me. Bring forth the 4 spear, and defend me against my persecutors.
5 Say to my soul: I am your salvation. Those who 6 are after my soul shall be ashamed and be 7 cursed; those who want to harm me shall return
8 and be put to shame. They must become like 9 chaff before the wind, and the angel of the Lord 10 drive them away. Let their way become dark and 11 slippery, and let the angel of the LORD pursue 12 them. For without cause they have set their nets 13 to destroy me, and without cause they have made 14 pits for my soul. A tumult comes upon him 15 unawares, and his net, which he has set, must 16 see him, and fall into the same tumult. But let my 17 soul rejoice in the Lord, and be glad in his 18 salvation. All my bones must say, "Lord, who is 19 like you? Thou that savest the wretch from him
20 that is too strong for him, and the poor and needy 21 from his robbers. Frevele witnesses appear, they 22 ask me, of which I know nothing. They repay me 23 evil for good, to make my soul desolate. But I,
24 when they were sick, put on sackcloth, humbled 25 my soul with fasting, and my prayer turned to my 26 bosom. I walked as if it were my friend and 27 brother, I bent down sadly, like a wailing mother.
28 But they rejoice at my harm, and come home; the 29 limpers come upon me in heaps unawares; they 30 tear and cease not. With the gluttonous and 31 mocking hypocrites they gnash their teeth at me.
32 O Lord, how long wilt thou watch? Bring again my 33 soul from their tumult, and my lonely one from the 34 young lions. I will thank thee in the great

Community, and among many people I will boast of you. Let not those rejoice over me who are 19 hostile to me without cause, nor wave their eyes at me who hate me without cause. For they speak not peace, and devise false words 20 against the outcasts of the land. And they open their mouths wide against me, and say: There, 21 there, our eyes see it. O LORD, thou seest it:
hold not thy peace, O LORD, remove not thyself 22 from me. Arise, and awake to my right, and to my cause, my God and my Lord. O LORD my 23 God, judge me according to thy righteousness, lest they rejoice over me. Let them not say in 24 their heart, There, there, we would. Let them not say, We have swallowed him up. They shall be 25 ashamed and put to shame, all they that rejoice in mine iniquity; they shall be clothed with shame and dishonor, they that magnify themselves 26 against me. They that delight in my righteousness shall boast and rejoice, saying always, Let the LORD be highly praised, who delighteth in the peace of his servant. And let my 27 tongue speak of thy righteousness, and daily of thy praise.

The 36th Psalm.

28

A psalm of David, the Lord's servant, to be sung on high.

It is said in my heart of the transgression of the wicked, that there is no fear of God before 1 his eyes. But he pretends to himself before his eyes, until his iniquity is found worthy of hatred.
2 The words of his mouth are unjust and false; he does not consider that he would be wise to do 3 good. He is vain in his own camp, and treadeth not in a good way, neither spareth he iniquity. O 4 LORD, thy lovingkindness is in the heavens, and thy faithfulness unto the clouds. Thy righteousness is as the mountains of God, thy 5 judgment as the great deep. O LORD, thou savest both man and beast. How precious is 6 your goodness, O God, that the children of men should trust under the shadow of your wings.: 7 They shall be filled with the fatness of thy house, and thou shalt water them with the brook of thy 8 mercy.

ner pleasure. For with you is the fountain of life; in your light we shall see the light. Extend your 1 goodness to those who know you, and your righteousness to those who are upright in heart.
 2 Let not the foot of hope come upon me, nor let the hand of the wicked overthrow me. There the wicked fall, they are cast out, and cannot abide.

The 37th Psalm.

4

A Psalm of David.

Do not be angry with the wicked, do not be 5 envious of the wicked. For like the grass they shall soon be cut down, and like the green herb they shall wither. Hope in the Lord, and do good;
 6 abide in the land, and nourish thyself in the faith. Take pleasure in the Lord, who will give you what your heart desires. Commit thy ways unto the LORD, and hope in him: he will do it well. And he shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light, And thy justice as the noonday. Be still unto the 7 LORD, and let him deal with thee. Be not angry with the man that is well pleased, and doeth according to his will. Turn away from wrath, and leave off anger; be not angry, that thou also doest
 8 evil. For the wicked shall be cut off: but they that wait upon the LORD shall inherit the earth. If 9 there be yet a little, the wicked shall not be there: then shalt thou take heed to his place, and he 10 shall not be there. But the wretched shall inherit the land, and have pleasure in great peace. The 11 wicked dreadeth the righteous, and gnasheth his teeth at him. But the LORD laugheth at him: for he seeth that his day cometh. The wicked draw 12 out their sword, and draw their bow, that they may cut down the wretched and the poor, and 13 slay them that walk uprightly in the way. But their sword shall enter into their heart, and their bow 14 shall break. Better is the little of the righteous than the great good of many wicked. For the arm 15 of the wicked will break, but the LORD contains the righteous. The Lord knows the days of the 16 righteous, and their inheritance shall be for ever. They shall not be put to shame in the evil time, and in the time of trouble they will have enough. For the wicked shall perish, and the 17 enemies of the LORD: though they be as the pleasant pasture, yet shall they all be as the smoke is all. The wicked borroweth and payeth not: but the righteous is merciful and mild. For his 18 blessed shall inherit the land; but his cursed shall be cut off. By God a man's ways are encouraged, and hath pleasure in his paths. If he fall, he shall 19 not be cast away: for the LORD upholdeth him in his hand. I have been young, and have grown 20 old, and have never seen the righteous forsaken, or his seed go after bread. Daily he is merciful, and lendeth; and his seed shall be blessed. Forsake evil, and do good, and abide forever. For the LORD loveth righteousness, and 21 forsaketh not his saints: they shall be preserved for ever: but the seed of the wicked shall be cut

 22 off. The righteous inherit the land, and dwell therein for ever. The mouth of the righteous is filled with wisdom, and his tongue speaks of judgment. The law of his God is in his heart; his 23 footsteps do not slip. The wicked looketh upon the righteous, and thinketh to slay him. But the LORD will not leave him in his hands, nor condemn him when he is condemned. Wait upon 24 the LORD, and keep his way, and he shall exalt thee, and thou shalt inherit the earth: when the 25 wicked shall be cut off, thou shalt see. ^{s)} I saw an ungodly man, mighty, and rooted up like a green laurel tree. As one passed by, behold, he was 26 gone; I asked for him, and he was nowhere to be found. Keep piety, and see what is sincere; for in the end he will have peace. But the transgressors are destroyed with one another, 27 and the wicked are cut off at last. But the salvation of the righteous is of the Lord, who is 28 their strength in time of trouble. And the LORD shall stand by them, and shall deliver them, and shall deliver them from the wicked, and shall save them, because they trust in him.

s) To see, that is, to see your desire.

The 38th Psalm.

1 A Psalm of David, to remember.
 2 O Lord, do not punish me in your anger, and
 3 do not chastise me in your wrath. For thine
 4 arrows are in me, and thy hand is upon me. There
 5 is no soundness in my body from thy wrath,
 6 neither is there peace in my bones from my sin.
 7 For my iniquities are gone over my head, as a 8 heavy burden they are become too heavy for me.
 9 My wounds have become stinking and rotten
 10 because of my foolishness. I bend and stoop 11 almost very much; all day long I walk sadly. For 12 my intestines are all withered, and there is 13 nothing healthy in my body. I am all too bruised 14 and battered; I howl with the disquietness of my 15 heart. All my desires are before you, O Lord, and 16 my groaning is not hidden from you. My heart 17 trembles, my strength has left me, and the light of 18 my eyes^t is not with me. My loved ones and 19 friends stand against my plague, and my 20 neighbors stand aloof. And those who are after 21 my soul oppose me, and those who want to harm
 22 me speak and write falsehood daily. I am like a 23 deaf man who does not hear, and like a mute who does not open his mouth. And I must be as one that heareth not, and hath not an answer in his mouth. For I wait, O LORD, for thee; thou, O LORD my God, wilt answer. For I think that they will not rejoice over me; if my foot were lifted up, they would boast against me. For I am made to suffer, and pain is always before me. For I show my iniquity, and am careful for my sin. But mine enemies live, and are mighty; and they that hate me without guilt are many. And they that repay me good with evil are against me, because I follow after that which is good. Forsake me not, O LORD my God; depart not from me. Make haste to help me, O Lord of my salvation.

23

t) Light of my eyes, that is, my face is not light and joyful, but looks sour, sorrowful and gloomy.

The 39th Psalm.

A Psalm of David, to sing high for Jeduthun. 1
 I said: I will keep my ways, that I sin not with 2 my tongue. I will keep my mouth with one bite, 3 though the wicked stand against me. I have fallen 4 silent, I have become still, I am silent of good, 5 and my sorrow grieves me. My heart is warmed 6 in my flesh, and fire is kindled in my thoughts. I 7 have spoken with my tongue. O Lord, let me 8 know my end, and what is the goal of my life, that 9
 I may know what I lack. Behold, thou hast 10 measured my days as with a hand, and the 11 length of my life is as nothing before thee. How 12 utterly vain are all men that live, Sela. Yea, every 13 man walketh as an image, and is vainly 14 disquieted; he gathereth, and knoweth not who 1 shall bring it in. Now, O Lord, what is my hope? I 2 wait for thee. Deliver me from all my 3 transgression, and put me not to the shame of 4 fools. I am dumb, and open not my mouth: for 5 thou hast made it. Turn away thy plague from 6 me; For I am faint for fear of thy hand. Thou 7 chastenest every man when thou punishest 8 iniquity, And makest his beauty to be consumed 9 like a spider. How vain are all men, Sela. Hear 10 my prayer, O Lord, and hear my cry, and be not 11 silent over my tears. For I am a stranger with 12 thee, and a sojourner, as were all my fathers.
 Depart from me, that I may rest before I go, and be no more.

The 40th Psalm.

A Psalm of David, to be sung on high. 13
 I waited for the Lord, and he bowed down to 14 me and heard my cry. And brought me up out of the pit of the brewing, and out of the mire and dung, and set my feet upon the rock, and made my walk prosperous. And hath put a new song in my mouth, a glory to our God: which many shall see, and fear, and hope in the LORD. Blessed is he that putteth his hope in the LORD, and feareth 1 not the LORD. 2

6 turns to the hopeful, and those who deal in lies.
 O Lord, my God, you have done many wonders, and nothing is like your thoughts about us. This I will declare, and say that they are too great to tell.
 7 Thou hast no pleasure in sacrifice and meat offering, but thou hast opened mine ears: thou requireest neither burnt offering nor sin offering.
 8 Then said I, Behold, I come; in the book it is written of me. I will do your will, O God, and your law is within me. I will preach righteousness in the 9 great congregation; behold, I will not withhold my lips; O Lord, thou knowest. Thy righteousness 10 have I not hid in mine heart; of thy faith and salvation speak I; I conceal not thy 11 lovingkindness and thy faithfulness in the great congregation. But thou, O Lord, wilt not turn away thy mercy from me: let thy lovingkindness and thy faithfulness keep me always. For I have been 12 surrounded by calamities of which there is no number; my iniquities have taken hold of me, so that I cannot see; they have become more than 13 the hairs of my head, and my heart has forsaken me. Let it please thee, O Lord, to save me; haste to help me. Let them be ashamed, and let them be ashamed, that are after my soul, that they should destroy them: let them fall back with one 14 another, and let them be ashamed, that do me 15 wrong. They must soon become ashamed who say of me: There, there. All who ask for you must rejoice and be glad, and all who love your salvation must say: Praise be to the Lord. For I am poor and miserable; the Lord thinks for me.
 16 Thou art my helper and savior; my God, consume not.

17 The 41st Psalm.

A psalm of David, to be sung on high. 1) 18 Blessed is he who takes care of the poor, whom the Lord will save in the evil time.

1) In sratis: Thus lift up the 41st Psalm: Blessed is he who takes care of the poor, or who takes care of the poor. (Zeidler and Walch.) - According to this information, I have put this improvement in the text instead of: "Wohl dem, der sich versteht auf den Dürftigen", which Walch and the Erlangen edition have retained.

The LORD shall preserve him, and keep him 3 alive, and make him prosper on earth, and not give him into the will of his enemies. The LORD shall rest him in the bed of his affliction; all his 4 camp thou shalt walk in his sickness. I said, O Lord, have mercy on me; heal my soul, for I have 5 sinned against thee. Mine enemies speak evil against me, saying, When shall he die, and his name perish? When he came in to look, his heart 6 spake vainly, and gathered him only iniquity, and went out to recount it. All those who attack me 7 murmur with one another against me, and think evil of me. They have decided a knavery against me: When he lies down, he shall not rise again. 8 Even my friend, on whom I trusted, who ate with me, tramples me under his feet. But thou, O Lord, 9 be merciful unto me, and awake me, and I will pay them. In this I perceive that thou delightest in 10 me, that mine enemy shall not exult over me. But thou hast kept me through my piety, and hast set 11 me before thy face for ever. Blessed be the Lord, the God of Israel, from this time forth and for 12 evermore. Amen.

13

The 42nd Psalm.

An instruction of the children Korah to sing high. 14
 As the deer cries out to the streams of water, so my soul, O God, cries out to you. My soul thirsts for God, for the living God; when will I come in and see God's face? My tears are my food day and night, because they say to me daily, 1
 "Where is your God? When I think of this, I pour out my soul against me. For I would gladly go 2 over with the multitude, and go with them to the house of God, in the sound of praise and 3 thanksgiving, among the multitude that celebrate.
 Why do you grieve, my soul, and are so troubled within me? Wait upon GOD, for I will yet give 4 thanks to Him for the salvation of His countenance. My God, my soul is troubled within 5 me; therefore I remember you in the land of Jordan and Hermonim,

10 at the small mountain. A deep calls the mderm, above the roar of your flood; all your waves¹) and waves go over me. The LORD hath commanded 11 his goodness in the daytime; and at night his catch with me, the prayer unto GOD of my life. I will say to God, my rock: Why have you forgotten 12 me? Why must I go so sadly, because my enemy presseth me? It is as a murder in my legs that my enemies revile me, when they say to me daily, Where is now thy God? Why do you grieve, my soul, and are so troubled within me? Wait upon God, for I shall yet thank Him for the salvation of His countenance.

The 43rd Psalm.

2 Judge me, O LORD, and plead my cause against the unholy people, and deliver me from the false and wicked people. For you are the God 3 of my strength, why do you reject me? Why do you let me go so sadly when my enemy presses me? Send thy light and thy truth, that they may 4 guide me, and bring me to thy holy mountain, and to thy dwelling place. That I may go in to the altar of God, to the God of my joy and delight, and give 5 thanks to you, O God, on the harp, my God. Why do you grieve, my soul, and are so troubled within me? Harp on GOD, for I shall yet give thanks to Him for the salvation of His countenance.

1

The 44th Psalm.

An instruction of the children Korah to sing high.
2 God, we have heard with our ears, our fathers have told us, what you did in their days of old.
Thou hast driven out the heathen with thine
3 hand, and hast established them; thou hast destroyed the nations, and hast driven them out.
4 For they took not the land by the sword, neither did their arm help them: but thy right hand, thine arm, and that which thou hast done, thou hast done.

Light of your countenance, for you were well pleased with them. Thou art my King, O God, who 5 didst help Jacob. By thee will we overthrow our enemies; in thy name will we subdue them that 6 set themselves against us. For I will not depend on my bow, nor will my sword help me; but thou 7 wilt save us from our enemies, and wilt put to shame them that hate us. We will praise God daily, and give thanks to your name forever, Sela. 8 Why then dost thou cast us off, and let us be put to shame, and dost thou not go forth from among 9 our host? You let us flee from our enemy, so that 10 those who hate us may rob us. Thou givest us away like sheep for the slaughter, and scatterest us among the heathen. Thou sellest thy people 11 cheaply, and takest no money for it. Thou makest us a reproach to our neighbors, a scorn and a 12 derision to them that are round about us. Thou makest us an example among the heathen, and 13 the nations shake their heads at us. Daily is my 14 reproach before me, and the shame of my face covereth me, before the voice of the reproachful 15 and the blasphemous, before the enemy and the revenger. All this has come upon us, and yet we 16 have not forgotten you, nor acted falsely in your covenant. Our hearts have not turned back, nor 17 our ways departed from thy path. That thou shouldest smite us in the place of serpents^u) And 18 hast covered us with darkness. If we forget the name of our God, and lift up our hands to a 19 strange god, will not God find it? For he knows the secret in the heart. For we are slain daily for thy 20 sake, and are esteemed as sheep for the slaughter. Awake, O Lord, why are you asleep? 21 Awake, and do not cast us off. Why dost thou hide thy face, Forgetting our affliction and our distress? For our soul is bowed to the earth, our 22 belly clings to the ground. Arise, help us, and 23 deliver us for your goodness' sake.

The 45th Psalm.

1 A lovely song and instruction of the children of Korah, from the roses, to sing high.
 2 My heart is a poet of good; I speak what I have made of a king; my tongue is the stylus of a skillful scribe. You are the most beautiful of the children 3 of men; your lips are blessed; therefore God blesses you forever. Gird thy sword about thy 4 loins, O mighty one, with praise and adornment.
 Let thy adornment prosper thee; Go forth with truth, meekness, and righteousness; Thy right 5 hand shall teach thee wondrously. Sharp are your arrows, the nations will submit to you, in the midst of the king's enemies. God, your throne remains 6 forever and ever; the scepter of your kingdom is a straight scepter. Thou lovest righteousness, 7 and hatest wickedness; therefore, O God, thy God hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness, 8 more than thy fellows. All thy garments are like myrrh, aloes and kezia,^v) one rejoices in thee above the ivory temples. The daughters of kings walk in thy ornaments; the queen is at thy right 9 hand in precious gold. Hear, daughter, look upon it, and incline thine ears; forget thy people and thy 10 father's house. Then the king will delight in your beauty, for he is your Lord, and you shall worship him. The daughter of Zor^w) will be there with gift; 11 the rich among the people will plead before you.
 The king's daughter is all glorious within; her 12 garment is wrought gold. She will be brought to the king in embroidered garments, and virgins 13 after her, who are her neighbors, will be brought to you. They shall be brought with joy and 14 gladness, and shall enter into the temple of the king. In the place of your fathers you have had 15 children, whom you will bring to

You shall make me ruler in all the earth. I will remember your name from child to child; therefore the nations will give you thanks forever and ever.

The 46th Psalm.

A song of the children Korah, of the youth, to sing high.

God is our confidence and strength, a help in the great troubles that have befallen us.
 Therefore, we will not be afraid if the earth 3 collapses and the mountains fall into the sea. If the sea were to rage and lead into a heap, and 4 the mountains were to tremble before its impetuosity, Sela. The river with its streams delights the city of God, the holy dwellings of the 5 Most High. God is with her within, therefore she will remain well; God helps her 1) early. The 6 nations rage, and the kingdoms stir; when he is heard, the earth melts. The LORD of hosts is with 7 us; the LORD of Jacob is our refuge, Sela.
 Come, and reprove the works of the LORD, who 8 hath wrought such destruction in the earth. He hath kept the strife until the end of the world; he 9 hath broken bows, he hath broken spears, he hath burned chariots with fire. Let go, and know 10 that I am God. I will be exalted among the nations, I will be exalted in the earth. The LORD of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our 11 refuge, Sela.

The 47th Psalm.

A psalm to sing high, of the children of Korah.

Rejoice with your hands, all nations, and shout for joy to God. For the LORD Most High is terrifying, a great king over all the face of the 1 earth. He will strike the nations under us, and people under our feet. He will choose us for an 2 inheritance, the glory of Jacob, whom he loves, 3 Sela. God has ascended with shouting, and the Lord with a bright trumpet. Sing praises, sing 4 praises to God; sing praises, sing praises to our King. For God is King.

v) What Kezia is, I do not know; some call it Kasia fistula. It must be a root that smells well and holds clothes well.

w) Zor means the city of Tyre. It may also mean a rock; but he calls the city Thrus, which was the richest and most famous city at that time, as if to say: Even the richest in the world will honor Christendom in later editions: "Christum"] 2c.

1) Erlanger: "me".

nig on all the face of the earth, praise him with 9 understanding. God is King over the nations; God sits on His holy throne. The princes of the 10 nations are gathered together as one people to the God of Abraham, for God is greatly exalted among the lords of the earth.

The 48th Psalm.

A psalm song of the children of Korah.

1 Great is the Lord, and highly renowned, in the 2 city of our God, on his holy mountain. Mount Zion is like a beautiful branch that all the earth rejoices 3 over; on the side toward midnight is the city of the great King. God is known in her palaces to be the protector. For, behold, the kings are gathered 4 together, and passed by with one another. They marveled when they saw these things; they were 5 amazed and perplexed. Trembling they arrived there, afraid like a woman in childbirth. You will 6 break the ships in the sea by the east wind. As we have heard, so we see it in the city of our God; 7 God is preparing it forever, Sela. GOD, we wait for your goodness in your temple. God, as your 8 name, so is your glory to the end of the wager; your right hand is full of righteousness. Let Mount 9 Zion rejoice, and let the daughters of Judah be glad, because of thy judgments. Make thee 10 round about Zion, and compass her, and number her towers. Put diligence upon her walls, and 11 exalt her palaces, that they may declare to their descendants that this God is our God for ever 12 and ever, who guides us like the youth.

The 49th Psalm.

A psalm of the children of Korah, to be sung on high.

15 Listen, all peoples, pay attention, all who live in this time. Both common man and lord, both rich and poor together. My mouth shall speak of wisdom, and my heart shall speak of and on the harp will present my riddles. Why should I fear in evil days,

When I am surrounded by the iniquity of my transgressors? Who rely on their goods, and 7 defy their great riches. A brother cannot redeem 8 anyone, nor can God reconcile anyone. For it costs too much to redeem their souls, that they 9 must endure forever, even though they live long and do not see the pit. For it will be seen that 10 such wise men die with one another, as well as 11 fools and fools perish, and must leave their goods to others. What is in their house will last forever, their dwellings will remain forever, and they will be called by their name on earth. But 12 man does not remain in such dignity, but becomes like the cattle, which is silent. This their doing is their foolishness, nor do their 13 descendants praise it with their mouths, Sela.
 They lie in hell like sheep, death will gnaw them, 14 and the upright will rule over them early, and their shelter will become obsolete; hell is their dwelling place. But GOD will deliver my soul from the 15 hand of hell if he accepts me, Sela. Marvel not if any man be rich, when the glory of his house shall be great. For he shall take none with him in 16 his death, and his glory shall not follow him. But he praiseth his soul for this life, 1) and if thou 17 doest well, he praiseth thee. That thou mayest succeed his fathers' seed, where no light is ever 18

 10 Israel, let me testify among you: I GOD, am your 11 GOD. I will not punish you because of your 12 sacrifice, for your burnt offerings are always 13 before me. I will not take bullocks from thy house, 14 nor goats from thy stalls. For all the beasts of the 16 mountains. I know all the birds of the mountains, 17 and all the beasts of the field are before me.

 18 Where I hungered, I would not tell thee; for the and pay your vows to the Most High. And call

 God says, "Why do you proclaim my judgments and take my covenant into your mouth, when you hate discipline and throw my words behind you?
 When thou sawest a thief, thou didst lie with him,

 11 Against thee only have I sinned, and done evil in 12 thy sight. Therefore thou shalt be justified in thy 13 words, and found pure when thou art judged.
 14 Behold, I am made in iniquity, and my mother 15 conceived me in sins. Behold, thou delightest in Create in me, O God, a clean heart, and renew in me a willing spirit. Cast me not away from thy presence, and take not thy Holy Spirit from me.

 Restore to me the comfort of your salvation, and the free Spirit keep me. 2) I will teach the wicked your ways, that sinners may turn to you. Save me from the guilt of blood,^a) God, who art the God of my salvation, that my tongue may praise your righteousness. O LORD, open my lips, that my mouth may declare thy glory. For thou hast no pleasure in sacrifice; otherwise I would give it, and burnt offerings are not pleasing to thee. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit, a broken and bruised heart thou, O God, wilt not despise.
 Do good to Zion according to your good will; build the walls of Jerusalem. Then thou shalt delight in the sacrifices of righteousness, in burnt offerings and whole sacrifices; then shall they put bullocks upon thine altar.

The 52nd Psalm.

1 An instruction of David to sing on high; when 2 Doeg the Edomite came and told Saul, saying, David is come in Abimelech's hands.
 Why do you boast of wickedness, O mighty 3 one? Is God's goodness here every day? Your tongue seeks mischief, and like a sharp 4 shearer's knife you deceive. Thou lovest evil more than good, to speak falsely more than 5 justice, Selah. Thou lovest only that which is for destruction, and false tongues. God will also 6 break you off completely, and crush you, and 7 uproot you from the tabernacle, and your root from the land of the living, Selah. And the righteous shall see it, and be afraid, and they shall laugh. Behold, this man thought not of God 8 for his strength, but relied upon his great riches, and was mighty in his mischief. But I am 9 like a green olive tree in the house of God, relying on his goodness forever and ever. I thank thee for ever, for thou hast done it; and I will wait for 10 thy name, for it is good in the sight of thy saints.

The 53rd Psalm.

11 An instruction of David to sing high in the choir around each other.
 The fools say in their hearts, "There is no God;
 they are corrupt and have become abominable in wickedness; there is no one who does good. God 1 looks down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there be any that understandeth to 2 ask after God. But they had all gone astray, and were unfit for one another; there was none that did good, not even one. Do not the evildoers who 3 devour my people realize that only they have food to eat? They do not call upon God. They are afraid where there is no fear; for God scatters the

The 54th Psalm.

An instruction of David to sing on high on the 1 2 strings: when they of Ziph came, and said unto Saul, Is not David hid with us?
 Help me, God, in your name, and judge me 3 4 with your power. God, hear my prayer, listen to the words of my mouth. For strangers set 5 themselves against me, and mighty men after my soul, who have not God before their eyes, Selah.
 Behold, God is with me, the LORD is with my 6 7 soul. He will pay the evil of mine enemies, cast them out in thy faithfulness. So will I offer 8 sacrifices freely unto thee, and give thanks unto thy name, O LORD, that it is so good. For thou 9 hast delivered me from all mine adversaries, that mine eye may delight in mine enemies.

The 55th Psalm.

An instruction of David to sing high on stringed 1 instruments.
 God, hear my prayer, and do not turn away 2 from my supplication. Take heed to me, and hear 3 me as I howl and lament so miserably. That the enemy crieth, and the wicked presseth: for they 4 will commit an iniquity against me, and are sore grieved against me. My heart is troubled in my flesh, and the fear of death is fallen upon me. 5 Fear and trembling have come upon me, and horror has overtaken me. I said, Oh that I had 6 wings like doves, that I might fly and stay! Behold, I would depart far away, and dwell in the 7 wilderness, Selah. And I would hasten to escape from the fierce wind and weather. O LORD, 8 9 devour and cut off their tongues: for I see iniquity and strife in the city. It goes round and round 10 within her walls day and night: iniquity and wickedness are within. Wickedness is within, 11 cunning and deceitfulness shall not depart from her street. If my enemy would disgrace me, I 12 would suffer it, and if my hater would rise up against me, I would hide myself from him. But you 13 are my companion, my keeper and my friend, who we were friendly with each other in secret, we walked in the house of God with heaps. Death overtakes 16 them, and they must go to hell alive, for there is wickedness among them in their dwellings. But I 17 will cry out to God, and the Lord will help me. In the evening, in the morning and at noon I will wail 18 and cry, and he will hear my voice. He will deliver my soul in peace from those who want me, for 19 they are against me with many. God will hear and humble them who remain forever, Sela. For they 20 do not change, and do not fear God. For they lay their hands on his seeds of peace, and profane his covenant. Their mouth is smoother than 21 butter, and yet they have war in mind; their words are softer than oil, and yet they are mere swords.

22 Cast thy cause upon the LORD, and he shall provide for thee, and shall not leave the righteous in strife. But, O God, you will push them down into 23 the pit of destruction; the bloodthirsty and deceitful will not bring their lives to the halfway mark; but I hope in you.

The 57th Psalm.

A golden jewel of David, to sing highly (that he 1 would not be destroyed) when he fled from Saul into the cave.

Be merciful to me, God, be merciful to me, for 2 in you my soul trusts, and under the shadow of your wings I have refuge, until the mischief helped me up again. He sent from Heaven, and 3 helped me from the shame of my sinner, Sela. 4 Gott sent His goodness and faithfulness. I lie with my soul among the lions, the children of men 5 are flames, their teeth are spears and arrows, and their tongues sharp swords. Exalt thyself, O God, above the heavens, and thy glory above all 6 the earth. They have set nets for my walk, and pressed down my soul; they have dug a pit 7 before me, and fallen in it themselves, Sela. My heart is ready, O God, my heart is ready, that I may sing and praise. Awake, my glory, ^c) awake, 8 psaltery and harp, early will I make out. O Lord, I will give thee thanks among the nations; I will 9

God, above the heavens, and thy glory above all 11
the earth. 12

The 58th Psalm.

A golden jewel of David, to sing highly of it, that it would not perish.

Will you not speak what is right and judge 1

heart you deal with injustice, and your hands do 2

They perish as a snail pines away; like a woman's untimely birth they do not see the sun. Before you^e) your thorns sprout on the briar, wrath will snatch them away while they are still fresh. The righteous will rejoice when he sees such vengeance, and will bathe his walk in the blood of the wicked. ^fSo that people will say: The righteous will enjoy his yes, because God is still judge on earth.

The 59th Psalm.

A golden jewel of David, that he should not perish, when Saul sent, and kept his house, to slay him.

Save me, my God, from my enemies, and protect me from those who set themselves against me. Deliver me from the wicked, and save me from the bloodthirsty. For, behold, they lie in wait for my soul; the mighty are gathered together against me, though I, O LORD, have neither iniquity nor sin. They run without my fault, and prepare themselves; awake to meet me, and behold. O LORD God of hosts, O LORD Israel, awake to visit all the nations; be merciful to none,^g, who do iniquity, selah. In the evening let them return, and murmur like dogs, and go about in the city.

f) Blood, that is, vengeance will be greater than anyone desires, so that where he desires a drop of blood and vengeance, it will be so much that he will want to bathe in it.

g) Be merciful to no one, that is, do not put up with their evil ways and do not help their wickedness to continue.

Behold, they speak with their mouths, swords are in their lips, who shall hear? ^h) But thou, O LORD, wilt laugh at them, and mock all the nations. From his power I will take heed to you, for GOD is my protection. God showers me with his goodness, God makes me see my will in my enemies. Do not strangle them, lest my people forget, but drive them out with your power, O LORD my shield, and cast them down. They only teach sin, and hinderⁱ themselves in their hope, and say vain curses and contradictions. Make them all. Rather, make them all angry, so that they are nothing, and realize that God is Lord in Jacob, in all the world, Sela. In the evening let them return, and murmur like dogs, and go about in the city. Let them run to and fro for food, but if they are not satisfied, they will grumble. But I will sing of thy power, and praise thy lovingkindness in the morning: for thou art my refuge and my shelter in the time of my trouble. I will sing praises to you, my refuge; for you, O God, are my protection, and a God of my goodness.

The 60th Psalm.

The 61st Psalm.

A psalm of David, to be sung on high, on a stringed instrument.

1 Hear, O God, my lamentation, and heed my prayer. From the ends of the earth I will call to 2 you when my heart is in anguish; you would lead me to a high rock. For thou art my refuge, a 3 strong tower before mine enemies. I will dwell in thy tabernacle for ever, And trust under thy

 5 vows: thou hast given an inheritance unto them that fear thy name. Thou wilt give the king long praises to your name forever, and I will count my

The 62nd Psalm.

9 A Psalm of David for Jeduthun, to be sung on high.

My soul is silent to God, for from him comes 1 my salvation. For he is my stronghold, my salvation, my refuge; therefore I will abide. How 2 long do ye pursue the man, that ye all slay him, 3 as a hanging wall and a broken fence? But they your heart before him; GOD is our confidence, 9 selah. But vain are men, false are men; on the scales they are lighter than vanity. Do not rely on 10 injustice and violence, and do not become vain; if riches come to you, do not hang your heart on that with God there is power. And with thee, O Lord, goodness, that thou pay every man

A psalm of David when he was in the wilderness of Judah.

God, you are my God, early will I seek you; my soul thirsts for you, my flesh longs for you, in a 1 dry and thirsty land where there is no water. So have I seen thee in the sanctuary, that I beheld

 4 When I remembered thee upon my bed, My conversation was of thee in the watch. For thou 5 art my helper, and under the shadow of thy wings will I glory. My soul cleaveth unto thee, thy right 6 hand containeth me. But they stand after my soul, to bring it down; they shall go down under the 7 earth. They shall fall on the sword, and be given to the foxes. But the king rejoiceth in GOD: he 8 that sweareth by him shall be glorified: for the mouth of them that speak falsities is stopped.

4 The wicked, before the wicked, who sharpen
 5 their tongues like a sword, who aim their arrows 6 most bitterly, so that they secretly shoot the 7 pious, suddenly they shoot at him, and are not 8 afraid. They attack a wicked piece, and say how 9 they will lay ropes, and say: Who will see them?
 10 They devise mischief, and keep it secretly
 11 among themselves in the depth of their hearts.
 But God shall shoot them with a sudden arrow, that they shall be sore. Their own tongues have they forged, that they mocked him that saw them. And all men were afraid, and declared the deed of God, and perceived that it was his work.
 The righteous rejoiceth in the LORD, and trusteth in him: and all that are upright in heart do glory.

The 65th Psalm.

A Psalm of David to sing high.

1 God, they wait and praise you in Zion, and 2 they pay vows to you. Because thou hearest
 3 prayer, all flesh cometh before thee. Our iniquity
 4 is become too great; our transgression thou wilt 5 forgive. Blessed is he whom thou choosest, and 6 dost admit to dwell in thy courts: he shall be filled 7 with the good things of thy house, of thy holy 8 temple. Thou wilt answer us marvelously with 9 righteousness, O God of our salvation, who art 10 the confidence of all the ends of the earth, and 11 of the sea afar off. Thou that preparest the 12 mountains with thy power, and girdest them with 13 might. Who stills the roar of the sea, the roar of 14 its waves, and the raging of the nations. That they that dwell at the ends may fear thy signs.
 Thou makest glad them that go out, both early and late. Thou dost visit the land, and water it, and make it very rich. The river of God is full of water, and thou preparest the corn thereof; for so thou preparest it. Thou waterest the furrows thereof, and dost overflow the plow thereof; thou makest it soft with shoots, and blessest the growth thereof. Thou crownest the year with thy good, and thy footsteps drip with fatness. The dwellings of the wilderness are dripping, and the hills are merry round about. The pastures are full of sheep, and the meadows stand thick with corn, that they rejoice and sing.

The 66th Psalm.

A Psalmied, high to sing. 1

Rejoice in God, all the earth; sing praises to 2
 His name; make His glory glorious. Say to God:
 How marvelous are your works! Your enemies will fall short before your great power. All the earth shall worship thee, and sing praises unto 4 thee, praise thy name, Sela. Come, and behold the works of God, who is so marvelous in his 5 deeds among the children of men. He turneth the sea into dry land, that we may walk upon the face of the waters: we rejoice in him. He reigns with 6 his power forever; his eyes look upon the nations;
 the apostates will not be able to exalt themselves, 7 Sela. Praise, O peoples, our God; let the voice of his glory be loud, who keeps our souls alive, and does not let our feet slip. For, GOD, you have 8 tried us, and refined us as silver is refined. Thou hast brought us into a castle; thou hast laid a 9 burden upon our loins. Thou hast caused men to pass over our heads, we have come into fire and 10 water, but thou hast brought us out into the 11 fullness. Therefore will I enter into thine house with burnt offerings, and pay thee my vows, as I 12 have opened my lips, and my mouth hath spoken in my trouble. I will offer thee burnt offerings of 13 fat, of burnt rams; I will prepare oxen with goats, Selah. Come, listen, all you who fear God; I will 14 tell you what he has done for my soul. To him I cried with my mouth, and [he] is exalted with my 15 tongue. Where I look upon iniquity in my heart, the LORD will not hear. Therefore God heareth 16 me, and hearkeneth unto the voice of my supplications. Praise be to God, who hath not 17 turned away my prayer, nor his kindness from me.

The 67th Psalm.

A psalm song, to be sung high on stringed 18
 instruments. 20

God, be gracious to us and bless us, let His face shine upon us, Sela. That we on earth may know his way, under

4 his salvation to all the nations. The peoples 5 thank you, O God, all the peoples thank you. The peoples rejoice and exult that you judge the people rightly, and lead the people on earth, 6 Sela. The peoples thank you, O God, all the 7 peoples thank you. The land gives its crops; bless us, O God, our God. May God bless us, 8 and may the end of the world fear Him.

The 68th Psalm.

A psalm song of David, to be sung on high. ^{j)}

1 Let God arise, that His enemies may be 2 scattered, and they that hate Him may flee from Him. As the smoke is driven out, so drive them 3 out; as the wax melts from the fire, so must the wicked perish before God. But the righteous 4 must rejoice and be glad before God, and have joy in gladness. Sing to God, sing praises to His 5 name, make way for Him who comes gently, He is called the Lord, and rejoice before Him. He is the father of the fatherless, and the judge of 6 widows. He is God in his holy dwelling place. A God who gives the lonely a hansom full of children, 7 who leads the captives in the wilderness, but the apostates remain in the drought. God, when you went before your people, when you walked in the wilderness, Sela. Then the earth prayed, and the 8 heavens dripped before such GOD Sinai, before the GOD who is Israel's GOD. God, your 9 inheritance is dry; you would pour out a gracious rain and let it fall. Thy beasts shall dwell therein, 10 O GOD, thou wilt leave thy substance for the poor. The Lord will give the word with great 11 multitudes of evangelists. The kings^k) of the hosts shall be friends among themselves, and the ornaments^l) shall divide the spoil. When you 12 lie between the borders, the fittest of the doves will be silvered, and their wings will be golden.
13 When the Almighty shall have kings over them-

it will be snow-white even in the darkness. The 16 mountain of God is a fat mountain, an ironed mountain, a fat mountain. Why do you hopped 17 mountains? God desires to dwell on this mountain, and the Lord abides there forever. The 18 chariot of God is many thousands of thousands;
the LORD is among them in holy Sinai. Thou hast 19 ascended on high, and hast caught the prison; thou hast received gifts for men, even for the apostates, that God the LORD might dwell there.
[Praise be to the Lord every day, the God of our salvation will be well with us,^m) Sela. The GOtt 20 is to us a GOtt of salvation and a HErr to escape death. But GOtt will bruise the head of his 21 enemies with the skull of their hair,ⁿ) who walks in his iniquity. The LORD hath said, I will bring 22 again out of the fatnesses, out of the depths of the sea will I bring again. That thy foot may be 23 dyed in the blood of the enemy, and that thy dogs may lick it. One has seen, God, your walks, the 24 walks of my God and King in the sanctuary. The singers go before, then the minstrels, among the 25 maidens who are cramming. Praise GOD the LORD in the assemblies around the fountain of 26 Israel. There reign ye little Benjamin, the princes of Judah with their multitude, the princes of 27 Zebulun, the princes of Naphtali. Thy God hath commanded thee strength; strengthen, O God, 28 that thou hast done unto us. For the sake of your temple in Jerusalem, the kings will bring you 29 gifts. Rebuke the beast^o) in the reed, the herd of oxen among the people, which are their calves, 30 which have pleasure in money. He has scattered the nations that delight in war. The cowardly shall 31 come out of Egypt; Moorland shall stretch forth her hands unto God. You kingdoms of the earth, sing to God, sing praises to the Lord, Sela. To him who leads in heaven from the beginning; 32 behold, he will give power to his thunder. Pray to God for strength,

God to Israel, he will give strength and power to his people. Praise be to God.

The 69th Psalm.

A psalm of David, from the roses, to sing high.

1 God, help me, for the waters have come up to the soul. I am sunk in the deep mud, for there is 2 no bottom; I have come into deep waters, and the 3 flood has drowned me. I have grown weary with cries, my throat is hot, my eyes are all murder with waiting for my God. They that hate me without a 4 cause are more than the hairs of my head. They that are unjustly hostile to me, and destroy me, are become mighty; I must pay that which I have 5 not stolen. God, you know my foolishness, and my debts are not hidden from you. Let not them that wait for thee be ashamed of me. O LORD of 6 hosts, let not them that seek thee, O God of Israel, be ashamed in me. 2) For for thy sake bear my iniquity. For your sake I bear shame, shame 7 covers my face. I am become a stranger to my brothers, and unknown to my mother's children.
For zeal for thy house devoureth me, and the reproach of them that reproach thee is fallen upon 8 me. And I wept as my soul fasted, and that 9 became a mockery unto me. I put on sackcloth for a garment, and became their proverb. Those who 10 sat in the gate spoke against me, and it was a song to the drunkards. But I pray unto thee, O 11 Lord, in due season: O God, in thy great goodness, hear me according to thy faithful help.
12 Deliver me from the mire, that I sink not; that I be delivered from my haters, and from thy deep 13 waters. Lest the flood of waters drown me, and the deep swallow me up, and the hole of the pit 14 close upon me. Hear me, O LORD, for thy lovingkindness is good: turn thee unto me according to thy greatness.

Have mercy, and do not hide your face from me, your servant, for I am afraid; hear me in haste. 22 Make thee my soul, and deliver it; 3) Deliver me for mine enemies' sake. Thou knowest my 23 reproach, shame, and disgrace; my adversaries 24 are all before thee. The shame breaketh my heart, and I am grieved: I waited to see if any would mourn, but there was none; and for 25 comforters, but I found none. And they gave me 26 gall to eat, and watered me with vinegar, because I thirsted. Let their table become a 27 snare before them, a retribution and a trap. Let their eyes be darkened, that they see not; and let their loins be ever shaken. Pour upon them 28 your disgrace, and your fierce anger seize them.
Let their habitation be desolate, and let none 29 dwell in their tabernacles. For they persecute whom thou hast smitten, and have made more 30 over thy wounds of hurt. Let one iniquity overtake another, that they come not to thy 31 righteousness. Blot them out of the book of the living, that they be not written with the 4) 32 righteous. But I am wretched, and woe is me: let thy salvation, O God, protect me. I will praise the 33 name of God with a song, and will highly honor him with thanksgiving. This will please the Lord 34 more than a farrow that has horns and claws. 35
The wretched see and rejoice, and those who seek God, their hearts will live. For the LORD 36 heareth the poor, and despiseth not his prisoners. Let the heavens, the earth, and the 37 sea, and all that moveth therein, praise him. For God will help Zion, and build the cities of Judah, that they may dwell there, and possess them.
And the seed of his servants shall inherit them, and they that love his name shall dwell therein. 1

The 70th Psalm.

A Psalm of David high to sing, to remember.

Make haste, God, to save me, Lord, to help me. It must come to shame, 2

2) "to me" is missing in the Erlanger.

3) "Redeem them" is missing in Zeidler and Walch.

4) Erlanger: dem.

Those who are after my soul must return and be heard who wish me harm. That they may be put 4 to shame by one course, who say of me: There, there. They must rejoice and be glad in you, who 5 ask for you, and always say: Praise God, who love your salvation. But I am wretched and poor, 6 O God, make haste to me, for you are my help and my savior; O Lord, do not consume me.

The 71st Psalm.

A Psalm of David.

O Lord, I trust in thee; let me never again be put to shame. Save me through your 1 righteousness, and help me out; incline your ears
 2 to me and help me. Be to me a strong refuge, whither I always flee; thou wilt give me help, for 3 thou art my rock and my fortress. My God, save me from the hand of the wicked, from the hand of the unjust and cruel. For thou art my confidence, 4 O Lord, my hope from my youth. In thee am I contained from my mother's womb; thou hast drawn me out of my mother's womb; my glory is 5 ever from thee. I am as a wonder before many,
 6 but thou art my strong assurance. Let my mouth be full of thy glory, and of thy praise daily. Cast me not away in the time of my old age; Forsake 7 me not when my strength faileth. For mine enemies say of me, And they that hold upon my 8 soul consult with one another, And say: God has forsaken him, pursue and seize him, for there is 9 no savior. God, do not be far from me; my God, hasten to help me. All those who are against my 10 soul must be ashamed; those who seek my misfortune must be covered with shame and 11 scorn. But I will always wait, and will always make more of thy glory. My mouth shall declare 12 thy righteousness, daily thy salvation, which I cannot number. I will go in to tell of the power of 13 the LORD, I will think of thy righteousness alone.

I have been taught from childhood onward, and I still proclaim your wonders. Nor forsake me, O 18 God, in my old age, when I am gray, till I declare thy arm to the children of children, and thy power to all that are to come. God, your righteousness is 19 great, you who do great things; God, who is like you? Who let me see much and great anguish, and 20 made me alive again, and brought me up out of the depth of the earth. You make me very great, and comfort me again. So I also give thanks to your 21 faithfulness with psaltery, O my God; I sing praises 22 to you on the harp, O Holy One of Israel. My lips are glad that I sing praise unto thee, and my soul that thou hast redeemed. My tongue also daily 23 doth sing of thy righteousness; That they that seek my evil may be ashamed and put to shame. 24

The 72nd Psalm.

Of Solomon.

God, give your judgment to the king, and your righteousness to the king's son. That he may judge thy people with righteousness, and thy wretched 1 with judgment. Let the mountains exalt peace among the people, and the hills righteousness. He 2 shall judge the wretched people, and help the poor, and smite the reproachful. They shall fear 3 thee as long as the sun and moon endure from child to child's child. He shall descend as the rain 4 upon the hide, as the drops that wet the land. In his days shall the righteous arise, and great peace, 5 till the moon be no more. He shall reign from sea to sea, and from the waters to the ends of the 6 earth. Those in the deserts will kneel before him, and his enemies will lick the dust. The kings of the 7 sea and of the islands will bring gifts, the kings of Arabia and Seba will bring gifts. All kings will 8 worship him, all pagans will serve him. For he will save the poor from crying, and the wretched who 9 has no helper. He will spare the lowly and the poor, and the souls of the poor he will help. He will save their soul from the deceit 10

And their blood shall be esteemed in his sight.
 15 He shall live, and they shall give him of the gold of Neicharabia, and they shall pray before him for ever, praising him daily. There shall be on the 16 earth a sweet corn on the top of the mountains, its fruit shall quake^p like Lebanon, and it shall grow green in the cities, like grass on the earth.
 His name will remain forever, under the sun his 17 name will reach to the descendants,^q) and will be blessed by him; all the nations will praise him blessedly. Praise be to God, the Lord, the God of Israel, who alone performs miracles. And blessed be the name of his glory, and all the 18 earth shall be filled with his glory. Amen, amen.
 19 The prayers of David the son of Jesse have come to an end.

The 73rd Psalm.

A Psalm Assaph.

God is so good to Israel who are pure in heart.
 But I would have stumbled with my feet, my 1 footsteps would have slipped much nearer. For I was displeased with the foolish, when I saw that 2 the wicked fared so well. For they are not encompassed with death, and stand firm as a 3 palace. They are not in misfortune, like other people, and are not afflicted with other people.
 4 Therefore, their hope must be honest, and their iniquity must be acceptable to them. They want 5 to be seen^r, because they are so fat, they do what they think. They destroy everything, and 6 speak evil of it, and speak with violence.

p) quake, that is, the mountain Lebanon stands thick with trees and quakes when the wind blows. The gospel will also stand thick and quake in the cities; that is, the gospel and the Christians will grow abundantly and increase.

q) reach, that is, one will always preach his name for and for;
 although the old die, so do the descendants.

r) They want; this verse reads in Hebrew: Their eye goes out with fatness, and they go over the thoughts of the heart. But this is spoken darkly, and thus means: They are fat, that is, rich, powerful, in honor; therefore they boast, and want to be in front and on top, and to be seen before all. What they do must be right and fine; what they say is delicious, so that their splendor and courtliness are considered an honor and adornment. But what others speak and do must stink and be nothing; their tongue rules in heaven and earth.

high up. They set their mouths in heaven, and 9 their tongues run in the land. Therefore their people return there, and find abundance of water 10 with them. And they say: How does God know?
 11 Is there knowledge in the Most High? Behold, these are the wicked, who are blessed in the 12 world, and possess riches. Shall I then have purified my heart in vain, and washed my hands 13 in innocence? And have been afflicted daily, and my punishment was early. If I thought to say so, 14 behold, I rejected the generation of thy children.
 I thought to hear such things, but it was a trouble 15 unto me, until I entered into the sanctuaries of God, and perceived their end. But you put their 16 thing in the unknown, and fall them to the ground.
 How soon they become so desolate! They 17 perish, and come to an end with terror. As a dream when one awaketh, so shalt thou, O Lord, 18 make their image^s despised in the city. For my 19 heart is pierced, and my kidneys are pricked. But I am a fool that knoweth nothing; a beast am I 20 with thee. And I am always with thee; thou takest me by my right hand. Thou leadest me according to thy counsel, and receivest me with honor.
 21 Whom have I in heaven? and on earth nothing 22 pleaseth me, when I am with thee. My flesh and my heart are faint; God is my heart's refuge and 23 my portion forever. For behold, they that depart
 24 from thee shall perish; thou destroyest all them 25 that fornicate against thee. But it is good for me to cleave unto God, and to put my trust in the 26 Lord GOD, that I may declare all thy works.

The 74th Psalm.

A briefing Assaph.

O God, why hast thou so utterly cast us off, and thy wrath smote upon the sheep of thy thou hast purchased of old, which thou hast

s) Image, that is, their temporal being, which is only an appearance and image.

4 They shall trample them underfoot, and even 5 thrust them to the ground; the enemy hath spoiled 6 all in the sanctuary. Thy foes roar in the midst of 7 thy strongholds, and set up their signs for tokens.
 8 You see the axes looking up, as they cut into the 9 forest; and they cut down his table-work with axe
 10 and baleen. They cast thy sanctuary into the fire; 11 they profane the habitation of thy name to the 12 ground. They say in their heart, Let us spoil them 13 with one another; they burn all the cities of God in 14 the land. Our signs we see not, and there is no
 15 more prophet, and there is no more discerner
 16 among us. How long, O God, shall the wicked 17 revile? and the enemy blaspheme thy name?
 18 Why turnest thou away thy hand, and thy right
 19 hand from thy bosom^t so even? But God, my King 20 of old, helps in the midst of the land. Thou hast 21 rent the sea with thy strength, and broken the 22 heads of the dragons upon the face of the waters.
 23 Thou breakest the heads of Leviathan, and givest him for meat to the people of the wilderness. Thou dost divide fountains and streams; thou dost cause strong rivers to dry up. Day and night is thine, thou preparest light and sun. You set boundaries for all lands; you make summer and winter. Remember, then, that the enemy reviles God, and a foolish people blasphemes your name. Thou wilt not give to the beast the soul of thy turtledoves, nor forget the beast of thy wretched. Call on the covenant, for there are houses of iniquity in the dark places of the land.
 Let not the lowly go away with scorn, for the poor and miserable praise thy name. Arise, O God, and plead thy cause; remember thy daily reproach from fools. Forget not the voice of thy vile ones; the tumult of thy vile ones always increases.

your miracles. For I will take appointed time, and judge aright. The land is softened, and all that dwell therein; I have prepared the pillars thereof, Selah. I said to the foolish: Be not so foolish; and to the wicked, Put not horns upon your heads.
 Lift not up your horn, speak not stiff-necked. For exaltation comes neither from going out, nor from going down, nor from the wilderness. But God is judge, who lowers and raises up. For there is a cup in the hand of the LORD, and strong wine, poured out full, and pour^u out of the same; but the yeast thereof shall suck and drink all the wicked of the earth. But I will proclaim for ever, and sing praise unto the God of Jacob. And I will break all the horns of the wicked, that the horns of the righteous may be lifted up.

The 76th Psalm.

A psalm song Assaph, to sing on strings high.

God is known in Judah, in Israel his name is glorious. In Salem is his tent, and his dwelling place in Zion. There he breaketh the arrows of the bow, the shield, the sword, and the battle, Selah. You are more glorious and magnificent than the mountains of robbery. ^v) The splendid ones are robbed, and sleep their sleep, and all the strong men are not able with their hands.
 From thy rebuke, O God, Jacob, both horse and chariot shall fall asleep. Thou art terrible; who can stand before thee when thou art angry?
 Thou hast let judgment be heard from heaven:
 the earth was afraid, and was still, when God arose to judgment, to save all the wretched of the earth, Selah. For that thou art angry in a human way, thou shalt be thanked; but the rest of the wrath shalt thou gird about thee. ^w) If ye vow,

The 77th Psalm.

A Psalm Assaph, for Jeduthun to sing high.

1 With my voice to God, yes, with my voice to God, I will cry out, and he will hear me. In the day of my distress I seek the Lord; my hand is stretched out at night and does not cease; for my soul would not be comforted. When I remembered God, I was overwhelmed; I spoke and my spirit fainted, Sela. Thou hast kept mine eyes to watch; I am trodden down that I speak not. I have thought of the time before old age, of the years before. I think at night of my strings, and speak with my heart; my spirit must search. Will the Lord cast me off forever, and have no more pleasure? Is it then completely over with his goodness? And is there an end to the word forever and ever? Has God forgotten mercy and closed His mercy in anger? Sela. But I said, This is my weakness, these are changes of the right hand of the Most High. Therefore will I remember the works of the LORD; Yea, when I remember thy wondrous works of old. And I will speak of all thy works, and say of thy doings. God, your way is in holiness, who is so great and strong as God? You are the God who performs miracles; you have made your power known among the nations. You redeemed your people by your arm, the children of Jacob and Joseph, Sela. The waters saw thee, O God, the waters saw thee, and were afraid, and the deeps were troubled. The thick clouds poured water, the clouds thundered, and your arrows^x) drove. The voice of thy thunder is round about,^y) thy lightnings shine upon the ground, the earth stirreth and prayeth thereof. Your way is in the sea, and your path in great waters, yet your foot was not felt. You led your people like a flock of sheep, through Moses and Aaron.

The 78th Psalm.

A briefing Assaph.

Hear, my people, my law, incline your ears to the words of my mouth. I will open my mouth in proverbs, and speak old things, which we have heard and know, and which our fathers have told us, that they be not hid from their children, which came after, and declared the glory of the LORD, and his might, and the wonders that he hath done. He established a testimony in Jacob, and gave a law in Israel, which he commanded our fathers to make known unto their children, that the seed might know, and the children which should be born when they should arise, that they should make it known also unto their children, That they should put their hope in God, and not forget the deeds of the Lord, and keep his commandments, and not become, as their fathers were, an apostate and disobedient generation, which judged not their hearts, and whose spirits were not righteous in God; as the children of Ephraim, having the bow in armor, turned back at the time of the controversy. [They did not keep God's covenant and would not walk in His law. And they forgot his deeds, and his wonders, which he had made them see. In the sight of their fathers he wrought wonders in the land of Egypt, in the field of Zoan. He divided the sea, and made them pass through it, and set up the waters as a wall. He led them by a cloud by day and by a bright fire by night. He cleft the rocks in the desert, and watered them with great waters. And he made rivers to flow out of the rocks, and they went down like rivers of water. Still they continued to sin against Him, and disobeyed the Most High in the wilderness, and tempted God in their hearts, demanding food for their souls, and spoke against God, saying: Yes, God should be able to prepare a table in the wilderness! Behold, he hath the rock that waters flow, and rivers pour out; but when can he give bread, and prepare meat for his people? When the Lord heard this, he was 21 inflamed, and fire came up in Jacob, and wrath came upon Israel because they did not believe in 22 God and did not hope for his salvation. And he 23 commanded the clouds above, and opened the doors of heaven, and rained upon them to eat, 24 and gave them corn of heaven. Everyone ate angel's bread; he sent them food in abundance.

 He made the east wind to blow under heaven, 25 and by his strength brought the south wind. And 26 rained flesh upon them like dust, and feathery fowl like the sand of the sea. And he caused them 27 to fall under their bed on every side where they dwelt. Then they ate, and were filled to 28 overflowing; he made them atone for their lust.
 When they had atoned for their lust and were still 29 eating it, the wrath of God came upon them, 30 slaying the best of them and humiliating the defilers of Israel. But over all this they sinned still 31 more, and believed not in his miracles. Therefore their days were all consumed with vanity, and 32 their years were soon gone. When he slew them, they sought him, and taught themselves early 33 unto GOD, and thought that GOD was their refuge, and GOD the Most High was their 34 Redeemer, and pretended unto him with their mouth, and lied unto him with their tongue. But 35 their heart was not right with him, and they were not righteous in his covenant. But he was 36 merciful, and gladly forgave iniquity, and did not corrupt them, and often turned away his wrath, 37 and did not let all his anger go. For he remembered that they are flesh, a wind that passeth away, and cometh not again. How were they so long 1) disobedient in the wilderness, and 39 made him displeased in the desert. They turned and tempted God, and provoked the Holy One in 40 Israel. They did not remember his hand of the day when he delivered them from the hand of the 41 enemy. As he had done his signs in Egypt, and his wonders in the land of Zoan, when he turned 42 their waters into blood, that they might drink their rivers.

They could not drink, because he sent evil 45 worms among them to eat them, and frogs to destroy them. He gave their crops to caterpillars, 46 and what they had worked to locusts. And he smote their vines with hail, and their mulberry 47 trees with frost. He gave their cattle to hail, and their flocks to lightning. And he sent among them 48 the fury of his wrath, and displeasure, and woe, 49 and fear, and the invasion of evil angels. He made a way for his wrath, and spared not their souls from death, and delivered up their beasts 50 to pestilence. When he smote all the firstborn in Egypt, the firstlings of their strength in the tents of Ham. And he sent forth his people like sheep, 51 and led them as an herd in the wilderness. And he led them safely, that they feared not: but their 52 enemies covered the sea. And brought them into his holy border, unto that mountain which his 53 right hand hath purchased. And he drove out the nations before them, and divided unto them the 54 inheritance, and made the tribes of Israel to dwell in those tents. But they tempted, and disobeyed 55
 God, and kept not his testimonies. And fell back, and transgressed, as their fathers did, and turned aside, as a false bow. ^{z)} And they angered 56 him with their high places, and provoked him with their idols. And when God heard it, he was 57 enraged, and greatly despised Israel, that he removed his tabernacle from Shiloh, the 58 tabernacle where he dwelt among men. And delivered their strength into prison, and their 59 glory into the hand of the enemy; and delivered 60 his people to the sword, and burned against his inheritance. Her young men were devoured by 61 fire, and her virgins were not mourned. Their priests fell by the sword, and their widows were 62 not mourned. And the LORD awoke as one sleeping, as one strong, exulting from wine. And 63 smote his enemies in the rear, and gave them an everlasting reproach. And despised the 64 tabernacle of Joseph, and chose not the tribe of Ephraim; but chose the tribe of Judah, the mount 65 Zion, which he loved. He built his sanctuary on high, like a land that he had established forever. And he chose David his servant, and took him from the sheepfolds. From the lactating sheep he took him to feed his people Jacob, and his inheritance Israel. And he also fed them heartily, and led them with the understanding of his hands. ^{a)}

The 79th Psalm.

A Psalm Assaph.

3 O LORD, the heathen have fallen into thine inheritance, and have polluted thy holy temple, and have made Jerusalem a heap of stones. They have given the dead bodies of your servants to the birds of the air to eat, and the flesh of your saints to the beasts of the earth. They have shed blood around Jerusalem like water, and there was no one to bury it. We have become a reproach to our neighbors, a mockery and a scorn to those around us. O LORD, how long wilt thou be angry, and let thy zeal burn like fire? Pour out thy wrath upon the heathen that know thee not, and upon the kingdoms that call not upon thy name. For they have devoured Jacob, and laid his houses waste. Remember not our former iniquity; let thy mercy soon be greater upon us, for we have become almost thin. Help us, O God of our salvation, for the glory of thy name; save us, and forgive us our sin, for thy name's sake. Why should the Gentiles say, "Where is their God? Let the vengeance of the blood of thy servants, which is shed, be made known among the nations before our eyes. Let the groaning of the captives come before thee; according to thy great arm let the children of death be left. And repay our neighbors sevenfold in their bosom their reproach, because they have reproached thee, O LORD. But we, thy people, and the sheep of thy pasture, give thee thanks for ever, and proclaim thy praise for ever.

a) [With mind of his hands that is, wisely.

The 80th Psalm.

A Psalm and Testimony Assaph of the Roses, to Sing High. ¹

O shepherd of Israel, hear, you who shepherd Joseph like sheep; appear, you who sit over cherubim. Awaken your power, who are before Ephraim,^b Ben-Jamin and Manasseh, and come to our aid. God, bring us again, and let your face shine, and we shall be healed. O LORD God of hosts, how long wilt thou be angry with the prayer of thy people? Thou dost etch them with tears of bread, and drench them with a great measure of tears. Thou hast set us at variance with our neighbors, and our enemies mock us. God of hosts, bring us again, let thy face shine, and we shall recover. Thou didst bring a vine out of Egypt, and didst drive out the heathen, and plantedst the same. Thou didst make the way before it, and didst root it, that it filled the land. Mountains are covered with his shadow, and with his branches the cedars of God. He hath let out his plant unto the sea, and his branches unto the waters. Why then hast thou broken down his fence, that all that pass by may break it in pieces? The wild swine have rooted it up, and the cattle of the field have gnawed it down. Turn, O God of hosts, and look from heaven, and behold, seek out this vine, and replant it, which thy right hand hath planted, and over the son^c whom thou hast strengthened. That which is burned with fire, and cut off, let it perish from the rebuke of thy countenance. Let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand, and upon the children of men, whom thou hast strengthened unto thee. So we will not depart from thee; let us live, we cry. ¹⁸

The 81st Psalm.

1 Sing joyfully to God, who is our strength;
2 rejoice to the God of Jacob. Take the psalms, 3 and give the kettledrums, sweet harps with psalteries. Blow the trumpets in the new moon, 4 in our feast of tabernacles. For this is the custom of Israel, and the right of the God of Jacob. This 5 is the testimony he gave to Joseph when he went out into Egypt: I heard lips that I did not 6 understand. He turned his shoulder from the burden, he let his hand go from the kettle. When thou didst call upon me in distress, I helped thee
7 out, and heard thee when the weather overtook
8 thee, and tried thee at the water of the Hader, Sela. Hear, my people, I will testify to you; Israel, you shall hear me. That there be no strange god among thee, and that thou worship no unknown 9 god. I am the LORD thy God, which brought thee 10 out of the land of Egypt: open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it. But my people will not hearken 11 unto my voice, neither will Israel hearken unto mine. So I have left them in the stupor of their 12 hearts, to walk after their counsel. If my people would obey me, 1) and Israel walk in my ways, I 13 would soon subdue their enemies, and turn my hand upon their adversaries; and they that hate the LORD should lack him, and their days should 14 endure for ever, and feed them with the best of 15 wheat, and satisfy them with honey out of the rock.

The 82nd Psalm.

A Psalm Assaph.

17 God stands in the community of God, and is judge among the gods. How long will you judge unjustly and take the person of the wicked? Sela.
1 Judge the poor and the fatherless, and help the wretched and the needy to justice. Save the lowly of the wicked hand. But they know it not, and 5 perceive it not; they walk in darkness, that the foundations of the land shall fall down. I say that 6 you are gods, and children of the Most High. But you will also die like men, and fall like one among 7 princes. God, rise up and judge the land, for you inherit among all the nations. 8

The 83rd Psalm.

A Psalm Song Assaph.

God, do not be silent, and do not be still; God, do not pause. For behold, thine enemies rage, 1 and they that hate thee lift up the head. They plot 2 cunningly against thy people, and counsel 3 against thy hidden ones. 2) They say: Come, and let us destroy them, that they be not a nation, that 4 the name of Israel be no more remembered. For they have taken counsel in their hearts, and have 5 made a covenant with one another against thee.
The tents of the Edomites, and the Ishmaelites, and the Moabites, and the Hagarites, and the 6 Gebalites, and the Ammonites, and the Amalekites, and the Philistines, with them that 7 are at Tyro. Assyria also joined them, and became an arm of the children of Lot, Selah. Do 8 unto them as unto the Midianites, as unto Sisserah, as unto Jabin by the brook Kison, 9 which were destroyed at Endor, and became filth in the land. Make their princes like Oreb and 10 Zeeb, like Zebah and Zalmunah all their rulers, who say, We will take the houses of GOD. GOD, 11 make them like a whirlpool, like a stubble before the wind. Like a fire that kindles the forest, and 12 like a flame that kindles the mountains: so pursue 13 them with thy weather, and terrify them with thy tempest. Make their faces full of shame, that they 14 may ask thy name. They shall be ashamed, and 15 shall be more and more afraid, and shall be ashamed, and shall perish. Then they will know 16 that it is you, and your name is the LORD, that you alone are the most high in all the earth. 17

The 84th Psalm.

1 A psalm of the children of Korah, to sing high above the winepress.

2 How lovely are your dwellings, O LORD of 3 hosts. My soul desireth, and is all turned unto the 4 courts of the LORD: my heart and my body
5 rejoice in the living God. For the bird has found 6 a hen, and the swallow her nest, where she lays 7 her young, even thy altars, O LORD of hosts, my 8 King and my God. Blessed are those who dwell
9 in your house, who praise you forever, Sela.
10 Blessed are they whose strength is in thee,
11 Whose paths are in their heart. Who pass
12 through the valley of tears, And make it a 13 fountain, And pools are filled with rain. They go 14 from strength to strength, and appear before 15 GOD in Zion. O LORD GOD of hosts, hear my 16 prayer; hear it, O GOD Jacob, selah. Sheol, 17 GOD, our shield; behold the face of our 18 anointed. For one day in thy courts is better than 19 a thousand: I will rather keep the door of my 20 God's house, than dwell long in the wicked
21 tabernacles. For the LORD God is a sun and a 22 shield; the LORD giveth grace and glory. No
23 good thing will be lacking to those who live 24 without change. O LORD of hosts, blessed is the 25 man that trusteth in thee.

The 85th Psalm.

13 A psalm of the children Korah, high zn sing.

1 O LORD, thou art well pleased with thy land,
2 and bringest again the captives of Jacob. Thou 3 takest away the iniquity of thy people, and 4 coverest all their sin, Selah. Thou hast taken 5 away all thy wrath, and hast turned from the fury 6 of thine anger. Restore us, O God of our 7 salvation, and turn from thy wrath upon us. Wilt 8 thou be angry with us for ever, and withhold thy 9 wrath for ever? Thou must refresh us, and give 10 us life, and thy people shall rejoice in thee. Lord, 11 show us your goodness and give us your 12 salvation. I will listen to what God the Lord says, 13 for he will Speak peace unto his people, and unto his saints, that they turn not unto folly. So his salvation will be near to those who fear him, that honor may dwell in our land. Goodness and faithfulness meet together, righteousness and peace kiss each other. Faithfulness grows out of the land, and righteousness looks down from heaven. The LORD also shall give good, and our land shall give his increase. Righteousness shall walk before him, and set his tread in the way. 14

The 86th Psalm.

Eili Prayer Davids.

Lord, incline your ears and hear me, for I am wretched and poor. Preserve my soul, for I am holy; help, O my God, your servant who relies on you. O LORD, have mercy on me, for I cry out to you daily. Comfort the soul of thy servant, for, O LORD, unto thee do I lift up my soul. For thou, O LORD, art good and gracious, of great kindness, to all who call upon thee. Hear, O Lord, my prayer, and heed the voice of my supplication. In time of trouble I call upon thee, for thou hearest me. Lord, there is none like thee among the gods, neither is there any that can do like thee.
All the nations you have made will come and worship before you, O LORD, and honor your name, because you are great and do wonders and are God alone. Tell me, O Lord, thy way, that I may walk in thy truth, and that my heart may rejoice in the fear of thy name. I thank thee, O LORD my God, with all my heart, and praise thy name for ever. For your goodness is great over me, and you have saved my soul from the lowest hell. God, the proud are set against me, and the company of the mighty are after my soul, and set not thee before their eyes. But you, O Lord God, are merciful and gracious, longsuffering and of great kindness and faithfulness. Turn to me, be gracious to me; give your strength to your servant, and help the son of your maidservant.
Give me a sign for my good, so that those who hate me and are ashamed may see that you have helped me, O Lord, and comforted me. 15

The 87th Psalm.

1 A psalm song of the children of Korah.
 Their foundations are on the holy mountains.
 2 The LORD loves the gates of Zion above all the 3 dwellings of Jacob. Glorious things are spoken in thee, O city of God, Selah. I will remember 4 Nahab and Babylon, that they may know me:
 behold, the Philistines and the Tyrians with the Moors are born there. It shall be added of Zion, 5 that this man and that man shall be born therein, and he, the Most High, shall have prepared 6 them. The Lord will proclaim in the tongues of the nations that some are born there, Sela. And the singers, as in the round dance, shall all sing in 7 thee one by one.

The 88th Psalm.

A psalm song of the children of Korah, to sing 1 high in chorus around each other. An instruction of Heman, the Esrahite.

O Lord, God of my salvation, I cry out to you
 2 day and night. Let my prayer come before you;
 3 incline your ears to my lament. For my soul is full of sorrow, and my life is near hell. I am like those 4 who go to hell; I am like a man without help. I lie 5 free among the dead,^d like the slain who lie in the grave, whom thou rememberest no more, and 6 they are separated from thy hand. Thou hast laid me in the lowest pit, in darkness and in the deep.
 Thy wrath endureth upon me, and thou thrustest me with all thy floods, Sela. Thou hast put my 7 friends far from me, thou hast made me an 8 abomination unto them; I lie captive, and cannot escape. My eye is saddened with misery, O 9 LORD; I call upon thee daily; I stretch forth my hands unto thee. Will you perform miracles among the dead, or will the dead rise and thank 10 you? Sela. Will they tell of your goodness in the tombs, and of your faith in the midst of 11 destruction? May your miracles be known in the darkness, or your righteousness in the land of 12 the dead?

 remember nothing? But I cry unto thee, O LORD, and my prayer is early before thee. Why hast thou, O LORD, cast off my soul, and hardened thy face before me? I am wretched and faint that I am so rejected; I am terrified. Thy wrath is upon me; thy terror oppresseth me. They surround me¹ daily, like water, and surround me with one from me, and turned away my kinsmen. 3

The 89th Psalm.

A teaching of Ethan the Esrahite. 4

I will sing of the goodness of the LORD for 5 ever, and declare his faith with my mouth for ever, saying, Goodness is established for ever; 6 and thou shalt prepare thy faith in heaven. I have made a covenant with my chosen one; I have sworn to David my servant: I will prepare thy 7 seed for ever, and build thy throne for ever, selah. And the heavens, O Lord, shall praise thy 8 wonders, and thy faith in the congregation of the saints. For who shall be like unto the LORD in the clouds, and be like unto the LORD among 9 the children of the gods? God is almost terrifying in the council of the saints, and marvelous above 10 all who are around him. O LORD God of hosts, who is like you, a mighty God? and your faith is 11 around you. You rule over the hopes of the sea; you still its waves when they rise. You smite the hopeful as one slain; you scatter your enemies 12 with your strong arm. The heavens and the earth are thine; thou hast founded the ground and all 13 that is within it. Midnight and noonday thou hast created; Thabor and Hermon shall shout in thy 14 name. Thou hast a mighty arm, strong is thy hand, and high is thy right hand. Righteousness 15 and judgment are the habitation of thy throne; goodness and faithfulness are before thy face. 16 Blessed are the people who rejoice! O LORD, they shall walk in the light of thy countenance. 17
 They shall rejoice in thy name, and through thy 18

20 21 Righteousness shall be exalted. For to thee is the 22 glory of their strength, and by thy favor thou shalt 23 exalt our horn. For the LORD is our shield, and 24 the Holy One of Israel our king. At that time thou 25 spakest in vision unto thy Holy One, saying: I 26 have raised up a mighty man, I have exalted a 27 chosen one from among your people. I have 28 found my servant David; I have anointed him with 29 my holy oil. My hand shall prosper him, and my 30 arm shall strengthen him. The enemies shall not 31 set him up, neither shall the unrighteous dampen 32 him. And I will smite his adversaries before him, 33 and them that hate him will I afflict. But my 34 faithfulness and my lovingkindness shall be with 35 him, and his horn shall be exalted in my name. I 36 will put his hand into the sea, and his right hand
37 into the waters. He shall cry out to me: Thou art 38 my Father, my God, and the refuge of my 39 salvation. And I will make him the first son, 40 supreme among the kings of the earth. I will keep 41 my kindness to him forever, and my covenant 42 shall be steadfast to him. I will make his seed for 43 ever, and his throne as the days of heaven. If his children forsake my law, and walk not in my statutes; if they profane my statutes, and keep not my commandments; I will punish their transgression with the rod, and with plagues their iniquity. But I will not turn away my goodness from him, neither will I fail in my faith. I will not profane my covenant, nor change that which is gone out from my lips. I have sworn once by my holiness, I will not lie to David. His seed shall be for ever, and his throne before me, as the sun.
Like the moon shall he be prepared for ever, And a certain witness in the heavens. But thou despisest and despisest, and art wroth with thine anointed; thou destroyest the covenant of thy servant, and desecratest on earth his crown.
Thou hast broken down all his walls, and caused his strongholds to be broken down. All who pass by rob him; he has become a mockery to his neighbors. Thou dost exalt the rights of his enemies, and

45
46 You have made all his enemies happy. Thou 47 hast also taken away the power of his sword, and 48 makest him not constant in strife. Thou 49 destroyest his purity,^e) and castest his throne to 50 the ground. Thou shortenest the time of his 51 youth, and coverest him with scorn. O Lord, how 52 long wilt thou hide thyself, and let thy wrath burn 53 like fire? Remember how short is my life; why wilt 54 thou have created all men in vain? Where is 55 there any that liveth, and seeth not death? that 56 delivereth his soul out of the hand of hell? Sela.
57 O LORD, where is thy former kindness, which 58 thou swarest unto David in thy faith? Remember, 59 O LORD, the reproach of thy servants, which I 60 have borne in my bosom of so many nations, that 61 thine enemies, O LORD, should reproach thee,
62 that they should reproach the footsteps of thine 63 anointed. 1) Praise be to the LORD forever, 64 Amen, Amen.

The 90th Psalm.

A prayer of Moses, the man of God.

O Lord, you have become our refuge forever and ever. Before the mountains were born, and the land and the ground were prepared, you are God from everlasting to everlasting. Thou that turnest men to destruction,^f and sayest, Come again, ye children of men. For a thousand years are before thee, as the day that passed yesterday, and as a night watch. Thou takest them away, and they are as a sleep; and they are turned early, as hay, which flourisheth early, and is turned, but in the evening is cut down, and withereth. For we perish in thine anger, and are afraid of thy wrath. Thou settest our iniquities before thee, our secret sins in the light of thy countenance. For all our days are passed away in thine anger; we have spent our years as a tale.
The time of our years is seventy years, when it is high,

e) Purity, that is, all its ornament and adornment.

1) Lct. 1540: and tread with feet your anointed one. (Walch.)

f) Destruction; that is, the human race you create so that some always die and others are born again; and all this by your word, Genesis 1.

Eighty years, and after that it is toil and trouble: for it passeth quickly, and we fly away. Who 11 knows the power of your anger? For as much as 12 they fear thee, so much thou art angry. Let us 13 know the number of our days, that we may enter with a wise heart. O Lord, return again from time 14 to time, and comfort thy servants. Fill us early with thy lovingkindness, and we shall glory and 15 be glad all our days. Make us glad after the time in which thou hast humbled us, after the years in 16 which we have seen misfortune. Show thy 17 servants thy work, and thy adornment upon their children. And let the LORD our God be gracious upon us, and promote the work of our hands
 upon us, and promote the work of our hands.

The 91st Psalm.

He that sitteth under the shelter of the Most High, and abideth under the shadow of the 1 Almighty, saith unto the Lord, My trust and my 2 fortress, my God, in whom I hope. For he shall deliver me from the snare of the fowler, and from the pestilence of craftiness. He shall cover thee 3 with his wings, and thy confidence shall be under his wings; his faithfulness shall be thy shield and 4 buckler, that thou fear not the terror of the night, the arrow that flieth by day, the pestilence that walketh in darkness, the pestilence that wasteth 5 at noonday. Though a thousand fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand, it shall not 6 come nigh thee. But thou shalt see thy pleasure with thine eyes, and shalt see the vengeance of 7 the wicked. For, O LORD, thou art my refuge; thou hast set thy refuge in the highest. No evil 8 shall befall thee, and no plague shall approach thy tabernacle. For he hath commanded his 9 angels concerning thee, to keep thee in all thy ways, to bear thee up in their hands, that thou 10 dash not thy foot against any stone. Thou shalt walk upon the lion and the adder, and tread upon 11 the young lion and the dragon. For he has desired me, I will help him out, I will protect him, 12 for he knows my name. He calls me, so I will

I will hear him, I will be with him in trouble, I will snatch him out and make him honorable. I will satisfy him with long life and show him my 16 salvation.

The 92nd Psalm.

A psalm song on the Sabbath day. 1

It is good to give thanks to the Lord, and to 2 sing praises to your name, O Most High. To 3 proclaim your goodness early, and your faith at night. On the ten strings and psaltery, with poem 4 on the harp. For, O Lord, thou makest me glad in thy works, and I glory in the work of thy hands. O 5 Lord, how are thy works so great, thy thoughts so very deep. A foolish man knoweth not these 6 things, and a fool understandeth not these things.
 The wicked flourish like grass, and all evildoers 7 flourish, that they may be destroyed for ever and 8 ever. But you, O Lord, are high 1) forever. For behold, thine enemies, O LORD, behold, thine enemies shall perish, and all evildoers shall be 9 scattered. But my horn shall be exalted like a 10 unicorn's, and I shall be watered with fresh oil.
 And mine eye shall see his delight in mine enemies, and mine ear shall hear his delight in 11 the wicked that set themselves against me. The righteous shall flourish like a palm tree; he shall 12 increase like a cedar in Lebanon. They that are planted in the house of the LORD shall flourish in 13 the courts of our God. And shall flourish even in old age, and be fat and fresh, to declare that the LORD is upright, my refuge, and there is no 14 unrighteousness in him.

The 93rd Psalm.

The Lord has become king, and has put on 15 power; the Lord has put on himself, and has 16 girded himself with strength; he has prepared the ground to abide. From that time thy throne is prepared, thou art from everlasting. O Lord, the rivers of water rise up, the rivers of water raise 1 their roar, the rivers of water lift up the waves.

1) In the original: high.

4 The floods are mighty from the roaring of great waters; the LORD is mighty in the highest. Your 5 testimonies are very sure, holiness adorns your house.

The 94th Psalm.

1 O Lord God, who is vengeance, God, who is 2 vengeance, appear. Arise, thou judge of the earth, repay the righteous according to their 3 deeds. O Lord, how long shall the wicked, how long shall the ungodly rejoice, and stiff-necked 4 say out, and speak all iniquity? O LORD, they 5 have broken down thy people, and humbled thine inheritance. Widows and strangers they 6 slay, and slay the fatherless, saying, The LORD
7 seeth it not, and the God of Jacob knoweth it not.
Mark, ye fools of the people, and ye fools: when 8 will ye be wise? He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? He that made the eye, shall he not 9 see? He that chasteneth the Gentiles, shall he not chasten them? he that teacheth men what 10 they know. But the Lord knows the thoughts of men, that they are vain. Blessed is he whom 11 thou, O LORD, chastenest, and teachest by thy law; that thou givest him patience in the evil time, 12 until the pit be prepared for the wicked. For the 13 LORD will not cast off his people, nor forsake his inheritance. For judgment will come again, and it 14 will be followed by all the upright in heart. Who will stand with me against the wicked? Who will 15 stand with me against the wicked? If the Lord had not been my helper, my soul would have 16 remained in silence^g). When I said, "My foot has stumbled," your goodness strengthened me, O 17 Lord. When I had much trouble inwardly, thy comforts refreshed my soul. Shall the mischief-18 maker also have fellowship with thee, who maketh trouble^h in the law? They arm themselves against the souls of the righteous, 19 and condemn innocent blood. But the Lord is my protection, my God is the refuge of my 20 confidence. And

g) Silence, that is, in hell, since it is silent, and everything is off.

h) Trouble, that is, their teaching makes evil conscience and sour life.

He will repay them for their wrongdoing and will disturb them in their wickedness, the LORD our God will disturb them.

The 95th Psalm.

Come, let us praise the Lord and shout for the refuge of our salvation. Let us come before his face with thanksgiving, and shout to him with 1 psalms. For the LORD is a great God, and a great King above all gods. For in his hand are the 2 things that are in the lower parts of the earth, and 3 the high places of the mountains are his. For his is the sea, and he hath made it; and his hands 4 have prepared the dry land. Come, let us worship and kneel and fall down before the 5 LORD who made us. For he is our God, and we are the people of his pasture, and sheep of his 6 hands. This day, when ye hear his voice, harden not your heart, as it was in Meribah, as it was in 7 the days of Massa, in the wilderness, when your 8 fathers tried me, and tried me, and saw my work, when I was forty years in the generation, and 9 said, There is a people whose heart is not right, and they know not my ways; that I swear in my 10 wrath that they should not come into my rest.

The 96th Psalm.

Sing to the Lord a new song, sing to the Lord all the earth. Sing unto the LORD, and praise his 1 name; preach one day upon another his salvation. Tell his glory among the nations, his wonders among all peoples. For the LORD is great and glorious, marvelous above all gods.
1 For all the gods of the nations are idols, but the LORD made the heavens. Honor and adornment 2 are before him; strength and glory are in his sanctuary. You nations among the peoples, 3 bring here, bring here honor and strength to the LORD. Bring to the LORD the glory of his name, 4 take gifts, and come into his courts. Worship the 5 Lord in holy adornment; let all the earth be astonished before him. Say among the nations, 6 that the LORD is King, who hath prepared the 7 earth to abide, and hath judged the nations.

sincere. Let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad; let the sea roar, and all that is therein. Let the field rejoice, and all that is therein. Then all the trees of the forest shout for joy before the LORD, because he is coming to judge the earth. He will judge the earth with righteousness, and the nations with his faith.

The 97th Psalm.

The Lord has become King, the earth rejoices, and many nations are glad. Clouds and darkness are round about him; righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne. Fire goes before him, and sets on fire his enemies round about. His lightnings shine on the ground; the earth is amazed and terrified. Mountains melt like wax before the Lord, before the ruler of the whole earth. The heavens declare his righteousness, and all nations behold his glory. All who serve images must be ashamed, and boast of idols; worship him all gods. Zion has heard, and is glad; and the daughters of Judah are glad, O LORD, because of thy judgments: for thou, O LORD, art the most high in all the earth; thou art greatly exalted above all gods. You who love the LORD, hate evil; the LORD preserves the souls of his saints; from the hand of the wicked he will deliver them. Light has come to the righteous, and joy to the upright in heart. Ye righteous, rejoice in the Lord, and give thanks in remembrance of his holiness.

The 98th Psalm.

A Psalm.

Sing to the Lord a new song, that he has done wonders. He has done his salvation with his right hand and with his holy arm. The LORD hath made known his salvation, he hath declared his righteousness before the nations. He has remembered his goodness and faith to the house of Israel; the end of the world has seen the salvation of our God. All the earth shout for joy to the Lord, sing, praise and extol. Praise the LORD with harps, with harps and bright psalms. With drom-

With the sound of the trumpet and the sound of the trumpet, shout for joy before the Lord, the King. Let the sea roar, and all that is in it, the earth, and those who dwell in it. Let the rivers clap their hands, and let the mountains rejoice one with another, before the LORD, because he is coming to judge the earth. He will judge the earth aright, and the nations uprightly.

The 99th Psalm.

The LORD is king, and the nations rage: he sitteth upon cherubims, and the land is moved. The LORD is great in Zion, and high above all nations. Thanks be to thy great and marvelous name, which is holy. The strengthⁱ of the king loveth judgment: thou hast prepared that which is upright, thou hast established judgment and righteousness in Jacob. Exalt the LORD our God, worship at his footstool, for he is holy. Moses and Aaron among his priests, and Samuel among those who call upon his name; they called upon the LORD, and he answered them. He talked with them by a pillar of cloud; they kept his testimonies and customs which he gave them. O Lord, you are our God, you heard them; you, God, forgave them and punished their deeds. Exalt the Lord our God, and worship at His holy mountain, for the Lord is holy.

The 100th Psalm.

A psalm of thanksgiving.

Rejoice to your Lord all the earth. Serve the LORD with gladness, come before his face rejoicing. Know that the LORD is GOD, he hath made us, and not we ourselves, his people, and sheep of his pasture. Enter his gates with thanksgiving, his courts with praise; give thanks and praise his name. For the LORD is good, and his lovingkindness endureth for ever, and his faith for ever.

The 101st Psalm.

A Psalm of David.

Of goodness and judgment will I sing, and praise thee, O Lord. I do wisely

i) Strength, that is, his kingdom and power.

in the way that is without change; when wilt thou 3 come to me? I walk in my house with a simple heart. I take no evil thing for myself; I hate the doings of the transgressor, and abide not with 4 me. A wicked heart must depart from me; I will not suffer the wicked. He who slandereth his 5 neighbor in secret, him will I destroy; I like not him of proud face and trusting heart. My eyes look for 6 the faithful in the land, that they may dwell with me; and he that leadeth a blameless life will I let 7 serve me. He who is deceitful must not stay in my house; he who lies will not stand before me.
 8 Early I destroyed all the wicked of the land, and cut off all the transgressors from the city of the LORD.

The 102nd Psalm.

A prayer of the wretched, when he is distressed, and pour out his speech before thy Lord, O Lord, hear my prayer, and let my cry come unto thee.
 1 Hide not thy face from me; in the time of trouble incline thine ear unto me: when I call upon thee, 2 hear me quickly. For my days are passed away like smoke, And my bones are burned up like a 3 fire. My heart is as downcast as grass, and withered, because I have forgotten to eat my 4 bread. My bones cling to my flesh at the voice of my groaning. I am like a bittern in the desert, I am 5 like a chancellor in the fortified cities. I watch, and am like a lonely bird on the roof. Daily my 6 enemies revile me, and they that mock me swear by me. For I eat ashes like bread, And mix my 7 drink with weeping, Before thine anger and disgrace, Because thou hast taken me, and cast 8 me down. My days are gone as a shadow, and I 9 am dried up as grass. But thou, O Lord, shalt endure for ever, and thy remembrance for ever.
 10 Thou wouldest make thyself known, and have mercy upon Zion: for the time is come that thou 11 shouldest have mercy upon her, and the hour is 12 come. For her stones are pleasing to thy servants, and are theirs.

Dust favorably. And the heathen shall fear thy 16 name, and all the kings of the earth thy glory; because the LORD buildeth Zion, and shineth in 17 his glory. He turns to the prayer of the forsaken, 18 and spurns not their prayer. Let this be written on the descendants, and let the people who are to 19 be created praise the LORD. For he looketh from his holy height, and the LORD seeth from 20 heaven upon the earth, to hear the groaning of the captive, and to loose the children of death, 21 that they may preach his name in Zion, and his praise in Jerusalem, when the nations shall 22 come together, and the kingdoms to serve the LORD. He humbles my strength in your way, he 23 shortens my days. I say: My God, do not take me away in the half of my days. Thy years endure 24 for ever and ever. Thou hast founded the earth 25 before, and the heavens are the work of thy hands. They will pass away, but you remain; they will all pass away like a garment, and if you 26 change them like a garment, they will be 27 changed. But thou art the same, and thy years have no end. The children of thy servants shall remain, and their seed shall stand before thee. 28

The 103rd Psalm.

29

A Psalm of David.

Praise the Lord, my soul, and all my thoughts to his holy name. Praise the LORD, my soul, and forget not the good he hath done me again. Who 1 is gracious to all thy iniquity, and healeth all thy sickness. Who redeemeth thy life from the pit,
 Who crowneth thee with goodness and mercy. 2
 Who satisfieth thy mouth with goodness, that thy youth may be renewed like an eagle. The LORD 3 establishes justice and judgment for all who 4 suffer injustice. He hath made known his ways unto Moses, and his doings unto the children of 5 Israel. The LORD is merciful and gracious, longsuffering and of great kindness. He will not 6 always be angry, nor hold a grudge forever. He hath not dealt with us according to our sins, 7 neither hath he recompensed us according to 8 our iniquities. For as high as the heavens are above the earth, 9

11

j) early, that is, soon and quickly.

He will show his kindness to those who fear him.
 12 As far as the morning is from the evening, so far will he let our transgression be from us. As a 13 father has mercy on his children, so the Lord has mercy on those who fear him. For he knoweth 14 what manner of things we are; he remembereth that we are dust. A man in his time is like hay; he 15 blossoms like a flower in the field. When the wind blows over it, it is no longer there, and it no longer 16 knows its place. But the goodness of the LORD endureth for ever in them that fear him, and his 17 righteousness in the children of children, in them that keep his covenant, and remember his 18 commandments to do them. The LORD has prepared his throne in heaven, and his kingdom shall reign over all. Praise the LORD, ye his 19 angels, mighty in power, which execute his word, that the voice of his word may be heard. Praise 20 the Lord, all his hosts, his servants, who do his good pleasure. Praise the LORD, all his works, 21 in all places of his dominion, praise the LORD, my soul.

22

The 104th Psalm.

Praise the Lord, my soul, Lord my God, you have become very glorious; praise and adornment you have put on. Thou coverest thyself with light, as with a garment; thou 1 spreadest out the heavens, as a carpet. Thou archest its top with water; thou makest the clouds 2 thy chariot, and walkest upon the footsteps of the wind. Thou makest thy angels winds, and thy 3 servants flames of fire. Thou dost establish the earth upon its foundation, that it may abide for 4 ever and ever. Thou coverest it with the deep, as with a garment, that waters stand upon the 5 mountains. But from thy rebuke they flee, from the voice of thy thunder they go; the mountains 6 go up, and the broad places come down to the place which thou hast founded for them. Thou 7 hast set a boundary; they shall not pass over it, neither shall they cover the earth again. Thou 8 makest wells to spring up in the bottoms, that the waters may go down among the mountains, that 9 all the beasts of the field may go up.

The donkeys of the forest quench their thirst. In them the birds of the air dwell, and sing under the 12 branches. Thou wettest the mountains from above; The land is full of the fruits of thy works. 13 Thou causest hay to grow for cattle, and seed by the labor of men, that thou mayest bring forth 14 bread out of the earth, and that wine may gladden the heart of man, and his form glisten with oil, and 15 that bread may strengthen the heart of man; that the trees of the LORD^k may abound, the cedars Lebanon which he hath planted. There the birds 16 nest, and the deer has its dwelling on the firs. The high mountains are the refuge of the chamois, but 17 the stone crags of the rabbits. You wax the moon, that one counts the festivals after it, the sun 18 knows its setting. Thou makest darkness, that night may come, there all wild beasts stir; the 19 young lions there roar after the prey, and seek their food from. God. But when the sun goes out, 20 they rise up and lie down in their dwellings. So man goes out to his work and to his farm until 21 evening. O Lord, how many are thy works: thou hast made them all wise, and the earth is full of 22 thy substance. The sea, which is so great and wide, teems with beasts, both great and small, 23 that cannot be numbered. There go the ships, there is the Leviathan, which thou hast made to 24 play in it. They all wait for you to give them food in his time. Thou givest them, and they gather; 25 thou openest thine hand, and they are filled with good. When thou hidest thy face, they are afraid; 26 when thou takest away their breath, they perish, and return to their dust. Thou sendest forth thy 27 breath, and they are created; and thou renounceest the glory of the earth. The glory of 28 the LORD be eternal; the LORD rejoiceth in his works. He looks upon the earth, and it trembles; 29 he touches the mountains, and they smoke. I will sing to the Lord during my life, and praise my God as long as I live. My speech must be pleasing to 30 him, I am glad.

of the Lord. Let there be an end of sinners on 4

The 105th Psalm.

5 Give thanks to the Lord, and call upon his name; make known his doings among the 6 nations. Sing of him, and praise him; speak of all his wonders. Praise his holy name; let the hearts 7 of those who seek the Lord rejoice. Inquire of the Lord, and of his strength; seek his face always.
8 Remember his wondrous works which he hath done, the wonders and judgments of his mouth.
9 You, the seed of Abraham his servant, you 10 children of Jacob his chosen. He is the LORD our God; his judgments are in all the earth. He 11 remembereth his covenant for ever, the word which he commanded a thousand generations, 12 which he made with Abraham, and the oath with Isaac, and established the same for Jacob for a 13 right, and for Israel of an everlasting covenant, saying, Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, 14 the cord of your inheritance: for they were few in number, and strangers therein. And they went 15 from nation to nation, from kingdom to kingdom.
He let no man offend them, and punished kings 16 for their sakes. Do not touch my anointed ones, and do not deal ill with my prophets. And he 17 caused a flood to come into the land, and withdrew all the supply of bread. He sent a man 18 before them, and Joseph was sold as a servant.
19 They bound his feet in the rod, and the iron passed through his soul, until the time that his 20 word came, and the word of the LORD ran through him. Then the king sent and released 21 him, and the lord of the nations let him out. He made him lord of his house, ruler over all his 22 possessions, to discipline his princes according to his will, and to make his elders wise. And Israel 23 went into Egypt, and Jacob became a stranger in 24 the land of the grove. And he made his people very fruitful, and made them mightier than their 25 enemies. He changed their hearts so that they were angry with his people.

and dealt treacherously with his servants. He sent his servant Moses, Aaron, whom he had 26 chosen. They did his signs among them, and his 27 wonders in the land of Ham. He sent darkness, and made it dark, and they disobeyed his words. 28
He turned their waters into blood, and killed their fish. Their land swarmed with frogs, in the 29 chambers of their kings. He spoke, there came evil worms, lice in all their borders. He gave them 30 hail for rain, flames of fire in their land. And smote 31 their vines, and their fig trees, and brake the trees in their borders. And he said, There came 32 locusts, and beetles, and the same without 33 number. And they devoured all the grass of their land, and devoured the fruit of their field. And 34 smote all the firstborn in their land, all the firstlings of their substance. And he brought them 35 out with silver and gold, and there was not a feeble man among their tribes. Egypt was glad 36 when they went out, for their fear had fallen upon them. He spread a cloud to cover them, and fire 37 to shine by night. They asked, and quails came, and he filled them with bread from heaven. He 38 opened the rock, and the waters flowed out, and the brook ran in the dry wilderness. For he 39 remembered his holy word spoken to Abraham his servant. So he brought forth his people with 40 joy, and with gladness his chosen ones. And 41 gave them the lands of the heathen, to take the work of the nations, that they should keep 1) his 42 customs, and keep his law, alleluia. 43

The 106th Psalm.

Hallelujah. 44

45 Give thanks to the Lord, for he is kind, and his goodness endures forever. Who shall proclaim the power of the LORD, and make all his praises loud? Blessed are they that keep judgment, and do justice at all times. Remember me, O LORD, according to the good will thou hast toward thy 1 people; visit us with thy salvation, that we may 2 behold the goodness of thy chosen ones; and let us be filled with the goodness of the LORD.

6 Rejoice in the joy of your people, and boast in your inheritance. We have sinned with our fathers, we have abused, we have been ungodly.
 7 Our fathers in Egypt did not hear your miracles, they did not remember your great goodness, and were disobedient at the sea, that is, at the Red Sea. But he helped them for his name's sake, to 8 make known his power. And he rebuked the sea of reeds, and it was dry; and he led them through 9 the depths, as in the wilderness, and delivered them out of the hand of him that hated them, and 10 delivered them out of the hand of the enemy, and covered their adversaries with water, that not 11 one remained. Then they believed his words and sang his praises. But they soon forgot his works, 12 they did not wait for his counsel. And they 13 became lustful in the wilderness, and tempted God in the desert. But he gave them their 14 request, and sent enough according to their will.
 And they provoked Moses in the camp, Aaron 15 the Holy One of the LORD. The earth arose and 16 swallowed up Dothan and covered Abiram. And fire was kindled among their company; the flame 17 burned up the wicked. They made a calf in Horeb, and worshipped the cast image. And 18 changed their glory into the likeness of an ox eating grass. They forgot God their Savior, who 19 had done great things in Egypt, wonders in the land of the grove, and terrible works at the Red 20 Sea. And he said that he would destroy them, 21 except Moses his chosen had stood before him against the breach, to turn away his wrath, that 22 he should not destroy. And they despised the noble land; they believed not his word. And 23 murmuring in their tents, they hearkened not unto the voice of the LORD. And he lifted up his hand against them, to smite them in the 24 wilderness, and to cast their seed among the 25 heathen, and to scatter them abroad. And they hanged themselves upon Baal Peor, and did eat 26 of the sacrifices of the dead, and provoked him to anger with their doings: and the plague was 27 upon them. Then Phinehas came and settled the matter, and the plague was lifted. And it was 28 reckoned to him for the plague.

righteousness for ever and ever. And they 32 provoked him to anger at the water of Hader, and Moses was displeased for their sakes. For they 33 were disobedient to his spirit, because he said by his lips that they should not destroy the 34 nations, of which the LORD had told them. And they mingled with the heathen, and learned their 35 works, and served their idols, which were an 36 offence unto them. And they sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto the devils of the field, 37 and shed innocent blood, the blood of their sons 38 and their daughters, which they sacrificed unto the idols of Canaan, that the land was stained with blood. And they defiled themselves with their works, and fornicated with their doings. 39 Then the wrath of the LORD was kindled, and he made an abomination of his inheritance, and 40 delivered them into the hand of the heathen, that they might have dominion over them which had 41 hated them. And their enemies afflicted them, and were humbled under their hands. He saved 42 them many times, but they were disobedient in 43 their ways, and became lowly in their iniquities.
 And he saw their affliction, when he heard their 44 lamentation, and remembered his covenant for 45 them, and repented him of his great goodness, and made them come to mercy before all them 46 that were taken captive. Help us, O LORD our God, and bring us together from among the 47 nations, that we may give thanks to thy holy name, and praise thy praise. Praise be to the Lord, the God of Israel, from everlasting to 48 everlasting, and let all the people say Amen.
 Hallelujah.

The 107th Psalm. 1)

Give thanks to the Lord, for he is kind, and his goodness endures forever. Say, Ye that are 1 redeemed by the LORD, whom he hath 2 redeemed from the hand of the enemy, and whom he hath gathered out of the countries, 3 from the going forth, and from the going down, and from the south, and from the sea. They go 4 astray in the wilderness, in the way they have not trodden, and find no city to dwell in; they are 5 hungry and thirsty, and their soul is weary. And 6 they cry unto the LORD in their distress, and he delivereth them out of the wilderness.

1) This Psalm is a common thanksgiving, how God helps all kinds of people out of all kinds of distress, as Paul says 1 Tim.
 2.: "He is a Savior of all people."

7 their anxieties, and lead them in the right way, that they may go to the city where they dwell.
 8 They give thanks to the Lord for his goodness and for the miracles he has wrought for the 9 children of men. For he satisfieth the thirsty soul, and filleth the hungry soul with good things.
 10 Those who sit in darkness and gloom, 11 imprisoned in misery and iron, because they disobey the word of God and blaspheme the 12 counsel of the Most High. And he humbles their heart with calamity, so that they become weak 13 and have no help. And they cry unto the Lord in their distress, and he helpeth them out of their 14 afflictions, and bringeth them out of their darkness and gloom, and breaketh their bonds.
 15 They give thanks to the Lord for his goodness and for his miracles for the children of men. For 16 he breaketh the doors of brass, and breaketh the bars of iron. Fools are humbled because of the 17 way of their transgression, and because of their iniquity. Their soul is disgusted with all food, and 18 they come hard to the gate of death. And they cry unto the LORD in their distress, and he 19 helpeth them out of their anguish. He sends his word and heals them and saves them from their 20 destruction. They give thanks to the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonders to the children of 21 men, and offer sacrifices of thanksgiving, and tell of his works with praise. They that go to sea in 22 ships, and trade in great waters, see the work of 23 the LORD, and his wonders in the deep. He is swallowed up. And they cry unto the LORD in 27 their distress, and he leadeth them out of their anguish. He calms the storm so that its waves he leads them to the fords as they wish. They

The 108th Psalm.

A Psalm Song of David. ⁴³

God, my heart is ready, I will sing and write poetry, my glory too. Farewell, psalteries and harps! I will rise with the dawn. I will give thee thanks, O Lord, among the nations; I will sing¹ praise unto thee among the people. For thy² lovingkindness is great unto the heavens, And³ thy faithfulness unto the clouds. Exalt thyself, O GOD, above the heavens, and thy glory above⁴ all the earth, that thy dear friends may be redeemed; help with thy right hand, and answer⁵ me. God speaks in His sanctuary; I am glad and will divide Shechem and measure out the valley⁶ of Shukhtoth. Gilead is mine, Manasseh also is mine, and Ephraim is the strength of my head,⁷ Judah is my teacher. Moab is my washpot; I will cast my shoe over Edom; over the Philistines I⁸ will exult. Who will lead me into the strong city?
 Who will guide me in Edom? Have you not, O⁹
 God, cast us out? And do you not go forth, O God, with our army? Help us in our distress, for the help of men is in vain. Through God we will¹⁰ prove our strength, he will trample our enemies.

The 109th Psalm.

A Psalm of David, to be sung on high.

God, my praise, do not be silent. For the wicked mouths of the wicked have opened upon me, and speak against me with a false tongue, and talk against me with hateful words in every place, and fight against me without a cause. Because I love them, they are against me, but I pray. They do me evil for good, and hate for love. Set the wicked over him, and let an adversary stand at his right hand. When he is judged, let him go out condemned, and let his prayer be sin. His days must become few, and his office must be received by another. His children must become orphans, and his wife a widow. His children must be idle, begging and seeking, because their accumulation is wicked. The usurer must suck up everything he has, and strangers must rob his work, and there must be no one to show him kindness, and no one to take pity on his orphans. His descendants must be cut off, his name must perish in one limb. His father's iniquity must be remembered before the Lord, and his mother's sin must not be blotted out. They must all be before the Lord, and their memory must be blotted out from the earth. For this cause he remembered not, to shew mercy, and persecuted the wretched and the poor, and him that was of a grieved heart, to slay him. And he curseth gladly, but it shall come to him; he would not bless, so he shall be far enough from him. And put on the curse like his garment, and it entered into his inward parts like water, and like oil into his bones. So let it be to him as a garment to put on, and a girdle to gird himself with. So be it done unto them of the LORD that are against me, and speak evil against my soul. But thou, O Lord, do thou with me for thy name's sake, for thy lovingkindness save me. For I am poor and wretched; my heart is troubled within me. I go, as a switch leads, and am brought out of-thrust like the locusts. My knees are weak from 24 fasting, and my flesh is lean, having no fat. And I was their mockery; when they saw me, they 25 shook their heads. Help me, O LORD my God, according to thy lovingkindness, that they may 26 know that this is thy hand, that thou hast done 27 this thing. If they curse, bless them; if they rebel, they will be put to shame; but let your servant 28 rejoice. My adversaries must be clothed with shame, and be clothed with their disgrace, as with a garment. O LORD, I will give thanks unto 29 thee with my mouth, and praise thee among many. For he standeth at the right hand of the poor, to save his soul from the judges. 30

A Psalm of David.

The LORD said to my Lord, "Sit at my right hand until I make your enemies your footstool. The LORD will send the rod of thy strength out of Zion, rule among thine enemies. Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power, in holy array. Out of the womb with the dawn comes the dew of thy birth. The LORD has sworn, and he will not repent; you are a priest forever, after the manner of Malkizedek. The LORD at thy right hand shall 3 smite the kings in the day of his wrath. He shall judge the nations, he shall make them full of dead bodies; he shall bruise the head of many 4 nations. He will drink from the brookⁿ) in the way; therefore he will lift up the head.

The 111th Psalm.

o) Requests, that is, whoever has a desire for it, asks for it.

And his work is glory, and his righteousness 4 endureth for ever. He has made a memorial of his wonders, the gracious and merciful Lord. He 5 has given food to those who fear him; he remembers his covenant forever. He will show 6 the power of his works to his people, that he may give them the inheritance of the Gentiles. The 7 works of his hands are truth and judgment; all his commandments endure. They are preserved 8 forever and ever, and made true and right. He hath sent a salvation unto his people, his 9 covenant commanded for ever: holy and terrible is his name. The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom; all who follow it have a 10 sound mind; his praise endures forever.

The 112th Psalm.

Hallelujah.

Blessed is he who fears the Lord, who 1 delights in his commandments. His seed shall be mighty upon the earth; the generation of the 2 upright shall be blessed. Riches and abundance shall be in his hand, and his righteousness shall endure for ever. To the upright there arises light 3 in the darkness from the gracious, merciful and righteous. A pious man is merciful, and lends 4 gladly; he divides^p his words rightly. For he will remain forever; he will never be forgotten. He is 5 not afraid of evil judgment; his heart is ready to hope in the Lord. His heart is confident and does 6 not fear until he sees his pleasure in his enemies.
 He scatters and gives to the poor; his 7 righteousness endures forever; his horn is exalted with honor. The wicked shall see it, and 8 be displeased; he shall gnash his teeth, and perish. For the desire of the wicked will be lost.

The 114th Psalm.

When Israel came out of Egypt, the house of 3
 Jacob out of the foreign nation, Judah became 4 its sanctuary, Israel its dominion. The sea saw 5 and fled, the Jordan turned back. The mountains licked like rams, the hills like young sheep. What 6 was it to you, O sea, that you fled? And you, 7 Jordan, that you turned back? Ye mountains, 8 that ye licked like rams? Ye hills, like the young sheep? Before the LORD the earth worshipped, 8 before the LORD Jacob, who turned the rock into a lake of water, and the stones into fountains of water.

The 115th Psalm.

Not to us, O Lord, not to us, but to your name 2 give glory for your goodness and faithfulness. 3
 Why should the Gentiles say: Where is their 4
 God? But our God is in heaven; he makes what 5 he desires. But those idols are silver and gold, 5 the work of men's hands. They have mouths, and 6 speak not; they have eyes, and see not. They 6 have ears, and hear not; they have noses, and 7 smell not. They have hands, and do not grasp; 7 they have feet, and do not walk, and do not 8 speak through their throat. They also that make 8 such things are so, and all they that hope in 9 them. But Israel hope in the LORD, who is their 10 help and their shield. The house of Aaron hope 10 in the LORD, who is their help and shield. Those 11 who fear the Lord also hope in the Lord, who is 12 their help and shield. The LORD thinks of us and will bless the house of Aaron.

The 116th Psalm.

5 I desire that the LORD may hear the voice of my supplications; that he may incline his ear unto 6 me, and I will call upon my life. The snares of 7 death had compassed me about, and the fears of 8 hell had taken hold of me; I found trouble and sorrow. And I called upon the name of the LORD:
 O LORD, save my soul, thou gracious LORD and just, and our merciful God. The Lord preserves 9 the simple; when I was inferior, he helped me.
 10 Return, my soul, to thy rest, for the LORD hath restored thee. For thou hast plucked my soul out 11 of death, mine eye from tears, my foot from 12 slipping. I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living. I believe, therefore I speak, but I am 13 greatly humbled. I said in my trembling, All men are liars. What shall I repay the LORD for all his 14 benefits to me? I will take the cup of salvation and 15 call upon the name of the Lord. I will pay my vows 16 before all his people. How precious is the death of his saints before the Lord. O LORD, I am thy 17 servant; I am thy servant, the son of thy 18 handmaid; thou hast loosed my bonds. To you I will offer sacrifices of thanksgiving and call on the 19 name of the Lord. I will pay my vows unto the LORD before all his people, in the courts of the LORD's house, in thee, O Jerusalem, alleluia.

The 117th Psalm.

1 Praise the Lord, all nations; praise him, all 2 peoples. For his goodness and faithfulness are with us forever, alleluia.

The 118th Psalm.

Give thanks to the Lord, because he is so 1 kind, and his goodness endures forever. Let 2 Israel now say, His lovingkindness endures forever. Let the house of Aaron now say, His 3 lovingkindness endures forever. Those who fear 4 the Lord say that his goodness endures forever.
 In fear I called upon the LORD, and the LORD 5 heard me in the wide place. The Lord is with me, I will not fear what man will do to me. The LORD 6 is with me to help me, and I will see my pleasure in my enemies. It is better to trust in the Lord than 7 to rely on man. It is better to trust in the Lord than to rely on princes. All the heathen have 8 surrounded me, but in the name of the LORD I 9 will cut them down. They have surrounded me round about, but in the name of the Lord I will 10 smite them. They have surrounded me like bees, they have gone out like fire in thorns;^{q)} but in the 11 name of the LORD I will cut them down. They thrust me to fall, but the LORD helped me. The 12 LORD is my strength and my psalm, and is my salvation. There is a voice of gladness and salvation in the tabernacles of the righteous; the 13 right hand of the LORD is strength. The right 14 hand of the LORD is exalted, the right hand of the LORD is strength. I shall not die, but live, and 15 tell the work of the Lord. The LORD chasteneth me, but giveth me not up unto death. Open unto 16 me the gates of righteousness, that I may enter therein, and give thanks unto the LORD. This is 17 the gate of the LORD, the righteous shall enter in. I thank thee that thou hearest me, and art my 18 salvation. The stone that the builders rejected has become the cornerstone. This was done by 19 the Lord, and is a miracle before our eyes. This is the day the LORD is making; let us rejoice and 20 be glad in it. O Lord, help, O Lord, let it prosper!

The 119th Psalm.

1.

Blessed are those who walk in the way
 1 without change, who walk in the law of the Lord.
 Blessed are they that keep his testimonies, that 2 seek him with all their heart. For the wicked walk not in his ways. Thou hast commanded to keep 3 diligently that which thou hast commanded. Oh
 4 that my ways were directed to keep thy statutes.
 5 Then would I not be put to shame, When I look upon thy commandments all. I thank thee with a 6 sincere heart that thou teachest me the 7 judgments of thy righteousness. I will keep thy statutes: forsake me not.

8
 With what will a young man purify his way? If he keeps your words. I have sought thee with all my heart; let me not lack thy commandments. I 9 have hid thy words in my heart, that I might not sin against thee. Blessed art thou, O LORD, that 10 teachest me thy statutes. I will tell with my lips all the judgments of thy mouth. I will rejoice in 11 thy ways of thy testimonies, As in all riches. I will speak the things which thou hast commanded, 12 and look into thy paths. I delight in thy statutes, 13 and forget not thy words.

3.

15 Restore thy servant, that I may live, and keep 16 thy words. Open my eyes, that I may see the wonders of thy law. I am a sojourner on earth; do not hide your commandments from me. My soul is crushed with desire for thy judgments at all times. Thou hast reproached the proud, that 17 they which lack thy commandments are 18 accused. Turn away from me shame and princes also sit and speak against me, but thy testimonies; they are my counsellors. ^4

My soul clings to the dust; make me alive according to your word. I have told my ways, and 25 thou answerest me; teach me thy statutes. 26 Instruct me in the way which thou hast commanded, And I will speak of thy wonders. My 27 soul dribbles with sorrow; Set me up according to thy words. Take away from me the wrong way, 28 and grant me thy law. I have chosen a certain way; I have set thy judgments before me. I cling 29 to thy testimonies, O LORD, let me not be put to 30 shame. I will walk in the way of thy commandments, if thou comfort my heart. 31

 Show me, O Lord, the way of thy statutes, and I will keep them unto the end. Instruct me, and I will keep thy law; I will keep it with all my heart.
 Lead me in thy paths of thy commandments, for 33 delight in them. Incline my heart unto thy 34 testimonies, and not to covetousness. Turn away mine eyes, that they see not vanity; Make me alive in thy way. Make thy speech steadfast unto 35 thy servant, That I may fear thee. Turn away from 36 me the reproach that I shun: for thy judgments are sweet. Behold, I desire that which thou hast 37 besought; Make me alive through thy righteousness. 38

39
 Let your goodness, O LORD, come to me, 40 your salvation according to your word, that I may answer my blasphemer, for I rely on your word.
 And take not from my mouth the word of truth, for I wait for thy judgments. I will keep thy law for ever and ever. And I will walk in the wide place, for 41
 I seek that which thou hast commanded. I speak 42

Remember thy servant in thy word, in which thou hast given me hope. This is my consolation in my misery, for your words make me alive. The proud mock me too much, but I do not depart from your law. O Lord, I remember thy judgments which are of the world, and am comforted. I am afraid of the wicked who forsake thy law. Thy judgments were my psalms in the house of my habitation. O LORD, I remember thy name at night, And keep thy law: It is mine [treasure], For I keep that which thou hast commanded.

I have said, O Lord, my portion is to keep thy ways. I beseech thy face with all my heart, make me alive according to thy word. I consider my ways, and turn my feet unto thy testimonies. I make haste, and do not delay to keep thy commandments. The covenant of the wicked depriveth me, but I forget not thy law. At midnight I rise to give thanks unto thee above the judgments of thy righteousness. I am in the fellowship of all who fear you and keep what you have commanded. O LORD, the earth is full of thy lovingkindness: teach me thy judgments.

65

You do good to your servant, O Lord, according to your words. Teach me good manners and knowledge, for I believe your commandments. Before I was humbled, I was misled, but now I keep your word. Thou art good and kind; teach me thy statutes. The proud tell lies about me, but I keep with all my heart what you have commanded. Their heart is as thick as sea, but I delight in your law. It is dear to me that thou hast humbled me, that I may learn thy statutes. The law of thy mouth is dearer unto me than many thousand pieces of gold and silver.

Thy hand hath made me and prepared me; Instruct me, that I may learn thy commandments. They that fear thee see me, and rejoice: for I wait for thy word. O LORD, I know that thy judgments are right, and that thou hast humbled me with faithfulness. Let thy lovingkindness comfort me, according to thy word let it be done unto thy servant. Thy mercy come unto me, that I may live; For I have breath of thy law. The proud must be put to shame, that they press me down so falsely; but I speak of that which thou hast commanded. Those who fear you and know your testimonies must turn to me. My heart abideth righteous in thy statutes, that I be not put to shame. 1) 11.

My soul longs for your salvation; I hope in your word. My eyes long for thy speech, saying, When wilt thou comfort me? For I am like a wineskin in the smoke; I forget not thy statutes. How many are the days of thy servant? When wilt thou execute judgment upon my persecutors? The proud dig pits for me, which are not according to thy law. All thy commandments are sure: they persecute me falsely, help me. They have made me almost all on earth; but I forsake not that which thou hast commanded. Make me alive through thy lovingkindness, that I may keep the testimonies of thy mouth.

12.

Lord, your word endures forever in heaven. Thy faithfulness endureth for ever: Thou hast prepared the earth, and it remaineth. It remains this day according to your judgment, for all things serve you. If I would not delight in thy law, I would perish in my misery. I will never forget what you have commanded, for you make me alive with it. I am yours, help me, for I seek what you have commanded. The wicked wait upon me, that they may destroy me; but I take 96 heed to thy testimonies. I have seen the end of all things, but thy commandment is very broad.

13.

How I love your law, daily I speak of it. Thou 97 hast made me wiser with thy commandment 98 than mine enemies are, for it is mine for ever. I am wiser than all my teachers, for thy 99 testimonies are my speech. I am more understanding than the ancients, for I guard 100 what you have commanded. I keep my foot from all evil ways, that I may keep thy word. I 101 will not depart from thy judgments, for thou teachest me. How sweet are thy words to my 102 throat, More than honey to my mouth. I am 103 made understanding of that which thou hast commanded; therefore I hate all false ways.

14.

Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path. I swear and keep it, that I will keep the judgments of thy righteousness. I am 105 greatly humbled, O Lord; make me alive 106 according to thy words. Let the voluntary sacrifices of my mouth be acceptable to you, O 107 LORD, and teach me your judgments. My soul is always in my hands, and I do not forget your 108 law. The wicked lay snares for me, but I will not err from that which thou hast commanded. Thy 109 testimonies do I inherit for ever: for they are the delight of mine heart. I incline my heart to do 110 thy statutes for ever and ever.

I hate the heretics,^{r)} and love your law. You commandments of my God. Keep me in thy Rights. You trample all who lack your right, for 118 their deceitfulness is false. Thou destroyest all 119 the wicked of the earth as refuse; therefore I love thy testimonies. The hairs of my flesh 120 stand on end because of your fear, and I am afraid of your judgments.

16.

I exercise judgment and justice; do not hand me over to those who do me wrong. Vow for thy 121 servant's good, that the proud do me no wrong.
My eyes are longing for thy salvation, And for 122 the speech of thy righteousness. Deal with thy 123 servant according to thy lovingkindness, And teach me thy statutes. I am thy servant, instruct 124 me, that I may know thy testimonies. It is time for the LORD to do it; they have made thy 125 statutes to stand. Therefore I love thy commandment above gold and above fine gold. 126 Therefore I will keep all that thou hast ever commanded; I will avoid all false paths. 127

17.

Thy testimonies are strange; therefore keep them my soul. When thy word goeth forth, it enlighteneth, and giveth understanding unto the simple. I open my mouth and take breath, 129 for I desire thy commandments. Turn thou unto 130 me, and be gracious unto me, as thou art gracious unto them that love thy name. Direct 131 my courses by thy speech, and let no injustice have dominion over me. Deliver me from the 132 iniquity of men, and I will keep thy commandments. Enlighten thy face upon thy 133 servant, And teach me thy judgments. Rivers of water depart from mine eyes, that thy law be 134 not kept. 135

You are righteous, O Lord, and your 136 judgment is right. Thou hast bidden the testimonies of thy righteousness, and hard faith. My zeal hath almost killed me, that mine adversaries forget thy words. Thy speech is 137 and my heart is afraid of your words. I rejoice in thy speech, as one that findeth great spoil. I am 161 averse to lies, and abhor them; but I love thy law. I praise thee seven times a day for the O Lord, let my lamentation come before thee; instruct me according to thy word. Let my

The 120th Psalm.

A song on high.

I call to your Lord in my distress, and he 3 answers me. Lord, save my soul from evil mouths and false tongues. What can the false 4 tongue do to you? and what can it accomplish?
 5 It is like the sharp arrows of a mighty man with coals of juniper. ^{s)}Woe is me, that I am a 6 stranger among Meshech; I must dwell among the tents of Kedar. My soul has long been 7 accustomed to those who hate peace. I kept peace, but when I spoke, they began to fight.

The 122nd Psalm.

1 A Song of David on High.

I rejoice in that which is spoken to me, that we shall enter into the house of God, that our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem.
2 Jerusalem, which is built like a city, holding itself
3 together with one another. As the tribes go up, 4 even the tribes of the LORD, to testify unto Israel, to give thanks unto the name of the LORD. For there sit the seats of judgment, seats 5 of the house of David. Give Jerusalem a friendly greeting; let it be well with those who love you.
6 Let there be peace within thy walls, and 7 abundance in thy palaces. For the sake of my brothers and friends, I will speak peace over you.
8 For the sake of the house of the LORD our God,
I will seek thy best.

The 123rd Psalm.

A song on high.

1 I lift up mine eyes unto thee that sitteth in heaven. Behold, as the eyes of servants look on the hands of their masters, as the eyes of maids 2 look on the hands of their wives: so our eyes look on the LORD our God, until he be gracious unto us. Be gracious to us, O LORD, be gracious to us, for we are very full of contempt. Our soul is 3 very full of the scorn of the rich and the contempt of the worthy.

The 124th Psalm.

A Song of David on High.

If the LORD were not with us, thus say Israel:
If the LORD were not with us, when men set 1 themselves against us, they would swallow us up alive, when their wrath was kindled against 2 us; and the waters would have drowned us, the rivers would have gone over our souls; the 3 waters would have gone over our souls too high.

The rope has been broken, and we are free. Our

The 125th Psalm.

A song on high. 8

Those who hope in the Lord will not fall down and will remain forever, like Mount Zion. There are mountains round about Jerusalem, and the LORD is round about his people from henceforth 1 even for ever. For the rod of the wicked is not left over the lot of the righteous, lest the righteous stretch forth their hand unto iniquity. Do good, O 2 Lord, to the good and upright in heart. But the LORD will bring those who are ready to step 3 aside with the wicked; but peace be upon Israel.

The 126th Psalm.

A song on high. 4 ö

When the Lord turns the prison of Zion, we will be like those who dream. ^{t)} Then our mouths will be full of laughter, and our tongues full of praise;
then it will be said among the Gentiles, "The Lord

1 Remember, O LORD, David, and all his

The 133rd Psalm.

A Song of David.

3 Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together! As the best oil upon the head, which floweth down into Aaron's beard, which floweth down into the hole of his garments.
 Like the dew of Hermon, which floweth down

The 134th Psalm.

Song.

2 Behold, praise the LORD, all ye servants of 3 the LORD, that stand by night in the LORD's hall.
 Lift up your hands in the sanctuary and praise the Lord. The LORD bless you from Zion, who made

The 135th Psalm. Hallelujah.

2 Praise the name of the LORD, praise, you 3 servants of the LORD. You who stand in the house of the LORD, in the courts of the house of 4 our God. Praise the LORD, for the LORD is good; sing praises to his name, for he is good. For the 5 LORD has chosen Jacob for him, Israel for his 6 own. For I know that the LORD is great, and that he is our LORD above all gods. Whatsoever he 7 will, that will he do in heaven, in earth, in the sea, and in all deeps. He who makes the clouds rise from the ends of the earth, who turns the lightning 8 into rain, who makes the winds come out of his secret place. Who smote the first births in Egypt, both of them,

 and all his servants. Who smote many nations,

 The idols of the heathen are silver and gold, the 19 them, all they that hope in such. Let the house of Israel praise the LORD: praise the LORD, ye of 20 the house of Aaron. Ye of the house of Levi, praise the LORD; ye that fear the LORD, praise who dwells in Jerusalem, alleluia. 1)

The 137th Psalm.

By the waters of Babel we sat, and meant 1 also, remembering Zion. Our harps we hanged upon the willows that are within. For there they 2 demanded of us a song, which held us captive,
 3 and in our howling a joyful song: Dearly beloved, sing unto us a song of Zion. How shall we sing the Lord's song in foreign lands? If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand be forgotten. Let 4 my tongue stick to the roof of my mouth if I do not

The 139th Psalm.

A Psalm of David, to be sung on high.

O Lord, you search me out and know me. 1
 Thou knowest my sitting down and my rising up; thou understandest my thoughts afar off. Thou 2 art round about my path and round about my 3 camp^y, and all my ways thou spakest out. For, behold, there is not a word out of my tongue that thou, O LORD, knowest not all things. Behind^z 4 and in front thou makest me, and holdest thine hand over me. Such knowledge is too strange 5 and too high for me; I cannot attain it. Where 6 shall I go before thy spirit? and where shall I flee before thy face? If I go to heaven, thou art there; 7 if I beg my way into hell, behold, thou art there 8 also. If I take the wings of the dawn, and abide at the uttermost sea, yet thine hand shall lead me 9 there, and thy right hand shall hold me. If I say,
 "Let darkness cover me," the night is also light 10 around me. For even darkness is not dark with thee, and the night shineth as the day; darkness 11 is as the light. For thou hast my kidneys in thy power; thou wast over me in my mother's womb. 12
 I thank thee that days were written in thy book, which were yet to come, and there was none of them. But how 17 delicious before me, O God, are your thoughts!

 How great is their sum! If I count them, they are 18 more than the sand of the sea. When I wake up,
 I am still with you. O God, that thou wouldest slay 19 the wicked, and that the bloodthirsty would depart from me! For they do not speak well of

The 140th Psalm.

A psalm of David to sing high.

Deliver me, O LORD, from wicked men; keep 1 me from the wicked men who think evil in their 2 hearts, and make strife daily. They sharpen their tongue like a serpent; viper's fury is under their 3 lips, Sela. Keep me, O LORD, from the hand of 4 the wicked; keep me from the wicked men who think to cast out my footsteps. The proud have 5 laid a rope for me, and spread out a net for me, and set traps for me in the way, Sela. But I say 6 unto the LORD, Thou art my God, O LORD, hear the voice of my supplications. O LORD, thou strength of my salvation, thou coverest my head in the time of the armor. O LORD, do not let the 7 wicked have his desire, do not strengthen his will, let them rise up, Sela. The calamity of their lips surround me, sela. He shall heap coals upon judgment upon the poor. Also the righteous shall 2 give thanks unto thy name, and the upright shall abide before thy face.

The 141st Psalm.

A Psalm of David.

O Lord, I call to you, hasten to me, hear my voice when I call to you. Let my prayer be made unto thee as an incense; let the lifting up of my 5 hands be an evening sacrifice. O LORD, set a guard for my mouth, and a keeper for the door of my lips. Incline not my heart from evil, to lead an ungodly life with the wicked, that I eat not of that 6 which is dear unto them. The righteous shall smite me kindly, and punish me; that shall be the 7 best oil for me, which shall not fail of my soul: for my prayer is yet against their evil. Their judges 8 stumble at the rock; they hear my speech, that they are sweet. Our bones are scattered as far 9 as hell, as one scattereth and scattereth the earth. For in thee, O Lord, do mine eyes look; I 10 trust in thee; pour not out my soul. Keep me from the snare they have laid for me, and from the snare of the wicked. The wicked must fall into the same nets with one another until I pass by.

The 142nd Psalm.

An instruction to David to pray, since he was in 2 the cave.

I cry out to the Lord with my voice, I plead with 3 the Lord with my voice. I pour out my speech 4 before him and show him my distress. When my spirit is in anguish, you know me. They have laid a snare for me in the way where I go up. Look to 5 the right, and behold, there is no one who knows me, for my flight 1) is lost; no one inquires about

Lead my soul out of the dungeon, that I may give thanks to thy name. The righteous will surround me when you restore me.

2

The 143rd Psalm.

A Psalm of David.

Hear my prayer, hear my supplication for the sake of your faith, answer me for the sake of your righteousness. And do not enter into judgment with your servant, for no living person will be justified before you. For the enemy persecutes my soul, and crushes my life to the ground; he puts me in darkness, like the dead in the world. And my spirit is troubled within me; my heart is troubled within my body. I remember the former lines; I seek thy works, and speak of the dealings of thy hands. I spread out my hands to you, my soul thirsts for you on earth, Sela. O Lord, hear me soon; my spirit is failing; hide not thy face from me, lest I be like them that go down to the pit. Let me early hear thy lovingkindness, for I hope in thee: make known unto me the way wherein I should go, for I lift up my soul unto thee. Deliver me, O Lord, from mine enemies: in thee have I recourse. Teach me to do according to thy good pleasure, for thou art my God: thy good Spirit leadeth me on the level ground. O LORD, make me alive for thy name's sake; bring my soul out of trouble for thy righteousness' sake. And destroy mine enemies for thy lovingkindness' sake, and destroy all them that afflict my soul: for I am thy servant.

Send thy hand from on high, and deliver me, and save me from great waters, from the hand of strange children, whose mouth speaketh vainly, and their right hand is a false right. God, I will sing a new song to you; I will play to you on the harp of ten strings. You who give victory to kings, and deliver your servant David from the sword of the wicked. The 145th Psalm.

A Praise of David.

I will exalt you, my God, O King, and praise your name forever and ever. I will praise thee daily, and glorify thy name for ever and ever. The LORD is great and very praiseworthy, and his greatness cannot be fathomed. Children's children shall praise thy works, and shall speak of thy might. I will speak of the sincere adornment of thy praise, and of thy wonders; that they may speak of the strength of thy wonders, and that I may tell 1) thy glory. That they may testify the remembrance of thy great kindness, and of thy great power.

b) [false rights,] that is, they teach nothing but temporal benefits and splendor.

merciful is the LORD, longsuffering and full of 9 great kindness. The LORD is kind to all, and his mercy is above all his works. All thy works give 10 thee thanks, O Lord, and thy saints praise thee.

Speak of the glory of thy kingdom, and speak of 11 thy power, that thy power may be known unto the children of men, and the honourable ornament of 12 thy kingdom. Thy kingdom is a kingdom for ever, and thy dominion endureth for ever. The LORD

The 146th Psalm.

Hallelujah.

Praise the Lord, my soul. I will praise the Lord in my life, and sing praises to my God because I am here. Do not rely on princes, on man's child, he cannot help. For his spirit must go forth, and 1 come again to his earth, and then are all his 2 counsels lost. Blessed is he whose help is the God of Jacob, whose hope is in the LORD his God, who made heaven, earth, sea, and all that 3 is in them, who keeps faith forever; who gives 4 justice to the wronged, who gives food to the

2. D. Martin Luther's Summaries on the Psalms and Causes of Interpretation.*)

Begun 1531; completed Nov. 30, 1532; issued New Year's Day 1533.

From interpreting.)

1. grace and peace in Christ to all pious Christians. Around this Easter of the 1531st year, we have again gone over our German Psalterlein, and have improved it for the last time, thereby we intend to let it remain henceforth. How the same Psalter will please the master Klüglinge is not our concern. But because perhaps some in our time, and even more,

*) On August 31, 1532, Veit Dietrich wrote to Justus Menius (Kolde, Analecta, p. 182): "Wittenberg brings now nothing new other than the Summaries, which I hope will go out next Michaelmas, together with Christ's Sermon on the Mount, which Cruciger has copied [According to this, Aurifaber's information, Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 145 would have to be corrected. See Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. VII, 346. note], and the corpse-

Good, pious hearts, who also know the languages and yet are untrained in interpreting, may be offended and annoyed that we have so freely departed from the letters in many places, sometimes also following a different understanding than that taught by the Jewish rabbis and grammarians, we hereby want to sermons that the doctor held at the prince's funeral. The first I have copied, the other, I hope, Cruziger will add." At the beginning of the year 1533, Justus Menius testifies in a letter to Luther his joy that the Summaries are completed (Kolde, Analecta, p. 183). On January 5, 1533, Melanchthon writes to Herzheimer (Oorp. l. l. II, 627), "I send you Luther's Summaries on the Psalms." In this letter he remarks: there is at present no commentary, no matter how great, that sheds more light on the Psalms than the Summaries (Köstlin, Martin Luther, Vol. II, p. 252). That Luther had already dealt with the Summaries in 1531 is proven both by the first sentence of the preface to our writing: "We have around this Easter of the 1531st year" 2c., as well as the last sentence of the postscript to the Psalter translation of 1531 (in this volume p. 1): "From this further, if God wills, in the Summaries." The first single edition, which appeared in Wittenberg with Hans Lufft under the title: "Summarien vber die Psalmen, Vnd Ursachen des dolmetschens. Mart. Luther. Witlemberg. 1531.", has on the title page the year 1531, but at the end the year 1533. To the year "1531" the German Wittenberg edition (1559), vol. XII, p. 376 makes the marginal note: For anno 1531. the dear Father in Christ D. Mar. Luth. began to write such a work, but in 1533. it went out of print." Only the smaller part of the Summaries Luther wrote down in the summer of the year 1532, the larger, as Veit Dietrich reports (Köstlin I. e.), in the four last days of November 1532. Mathesius (Luthers Leben, St. Louiser Ausg., p. 170), on the other hand, writes: "In the 32nd year also go out the Summaries about the Psalter, which beautiful and useful booklet the Doctor produced in four days, on which he wrote four Seiger hours of the day, two before the meal, two after the meal." These statements of Mathesius are supplemented and corrected by what has been said before. Spengler waited for the Summaries even on 20 Sept. 1531 (Köstlin I. o., vol. II, p. 659 sâ p. 252). - Walch places the Summaries according to the year on the title of the first edition in the year 1531; Luther, however, began the Summaries in 1531, continued to work on them in the summer of 1532 and completed them in the last days of November 1532. The printing of the same was then finished at New Year's Day 1533. - In the same year 1533, a second edition was published by Hans Lufft in Wittenberg, which also has the year 1533 on the title page; likewise a reprint in Erfurt and a Low German edition under the title: "Lurnnaurien aver de Psalmen un de Orsake des verdütschens. M. Luther. Witt. In his preface, Walch mentions another Lower Saxon edition, which was published by Hans Walther in Magdeburg in 1533. Furthermore, many editions appeared in which the Psalter and the Summaries are found: "Der Psalter mit den Summarien Doct. Martin Luther" (aum praolationidris Kmtlwri) came out without the In 1537, an edition in Low German: "De nye putsche Psalter, mit den Summarien" at Wittenberg; likewise in Low Saxon at Magdeburg in 1541. Then: "Der verteutschte Psalter mit Summarien, Glossen und Vorrede Lutheri. Witt. 1538." Further by Georg Rhaw at Wittenberg 1541: "Der Deutsche Psalter Mit den Summarien. D. M. Luther." At the end is the year 1542. At the beginning is Luther's preface to the Psalter: "Es haben viel heiliger Väter" 2c.; then the preface to the Summaries with the alteration "um diese Ostern des 1541. Jahres" (instead of 1531). Each psalm is preceded by its summarium; the glosses are in the margin. At the end, Luther's postscript: "Ob jemand klügeln wollte" 2c., followed by a register of the psalms signed by M. Georg Rörer, in which it is indicated to which of the five parts indicated in the preface "Von den Summarien" each psalm belongs. Another edition was published in 1544 in Wittenberg by Hans Lufft: "Der Psalter Deusch mit den Summarien. Auuffs uew zugericht. D. Mart. Luther"; likewise in 1557 at Nuremberg by M. Joachim Heller: "Der Psalter mit den Summarien. There, Mart. Luth. Ein Register von vnterscheid der Psalmen." Finally, an edition at Leipzig "by Jacobum Verwalt, resident in the Nickelstraßen," without indication of the year, which has the title: "Psalter Deusch, Mit den Summarien, D. Mar. Luth." The only Bible in which the Summaries were printed during Luther's lifetime is the Bible ordered by Bugenhagen and printed in Lübeck in 1534. After Luther's death, the Summaries were included in many Bibles. - In the course of 1533, Justus Jonas translated the Summaries into Latin and added a dedicatory inscription, which is dated Dec. I, 1533 (Erl. Ausg., vol. 37, p. 251). This translation was published in 1534 in Wittenberg by Johannes Weiß under the title: 8umirmria O. Illar. Outlwri in?8u1iuo8, Oaviüis 6 K6rma. lutiue reclüita per ^ustum 4onarn. In the collections our writing is found: in the Wittenberg (1559), vol. XII, p. 376; in the Altenburg, vol. VI, p. 133; in the Leipzig, vol. IV, p. 401 and in the Erlangen, vol. 37, p. 250. The Latin translation is in the Latin Wittenberg edition (1549), Dom. III, col. 398d. In it, the first part of the preface "Vom Dolmetschen" is missing. On the other hand, as already noted in the previous edition, Luther's preface to the Psalter has been added: "Nulti ex veteridus et sauetis putridus" etc. After the Summaries and Luther's postscript, there follows a postscript by Jonas, in which he says that Luther allowed him to express himself somewhat more expansively (prolixius) in the translation. Jonas made ample use of this permission; for example, the Summarium to the 109th Psalm, which in German consists of only a few lines, takes up an entire folio page in Jonas. The Latin Summaries in the Wittenberg edition are thirty folio verses thicker than the German ones. We give the text according to the Wittenberg edition, which reproduces the first printing, with comparison of the Erlangen.

We will show the causes and explain them with some examples, so that they may see how we have not interpreted in this way out of ignorance of the language, nor out of ignorance of the rabbis' glosses, but knowingly and willingly.

The thorns on the bush will be snatched away by a wrath so fresh" 2c.; know well that the Jewish rabbis read and interpret differently, and, make pots out of the word XXX; and fire out of the word "wrath", and shall have the opinion: Before your pots become aware of the thorns, and the flesh in them is still raw, the wrath (fire) will have burned them; that is, when the wicked rage, they are like the thorns that are put under pots, and are to cook the flesh (that is, the pious perish), they burn in themselves before such flesh is cooked.

(3) This opinion we leave well, and it is also ours, but we have given it thus: "Before the thorns ripen" or are to be respected "on the thorn bush, the wrath comes", that is, an axe or axe, and cuts into them, because they are still so green and fresh.

4 So the wicked with their raging are like young thorns on the bush, which grow up and threaten to prick; but a farmer comes in with a hatchet before they are hard and ripe to prick, and throws them down like a thunderstorm. For God lets the wicked rage, but they do not have to carry out their raging and raging; he sends them to perish before they carry it out, as happened to Saul, Absalom, Pharaoh and all the tyrants.

5. Psalm 68 in the 31st verse we have thus interpreted: "Those who have desire for money"; know well that the Nabbini here use the word "money" differently.

However, we are of the opinion of almost one thing, namely, that the Psalm asks God to rebuke and ward off the beast in the reed that has a lust for money, that is, runs and does everything against God's word for the sake of money.

But what such a beast is, he says himself: "the herd" or bunch "of oxen among the calves"; that is, they are the cowardly, rich herds of the great Hansen, who graze in the country, like the oxen, in good pasture, or large grass, and have many followers, as the oxen have many cows and calves next to them, which also graze with them. Such tyrants (and especially he means the priests of the Jewish people) fight and run against God's word only for the sake of money, because they worry that if God's word were to be fulfilled, their splendor and wealth would be destroyed.

(7) This is what we mean when we say: "Those who have a desire for money"; the Nabbini, that is, that runs with the trampling for the sake of money; that is, such a beast runs with the tyrants who trample the pious for the sake of money. 1)

8th Psalm 63 in the 6th verse, since we interpreted the words before: "Let my soul be filled as with lard and fat, that my mouth may boast with glad lips. Since no German understands this, we have left out the Hebrew words ("lard" and "fat", so that they mean joy; just as a healthy, fat animal is joyful, and again, a joyful animal becomes fat, a sad animal loses weight and becomes lean, and a lean animal is sad), and have clearly given German, thus: "That would be my heart's joy and delight, if I were to praise you with a joyful mouth."

9 For this is David's opinion, since he had to stay outside the city and flee from Saul, that he could not be at the service, nor hear the joyful word of God, which comforts all sorrowful hearts 2c.

Psalm 6ö in the 9th verse, since we previously interpreted: "You make merry those who go out, both early and late", we have made it clearer: "You make merry those who weave, both in the morning and in the evening".

(10) That is, it is your gift that all animals, both men and cattle, rise early in the morning with good peace, and each one goes cheerfully to his food and to his work; then the birds sing, then the cattle bleat, servants and maids go to the field with a little song; likewise at evening they all come home again with singing and bleating. In sum, the psalm praises God for peace and good times, for where there is peace and good times, everything sings and is joyful, and mountains and valleys stand merrily. This is a great blessing and gift of God, who gives such joy. For in time of war, and other evil times, no one can give such joy, nor have it.

1) In the first edition is added here: Although my printers have left out this little piece, "Those who have a desire for money," in this last little Psalter, which we had made with special diligence and great disputation. So no diligence is sufficient in the printing shop.

(11) Whether in this, and such like things, we sometimes deviate from the grammarians and rabbis, let no one be surprised; for we have kept the rule: Where words may suffer and give a better understanding, we have not allowed ourselves to be forced to a lesser or different understanding by the grammatica made by the rabbis; just as all schoolmasters teach that not the meaning should serve and follow the words, but the words the meaning. So we also know, and St. Paul 2 Cor. 3, 15 teaches us, that Moses' face is hidden from the Jews, that they meet the opinion of the Scriptures, especially in the prophets, little and seldom; just as in this place they interpret "the joyful goes forth early and late" the sun that rises in the morning and the stars that rise in the evening; which understanding, though it may be good, has not pleased us here.

(12) But once in Psalm 68 we have dared much, and often given the meaning, and let the words go; therefore, of course, many clever ones will master us, and perhaps also some pious ones will be offended by it. But what is it that keeps words so stiff and strict without need, from which nothing can be understood? Whoever wants to speak German does not have to use the Hebrew words in a certain way, but must see that when he understands the Hebrew man, he grasps the meaning, and so think: Dear, how does the German man speak in such a case? If he now has the German words that serve for this, then he leaves the Hebrew words, and speaks out the meaning freely in the best German, if he can. Here, in the 14th verse, we could have interpreted stiffly according to the Hebrew: "When you lie between the marks, the wings of the doves are covered with silver, and their wings with glittering gold" 2c. But which German understands this? But since the next verse before it sings of kings who are warring and commanding the spoil to the housewife, this verse means that such kings have a fine, beautiful, well-equipped army in the field, which is to be seen from afar like a dove, whose feathers glisten white and red (as if they were silver and gold). These kings are the apostles, who now and then, in the world, through various

The beautiful gifts and miraculous deeds of the Holy Spirit, gloriously shining, were at war against the devil, and won many people over from the devil, whom they commanded the matron, the church, to govern and teach as a spoil.

(14) And in the 16th verse after that we might have interpreted with the rabbis thus: The mountain of God is a mountain of Bashan, or a fat mountain (as we have also interpreted it before); but it is said more finely and more clearly: "A fruitful mountain", that is, in Christianity, which is the mountain of God, much good always happens, and if the trees are fruitful, that is, the Christians do great works and miracles. For God's word does not go out empty, and a good tree brings forth good fruit. For in German we also call a good fertile land a fat land and a pit of lard, not that which is smeared with lard or dripping with fat.

(15) So that which follows, "a hill, a fat mountain," we have now rendered, "a great mountain. Since the opinion is that, as a great mountain is and is called, there are many hills, and always one above the other, up to the highest hill: so the church is put together, since always one saint and little group hangs on the other, and one group, or one Christian, is more gifted and does more than the other; as Paul says in 1 Cor. 12:4 ff. that there must be a difference of works, gifts and offices in the church. And 1 Cor. 15, 41: "One star always has a different clarity than the other."

But that the rabbis here quarrel about the word from it make some, humps on a back, some the eyelashes over the eyes, we let happen; we have it neither like nor want such words after German. Likewise, in the 16th verse, we would have liked the same word XXXXX to be German: What do you bounce bumpy or eyelash mountains? But who would have called that spoken German? But because the Psalm speaks of the world's power, wisdom and holiness, especially of the Jews, it punishes them for laying themselves against this mountain of God, defying that they are great, mighty and many, and wanting to defend their power, holiness and wisdom against the mountain of God, when God is not with them, than they think, but dwells on this mountain, which they despise with pride, and call it the devil's mountain, and a vain heretic's mountain.

(17) Again, we have sometimes interpreted straight from the words, although we could have given it differently and more clearly, because there is something in the same words; as here, in the 19th verse: "Thou hast gone up on high, and hast caught the prison."

18 Here it would have been good German: Thou hast redeemed the captives; but it is too weak, and does not give the fine, rich sense which is in the Hebrew, saying, "Thou hast caught the prison," which not only signifies that Christ hath done away with the captives, but also that the prison is so led away and caught, that it can never catch us again, nor shall, and is so much as an eternal redemption.

In this way St. Paul feels like speaking when he says Gal. 2, 19: "I died to the law through the law. Item, Rom. 8, 3: "Christ condemned sin through sin." Item, Hos. 13, 14.: Death is put to death through Christ. These are the prisons which Christ has caught and put away, so that death can no longer hold us, sin can no longer guilt us, the law can no longer punish our conscience; as St. Paul teaches such rich, glorious, comforting doctrine everywhere. Therefore, in honor of such teaching, and for the comfort of our conscience, we must keep and accustom such words, and thus leave room for the Hebrew language, where it does it better than our German can do.

20 Thus we have Psalm 91, verses 5 and 6, written in Hebrew: "Lest thou be afraid of the terror of the night, of the arrows that fly by day, of the pestilence that creepeth in darkness, of the pestilence that wasteth in the midst of the day" 2c.

(21) These four plagues or calamities, which a righteous man must suffer for God's sake, because they are spoken in obscurity and with hidden words, may be interpreted differently by one and not by another. Therefore, we have given each one his due according to the gifts of his spirit.

l) Wittenberg and Erlangen: am.

and measures to understand the same; otherwise we would probably have translated them so that our understanding might have been recognized.

(22) Namely, the first evil that the righteous must suffer is "fear of the night," that is, fretting, fretting, envying and harming; for God's word always arouses danger and enmity; such enmity he calls here "fear of the night."

The other evil is "arrows that fly by day," which is obviously blasphemy, contradiction, scolding, reviling, cursing, banishing, 2) as papal bulls, imperial edicts, princes and lords forbid, the sermons and books of the sophists, and the writings of the perverse do now.

(24) The third is "pestilence" or fever, "creeping in darkness"; these are the secret wiles, stratagems, plots, practices, alliances, so that the adversaries consult and unite among themselves in their chambers and corners, which no one should notice nor understand, how they want to suppress the word of God, and exterminate the righteous.

The fourth is "the pestilence" or 3) "the pestilence that destroys in the midday"; this is the manifest persecution, because they want to kill, drown, strangle, burn, chase away, rob 2c. with the deed, so that they manifestly disturb the word, and ruin everything to the ground.

Such is my mind in this place, but I know well that St. Bernard has another, which I let be good, although it seems to me to be too much monasticism, and too little for the Christians or Christian church, which is contested more for the sake of word and faith than for the sake of life or work. Others may interpret it differently, but we let them be sure of their meaning. Our understanding is also good, where it is not supposed to be the best. For we see, and experience daily, that God's word is attacked with such four pieces. Therefore the Holy Spirit comforts our faith that it should not be afraid of this, even if it has to suffer it.

27. item, in the same psalm we have in the

2) Wittenberger: "condemn".

3) Thus the first edition; in the Wittenberg and in the Erlangen: the.

In the 9th verse, the pronoun mea is changed to tua, and "my" is changed to "thine," so that the verse is obscure when it is said, "For the Lord is my refuge," although the word "thine" is used throughout the psalm, and speaks to another, or of another; as also in the same verse: "The Most High is your refuge"; 1) and the common German man cannot well notice the sudden change of persons in speech.

(28) Therefore we have given it clearly and plainly, because one is not so accustomed to speak in this way in German as in Hebrew, where it often happens that one speaks now: "You" and "The"; if he speaks with the same person, as the Hebrews know well; we have done this several times more. Whether this may not please Master Klügling, who does not ask how a German should understand the text, but keeps the words stiff and exact, so that no one can understand him, does not matter to us; we have not taken anything away from the sense, and have given the words clearly.

29. item, Psalm 92, 15.: "When they become old in a moment, they will still blossom, be fruitful and fresh", we know well that [it] reads from word to word thus: They will still blossom in the gray hair, be fat and green. What is this saying? The Psalm had compared the righteous to trees, as palm trees and cedars, the same have no gray hair, are also not fat (which a German understands by lard, and thinks of a fat belly).

030 But the prophet saith, The righteous are such trees as flourish, and are fruitful and fresh, when they wax old, and must abide for ever. For God's word abides forever, which they learn. 2) Ps. 1, 3: "His leaves do not wither"; for they increase the longer, both in word and life. But all other trees decrease at last when they grow old, especially the rotten ones, so God has not planted them; as Christ Matth. 15, 13. says: "All plants, which my heavenly Father has not planted, must be uprooted."

1) Thus the first edition. In the Wittenberg, Erlangen and Waich (incorrectly); Zuversicht.
2) Erlanger: teach.

31 Item, Psalm 118 in the 27th verse we knew well that the Jewish rabbis read thus: Bind the paschal lamb with ropes, even to the horns of the altar; since we thus read, "Adorn the feast with may." They make the word (which actually means a feast or holiday) into a paschal lamb, by their own thirst; and even if it were invented elsewhere in this way, as they pretend, they may not prove it here. And where is it written that the Jews were to lead the paschal lamb to the altar with ropes, which each one had to roast at home in his house and eat with his servants? as they still do, even though they have no altar.

32 Because this is a Jewish misconception in the text, and we know that this psalm sings of Christ and His kingdom, and the words of this verse, by the nature of the language, give this meaning: Bind up the feast with may; we have made it clear thus: "Adorn the feast with may" (which is the spiritual feast of leaves, or feast of tabernacles, which was the model of the Jews' feast of leaves), "unto the horns of the altar."

33 By the altar he indicates that if it is to be a spiritual feast, it must be an altar. In the case of the Jews, there had to be no altar, but only in Jerusalem; and the opinion is that at the time of Christ, all festivals should be a daily feast, in which one preaches joyfully in the faith, and thus offers thanksgiving to God. That is, to adorn the feast with maybes up to the altar, to be joyful in word and faith, and thus to praise and glorify God in Christ, who is our altar.

34 Item, in the twelfth verse, when we thus say: "They dampen like a fire in thorns", the rabbis make it thus: They extinguish, or are dampened, like fire in thorns; and shall be the opinion: The wicked persecutors are like thorns under a pot, and flash and burn horribly, but before the flesh is cooked in the pot, the thorns are burned out, and go out, leaving the flesh raw; so the persecutors perish before the righteous clean them up. So the rabbis everywhere, where they can, draw the scripture on their pots and sacrifices, as those on such sacrifice and work build their holiness the most.

35 But because it follows in the text: "In the name of the Lord I will smite them" (as the same words are in the two verses before), by which words it is signified how the wicked shall perish, we hold the sense given by our text to be expressed by this the great wrath of the adversaries against the righteous. Just as he compares them to the angry bees in the same verse, so also here to those who run and quench when a hedge or forest burns, which also the Hebrew Grammatica gives, where they do not mend their spots without cause. Even if the thorns are burned and extinguished, how does it rhyme with wanting to cut them down in the name of the Lord? Should the ashes be hewn? or should the wicked, who are no more, first be put to death?

And what is the need to give such an account of all words? We have truly spared neither diligence nor effort. Whoever can do it better is welcome to it; but I hope that he will not use our Psalter to translate the Psalter so that neither German nor Hebrew remains much in it. You will notice this when you find our Psalter compared to his, and his own art, or our words stolen.

(37) It is a disgraceful, disgruntled man, Master Klügling, if he can find a little word that we would have provided (for who would be so presumptuous that he, as if he were Christ and the Holy Spirit himself, would not have missed a word?), then he is master and lux mundi, whether he knows well that we would otherwise have well Germanized the whole Psalter, and he would not have found one verse in the whole Psal-

1) Erlanger: in.

ter could rightly translate; they are Schnudler and calumniatores, that's what they remain.

(38) And how is it that we alone are sought so carefully, when the old Psalter, St. Jerome, and many others, have, out of the measure, lacked much more than we, both in Greek and Latin? Or, can they be so patient and kind there, since they find much lack, why are they so poisonous and merciless here, since they find much good, which they have found nowhere else?

39 But it is the tiresome court life and the great envy of Master Klügling. Because he sees that he can do nothing good, he wants to hunt for honor with it and be a master, so that he can blaspheme and desecrate other people's good work. But time will bring it. What God plants will remain.

40 So they will no doubt also try their art in that, since we have praised the rule, that we have at times kept the words stiff, at times given the sense alone. Here they will first of all puzzle and quarrel, as I have not used such a rule rightly nor at the right time, although they never knew of such a rule before; but, as is their way, what they hear, they can do better than anyone.

41 However, if they were so highly and deeply learned and wanted to prove their art, I would like them to take the few and yet almost common words before them and give me good German on them. I will procure fifty guilders for the one who actually and certainly translates such a word for me through and through in writing. And let all masters and clever ones do all their art together, so that they may see how even interpreting is a much different art and work than blaming and mastering another interpreter. Whoever does not want to have our interpreting, let it be; with it I serve ours and those who like to have it.

From the summaries.*)

(1) That is enough of interpreting; let us now proceed to the Psalter and the Summaries, for the simple, and so less able than we, to indicate what each Psalm intends and is able to do. And it is to be noted that the whole Psalter deals with five things, therefore we divide it into five parts.

First, some psalms prophesy of Christ and the church, or of the saints, how they shall fare. 2c. And here belong all the psalms, since promissiones et minae, promises to the pious and urges on the wicked, are inside.

3. secondly, there are some doctrinal psalms that teach us what we should do and what we should not do according to the law of God. And here belong all the psalms that condemn human doctrine and praise God's word.

(4) Third, there are some psalms of consolation, which strengthen and comfort the afflicted and suffering saints, and again, which warn and terrify the tyrants. And here belong all the psalms that comfort, exhort, provoke to patience, and rebuke tyrants.

(5) Fourth, there are some psalms of prayer in which one calls upon God and prays in all kinds of distress. And here belong all the psalms that lament and mourn, and cry out over enemies.

(6) Fifth, there are some psalms of thanksgiving, in which one praises and glorifies God for all kinds of benefits and help. Therefore, all the psalms that praise God in his works belong to the Psalter, and these are the most distinguished, and for these the Psalter was made, which is why it is called XXXXX XXX in Hebrew, that is, a book of praise or thanksgiving.

(7) But it should be known that the Psalms should not be divided so evenly and exactly into such pieces with all the verses, for sometimes in one Psalm of these pieces two, three, or even all five are found, and one Psalm belongs in all five parts, so that one has both prophecy, teaching, consolation, prayer, and thanksgiving next to one another; but this is the Opinion, that one knows, how the Psalter drives such five pieces. This serves to make it easier to understand the Psalter and to learn and retain it.

The 1st Psalm.

It is a psalm of comfort, admonishing us that we should gladly hear and learn God's word, and comforting us that we shall have great and much good from it, namely, that all our words and works shall be blessed against all enemies, just as a palm tree grows by the water and bears fruit against all heat and frost, which the teaching of men does not do; but as the wind weaves the chaff, so they also perish. For God also delights in such students of his word, he says, but the others he lets perish. And this psalm flows from the third commandment, yes, also belongs to it. For there it is commanded to celebrate the Sabbath, that is, to gladly hear and learn God's word, and is comprehended in the Lord's Prayer, in the other and third petition, where we ask for the kingdom of God and His will, both of which are promoted by His word.

The 2nd Psalm.

It is a prophecy of Christ, how he should suffer, and thereby become a king and lord of the whole world. And in it are also urges against the worldly kings and lords, how they shall perish, if they will not do homage to this King and serve him, but persecute and destroy him, and the promise that those who believe in him shall be blessed. And this psalm flows from the first commandment, where God promises to be our God, who will help us out of all distress and do all good, as through Christ he delivers us from sins, death and hell.

1) In the old editions: "demanded", that is: promoted.

*) This superscription is found in the Wittenberg edition.

and brought him to eternal life. 1) This we ask in the Lord's Prayer in the other petition, that his kingdom may come.

The 3rd Psalm.

It is a prayer psalm in which the example of David is presented to us, how he prayed in his distress and was heard when he was driven out by his son Absalom, and in the end praises God that he is a faithful helper and sustainer of all his own who call upon him in all distresses. It belongs to the first commandment, since God wants to be our God and help, and is understood in the seventh petition in the Lord's Prayer, since we ask for deliverance from all evil.

The 4th Psalm.

It is a psalm of consolation, and besides it prays and teaches; for it teaches to trust in God when things go badly, and reproves the wicked who turn to useless gods and carnal consolation, and suffer nothing, nor want to wait on God with patience, when he is the highest consolation. Although he does this wonderfully with his saints, that he leaves them first, and tries their faith and patience with it. But the wicked want to have their bellies full and secure; whoever tells them about faith and patience, they mock and despise, saying, "How can the fool tell us what is good? yes, wait until a roasted chicken flies into your mouth, rely on it, and do not bake. It also belongs in the first commandment; for it teaches and exhorts to hope and trust in God with patience where something is lacking, and punishes the unbelieving and impatient, and is comprehended in the third and seventh petition, where we ask that God's will be done and we be rid of evil; may well also be in the fourth petition, where we ask that God's will be done and we be rid of evil.

1) Here Walch has the following addition, which is found neither in the German Wittenberg nor in the Latin translation of Jonah (from where? we do not know): "After the suffering and persecution of Christ, his glory and his kingdom followed, not only among the Jews, but also among the Gentiles, to the end of the world. And here in this psalm is mocked the adversaries of Christ, whom the prophet admonishes to understand the truth, unless they would much rather perish and perish miserably under Christ the wrathful Judge."

To ask daily for bread, that is, for peace and all the necessities of this life, against all the lack on earth.

The 5th Psalm.

This is a psalm of prayer against the false teachers and the false spirits, in which he severely accuses both of them, their glittering teachings and works, so that under the name of God they do great harm to the pure word of God and the right worship of God; and prays for the pious, that is, for the pure word of God and the right worship of God, and promises in the last verse of such prayer to be answered and the false spirits to be rejected. It belongs to the other and third commandment, in which God's name and word are commanded to be sanctified, and to the first and other petition in the Lord's Prayer, in which God's name, honor, and His kingdom's correction are also asked for.

The 6th Psalm.

It is a prayer psalm, and laments the high and quite secret suffering of the conscience, which is martyred for its sin in faith and hope, with the law and wrath of God, and is driven to despair or disbelief; which are otherwise called in the Psalter from time to time the bonds of death and the ropes of hell, or the anguish of death and the fear of hell. But in the end he indicates that such prayer will be answered, as a comforting example to all who are in such distress that they should not remain inside, and punishes the evildoers, that is, the false saints who commonly hate and persecute such afflicted people. For their comfort is based on their own holiness, and they know nothing of such temptation; therefore they are the worst enemies of pure faith. But it belongs in the first and other commandments; for it praises the struggle of faith in God, and prays against sin and death, and is in the first petition of the Lord's Prayer, like all other prayer psalms; for to pray is to call upon and honor God's name.

The 7th Psalm.

Is also a psalm of prayer, and complains of the blasphemers, who blame the saints and their doctrine, that they should be seditious and disturbers of the authorities and of the peace; how Simei, the Jeminite, blasphemed the pious David in his misery, as if he had taken his kingdom from King Saul; as the Jews also blamed Christ before Pilate, and now the blasphemers also reproach the gospel. He fights against such challenges here with prayer, and accuses God of his innocence, and then shows us by his own example how such prayer is answered, for our consolation; and he dreadfully condemns the blasphemers and tyrants, and holds up to them the example of Absalom, how he perished before he accomplished the evil that he had in mind and begun. But it also belongs in the other commandment, and in the first petition, as the next one above.

The 8th Psalm.

This is a prophecy of Christ, his suffering, resurrection, and kingdom over all creatures. And such a kingdom shall be established by the mouth of babes, that is, without sword and armor, by word and faith alone. It belongs to the first commandment, since God wants to be our God, and is in the other petition, as said above in the other psalm.

The 9th Psalm.

It is also a prophecy of the youth, that is, of the new children and of the people of Christ: Christ's people, which is holy Christendom, as the same must also, according to the example of Christ, suffer and shed their blood forever. But he deals with this prophecy in thanksgiving and consolation, so that it may well be called a psalm of thanksgiving and consolation. For the Christians, and especially the holy martyrs, give thanks to God here, and comfort themselves that God will not forsake them, but continually increases them the more they are persecuted, until the 1) persecutor converts some and they become Christians, and the others perish. But it belongs in the first commandment, and in the other petition; as said above in the next psalm.

The 10th Psalm.

It is a psalm of prayer, lamenting over the archenemy of such a kingdom of Christ, that is, over the end-Christ, who will destroy both Christendom and the world with violence.

He is disturbed by his violence and cunning for the sake of his avarice and splendor. He wields both, the sword of worldly tyranny over the body and the net of false doctrine over the souls, and cannot do more than (as he says here [v. 7]: "His mouth is full of cursing, falsehood and deceit") curse, that is, banish and condemn, item, lie, that is, establish false doctrine and worship; and deceive, that is, deceive and fool all the world for good, honor, violence, body and soul. But at the 2) end he shows the consolation that such abomination should be eradicated with the end of the world. It belongs in the other commandment and in the first petition, like all the prayer psalms.

The 11th Psalm.

This is a Psalm of prayer which complains about the heretics and false interpreters of the Scriptures, who lead people away from the right ground of faith to their mountains, that is, to their high, great holiness of works, and mock the right teachers, saying: What should the righteous do? But in the end he comforts us that God will surely see to it that the false teachers are condemned and the right ones remain, and that therefore the prayer is heard as an example for us. It belongs in the other commandment, and in the first petition 2c.

The 12th Psalm.

It is a prayer psalm, and complains about the teachers of men, who are always thinking up new things, and fill the kingdom of God with such services everywhere, as the last verse complains. For where the doctrine of men once begins, there is no end, nor end, nor measure, throwing more and more, and complaining beyond all measure to the poor consciences, and making that few right saints remain. On the other hand, he takes comfort in the fact that God wants to awaken his salvation, that is, his Word, which confidently rushes under such straw works of human doctrine and sets the captive consciences free. Although it does not happen without a cross and torture, but is purified like silver in the fire, they must also suffer over it, and thereby become the clearer, and recognize the truth the clearer. It belongs in the second and third commandment, and in the first and second petition.

1) Wittenberg and Erlanger: die. Jonas: alicui ex seorbissiknis kostibus.

2) "am" is missing in the Erlanger.

The 13th Psalm.

This is a Psalm against the sadness or gloom of the spirit, which sometimes comes from the devil himself, sometimes also from men, who act against us with evil wiles and practices, so that we must be grieved when we see such great wickedness against us; But prayer is stronger than all misfortune, as this Psalm here gives an example, so that we may be comforted and learn in all kinds of misfortune, not to be grieved and distressed, nor to bite and devour ourselves in the heart, but to keep ourselves to prayer, and complain to God about all these things, certain that we will be heard and finally redeemed; as St. James Cap. 5:5. Jacobus Cap. 5, 13. also says: "If anyone is distressed, let him pray." It belongs in the other commandment, and in the first and last petition, when we ask to be delivered from evil.

The 14th Psalm.

Is a prophecy and doctrinal psalm that teaches how all men's teachings and lives, without faith, are vain abominations in the sight of God, and their best service is a mere belly-service, which they fatten with it, and eat people's goods; but no one knows nor understands the righteous service: God's service, although they teach and praise the law of God; yes, they desecrate and blaspheme the word of God when they are punished, not wanting to hear of the confidence or faith in God. There must also be resistance with prayer, which shall be answered, says the last verse, and the gospel of Christ shall come. For this Psalm especially punishes the Jews before Christ's birth, who tortured the people with the law, and promises or prophesies of Christ's future, since it says of the help from Zion; for out of Zion came the gospel and the Spirit. He belongs to the first and third commandment, because he praises God's word and promises Christ, also punishes the hypocrites and teachers of food or teachers of the belly, and is in the first and second petition, because we ask his name, his kingdom. 1)

The 15th Psalm.

It is a doctrinal psalm that teaches the right understanding of the law, a right life, and right good works, as the fruits of the spirit and faith; namely, to be without change before God through right faith, and to do right toward one's neighbor, and to avoid the evil ways of the wicked and their hypocrisy, since they serve God with deceptive works, and leave out right works. It belongs to the third commandment of the Sabbath, in which one is to hear and learn God's word, and is in the third petition.

The 16th Psalm.

This is a prophecy of Christ's suffering and resurrection, as the apostles have powerfully led Him, Acts 2:25 ff. and 13:35. 2, 25. ff. and 13, 35. And clearly testifies that he wants to reject the old law with its sacrifices and worship as idolatry 2c., and choose other saints and people for a beautiful inheritance. He belongs to the first, second and third commandment, because he proclaims God's new glory, work, word and service, which should come into the world in Christ after the old service, and is in the first and second commandment 2c.

The 17th Psalm.

It is a psalm of prayer, complaining about the false teachers and tender saints, who lead away from the word of God with the teachings and works of men, and persecute the true teachers, also hating the cross of Christ, seeking with their teachings and works how they may only have good, honor and peace here on earth, and may neither suffer nor lack anything. He belongs in the other and third commandment, and in the first petition, that his word and name be sanctified.

The 18th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving in which David thanks God (as the title indicates) that he is delivered from all his enemies. And I divide it into four parts according to his four enemies, as Saul, the Gentiles, Absalom, and the rebels. First, in the first six verses, he tells how he had been so distressed in his troubles that God had helped him; then, in the seventh verse, he introduces the example (according to the prophets' way) of how God used to help when he had in Egypt 2c. After that, in the sixteenth verse, he mentions the first enemy, namely Saul, who caused him much suffering because of God's word that he was chosen to be king. In the sixth and twentieth verses he praises God on account of other enemies, such as the trustworthy Goliath, Philistine, Amalek and other nations. In the fourth and thirtieth he touches the third enemy, his son Absalom, with his followers. And last, in the second and fortieth verse, he gives thanks against the disobedient and rebellious, when Zebah and almost all Israel were [2 Sam. 20, 1. 2.]; for he had many envious and hateful subjects, that even the foreign Gentiles (as he says here) were more obedient than his own people. So everyone may use this Psalm as an example to thank God for His help when God has saved him from his troubles. But whoever wants to interpret it spiritually, may make Christ out of David; out of Saul the Jews; out of the Gentiles the tyrants; out of Absalom the heretics; out of the disobedient the false Christians; out of all of whom Christ and his own will finally be redeemed. He belongs in the other commandment, and in the first petition, for he gives thanks to God, and praises His holy name.

1) The Wittenberg offers our reading, the Erlangen: "since we ask for his name, his kingdom". Cf. the Summarium to the 5th Psalm, at the end, where the same breviloquy is found.

The 19th Psalm.

This is a prophecy of the gospel, how it should go out into all the world, as far as the heavens are, and be propelled every day and night; not only in the Jewish language, but in all languages. Just as the sun (which he introduces as a similitude) shines in all places, and warms around and around: so also the new law of the gospel should shine, teaching, enlightening, comforting, purifying all 1) kinds of things 2c. And with this he at the same time abolishes the old law, which was not so pure, bright, lovely and imperishable 2c. It belongs in the third commandment; for it proclaims the right Sabbath, when God's word should be taught and believed inside.

The 20th Psalm.

Is a prayer psalm, and actually prays for emperors, kings, princes, lords, and all who sit in worldly authority, that God would give them

They must be granted grace to rule peacefully and well, and have happiness and victory against their enemies. For if a worldly government were in the hands of princes and lords, one should not pray so earnestly and heartily for them; but that one must pray for them in this way shows that they are the greatest fools and even blind, who presume to govern land and people out of their own heads. It belongs in the other commandment, as do all the prayer Psalms, for there one invokes God's name, and in the third petition is that God's will, and not the devil's, be done.

The 21st Psalm.

This is a prophecy of Christ's kingdom, which should be and remain eternal and spiritual in the sight of God; besides this, he also proclaims 2) that the Jews' kingdom should be disturbed, because they resisted God's will and crucified the king. Therefore, they are now made to suffer always, and gain nothing by it. It belongs in the first commandment, and in the other petition, because it proclaims a new worship and kingdom.

The 22nd Psalm.

It is a prophecy of the passion and resurrection of Christ and of the gospel that the whole world should hear and accept; and before all other Scripture, it clearly indicates Christ's martyrdom on the cross, how his hands and feet were pierced and his limbs stretched so that they could have been counted. Such a similarity is not found so clearly in other prophets, and is also one of the main Psalms. It belongs in the first commandment, for it proclaims new worship, and is in the first and second petition.

The 23rd Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving, in which a Christian heart praises and thanks God for teaching and sustaining it in the right way, and comforts and protects it in all distress by His holy Word, and compares itself to a sheep that a faithful shepherd feeds well in fresh pasture and by cool water, item, shows the table, cup and oil also in the likeness from the Old Testament.

and worship, and calls it all God's word, as he also calls it rod, staff, grass, water, and right way. It belongs in the third commandment, and in the other petition.

The 24th Psalm.

Is a prophecy of the kingdom of Christ, in all the world to come, and admonishes the gates of the world, that is, kings and princes, that they should give place to the kingdom of Christ; for it is they who rage most against it, Ps. 2:1 ff, saying, "Who is this King of honors?" As if they should say, The beggar, yea, the heretic, the thief, should he be a king, and we should yield to him and obey him? We will not do it 2c. So he proclaims besides that God's word must be condemned and persecuted. It belongs in the first commandment, and probably in all three commandments and requests.

The 23rd Psalm.

This is a prayer psalm in which the righteous pray that God would make him righteous, forgive all sin, protect him from evil and disgrace, and finally deliver him from all enemies and evils. And also stabs at the false, safe spirits and teachers. He belongs in the other commandment and in the other petition.

The 26th Psalm.

It is a psalm of prayer, complaining about the false saints who want to be righteous by the work of the law and condemn the saints who become righteous by God's goodness and grace alone; and blame them for gladly taking gifts. For such saints are certainly all vain covetous men, and their belly is their god, as St. Paul says [Phil. 3:19]; but they are harmful with their spiritual glitter and worldly honor, therefore it is well to ask that they do not deceive us. It belongs in the third commandment, and in the first and other requests, because it speaks of God's service and kingdom.

The 27th Psalm.

Is a psalm of thanksgiving, but besides that also much prays and comforts against the false teachers, which he calls false witnesses, who commit sacrilege without any shyness. For they are very foolish, bold saints, who testify of God with certainty and boldness, that they have no command; as we see every day, that the more foolish and unlearned people are, the more bold and impudent they are to preach, and teach all wagers; no one can do anything, they alone know everything; they also make war and sedition against the true saints and God-fearers. It belongs in the other and first commandment, and in the first and other petition.

The 28th Psalm.

This is a psalm of prayer that David may have prayed in his time against Saul and the like, especially against wickedness, when they gave him good words at times, and behaved kindly, and yet were after his life, as Absalom did afterward, and Joab against Amasa and Abner: that David feared that God would impute it to him, and prayed that he would not carry him off with the wicked. We may pray him, both against the tyrants and against the ruffians. For the tyrants are friendly, and practiceret: yet daily, as they murder and want to harm. The spirits of the wicked praise God's glory, word and service to the utmost, want to help all the wagers, and are excellently humble, but nevertheless seek to corrupt souls, and are the ravening wolves among sheep's clothing. It belongs in the third and other commandment, and in the first and other petition.

The 29th Psalm.

This is a prophecy of the gospel, how it should resound with power in all the world, and put to shame all kings, princes, rulers, nations, wisdom, holiness and glory, and Christ alone should be the only king, who should be served and honored with right wisdom and holiness; for this he also brings about the flood of baptism, in which the old Adam is drowned and the new man arises. He called the deserts, the forests, the hills, the lands of the world, which were under Jews and Gentiles, all of which he opened and converted to the gospel. It belongs in the third commandment and in the other petition.

The 30th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving in which he gives thanks that God has delivered him from the devil's high spiritual temptation, which is sadness, gloom, fright, despair, doubt, distress, and such like poisonous, fiery darts of the devil; and besides this, he comforts finely, how that God is angry for a moment, and has no desire nor will for our death nor gloom, but rather sifts us alive and glad 2c. It belongs in the third commandment, and in the first petition.

The 31st Psalm.

It is a common psalm of thanksgiving, prayer and consolation among themselves, and is spoken in the person of Christ and His saints, who are afflicted all their lives, inwardly with trembling and terror, outwardly with persecution, blasphemy and contempt for the sake of the word of God, and yet are redeemed and comforted by God from all of them. It belongs in the other and third commandment, and in the first and third petition.

And here we will stop with the indications to which commandment and petition each psalm belongs, because from the previous ones there are enough examples, so that everyone can easily recognize for himself where each psalm belongs. The prayer psalms belong to the other commandment and to the first petition, because they honor and call upon God's name. The teaching psalms, comfort psalms, thanksgiving psalms, all belong in the third commandment, and also in the other, and in the first and third petition, because they sanctify the right Sabbath with right sacrifice and worship. And often many psalms belong in all three commandments and petitions. But we have indicated that we should learn to practice and understand the commandments of God and our Father, when we see how the dear saints and prophets have so abundantly and manifoldly spoken and practiced the first three commandments and petitions, and always acted upon them anew, and yet taught nothing new, and have not walked on the tablets of Moses and our Father, that one must grasp how all scripture and holy life of the prophets flowed from the commandments of God, and also remained therein, and even not to bring up any new doctrine, as the false spirits and teachers of men do, against whom they complain and fight the hardest, and want to keep the people pure and clean in the commandment and word of God, and always resist the secondary doctrines 1) and new ways.

The 32nd Psalm.

This is a comprehensive doctrinal psalm that teaches us what sin is, how to get rid of it, and how to be righteous before God. For reason does not know what sin is, and thinks that works are enough for it; but here he says that even all saints are sinners, and cannot be holy or blessed in any other way than that they recognize themselves as sinners before God, and know that they are counted righteous by God without merit and work, by grace alone. Summa, our righteousness means out of German forgiveness of our sin, or, as he says here, "not imputing sin", "covering sin", not wanting to see sin. There are the bright, dry words that all saints are sinners, live and remain sinners; but from this they are saints, that God by grace does not want to look at such sin nor avenge it, but to have it forgotten, forgiven and covered. That; so there is no difference between saints and unholy, they are all equally sinners, and all sin daily; without that; the sins of the saints are not reckoned, but covered, but of the unholy reckoned and uncovered. Those wounds have plasters, and are bound up; but these stand open, and are unbound up. Nevertheless, they are truly sore on both sides, truly sinners, of which we have abundantly testified elsewhere in our books.

The 33rd Psalm.

This is a psalm of thanksgiving that gives thanks to God in general for the blessing that he helps his faithful in all kinds of distress and does not leave them stuck. For he is able to help, since he created everything, and still creates everything with one word, as nothing is impossible for you; so he is also kind and faithful, that he wants to help, and gladly helps, as he promised in the first commandment: I will be your God, that is, I will be your comfort, sleeve,

1) Wittenberger: Nebenlehren.: Jonas: üoiränum.

Salvation, life and all that is good, against everything that wants to be evil to you; for this is called "being God". In particular, however, he gives thanks and praises the mighty good deed of God, that he directs the hearts, thoughts, intentions, anger and rage of all the world, even of kings, princes, 2c. He also finally destroys all their plans, so that they cannot do what they would like to do; and what they intend to do against the righteous, he immediately turns around and puts them to shame. This is a special joy and consolation for his saints, in contrast to the rude and intemperate dread, defiance, and throbbing of the angry nobles 1) and ruthless tyrants, who think that they alone want to devour all the saints of God with dread, and topple God himself from heaven. But before they bring it in half, they lie in the dung. See the Sodomites against Lot, the king Sennaherib, and now our tyrants, how innumerable attacks they have lost so far.

The 34th Psalm.

It is also a psalm of thanksgiving, almost the same as the next one, and (as the title and sixth verse reports) it tells the story of David as a common example for all the righteous, so that they may learn from him how God does not despise the calls of his saints. He also teaches how we should fear God and no one else, and how we should beware of false doctrine, cursing, murmuring and lusting, but should be patient, blessing our enemies rather than cursing them, wishing them well and doing them evil, and thus living peacefully with all people (as much as is in us), whether they are evil or pious. For it is decreed (says he) that the righteous must suffer much; there will be nothing else; if thou wilt be righteous, send thyself also to the cross and to suffering; so it must be. But again it is decided that the Lord will help out of all this, so faithfully that not a single leg will be lost or fall out; even the hairs on the head are all numbered [Matt. 10:30]. For though many of the bones of the saints were broken in the burned to ashes, many also decay in the graves, 2c. but they must come again, and not be eternally broken or called, but be broken for a time, and afterward all become whole again, and more beautiful than they were. And notice that this is the first psalm that says of the angels, how they care for the righteous and wait, that they are not bad with and around us, but like an army and armed warriors encamp around us (he says), pitch their tent, watch and fight for us against the devil and his members. Which is a great and glorious comfort to all who believe it; as the prophet Elisha makes this verse true and clear with his example, 2 Kings 6:17. But this verse is taken from the 32nd chapter of the first book of Moses, v. 1, 2, where the angels met the archfather Jacob, whereof he called the place "host" or "camp", for they were his escorts, and encamped around him for protection, as the Psalm says here.

The 35th Psalm.

This is a psalm of prayer in which David complains against and about the shameful people who deserve the gray skirts at court, namely the hypocrites, who pretend for the sake of their own enjoyment and benefit, and speak what the lords like to hear, denigrate the innocent, incite the lords, and embitter them most vehemently, but suppress the truth, and thus have to inflict heartache, just as happened to David with his king Saul, even through those to whom he had done all that was good and often took great pity for their misfortune, as he indicates here. We may now need this as an example in our time, when our gospel is so disgracefully reviled by princes and everywhere with lies that it is exceedingly so, both in books and sermons. And those do it most of all in whom we have rightly earned all honor and love, so that they come to honor and high, but we are defeated and fall to the ground. Such disgraceful, ungrateful, wicked filth is the grievous belly with its servants. Summa, it goes (as Christ says of his betrayer): "The Eats my bread, tramples me underfoot," and does it for thirty pieces of silver. These are the hypocrites who devour the righteous for the sake of food, as he laments here.

The 36th Psalm.

It is a doctrinal psalm that warns and teaches us to beware of false teachers, heretics, and the spirits of the red, for which he also prays at the end, and in the middle of the psalm he comforts us, that God's word and kingdom should not be overthrown by their ruthlessness, but should stand firm in all the world like the mountains that God Himself has set, and like the deep abysses that are inexhaustible, and that the living and comforting word should nevertheless remain in the house of God. - But he paints them almost masterfully, saying: "There are wicked, poisonous people who, first of all, hold God's word in contempt, and have no fear of God at all, are proud, insolent and sure to teach what they think is good. Secondly, they praise and extol nothing, but themselves, all other teachers they disgrace and denigrate most bitterly; and in that they are masters, adorning themselves alone, and must be nowhere else, no spirit, no God, no church. Third, their doctrine is harmful and vain lies, for they dispute against the faith and doctrine of grace, and deceive people with their false pretenses and lies. Fourth, they are stiff-necked and stiff-necked, suffering neither instruction nor admonition; harder than any anvil is their head. Yes, when they feel that they are to be punished and not praised, they are inflamed and become furious, like the devil. Fifth, they always continue and increase, spreading their thing and growing "like cancer" (says St. Paul [2 Tim. 2:17]). For they do their thing ten times more vehemently and diligently, neither do the pure teachers, as if they would gladly turn all in a day; and there is no celebration nor cessation. In the end, they persecute and torment, wherever they can, all those who do not want to keep up with them; and they do such evil (he says) without hesitation, with all thirst and certainty, as if they were doing God a service.

The 37th Psalm.

Is a consolation psalm that teaches and admonishes us to have patience in the world, and warns

We are especially opposed to envy, because it is especially annoying and hurts the weak believers when the godless are doing so well and the godly are doing so badly. It is a spiritual, great virtue when one sees the great courage that peasants, citizens, nobles, princes and everyone who is able to do something exercise, that he should not curse and wish in his heart for this and that; but must also suffer, and see that everything turns out happily for them, remain unpunished, and even be praised and honored; because of which the godly are also so miserably despised, hated, envied, hindered, plagued and persecuted by them. 1) This means: Here learn to have patience, here keep your heart towards God, and do not let it be displeased; do not let envy move you to curse, to wish evil, to grumble and to look askance; always let go, command God, he will find them well. This is what this psalm teaches, and it comforts with all kinds of ways, with rich promises, with examples, with sorrow; for it is a difficult, great art to show such patience, yet reason and all the heathen count such envy for virtue. For it seems fair to envy and to begrudge the wicked 2) their good will, happiness and wealth.

The 38th Psalm.

This is a psalm of prayer in which he laments his sins, which make his conscience despondent and sorrowful, and make him see nothing but God's arrows, that is, anger, wrath, death and hell; which sorrow consumes marrow, legs, strength and sap, and disguises face, color, all senses and mind. For to really feel sin, and to despair of an evil conscience, is torture above all torture. For this the outward persecutors help confidently, for they chase men into conscience, boast how God stands with them against the righteous; and because God consumes the consolation here, such terror must follow in the heart, as if God were angry with them because of their sin. But still he teaches to hold fast, and not to despair, and

1) "werden" is missing in the first edition and in the Wittenberg.

2) grudge - begrudge. - Erlanger: "do not begrudge". This can also be correct, because "vergönnen" also occurs in the meaning "to begrudge", e.g. Walch, St. Louiser Ausg., Vol. III, 1105,? 208.

resists their boasting with prayer, and rises up in God's promise, and seizes his cause by the right hand, namely, that it is divine and right before God; there then follows again comfort in faith 2c. In the same way, we should pray and not despair in fear, even though we are sinners and feel the burden and storm of sins.

The 39th Psalm.

It is a psalm of consolation, and also prays that God will not let him grumble and become impatient with the wicked, who live so securely and gather goods as if they would not die, while the pious are always afflicted and punished for their sin; and much rather desires that God grant him to think how short and uncertain this life is, than that he should be so secure with the wicked, without worrying about death, and be resplendent. For it is a great vexation, and moves many hearts, that the wicked live in ease and so securely, and the pious must be sorrowful and miserable. But in the end it is found that the very best is forgiveness of sins, and to have one's] gracious God, who helps out of all misery; as he says and asks here.

The 40th Psalm.

It is a beautiful prayer psalm, in which Christ himself laments his suffering and cries out from death. He also clearly proclaims that he alone does God's will and fulfills the law, and that this was written by him in the Book of Moses; and rejects and cancels the old law with its sacrifices and holiness, as if God's will was not fulfilled; and not our work and sacrifice, but he himself and only must do it for us all. Promises therefore and establishes the new testament, since the righteousness of faith is to be preached in great congregations [v. 10], that is, in all the world, and not the righteousness of sacrifices, or of our works, which (he says in the fifth 1) verse) only make hopeful and false saints, as those who do not put their hope in God, nor in His grace, but in their lies and false holiness.

1) In the editions: "fourth".

The 41st Psalm.

This is a prayer psalm in which Christ himself prophesies and laments over his betrayer Judas and his companions, by whom he was to be crucified, and asks that he be raised from death and exalted to the right hand before God. But out of measure it is comforting that he makes himself a sinner in the fifth 2) verse, if he was without all sin; for he stands and speaks there in our person, and bears our sins as if they were his and as if he had done them himself. He praises blessedly those who take care of the wretched, that is, who do not resent the wretched, crucified sinner Jesus Christ, but remain steadfast in him. For it is annoying to believe that such a poor, condemned sinner should rise so high that he would also have to sit at the right hand of God; because of this, the whole Judaism has thus fallen apart, that they still lie torn and scattered, or, as he says in the eleventh verse, are paid by him again.

The 42nd Psalm.

It is a prayer psalm in which he complains about the sadness of the heart, as if God is angry with him and torments him, and must be mocked by the wicked: Where is now thy GOtt? For the wicked cannot refrain from it, when they see that [it] goes badly with the pious, then they must whistle, laugh and mock. Oh, how right it is, they say, for the heretics; and they do not think otherwise, for whoever is afflicted, it is surely a sign of divine wrath; but when they are afflicted, it must be called suffering for the sake of God, and becoming holy martyrs. The perverse, blind and poisonous leaders of the Vlinden do not want to know that God chastises His own, but in turn also comforts them and does not abandon them. But he desires to come to the house of God, and to have comfort from the face of God; that is, he would like to hear God's word comforting him. For "GOD's house" means since GOD's word is, and his "face" is his presence, since he makes himself known, and through his word reveals his grace. This means elsewhere in Scripture, not turning our backs, but turning our faces to us.

2) In the editions: "fourth".

3) In the editions: "tenth".

The 43rd Psalm.

This is just the stroke of the previous psalm, and almost the same word with it; for he also wants to go to the house of God through light and truth, that is, to be comforted with God's word in his sadness.

The 44th Psalm.

This is a common psalm of prayer, in which all the saints, especially in the New Testament, lament how they are persecuted and strangled by the pagans and tyrants, and God gives them up as if he had rejected them; yet he has helped them in time past by great miracles, so that they have no evil cause; yes, precisely for their good cause, that is, for God's sake, they are thus persecuted, as if they had done all evil. Summa, it is the groaning of the spirit against the flesh, which grumbles against God that he judges so wrongly and rules evil (according to reason), makes the pious suffer whom he should help, and exalts the wicked whom he should punish 2c.

The 45th Psalm.

It is a prophecy of the gospel and kingdom of Christ, adorned with magnificent, splendid and mighty words. For he paints Christ as a king, adorned with all royal splendor, that he is very beautiful, well spoken, 1) well adorned, well armed, blessed in war, just, gentle, gracious. Item, have beautiful castles, a beautiful wife, a beautiful queen, and children forever. All of which is spirit, of Christ's gospel, spirit, gifts, church and eternal life, of victory against sin, death, law, devil, flesh, world and all evil 2c. But he also clearly proclaims how the Old Testament should end, for he is called the daughter, forgetting her father's house and people (that is, the synagoga), and worshiping this king for a God, that besides him there is no other God. So give him the honor of the first commandment, which is to worship, and clearly call him the right GOt in the seventh and eighth 2) verses; make of him an eternal king, who in righteousness-

2) In the editions: "in the sixth and seventh".

and take away sin; but the eternal king must be God Himself, of which now is not the time to speak further.

The 46th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving sung at that time by the people of Israel for the miraculous deeds of God, that He protected and preserved the city of Jerusalem, where His dwelling was, against all kings and nations raging and raging, and kept peace against all wars and weapons. And calls, according to the scriptural way, the being of the city "a fountain", as a little water that shall not fail against the great waters, lakes, and seas of the Gentiles, that is, great kingdoms, principalities, and dominions, which must fail and perish. But we sing praises to God that he is with us, and that his word and Christianity are wonderfully preserved against the infernal gates, against the raging of all devils, of the evil spirits, of the world, of the flesh, of sins, of death 2c. That our fountain may also remain a living spring, since those swamps, pools and ponds must become foul and stinking and dry up.

The 47th Psalm.

Is a prophecy of Christ, how he should ascend and become a king over all the earth, without all blows of the sword, but only by shouting, singing, and blowing of trumpets, that is, by the joyful preaching of the gospel; just as the walls of Jericho fell by trumpets and shouting, without all weapons.

The 48th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving, almost like the sixth and fortieth psalm, because it also praises God for the city of Jerusalem, protected and defended by God against kings and princes, who had to leave with disgrace, and let the temple, worship and its word (or rights) stand, so that he kept his promise (as the ninth³ verse sings), namely, that he would be their God according to the first commandment. As we have heard (he says) and believed, so we see and experience it in the city with the deed 2c. We sing

3) In the editions: "eighth".

To preserve him also for Christianity and the gospel against the ravings of kings and princes, who must also at last depart in disgrace, and leave the word.

The 49th Psalm.

It is a doctrinal psalm against the great God of the world, who is called Mammon, and punishes those as great fools who brave riches and do not see that they cannot save themselves from death with them. Therefore, it is better to rely on God, who redeems from death and gives eternal life, since those, like cattle, die and have to leave everything behind, and do not know who will get it.

The 50th Psalm.

This is a doctrinal psalm that explains what the right worship and sacrifices are, against the false saints who consider their sacrifices and merits so delicious, as if God should thank and be indebted to them for them, when He turns this around and wants His blessings and help to be considered so delicious that one should thank and be indebted to Him. And notice here that this Psalm, in bright words, conveys and teaches that calling upon God in times of need and giving thanks is the right service of God, the dearest sacrifice and the right way to blessedness, as the last verse sings. Item, that it is called paying vows (in the fourteenth verse), not the foolish vows mentioned by oneself, but those commanded in the Ten Commandments, especially in the first and other ones, where we vow to God that we will believe in Him, call upon Him, praise Him, and give thanks as our one God 2c. The mad saints and false gleamers know nothing of this.

The 51st Psalm.

This is one of the most distinguished doctrinal psalms, in which David teaches us correctly what sin is, where it comes from, what it harms, and how to get rid of it. For in this psalm, and nowhere else, sin is so clearly shown that it is a hereditary and innate fei, against which no work can help, but only God's grace and forgiveness. He must create us anew through His Spirit and give birth to a new being and creature, otherwise it will be so powerful that it will also destroy the Bones (he says) shattered with terror, despair, until his grace comes to our comfort. After that, when we have become new again by grace and the Spirit, then we can teach, praise, give thanks, preach, and even suffer and carry the cross. All of which he also calls the right sacrifices and worship, and rejects all the other sacrifices that are made without such sacrifices by the great saints; and in the end he asks that for such sacrifices and worship he will build and preserve the city of Jerusalem.

The 52nd Psalm.

It is a comforting psalm, and the title indicates enough what it speaks of, namely of the Doeg, who betrayed David and shed much innocent blood, 1 Sam. 22, 9. 18. These are the traitors and bloodhounds, who blaspheme God's word at court, and revile His servants, inciting kings and princes to shed innocent blood 2c. Against which evil-doers this psalm comforts, and proclaims their reward, that they shall perish from body, goods, house and land; but yet the pious shall remain, and keep God's house and word.

The 53rd Psalm.

It is a doctrinal psalm and prophecy, like the 14th Psalm, because they both have almost the same verses and words. Summa, they both punish the unbelieving saints of works, who persecute the right doctrine and teachers, and at the end he proclaims the gospel and kingdom of Christ, which should come out of Zion.

The 54th Psalm.

This is a psalm of prayer against the persecutors who seek the lives of the pious for the sake of God's word; as Saul and those of Ziph sought David's life for the sake of God's word, that he might be called and ordained king. And ask for help and vengeance upon his enemies.

The 55th Psalm.

Is a Psalm of prayer; and although it would be spoken in the person of Christ against his betrayer Judah (in the 13th and 14th 1) verse), so

1) In the issues: "12th and 13th".

I let him remain a mean prayer, against the French art; these are the evil cats, who lick in front and scratch behind. In front they are such faithful friends, fathers, 1) brothers, sisters, want to put life and limb with us, that their mouth is smoother than butter and oil; but behind it is vain murder, sword, war and all destruction, as he says here. And this is what he complains about in the 14th and 15th verses, that they can go to table, to church, to chambers, to the street, and be the best of companions. Therefore he also curses them, that the devil or death and hell may take them away; for they make great sorrow of heart and sorrowful people. But such a curse is a prophecy that they will certainly be like this, because they do not accept any improvement; or, as the 20. 3) verse says, they will not change, and do not fear God.

The 56th Psalm.

This is a Psalm of prayer in which David laments over Saul and his people, because he had to flee from them out of the country to the Philistines; they pursued him so hard that he could not be safe anywhere. But he consoled himself that he had God's word and promise, and right to the kingdom, though they daily disputed and perverted it, or even denied that he should not be king, but Saul and his heirs. We may pray him against our tyrants, who persecute God's word and us without ceasing, and leave no peace anywhere; but we also comfort ourselves that we have God's word for us, though they daily pervert, dispute, and deny it to us, that we are heretics, and they alone are the true church.

The 57th Psalm.

This is a psalm of prayer, in which David laments over Saul and his courtiers, before whom he crawled into the cave, and is almost of the same opinion as the next psalm, wherefore it is also, like the same, to be used against the tyrants and their poisonous counselors and ear-blowers, who pervert the word of God for us, and have teeth and tongues for such work,

1) So the Wittenbergers: "veter". Erlanger: "cousin". In Latin it is not expressed.

2) In the editions: "in the 12th verse."

3) In the issues: "19."

They are (he says) spears, arrows and sharp swords. But thanks be to God, who does not leave us, and plunges them into the pit they prepare for us, and their counsel goes over their own heads at last.

The 58th Psalm.

This is a psalm of consolation against the stiff-necked teachers, who carry their error through with their heads, plug their ears, and will not let themselves be instructed, but also threaten, and want to devour the pious; but he consoles himself with five parables, so that they will not carry it out, or even bring it halfway; namely: Sometimes a great water comes, and rushes very much, as if it wants to surround everything; but it shoots past, and does nothing. A crossbow is very threatening, but when both arrow, string and bow break, it does nothing. A snail stretches out its horns, but before it pushes, it has pined away, or it is consumed. An untimely child makes its mother's womb large, as if something were about to be born, but dies before it comes to light. A thornbush shoots out with many thorns, and gives pricking and scratching; but before they become hard and ripe, an angry axe comes upon them, and makes them crawl into the furnace and become ashes. So these also have it great in mind, and their thing shall go away, and yet nothing comes of it.

The 59th Psalm.

It is a psalm of prayer, and can be spoken very well in the person of Christ, that he cries out and prophesies against the Jews, how they shall not be destroyed, but shall be scattered abroad, and teach vain cursing and contradicting; as they have always done until now, and have directed all their doctrine against Christ, cursing and denying him. They also have their reward, that in the evening they run about in the city like hungry dogs, and yet find nothing; that is, at the end of the world, from the time of the apostles, they are chased among the Gentiles from one country to another, seeking eagerly and hungrily where they might again set up a kingdom or dominion, but it will not come to pass; they must remain hungry dogs and run about until they lie down unforbidden, and are buried without a kingdom and cast into hell. But he can also

According to the history of David, this can be understood against his Saulites, who finally had to run around without a kingdom, like hungry dogs, until they were exterminated. For Saul's tribe did not regain the kingdom, even though they sought it greedily and diligently.

The 60th Psalm.

This is a psalm of thanksgiving, in which David thanks God for having given him a fine kingdom, in which God's word was taught, and a good orderly government, which is truly a noble treasure. For before David, in Saul's time, it was a torn, desolate regiment (as the first three verses complain), plagued by the Philistines, so that they did not pay much attention to God's ark, 1 Chron. 14, 3, and also went on badly with much injustice, as it must be and go where God is not at home, and David's example shows well how Saul had wicked boys at court 2c. But God left a sign for His own, which they raised up and praised, so that they would be sure and certain of His grace, namely, the tabernacle of Moses and the ark of the covenant with the mercy seat, which He also brought out of the land of the Philistines with great miracles, 2c. before which they prayed and called, and were thus delivered from their troubles. Then he reckons his land and people: first the sanctuary and God's word; then Shechem, Sukhoth, Gilead, Manasseh, Ephraim, Judah, Moab, Edom, Philistim; and finally he confesses that it is not man's thing to have a strong city, that is, to have a good peaceful government, and Edom, that is, to win people and land, and to keep victory in battle, but God must give it. But why he does not name more lands or tribes than the above-mentioned nine, belongs in a Commentarium, not in Summaria. We may sing this, 1) Psalm to the praise of God, that He has spread the Church far and wide in the world, and in many parishes and foundations, where God's Word, and each one has its own special gift.

The 61st Psalm.

It is a psalm of prayer against the enemies, and especially for the king and the authorities, that they may

1) Thus the Wittenbergers. Erlanger: den. - Jonas: illnm.

Fear God and rule well for a long time, so that good rule will not be destroyed by enemy and war. For Solomon also says that because of the sin of the land, many and various princes come. But where there are many lords, there is seldom lack: What one builds, another breaks, according to the saying: Novus rex, nova lex, and yet changes in the regiments have always been dangerous and harmful; but where it remains in a long, old, good nature.

The 62nd Psalm.

This is a doctrinal psalm about the false trust in men and the right trust in God. Many are, when they have the grace of a prince or lord, or the favor of a rich powerful man, they think they are no longer allowed to do anything, and they exercise a lot of willfulness; especially when they see a sloping wall, that is, when they notice that someone without this does not have a good desire at court, or is otherwise poor and persecuted by others, so that he cannot defend himself: Then they all become knights, and court and pretend to the great Hansen, but they do not see how such defiance is vain and nothing, and they do not believe it until they find out how vain it is. Therefore it is said: Trust in God, and do no harm to anyone, that exists before God and man.

The 63rd Psalm.

This is a prayer psalm in which David, when he had to flee from Saul in the wilderness, longed to be in the sanctuary and hear God's word, and complained about his Saulites, who longed for his life, so that he could not come to it, and thus had to be deprived of God's word; although he still boasts of being king because of God's promise and election, so that he can comfort himself in the meantime. Now may those pray this psalm who would like to have God's word among the tyrants, and yet must remain deprived of it, yet should boast of God's children and heirs, because they have faith and love for His word, until Saul gets his end.

2) Wittenberger: "umbs". Erlanger: "umb Lands".
3) "gar" is missing in the Erlanger.

The 64th Psalm.

This is a psalm of prayer in which David prays against his betrayers and slanderers, who made his cause most grievous with poisonous words and wicked wiles, as Absalom, Ahithophel, and their like, and before in the court of Saul, Doeg 2c. But he comforts himself that it will go out upon them themselves, and their tongue will not cut him down, but they themselves, as happened to Absalom, Ahithophel, and also to Doeg. So we also pray against our traitors to the courts of princes, bishops and kings, who carry out all kinds of treachery, intrigues and practices. But it should also (as has often happened) go out over them, so that one must say that God has punished them.

The 65th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving, in which one praises God for giving his word and service, as well as temporal peace, and controls the raging of the enemies and war in the land, which roar and rage like the sea, and blesses the field, so that everything grows well, bears well, grows well. O how strange is such gratitude in the mob! who misuses both of the word, peace and good time for all their will, as Sodom and Gomorrah did. But it will also happen to them in the end, like Sodom and Gomorrah.

The 66th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving for the common blessing that he has often delivered and preserved his people from the hands of the enemy, as he did in the Red Sea. The stories in the books of Judges and Kings are full of this, which he also does for us daily, saving and preserving his own in the right faith, against devils, spirits, sin 2c.

The 67th Psalm.

This is a prophecy about Christ, how he should become king as far as the world is, and judge (that is) the people rightly, rule them with the gospel, that they should be rid of sins, live righteously before him and give thanks with joy, which is the new and right service of God, as is often said. For he does not say that the Gentiles should circumcise themselves and run to Jerusalem, but remain in the Gentiles, and yet give thanks to God, be joyful, and fear him, that is, serve him.

The 68th Psalm.

It is a beautiful, mighty prophecy of Christ, how he should rise from the dead, ascend to heaven, give his spirit, send out apostles, preach the gospel, help poor sinners out of death, comfort the afflicted, destroy the Jews' kingdom and priesthood and scatter them, and establish a new kingdom in which he would be praised and preached daily and not the law of Moses. And call the apostles kings and. He calls the apostles kings and princes of the army or captains of the field, because they war with the gospel against death, sin, the devil, against the wisdom and holiness of the world. Item, he calls them high, fertile mountains, God's inheritance, God's chariot with many thousands 2c. Again, he calls them singers and minstrels among the virgins in song, because they joyfully praise, extol and thank God. And so he has his joyful play over the blessed kingdom of grace and life, and prays at the end that God would preserve such a kingdom, and bless and confirm it until eternity. He was quite merry in spirit when he made this beautiful, rich psalm.

The 69th Psalm.

It is a prayer psalm in the person of Christ, as spoken at the cross and in his suffering, in which he confesses himself a sinner in our place (in the sixth 1) verse), and complains about his crucifiers and blasphemers, who gave him gall and vinegar to drink in his great thirst. (So clearly and evenly he speaks of his future suffering.) After that he prophesies of the Jews' ghastly blindness and hardening and final destruction; how all this happened when we see and grasp. At the last he also proclaims the new worship: I will praise GOD, he says, and with thanksgiving honor him highly. This service should cancel the old one, for it pleases God greatly, neither all the fools, nor what could be offered there in the best way, as he finds here.

The 70th Psalm.

This is a psalm of prayer against the persecutors and enemies of the pious for the sake of God's word, which they do with their fist and with their deeds,

1) In the editions: "seventh".

with advice and desires in the heart, with words and cries, that is with earnestness and all ability after life 2c.

The 71st Psalm.

It is a prayer psalm (of my mind) in the person of all Christianity, from the beginning to the end, spoken against all enemies and temptations. For he especially prays for his old age, when he becomes weak and gray, that is, for the last Christians, when leading times should be, and faith should be struck down with the gospel; as also Daniel [Cap. 8, 12.] proclaims that truth should be struck down, and unrighteousness should triumph; which we have well experienced under Mahomet and Pope. Therefore he praises (in the 15th, 16th, 17th verse) only God's righteousness, which he learned from God from youth or from the beginning. And it may well be a comforting prophecy to us that God's word must come again before the end of the world, so that he again (he says) brings us deep out of the earth and comforts us greatly; as then the common speech among Christians is that Elijah and Enoch should come, and reveal the lies of the end of Christ, and set everything right again.

The 72nd Psalm.

It is a prophecy, almost glorious and beautiful, of Christ and his kingdom in the whole world, where not sin and evil conscience (as under your laws), but righteousness, peace and joy of conscience should flourish and reign; but not without a cross, through which they would have to give up their blood, which would be very precious in his sight. And also proclaims the new worship in the 15th verse, namely calling and giving thanks. One will, he says, pray before him, one will praise him daily. This is our daily sacrifice among all the Gentiles. Here we hear of no circumcision nor law of Moses that the kings and Gentiles should accept, but remain kings and Gentiles, and consider this king a right natural God, call upon him, and honor him. For calling on God in times of need and giving thanks for his help is a service to God, and belongs to God alone, who alone is a helper in times of need and a savior, without whom everything else is nothing, nor does it help.

The 73rd Psalm.

This is a doctrinal psalm against the great offense in which the wicked are rich and prosperous, so that they mock the poor and afflicted saints, as if God knew or respected them nothing; but they and their holy works, what they teach and say, are delicious things, and entirely heavenly, divine wisdom and holiness. This hurts, and I must, he says, be a fool before you, that is, be called a godless heretic and despiser of God. But hold fast, he says, go into the sanctuary, hear the word of God, what he says about them. Look at the old examples in the histories, and you will find that they suddenly come to nothing; for there is no rock nor ground, but only slippery soil.

The 74th Psalm.

This is a prayer psalm against the enemies who destroyed Jerusalem, the sanctuary, and all the schools of God in the land along with the cities, and blasphemed God, as if he could not help his people. It seems that it was a prayer against the future destruction of the Chaldeans, and then by Antiochus Epiphaneus, because only the two times the Temple in Jerusalem and the land is destroyed. Therefore, we pray it against Mahomet and our Antiochus, who destroyed Christianity, tore apart God's Word, Sacrament and all God's order, and preached and held abominations and blasphemies in all places.

The 75th Psalm.

This is a psalm of comfort against the stiff-necked, proud, godless teachers who are so sure and insist on their office that they neither fear nor respect anything, neither punishments nor penalties; as above Ps. 12:5: Who should teach us? We are the teachers, we sit in office, we have authority, we are to be obeyed, or you must be banished and be a heretic 2c. So also now sit our secure rulers, both spiritual and secular tyrants, the red spirits also, that they think that God himself cannot overthrow them; but this Psalm says otherwise, and comforts us that we shall endure judgment, so he will judge, and that

He will make the earth shake and tremble with its inhabitants. But he wants to preserve the pillars, that is, the pious who carry the world, and preserve it, as St. Paul [1 Tim. 3, 15? calls the church a pillar, and pillar of truth. Just as he preserved Lot when he sank Sodom, and the believing Jews with the apostles when he destroyed the Jewish people; for he knows how to preserve his own when he destroys a country.

The 76th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving, like the 46th Psalm, because it gives thanks that God has his dwelling place, word and service in Jerusalem, and protects his people there against the kings and angry warriors who wanted to devour them, like Sanherib; because he knows how to take away the courage of princes and make them despondent. In this way he fights against our enemies. But it is evil to defend oneself against one who takes away one's heart and courage, be he as mighty and as wicked as he will; the devil himself must flee when he loses his courage; what then should men do? Such a warrior and God should be praised, who can thus rumble with kings and help his own without a sword, but only with terror and stupefaction.

The 77th Psalm.

It is a doctrinal psalm, because it is an example of how one should comfort oneself when the sorrow of the heart comes and the conscience is grieved, as if God is angry with him 2c. And in the 5th¹ verse he says that he was so distressed that he could not sleep or speak before it. And therefore tells the same heavy thoughts in the 8th, 9th, 10th² verse. But this is the consolation against rejecting such thoughts (in order to hurt oneself in vain), and instead put into one's heart the thoughts, the miracles of God in the old stories, where one finds that His work has always been to help the miserable, the afflicted, the abandoned, and to overthrow the secure, proud despisers, as He brought the children of Israel out of Egypt.

redeemed. Therefore his ways are called hidden, that he is there and helps, when one thinks all is lost. This is what one should learn. And so this psalm wants to show us God and teach us his way of helping, namely, that we do not despair of God when things go badly, but then wait for help in the most certain way and do not believe our thoughts.

The 78th Psalm.

It is a teaching psalm, in which it teaches us through the examples and history of the whole people of Israel, from the beginning to David, to trust and believe in God, and warns us against mistrust and unbelief, showing the punishment that has fallen on the mistrustful and the grace that has befallen the mistrustful.

The 79th Psalm.

If a Psalm of prayer against the future destruction, done by the Chaldeans and Antiocho Epiphane, is all the same as the 74th Psalm, therefore it is the same summarium. So also Isaiah [Cap. 63] prays for the future destruction 2c.

The 80th Psalm.

This is a psalm of prayer against the daily enemies, the neighbors, who tormented and tore the people of Israel all around, as the Philistines, Syrians, Moabites, Edomites 2c. Just as our enemies and neighbors are doing to us now, the fathers and spiritual orders, and in former times the heretics of the church.

The 81st Psalm.

This is a psalm of prayer and a song that was sung and preached in the fall at the Feast of Tabernacles, to remind the people of the first commandment, that they alone should honor and call upon the God who had led them to the land of Egypt, and no other. But they did not keep it, but all their mouths and teachings were full of idols, when the true God should be full of their mouths, 3) and always speak of him alone. The Psalm teaches us to believe and cling to Christ alone, and not to praise any works for righteousness before God. We shall have their mouths full of Christ alone; but neither do we, each following his own conceit and idolatry.

The 82nd Psalm.

It is a psalm of comfort against the tyrants who oppress the wretched; but it has its interpretation, having gone out from us long ago. 1)

The 83rd Psalm.

It is a prayer psalm, just like the 80th Psalm, as the names of the Gentiles clearly indicate, therefore it remains with the same summario.

The 84th Psalm.

Is a psalm of consolation, praising God's word gloriously above all things, and provoking us that we should gladly lack all good things, honor, painting, joy and pleasure, that we may keep God's word; and should we guard the door, that is, be the least in the temple, nor would it be better than to sit in all the godless castles; and one day here better than a thousand joyful days in the world. For God's word (saith he) giveth victory, blessing, grace, honor, and all good things. Blessed are those who believe it and keep it. Yes, where are they? If one were to blaspheme and despise, the whole world would be full and ready.

The 85th Psalm.

It is a prayer psalm, in which he aborts God's wrath and seeks mercy; but the wrath (of my eighth) has been that there has been a lack of God's word and faithful preachers, as well as of good government, peace and pious authority, and finally, of fruits and good time; for such plagues commonly cling to one another. Therefore, he asks that God would speak again, so that His people would not fall into foolishness and blaspheme with impatience, or seek other gods; and that peace, unity, truth and love would grow among the people, and the land would be fertile, so that they would lead a fine and honorable life in silence and tranquility; as St. Paul 1 Tim. 2, 1. f. also teaches us to pray.

1) This interpretation had gone out in 1530. It is found in Walch, old edition, Vol. V, 1024.

The 86th Psalm.

It is a prayer psalm, and the title itself calls it "a prayer of David". It is easy and clear to understand, that David in his distress calls upon his God against his enemies, who want him dead, be it Saul, Absalom, or whoever they are. But behold, how abundantly and masterfully he praises God in His goodness, faithfulness and power, that He may warm his faith and heat his prayer. So shall we also do. The sign he desires is that God should help him in the end, that God should be said to have helped him and to have vindicated his cause against the fame of his enemies, who defiled his right.

The 87th Psalm.

There is a prophecy about the holy Christian church, that it should become a city as far as the world, and in it should be born Moors, Egyptians, Babylonians, Tyrians, Philistines and all kinds of countries and languages. And all this through the gospel, which was to preach glorious things of God, namely the knowledge of God, that is, how one must come to God, be freed from sins, be saved from death, namely through Christ 2c. And the service in this city should also be singing and jumping, that is, preaching with joy God's grace, praising and giving thanks, and not tormenting and torturing Moses with his law.

The 88th Psalm.

Is a prayer psalm prayed in the person of Christ and all other great saints, lamenting the high spiritual suffering, which is above all suffering, namely the terror of God, which he calls death, the grave and hell; as it is in truth, and makes a miserable and wretched figure 2c. St. Paul [2 Cor. 12, 7] calls it Satan's angel that smote him on the neck, 2) and a stake of his body, whereon he was impaled; as in Greece they impaled the transgressors, and

2) Wittenberger: "jn halsschlaget". The Erlanger has resolved "jn" incorrectly and offers: "in Hals schlaget". - "halsschlagen" is the translation of Ohrfeigen, or as Luther translates 2 Cor, 12, 7: to beat with fists.

The Gentiles blasphemed our Lord and called him 'the impaled one', and the Jews 'the hanged one'. For Christ and his own are due in the world to be mocked for his suffering; just as this psalm also says that his friends and relatives, who should mourn and pity him, are far from him.

The 89th Psalm.

It is a prophecy of Christ and his kingdom, which he calls a heavenly kingdom (as he himself calls it in the Gospel), and takes before him the promise of David about Christ, and sets it forth with a rich spirit, and especially that it should be so certain that it should neither cease nor remain because of any sin, so that our salvation does not rest on our piety, as the kingdom of the Jews is promised, and the kingdom of all the world, no longer nor further than they are pious. But in the 39th verse he prophesies how such a lovely, beautiful kingdom should be trampled, torn and torn apart by the Antichrist, so that it seems as if God has forgotten the previous rich promises and is doing the opposite of His own word. But for our consolation, in these last days, all these things have been proclaimed beforehand, so that we should not despair, even if it seems to us that there is no longer any Christianity on earth. For under Mahomet and Pabbism no semblance of the church has remained, if one looks at its rule, and yet it has had to remain under both, though miserably torn apart and despised.

The 90th Psalm.

It is a doctrinal psalm in which Moses teaches where death comes from, namely from sin, which only God knows and is hidden from all the world, and yet is inherent in all of us from Adam; and shows how a short and miserable life is here, that [it] may well be called a daily death. But, he says, it is good for us to be admonished by this to seek God's grace and help, who will deliver us from all this. For those who do not think of death and do not feel misery remain great fools and do not ask for God's grace or help. And concludes the psalm with the request that that he will show us his work, that is, the remission of sins and death, that is, that he will send Christ, and because we live here, that he will promote our work, that is, that he will graciously confirm and maintain both spiritual and temporal rule. A short, fine, rich and full prayer.

1) Erlanger: "da wohl."

The 91st Psalm.

It is a psalm of consolation, and encourages us to trust in God in all adversity and temptation, and is full of rich, comforting promises, spun and drawn from the first commandment; and is the other psalm, in which the dear angels are proclaimed our guardians and escorts, which is comforting and well to remember. I have just given my opinion of the four temptations mentioned in the 5th and 6th verses.

The 92nd Psalm.

This is a psalm of consolation that praises God's word almost highly, as a noble, delicious gift, against the false saints who dispute it; who flourish for a time, are honored and powerful, but at last perish. The righteous remain forever, and though they come to old age, they never grow old, but are rejuvenated daily by the word of God, which is evergreen and bears fruit; but fools do not understand and respect this, as is happening in our time.

The 93rd Psalm.

This is a prophecy of the kingdom of Christ, as far as the world is, and shall remain forever; though the rivers and waters roar, that is, the world rages and rages against it, and strangles much, yet it does not help it; for he is higher and greater neither the world, nor the prince thereof. Such a kingdom and all things are established by his word, without sword and armor, and the same adorns and sanctifies his house; for this is the right worship that shines and shines in this house, preaching, praising, and giving thanks, where no Moses nor Old Testament belongs.

The 94th Psalm.

Is a prayer psalm, and to my mind it does not lament the heathen, but the kings and princes, priests and prophets, and calls them fools of the people, that is, those who taught and ruled the people foolishly and wickedly. These are the ones who killed and persecuted all the pious prophets and their disciples. And, as he says, they defy God, who would have given them power, and would have stood by them, and respected, nor regarded those who were slain by them, as damned heretics and rebels against all the authorities. Against them he prays, seeking help and assistance, but because he finds none, he takes comfort in his faith that his word and cause is right, and God will not let the harmful chair please him, but will repay them for their lies and murder, amen.

The 95th Psalm.

This is a prophecy of Christ, which the epistle to the Hebrews abundantly describes, that he prophesies of the time of the New Testament and of the voice of the gospel. Summa, he teaches and draws us to Christ and to the word of God, as to the right worship, and warns us of your example of the unbelieving fathers in the wilderness, who also did not enter the promised land because of their unbelief and contempt. But you must draw the whole psalm to Christ, that the 1) fei is the same God whom he exhorts to serve; who created us, and is our shepherd, and we are his sheep. He is the one whom the unbelieving fathers tempted, as Paul also says in 1 Cor. 10, 9. He does not want a Mosaic service, but faith, joyful preaching, praise and thanksgiving instead.

The 96th Psalm.

It is a prophecy of the kingdom of Christ in all the world, in which there shall be joy and praise, and the text itself is clear enough. Here all nations, lands, people, forests, waters, trees are laid up for worship, that they should praise and give thanks that he judges and rules with righteousness and truth, that is, he delivers from sins and all that sin brings, as, death, hell, the devil's power, and all evil. This is the new song of the new kingdom, of new creatures, of new men, born not of law nor of works, but of God and of the Spirit, who are and do wonders in Christ our Lord.

The 97th Psalm.

Is a prophecy of the kingdom of Christ, just like the next one [Psalm]. And the opinion is always that he establishes and has such a kingdom through the gospel; with it he thunders and flashes, and burns his enemies, and melts mountains 2c., that is, he humbles all holiness, wisdom, power and what is great, that they alone must become holy, wise, great and powerful through him, and not otherwise. With these enemies and mountains perish also the kingdom and worship of the Jews, and all things that are not Christ; for he alone shall be, and all other things nothing, as the stone in Daniel [Cap. 2, 34. 35J, torn from the mountain, fills the whole earth, and destroys everything and makes it nothing, and he becomes a mountain in all the world 2c.

The 98th Psalm.

It is a prophecy of Christ's kingdom to be spread throughout the world, like the next Psalm, and also means to be joyful and praise God for His salvation, that is, to preach and give thanks for the redemption given to us through Christ. Here also is the service, not to sacrifice at Jerusalem, but to preach and give thanks that the 2) King in righteousness is in all the world, that is, who redeems from sins and death through Himself, without our merit.

The 99th Psalm.

It is a doctrinal psalm that exhorts the people of Israel to praise their God in Zion, although the Gentiles rage that they should be a special people of God before others, and had to suffer much because of it; for it praises Moses, Aaron and Samuel, who had been the heads of the people of Israel. But he also teaches (as the words are written) the people of Israel themselves, that they should know that the right service of God is not to sacrifice much cattle, but to recognize his wonders and to give thanks 2c. that he makes them godly and redeems them from sins (in the fourth verse). But for us he prophecy of Christ, who rules the right Zion in all the world, and has set his mercy seat and footstool in heaven, over which all the world is angry, becomes mad and foolish, and persecutes and kills the Christians 1).

The 100th Psalm.

Is a prophecy of Christ, and means all the world to rejoice, praise and give thanks; that is, to serve God, and to enter his gates and courts, to call upon him with all confidence 2c. For his grace is an everlasting kingdom, which abides forever.

The 101. Psalm.

This is a doctrinal psalm in which David sets himself as an example of how one should have pious servants and not suffer wicked servants; how he therefore counts the vices and bad habits of a wicked servant, which belongs to be explained in a longer commentary. 2) This he calls "sung by grace and right," that is, how he is merciful to the pious and punishes the wicked, and how a servant should be benevolent 3) and avoid evil. How he fared in this regard is evident from Absalom, Ahithophel, and Joab 2c., for he who wants to make and keep people pious must incur all hatred and envy. Therefore he may well sing and thank God, who has given him such grace and justice; for where there is no God, such a song will remain uncaught, and for it there will be cursing and reproach in the house, and in the court there will be haggling and beheading 2c.

The 102nd Psalm.

This is a psalm of prayer in which the dear old fathers, tired of the law, of sins and of dying, long and call so earnestly for the kingdom of grace promised in Christ; they ask that he would build Zion, and yet 4) prepare stone and lime that it may begin, and let his glory be seen in all kingdoms, and save the captives from sins and death, so that they may come together and give thanks to him, that is, serve in the right Zion, and stop the Old Testament. For apart from Christ there is nothing, but to humble oneself in the way, and to shorten days, that is, a miserable, short, miserable life, in which he would not willingly be taken away. But in his kingdom there is eternal life, and no end of time; for it is he who was before heaven and earth, and made them, and will change and change them again. Therefore he is beyond all time, and his years have no end, neither is there any death. The kingdom we would gladly have (he says), such thy kingdom come, amen.

The 103rd Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving, finely and sweetly made, in which he gives thanks to God for all benefits, such as the forgiveness of sins, the healing of body and soul, the provision of all kinds of goods, making us joyful and confident, delivering us from enemies and hardships; in sum, he who holds himself out to us, who are a frail and loose creature, as a gracious, merciful, loving Father, and does not deal with us according to our sins and merits, but according to his grace and goodness; So far as we know ourselves, and keep his blindness, that is, believe in him, and gladly become godly, and are not proud nor stiff-necked in our holiness and righteousness, which strive hard against the covenant, especially in the first commandment. All these things come to pass in Christ, who promised at that time, and now is come, whose kingdom reigneth over all 2c. For in the end, when he praises the angels, heroes, servants, hosts, who make his word loud, I respect, draw and point the psalm to Christ, his apostles, gospel and church, in which such grace reigns; for everything must happen in Christ, and nothing apart from him, which is blessed and necessary for us.

The 104th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving for all the works other than man that God has created in heaven and earth, how they walk so orderly, surely and wisely in their works,

1) Wittenberger: to pursue and to kill.

2) In later editions: "which we have explained at length in our commentary on this Psalm. This interpretation of the 101st Psalm was first published in 1534. It is found in Walch, old edition, Vol. V, 1172.

Fruits and uses. How then he numbereth them one after another, that the heavens are full of light, and stand without pillars and beams as a spreading carpet; the clouds as a vault, without foundation and pillar; the winds fly without feathers; the angels sent forth come as a wind and flames fashioned 2c. So play and take pleasure in God's creatures, so wonderfully created and so beautifully arranged among themselves. But who respects them or looks at them in this way? Only faith and spirit.

The 105th Psalm.

This is a psalm of thanksgiving, made to the people of Israel, to give thanks for all the ancient miracles that he did for them from Abraham until they were brought into the land of Canaan; as he counts them all one after the other, and concludes with Moses, Deut. 9, 4. ff, that God did not do such miracles for them because of their piety or merit, but because of his covenant and promise, which he had promised to Abraham; for how pious they were, and what they deserved, sings the following Psalm.

The 106th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving in which he confesses all the sins that the people of Israel had committed against God, thus making themselves unworthy of all graces and benefits. Therefore he always boasts that he did it all for his name's sake and remembered his covenant 2c., as Moses also says, Deut. 9, 5. Therefore they can boast of nothing but his grace, just as we all can have no other glory.

The 107th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving for all kinds of help that God shows to all people in their troubles, they are pagans or Jews, which otherwise the pagans have sought from various idols, and we Christians and Turks from various saints so far (and still much). St. Leonhard redeemed the prisoners. St. Bastian drove away the pestilence. St. George helped in the war. St. Erasmus made rich. St. Christopher has been God in the sea and water; thus have all God's help among the saints, as the pagans have among their idols, and stole and robbed them from God, to whom alone this psalm assigns them, and for this is called giving thanks.

The 108th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving, almost also with words like the 60th Psalm, in which he gives thanks for his kingdom 2c. But the first verses draw the psalm to Christ's kingdom and ask that God would establish the kingdom in all the world and thus bring David's kingdom to its right, final, full state, because he had a small, imperfect piece to reckon against the whole world, where it was promised to him to come, as Isaiah Cap. 9, 7. also says: On the seat of David and his kingdom he will sit 2c.

The 100th Psalm.

It is a prayer psalm, prayed in Christ's person, against his betrayer Judah and the Jews, his crucifiers; against them he complains vehemently, and prophesies to them how they must perish and perish horribly in God's wrath; as we see all this fulfilled before our eyes.

The 110th Psalm.

Is a prophecy of Christ, how he should be an eternal king and priest, in addition true God, sitting at the right hand of God, to be declared and recognized. And there is nothing like the Psalm in all Scripture, and it is rightly considered the most distinguished to confirm Christian faith; for Christ nowhere prophesied with bright, dry words a priest, 1) and eternal priest, and thus the priesthood of Aaron is abolished; as then the Psalm is further and more gloriously deleted in the epistle to the Hebrews; for it would be a pity that such Psalm should not be deleted abundantly and mightily among the Christians.

The 111th Psalm.

This is a psalm of thanksgiving made for the people of Israel to sing at the paschal feast by the paschal lamb, in which they learned to praise God and give thanks in a short, fine song for all his miraculous works, especially for the spiritual regiment, priesthood, Easter, law, God's word, peace, justice in the land, help and all kinds of grace 2c., as we have further interpreted it in our Commentaria 1).

The 112th Psalm.

It is a psalm of comfort in which the godly and pious are praised for their good life, and eternal comfort is promised against all evil. And especially he praises in them the hearty confidence and defiance in God's grace, that they are undaunted and undaunted (which is the right, true faith) until they see the wicked and their enemies perish.

The 113th Psalm.

Is a prophecy of the kingdom of Christ, which should go over all the Gentiles from the going forth of the sun until the going down, and calls them to praise God, and to preach his grace; for he is a God of the miserable and afflicted, a lovely and praiseworthy God, who sits so high, and loves and exalts the lowly. For this is Christ's office and work in his kingdom, to bring low the high, to deceive the wise, to condemn the holy, to dry up the fruitful; and again, to exalt the low, to enlighten the foolish, to sanctify the sinner, and to make the barren joyful mothers.

The 114th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving, made for the people of Israel, so that they might praise God at the Easter feast for the miraculous works of God, when they were led out of Egypt through the Red Sea, through the arid, desolate mountains and the Jordan, into the Promised Land. We sing praise to Christ daily, who leads us out of death and sin, through the ravages of the world, [the] flesh 2) and the devil, into eternal life 2c.

The 115th Psalm.

Is a psalm of thanksgiving, in which God is praised for being the right helper-God, and all the others

1) The interpretation of the III Psalm, which is dated Nov. 28, 1530, is found in Walch, old edition, vol. V, 1532.

2) In the old editions: "world, flesh and" 2c.

Gods are vain idols that cannot help. That is why he asks in the first verse: "Not to us, O Lord," 2c. Do not look at how pious and worthy we are, otherwise you will never have to help us, and we would be a people without God, as well as the Gentiles, or as those who also have a helpless God, as they reproach us; but look at your honor and 3) your name, that you are called and praised a right, living, helpful God. You will deal with us according to our name, and not according to our name, since we are called God's servants, sacrificers, singers, fasters and benefactors; 4) for the heathen can also have such a name, and yet it helps nothing.

The 116th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving in which he is joyful and gives thanks that God has heard his prayer and has saved him from the anguish of death and the fear of hell; as many more psalms above speak of such deep spiritual trials, known to few people. He also complains in it how he is in such a bad way because he confesses his faith and the truth of God, and that he proclaims all men's holiness, virtue and trust to be false and nothing. The world does not want to hear this, nor can it suffer it; it is because of this that the pious must suffer, tremble and tremble in all kinds of misfortune. But in all this he comforts himself with the fact that his word is right, and only wants to do it the more. If they give me drink from the cup of their wrath, then I will take the cup of grace and salvation, and drink myself spiritually drunk, and give it (by preaching) to those who will drink with me, and draw such comfort from the word of grace; this is our cup. And with this we serve God, and praise His name, and pay our vows, namely of the first commandment, since we have accepted Him as a God, and have vowed to honor, preach and call upon Him as a God. And find here again that the sacrifice of thanksgiving, preaching, confessing God's name before all the people, is the proper service of God 2c.

The 117th Psalm.

It is a prophecy of Christ, that all creatures should praise and serve him in his kingdom, where all grace and truth, that is, forgiveness of sins, eternal life, and all joy and comfort reign over sin, death, the devil and all evil. It is abundantly enough laid out by us with a commentary. 1)

The 118th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving, and my dear, beautiful Confitemini. What the summarium is, each one may read from his commentary. 2) He gives thanks, but he also prophesies of the Christians, and of Christ, the rejected cornerstone 2c.

The 119th Psalm.

It is a long psalm, in which there is praying, comforting, teaching, giving thanks, with a great deal. But it is primarily made to provoke us to the word of God; it praises the same through and through, and warns us against false teachers, also against overindulgence and contempt. That is why it is to be counted the most among the comforting psalms. For it is truly most important to have God's word pure and to hear it gladly; from this follows prayer, teaching, comforting, giving thanks, prophesying, serving God, suffering and everything that pleases God and annoys the devil. But where it is despised and satiated, all these things remain; and where it is not taught purely, there is much, but vainly false and lost, praying, teaching, comforting, giving thanks, serving God, suffering, prophesying; for all these things serve the devil, who thus defiles them with his heresy.

The 120th Psalm.

Is a prayer psalm that laments and cries out against the false teachers who do murderous harm, and their doctrine pierces through like sharp

Arrows with violence, shot, and spreads, like fire in juniper bushes, which there burn easily and very much, because they are fat and dense, and capable of fire: so the mob is also much more capable of false doctrine (because it rhymes with reason) neither of right truth; as St. Paul [2 Tim. 4, 3.] also says of the itching ears 2c. "Mesech" are the peoples toward the midnight of Jerusalem, since now are almost the Tatters. "Kedar" are the Arabs toward morning, but mean all neighbors and false teachers, as now the Turk, the Christians Mesech (for he came from Tattern), and the Mahomet or Saracen, who are Kedar (for from Arabia they came), and with their Alkoran muffled the gospel, and burned their doctrine far around, devoured and driven 2c.

The 121st Psalm.

It is a comforting psalm, in which he consoles us with his example, that we should remain firm in our faith and expect God's help and protection. For although it seems as if he were asleep or snoring, that the sun stings us by day and the moon by night, it is not as we feel and think; for he is certainly watching over us and does not let the sun sting us to death. We will know this for sure in the end, where we can only hope for it.

The 122nd Psalm.

This is a psalm of thanksgiving, which gives thanks with joy for the word of God, which is given to him in a certain place, as Jerusalem, and through certain persons, as the Levites and kings, and 4) certain disciples, as the tribes of Israel. For what a pity it is to seek God's word everywhere and to find it nowhere, the children of Israel experienced with their running to the idols, and we with our running to pilgrimages and running to monasteries 2c. But our Jerusalem is the holy church, Christ our temple, place, altar, mercy seat, before whom, and from whom, and with whom we should seek and hear his word.

4) Wittenberger: from.

The 123rd Psalm.

This is a Psalm of prayer against the proud and proud of heart, who despise and mock God's word and His people; which not only the Gentiles did, who considered God and the worship of the children of Israel to be a fool's work, even to be error and rebellion; but also they themselves among themselves, the idolatrous idolaters 1) and false teachers with their multitude, proudly and surely despised and mocked the small multitude and the right doctrine; as the 12th and 14th Psalms lament above. and 14th Psalm also lament. And now our nobles and the spirits of the mob, who are both holier than the gospel itself, mock and trample under foot the poor preachers and faithful servants of Christ, without what our pagans, the spiritual lords, and their mob, do. And so we must be full of contempt everywhere; but God is and will be gracious to us, amen.

The 124th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving, in which he thanks God for protecting this poor little group against the tyrants and the desolate, and rescues them from the snare of the poisonous blasphemers and slanderers; both of whom are so many, and so great, as great, deep waters and floods of sin against the little group. But even if their teeth were so wicked and angry, and their cords so cunning and poisonous, God is still greater, and smites out teeth, and breaks cords, and helps His own from them, as we still experience daily with ourselves.

The 125th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving in which he gives thanks that God finally does not suffer the ungodly teachers and rulers to have power over those who believe and teach correctly and hope in him, so that they will not finally become too weary and fall from the word to those, but will do everything good to those who hope in him; but the apostates with their crooked ways he will expel and drive out both master and pupil in one heap. We have seen and experienced several examples of this in our time with the spirits of the rotten.

1) Idolaters Idolaters. Jonah translates "idolatrous idolaters" by idolatry.

The 126th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving for the redemption from the prison of Babylon, made afterwards or before (as a prophecy, for the comfort and hope of the future redemption, so that they would not despair), is the same. In the end, he concludes that the saints must suffer before they rejoice, just as the world must rejoice before it receives its suffering. Therefore the saints must sow with tears, then reap with joy; but noble and precious (he says) is such seed that brings forth such fruit. But for weeping it cannot be seen that it is so noble and worthy in the sight of God, who holds it so dear that even the death (which is the most shameful, most cursed seed in the sight of all the world) of his saints is more treasured than all the world's treasure and goods.

The 127th Psalm.

It is a doctrinal psalm, for it teaches that worldly government and stewardship are gifts of God alone, and are in his hands. For if he does not give peace and good government, no wisdom, order, strife or armor will help to keep the peace; if he does not give happiness with wife, child and servants, all care and labor is in vain 2c. More about this in the Commentaries, where it is well brought to light. 2)

The 128th Psalm.

This is a psalm of consolation in which the marital state is gloriously praised, and the spouses are highly comforted that they should not look at the toil, work, unpleasantness and other hardships they must feel and experience in it, but at the gracious will of God over them, that their state and being is His gracious creature and blessed by Him. Therefore he is dear to them, gives them much more happiness and salvation than they can ever have, if only they believe in it, if they put themselves into it properly and remain pious in it. Therefore he says in front and in the midst, "He who fears the Lord." It is no wonder that the wicked are in trouble.

2) The interpretation of this psalm (from 1524) is found in Walch, old edition, Vol. V, 1860.

3) Erlanger: Ehe-Stand.

The 129th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving, in which the people of Israel give thanks for the manifold deliverances he has often done from the beginning; as it is written in the book of Judges and Kings, that they were often oppressed by the Gentiles, who kept them hard under them for a long time, and thus made the long furrows on their backs, and overstretched them in the yoke and ropes, until God raised up a Savior for them, and delivered them from their plowmen together with the yoke and ropes. In the end he wished them (that is, prophesied to them) that all their enemies should wither and die away, as has happened. For all nations have passed away, but Israel has remained. So all the Gentiles and the enemies of the Christians are still like the grass on the housetops, which grows and grows green as if it were going to do much; but it withers before it ripens, and bears no fruit, and there is no blessing in it. And the heathen, and the heretics, and all manner of enemies, though they rage and rage, at last they vanish, leaving no seed nor sign behind them; but Christians abide for ever.

The 130th Psalm.

This is a Psalm of prayer that is based on true Davidic devotion and understanding, for it confesses that no one is righteous before God, nor can he be righteous by his own works and righteousness, but only by grace and the forgiveness of sins that God has promised. On this promise and word he builds and comforts himself, and exhorts all Israel to do likewise, and to learn that with God is the mercy seat and salvation, and Israel must be delivered from all sins through him alone, and not otherwise, that is, "through forgiveness" (otherwise it would not be grace) to become righteous and blessed, otherwise he would remain in the depths and never exist before God. Behold, this is a true master and doctor of the holy Scriptures, who has understood what is said: The seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent, Gen. 3, 15, and by thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, Gen. 12, 3 and Cap. 22, 18, 22, 18. Therefore both promises and prophecies of Christ are contained in this verse: "He will redeem Israel from all their sins." The whole psalm is based on this verse.

The 131st Psalm.

This is a doctrinal psalm against the proud, hopeful saints, who are confident and presumptuous of their great worship and holiness, and do not count on forgiveness, as the previous psalm says. As if to say, "I cannot soar so high and thunder so high with my holiness as people do who build on themselves. For as often as I wanted to do so, and did not base my heart on God's grace and still it, that is, let it rest, it happened to me as a "weaned child", I lost the teat of promise and grace, cried out day and night, and had no rest in my conscience. Therefore I conclude: that Israel and everyone trust and hope in God, and rely only on His grace; do not let this teat be taken from you, I advise you, for the promised and future Christ is in it.

The 132nd Psalm.

This is a prayer psalm in which Solomon, or the people of Israel, prays for the preservation of the priesthood and kingdom; that is, he prays for spiritual and temporal government, for God's word and temporal peace; for where the two stand well, there it goes well. And in the eleventh verse he begins to tell how such a prayer was not only heard, but how God also promised both beforehand with an oath that he would 1) keep both kingdom and priesthood at Jerusalem, and himself dwell there, and give all blessings and grace there, and put their enemies to shame, as far as they also keep his commandments and are obedient to him. But why he calls the place of God's dwelling "Ephrata" and "field of the forest" in verse 6 is too long and belongs in the Commentary.

The 133rd Psalm.

It is a doctrinal psalm, that one should live in harmony and kindness among themselves, both in the spiritual and temporal state, having one doctrine, one right, and that one should help the other to bear; as the two parables give, one of the balm flowing down upon Aaron's head into his beard and garments; the other of the dew flowing down from the mountains of Hermonim.

1) Wittenberger: "and" instead of: that he.

1) on the mountains of Zion. Where it is like this, God dwells gladly with all grace, blessing and life; but where there is disunity and mobs, there dwells the devil and death with only misfortune.

The 134th Psalm.

It is a doctrinal psalm, in which he teaches and admonishes the priests and ministers of their office, that they should serve God faithfully and diligently, praise God day and night, preach and practice His word; as St. Paul also says to Timothy [2. Ep. 4, 2. 4.], he should continue with his office faithfully, regardless of the fact that many despise it and turn away from it to fables 2c. For where one abandons God's word, both spiritual and temporal government must fall by the wayside, at least into error, and be abandoned by God into the power of the devil. But where one stops with preaching, he who created heaven and earth always gives blessings, and for the sake of his word he helps and gives all good things even to the unworthy and ungrateful. Let the psalm be sung to you pastors, preachers, bishops, and whoever is in spiritual office.

The 135th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving, and means that the priests give thanks, preach and praise God in His miracles, shown to the people of Egypt and Canaan, so that they do not forget God, and seek idols or other gods, as it goes and must go, where one does not always drive and diligently stop with preaching and praising God, as is said in the next psalm. But if God judges (in the 14th verse) His people, that is, preaches, teaches and punishes, He is certainly gracious to His servants; but where His word is silent, and He neither judges nor teaches, there must certainly be great wrath and disfavor. Therefore, you servants of the house of the Lord, think and preach diligently about God and His works 2c.

The 136th Psalm.

Is a psalm of thanksgiving, and is almost the text he indicates to the priests what they should sing and preach about, namely about GOD and his

1) Wittenberger: "and the dew from the mountains of Hermonim to the mountains of Zion."

Miraculous deeds, how he is gracious and merciful, and a true savior. Therefore, in each verse he repeats the words: "His goodness endures forever"; so that he may immediately tell them that they should preach only grace and not the work of men or the teachings of men. For man's work and word had not done such wonders for them, nor was their merit to blame, but his mere grace and pure goodness, which gives everything. Gives, gives, he says, and gives freely. And Christ is also hidden in the piece. Such a doctrine keeps pure faith and right understanding of grace and forgiveness of sin among the people, in opposition to the rats and trustworthy works saints 2c.

The 137th Psalm.

This is a Psalm of prayer in the person of the captives of Babylon, for Jerusalem, that is, for God's word and spiritual rule, which lay so utterly destroyed, that it is only right to assume it in the highest, and above all with the godly, as this Psalm shows. Although Babylon and Edom rejoice greatly at such destruction and make a mockery of it, which is painful, they shall not carry it away unpunished and unpunished, but shall be torn apart again in such a way that even their children shall be destroyed and they shall have no descendants, and yet Israel and God's word shall remain forever; as happened to Babylon, and will also happen to our Edomites and Babylonians, who are now rejoicing and mocking the poor broken churches, and [the] destroyed word and ministry of God. 2)

The 138th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving in general for all kinds of help from the enemies, and desires that Christ's kingdom come, and also kings should accept His word and teaching, and give thanks for it, and do right worship, and learn that Christ's kingdom is, sit high, and help the lowly who are in distress and anguish, comfort, save the sinners and the wretched; and concludes with prayers that God would not leave such a kingdom and work begun, but accomplish it forever.

2) Erlanger: and destroyed God's word and ministry.

The 139th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving in which he praises God for having provided him so wonderfully, and for still governing him in all his works, words, and thoughts, and where he 1) stands, walks, sleeps, or wakes, yes, even in his mother's womb, before he was created, was with him, how he should be formed, and how long he should live. As if he were to say, "It is in no man's art or power how he should live, do, speak, think, where and when, whence and whither he should come, but all is purely God's work and art. What do the wretched wicked do, who do not believe this, but want to be pious themselves with their annoying works? They want to have done what they do, and want to have merit, glory and honor with God from it, yet they cannot make a word of themselves, cannot grasp a thought from their own strength, do not know what they make, how they are created, how they live, speak and think. If all that we are and do is God's work and art, why do men presume on the high work of making themselves pious, boasting of free will, and wanting to work themselves out of sins and death? 2c. Such cannot speak rightly of God and His works. Protect me, Lord, from this, and test me, and discipline my heart, so that I may remain on the right path, which endures forever 2c.

The 140th Psalm.

This is a psalm of prayer against the proud, unrighteous saints, who not only put many cords and troubles in the right way, against God's word, but also threaten and rage with violence against all those who do not praise and follow their error. Then he prays that their wickedness not go away, but come over their own heads, and be done to them as Pharaoh was done in the Red Sea, whom the weather smote into the sea and drowned; so all such wicked mouths shall be overthrown, and the 2) righteous shall abide before God forever.

1) "he" is missing in the Erlanger.

2) "the" is missing in the first edition and in the Wittenberg.

The 141st Psalm.

It is a prayer psalm, and asks that he be protected from the ungodly teachers, who are friendly and give smooth words, where dread will not help. It is better for me (he says) that the right teachers punish me and condemn my righteousness than that they praise me. And even though I am in a bad way, suffering crosses and death, and must be torn and torn, I will rather trust in the Lord; for their hypocrisy will at last break my neck over a rock, that is, suddenly overthrown, and come to an evil end. Then it will be seen how bitter their sweet doctrine is, and how sweet my sour doctrine; there their own doctrine will bring them, in which they will be caught as in their own net, but I will pass by freely.

The 142nd Psalm.

It is a psalm of prayer for a prisoner among false teachers who force him from the right faith and life. For this was common among the people of Israel every day, that they persecuted and condemned the right prophets for the sake of the right worship and word; as all their histories show, and Christ Matt. 5, 12 and Cap. 23, 34. ff, St. Stephen Apost. 7, 52. Therefore it is no wonder that many psalms are made against such false prophets and teachers, because it has been so common, and has been practiced in the church from the beginning, even ever since, that God may well be asked to guard against false teachers and error. The history of the time of Elijah and King Ahab and Jezebel shows a fine example of this Psalm, since all the prophets had to hide and go into hiding, and in Ari's time all the orthodox bishops also had to leave; for the devil does not want to suffer God's word and His servants.

The 143rd Psalm.

It is a prayer psalm in which he asks for mercy and forgiveness of sin in the anguish of his conscience. To what misfortune are almost driven the enemies of grace, the lawmakers, who mostly plague the afflicted, stupid consciences, and drive them into darkness, that is, into misery.

doubting and death, with their heavy burdens and infallible doctrines of works, none of which they themselves touch with a finger, as Christ says Matt. 23:4. But here the Psalm shows that it must be grace that does it and not law, before which no living man can stand; as all the old stories and works of the Lord also testify. For all the holy fathers of old he helped out of love and grace, and not out of right, as St. Peter also says Apost. 15, 10. 11.: "Neither we nor our fathers were able to bear such a burden, but I hope to be saved by the grace of Christ, just as they were." Such works and old examples (he says here) I look at, and comfort myself, because they as well by pure grace (as Abraham himself is called out of idolatry, Joshua 24, 2.) are comforted and saved from sins, as I, and have been sinners as well as I, and does not apply here any [man's] boast 1) of righteousness or holiness, as the false prophets plague us.

The 144th Psalm.

This is a psalm of thanksgiving to be spoken for kings and authorities; for David hereby thanks God as a king who had to wage war and rule, and confesses that all victory, happiness and salvation in battle and regiment is God's gift, and not man's strength nor art, as little as man's wisdom is, to keep people under him in compulsion, to rule land and people well. For what should a man be able to do such great works, if he is nothing, and passes away like a shadow? But the Lord does it, he flashes and gives despondent, frightened hearts in the army, and humble hearts in the people; so when he touches the mountains and great multitudes, that they must fear him, then good is warfare and government, so victory and happiness follow, and such fear; how else can a man accomplish it? Then he also pleads against his own people and punishes their unbelief. For the people of Israel, because they had the glory of being called the people of God, were proud beyond measure, stiff-necked, disobedient, rebellious, stingy, envious, unbelieving, as they both were against Moses and David and other kings.

1) Jonas: Uegue, M tiie guisqnm Zlorletur etc..

proved well. And even though they saw that David had done miraculous deeds and ruled as Moses did, they were no better and asked nothing about God or faith in God. If we had beautiful children, houses, cattle, great goods and good days, we would be a blessed people. And there were prophets enough who taught that God's people were those who were well off, but those who were not well off were nothing in the sight of God, just as all the saints are not well off because they trust in God. Now that you have delivered me from the sword of Goliath the murderer, and have often given me victory like other kings, protect me also from this godless, wicked, false people, who respect neither God nor kings, and ask nothing of what is necessary for a ruler in war and peace. They are peasants and felons, yes, real swine, who seek nothing but their belly, and it is harder and more dangerous to govern them than it may always be to get them. He calls them strange children, because they want to be the noblest children of God, and yet they are strangers, and worse than heathens; Bastards they are, who honor God with their mouths, and their hearts are far from him 2c.

The 145th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving for the kingdom of Christ, which was in the future, and almost drives the high work of praising God, praising his power and kingdom. For Christ's kingdom and power is hidden under the cross; if one did not praise it by preaching, teaching and confessing, who could think anything of it, let alone know? But his power and kingdom is such that he helps the fallen, takes care of the miserable, makes sinners righteous, the dead alive; yes, he is the one who feeds everything, who hears the cries of his saints, does what they desire, protects them 2c.

The 146th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving, and at the same time teaches that one should trust in God, and not in princes or men, as the troubled world, flesh and blood, is wont to do; for it is God alone who can faithfully help in all kinds of distress, and helps that [it] is called helped. Man's help is miserable and does not last long, because he himself is not sure of his life for an hour.

The 147th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving for many blessings and miracles of God. First of all to Israel and Jerusalem; then to all who are in need; who also gives rain and growth to all animals, and does not let a bird go hungry, not even the useless ravens; but much more to men, especially to those who trust in his goodness and not in man and grate. For Jerusalem and Israel have the advantage of having God's word and God's service above all the nations; therefore he also does more miracles with them, and the daily miracles, such as rain, snow, ice, etc., are more widely recognized there than with the unbelievers, who do not have or do not respect God's word. Therefore, they cannot see any work or miracle of God, even though they daily feed on it with all five senses, rummaging and feasting, 1) like swine; for they know nothing of God, because they neither hear nor respect His word.

The 148th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving, in which it praises God and admonishes all creatures in heaven and on earth, but especially His saints, the children of Israel, who serve Him, that is, have His word and worship. And notice that this Psalm confirms all ranks created by God to be good and praiseworthy, as kings, judges, old, young; for where kings and judges are wicked, and God is displeased, one could not praise God in them. But where kings and judges are, there are also subjects, servants, executioners, warriors, craftsmen, farmers, citizens 2c. Where there are old and young, there are husbands, children and household servants. All are praiseworthy and valid, and indicate that their Creator is good, and all should be cheaply vain tongues, and all preach such great goodness of God forever. But if you want to know how good every thing is, take before you the one you want and say: If there were no fire; item, if there were no sun, if there were no executioner, if there were no woman 2c., then you will see why one should thank God.

1) fretzen - to take their grub.

The 149th Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving for the blessing that God is gracious and merciful to His people, and they know how they have a gracious God, of whom they are glad, and is the blessing or grace called forgiveness of sin, that God will not avenge how wicked and sinful they are. Therefore, this psalm actually belongs to the New Testament, and he himself calls it a new song to sing to the king Zion, whom they should praise in their camps, that is, in their churches, where they come together; as Isaiah calls the churches and altars camps or beds, in which Israel committed fornication, that is, idolatry. Item, this is also of the New Testament, that they should have sharp swords in their hands to punish the heathen, to put kings in stocks and towers, and to execute vengeance, as it is written (for this is Jewish, yes, rather Mahmetic and Turkish) 2): Now this is the vengeance promised in the Scriptures, that Abraham's seed by the gospel, the spiritual sword, should put down idolatry in all the world, take captive all kings and wise men holiness and wisdom, and subdue them to Christ; as Paul says 2 Cor. 10, 6.

The ISO. Psalm.

It is a psalm of thanksgiving, first of all, made for the people of Israel to praise God with, that they have his sanctuary, the feast of his power, that is, his dwelling place, heaven and castle in Jerusalem, where he shows his power with miraculous deeds, and therefore calls the Jewish string plays and music, with which their praise and worship was directed. But among Christians, the preaching and gospel is all such music and worship. And notice that all psalms of thanksgiving are vain promises to the afflicted, miserable consciences, and thus say much that God is gracious, and gladly forgives all sin, and wants to give all comfort, that one should provide oneself with all good and all comfort to Him. Therefore, it is an obvious! It is therefore an obvious psalm of thanksgiving, but at the same time also secretly a psalm of consolation, and even a doctrinal psalm and a prophecy, as it proclaims God's grace with an example, and teaches to trust and believe in Him. May the same help us Luther's work on the first 22 Psalms (operationes in psalmos). *) 1519-1521.

Newly translated from Latin.

Luther's Preface to the Students of Theology.

Brother Martin Luther wishes salvation to the students of theology.

I know, dear theologians, that there will be no lack of people who will accuse me of presumption, yes, of the already ingrained vice of vain doctrine, because at this time, when the sciences are in the most beautiful bloom, I am not the only one,

I shall appear in public and in such a way that I let myself be seen as an interpreter of the books of the Holy Scriptures, which are probably the noblest and most difficult, namely the Psalter and the letters of Paul, especially since I am found by scholars to be a completely unskilled person, but by others I am found to be

*) After Luther had given lectures on the Psalter for the first time in the years 1513-1516 (Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. VIII, Preface, p. V), he began to read anew on the Psalter at the urgent request of his listeners (letter to the Elector) (De Wette, Vol. I, p. 279). In the second volume of the Latin Jena edition, toi. 1, it is reported that Luther began to recite the oprcnrtionss on the first 22 Psalms in the month of March 1519, but stopped in May 1521, when he traveled to Worms. About July 1521, he had completed in his Pathmos what he had left of the 22nd Psalm. He had let it go out piecemeal, each time two sheets of two leaves (per sinAulns ckuerniorres). Jn these statements of the Jena edition is a twofold error, as the Weimar edition, Vol. V, p. 5, has explained. Luther did not begin his lectures on the Psalter in March 1519, but probably about three quarters of a year earlier. "In a copy of the Erlangen University Library, on the second title, which follows the Prefaces, there is the note in the same hand: Inoüoatu8 3a teria post Reminiscere [March 22, 1519/ We will not be mistaken if we see in this an indication of the date on which the first owner got the book in his hand and began reading through it. This date, however, is 5 days earlier than that of Luther's dedication to the Elector, which is dated March 27, 1519. Already on April 3, 1519, Melanchthon sent Lang a part of the print (6orp. Rek. I, Sp. 76). It probably comprised the first five psalms." The other error is obvious, because Luther did not leave Wittenberg for Worms in May, but already on April 2, 1521. - The third statement of the Jenaer, that Luther had completed approximately in July 1521 what he had left of the 22nd Psalm, we can correct according to the Weimar edition to the effect that Luther at the time of his departure to Worms had stopped at the 19th verse of the 22nd Psalm (Ps. 22, K 264 in this volume). In a copy of the library in Dresden, there is a simultaneous hand to the passage that begins with the words: Vcnirrus acl xurpuronmthe remark: Unettznus ea in xsnlmos eäiäit Ruterus ante Vor- inaeiensi prokectionem kacta sunt. Rostrema ejus praeleetio contiMt in die Veneris saneta, turn euni nos Vitenber^ae paseüa istUie eelebratnrri NMrenius.... Ruteru Vormaciam proteoturo. [Jn this note it seems to us very strange that Luther should have lectured "on Charfreitage" (March 29); if these were sermons, we would of course find it all right]. On Jan. 13, 1521, Luther had finished the 21st Psalm (Erl. Briefw., vol. III, p. 172, note 7), and in February he wrote to Pellican that he had the 22nd Psalm under hands (in this volume at the end of the 21st Psalm). At the Wartburg, Luther was immediately intent on continuing his work on the Psalter, and as he wrote to Amsdorf on May 12, had (Walch, old edition, vol. XV, appendix, no. 70), he has already asked D. Schurs and Prior Helt to send him the necessary books; on May 14, he says in a letter to Spalatin (Walch, old edition, vol. XV, appendix, no. 68, tz 4) that he will continue with the Psalter as soon as he has received what he needs from Wittenberg. On May 26, he was still without books (Walch, old edition, vol. XV, appendix, no. 79, K 2); but already on June 10, he wrote to Spalatin that he had already sent off the 22nd Psalm to be printed (Walch, old edition, vol. XV, appendix, no. 74, Kl). He finished the 22nd Psalm only for the printing, but did not resume the lectures. - The last statement of the Jena edition, that the printer gave up the sheets individually, is well founded. Therefore, not a single complete copy of the original edition is known. Even in the most complete one, which is in the Erlangen University Library, two quires of four sheets each (pp. 213-220 and pp. 265-272) have been added by hand. The Dresden library owns two copies, which complement each other in a fortunate way. It is mentioned several times that the book printer suffers damage due to sheets that are left behind or also due to a lack of individual sheets (Luther's letter to Lang of Jan. 26, 1520. Erl. Briefw. II, 305. (Walch has here "remain empty" instead of "remain lying," Vol. XXI, 668, s 2) and Luther's letter to Spalatin of I. Nov. 1519, Walch, old ed. vol. XV, appendix, no. 46, s 3s. Luther intended, as he states in the above-mentioned letter to Laug, to organize a better equipped edition in the Lotthersche (Walch, I. o. "Lutherische") Officin; however, nothing came of it. This first edition, published in quarto by Johann Grünenberg in Wittenberg, has the title: "Operationes. F. Martini L. in Dsnlmos, VittsuksrAonsib. tUeolo^E kntljiosik pronnointukl". On the back of the title follows the dedication to the Churfürst, 'then Melanchthon's preface and at the conclusion of the same: Vnitsndor^ne in 8nxonibu8. Norme Nnrntio. Xnno NDXIX. on it tue Zuschrift an die Studierenden der Theologie. Twice a complete conclusion is made within the work. At the end of the fifth psalm are the words: "V VittonberAus anno Domi. M.D.XIX", from it a blank page; likewise at the end of the tenth (according to the counting of the Hebrew Bible: the eleventh): "VVittenbsrßno por Todnn. Elrvnon s-bsr^s. Xnno Domini M.D.XX." This edition is in quarto. At the end of the whole work, neither printer nor place nor year is indicated. From this we see that the first five Psalms were published in 1519 (probably already in March 1519 (Wenn. Ausg. V, 5s), the following five (according to the Vulgate count) in 1520 ("about the beginning of the year" (Wenn. Ausg. V, 5s), the others in 1521. The interpretation of the 22nd Psalm also appeared in quarto in the latter year at Wittenberg, printed by Grünenberg. Already in 1521, Adam Petri organized a reprint in Basel, in which Conrad Pellicanus (then Guardian of the Franciscan convent, later Lector at Basel) was involved (De Wette, Vol. I, p. 553). Luther learned of this and was prompted to say several times that he would have preferred that this reprint had not been made. On February 17, 1521, he wrote to Spalatin (Walch, old edition, vol. XXI, 747, Z 4): "Adam Petri (Dotmm) at Basel prints my Psalter, which I would rather not have seen" (nostonn). In the postscript to the 21st Psalm, he asks the printers not to distribute these interpretations further "until he himself or another has improved some gross errors (orrores)." In these words we find the solution of the concern which De Wette (Vol. I, p. 554) expresses in the introduction to Luther's letter to Pellican: "Strange that L. is dissatisfied with the Basel printing of his Psalter in: Bries to Spalatin of February 17." Seidemann also says (De Wette, vol. VI, p. 568, note 4) from the same misunderstanding: "Luther was dissatisfied with the first edition, which appeared in March." In February Luther could not express his dissatisfaction with this edition, since it did not appear until March, but he only spoke out that he did not wish the Wittenberg edition to be reprinted ""improved." At the end of February (we consider this time determination of D. Enders, Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 92, which the Weimar edition also accepts, to be the correct one; De Wette datirt: "January or February"; Seidemann-De Wette, vol. VI, p. 568: "In March or April") Luther sent from Wittenberg (not: "Ex Pathmo", as the German Wittenberg edition (1553s, vol. III, p. 276d and after it the Altenburger, vol. II, p. 750, the Leipziger, vol. V, p. 184 and Walch, vol. IV, 1623 indicate) a letter to Pellican, in which he asks him to make various corrections in the Psalms, which he indicates to him, if the said Psalms should not yet be printed. The printing, however, was already so far advanced that at least the first two improvements requested by Luther could no longer be made, Probably mainly for this reason, one hastened to bring what had already been completed (which otherwise might have become difficult to sell) into the market as quickly as possible, and published the first edition, which contained only the first thirteen (14) Psalms, in March 1521 under the title: Nnrntini Dutüeri pino ao cloctuo in Dsulinos ope-ntion^s. From the title page follows an address to the reader, in which the richness and excellence of the book is praised. Because it is of such quality, not only according to him (Adam Petri), but also according to the judgment of all scholars, he publishes it, although it is not yet finished (nksolutum), since he fears to sin against the welfare of the church, if he would keep it longer in the house. The rest is already under the press, and the reader has something to read here in the meantime until the other is ready. At the end of a postscript by Adam Petri, which is similar in content, is written: "Dx m'äidus naeis LnsiWns, Xn.no domini, M.D.XXI, nmimn Nnrntio." On the evening of March 28, the papal legate Aleander in Worms received a copy of this first Basel edition from Frankfurt. He wrote about it to the vice-chancellor Medici, Worms, March 29, 1521 (D. Theodor Brieger, Aleander and Luther 1521, p. 117): "Luther has published a commentary on the first thirteen Psalms of David, printed at Basel, with an epistle before it by one von Sconnenberg, who, as he says, is a recently arrived man (ßoruo nuovo) and not a nobleman (nodilo), but full of cruel venom against Rome, against which he agitates Germany, to which he gives the

This „clo LoonnorliborZ" Aleanders is llälriionsDnrMeu " (Ulrich Hugwald from of Thurgau), then a young man of 25, who in 1521 from Schoneuberg (which Aleander seems to have taken for his name, the other names for given names) addressed an enthusiastic preface "to Germany, the noblest and most Christian nation," which was prefixed to the first Basel edition. Seidemann (De Wette, vol. VI, p. 568) and the Erlangen edition, "xeMtwä opsru, tom. XIV, p. III and VI, call him the scilitor of this edition. - Already in the month of August of the same year, a second edition of our writing appeared with Adam Petri, which not only contains the psalmcinterpretations of the previous edition improved in the way Luther had desired, but also the ones still missing up to the twentieth (21st). After the interpretation of the 20th (21st) Psalm follows Luther's postscript (complete), from it an address of Adam Petri to the reader, at the end of which is written: "Dx aockibus inem, IN6N86 XnÄrmtö Vnni Vieebimi primi." On the last unfolioritcn sheet is printed the already mentioned letter of Luther to Conrad Pellican (Delieano). In addition to Luther's preface to the students of theology, Luther's letter to Prince Frederick, and Melanchthon's preface to the students, there is an index before the interpretation of the Psalms, which (in two columns) takes up thirty folio pages; nevertheless, it is preceded by the remark that one should not be misled by the brevity of the index into thinking that the book is not exceedingly rich (pinAnissiinnr ssse). In the following year, Petri also published the 22nd Psalm especially under the title: „M. Dntüeri Dnondrntioneg in p "alinnin XXI. Dsns cksus inens oto. Hui est äs passion" COristi. . . In toino oporationuin nupor oxcmno obinissug." At the end, "Damlao apnck Xckamum IVtri Ä.nno Al.v.XXII." The aforementioned Basel editions appeared in folio, only this one in quarto. In October 1523, the printer Johann Grünenberg in Wittenberg published a separate edition of the interpretation of the 22nd Psalm in octavo under the title: Oporutio in Dsalinum XXI Dsu" Don" insus Älar. DntU. VvittoidorÄue. 1523. at the end: imprint VVittsnlu-rÄu" por ckoUamioin OrunenderÄ. Anno Äl.D.XXIII. Älonss Oot. - These interpretations on the first twenty-two Psalms were then included in the Latin collective editions, and are found: in the Wittenberg (1549), Dorn. III, cok. 131d (with the remark: ckain tortio rooop;uirtn"); in the Jena (1566), Dom. II, toi. 1; in the Erlanger, "xoÄotiea opora, Dom. XIV-XVI, and in the Weimar one, vol. V p "r totum. In the first two editions mentioned, the Psalms have the Hebrew count, as in our Bible; the Erlangen edition, like the individual editions mentioned before, has the Vulgate count, except that (because in the Vulgate the ninth and tenth Psalms are contracted into one) the second part of the ninth Psalm is also erroneous on the heads of the pages Vol. XV, pp. 137-187 with the superscription: Dsulinus kceoiinn", and page 188 the tenth Psalm (according to Latin counting) as Dsulmns nnckooiinn8. In the Jena edition, Melanchthon's Preface to the Students has been omitted. Luther's Preface to the Students is in the Erlanger and Weimar editions after the repetition of the title immediately before the interpretations, in the other editions immediately after the title before the other prefaces. Because Walch also inserted other prefaces here, we have retained the order he chose. - Luther's postscript to the first 21 Psalms, in which, as already mentioned, he asks the printers not to further distribute these interpretations "until he himself or another has improved some gross errors," is incomplete, precisely with the omission of this most important passage, in the lat. Wittenberger, Dom. III, lol. 367d; in the Jena, Dorn. II, 225 d; in the Leipzig, vol. V, p. 184, and in Walch, vol. I V, 1620. - The postscript to the 22nd Psalm, in which Luther again complains that his interpretations are reprinted, and the expositions he has to make of the previous editions are publicly displayed, has been moved away from its original place at the end of the 22nd Psalm in the German "Gesamtausgabe. In the Wittenberg edition, vol. III, p. 276, it stands as a "Sendbrief Luthers an den christlichen Leser" behind the interpretation of the 112th Psalm; in the Altenburger, vol. II, p. 690, in the Leipziger, vol. V, p. 185 and in Walch, vol. IV, 1624 it is placed before the 22nd Psalm. We have returned the same to its place. Luther's letter to Pellican, which is (complete) in the Basel edition after the 21st Psalm, is found incomplete in the Latin Wittenberger, Dom. III, col. 398b after the 22nd Psalm under the superscription: "Dutboru" uruioo suo X." Similarly in the German Wittenberger, vol. III, p. 276 after the 112th Psalm with the superscription: "D. M. Luth. an seinen lieben Freund N.;" in the Altenburger, vol. I I, p. 750 after the 22nd Psalm; in the Leipziger, vol. V, p. 184 and in Walch, vol. IV, 1622 after the 21st Psalm. In all these German editions, it is incomplete, under indeterminate superscriptions. We will leave this letter in its place after the 21st Psalm, but give it in its entirety according to the Basel edition. Printed from the Basel edition, this letter is still found in Niederer, Nachrichten, 1, 189; in Strobel-Ranner, p. 80; in De Wette, Vol. I, 554 and in the Erlangen edition, Briefwechsel, Vol. III, p. 92. - The "Operation"" in paalmos are also translated into German. We get a reliable account of these translations only through the Weimar edition. First, a fragment of the 5th Psalm (Ps. 5, 12.) seems to have appeared in Upper German translation, which has the title: "Von der Christlichen Hoffnung ein tröstlich leer für die kleinmüthigen Martin Inthers über on ein den leisten [i.e., about the penultimate] verh des fünfften Psalmen" 2c. Without place, time or printer, in quarto. Three different editions of this print are cited.

I have come to regard honor as a disgrace, wealth as poverty, or anything by which one man can serve or harm another, as commonplace temptations.

Welcher Sachs in Erfurt published a translation in octavo in two parts with special titles, but continuous signatures, the first of which contains a translation of Ps. 13, 1, the second of which contains a translation of Ps. 5, 12 (independent of the aforementioned edition, also limited in scope). The title of the first part is: "Vom Glawben, Was er sey 2c. Vnd wie die Cerimonien gehalten oder verlassen sollen werden. Doct. Mart. Luth. at Wittenberg. In Psalmo. xiiij," The title of the second part is: "Was Hoffnunge sey, Vnd warauß sie komme 2c. Williche gute werck sehn. Von anfechtunge in gütlicher Versehung vnd Verzweiflung 2c. Doct: Ma: Luth. Wittenberg. In Psalm, v." These two parts were also printed by Gabriel Kantz in 1525 in the same format and with the same arrangement. In 1524, a piece of the 22nd Psalm (Ps. 22, 7. 8. 19.) was also published by Welcher Remminger in Augsburg, translated by Nicolaus Mair in Nuremberg under the title: "Bonn dem hailigen leyden Christi, wie nur das zu der Zeit vnsers sterbens brauchen sollen" 2c. Quart. - In the same year, at Freiberg in Saxony, the Franciscan monk Lorenz Sörer preached on the 22nd Psalm according to Luther's interpretation. He refused the request of some listeners that he publish Luther's work in a German translation, because it was too difficult and time-consuming for him. Then Valentin Einer, a painter at Freiberg, turned to Stephan Roth in Wittenberg on October 6, 1524, with the request that he translate this psalm for them. Noth did this "with Luther's favor and approval," as he says in the dedication to Einer, which is dated Martinmas 1524. On November 30, Einer thanks him for the letter and on December 11 for the psalm. The printing by Joseph Klug in Wittenberg is in octavo; in some copies dated from the New Year's Day 1525, in others only from 1525. A reprint appeared in March 1525, with the title: "Der zwey und zwentzigste Psalm Davids von dem leyden Christi. Vmm ckeus meng. Doct. Mart. Luther. Wittenberg." The dedication to Einer is signed: "Stephan Rodt von Zwickaw". - After that, Roth first began the translation of the 5th Psalm, also "with Luther's permission", which he dedicated to the mayor Hermann Mühlpfordt of Zwickau on April 1. Previously, he had intended to dedicate it to the wife of Duke Heinrich of Saxony, but Einer informed him on February 6 that she would have to refuse because otherwise she would have to fear the disfavor of her husband and especially of her brother-in-law, Duke Georg. The title is: "Der Funffte Psalm David, Widder die Heuchler vnd falsche Propheten. Of hope and branching. Was. Luther. Wittenberg. 1525." Octav. At the end: "Printed at Wittenberg by Hans Lufft. 1525." On May 6, Einer heard that this Psalm had been translated, and asked Roth to send it to him when he went out. (Cf. Ermisch, the letters of Valentin Einer in the "Neues Archiv für sächsische Geschichts- und Alterthumskunde" V, p. 321 ff.) It was not until 1527 (not 1524, as was previously assumed) that the first nine Psalms in Roth's translation appeared for the first time. The fifth Psalm, which was published in 1525, is included in this collection unchanged. The title is: "Das Erste Teyl der Lateinischen auslegung des Psalters, Doctor Martin Luthers. Verdeudschet by Stephanum Rodt. Wittenberg 1. 5. 27." Octav. At the end: "Printed at Wittenberg by Joseph Klugen. Am 1527. Jar." 2c. The 22nd Psalm is not found in this edition, but only in the previously mentioned separate editions. Roth did not translate more than these ten Psalms, although Luther speaks of his 22 Psalms in his preface to Roth's translation, and the latter promises the translation of the other Psalms at the end of the 9th Psalm in a postscript. These, however, were translated into German only in 1730 by the Leipzig M. Johann Jakob Greiff, Candidate of Theology, for the Leipzig edition. This settles the concern that Elias Frick expresses in the German edition of Seckendorf's Historie des Lutherthums: "I am highly surprised, however, why only the first nine and the 22nd Psalm are to be found translated in the Altenburgische Theil, since Luther expressly writes in the preface: he has been pleased that this man (i.e. Stephan Rodt) has put his 22 Psalms into print in German". Roth has omitted Luther's and Melancthon's prefaces to the "oxoratio", but has prefixed Luther's preface and his own to his (Roth's) translation, Luther's preface to the first Psalter translation (in this volume, Col. 1), and his "short instruction on how to read the Psalter usefully" (which we have already discussed in the first note to the first manuscript of this volume) to the interpretations. Roth's translation is not only extremely free, as he himself says in his letter to Einer: "But first I want to tell you, and all readers of the text, that I have applied myself more to seeking understanding and opinion from it than to giving word for word, so that we may also serve those who are eynfelt", but also very incomplete. He leaves out all the sections in which linguistic explanations are given. Of the interpretation of the third Psalm, about the third part is missing, of that of the fourth about half 2c. At the beginning of the 9th Psalm, he completes a section that takes up four whole pages in the Erlangen edition (Dom. XV, x. 67-71) with the words (Wittenberger, Bd. III, Bl. 196d): "Die auslegung des titels dieses Psalms magstu im latin besehen, da sie nach der lenze gehandelt wird, Ich Halts one not dem einfeltigen Leien dieselbige hie zu eiⁿelen." Greiff's translation of the remaining Psalms, from the 10th to the 21st, contains, as we have demonstrated in the preface to this volume, many gross, meaning-distorting errors. Thus, these existing translations are not sufficient for our edition, and we have had to decide to re-translate this extensive work, which in the Basel edition (without the 22nd Psalm) occupies 449 folio pages. Roth's translation is found in the collective editions: in the Wittenberg (1553), vol. III, p. 72d; in the Altenburg, vol. II, p. 520; with Greiff's additions: in the Leipzig, vol. I V, p. 430 to vol. V, p. 246 and in Walch, vol. IV, 264. As a title we have chosen, because Luther himself, as he expresses in the letter to the Elector, did not want to call this work "explanations" or "interpretations", but rather operations, "Arbeiten über die ersten 22 Psalmen" ("Works on the first 22 Psalms"), which also distinguishes this work from the following one: "Kurze Auslegung über die 25 ersten Psalmen" ("Short Interpretation on the first 25 Psalms").

Luther's letter to the Elector of Saxony.

JEsus.

Brother Martin Luther wishes salvation from the Lord to the most illustrious Prince and Lord, Lord Frederick, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, Duke of Saxony and Margrave of Meissen, Landgrave of Thuringia, his most gracious protector.

Those seem to do wisely and rightly who dedicate and ascribe their learned works and the products of their mind to great lords, for by this artifice they achieve for their works both reputation and protection against an adverse fate (which is particularly hostile to them), since what men undertake generally tends to be so that the better it is, the more it is subject to the envy and the furious persecution of malicious people. Hence it comes that both the good sciences and in general that which is based on understanding and learning (since it is beyond dispute that they are very good and worthy of an exceedingly good and special care of man) need in no small measure such people as a Mäcenas and Augustus, yes also a Ulysses, who beat these blasphemers (Thersitas) with the ivory rod. Some have also

This reason for their dedication, that they perpetuate and make famous the names of those to whom they ascribe [their works], having in mind at the same time that they incite the descendants to the same virtue, and inculcate by example that which they praise. Some have the purpose of showing gratitude, and to some extent to repay the good deeds [received], and to give those by whom they have been well received a testimony of their grateful disposition. But for me, Most Serene Prince, none of these reasons exist; first of all, because I know very well that what I accomplish through my work is not of such a nature that it deserves a patron. And in this respect it is not bad for me that I am at least not ignorant of this ignorance of mine. Even if I could still accomplish so much that would be worthy of a dedication, I would not then be anxiously concerned that it would be preserved by a high patron (patrono). Yes, after I have learned from the holy Scriptures how terrible and dangerous a thing it is to let oneself be heard in the church of God and to speak in their midst, of whom it is known that they will be our judges on the day of the last judgment (for before the present ver-

Psalms" is clearly distinguished. Luther's preface to Stephan Noth's translation (which is not found in the Erlangen edition) and the "short instruction on how to read the Psalter in a useful way" (of which the Erlangen edition, vol. 37, p. 248 erroneously says that it "does not yet appear in any complete edition") have been left in our edition, as has Walch. About his oporationos, Luther says in later years, as Mathesius indicates in his Tischreden (Lösche, ^, nalseta, p. 75, No. 52): "There is still an immature theology in it, although the doctrine of justification and against the pope is faithfully pursued. But the Hebrew Grammatica is not quite inside." In contrast, Jonas, speaking disparagingly of his commentary on the Psalms to Luther, said in 1532: "It is of the Holy Spirit; I like it." (Preger, Tischreden Luthers nach den Aufzeichnungen Schlaginhaufens, p. 28.) We translate according to the Erlangen edition, which brings the first Wittenberg printing, but compare the second Basel edition, the Wittenberg and the Jena. - After we had completed the entire translation, we were also able to compare the Weimar edition before going to press.

leumdem I do not fear at all), and that in the presence of God, who sees all things, since the angels watch and all creatures see and hear and incline their ears to the word of God (for it is fitting that one should believe in such a way that everything [that is there] behaves reverently toward the word of God, by which it was made; (and all do so) except man and the devil, who have become deaf through their ingratitude), I would truly have no greater wish than to be allowed to remain silent, indeed, that everything I have ever blabbed about would be erased. It is something hard and frightening to give GOtte an account of any useless word. For it is only obedience to a foreign will, yes, to God's will, that sustains me in the office of the word; as I have always had an aversion to it, so I have never entered into it with my will until this hour. Secondly, what fame, what praise, what immortality of your name could be hoped for by me for you, most noble lord, since you are such a prince who, both by other truly princely gifts and by a very special love for the sciences and learned people, has brought about such a great name and fame that even an Appion could not make an immortal name for you, but you for the Appion and all who praise you. Who does not know that Prince Frederick has become an example to all princes in the promotion of science? In your city of Wittenberg, the Greek and Hebrew languages are taught with great success. The liberal arts are taught with better skill than before; the truthful theology of Christ triumphs over the opinions and questions of men, who neither mean nor ask almost anything. All this is flourishing by your order, at your expense, through your protection. Would God that the ecclesiastical high lords, who in these matters should primarily precede the secular (laicis) princes as models, would at least follow the example of the laity! For such an evil end has come to the wealth and power of the church. But furthermore: What thanks could I possibly give for your exceedingly rich welfare?

what you have done against me, all of which you have done to a person who deserves nothing? At your expense, the badge of honor 1) is placed on my stupid (insano) head, which forces me to appear in public (ostentationis meae), of which I am ashamed; and yet it must be worn, because those whom I am obliged to obey want it that way. But how great worries, troubles, costs, yes, even dangers have brought you, most gracious Lord, my whimsical trade (monstrum), which has arisen for me from the indulgence! Your whole country knows that my prince has had much more concern for my sake than I myself. I have started the game of my own accord (aleam jeci), and have always been ready to dare and expect the utmost. For I hoped that on this occasion, relieved of the teaching of others, I would find a corner for myself and could leave the public, which I hated. But you, most gracious Lord, persevered in your benevolent conduct (officium) toward me, and although I wished to suffer what those [my enemies] fiercely desired to inflict upon me, yet neither of them accomplished what they sought.' But the end is not yet here. But in the meantime it pleases me that it has come to this end, especially because it must be exceedingly grievous to every Christian that some impudent people in the Church of Christ should presume on so great a thing as to succeed in their shameful desires under the name of the venerable authority of the Church. And the kinder, better, more learned a pope is, the greater abominations (portenta) these godless deceivers promise themselves to put into work under his name. For with how many blatant lies have they profaned and defiled the holy name of Leo of the title in this one very small matter, in order to frighten a very small monk (fraterculum) and to fortify their atrocious tyranny! But it is not so strange that there are people who desecrate the name of the pope and use it uselessly. Their forefathers have done the same, the false prophets, the false apostles, the false Christ, who even forced the holy name of God and Christ to serve their lies. Therefore, by God's miraculous providence (dignatione), both the honor of the Roman Church has been preserved completely pure and 1) the reverence for the Pope has been preserved. Only the scheming people (sycophantis) were countered quite nicely and successfully, so that they finally learned that God still lives and reigns, who mocks the mockers. This God, I say, and our Lord Jesus Christ, who alone has in His hand all that we admire in you, most noble Prince, may He look upon it, increase it and preserve it for eternity. So I offer you my prayer instead of my thanks, since I am not able to do anything else.

Therefore, that I have wanted to publish these my works (operationes), they may now be what they want, "works" they are certainly (for I have not dared to call them explanations [interpretationes] or interpretations [commentaria], because I am very well aware how weak they are²⁾), under your name, most gracious Lord, I have had no other cause for this than my love. For I have experienced how pure and chaste your heart loves the holy Scriptures, and my heart (to use the words of Deborah. 3) loves such princes [Richt. 5, 9.]. And why should I not tell what I think here, namely the reason of this love of mine, so that those who boast with the title [of a teacher] of the holy Scriptures may see how great a difference there is between a hypocrite and a true theologian. The excellent father Johann Staupitz, who is truly to be highly admired by me in Christ, once told me: "When we were talking with you, most gracious Lord, the subject of those who speak publicly to the people came up. Then you said, according to the admirable sharpness of your judgment, that the speeches based on the acumen and the statutes of men are extraordinarily cold, and lame and ineffective to persuade in our affairs, since nothing is so sharp as this.

The only thing that can be put forward with such great majesty and effectiveness, even without our efforts, is the sacred Scripture. But it is the holy Scripture alone that resounds with such great majesty and effectiveness, even without our effort, that it immediately removes and nullifies all artifices of objection (disceptationis), and urges and compels that one must say: No man has ever spoken like this. Here is the finger of God, for he does not teach like the scribes and Pharisees, but mightily. Since he [Staupitz] would have been more than happy to agree with this judgment and to pledge the same, you offered him your hand, demanded that he give you his hand, and then said: "Dear, promise me that you will always stick to this opinion. I beg you, is this not a word and a saying that would adorn even the holiest and highest bishop, and all the more so since it is clear that it was not only spoken in words but also from the heart? How? Do we not yet see who the right theologians are? Finally, the theologians and jurists should be ashamed of themselves, especially those for whom the Holy Scriptures are almost something ridiculous, and who, with their countless cobbled-together glosses, perniciously smear the mouths of those who want everything they say to be regarded as the Word of God (as St. Jerome also complains), as if Christ had said to Peter: Command, or command, or teach, and not rather, "Feed my sheep," that is, set before them that by which they will be fed; but they are fed by the word of God alone, not by the opinions or statutes of men. Furthermore, how rightly you said that nothing can be put forward in such an astute way that it cannot be overturned again, is abundantly taught by the miserable treadmill, 4) in which the Scotists, the Thomists, the Albertists, the Modernists, and all these again divided into their particular sects, waste time. I confess, most noble Prince, that I have been completely inflamed with love for you by this exceedingly lovely story. For I do not know how

4) Erlanger: xristinum instead of: pistrinum.

It comes about that I cannot but love those of whom I hear that they love the holy Scriptures, in turn to hate the traffickers and despisers of the same, in such a way that I am all too vehement on both sides out of impatience, which is peculiar to love, and, as those, my good friends, accuse me, mordantly and gloriously. But they may accuse me as they please, they may attach to me both evil and good names, whether this be done in the first or in the second, or even in the third intention or rather enclosure 1)(lest I verse it in anything in their dialectic): the cause of theology itself they will never take from me, nor even extinguish the love of it, if Christ be gracious to me. I know what scholastic theology has done to me, I know in turn what I owe it. I am glad that I have been torn out of it, and I thank Christ, my Lord, for it. It is not necessary that they teach me the same, I know it; nor that they try to bring it close to me, I do not want it.

Therefore allow it, most noble prince, and I ask you to credit it to my love that I wanted to have this booklet go out under your name, most gracious lord. Now I am already reading the Psalter for the second time in your city of Wittenberg at the urging and request of my dear listeners, and I cannot deny that I owe them this. But I interpret it in the opinion (ita profiteor) that I do not want anyone to expect from me what none of the holiest and most learned fathers has yet been able to accomplish, namely, that I understand and teach the Psalter in all things according to its right sense. It is enough to have understood some of the Psalms, even only in part; the Holy Spirit reserves many things so that he may always have us as disciples. Much he shows only to entice us, much he teaches to move the heart (afficiat), and (as Augustine aptly said) no man ever spoke in such a way that he was understood by all in all things: much more has the Holy Spirit himself the [full] understanding of all things.

understanding of all his words. Therefore, I must freely confess that I do not know whether I have the right understanding of the Psalms or not, although I do not doubt that the understanding I teach is a true one. For also all that St. Augustine, Jerome, Athanasius, Hilarius, Cassiodorus and others have gathered about the Psalter is quite true, but at times very far from the literal understanding. And also this second lecture of mine on the Psalms¹ is quite different (lovZe lategue) from the first, and there is also no book in Scripture which would have cost me more trouble; until I have come to the conviction that one must not reject the interpretation of any man, if it is only godly, if one does not want the same to happen to one (träionis loZo), and one's own interpretation to be rejected again. He has missed some things, but you have missed many; I see some things that Augustine did not see; again, I know that others will see many things that I do not see. What is left, then, but to stand by each other, and to give some credit to those who are lacking, since we ourselves have either already fallen or will fall? So that we may not be counted among the exceedingly bad and repugnant class of people who, although they can accomplish almost nothing that would not be reprehensible, nevertheless, if they, like a briar, can seize an outstanding interpreter even by a trifle, immediately hope for the most glorious (l>0mpchLN08) triumphs. I know that he must have a very shameless stupidity who should dare to say publicly that he has understood even one book of the Holy Scriptures in all its parts. Yes, who would dare to claim that even one psalm has been fully understood by any man? Our life is a beginning and a progress, not a completion; the best interpreter is the one who has come closest to the spirit. When I have reached the moon, I should not immediately think that I have also reached the sun, but I should not proudly despise even the lesser stars. There are stages in life and action, why not also in understanding? The apostle says [2 Cor. 3, 18.], "that we may be transfigured from one clearness to another." And that I may speak to the matter, I serve only those who do not know these things, and who wish [that I should speak to them about them]; then at least the benefit will spring from the fact that I have brought this about, that in the meantime I have occupied myself and my hearers with better studies, than if I had put (creassem) over the books of sentences 1) new obscurities and frogs and gnats into the world. But this book, according to my judgment, has a different content from the other books. In the other books we are taught by word and example what to do; this book not only teaches, but also gives the way and the custom how we should fulfill the word and follow the example. For it is not our work to keep the law of God.

1) Sentences were called sayings of the church fathers. The main collector of them is Petrus Lombardus, magister ssntsnariiw, died in 1164. On the basis of his five books other scholastics wrote extensive commentaries. The most important of them are: Alexander of Hales, docteur irrekrumdlis, d. 1245; Thomas of Aquino, docteur anMiieus, d. 1274, and John Duns Scotus, docteur sukllis, d. 1308. Cf. Walch, old ed. XVI, 1386, § 154.

or follow Christ's example, but we must ask and desire that we do so and follow; but when we have attained it, we must praise and give thanks. What is the Psalter but a prayer and praise of God, that is, a book of songs?

Therefore, because the precious Spirit of God, the Father of orphans and teacher of minors, sees that we do not know what or how to pray, as the apostle says [Rom. 8:26. When the Father of orphans and teacher of infants sees that we do not know what or how to pray, as the apostle says, and wants to help our weakness, he does like the schoolmasters who write letters or little speeches for the children to write to their parents, and equips us through this book with words and attitudes with which we should address the heavenly Father, and ask for what he had taught in the other books, that we should do it and follow it, so that man may lack nothing that is necessary for his happiness. So great is the care and goodness of God toward us, who is blessed for ever and ever. May you live and prosper in him, most gracious Lord, here and forever. Amen. Wittenberg, March 27, 1519.

Philipp Melancthon's Preface to the Students of Theology.

To the students of theology, Philip Melancthon wishes salvation.

I wish you, theologians, and indeed all of Christendom, happiness that the sciences, and especially those that serve godliness, have increased in an extraordinary way in a short time with happy success, indeed, have been reborn, although in the meantime those to whom we owe the fall of the sciences and false theology, which consists of opinions, have unceasingly opposed it and worked against it with fire and sword. And especially we should recognize and revere the heavenly benefit with a godly sense, through which, as it seems to me, the church, having now served as a captive of Babel for almost four hundred years, has at last been able to gain some hope that it will attain Christian freedom. For, if I am not mistaken, there has been no more urgent and general evil in the church than this, that we have almost abandoned the evangelical writings and learned the sophisticated ones, and have lingered so long over the statutes, collections of cases of conscience (formulis casuum and sums, 3) as they are called, that not even aged people have found time to occupy themselves with the teaching of Christ. For I dare not say how the schools have departed from much of the apostolic way of life, so that they have made the exceedingly wholesome commandments and the symbols of true Christian peace the same.

3) Cf. Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 97.

The same is true of those who have forced us to change the order among the number of the [evangelical] councils, and others of that kind. But from these, by God's grace, we are freed by those who bring the true and original theology back to the bright light. To Erasmus of Rotterdam we owe the study of the Greek as well as the Latin language, we also owe him, to pass over more, the explained edition (lectionem) of the New Testament, 1) we also owe Jerome to him. To Reuchlin (Capnioni) must be attributed, besides many other things, the Hebrew. Special praise is due both in Greek and Hebrew to Wolfgang Fabricius and Johannes Oecolampad. Andreas Carlstadt has refuted a number of cold school opinions as conscientiously as carefully. 2) And what am I doing mentioning individual people? Everywhere many things are written by the best men, by which good souls can be brought back to evangelical studies. I believe that those do the most good who deal with the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures, and among these especially 3) those who explain such books as are most necessary to the people but least understood. I do not say this as if I did not think equally highly of all sacred and canonical books, but because some are read more frequently by the people, and some are of such a nature that they can serve as an instruction or instead of an interpretation for the others. As, among the Pauline epistles, the purpose (scopus) of the epistle written to the Romans shows, as it were, like a signpost (Atticus Mercurius) the way to the others: so both the use of the people and the order of the contents give some books an advantage over the others. Otherwise, all have the same prestige. In this way, the Psalms are generally preferred to the other books of Scripture, not only because of their public use in the church, but also because they touch on almost all of sacred history. Then they often bring prophecies of Jesus the Savior, of the calling of the Gentiles, of the Church of Christ in such clear sayings (carminibus) that David also far surpasses the other prophets in this laudable piece. Finally, as from the historical books the knowledge of the events and the law is obtained, so from David's writings the meaning (vis) and effect of history, which awakens our hearts by the harmony of the Psalms and, aroused by a powerful urge, carries them away to the heavenly things. And the Psalms have, as it were, this noble way (^-rc<") about them, that they apply the examples of sacred history to calm our minds in all things. For what is the use of knowing that the world was created by God, as the first book of Moses indicates, if you do not worship the Creator's mercy and wisdom? Then, what good would it do you to know that God is merciful and wise, if you did not also firmly believe that He is merciful to you, just towards you, and wise for you? And that means in truth to know God. But this highest level (extremam rationem) of the knowledge of God has not been attained by philosophy, it is peculiar to Christians. But this sweet knowledge (suavitatem) is instilled in the godly hearts by the spirit of the Psalms, and this heavenly harmony, which the spirit of God brings about. It is nothing that the pagan antiquity praises to me its poetic works (epodas) or the songs of Orpheus; the sounds of this harp are quite different, which connect the hearts of men with heaven in such a way that they transform them completely into something divine. Therefore, Martin Luther has explained these sacred songs by an interpretation, which we want to have recommended to the students all the more for this reason, because, although other writings on David's Psalms have been written by others, still few hit the right sense (referant faciem). He who will carefully compare everything with the old [interpretations], and indeed with the best ones, will learn what Luther has achieved in this. However, dear readers, it is up to you to accept Luther's faithfulness and diligence, and to direct your efforts toward bringing a pure heart to the reading of these interpretations and to tame human prejudices (affectibus), in short, to read Christ's writings under Christ's guidance. Fare well. Wittenberg, Saxony, in the month of March, 1519.

Foreword D. Martin Luther

to the translation of the first nine Psalms by M. Stephan Rodt.

1527.

To all my dear Lord and brothers in JESu Christo Martinus Luther.

Grace and peace in Christ Jesus, our Lord and Savior. Some years ago, I undertook to read the Psalter here in Wittenberg, so that I might bring forth into the light such a fine, lovely book, which at that time lay hidden deep in darkness, and also practice myself the more in the Scriptures, and make myself more certain. But since I read the same Psalter, after which Christ bestowed His grace upon me, up to the 22nd Psalm, the persecutions of the papists chased me away, and I had to stay in Worms and Wittenberg, so that I could not bring the work to an end, and much more necessary business fell through that it has remained until now. 1) Afterwards, Christ chose others in my place, as Mr. Johann Pommer, 2) and many more, who were such my hindrance not only with the Psalter, but also with other books (GOD

3) that the error and persecution of the papists has done them no good, but has been useful to us and all the more harmful to them.

But because some also desire these 22 Psalms, read and interpreted by me, I have allowed myself to have them translated and printed by M. Stephan Rodt, who has been with us, experienced our way of teaching and speaking, and practiced in our theology. Therefore, he can bring it to light better and more clearly than other foreigners who may not be around us.

If there is anything in it (as I hope there is not a little) that can strengthen and improve our faith in Christ, for which I have worked the most in it, accept it with thanksgiving and praise to our Father in heaven, who has mercifully given it to me, through his dear Son Jesus Christ, whom he has also made known to us at this last time, according to his great goodness and mercy, and through him brought out of the abominable darkness of human doctrine and works, to whom be praise and thanksgiving, honor and glory forever and ever, amen.

Brief instructions on how to read the Psalter in a useful way.

D. Martin Luther.*)

1525.

1. the Psalter has the virtue above other books of holy scripture that it not only teaches all kinds of good things and presents examples, but also shows and instructs in the most refined way with chosen words how one should keep and fulfill God's commandments, i.e., how a heart should be prepared that has right faith.

and how a good conscience is to be held against God in all contingencies, how it is to be comforted and uplifted. In sum, the Psalter is a proper school in which one learns, practices and strengthens faith and a good conscience toward God.

(2) Therefore you see that there is no psalm that praises God's faithfulness, truthfulness, and truthfulness.

*This is (Weim. Ausg., Vol. V, p. 11) the closing word added to the Psalter in "das dritte teyl des allten Testaments" in 1525, which Roth refers to as "Ein ander Vorrede".

salvation, word, righteousness, and thus exercises the conscience in faith in God, so that one must grasp to fulfill God's commandment in sincere faith, in comforting confidence in His grace, and in joyful conscience in His mercy. Such a heart, which is of good courage in God, is the one that does and suffers all of God's will freely and with pleasure.

(3) But you also see the cross in all the Psalms; there is lamentation and crying out against the persecutors, punishment and rebuke against the wicked. For he who is to live in faith must suffer much for the sake of God.

The two pieces are abundant and powerful in the entire Psalter. So that both pieces are abundantly and powerfully practiced in the whole Psalter. One, how the spirit lives, fights, does and increases in faith through God's word and truth; the other, how the flesh dies, suffers, succumbs and decreases; and thus faith goes in death, and yet lives.

Whoever wants to read and understand the Psalter properly must pay attention to these two pieces inside, and he will find what a sweet and fine little book it is, and will learn all kinds of teaching, comfort, strength, joy and all the happiness his heart desires.

Brother Martin Luther's work on the Psalms, presented to the students of theology in Wittenberg.

The first Psalm.*)

V. 1. Blessed is he (beatus vir) who walks not (abiit) in the counsel of the wicked. 1)

(1) It is a question that moves all men, how they may be blessed (de beatitudine), and there is no one who should not wish that it may go well with him, and who should not be sorry if it goes ill with him. But all men, as many as they are, have lost the knowledge of true blessedness, and most of all those who have most searched for it, as the philosophers,

1) In the German Wittenberg edition and subsequently also in the Old Burger, the Leipzig edition and in Walch, the text of our Bible is used as a basis, although the interpretation refers to the text of the Vulgate and therefore often does not fit the "words" of the text. We do not have an older German text at our disposal than the one from 1524, which, however, is just as insufficient for these interpretations. Therefore, we have also retained our Bible text, but indicate the text of the Vulgate when the deviations require it.

Among them, the most excellent have said that it consists in virtue or in the practice (opere) of virtue. By this they have become more miserable than the others, and have equally deprived themselves of the goods of this life and of the life to come. For though the rabble have grossly deceived themselves in seeking to attain blessedness in the pleasures of the flesh, they have at least obtained the goods of this life. But he who here [in this psalm] speaks down from heaven, rejects with disgust all men's pretensions, and gives a unique description of blessedness, unknown to all: let him be blessed who loves the law of God. A short explanation, but one that goes against the sense of all men, especially the wise. But first, let us look at the things that concern grammar, but also theology.

*) We have tried to establish the same counting of the paragraphs in the Psalms translated by Stephan Roth as it is found in the old edition of Walch. However, because of the many omissions, we have only succeeded to a certain extent by leaving a large number of paragraphs without number signs, as can be found, for example, in the first Psalm between the sixty-first and the seventy-fifth paragraph several times.

2 The Hebrew says in the majority blessed people or blessed circumstances, as, in blessed circumstances is the man who does not walk; as if he wanted to say: In all things it is well with the man who walks 2c. Why do you talk back and forth about this? Why do you conclude such useless things? This is the only pearl a man can find, that he loves the law of God, and separates himself from the wicked; then it is well with him in all things. He who does not find this may seek all goods, but will not find one. For as everything is pure to the pure, so everything is lovable (dilecta) to those who love, everything is good to the good, and in general: As you are, so is God to you, let alone the creature. For God is pure [Ps. 18, 27, 26] with the pure, perverse with the perverse, holy with the holy; so nothing is good for him who is evil, nothing is lovely for him who has no desire for the law of God.

3] "Man" is used in three ways in Scripture; it denotes age, sex, and excellence (virtutem). As a word expressing age, it is found in 1 Cor. 13:11: "But when I became a man, I put away childish things." The gender is indicated by Matth. 1, 16: "Jacob begat Joseph, the husband of Mary." Joh. 4, 16.: "Go, call your husband." The excellent nature tells it from 1 Sam. 26, 15.: "And David said unto Abner, Art thou not a man?" And in this third way a man is here called blessed, that he might not exclude the female sex from this blessedness. 1)

4. abiit [he has gone away). Better it is said in Hebrew XXX XX, he did not walk, he did not go along, he did not enter, for which also in Greek οὐχ ἵππορώυη stands. But it is known that according to the way of the Scriptures "to walk" and "to go forth" in a figurative sense (μεταφορικως) means the

The same is as living or having fellowship, as Ps. 15:2: "He that walketh without change," and Ps. 101:6 [Vulg.]: "He that walketh in the way that is blameless is my servant." Rom. 8:1: "There is therefore nothing condemnable in them that walk not after the flesh."

1) That is why Luther did not translate: "Wohl dem Manne", but: "Wohl dem".

5 "Counsel" here is undoubtedly taken for statutes and doctrine, since no community among men can endure if it is not formed and maintained by certain statutes and laws. But with this word he punishes the arrogance and the shameful sacrilege of the wicked; first, that they do not stoop to walk in the law of the Lord, but act according to their own counsel; secondly, he also calls it a council, because it means so much as prudence, and a way that knows not error.

006 For this is the destruction of the wicked, that they are wise in their own eyes, and before themselves, that they adorn their errors with the appearance that they are wisdom and a [right] way. For if they should accuse men of manifest error, it would not be a great praise of blessedness not to walk with them. For he saith not, In the foolishness of the wicked, in the error of sinners. He therefore most diligently exhorts us to beware of good appearances, lest the angel of Satan, disguising himself as an angel of light, deceive us by his craftiness. But he contrasts the counsel of the wicked with the law of the Lord, that we may learn to beware of wolves in sheep's clothing, who are ready to counsel all, to instruct all, to help all, while they can do nothing less than that.

(7) An "ungodly", which is called XXX in Hebrew, is rightly called by Saint Hilarius the one who has an evil opinion of God; for ungodliness is really the sin of unbelief and is committed with the heart; but it has been translated in many ways, and in such a way that one has not remained the same. Therefore, always hold these two things against each other, faith in God and unbelief, as well as the law of God and the counsel of men. For when we speak of godliness and ungodliness, we are not speaking of the life (moribus), but of the attitude (opinionibus), that is, of the source of conduct (morum). For he who rightly believes in God (orthodoxus est) cannot but do good, lead a good life. For if the righteous in one day also seven-

But the wicked sink into misfortune [Prov. 24:16] and do not get up again. Because these are unbelievers, they do no good work. All that they undertake is only a beautiful appearance, the shadow of Behemoth [Job 40:16], with which they deceive themselves and lure the simple to themselves. So he who lives by faith is godly, and he who lives by unbelief is godless.

8 From this we can also see what a "sinner" is. This is the outward man of the ungodly, for you do not see the counsel and the ungodly hidden in the heart. Therefore, he speaks of the works, the walk, the practice (studiis), which is done outwardly, and calls this a "way," that now the council has come into custom and practice (Praxis, as they say), and the evil disposition, which they have inwardly, they now also put into practice outwardly. But this way, as I have said, is almost always more beautiful than the way of the godly. For even without this warning, everyone can easily beware of gross sinners, or at least recognize them.

9. stetit¹) [he has stood] denotes the stubbornness, the hard neck, which they raise and excuse themselves with malicious words, since they have become incorrigible in their godlessness, because they consider the same to be godliness. For "to stand" means, according to the figurative expression (tropo) of the holy scripture, to be firm. Rom. 14, 2) 4: "He stands or falls before his Lord. But he may well be raised up, for GOD is well able to raise him up." Hence a pillar [XXX]. 1) in Hebrew its name from stand [XXX]);, as in Latin statua from stare. For with this the wicked excuse and strengthen themselves, that they make themselves believe that they live rightly and shine before others by beautiful works.

10. cathedra³) [the chair], "to sit on the chair" means to teach, to be a master and teacher. Matth. 23, 2: "On Mosi's chair sit the scribes" 2c. Thus, to sit on the throne means to rule or to be a king, as is common in the books of Kings. On the

1) Vulgate: st in via pssatorum non sttit.

2) In the issues Rom. 15.

3) Vulgate: st in satUsam xsstilsntias non ssdit.

To sit on thrones is to be a prince; to sit on the judgment seat is to be a judge.

11 Although pestilentia is not a literal translation, the word is nevertheless rendered with good emphasis, for the Hebrew says: [chair] "the mocker" or the scoffer. But it is the mockers whom he accuses everywhere in the Psalter as "the false ones" and "the false tongue", since they present the poison of erroneous doctrine under the appearance of sound doctrine.

(12) For there is no pestilence so contagious to the body as ungodly doctrine to the soul. For, as the apostle 2 Tim. 2, 17 says, "their word eats away at them like cancer. Just as the wise are called the salvation of the world (Wis. 6:26), so the wicked are rightly called the pestilence of the world. For what can be more harmful than the deception that deadly poison is given to souls that thirst for the pure truth?

(13) Therefore, according to the common custom of the church, according to which a good life is distinguished into faith and life (mores), in that the former [faith] makes godly or ungodly, but the latter [life] makes sinners or saints, the prophet here also describes these two pieces, and adds a third to them.

14 For since ungodliness had nothing left in which it could go further, after it had corrupted man inwardly in his mind and outwardly in his life, it therefore burst forth, and now drags others with it into the same corruption, not being satisfied with having an ungodly mind and leading an evil life, but also teaching others ungodliness. So much of grammar.

(15) This is to be especially noted in Scripture, how wisely it refrains from giving the names of the sects and the persons. For although in this psalm the people of the Jews are undoubtedly being punished, as the apostle says [Rom. 1:16]: "The Jews in particular, and also the Greeks," and Rom. 3:19: "But we know that what the law says, that says it to those who are under the law," he nevertheless does not say, "Well with the Jew," or, "Well with this or that;" nor, "In the counsel of the Gentiles, of this or that nation," but rather, "In the counsel of the Jews, of this or that nation.

The general (absolute): "good to" and "counsel of the wicked", "way of sinners", "chair of scoffers" 2c., whoever they may be, because with God there is no respect for the person.

16 And this was also most necessary, so that the word of God, because it is eternal, would fit all people in all lines. For although in the course of time the customs, the people, the places and the practices change, the same godliness and the same godlessness go through all times. Thus we see that the prophets against the false prophets, the apostles against the false apostles, the [right] teachers against the heretics used the same passages of Scripture, although they found in them neither the name of the prophets, nor of the apostles, nor of the teachers, nor the names of their adversaries, but only the godly and the godless are mentioned therein.

17. after that [it happened also for this reason], so that if the name of a person was mentioned, then the rest would not believe that it does not concern them what is said there evil, or it concerns them only what is said there good, as the Jews refer all that was promised to the good seed of Abraham and Israel to themselves, while this psalm is certainly, as I have said, primarily directed against them. Therefore, according to the example of the holy fathers, we too should apply the Psalm to the generation that lives with us; indeed, we should follow it, since it precedes us in punishing all the wicked, and is found by us to be doing this, rather than us forcing it on this opinion.

18 He says, "Blessed is the man who does not walk in the counsel of the wicked," that is, since there are so many thousands of wicked people around us that it can be said, Ps. 12:2, "Help, O Lord, the saints are gone, and the faithful are few among the children of men," and with Micah, Cap. 7, 2: "The righteous are gone from this land, and the just are no more among the people." Is not he blessed and a truly strong man in the faith who does not walk with such a great multitude in the broad way, after which also reproach and much evil?

and even then does not consent to walk with them, and is not deceived by the exceedingly beautiful counsel of the wicked, who would like to lead even the elect into error?

19. it is a great thing not to be overcome by riches, pleasure and honor, but it is the very highest victory to overcome the wisdom and exceeding righteousness of the wicked, by which pure faith is most contested.

20 But you must notice that these words of the psalm are words of faith, since they do not speak of men according to what is seen, because according to that no one would consider them ungodly (as I have said). The prophet speaks in the spirit, where also that is ungodly (because there is no faith), which is considered most godly in the sight of men, as also the preacher Solomon says, Cap. 8, 10. [Vulg.], "I have seen the ungodly buried, who, when they were alive, were even in the holy place, and praised in the city, as though they had done the works of the righteous," and Ps. 37:35. [Vulg.], "I have seen the ungodly exalted like a cedar of Lebanon." These are terrifying things, who should seek ungodliness there, and so deeply?

21 But listen! This psalm does not only punish the ungodly and sinners (for every man without Christ is an ungodly man and a sinner), but especially those who sin with double sin, because, although they are ungodly, they do not recognize this, but prepare a "counsel" above, in which they walk and want to give their ungodliness a beautiful color. For he does not say, "Blessed is he who does not walk as an ungodly man, or does not stand as a sinner," but "in the counsel of the ungodly" and "in the way of sinners," for whom it is not enough that they are ungodly, but they also want to be righteous and holy, adding to ungodliness the appearance of godliness.

(22) Which people do you think this might affect in our time? I would not dare to name any persons, lest I incur the irreconcilable enmity (cha-rybdim) of certain priests, monks and bishops. For this generation of the godless

People have always been exceedingly intolerant of God's word and have filled heaven with martyrs for no other reason than because they thought they were doing God a service by doing so, and have been blamed for fighting for godliness by quite stubbornly accusing the right godly of ungodliness.

23. But know and do not doubt that those will be struck who excel only in ceremonies, customs and other trappings of godliness, who measure godliness by food, clothing, places and times, or at most by works and prayers, especially those who, for the sake of their rules (observantiis), privileges, dignities, powers and rights, divide themselves and live in irreconcilable strife, and are willing to do and suffer anything rather than yield and humble themselves in mutual love. That these are the wicked spoken of here, you can assume from the fact that they are secure in their lives and rely on it, and no fear of God is before their eyes.

24. For this shall be a constant and infallible guide (canon) for you, and (as they say) more certain than a touchstone, that it is peculiar to the ungodly that they do not fear God, but rely on His mercy for everything (as they think); But it is peculiar to the godly that they, like Job, fear all their works, trust in no righteousness that is found among them, and regard their holiness as filth, and therefore cannot contend for it, justify it, or avenge it, but [admit] that they are worthy of the reproach and vengeance of all men. Therefore I have said that eyes and ears of faith are necessary to hear these words of the Spirit and to see what they contain. For man cannot understand.

(25) But you must not think as if I condemn ceremonies or [good] works; but only the false delusion, confidence, and perverse zeal of those people I call a harmful ruin, because we see that this happens to them, that they fall into sects, wrath, evil talk, and innumerable abominable sins, all of which they cover with the name of godliness, with the covering of their counsel, with the beautiful appearance of their teachings. For if their works were done in humility, they would certainly be good.

Nor treads on the path of sinners.

(26) For after they have corrupted the faith by ungodliness, what remains but that their works are evil and sins? But, you will say, how can the works of the Jews, the heretics, the pious be evil, since they fast, pray, do good, and perform other works which no man dares to say are evil? I have said that faith is necessary. Therefore those works are all the worse because they strengthen ungodliness and cause them to stand firm and persist in the way of sin. But they are sins because they proceed from an ungodly heart. The wise man says [Sir. 34, 4. Vulg.], "How should a liar speak the truth?" and: How should an ungodly man do a godly thing?

(27) But Christ hath well instructed us here, when he taught that they should be known by their fruits. For they have two kinds of works: the first, which he calls sheep's clothing; these are not their real fruits, but pretended ones, according to their counsel and their ways. But if you touch them and confront them, behold, their real fruits burst forth, wrath, pomposity, crying out, pride, after-talk, cursing, vain excuses, spitefulness, blasphemy, and such horrible things. For from these thorn bushes you can also read no other fruits than these exceedingly sharp thorns. Such people, as you see, are also our work saints who deal with ceremonies.

Nor sit where the scoffers sit (in cathedra pestilentia).

For this is what the Jews do who forsake Christ; under their lips is deadly adder poison [Ps. 140:4], and their wine is dragon's gall [Deut. 32:33]. For those must necessarily teach against Christ who do not teach Christ. These are followed by the heretics, though under a different name and in a different person, but they bring destruction through the same ungodliness.

29. and, to come to our cause, those who have "the chair of destruction".

They fill the church of Christ with the opinions of philosophers, the statutes of men, the counsels of their own heads, and weigh down the wretched souls, but leave the word of God standing, by which alone the soul is fed, lives, and is preserved.

(30) Hence it is that men know no other righteousness than that which is brought about by works; but this is ungodliness and sin before God. For it is impossible that one can teach works according to any laws without danger, if one has not first taught the most important (meliore) doctrine and that with greater zeal, namely faith in Christ. In the Epistle to the Romans, Paul lays the foundation of faith in eleven chapters, and only then builds life (mores) on it in five chapters; in the Epistle to the Galatians, he teaches faith in five chapters, and life in only one, the sixth. He does the same in other epistles. Christ demands only faith in the Gospel.

v. 2. But have pleasure (voluntas ejus) in the law of the Lord, and speak of his law day and night.

Grammatical, as far as theology is concerned.

See to it (this I say once for all) that you separate "the law of the Lord" from the laws of any man in the farthest and most distant way, and take care of it with all diligence, lest both [laws] mixed in a desolate heap destroy you miserably, as happens through the teachers of destruction, either by making human statutes out of God's law, or a law of God out of the statutes of men.

32 Let us show this by examples. It is a law of the Lord: "You shall honor your father and your mother." From this law the Pharisees made this statute: The gift that is offered on the altar is better than the gift that is given to the parents, as you read Matth. 15, 5. Again, while God is so despised by them in His true commandment, they honor Him with another commandment, which they made themselves, by setting up their law as God's law.

ten: The elders wrote that one should wash his hands when going to eat, but if one does not listen to the elders, it is the same as if one does not obey God. Therefore he says in the same place (Matth. 15, 7-9.): "You hypocrites, Isaiah prophesied about you and said: This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, and honoureth me with their lips: but their heart is far from me. But in vain do they serve me, because they teach such doctrines as are nothing but the commandments of men."

Nowadays, however, it has gotten out of hand that they insolently cry out that one must hear only the voice of the bishops and of the Roman court with fear and trembling, but in the meantime not only despise all commandments of God, but even ridicule them, and this is done by no one more than by those who raise the frightening voice of the [Roman] court high. Yes, they have carried this quite godless superstition to such an extreme that one finds Mass monks everywhere who consider it a mortal sin if they say Mass without a stole, without a maniple, or omit any other custom. If they make a mistake in the Canon of the Mass, even without their will, it is considered a very grave sin. But I am ashamed to mention other ridiculous fears of conscience of the priests and the monks, since in the meantime they do not even feel when they have spent many years in unchastity, anger, envy, avarice, and greed, despising God.

First of all, "will" (voluntatem) here stands neither for a faculty (potentia), nor for the sleepy habit (habitu), which the newer theologians have brought in from Aristotle to overturn the understanding of Scripture, nor for an action (actu), of which they say that it is produced from this faculty and habit (elici). The whole human nature does not have this will, but it must come from heaven. For since human nature is inclined and ready for evil, as God's word says Gen. 8, 21, but the law of the Lord is good, holy and just, it follows that the will of man is hostile to the law, hates the law, flees the law. If now also

Although a man sometimes pretends to love the law out of fear of punishment, or because he desires the promise, there always remains within him a hatred of the law, and he cannot love it without seeking a benefit (gratuito), for he loves the law, not because it is good, but because it benefits him.

But this "will" is the pure pleasure of the heart and the "delight" (voluptas quaedam) in the law, which does not seek what the law promises, nor fear what it threatens, but only that the law is holy, just, good. So it is not only love for the law, but also a loving delight in the law, which the world and the prince of the world cannot take away and overcome by any prosperity, by wedged adversities, but through lack, disgrace, cross, death, hell it tears through as victor, because in adversities it shows itself most gloriously.

But this will comes from faith in God through Jesus Christ. On the other hand, the will, which is forced away by the fear of punishment, is hasty and forced (violenta); but the will, which is brought about by the request of reward, is that of a hireling and a hypocritical one. But he who is of faith is free, does not seek reward, is cheerful, therefore in Hebrew Christ's people are called XXXX, the voluntary, the willing, the free [Ps. 110, 3].

From all this it is clear that this psalm, if it is not understood by Christ alone, is a mirror and a goal that a blessed man should pursue, since there is no one in this life who does not lack something of this will, because of the law and the will in the members that opposes it, as the apostle laments Rom. 7:23. This will, as theology teaches, must be crucified; but according to the teaching of philosophy it is to be considered a virtue.

Meditari, they say, is the same as talking, discussing, and generally acting with words, as, in the 37th Psalm, v. 30: "The mouth of the righteous speaks (meditabitur) wisdom." Therefore, St. Augustine in his translation has "chirping" (garrire) in a beautiful figurative way of speaking (metaphora), because, as chirping (garritus) is an occupation (exer citium) is for the birds, so for man (whose special gift [officium] is speaking) speaking of the law of the Lord should be an occupation. But also the poet has taken meditari in this way: Produce on dainty reed the chirping of the muse of the forest. 1) I cannot emphasize the power and the sweetness of this word, because this meditative consists first of all in paying close attention to the words of the law, and then in keeping different passages of Scripture in relation to each other. This is then a kind of lovely hunt, yes, a game of the deer in the forest mountains, where the Lord stirs up the hinds and exposes the forests [Ps. 29, 6.]. For from this, finally, the speech to the people, well founded in the law of God, will emerge.

39 For example, if you only want to pass over the words: "Thou shalt not kill", it is a cold word, and according to the sound of the letters you hear that the work of killing is forbidden. But stay with it, and notice that it does not say: Your hand shall not kill, but: Thyself. But who are you? Soul and body, and have in both so many powers, hands, tongue, eyes, mind, and will. If then you are forbidden not to kill, are you not also taught that you should not kill with your hand, tongue or will? For if any of these slay, thou slayest. Thou shalt not, therefore, be angry, nor evil-minded, nor curse, nor evil-speak, nor turn away thy face, nor despise, nor harm, nor wish to harm, but rather love, bless, and do good. How now? Thus, "Thou shalt not kill" means that you should not be bitter and angry, but gentle and kind to your neighbor. Then see how many passages of Scripture teach of love, gentleness, kindness, goodwill, goodness, goodness; when you have drawn these forth, have you not sweetly twittered (garristi) and spoken (meditatus es) of the law of your Lord?

40. "Day and night." Whether you take this literally, or in a kind of figurative speech (tropo) for "constant," or figuratively (allegorice) for the time of adversity and well-being, there is nothing in it. For the righteous loves the law of the Lord and remembers it even when he sleeps.

41 The prophet says: This blessed man will have his pleasure (voluntas) in the law of the Lord; he will not see, love or hate anything else, neither in goods nor in evils, but through this pleasure he will be completely elevated above all created things. What wonder, then, if he is blessed who, endowed with this heavenly delight, does not even think of the things that destroy those who judge happiness by their foolishness?

Furthermore, because through this desire he has already become one with the word of God (since love unites the lover with that which he loves), it is necessary that he taste how good, lovely, pure, holy, wonderful the word of God is, namely, the highest good, which those cannot taste who are in the law only with the hand or with the tongue, but with their will immersed in the muck of things.

(43) For there are many babblers who speak much of the law of the Lord, pretend much, think much, but do not love it. It is not said, Blessed is he whose tongue is in the law of the Lord; not his hands, not his understanding or speculation, by which they only puff themselves up and flatter themselves, as if they were already righteous and blessed.

44 Furthermore, this will is the whole life of man. For it is not to be feared that he who is with this desire, the source and head of life, is in it with any other member outside the law. For where love goes, both the heart and the body follow. Here again you can see how the godly and the godless arrange their lives in opposite ways. The wicked start their righteousness from the outside and advance to the inside.

to the inner. First they pretend to do a work, then also the word, later they also deal with thoughts, and this is their highest level; then they immediately become the masters of others, everything they think, speak and do, they want to be considered holy and divine, although they have never come to this hidden desire. The godly begin from within, from this holy will, then follows the speaking (meditatio), finally also the work by heart; after these things the teaching of others, as we shall see.

45. "And speaketh of his law day and night." Speaking is not without punishment (damnatione), if there is not first the desire; love in itself will teach to speak. But we must despair of our powers and ask for this desire (as I said) through a humble faith in Christ from heaven. Notice that it is the manner and nature of all lovers that they like to talk, sing, write poetry, aspire, joke, and also like to hear about what they love. Therefore also this lover, the blessed man, has his beloved object, the law of the Lord, always in his mouth, always in his heart, always (if it can be) in his ears. For "he who is of God hears the word of God" [John 8:47]. It is said [Ps. 119, 54.], "Thy rights are my song in thy house of my pilgrimage." And again [v. 16. Vulg.], "I will speak of thy rights forever."

(46) But those who deal with sepulchers, who talk of natural things, of the opinions of men, of sinecures, of dignities, of the power and privileges of the churches, and such innumerable foolish things day and night, do you think that they are blessed people? They are much more wretched than those who talk about love affairs with girls or about the fables of poets. For these know that they are doing wrong, and in time they may repent of it. But those who make themselves believe that they are acting wisely and sanctimoniously will remain in their impiety until death, and will finally suffer in vain for their right, by which they have brought upon themselves the greatest injustice and iniquity. For they speak not of the law of the Lord.

I, In the Basel edition, the words voluntas and vita are offset.

V. 3. He is planted like a tree (lignum) by the rivers of water, which brings forth its fruit in its season.

I have said that the blessedness of this man is hidden in the spirit, in God, so that it cannot be known otherwise than by faith or experience. That this is the truth, you will clearly see, if you look at his pleasure, in which alone his blessedness consists, namely, not in wealth, not in honor, not in his righteousness and virtue, yes, not even in any good (except this pleasure in the law), which could be called inside or outside of man. Rather, it consists in the opposite, in poverty, in contempt, in foolishness and in all evil that can be called inside and outside of man, so that such a man, as the prophet here praises him, the world, according to the judgment of all people, declares to be the most wretched, as Isaiah saw in Christ, the head and model of these blessed people, saying [Is. 53, 3.) that he was the most wretched. For the world and its ruler cannot stand such a man who wants to be blessed by this lust and despises their blessedness. Therefore the prophet, when he saw how few they are, began: "O, a blessed man is he who" 2c.

48 After he has painted a blessed man with his right description, he still describes him by a no less beautiful likeness. The description was certainly complete, since he claims of him that he is free from all misfortune and full of all good (which also the great crowd considers bliss, but in things of this world; the latter, however, in faith). So also the likeness proves that he is free from the same evil and full of good, because this blessed man, who is hidden in faith, could not be shown by any example. As he who wants to make a thing clear (diffinitores) sees it well, so the prophet paints by the likeness of a visible thing; and because he describes the righteous under a picture, one does not need to stop at the words.

(49) I believe that the palm tree is spoken of here in a periphrastic way. For also another Psalm [Ps. 92, 13.] says: "The righteous will green like a palm tree, he will grow like a cedar on Lebanon", so that what is said there shorter, here is more extensively put apart. For the palm tree loves the water brooks and (as Pliny says) drinks gladly 1) all the year round, is constantly green and brings forth exceedingly sweet fruit. Perhaps he took this simile from the palms, which are frequent at Jericho at the Jordan, because therefore, one thinks, Jericho is also called the palm city. For also in many other places of the scripture the Jordan serves for secret interpretations. Hence also comes this: A fountain of living water that flows down from Lebanon [Hohel. 4, 15.).

50. Here the prophet has given you a guide to understand the figurative speeches (allegorias) of trees and rivers that occur in Scripture. A tree means a man, a good tree a good man, an evil tree an evil man, so Christ also teaches [Matth. 7, 18.). But I know that St. 2) Augustine, when he was pressed by the Pelagians not to allow sinless children to be produced by believing spouses, wanted to be understood by a tree the will of man, not man, and perhaps this could serve him that here the spiritual man is described, which is mainly just the will or spirit. But I believe that the whole man is just as well and perhaps better called a tree, but that the root is the will, the branches the limbs and powers. But I do not argue about this.

(51) "It is planted," says the prophet, distinguishing this palm tree from those that grow by themselves. For it is of such a nature by the care and nurture of others, not by its nature; namely, it is cut out from that which grew by itself and wild (natura), and artificially planted elsewhere as a seedling. This is what I have said, that the desire for the law of the Lord is not by nature in any man.

1) Wittenberg and Jena: didit. Baseler, Weimarsche-and Erlanger: kiker?.

2 > Weimarsche and Erlanger: sruoitissimulu; Baseler: ,, 8UN."

But because the heavenly Father is the cultivator and planter and transfers us from Adam into Christ, it is given from heaven.

By "streams of water" he undoubtedly understands the streams of divine grace. For it is said that the palm tree grows on a light, sandy, nattum and salty soil, therefore it always longs for streams. Therefore, this desire, the root of this tree, since it is in this arid, barren life, thirsts all the more for the streams of heavenly water, the less it finds in the world whereby it could thrive. Thus says that Psalm [Ps. 63, 2.]: "In a dry and arid land, where there is no water." And Isa. 53:2: "He shooteth up before him as rice, and as a root out of dry ground." Is it not wonderful that a tree grows on barren land and is nourished by streams of water alone? And that the blessed man of whom the psalm speaks here, the more barren the world is for him, the more thirsty he becomes for heavenly water? This tree does not grow on a fat land, nor the blessed man in the prosperity of the world.

Some have investigated why the prophet preferred to say "wood" (lignum) rather than "tree", likewise rather: "it bears fruit" than: it bears fruit. In the first book of Moses we read [Cap. 1, 11.], 1) that God created wood, not a tree; and this figurative speech (tropum) the Scripture retains, "wood" instead of: Tree. And "bring forth fruit" indicates that this blessed man, through love (which, as we see, is commanded in every law of the Lord), served, not himself, but his neighbor. For it is not a tree that bears fruit for itself, but brings its fruit to another, indeed, no creature lives for itself or serves itself only (except man and the devil); the sun does not shine for itself, the water does not flow for itself 2c.

Thus every creature keeps the law of love, and its whole being (substantia) is in the law of the Lord; but even the members of the human body do not serve themselves. Only the attitude of the heart is ungodly, for it does not alone give to no man what it has, gives to no one, serves no one, wants to please no one, but snatches everything to itself, seeks its own in all, even in God Himself, so that one can rightly say that this tree is a thorn bush or a wild branch, which no man has given care, which also has no pleasure in streams of water, bears nothing but thorns, with which it pricks, lacerates, suffocates the fruit of the trees standing around, even the trees themselves, then also robs, dishevels, wounds everything that passes by, the clothes, the fur, the skin, the flesh and everything. Therefore, the prophet has expressed the beneficence of the good trees, that while they harm no one, they benefit all by willingly giving their fruits.

55. "At that time." O a golden and lovely word, by which the liberty of Christian righteousness is confirmed. The wicked have certain days, certain times, certain works, certain places, to which they cling so firmly that if their neighbor were to die of hunger, yet they could not be turned from them. But this blessed man is free at all times, at every work, in every place, against every person; however a case may arise, he will serve you; whatever may come before his hand, that he will do. He is not a Jew, nor a Gentile, nor a Greek, nor a foreigner; he has no reputation at all, but he brings forth his fruit in his season, as often as his service is needed against God and man.

(56) Therefore his fruit has no name, nor his time has a name, nor he himself has a name, nor his streams have a name. He, as One, does not serve One, even at One time, in One place, in One work, but He serves all everywhere in all things, and is in truth the alum for all hours, for all works, for all persons, and in His Father's image all in all and over all.

But the wicked, as it is said in the 18th Psalm [v. 46], are closed in their troubles, they catch themselves, and torture themselves with their self-chosen works, times and

2) The Weimar edition has in the margin 2 Sani. 22, 46. where eontruëuitor corresponds to the ctäuäuntur in our: Texts corresponds. In the 18th Psalm, on the other hand, it says: ctäuäieuvorunt u seinitis miis.

Places apart from which, they think, nothing can be done in a right way. Therefore, those who think highly of their fruits do nothing but bite, judge, and condemn the fruits of others; they take themselves off easily and are at hand at all times to reprove others, and in general such men in doing evil as the godly are in doing good. For they, too, are men for all hours, not only in one way, not at one time, not against one man, but everywhere, where only opportunity presents itself, to belittle others and to harm them. If they directed these efforts towards good, they could not become godly in a better and shorter way.

(58) I do not say this in order to reject the ceremonies of the churches and monasteries, but this was the first discipline (institutio) of those who entered the clerical state, that he who entered a monastery should learn to be subject to the superior, not to do anything of his own will, but to be ready to serve everyone in all things. And the monasteries were in truth a kind of schools to exercise and train Christian liberty, as they still are where they preserve the old order; this, I say, was the purpose and manner of the ceremonies. For what are even the works of love and mercy but a kind of free ceremonies, since they are also external and bodily?

(59) And the ceremonies of the old law were also extremely useful exercises of true and free godliness. But when they began to be misused to the detriment of freedom and, by using them as a pretext, to extinguish true godliness, and now, instead of freedom, servitude ruled tyrannically, it became necessary to abolish them all. It became necessary to abolish them all, just as it should now be the task of godly pastors to abolish the many useless ceremonies, where they are only a snare to the souls and a hindrance to free godliness.

And its leaves do not wither.

60 He remains with this exceedingly beautiful image. "The leaves" mean the word and the teaching in general; but we have said.

that the palm tree has green leaves all the time. On the other hand, Isaiah 1:30 says of the wicked: "When you are like an oak tree with dry leaves. Now compare the two with each other. The wicked walk in their counsel, the godly stand firm through love of the law and are planted by the rivers of water; those stand in the way of sinners, this one speaks of the law of the Lord and bears fruit in his time; those sit where the scoffers sit, this one never lacks leaves.

61 And notice that he describes the fruit rather than the leaves. And although it is the nature of the palm tree not to have its fruit between the leaves, as is the case with other trees, but between the branches, and to have all its foliage at the top, so that it can also be seen to produce fruit rather than leaves (for I have been told that this image is taken from the palm tree), yet the Spirit also instructs a faithful preacher in the church to know that the kingdom of God does not stand in words, but in power, 1 Cor. 4, 20.; and [Acts 1, 1.], "JESUS began to do and to teach." And [Luc. 24, 19.], "He was a man mighty in deeds and words." Thus he who would appear as a public teacher of the Word should first show the fruits of life, if he does not want his leaves to wither. For just as a tree is despised which has luxuriant blossoms but bears no fruit (but Christ also cursed the fig tree which bore no fruit [Matth. 21, 19.]), so, as St. Gregory teaches, his teaching is also despised on whose life one looks down with contempt; for such people preach to others, but become reprobate themselves [1 Cor. 9, 27.]. To these Christ proclaims, Matth. 7, 23, that in the judgment they will have to hear: "Depart from me, all you evildoers," even though they prophesied in his name and did many deeds to others through the word of Christ.

Someone might ask: There have been so many saints and martyrs, of whom neither fruit nor leaves remain, but everything has fallen away with them, nor do we have all the words of the apostles: how then can this praise of a blessed man be a general one?

I answer: Their word was not their word, "for it is not you who speak, but it is your Father's Spirit who speaks through you. All saints are taught by the same word, have also taught the same word, as it is said 1 Cor. 10, 3. f.: "They have all eaten one kind of food, and drunk one kind of drink." But [Ps. 119, 89. f.): "The word of the Lord endureth for ever, and his truth endureth for ever."

It can be seen, then, that this blessed man and the fruitful tree mean the whole church, or those who preside over the magisterium. But this is no obstacle that it cannot also be understood of any righteous man, for he also has the same leaves. If he does not teach others, he certainly teaches himself, speaking in his heart of the law of the Lord. This word also remains in him for eternity, just as it remains in the whole church. Yes, because all believers are one body, through this fellowship everything belongs to all, although these leaves belong only to this one member who preaches. For it is my word that my tongue preaches, even though I am only the ear and not the tongue. So shall you think of the rest of the members, and of the whole body.

And what he does, he does well.

62) When he says this of the tree (ligno) or the palm tree, it is because it is said of the palm tree alone that it bends upward against the load 1) as it is said that one has seen this on beams of palm wood.

"Making" in this place (if I am not too bold) does not mean the good works of the righteous man, for these are sufficiently praised by the name "fruits," but rather works of making, or entities, as we make works of art, since even the worldly wise ascribe to prudence an action, and to art a making. And the same difference can be recognized (as I dare to assert) in the Hebrew language, for I see that in general the word for making (facere) is taken for acting (agere). As it is said in the 28th Psalm, v. 5.

do not want to pay attention to the doings of the Lord, nor to the works of his hands", so that "the work of his hands" is his workmanship (plssma), as it is said [Is. 19, 25: Israel is the work of my hands; and Gen. 1:7, 16, 25: "And GOD made" 2c.; and Ps. 95:5: "His is the sea, and he made it." But the works of God are those which he does through the creatures, but especially the word and grace, through which he works and makes us work.

So "to make" is to appoint, to decree, to put into different church offices, and as Peter [1 Petr. 4, 10? and Paul s/ Cor. 12, 4. ff? taught, to make stewards of the various grace of God, to found churches, to multiply, so that in such a way even the believers are the structure (plasmata.), the works, the made (facta) of it. For so he begets the Galatians [Gal. 4, 19?, and the Corinthians the apostle has begotten [1 Cor. 4, 15?. Ye are, saith he, my workmanship in the Lord. So you understand that this "making" of the blessed man is a spiritual one, not palaces, not empires, not pomp, for these also the Gentiles make and produce; but making many good and blessed people who are like him, that is only the "making" of this blessed man.

Beware, too, that the "well-being" is not understood by you as a carnal one. This is in secret and entirely in the spirit; so much so that if you do not hold on to it in faith, you might rather judge it to be the highest repugnance. For as the devil utterly hates the "leaves" and the word of God, so also those who teach and hear it; these he persecutes, supported by the power of the whole world. So you hear the greatest of all miracles when you hear that everything the blessed man does is well done. For what is more wonderful than that the faithful, when they are killed, increase; when they are diminished, multiply; when they are subdued, are above; when they are driven out, come in, conquer; when they are defeated? For such is the world and its

1) Jena and Erlangen xontus instead of: ponäns.

2) The comma after tuesre in the expenses is to be deleted.

Prince has been defeated. God leads His saints so strangely [Ps. 4, 4] that that which contains the greatest misfortune must bring the highest welfare. This is the welfare of the wise and the change of men (conversio virorum) [in God].

But now we see that the word Proverbs 1:32 is fulfilled: "The apostasy of the foolish (aversio parvulorum) shall kill them, and the welfare of fools shall destroy them." For now, because we have made reputation (personas) and name to the affairs of the church, and drawn the spirit into the flesh, for this reason riches, tyranny, impunity, carnal peace, and more than worldly splendor are called a good state of the church. For the devil finally saw and recognized this spiritual welfare; therefore he restrained himself and attacked us from another way, where he triumphed to our terrible misfortune. And he who was defeated in war now reigns in peace, certainly on both sides by God's miraculous decree. That is why St. Hilarius said so well and so rightly that it is the nature of the Church to grow through adversity and to diminish through prosperity. But this wisdom of the cross and the new meaning of things is not only unknown, but also by far the most terrifying, even for the leaders of the church. And it is not to be wondered at, after they have left the holy Scriptures and have begun to read the unholy statutes of men and the account books of money.

V. 4. But the wicked are not like that (Non sic impii, non sic).

63 In Hebrew "non sic" is said only once, but there is little concern about that. And since you hear the word "ungodly", remember what we said above about the ungodly, so that you do not refer this word with the ungodly only to the Jews, heretics and I do not know what kind of distant people, lest you also put off the fear of God and do not honor this word of God; but since the one who is without faith in Christ is an ungodly person, these words are also for you such, before

You must be afraid of them, lest you too be found ungodly. For the truly godly trembles at every word of God, as Isaiah Cap. 66, 2. says: "But I look upon the wretched, and the broken in spirit, and he that is afraid of my word." How then can you have confidence that you have enough faith? But as much as faith is lacking, so much ungodliness is present.

It is the way of the wicked that they arrogate to themselves what is good with complete certainty, and ascribe the evil to others; it is the way of the godly that they believe that the evil is intended for them, and the good comes to other people, and only sigh for it, considering themselves completely unworthy of it, so that they do not attain it through their merit, but only through the mere hope of God's mercy.

65 So the wicked are not well, their leaves wither, neither are they planted by the rivers of water. Now hear the prophet who speaks in the spirit, even in the spirit, for all Scripture complains that the wicked are green, and that it is well with them; and I shall see the same in many psalms, so that you alone may say of them: Their leaves are green; all that they do is well. So faith is necessary.

But like chaff (pulvis) that the wind scatters.

66. it is added [in Latin]: a facie terrae [of the earth, but without that the sense suffers from it. So also there is nothing in the fact that in Hebrew it is said XXX, like the chaff, the dust of the husk or the waste of the ears. For it is the same, may be said dust, or husk, ashes, chaff. For these are the people of whom it is said in Luke 3:17, "In his hand is the shovel of the word, and he shall sweep his threshingfloor, and shall gather the wheat into his barn, and the chaff shall he burn with everlasting fire." Doubt not that this casting out, this chaff, this dust is meant in this passage, though in truth and actually a husk and crushed chaff is expressed. Thus it is said

Job 21:18. [Vulg.] in the same opinion, "They shall be as chaff before the wind, and as ashes which a whirlwind scattereth."

67 Note that he does not call them chaff as such, but chaff "scattered by the wind," not lying still, but scattered, flying about, restless chaff. And first of all this is to be understood of the Jews. These are scattered in three ways. First, bodily, by the whirlwinds, that is, by the will and displeasure of the people among whom they dwell, as we see before us that they have no certain abodes, but are exposed at any moment to such a wind as may drive them away. Secondly, that their minds are driven about by harmful teachers with the wind of manifold doctrines, since they are not planted in the faith of Christ, but their hearts are driven to and fro by uncertain doctrines, and now even their consciences cannot be secure and calm. Thirdly, on the last day they will be driven about and scattered by the eternal storm wind of God's unbearable wrath, so that they will never have rest, not even for a moment.

68 The heretics fare very similarly, especially in the last two tempests.

And what do you think that [now] is different in the church than the storm wind of the wrath of God? by which we have been driven into so many, so different, so unstable, so uncertain, and moreover innumerable glosses of the jurists and opinions of the theologians. And since, in the meantime, Christ has been completely unknown, we have encountered many shoals, whirlpools and perils (symplegadas) of conscience and have been shattered quite miserably. 1)

(70) But the other wicked also have their whirlwinds and storms of desires and lusts, in riches, honor, favor, and other floods of this world, by which they are quite miserably broken, because they despise the one rock, the firm foundation of our heart.

V. 5. Therefore the wicked do not remain in judgment, nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous.

(71) It has been sufficiently said who the wicked and sinners are, only do not listen to these speeches of your God without trembling, as if you were godly and holy. Fear itself is godliness, yes, the head and the beginning of wisdom and godliness.

The Hebrew says surgent [they will rise[^], not resurgent [they will rise[^], nor does the text speak of the resurrection of the dead. For it did not say, Men shall not rise in judgment, but the ungodly. The resurrection of men is different from that of the ungodly. Therefore, in the Apostles' Creed it is rightly said rather a "resurrection of the flesh" than "of men," and the apostle calls it a resurrection of the dead or of men, evidently placing two resurrections of men, that of the flesh and that of the spirit. "But to rise" here means that the wicked shall not stand before GOD, as the 5th Psalm, v. 6. [Vulg.], says: "Neither shall the wicked dwell before thee, nor shall the unrighteous abide before thine eyes." And Ps. 24:3: "Who shall go up into the mountain of the LORD? And who shall stand in his holy place?" So also of Christ it is said Ps. 76, 10. [Vulg.], "When GOD ariseth in judgment," and Ps. 12, 6. [Vulg.], "Now will I arise, saith the LORD." So it is, "They will not rise," the same as: They will not stand, they will not serve, they will not render to GOD His service, however much they may presume to do so.

"Judgment" here means, after an overbearing, that they have been so miserably plagued and martyred for a very long time, that they have had to despair over it innumerable much, and be eternally lost."

1) The 68th paragraph takes fifteen lines in the translation of Stephan Rodt (the only one that has been delivered on the first nine Psalms since the time of the Reformation) in the old edition of Walch. The 69th paragraph, however, reads there like this: "Then the blessed gospel, by which alone the poor consciences received right constant consolation, was completely extinguished in the whole of Christendom, and Christ, the only Savior of the world, became so unrecognizable that he had to bear the terrible name that he would be a severe judge, not the Savior of the world 2c. On the other hand, the wretched and afflicted consciences are filled with all sorts of fictitious and untruthful doctrines and commandments of men, by the canonists and sophists, by the wretched scribes of the Pabst,

The name of the book of Judges is derived from the name of the judges or regents. Thus the whole book of Judges takes its name from the judges or regents. Ps. 122, 5: "For there sit the chairs of judgment, the chairs of the house of David." So it is said of Christ Ps. 110:6 [Vulg.], "He shall judge among the nations," he shall be the judge of the Gentiles; and Ps. 72:4 [Vulg.], "He shall judge the poor of the people," that is, he shall govern them; and Ps. 96:13, "He shall judge the earth with righteousness, and the nations with his truth."

So the meaning is: The wicked will never rise to be judges and rulers of the faithful, but neither will they be in the assembly (concilio), that is, in their congregation (congregatione), that is, they will belong neither to the nobles nor to the lowly of the righteous. More clearly, then, it would read thus: Therefore, the wicked will not come into judgment (surgere in iudicium), nor sinners into the congregation of the righteous; they will not be counted among the servants of GOD at all.

But how? Are we to overthrow ungodly rulers and wicked people and throw them out of our midst? Or is there not a community of believers where the wicked are at the head and sinners are among them? Let that be far away.

I have said that the prophet speaks in the spirit, and therefore must also be heard in the spirit. For as Judas was an apostle, so he was not an apostle, and as John says [1 Ep. 2, 19.] "They went out from us, but they were not of us," so also the wicked, while they are in the regiment, are indeed visibly in the regiment before the people, but in fact and truth they have no regiment. For Zechariah also says [Cap. 11, 17. Vulg.]: "O shepherd and idol, you who trust the herd", and calls him at the same time a shepherd, because with this name he was honored by men, and an idol, because with this name he was condemned in truth by God.

73. so Christ also pays many wicked in this life with such bad wages, so that we may realize that sitting in the regiment does not belong to the very essence (rem) of the Believers. Therefore, both must be tolerated like the chaff among the wheat, until the day when the sifting is done.

And see if the prophet does not clearly indicate this. For since he had said before, "But such are not the ungodly," it would not have been necessary to repeat ["ungodly" and "sinners"] in another verse, but it would have been sufficient to say, Therefore they abide not in judgment, nor in the congregation of the righteous. 1) But he has taken away the reputation of the person (personas) and the outward appearance of men, because rich and powerful people, and if they have any other reputation, can come (surgere) into judgment and be in the congregation of the righteous, since all this concerns only the body; but the ungodly and sinners never. Therefore, a special emphasis and the whole weight lies on the words: "ungodly" and "sinners".

In truth and in spirit they are never in authority, the wicked are never among the faithful, although they shine in such a great outward appearance of life that one would think that no one is higher in authority and no one is more among the faithful than they. For this psalm attacks this pretense and hypocrisy with which they are puffed up and presumptuous, and by which they deceive themselves and others. Yes, that this is the right understanding of this verse is proven by the following verse.

V. 6 For the Lord knows the way (viam) of the righteous, but the way of the wicked (iter) perishes.

The Latin interpreter could have left his change with the expression [viam and iter] and said: "The way (via) of the ungodly", because it is one and the same way of speaking and a very beautiful contrast: "The way of the righteous", "the way of the ungodly", and so one and the same word would have been kept [as in Hebrew].

1) Instead of peoatoruiQ in all editions, we have assumed justorurri. For it is clear from the following that Luther only wanted to omit the words inipii and psecatores from the text of the Vulgate, but did not change it otherwise. The Weimar and the Basel have here consilio instead of: Concilio. The Wittenberg and the Basel also have oovsilio at the top of the Bible text.

(76) The way of the wicked has such a beautiful appearance (he says) that they are considered by men as coming into the judicium and the church. But he who is not deceived knows their ways, and that they are ungodly, and before him they are not in the number of those who are his church. He alone knows the righteous; he does not know the ungodly, that is, he does not put up with them. Therefore, what they absolutely do not believe, their way will pass away; it will pass away, I say, even though it has such a glorious progress that it seems as if it will remain forever. See how he discourages us from that which has the appearance of happiness (a specie prospera), and praises to us many a temptation and adversity. For this way of the righteous men exploit altogether, and think that even GOD does not know it, because this is the wisdom of the cross. Therefore, God alone knows the way of the righteous, so hidden is it even from the righteous, for His right leads them astray, so that it is a way not of the senses, not of reason, but only of faith, which sees in the darkness and that which is invisible.

Therefore, when we obey ungodly shepherds, we do not obey the ungodly, but men, for we do not obey or follow their ungodliness, but suffer the rule which they lead as men. Again, those who put them out and deturb them, as we see happened in Bohemia, do they expel the ungodly? No, but they expel the people. For even though the ungodly are cast out, they remain ungodly. But then an ungodly person is cast out when he is led from ungodliness to godliness, which does not happen outwardly through violent raging, but through love, which prays inwardly and exhorts by heart when God cooperates.

Whoever does not like this understanding, let him first call the Jews ungodly. For the Scripture has also proclaimed in many other places that these are to be expelled from the church. But also

The heretics and all those who publicly proclaim their ungodliness partly exclude themselves from the church, but partly the church also excludes them and puts them under ban, no matter how much they boast that they alone are the church and the people of God.

Finally, we must consider 2) what the most respected Fathers, especially Athanasius and Augustine, have taught, namely, that we should adapt and conform our sense (affectus) to the sense of the Psalms. For since the Psalter is only a kind of school (palaestra) and training of the mind of the heart (affectuum), he who does not sing them in the spirit sings the Psalms without fruit. As when you read: "Blessed is he who does not walk in the counsel 3) of the wicked," you must immediately be with the heart (affectum movere), and curse and execrate the counsel 4) of wickedness, not only for yourself, but in general for the whole church. So also "the way of sinners", so "the pestilent doctrine" (doctrinam pestilentiae). For with this fire (the fervency [affectu] of love) the heretics must be burned and all those who are ungodly minded and ungodly teach. Because we despised this fire, God gave us in a wrong sense, so that we became executioners' slaves and burned the heretics with natural fire, and in turn would be burned ourselves.

Thus, when you say, "But have a desire for the law of the Lord," do not snore, and do not surely applaud yourself, as if you were already a man who loves the law of God, but sigh with as great a fervor of heart as you are able to send a fire to the one who alone has come to earth. And as long as you live, do not think otherwise of yourself than that you are such a man who does not yet love the law of God, and urgently needs this desire for the law.

79 Thus, when you hear "that all things go well with the righteous," you must wish this for yourself, and sigh for all who are in opposition.

4) Jenaer and Erlanger: eoneiünin instead of: eonsiinin.

When you hear that "its leaves do not wither," you must wish that the pure word of God may flourish in the Church of Christ, and that all the fables and dreams of men may be rejected. Now, when you see such things happening somewhere, you should wish yourself happiness and rejoice, and give thanks to God for His goodness. Also, do not think that the impossible is demanded of you; just make the attempt, and I know that you will rejoice and be grateful. First, practice on a psalm, yes, on a little verse of a psalm. You have achieved enough if in one day or even in one week you have learned to make even one little verse alive and strong (spirantem) in your heart. After this beginning is made, everything will follow, and you will come to an exceedingly rich treasure of knowledge and love (affectionum); only see to it that you do not let yourself be deterred by weariness and despair from beginning with it. For this is called singing psalms in dignity, or as the Scripture says of David, 1) playing with the hand from the harp. For the light fingers of the harpists, which run through the strings and pluck them, are the motions of the heart (affectus), which run to and fro in the words of the psalms and stir them; as without those the strings would not be sound, a psalm is not sung even without it, because it is not touched.

80 I wanted to remind you of this once and for all in this first psalm, so that it would not be necessary to repeat the same thing for each individual psalm. But I know that if someone practices this, he alone will find more in the Psalter than all the interpretations of all men can give him. I see that St. Bernard understood this art perfectly and drew the whole wealth of his erudition from it. The same, I think, can be perceived in 2) St. Augustine and others. Therefore, we too must drink this water of life from the same source, lest the mockery of the prophet Amos strike us [Amos 6, 5. Vulg.): "They let themselves think that they had harps (vasa cantici)(that is, psalteries) like David," and again [Cap. 5, 23.]: "Thou only put away from me the noise of thy songs, for I do not like to hear thy psaltery." For how do you think that the howling or murmuring without heart and spirit, which resounds everywhere in the churches, seems different to God than a swarm of flies humming with their wings? especially if you add that you believe that this pleases God, and you make a mockery and dream image out of the living and true God.

The other Psalm.

Why do the nations rage and the people speak in vain? The kings of the land rebel, and the lords counsel with one another against the Lord and his anointed.

(1) That this psalm was made by David and speaks of Christ, proves irrefutably (cogit) the reputation of the first church, of which Lucas, Apost. 4, 24-28, says: "They lifted up their voice with one accord to God, saying: Lord, you are the God who made heaven and earth, and the sea, and everything that is who by the mouth of David your servant you said, "Why do the Gentiles rebel and the peoples take advantage of what is in vain? Why do the heathen rise up, and the nations take in vain? The kings of the earth are gathered together, and the princes are gathered together against the Lord, and against his Christ. Indeed, they have gathered together against your holy child Jesus, whom you anointed, Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the people of Israel, to do what your hand and your counsel purposed beforehand to be done" 2c.

2 Therefore one's heart must be fixed in this mind, nor be weighed and swayed by any other wind of doctrine [Eph. 4:14], for this mind is confirmed from heaven; the place moved when they had finished this their prayer, as Lucas also writes [Acts 4:31].

It is therefore clear that by the "kings of the land" Herod and Pilate are understood, even though Pilate was not king. For these two at the same time worked together to fulfill what the council of God had decided, as they [the disciples] say here (that is, that they would destroy Christ). For no other kings did this, nor does he speak of any other matter than that which was done against Christ under Pilate.

It only remains that we untie this knot, which has nothing to mean at all. Either Pilate is called a king with Herod, or according to the way of the scripture the whole was called with the very common name of a part 1), like Israel is called the firstborn son, although many among them were idolaters; again all are punished, where only few had deserved it. Thus both men are called kings, because one is a king.

4 Thus it is also sufficiently clear that by "lords" (Principes) are understood the chiefs of the priests; by "Gentiles" the Roman soldiers under Pilate, who seized, scourged and crucified Jesus; by "people" the common people of the Jews or Israel, as they (the apostles) themselves say.

In this place "Gentiles" (gens) and "people" (populus) are obviously distinguished, but I do not dare to say, nor do I think, that this distinction is constantly running through everything, although the word "Gentiles" is very often used in contrast to Israel or the Jews, so that the church of the Gentiles, and Paul the apostle of the Gentiles, is now called so in many writings (auctoritate) and in common life in contrast to the church of the Jews or that which came from the Jews.

1) Baseler: patris instead of: xartis; a misprint.

Note the exact observation of the division: the pagans rage, the people talk in vain, the kings rebel, the lords confer with each other. The pagans, as unreasonable beasts, rage, because they did not know what they were doing; but the people gossiped and made their counsels together, namely, they spoke unworthy things against the Most High and showered him with hateful speeches, as in the 109th Psalm [v. 2. f.], where they said: Come, let us kill him, and the inheritance shall be ours. And Caiphas Joh. 11, 49. f. said, when the council had assembled (concilio coacto): 3) "You know nothing, consider nothing; it is better for us that one man die for the people, than that the whole people perish." This, then, is the vain speaking (tractatus) by which they so often sought to destroy Christ, and the trumped-up accusations before Pilate; here he calls it vain speaking.

The kings, however, decided (statuerunt) (for this is how adstiterunt is to be understood according to the Hebrew), that is, determined, pronounced, confirmed the raving and speaking of those people when they passed judgment on Christ. It is said [Marc. 15, 15.], "Pilate, however, thought to do enough to the people, and released Barabbam to them, and delivered JEsu to them to be crucified." The lords came together, they contended, they at the same time persuaded [the people] and strengthened them in their desire to destroy JEsu, for [Marc. 15, 11.] "they provoked the people that they should much rather ask for Barabbam." 2c.

Pay attention to the restraint and modesty of the prophet's speech, how mildly and, as it were, compassionately he expresses their rage. For although he could have called their raging words: "Away, away with him, crucify, crucify him" [John 19:15], and other cruel cries of the Jews, with which they accused Christ, a frenzy and a murderous attack (impetus), he only calls it speech (meditationes). But meditatio, as we said above [Ps. 1, 2., § 38], is a chatter and a verbal sub-talk. For it is

2) In the issues: ks. 108.

3) Jenaer and Erlanger: consilio instead of: Concilio.

This is evil talk. For just as a lover gladly speaks many things of the beloved object, so also a hater speaks and chats on and on about the one he hates, and that the very worst. A similar moderation is in the words [according to the Vulgate] fremuerunt [they murmur], adstiterunt [they stand by], convenerunt [they come together], while the thing itself is far more terrible than the meaning of these words indicates.

(5) By this we are instructed not to magnify the evil that men do, as the slanderers do, but to minimize it as much as possible, that we may show that we are not indignant on our account, nor grieved for their misery. For the Holy Spirit is kind, not seeking glory in the evil that others do, but in His goodness having compassion on all. For St. Peter also mentions that Christ neither scolded nor threatened when he suffered, nor sought vengeance, but brought all things home to him who judges rightly.

6 "In vain" he says. With this word he understands almost everything that this psalm is about, because the prophet wants to show that Christ was set up as king by God the Father, which could not have been prevented by the counsels, efforts and the raging of many and great people from pagans and Jews, from kings and lords, who opposed it, but these would have done everything in such vain that they made a mockery of themselves, and just by opposing them only promoted the kingdom of Christ all the more, just as if he had wanted to prove by this psalm as by an example what he said in the first psalm: "And what he does is well done," as long as it is understood by Christ.

7 For the word in the 45th Psalm [v. 5, Vulg.], "Go forth in your adornment and in your beauty, and prosper and reign," belongs to this; and in the 118th Psalm, v. 25 f., "O Lord, help, O Lord, prosper! Blessed is He who comes in the name of the Lord!" For the good pleasure of Christ is (as I have said [Ps. 1:3, § 62]) not temporal nor carnal, but spiritual. For who is there, that, when Christ suffered, would not have made my

Who should have believed that he would never be 1) even the very least man, and not come to life again, let alone that he would be a king over all things? Who should not have believed that the speeches of the people were confirmed and not in vain, since they boasted that he was also condemned by them to the curse of the cross [Matth. 27, 42. f.] because of God's sending (auctore Deo), and thought that their speeches were eternally fixed?

8) Faith and hope are always necessary in the works of God, not only that they may be accepted (ferendis), but also that they may be understood, since they are fulfilled against all understanding, above all comprehension.

9 And this also is a word of faith, "Against the LORD and his anointed." For they were regarded as acting for the Lord and for Christ, both by all others and especially in their own eyes. So also today and always the wicked work for the glory of GOD, against the glory of GOD, with frightening boldness (periculo). For God rules the world in such a way, and turns its wisdom into foolishness, that those who are judged to be acting for the honor of God are actually working to blaspheme Him, and those who are accused of blasphemy are actually fighting for the honor of God. His way is in secret, in faith, in holiness; "the court is not measured, for it is given to the Gentiles," Revelation 11:2. [Vulg.]t he: "Against the Lord," then: "Against His anointed," because every sin offends God first of all. For He is not only righteousness, but also the love of righteousness, and from Him all who love righteousness receive it, and it would not be a sin if it did not offend God.

11 But he also arranges the words in this way so that we may learn for our comfort and admonition that we never suffer a wrong without God being offended sooner and more than we are, and that God's care is so great.

1) In the original edition and the Erlanger: NULgnara, in the other editions: unguin. We have followed the former reading, because in the latter the nou would have to be deleted.

that He feels our insult sooner and bears it with greater displeasure than we ourselves do, so that we should not be moved to revenge, indeed, we should rather have mercy on those of whom we see that they are running to their ruin against such a high majesty, since they not only cannot harm, but rather ruin themselves in a frightening way. Thus says GOD [Zech. 2, 8.], "He that toucheth you toucheth the apple of mine eye."

12 For the prophet also, as if he were heartily sorry for their iniquity, begins with a question, "Why do they rage?" Why do they make a mockery of themselves? Why do the fools do impossible things? Oh that they would come to their senses and become wise. Then he admonishes them and urges them to do something right (solida) instead of futile things, that is, that they should rather be instructed and become wise, so that they serve Christ with fear.

Finally, he makes the inanity and the futile efforts even greater through the mild words. He says [Vulg.]: "They murmur, they talk, they decide, they counsel," as if he wanted to say: You may murmur, but you cannot do it; you talk and chatter a lot, but you will get nowhere; the kings decide, and nothing comes of it; the lords counsel, and it will be in vain. What else do you get out of it than that you wanted to accomplish a lot through your vain endeavors, that you undertook difficult things, that you put everything into it, and that you did not succeed in any of it, but everything turned out to be the opposite?

Thus God allows ravings and counsels and efforts to be made against the godly, but all this is like the swelling tides of water, which rush against the user with their surge, as if to break it down, and before they reach the shore, collapse in on themselves and disappear, or break down on the shore with empty talk. For the righteous, as a firm shore in faith in Christ, quite confidently despises these powerless threats and quickly collapsing surges. For he knows that Moab is very proud, and that his might never so great as his presumption, and his wrath greater than his ability, as Isaiah [Cap. 16, 6.] and Jeremiah [Cap. 48, 29.f.] say.

15 With this cross the wicked are martyred quite cheaply, since it is an exceedingly great torture when someone wants to do harm in all things and can do harm in nothing, so that even the pagans have said of envy: The Sicilian tyrants suffered no greater torture than envy. This is all the more graceful in the matter of Christians, because not only are the wicked tormented, and not only can they do no harm, but out of God's counsel, by their torment, their futile attempts, they must most of all promote that which they strive to prevent, so that even friends cannot be of as much use to a Christian as enemies.

V. 3 Let us break their bands and throw off their ropes.

16. this verse must be connected with the words: "they rave, they talk, they rebel", so that the meaning is: Surely that is why they rave, that is why they chat, that is how they deal with it, that is what they have decided, that they want to pull the neck out of God's and Christ's yoke, to break their (eorum) bonds and say: "We do not want this one to rule over us", Luc. 19, 1) 14., or the word, Job 21, 14. 15.: "They say to GOD, 'Get thee away from us; we will not know thy ways.' Who is the Almighty, that we should serve him? or what are we improved, if we call upon him?" For thus the prophet introduces the wicked speaking.

Others are of a different opinion about it, but in the meantime I stick to this understanding. Therefore, what has caused others concern, that it is said in the plural "their" (eorum and ipsorum), must be referred to "the LORD and his anointed". For these are undoubtedly two, God and man, the sender and the sent, as if it were said: The people have rejected both the sent and the prince, and they have not accepted their (eorum) counsel.

(17) But that the divine commandments are signified by "bands" and "ropes" by means of a fancy or figurative speech is shown in Jer. 5:4 f.: "But I said, 'Well, the poor multitude is ignorant, they know not the way of the LORD, nor the right of their God. I will go to the mighty and speak to them; they will know the way of the Lord and the right of their God; but they all had broken the yoke and torn the cords. Ibid. Cap. 2, 20. [Vulg.]: "For thou hast always broken my yoke, and rent my bands," although this passage is corrupted, since in Hebrew God says in the first person: "I have always broken thy yoke, and rent thy bands," so that bands stand against bands, yoke against yoke, the way of God against the way of men, the judgment of God against the judgment of men.

"Bands" are the commandments of Christ, by which we are instructed to walk in his way; the yoke or "cords" are the judgment by which we are forbidden. The yoke or "ropes" are the judgment by which we are forbidden to do evil, so that the former is the justification of the spirit, the latter the putting to death of the flesh. But there are two things that are commanded: To cease from evil, and to do good; the former is to crucify the lusts of the flesh, the latter is to do good works. There is nothing wrong if someone wants to confuse these things with each other, so that he wants to take the bands for judgment and the ropes (jugum) for righteousness, because the meaning remains the same; if one has this, one should not quarrel about words.

But the whole verse is figurative, for "to tear" is taken for despising and making futile; "bands" for commandments; "to cast away" for disobeying, neglecting, not accepting; "ropes" (jugum) for instruction and discipline in mortification of the flesh. I do not mean, however, in a fanciful speech (allegoricum) after the manner of the moderns, as if another, historical (historicus) sense were to be sought under it than that which is expressed, but that he expressed the right and proper sense in figurative speech.

18 Behold, to the perverse all things are perverse, as it is written Ps. 18:26: "By to the perverse thou art perverse." The law of Christ, which is a law of freedom and sweetness, they call "bonds" and "cords", considering it bondage and hard service; again, their law, which is a right bondage and inability (infirmitas), they believe is freedom and easy to fulfill (facilitatem). Even so, everything is evil to the wicked. Jer. 23:38-10: "Now ye call this word the burden of the LORD, and I have sent unto you, saying, Ye shall not call it the burden of the LORD: behold, I will take you away, and cast you out of my sight, and will bring upon you everlasting shame and reproach" 2c. For inevitably the one who has pleasure in his own dislikes what is God's.

19 Again, eyes of faith are needed here, for the prophet does not say this as if he thought that they had in truth recognized the Lord and Christ when they said, "Let us break their bonds," believing that they were acting for God and His law when they rejected Christ; but the prophet calls "the Lord and His anointed," which he describes as having been despised by them because they did not recognize them. And behold, if for this reason he did not want to use the fanciful expression in the whole verse, to show that they hypocritically pretended something else than they did, and in their blindness did a kind of fanciful work (operis allegoriam) by rejecting the Lord and Christ, since they pretended to do the most for them.

Might it not also be that the prophet has put the pronoun "their" as a diminishing speech (per tapinosin), so that he at the same time refers to and understands it from the Lord and his Christ, and at the same time also punishes their exceedingly great contempt, in which they also do not consider Christ worthy of a name, let alone acknowledge him for the Lord and the Christ? Thus he has described their efforts so far, by which they wanted to bring it about that Christ would not be installed as king, whom the Lord had already installed, by which they not only oppose Christ, but much more oppose God's decree.

order, as is shown in David and Saul. For David also was anointed king by God's command, but Saul resisted both God's decree and David's most stubbornly, and in a not dissimilar manner he also raged, spoke much, resolved much, counseled much against him. But as he did all in vain, so did the Jews and the Gentiles against Christ, as follows:

v. 4. But he who dwells in heaven laughs at them, and the Lord mocks them.

20) This tautology or repetition of the same thing, which frequently occurs in Scripture, indicates certainty (firmitatis), as the holy patriarch Joseph confirms, Gen. 41, 32, where he says, interpreting Pharaoh's dreams [Vulg.]: "But that you have seen the thing concerning the dream the second time is a sign of certainty, because that which God has spoken comes to pass, and is fulfilled exceedingly quickly." So also here "he laughs at them" and "he mocks them" the same is repeated, so that there can be no doubt that everything will happen most certainly.

(21) This is what the good Spirit does for our encouragement and comfort, so that we do not fall away in the face of adversity, but rather build ourselves up to the most certain hope, because it will surely come and not be forgiven (Hab. 2:3). Therefore, although in human speeches such a repetition of what has been said (tautologia) seems erroneous and superfluous, yet in divine things it is most necessary, especially because hope (as the wise man says (Prov. 13:12)), which is consumed, anguishes the heart; true hope, I say, which has need in suffering and the cross. For all delay is hard for those who are exercised in the sufferings of Christ. Therefore, they need the firmest and most sure promise of God to sustain them.

(22) Again, as in promises of good things comfort cannot be sufficiently impressed upon the afflicted, so in threats of evil things terror cannot be sufficiently taught to the unintelligent, hard and unbelieving. For this reason, repetition of what has been said is also necessary in this piece, so that it can be understood by the quite certain and over

The people are terrified by a strong threat. For as those people have too much fear and too little hope and security, so with these there is too much security and hope, but in general no fear, as the 36th Psalm, 1) v. 2, says: "There is no fear of God with them. For these it is necessary that they fear the Lord, for those that they hope in His mercy, and on both sides the right middle road exists, which is described thus: "The Lord is pleased with those who fear Him, who hope in His goodness" [Ps. 147, 11.].

23 Now this is written, "that we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope" [Rom. 15:4]. For what is here written of Christ is an example to all Christians. For everyone who wants to be a sincere Christian, especially if he also teaches the word of Christ, must suffer his Herod, Pilate, lords, kings, pagans and people who rage against him, speak in vain, rebel against him and argue with each other. If this is not done by men, it will at least be done in the end by devils and finally in one's own conscience. Then it is necessary to remember these and similar comforts: "He who dwells in heaven laughs at them, and the Lord mocks them," and to hold fast to this hope and not waver from any cause.

24. And to fortify the confidence of the afflicted the more, he says especially strongly (ἰμφοτιχώως), "He will laugh and mock," as if to say: So certain is it that they make vain efforts, however firm their pretensions may be in the opinion of all men, that the Lord does not think it worth while to resist them "in earnest," or as if it were a great matter, but he laughs at and mocks them as in a very trifling matter, as is also said on the same stroke in the 37th Psalm. Psalm, v. 12. f., says: "The wicked threatens the righteous, and gnashes his teeth at him. But the LORD laugheth at him; for he seeth that his day cometh." Furthermore, we see that our adversaries will not only be humiliated, but also laughed at.

1) In the Latin editions: 14. In the Vulgate this word is found in the place where Ps. 13, 3. is inserted.

25 O how great strength of faith is required in these words! For who could have imagined that God would laugh, since Christ suffers and the Jews triumph? So also, when we are oppressed, when do we believe that our adversaries are laughed at by God, since it seems to us that we, both by God and by men, are laughed at and trampled underfoot.

26. but this mockery of God is, as I have said, that he made a mockery of the Jews and the Gentiles, who killed Christ, to the whole world, by raising him from the dead, and since there could be no hope that the kingdom of Christ could extend to even one people, he caused his eternal dominion to spring up over all creatures, and so perverted their proposals that it took just the opposite outcome with them, so that we can sing [Ps. 113, 4]: "The Lord is high above all nations; his glory reaches as far as the heavens", who was humbled below all Jews, and whose shame was also deeper than the earth. Therefore, as in the preceding verses the suffering and death of Christ is prophesied, so in this verse His resurrection, though somewhat obscure, is foretold.

But what is the purpose of these periphrasis: "He who dwells in heaven"? By these words, in order to strengthen our hope, he paints God at once as one at rest (quietum) and as a wonderfully hidden judge. He who takes care of us dwells securely and quietly, and when we are troubled, He who takes care of us is not troubled. We are tossed to and fro, but he sitteth, that he should not leave the righteous in trouble for ever [Ps. 55:23.].

(28) But all this is so hidden that you cannot know it unless you are in heaven. On earth, on water, in all creatures you have suffering; everywhere and in all things the hope of help is cut off from you, until you leap over everything by faith and hope, and seize him who dwells in heaven, for then you also dwell in heaven, but in faith and hope. Here, then, in all tribulations, we must cast out the anchor of our heart

In this way, the evil of the world will not only be easy for us, but also a source of laughter.

V. 5. He will speak to them in his wrath one day, and with his fury he will terrify them.

(29) What was said in the previous verse about the repetition of the same things (tautologia) must also be kept for this verse. For ignorant people and the despisers of God nothing can be said sufficiently. For the Leviathan, Job 41, 17-19. [loosely from the Vulgate], laughs at the whirring spear, and esteems a hammer like straw, and iron like chaff, and brass like rotten wood. An archer does not drive him away, the sling stones become on him like stubble 2c., though perhaps there seems to be no tautology here.

030 But when did he speak to them in his wrath, or in what did his wrath consist? Certainly when he laughed at them; which we will know when we know what it means that God speaks in his anger. Jer. 18:7 says: "Suddenly I speak against a people and against a kingdom, to cut them off, to break them, and to destroy them" 2c.

31) So "to speak in anger" means to cut off, to break and to destroy; this is what happened to the Jews, who said [Joh. 11, 48. 504 "Lest the Romans come and take away our land and our people, it is better that one man die, than that the whole nation perish." These vain speeches the LORD ridicules, since (as Prov. 10:24 is written) that which the wicked fears will meet him; and by the Romans he cut them off, broke them, and corrupted them. So it was the wrath and fury of God that was the impetuous attack of the Romans, as Isaiah Cap. 19, 5. f. says: "O woe to Assyria, who is the rod of my wrath, and her hand the staff of my fury. I will send him against a deceitful (that is, a hypocritical, dissembling) people, and will command him against the people of my wrath" 2c. According to my judgment, these words are definitely said by the Roman army. For that he says: "I will command him", he expresses it in this verse like this: "He will speak to them", because everything happens by the command and the word of God [Ps. 33, 9]: "For as he speaks, so it happens" 2c.

32 Therefore this word: "He will speak" must be taken without special relation (absolute), from this way: He will speak, that is, he will determine, command, decree by his word, but that it shall be against them, not for them; then, not in mercy, but in wrath. For he also speaketh against the righteous, and against his children, commanding that the cross and death should be inflicted upon them, as it is said in 2 Sam. 16:10, "The LORD hath commanded him, Cursing David," 2c.; but in mercy. If now [in the fifth verse of our Psalm] the preposition "with" is changed into "against", and the verb "he will speak" into "he will command", the text will be clearer: He will once command against them in his wrath.

He will not only break and destroy them, but he will also "terrify" them, for he has consumed them outwardly by strife and inwardly by fear. Of course, he also terrifies his children and puts them in extraordinary fear, like Christ in the garden, but in mercy. But the Jews, since they were devastated and killed by the Romans, he has set in terror for eternity by the beginning of fear. For it is impossible that the wicked, when he dies, should not fall into an eternal terror. It would have been a mild punishment if they had only been devastated; but that they were devastated in anger is terrifying. But by far the most terrifying thing is that, having been devastated and killed in anger, they were also terrified in fury and cast into eternal horror by death.

34) Now see the register 1) of the terrible punishments that are prepared for the murderers of Christ. First, they lose the honor for which they most raged against Christ, becoming a laughingstock before God and all men, seeing their shame everywhere, which is no small evil for arrogant and envious people. Then they lose everything they relied on and are devastated, wiped out, 2) destroyed, so that they have no comfort even in body. Finally, the greatest evil is added, that their gloom and anguish terrifies their souls with eternal fear.

1) Weimarsche: cstalø^ium instead of: eatuto^uiu.

2) Instead of raäicautur in the Baseler, in the Weimarsche and in the Erlanger, 4-raäic'niitr is to be read.

35. Thus they are beaten in their good reputation, in bodily goods and in eternal goods, and no creature, not even God Himself, is inclined toward them. Dear one, who should not now let himself lament for his enemies, who should not weep for them, who should not suffer everything for them, let alone from them, who firmly believes that this unbearable misfortune is in store for them.

(36) First, they are ridiculed and mocked, because their honor is turned into the highest disgrace (for this is their outward possession). Then they are devastated, robbed of their goods and their father's inheritance (facultatibus), which is their other possession. Finally they are frightened with fear, so that all hope and confidence in the spirit is gone; this is their inner and last possession; and these people become like dust before the wind. And again you see that the punishment of the wicked is described as fear and terror. For as the kingdom of God is righteousness and peace and safety, so hell must necessarily be sin, fear and terror.

V. 6. But I have set up my king on my holy mountain Zion. 3)

37 Here the person changes, because not David speaks of himself, but Christ. But the Hebrew text speaks in the person of the Father: "I have set my King on my holy mountain Zion" or decreed. Nor do I think that this matter is of such great importance that we should quarrel over a disputed word, since both minds are good, only that the Hebrew text is more suited to the mode of speech in use in Scripture, according to which authorship (auctoritas) is ascribed to the Father, as in the 110th Psalm, v. 1. Psalm, v. 1: "The Lord said to my Lord, 'Sit at my right hand,'" and Ps. 89:28: "And I will make him the first son, most high among the kings of the earth." Stapulensis means that one could say: But I have anointed my king, in that he establishes himself on the word of the believers, Apost. 4:27: "They have gathered together concerning thy child JESUS, whom thou hast anointed." But it is seen that they took the word, "Thou hast anointed," not from this verse, but rather from the second, when they said [Acts 4:26], "Against his Christ," which is as much as, "Against his anointed," which they repeat to confirm it the more strongly (confirmandi affectu). Truly," they say [v. 27], "he is the Christ and the anointed whom you have anointed, that is, made a Christian.

This I say in my low opinion: If the Hebrew text did not require that sanctum meum be connected with "Mount Zion," it might seem to refer to Christ, so that the sense would be: I have set my King on Mount Zion, not any man at random, but he who is "my Holy One," anointed by me with the Holy Spirit. For Christ is called in Scripture the Holy One of God and the Holy One in Israel, as Ps. 16:10: "Thou wilt not suffer thy Holy One to decay," and Ps. 89:19: "The LORD is our shield, and the Holy One in Israel is our King." But the Hebrew text (as I have said) has "my holy mountain."

So the meaning is: They have not wanted him to rule over them and have conspired against me and my king. But my counsel shall stand, and my will be done. Who can resist my face? They have killed him, I have made him king; they have withdrawn themselves from him, I have subdued to him the holy mountain of Zion and all the ends of the earth, and so they have become a laughing stock and a mockery, and it is publicly shown that they have spoken in vain.

This verse belongs to the doctrine (locum communem) of ambition and presumption, which nowadays prevail in the Church of Christ in the most impudent manner. For this is what the apostle says in his letter to the Hebrews, Cap. 5, 4. f.: "And no man taketh glory to himself, but he also which is called of God, even as Aaron. So also Christ did not take glory to himself, but he who said to him: You are my Son"; and again [Ps. 110, 1.]: "Sit down with me.

Right hand." This is what almost the whole psalm inculcates here, which describes that everything concerning Christ is ordered by the Father, not arrogated and sought by Christ himself. But for many years now our decrees have hardly been about anything other than dignity, power, privileges, which reeks very strongly of ambition, without the Father having decreed or instituted anything of this.

The church of Christ is called "Mount Zion" because it began there and was established by the sending of the Holy Spirit, and although it is not bound to any place, it was nevertheless necessary that it had its beginning in a certain place. Therefore it was spread out from there over the whole earth, so that the word of Christ Joh. 4, 21. would be fulfilled: "The time is coming that neither in Jerusalem nor on this mountain will you worship the Father. And so the gospel has no place and yet has all places.

At the same time, through the Holy Spirit as a teacher, the Church of Jerusalem has preserved this modesty, that it has never quarreled with other churches over the primacy and dignity, as the churches of Rome and Constantinople had a protracted and annoying dispute, although the latter (if a primacy were to be sought at all) should have been fully preferred to the other churches: rightly should have been preferred to the other churches, both because Christ Himself was the bishop of them, the King appointed by God the Father, and also because the whole Church took its beginning there, and from there all churches arose, and it alone is in truth the mother of the churches, where all the apostles and disciples were, as it were, the elders. But God did not want this to happen, so that He would show us that this arrogation of primacy was reprehensible, and that no other church should seek it, since He did not allow it even to this one, to which it was due.

41 I say this not as if I condemn the supremacy (monarchiam) of the Roman Church, but because I detest that it is forced and imposed and arrogated to oneself, as if it were a commandment of God, when in fact it is a mutual agreement between the faithful and the Church.

should be established through the bond of love, so that it would be a supremacy, not of commanding power, but of serving love. The presumption I reject, the cause I approve. Gold is not evil, but avarice; the flesh is not evil, but the lust of the flesh. But even here Christ resisted quite vigilantly, because he never suffered the churches of the East to be subjected to this [our] church.

So the church is called Mount Zion, according to the quite common way of speaking (tropo) of the synecdoche, the containing for the contained in it, like the city Jerusalem for the people of the city. However, it is not only for this reason an obscure speech, but also in the name, the thing and the form lies the same. The name Zion denotes a waiting place. The church is not only called a lookout because it looks out for God and heavenly things by faith (that is, from afar), seeking what is above, not what is on earth, but also because in it are the right guards (speculatores) and the watchful in spirit, to whom it is incumbent to take care of the people who are among them, and to be careful of the wiles of enemies and sinners. These are called in Greek episcopi, as it were watchmen, and for the same reason you might suppose that they would like to be called from the Hebrew Zionists or Zionians.

But the thing is that Zion is a mountain. Thus the church is high in the sight of God through spiritual height, because of the greatness of the virtues, gifts, graces, effects 2c. by which God has exalted it above all authority, wisdom and righteousness of men, as it is said in Isa. 2, 2. and Mich. 4:1: "The mountain where the Lord's house is shall be higher than all mountains, and shall be exalted above all hills." Again, I must interpret this for the sake of the carnal dreamers who always drag the word of God on the splendor of the world. The church will be exalted above all the power and height of the world, not by riches or painting, but by faith, hope, love, and the virtues that despise worldly riches and power. For the fact that the church is now high in these things is not the church's fault.

It is not a church of its own, but a foreign leviathan, and that is why it has decreased so much in wisdom in the word of God, in holiness of life, in the practice (virtute) of good works 2c. For these are the mountains and the very heights of the church of Christ, in which the world cannot follow it. But in those things it [the Roman Church] has long surpassed the world, if it must be called a church that does such things. For it is certain that the true church of Christ will always remain the same.

The figure of Mount Zion was that it rose at the southern end [of the city of Jerusalem] and had the city of Jerusalem under it, sloping down on the north side, and [the city] rising up to it, as it says in Ps. 48:3: "Mount Zion, on the side toward the north, is the city of the great King."

This descending and ascending can mean the inner struggle of Christ's people, which takes place between the flesh and the spirit; the flesh strives toward midnight, the spirit toward noon; or the two kinds of life (duas vitas), the active and the contemplative. The former descends to do temporal things for others, the latter ascends to heavenly things, and inclines to the watch where the watchmen (episcopi) are, all excellent in life and word, and draw others to themselves. In the middle between Mount Zion and Jerusalem) is Mount Moria, the mountain of the temple. Here is Christ, God and man, encompassing both, dwelling in both, as the same Mount Moriah, located in Jerusalem under Mount Zion, depicts.

For it is the mountain Moria, that is, of seeing, on which Abraham sacrificed his son, on which also Solomon built the temple afterwards, and we are sacrificed over Christ with Isaac and are formed into the temple of God through the right Solomon. For Christ is Mount Moriah to us, because God neither sees nor recognizes anyone who is not sacrificed and built in this place, that is, above Christ and in Christ, for only on this one do the eyes of the Lord look. Therefore the mountain is called: "The Lord sees" eternally [Gen. 22, 14]. But the heretics and the arrogant judge other mountains of the

They are not able to see, or rather not to see, because they want to merit by their righteousness and works that God will look upon them graciously.

"Holy" he is called, not because of exemplary (figurali) holiness of law or external consecration, for he speaks in the spirit. Therefore, he is not content to say: the holy mountain; he adds "my" as if to say: Who also is holy by my holiness, not by those by which stones, wood, walls are consecrated, but by which mind and body are consecrated by means of the anointing of the grace of the Spirit, and by faith, hope, and love are purified from day to day. For that is holy which, separated from common use, is consecrated only to holy and divine use. This is done as a ceremony (ceremonialiter) and in letter by men, the bishops, but in truth and in spirit by the Holy Spirit poured out in our hearts.

42 In all this he obviously distinguishes the kingdom of Christ from all other kingdoms. Of this king alone he proclaims, "I have instituted him," [according to the Vulgate], "I am instituted." This person, because GOD is invisible and wholly spiritual (spiritualissimus), certainly indicates a spiritual appointor, since he does not appoint the others by himself, but men by men. Visible through visible. It is therefore Christ's kingdom not of this world, but in spirit and in truth. Likewise, "My King" does not mean a king of men, or which men appoint. Christ is therefore a king in spirit and before God.

43) Then, although he is appointed "on Mount Zion", nevertheless it is added: "my sanctify" (or/Vulg?: "his sanctify"), that it may be known that the kingdom of Christ is indeed a people in Zion, but such a people as is holy in spiritual holiness.

44 Again, you see that the church of Christ does not exist in worldly power, wisdom, or dignity, although there are people who say that there is no Christian outside the new supremacy, since the power of the supremacy has nothing to do with spiritual holiness.

V. 7. I will preach of such a way, 1) that the Lord has said to me: You are my son, today I have begotten you.

The Hebrew text begins the seventh verse in this way: "I will preach God's commandment, which the Lord has said to me: You are my Son, today I have begotten you." This connection has, I think, the effect of letting us know of what kind of commandment he wants to be understood that of which he says he will preach, namely, of that which he adds: "The LORD hath said unto me, Thou art my son" 2c. This, he says, I have as my commandment; to this end I am appointed as king, that I should proclaim to all that I am the Son of GOD, for I must transfigure the Father. For this is the purpose (scopus) of the whole Gospel, that Christ may be known as the Son of God, as it is said in Matth. 16, 15. f.: "Who do you say that I am? Peter answered, "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. The church is built on this rock.

46 Paul also says in 1 Cor. 1, 24: "We preach Christ, divine power and divine wisdom. And Christ Himself does nothing else in the whole Gospel of John than to prove Himself to be the Son of God (ostendat) by always preaching that God is His Father. This was also impressed upon him in his suffering as a crime worthy of death. For Christ came to establish the faith through which one believes in Him as the Son of God. But this faith is the fulfillment of all laws, the righteousness for all eternity, the work of the miraculous deed (magnificentiae) of God, the slaying of the flesh, the revival of the spirit, the victory over the world, the victory over the flesh, the victory over hell, as Christ says [Matth. 16, 18.]: "The gates of hell shall not prevail against it"; in short, it is all in all. Thus he says John 8:24: "If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins"; again John 11:2) 26: "He that believeth on me shall never die."

1) The preceding words are drawn in the Vulgate to the sixth verse and read there: krneäieans praeesvtnrn ejus findem ich sein Gebot predige).

2) In the Latin editions:

47 Therefore the letters of the apostles are full of the teaching of faith, which is eternal life itself, as John 3:36 says: "He who believes in the Son has eternal life. He that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him"; and Cap. 12:49: "I have not spoken of myself, but the Father which sent me hath given me a commandment what I should do and what I should say. And I know that his commandment is life eternal. Therefore that I speak, I speak thus, as the Father hath told me." So it is clear that he preached the commandment of God, namely that of faith in him as the Son of God, for salvation to all those who receive him, who believe in his name 2c. [Joh. 1, 12.]

48 But you will say: If the spirit wanted this, why did he not order the words more clearly, in this way: I will proclaim God's commandment that I am his Son, today he has begotten me 2c.? I answer: The Holy Spirit remains the same everywhere. For he also observes this in the Gospel of John, when he speaks of himself and his divinity, that he always takes on the appearance of the Father, and attributes everything that he is to the Father. He says: "I do not speak of myself" [Joh. 14, 10.], "my teaching is not mine" [Joh. 7, 16.], and [Joh. 14, 10.]: "The Father who dwells in me, the same does the works." And many other sayings.

So also here. Since he said that he will proclaim that he is the Son of God according to the commandment of the Father, he first introduces the Father speaking to him, so that we should hear more the Father in your Son speaking of the Son than the Son himself speaking of himself, so that the meaning is: I will proclaim God's commandment that I am the Son of God, but I will not do this out of my authority (auctoritate), lest it seem as if I were boasting. Rather, I will proclaim to you what the Father has said about me, so that you may hear him speak about me, who has commanded me to proclaim what he has said to me, so that you may believe me through his authority (auctoritate) in what I say about myself.

And notice, this change of persons, soon of the Father, soon of the Son, who proclaims the Father's words about him, is venerable and holy, in that it presents the divine nature and the likeness [of the Son to the Father] more unbreakably than that I, impure as I am, should dare to expatiate on it more widely. Yes, this Psalm is one of the main Psalms in the whole Psalter. This suffices [to prove this assertion] that also according to the testimony of the apostle Paul this verse speaks of the begetting of the Godhead, since he says Hebr. 1, 5: "For to what angel did he ever say, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee?"

Now everyone can see for himself that the words of the Father refer to the only begotten Son. It is said: "He has said to me", namely to One, not to many, "you are my Son", the only one, in that he undoubtedly designates him with such special characteristics as the Son exalted above all others, of whom the 89th Psalm, verse 7, says [Vulg.]: "Who may be like God among the children of God?" as if he wanted to say: There are many children of God, but among them is One who is God, who is like him? Likewise, "I begat you," I alone begat you 2c.

And how watchfully and in what a dignified way the holy fathers have interpreted this: "Today I have begotten you", that is, for eternity. Eternity is that he has been begotten, is begotten, and will be begotten without end, he for whom this means "to be a son", that he is born of the Father; he has neither begun to be born, nor will he cease to be born, but is always born by a birth taking place entirely in the present (praesentissima). It is rightly said, "begotten today," that is, who is always born. For this "today" has not a "yesterday" or a "tomorrow", but it is perpetual, as He says John 8:58: "Before Abraham was, I am."

49. Where then are you, wretched and ambitious people, who either ambitiously seek the governorship (vices) of this king in the church, or fruitlessly hold it, who do not proclaim God's commandment, do not preach Jesus Christ the crucified, the Son of God, for the salvation of the faithful, but gather treasures, set up one merrymaking over another, and with every possible ostentation drive your wills.

This Son of God, appointed as a man to be king, does not seek what is his, but proclaims the commandment of God, who did not accept his kingdom for himself, but for others to be blessed, for the glory of the Father.

50 But this one office of the word, which is the bishops' alone, is neglected above all others. Then, if there are some who teach in their stead, they teach not the commandment of the Lord, not Christ, but their fables, or, if it is best, the laws and traditions of men. Therefore do not believe that there is the church, the holy mountain of God, where Christ does not teach Christ completely pure. For it is an exceedingly grave word that he says: "I will proclaim God's commandment." "God's," he says, not man's commandment, counsel, stories. And "I myself will proclaim"; for unless Christ speaks in us, we shall never proclaim the commandment of GOD. "I," says he, "will be with thy mouth" [Ex. 4:12.], and [Ps. 81:11.], "Open thy mouth wide, let me fill it."

Our translation [the Vulgate] thus agrees very well with the Hebrew in the sense, only that the different division 1) also tends to impair the sense; but if one has the sense, the division will not harm; therefore I will not argue about it.

(51) So this verse distinguishes the kind of doctrine taught in the New Testament from that taught in the Old Testament. Formerly the law was taught, which caused wrath [Rom. 4, 15.] and increased sin; now faith is taught, which works forgiveness and fulfills righteousness. Therefore the lawgiver there is Moses, a man and a servant; here the lawgiver is Christ, God and the Lord of all things. The former made slaves of sin, the latter free of righteousness.

Not as if the law should not also be taught now (since Christ says, Matth. 13, 52, that both are taught by a scribe, taught for the kingdom of heaven, both the old and the new), but that the preaching of grace is proper to the new testament.

Since there is no one in this life in whom all the fullness of the New Testament has been fulfilled, no one will be found who does not still have some part of the Old Testament left. For this life is a transition and a kind of passage (phase) from law to grace, from sin to righteousness, from Moses to Christ; but the completion comes with the future resurrection.

v. 8: "Cry unto me, and I will give thee the heathen for an inheritance, and the end of the world for a possession."

(52) This also belongs to the commandment which Christ took upon himself to proclaim by the commandment of the Father. He says: "The Lord has said to me," and the Father has commanded me, "that I should ask of him the Gentiles for an inheritance," and this commandment of his I will proclaim, so that you may believe and know that I have been appointed as such a great king on his holy mountain Zion, that is, over the people of Israel, but also as heir and Lord over all things, so that whoever hears this commandment of God from me and believes may come to the Father through me and be saved.

Again, you see that Christ's kingdom is not one that he has subjected himself to out of his own presumption, but it is established by the prestige and command of the Father. For not only did the ambitious have to be left no example or remedy (patrocinium), but their vice also had to be kept in check by divine prestige; but even so this so strong abomination is not sufficiently resisted. Christ, the Lord of all things, acts and does nothing in the church without God's command, and the little worms of men undertake and dare everything out of their own iniquity in the church, which is not theirs.

54. But what is the meaning of this, that when he goes to Mount Zion, he is not commanded to seek the kingdom over Mount Zion, but that the inheritance over the Gentiles is promised to him only upon his seeking, and is even commanded to seek it? Perhaps because Israel was promised the blessing and the kingdom of Christ in Abraham, but to the Gentiles it is given without promise out of mercy, as it says in Rom. 15:8, 9: "But I say that Jesus Christ has been a servant of the circumcision of the Lord."

to confirm the promise made to the fathers for the sake of God's truth, but that the Gentiles praise God for the sake of mercy" 2c. The truth has been proven to the Jews and the promise fulfilled, but the Gentiles have been granted free mercy. Therefore, in the prophets "mercy" and "truth" are very often connected with each other, although this was also a work of free (gratuitae) mercy, that he [God] had the grace (dignatus est) to do the promise.

Therefore Zion is given to Christ as a kingdom without him asking for it, but the Gentiles are given to him as an inheritance at his request, as it were as a gift of Christ, since nothing was promised to them. Is 66:19, 20: "They shall declare My glory among the Gentiles, and shall bring all your brethren from all the Gentiles for a meat offering unto the Lord" (donum). Thus Israel is the kingdom, we Gentiles the gift, as it were as a gift for Pharaoh's daughter, which Pharaoh, the king of Egypt, gave her as a gift [1 Kings 9:16].

56 Finally, when Christ is appointed King over Zion, the prophet uses words of the present time, indicating that the thing itself is done. But where it is proclaimed that he is an heir, he is first commanded to heal, and it is promised to him in the time to come. We see all this fulfilled in the Acts of the Apostles, when the disciples preached the word only to the Jews, until Paul, called from heaven, was sent as an apostle among the Gentiles. Therefore Christ, who was already appointed King over Zion on earth, but since He reigns in heaven, receives the Gentiles promised to Him at His bidding. Also here he does not say in vain (otiose) "from me", so that he may show that this kingdom and the inheritance of the Gentiles were not transferred to Christ by men and in a human way, but by God, that is, in a spiritual way.

This is one of the passages against which those who say that those who are not under the Roman Pontiff are not Christians fight sacrilegiously. For they presume to make God the Father a liar, since He has given Christ the

The Christians have subjugated the ends of the world, but they do not even subjugate all of Europe to him. Can't Christians be there because the Turk or the Scythe rules there in time? How could they be in Rome under Nero and Domitian? Are there not bishops because they do not buy the pallia? Can't there be priests because they don't pay the annals? How? if they were therefore all the more true bishops, the more they, free of wealth, court and pomp, teach the word of God and govern the people of Christ? At least the apostle Paul describes the bishops Apost. 20, 28. in such a way that they take care of the host and govern the church of God. He says: "Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and unto all the host, among whom the Holy Ghost hath made you bishops, to feed (regere) the church", while he was speaking to the elders, as St. Jerome clearly takes from the text, which he also proved by the word "take heed", which has a corresponding (vicina) meaning. But to feed (regere) the community and to take care of the herd, can this not be done only by the service of the word and by prayer, without the disorderly nature (tumultum) of the bishops, as it is now?

(58) Therefore, let us not accuse the word of this psalm (so that we do not stretch the inheritance of Christ too thin) of falsehood, either because of the shameful behavior (perfidiam) of the Turks, or because of the multitude of others who are in error. For who else could know among us who are Christians in truth? Are there not also among us a great many evil people, and few good? The power (auctoritas) of the divine word is greater than we can comprehend, how much more is it greater than our suspicions (suspicio) and our imaginations (phantasia), which are occupied with the appearance of outward customs.

St. Augustine thinks that here is a repetition of the same thing (tautologiam), namely, the same thing is expressed by "the Gentiles for inheritance" and "the end of the world for ownership". This [repetition] is (as I have said) always an indication of certainty (firmitatis), by which our faith is strengthened all the more: namely, that there are Chri-

The same is true in other parts of the world where the other apostles preached, as much as the godless nature prevails there.

v. 9. You shall smash them with an iron scepter; like pots you shall break them.

(59) Again, we must put away carnal imaginations, lest anyone imagine that the kingdom of Christ is established and maintained with sword and weapons, since it is written [Ps. 147:10, loosely from the Vulgate], "He hath no pleasure in chariots and horses, nor in any man's legs," and the apostle says 2 Cor. 10:4, "Our weapons are not carnal." For even the Turks, whom we nowadays seek to overcome only by the sword (quaerimus), we should defeat by increasing the number of Christians who are among them.

60 Or why do we not pursue with the sword the wicked who are among us, especially the nobles of the people? Be far from that! The kingdom of Christ stands in righteousness, truth and peace; by these it is established, by these it is also maintained. Therefore, when he said above that he was appointed king, he did not think of any other office than the office of the word, saying: "I will preach in such a way that the Lord has said"; not: I will ride proud stallions (caballos); not: I will devastate cities; not: I will seek the treasures of the earth, but this one thing: I will preach what God has commanded, namely Christ, who is God and man, what Paul calls Rom. 1, 1-3. calls the gospel, saying: "Sent forth to preach the gospel of God, which he promised beforehand of his Son" 2c.

(61) You see that this verse is also an allegoricum, not without reason, since it represents an allegory that takes place in reality and in life. For since the word of Christ is a word of salvation and peace, a word of life and grace, and this is not effective in the flesh but in the spirit, it must necessarily suppress and expel the salvation, peace, life, and grace of the flesh. If it does so, it appears harder and more unbearable to the flesh.

more than iron. For something quite different is felt than happens when a carnal man is touched in a healing way by the word of God, namely, as it is written in 1 Sam. 2:6, 7: "The Lord killeth, and quickeneth; he leadeth into hell, and bringeth up again; he bringeth down, and exalteth."

62 This secret (allegoricam) effect of God paints Isaiah, Cap. 28, 21, when he says [Vulg.]: "In order to do his work, he performs a foreign work; in order to do his work, he lets his work be far (peregrinum) from him," as if he wanted to say: Although he is a God of life and salvation, and these are his proper works, he nevertheless kills and destroys in order to accomplish this. These are foreign works to him [but he does them], that he may come to his own work. For he kills our will in order to establish his will in us. He kills the flesh and its lust, in order to make the spirit and what he desires alive in us. This is what he said above, without any fancy speech, "I will preach of such a manner that the LORD hath said unto me" (praeceptum Domini - the commandment of the LORD). For the spirit accepts the word of God as an exceedingly sweet commandment. For then it happens that the holy mountain Zion becomes his kingdom, and the Gentiles his inheritance and the end of the world his property. But the flesh bears the commandment or word of God with great reluctance, and does not recognize it either, because it is completely and in every way opposed to it. Therefore, it receives the word as a rod and an iron and as something that crushes him, and so the image (allegoria) is fulfilled, both in that this verse indicates it and proves it in deed and work.

63: "You shall smite them" (reges eos) in Hebrew is 2^8^, which St. Jerome translated: Thou shalt feed them. But John Neuchlin, in his "Beginning Reasons" (rudimentis), indicates many meanings of this word, namely: to feed, to govern, to take away, to smite, 1) or to bruise and to crush. And this last meaning is, in my low opinion, for this passage the very-

1) Here, the original still contains the words: amions, evMtMio, which has been retained in both the Basel and Weimar editions.

Firstly, because an iron rod, as everyone knows, is better suited for crushing and smashing than for grazing and negating. Secondly, for negating it would have been sufficient to say: with a scepter (virga), but for grazing one can appropriately speak neither of a scepter nor of an iron [scepter]. But what will be accomplished by an iron scepter but crushing and breaking? as Dau. 2:40, it is written, "As iron crusheth and breaketh all things, so shall it crush and break all things." In addition, in this way what is repeated rhymes finely with what is said (tautologia), because it follows: "Like pots you shall break them," so that "break" is the same as "smash" or "pasture" (reges seu pasces).

For both words denote the humbling of the proud by the word of God, which then shatters and crushes when it terrifies and humbles. Thus the apostle Rom. 1, 18. says that through the gospel the future wrath will be revealed from heaven. Thus those who were converted at the word of Peter and felt struck (compuncti), Apost. 2:37: "Men, brethren, what shall we do?" This is what Scripture elsewhere calls rebuke, shaking of the ground, and trembling of the earth. Most beautifully, however, it says Blich. 4, 13. "Arise and thresh, O daughter of Zion. For I will make thee horns of iron, and claws of brass; and thou shalt break in pieces many nations: so will I banish their goods (that is, they themselves, which are as it were a spoil taken from the devil) unto the LORD, and their substance unto the ruler of the world." See what it means to rule them with an iron scepter (regere), namely (as he says here) to crush many nations with an iron horn.

64. the scepter (virga) is therefore the most holy gospel of Christ, for this is the scepter of His kingdom, as Ps. 45, 7. says: "The scepter of Your kingdom is a straight scepter," and Ps. 110, 2.: "The Lord will send the scepter of Your kingdom out of Zion." So also says Isaiah, Cap. 11, 4. "He shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked." What is the rod (virga) of the mouth

What is the word of Christ other than the word of God with which he crushes the earth, that is, those who are earthly minded? What is the spirit of his lips but the same word of the Spirit with which he kills the wicked, that he may live unto godliness, having died to ungodliness? This is the scepter, against the tip of which in the hand of Joseph Jacob bowed down, Gen. 47, 1) 31 [Heb. 11, 21], this is the scepter, the tip of which St. Esther touched, Esther 5, 2.

65. but [the gospel is called] a scepter figuratively (μεταφορικῶς) or rather figuratively (ἀλληγορικῶς), first because it [the scepter is] thin and light, so that it may be carried in the hand, for the yoke of Christ is gentle and its burden is light, Matth. 11, 30. But the hands of Moses are heavy, Ex. 17, 12. so that they had to be supported by Aaron and Hur with stones placed under them, that is, as Peter interprets Apost. 15, 10, that the burden of the law is unbearable. On the other hand, the hands of Christ are laid on the little children and the sick everywhere in the Gospel, so that it might be better with them. But Moses also has two large stone and heavy tablets. Furthermore, the Levites formerly carried large and many tables of the tabernacle, of which it is said in 4 Mos. 4, 31: "These are their burdens"; in truth heavy and many burdens, if they are considered alone, but none, or certainly only little, if one looks at the ecclesiastical laws and rights, which nowadays exercise their tyranny. For we carry nowadays not tablets, but whole forests and rocks, and the hands of bishops so heavy that the whole world could not bear it; and it serves us quite right. Because we have cast away the scepter of Christ, therefore has happened to us that which Isaiah Cap. 8, 6. f. says: "Because this people despise the waters of Siloam, which stand still, the LORD will bring upon them strong waters and many waters of the river."

66. secondly, because it [the scepter] is straight, for the gospel and the law of the Spirit lead us on a straight and short (compendii) road to life, where the law leads us

1) In all editions: Oen. 49. Weim. Ausg. (not correct) in the margin: I Mos. 49, 22. ff.

The author of the letter, who, through long detours of figures and works and, as it were, through an exceedingly vexatious desert path, nevertheless hardly reaches the climes of Moab, nor does he arrive at the land of promise, but falls away with Moses.

Third, because the law of Christ is bare and unveiled, as a scepter is borne without a covering. The law of Moses was carried in the ark of the covenant, and the tablets were carried veiled, because every law, every doing without the law of Christ is a shadow and a sign of a hidden righteousness, but not the thing itself, which is revealed by the law of Christ. Rom. 1, 17.: "The righteousness that is before God is revealed in the gospel by faith in faith."

68. but it is called a scepter of iron, first of all (as I said) for the sake of the flesh, because the law of Christ is exceedingly hard, although it is very gentle for the spirit. For it lays upon all its lusts the cross and death, poverty, lowliness, patience. These are the three points (cornua) of the cross: poverty curbs the lust of the eyes and avarice; lowliness resists hope in life and ambition; patience nullifies the lust of the flesh and pleasure. Therefore it is called Isaiah Cap. 27, 1. a hard and strong sword: "At that time the Lord will strike down Leviathan, the serpent, with his hard, great and strong sword."

Secondly, this scepter cannot be bent and cannot be brought out of its right nature (invincibilis rectitudinis), or (as St. Augustine holds here) has an unbending righteousness. For as much as many have tried to twist and bend the word of God to their sense, it has nevertheless remained of unconquerable straightness, convicting as liars those who have bent it. For it is not a reed like the rod of Egypt, 2 Kings 18:1, 21 and Isaiah 36:6, "which, if any man lean upon it, it entereth into his hand, and pierceth it. But the reed is the doctrine of men, which is moved to and fro by every wind of opinion.

2 Sam. 17. - Bas: Isn. M.

But this voice of the one calling in the wilderness, as it is not clothed with soft garments, neither is it an empty reed which the wind can weave to and fro, but full and firm and iron.

(70) But that some ascribe a waxen nose to the Scriptures, saying that they are as it were a movable reed, is due to the actions of those who misuse the holy Word of God for their unrhymed and unstable opinions and glosses, and they bring it about that the Word of God, while it rhymes with everything, rhymes with nothing.

Third, as the iron crushes and breaks everything, as Dan. 2, 40. the word of Christ crushes the great, that is, it humbles the proud, the crooked makes it straight, that is, it chastises the unchastised, the straight makes it crooked, that is, it bends the hopeful, the rough makes it smooth, that is, 2) it makes the angry kind, the short makes it long, that is, it comforts the fainthearted, the long makes it short, that is, it frightens the presumptuous, the narrow it makes wide, that is, the meager it makes liberal, the wide it makes narrow, that is, the profligate it makes thrifty, the blunt it makes sharp, that is, the unlearned it makes learned, the sharp it makes blunt, that is, the wise it makes fools, it takes away the rust, that is, it drives away sloth. In short, it destroys every defective form, and changes it into another that pleases God, and, as the apostle says 2 Tim. 3, 16. f.: "All Scripture inspired by God is profitable for doctrine, for correction, for chastening in righteousness, that a man may be perfect unto all good works."

72. like pots. Here the prophet mixes a simile into the fictitious speech to make the opinion clear. In 2 Cor. 4, 7, the apostle uses "earthly (fictile) vessel" to refer to the body, yes, to the man in the body. "We have (he says) such treasure in earthly vessels, that the super-pregnant power be of God, and not of us." These are the earthen jars of Gideon [Judges 7, 16. ff.], which at the sound of the trumpets burn shattered and broken, and shine, and pursue the terrified Midianites, and put them to flight; that is, that the bodies of the martyrs and Gentiles, broken by many a suffering of torture, have instructed the world by examples of love and truth, and have driven out the ungodly with their ungodly nature. And according to the moral interpretation (tropologice)¹: when the flesh or the carnal man is broken by the word of the cross or the iron scepter, the army of vices and evil desires goes down defeated before the virtues and the grace that enlightens man.

2) Until now, in all editions "iü est" is fully expressed; in the Wittenberg and Jena editions also before the following explanatory words. In the Basel edition, however, the abbreviation ".i." appears from here on. In the Erlangen and Weimar editions, however, "iä est" is missing from here on.

(73) Care must be taken at this point, not only for the thing itself, but also for the likeness. For Christ does not break and destroy his own in such a way that he tears one member of the body from the other, as broken pots are broken into many parts, but this bodily dispersion is to be a likeness of the spiritual destruction (dissipationis), that is, that the members of the body, which have not been bodily torn from one another, are destroyed in their evil lusts and actions.

74. The tongue no longer speaks what is pleasing to the flesh, the ear does not listen to slander, the eye does not look at shameful things, the hand does not steal other people's goods, does not handle illicit things, and in general: the body of sin, which before used the members for its lusts, is now suddenly deprived of these members, since they have been destroyed by the word of God, and this deprived of its service (officio), and forms as it were a blessed Babylon, since, as the apostle Rom. 6, 19, the members, who before were given to the service of uncleanness, and from one unrighteousness to another, are now given to the service of righteousness, so that they become holy. So also in the Gospel [Luc. 11, 22.] the stronger one not only takes away the armor, but he also distributes the robbery. For the Hebrew word XXXXX means, like Reuchlin confirms, you shall scatter them, divide them, throw them apart.

Therefore, "the pots" are all Christians, first of all because a potter's vessel is very easily broken. Thus, gentle people who are not hardened by the hardness of unbelief easily yield to the word of God; they do not contradict or resist it. But those who are stiff-necked (as they are called in Prov. 28:14) will fall into misfortune and, as Elijah saw in 1 Kings 19:11, will undoubtedly be torn apart like the mountains and broken like the rocks.

76. secondly, because a broken pot is completely unfit for its former use, so that you see how the word Isa. 30, 14. is fulfilled: "One will not find a shard of its pieces, in which one can get fire from the hearth, or draw water from a well." For he speaks of a brazen pitcher that shall be broken by a strong casting, and it agrees with this verse almost word for word. So also an ungodly man, converted and changed into Christ, is made quite useless for his former life, and he speaks with the apostle Gal. 6:14: "The world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world."

V. 10. Let yourselves therefore be instructed, O kings, and let yourselves be chastened, O judges of the earth.

The interpreter, as a word clarifier (etymologiis), has said instead of: "judges of the earth": "You who judge the earth". But without word explanation he has said: "kings", not: you who rule; but this is of little importance.

After the kingdom of Christ has been described, he adds a holy and faithful and instructive exhortation, trying and offering everything to make all men subject to Christ, especially the great. But how bold and, as we are wont to speak nowadays, how rebellious and vexatious is this exceedingly insolent prophet, who sets his mouth in heaven, and presumes to attack not the lowliest and the common people, but the highest chiefs and even kings, and to teach those who, puffed up by the title and office of being teachers of the people, and secure by the custom and honor due them according to their delusion (opinionis Lonore), cannot stand this exceedingly great insult, namely, that they are fools and unlearned people, and should need to be taught and instructed.

1) tropologia is the same as moraliter. Cf. Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XXII, 1341, 8 5. el. § 8.

For it is easy to have the unlearned people as disciples, who are accustomed to be disciples, but to put the kings, the judges of the earth, the magistrates, the regents, the doctors, the bishops, not only on a par with the rabble, and to put them in the ranks of the disciples, after they have been so accustomed to teaching and governing, but even to pine for the people, and to demand them alone as disciples: Dear, who could suffer this? Who should not tremble here with John the Baptist to touch the head of Christ? But it must nevertheless be touched and baptized with the water of Jordan, namely in his condescending humility, so that all righteousness may be fulfilled [Matth. 3, 15.], in that he who is the highest humbles himself among the lowest, and the lowest fears the humility of the exalted (sublimitatis).

(79) But since the kind and worthy Spirit knows that the whole salvation of the common people rests on the right instruction of the rulers, he first of all admonishes them kindly and fatherly, that they do not follow their own sense, and are all the more ready to be instructed, since they do not conduct their own affairs, but the affairs of all their subjects, and since they, when they fall into error, also bring the whole people with them into misfortune, as the saying says [Matth. 15:14], "If one blind man lead another, they both fall into the pit."

80 Not only for this reason does he admonish them, but also because he knows (as I said) that they, puffed up because of their power and office, always have the word John 9:34 in their mouths: "You teach us? You teach us?" and the word Jer. 18, 0 18.: "The priests cannot err in the law, the wise cannot fail in counsel, the prophets cannot teach wrong." For inflated by this bubble of water and this false confidence, they used always to resist the right prophets, not unlike how today any truth is resisted by the flatterers of the popes, who say that it cannot be supposed that such an exalted head can err, and that the church cannot err: The church cannot err, the pope cannot err, a concilium cannot err 2c.

81) But the people of the Old Testament were more strictly bound to obedience to the bishops (pontificum) than we Christians, because at that time they had to listen to the Levitical priest under penalty of death, but today we are all priests, and now the word of Isaiah Cap. 54, 13. is fulfilled: "I will make all thy children to be taught of the Lord", and Jer. 31:34: "No man shall teach another, nor brother another, saying, Know ye the Lord: but they shall all know me, both small and great, saith the Lord"; and 1 Cor. 14:30. Paul evidently commands that if a revelation should happen to one sitting there, the first should keep silence.

Therefore, in the New Testament, any superiors are to be heard in such a way that every lowly one is free to judge the opinion of the superior in matters concerning faith, much more than the prophets were free to resist the superiors in Israel, despite the commandment of God [Deut. 17:8-12]. For in the synagogue, where the priesthood had to do only with external ceremonies, any error of the priests was without danger. But in the church, where it is a matter of spirit and faith, it is very important to everyone that the priest does not err, since God is in the habit of revealing to the lowliest what He Himself does not deign to reveal to the highest, so that His kingdom may stand firm in the humility on which alone it is based.

Note the emphasis on the circumstantial word (adverbii) "now". "Now," he says, after Christ is established as King over all things. At this time there are two things which will hinder you most from knowing what is right. First, that this Christ, who was crucified, killed and condemned by you, even after God's saying (auctore) cursed according to the law of Moses, is preached as a Lord over all lords. For this is the most difficult thing, to acknowledge him as a king who died such a desperate and shameful death. The feeling

Reason has an abhorrence of it, custom speaks against it, there is no example of it: so then it must obviously be foolishness to the Gentiles and an annoyance to the Jews if you do not lift up your hearts above all this.

Secondly, that this king reigns in such a way that he teaches that everything you hoped for in the law is to be despised, everything you feared is to be loved; he puts forward the cross and death; he advises you to disregard the good you see and likewise the evil, since he wants to put you in far different goods, namely those which no eye has seen, no ear has heard and have not entered into the heart of any man. You must die if you want to live under this king, you must bear the cross and the hatred of the whole world, you must not flee shame, poverty, hunger, thirst, in short, the misfortune of all the floods 1) of the world. For this is the king, who also became a fool to the world and died, after which he smashed his own with an iron scepter and broke them like pots.

How can he suffer this king who is based on his feelings, who wants to measure things with reason, who stands in the door of his tabernacle, who cannot see the face of his Moses? Therefore instruction and chastening are necessary, that ye may go beyond these things, despising the visible things, and be drawn unto the invisible things, not seeking the things that are on earth, but the things that are above, where Christ is 2c.

86 Therefore the word: "Let yourselves be instructed" in Hebrew, where it stands without reference to another word (absoluto statu), means: Make yourselves wise (as Jerome interprets it) or others, that is, act in such a way, strive to be wise and to strive for spiritual and heavenly things, which we say in German: "Be wise and understanding," in the same sense as Ps. 32:9, "Be not as horses and mules that have no understanding." But this understanding is not what the worldly wise think about, but faith itself, which is able to see in fortune and misfortune what one does not see.

Therefore he does not express in what they should be instructed, but says without further specification (absolute): "Let yourselves be instructed", that is, create that you may have understanding, see to it that you may have faith. For that which faith knows (intelligit) has no name, not even an outward appearance. For happiness or unhappiness in the present things completely destroys every man who does not recognize the invisible things by faith. For this knowledge comes from faith, as it is written, If ye believe not, ye shall not understand. 2) And this is the entering "into darkness" [Exodus 20:21], in which everything is consumed that the sense, the reason, the mind and the understanding of man can comprehend. For faith connects the soul with the invisible, ineffable, unnameable, eternal, unthinkable word of God, and at the same time separates it from all visible things, and this is the cross and the passage (phase) of the Lord, in which he preaches this necessary instruction.

"Let yourselves be chastened, you judges of the earth", Augustine takes as something that is said repetitively (tautologic). But also this word, "let yourselves be chastened" (erudimini), is without further definition (absoluti status), instead of: Let yourselves be chastened (eruditi), that is, let yourselves be taken out of the raw and natural inclinations and opinions of the senses and sensual things, so that you may not be childishly minded with respect to Christ and His kingdom, for, 1 Cor. 2:14, "the natural man hears nothing of that which is of God." But it seems to me that the "chastening" (eruditio) means the turning away of the heart from perishable things, just as the "instruction" (intellectus) means the turning to eternal things and the "knowledge" (intellectus).

2) Is. 7, 9. it says in the Vulgate (also in our Bible): si non cr^oäeritis, non pvrmanebitis. Luther interpreted "kernnnökitis" here by intelliSstis, as also the Epistle to the Hebrews Cap. II, 3. thut: D'iiv inwlllⁱimus etc. Compare Luther's interpretation of this saying in the Table Talks, Cap. 50, s 5. Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XXII, 1331.

1) Basel and Weimar: ünetaum; Wittenberg, Jena and Erlangen: truotuun.

The same is attained. The cross works the latter by killing the flesh, the faith works the latter by the spirit that makes alive.

It is too well known that "the earth" in figurative speech means the people on earth to indicate this, except that Augustine, who prefers to interpret it in a moral way (tropologisans [cf. § 72]), thinks it means the body.

V. 11. Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling.

This is a strange saying and inconsistent in our eyes. For fear works hatred and fleeing, not service (famulatum), and trembling is completely opposed to joy. Then he also says here the opposite of what is said in another Psalm [Ps. 100, 2.], where we are asked to serve the Lord with joy. How now? We want to hear the apostle Paul as an arbitrator (mediatorem), who says 1 Cor. 1, 21: "Because the world through its wisdom did not recognize God in His wisdom, it pleased God well to make blessed through foolish preaching those who believe in it," as if he wanted to say: In foolishness one must become wise. Thus, since we did not recognize God as our Benefactor in peace and well-being (as it should be), nor did we praise Him, it pleased Him that we now recognize and praise Him in cross and adversity. Thus, since we did not serve God with joy in safety, it pleases Him that we serve Him with joy in fear and rejoice with trembling. 1)

In short, as the world perverts all that is of God, so God in turn perverts all that is of the world. All creatures are given to guide and enlighten man, but he uses them to blind himself and to overthrow himself (incurvandum). Therefore, God again uses all creatures to blind and bend man. This is the cross of Christ and the foolish preaching by which he makes blessed those who believe in it [1 Cor. 1:21]. For those who believe their sense, their reason, their wisdom, follow their mind, bump into all of them and get lost.

90] So it is that since Christ the Lord rules with a scepter of iron, and breaks the old man by the word of the cross, according to the will and command of the Father, who has subjected all things to him, you must acknowledge yourselves as those who are subject to him, but subject in fear, that you may patiently and humbly bear his cross, fearing that if you will not bear his hand and counsel, you may become reprobate, like those in the 78th Psalm. Psalm, v. 9. "The children of Ephraim fell away in the time of strife."

91 But you will do this when you realize that you will never suffer undeserved punishment, but would have deserved much greater. For the hopeful, who consider that only good things must happen to them, are secure, not afraid, like Job [Cap. 9, 28. Vulg.] 2), of all his works, therefore they do not stand in the time of trial, but (as Matth. 7, 26. f. is said of the house of the foolish man, which was built on the sand) they do a great fall and become worse. Therefore this fear in the whole life, in all works, is a great part of the cross, yes, almost the whole cross.

(92) Yes, one should be on top with the apostle, Rom. 5:3, boast in tribulation, rejoice with citation. From all this it can be seen that there are two kinds of service and joy in God. There is namely a service in security and joy in the Lord without trembling. These are found in the hypocrites, who are secure, have pleasure in themselves, nor think that they are useless servants, having many merits, of which the 10th Psalm, v. 5, says: "Thy judgments are far from Him," which is soon followed in the 36th Psalm, 3) v. 2: "There is no fear of God with them." These accomplish justice without judgment at all times, and do not let Christ be a judge before whom all must tremble, before whom no living man is righteous [Ps. 143, 2.].

93. service with fear and joy with trembling is found in the righteous, who have

2) Weim. Ed. (erroneous): Job 8, 15.

3) In the Latin editions: ?s. 14. Edition "Ps. 14, 5. (?)"

1) Jenaer and Erlanger: timore instead of: tremore.

They do justice and judgment at all times, and always mix the two together (temperantes), and are neither ever without judgment, by which they are terrified and despair of themselves and their works, nor without justice, by which they trust and rejoice in the mercy of God. The office (officium) of these people in their whole life is that they accuse themselves in all things, find God righteous in all things and praise Him, and thus fulfill the word, Prov. 28, 14: "Blessed is he who fears always", at the same time also the saying 1 Thess. 5, 16: "Be joyful always" in the Lord. Thus they are ground and humbled between the lowest and the highest millstone, Deut. 24, 6. and after they are freed from the husk of the grain, they become a very pure flour of Christ.

(94) I leave it to you to pay special attention to the emphasis with which the prophet says, "Serve the Lord," not you, not the belly, not the gold, not even your righteousness, your power, your wisdom, nor any thing at all. For these are different kinds of idolatry. So he also says, "Rejoice in him" (exultate ei), not in you, not in any of your creatures, but in the Lord alone [Phil. 4, 4.] But this happens when you presume nothing good in all things, in which you trust and boast, but ascribe everything to God alone, and praise, adore and love Him in all things, but ascribe everything evil to yourself, because of which you must fear, tremble and be despondent, as Job said at both times [Cap. 1, 21.]: "The Lord has given, the Lord has taken away, the name of the Lord be praised!"

95 You will see how difficult all this is if you pay attention to both times. For in adversity it is difficult not to fall away, not to complain, not to become impatient, and not to do or refrain from doing anything against God's commandment for fear of evil, and thus to overcome the fear of the creature through the fear of God, not to give way to the inclinations of the heart and the circumstances (objectis), but to hold fast to the word of the Lord even unto death. For this is where it is proven whether one serves the Lord, whether one does the will of the Lord or not.

God more than the violence (violentia) of any creature. Above this, trembling before God in prosperity is also in greater danger than the fear of God in adversity. For here [in good days] one lives securely in joys, and it is difficult to fear, let alone cite, when everything goes as one wishes.

Therefore, the prophet very appropriately, as I think, connected trembling with joy, and fear with service, because service brings with it the laborious life (laborem) of adversity, but joy brings with it the leisurely life (otium) of well-being; and therefore it was necessary to recommend fear so much, that he might also say that trembling is necessary there, as if he wanted to say: We must fear most where there seems to be no cause for fear, and the happier everything is going on, the more fearful (sollicitus) we must be, and even tremble, when joy and great gladness befall us.

V. 12: Kiss the son so that he will not be angry and you will perish on the way. 1)

In Hebrew the words "HErr" (dominus) and "right" (O^{ta}) are not found, but there is nothing wrong with that. Almost everyone rejects this translation [of the Vulgataff: "Take heed". For in the Hebrew it says: XXXXXXXX, what Jerome in the Hebrew translated the Psalter: Worship in a pure way (pure), because ^3 also means pure and chosen. The same one says in his small interpretation (commentariolo) thus: In Hebrew one reads: Nescu bar, which can be interpreted: Worship the Son, because bar also means a son. Therefore Simon bar Johanna in the Gospel [Matth. 16, 17.] is called "Jonah's son", and Ptolemaeus Ptolemy's son, Barnabas the son of a prophet, and the like.

Burgensis and Lyra give it thus, "Kiss the son." Nowhere, however, is it said to denote "chastening." "Kissing" however they put from: Pay homage, so that the meaning is: "Kiss the Son", that is, accept with reverence and humility the King and Lord Christ.

But we want to try to harmonize everything as well as possible 1) with each other. A kiss is first of all a sign of reverence and adoration, as we kiss and honor holy and divine things or humbly inclined (prostrati) kiss the feet and footsteps, as Mary Magdalene kissed Christ [Luc. 7, 38.]. After this, Jerome translated: Worship in a pure way.

Secondly, the kiss is a sign of recognition and loyalty, which one wants to render, as in the homage, where we are used to kiss the hand and just thereby acknowledge the one as master, whom we kiss. Thirdly, it is a sign of the fullest friendship and love, since we are wont to kiss the eyes or face, of which the apostle commands Rom. 16:16, "Greet one another with the holy kiss." We read that Christ used to greet His disciples with this kiss when they returned [Luc. 7, 45. Matth. 26, 49.]. But since those who kiss each other in this way tend to apprehend and embrace each other, our (Latin) translation offers: "Take discipline" (apprehendite disciplinam).

But since he says without further specification (absolute): "Kiss the Son", not mentioning the feet, not the hand, nor the face, it is reasonable that we understand it of the kiss in its broadest meaning, so that by the kiss of the feet we adore Christ as the Son of God, true God, by the kiss of the hand we receive Him as our right (legitimum) Lord and eternal Helper and Savior, by the kiss of the eyes or face we grasp Him as our most beloved brother, friend and bridegroom of our soul. About this threefold kiss, see Bernard at the beginning of the Song of Songs; so that the meaning is: "Kiss the Son," that is, honor Christ, who is God, with the highest reverence, be subject to Christ, the Lord, with the highest humility, cling to Christ, the Bridegroom, with the highest respect.

tigam, with the highest love. Behold, fear and love, the right measure and the means between the two, humility, that is the complete worship (latría).

Now we can harmonize the word ", 3, which is translated by "son", "pure", "discipline", in such a way that faith in Christ is in truth our discipline. Therefore, he who believes in Christ (that is, kisses the Son) truly takes discipline, bearing Christ crucified to himself (as is written in the Epistle to the Galatians [Cap. 6, 14. 17.]). For Christ is not kissed or grasped according to your flesh, but in the spirit, that is, when His cross and suffering, whereby we are chastened (Heb. 12, 7. ff.), is gladly (amanter) received. Therefore, our (Latin) translation, as far as the words are concerned, is not correct (nihil est), but quite suitable in the sense.

Furthermore, "to worship in a pure way" points to what is written 1 Kings 19:2) 18. about the impure worship of Vaal, saying [Vulg.], "I will leave me seven thousand men in Israel whose knees have not bowed to Baal, and every mouth that has not worshipped him by kissing his hand," where, as I will say parenthetically, it does not say in the text: "by kissing his hand"; but the same word nasca, which has just been said to mean kissing, is placed where it is said, "who did not worship him," which some Hebrew may have interpreted and glossed, "by kissing his hand," to indicate the manner of reverence, and after that it is brought into the text by an ignorant scribe.

But on this opinion nevertheless Job 31, 27. f. speaks. [Vulg.]: "Have I kissed my hand with my mouth? This is an exceeding great iniquity, and a denial against GOD, the Most High." St. Gregory interprets this in such a way that by this way of speaking Scripture means the man who trusts in his works and boasts of a righteousness that he did not receive from Christ, but achieved by his own powers.

2) This citation is correct in the Wittenberg and the Jena: "3 lie]. 19." In the Basel: 3 RoA- 11; in the Erlangen: 1 He. 19; in the Weimar in text: III ke. IX.

1) In the Basel and in the original of the Erlangen uttruncjue instead of: utenn^ue.

I have brought. For such a person worships his hand with his mouth, because he praises himself, is pleased with himself, but his soul is not praised in the Lord. Therefore it is "an exceedingly great iniquity and a denial of the Most High"- since it ascribes to itself what is of God, sets itself up as an idol of Baal for itself, and worships itself, making itself an author of its goods (for Baal means an author or a lord). Thus it is said Isa. 2:8, "They worship the work of their hands, which their fingers have made." But this is quite impure worship; therefore this is to kiss Christ, to recognize Christ as one's Savior, and to kiss His hand, in truth and in a pure manner, and to worship the pure One, that is, to worship the Son. It is said [John 8:36], "If the Son makes you free, you are free indeed."

Therefore we will conclude: The prophet wants them to serve Christ with fear, to recognize themselves as sinners and always accuse [themselves], and let God alone be righteous in Christ. But since they can confront him and pretend that they have kept the law, that they are righteous, that they have not sinned, and that they have no need of Christ for their righteousness, he confronts this exceedingly wicked presumption and says: "Do not think that you are righteous, renounce this idolatrous opinion, so that you do not make yourselves like God; do not trust in your righteousness, but rather kiss the Son, seize the Son, his hand, his righteousness, his salvation will sustain you. And if you will not do this, he will be angry with your righteousness, and you will perish from your way (de via), or (as methinks), you will perish with your way (cum via). For in the Hebrew it says rather darkly

XXX XXXXXX, that is, et peribitis via, which seems to me to be said by an ellipsis for: Ye shall perish with the way, as it is said in the 1st Psalm, v. 6, "The wicked way perisheth." But I will let every man have his own way; but I see not how they shall perish from the right way, which are not yet in the right way. But those can be frightened by their danger, who please themselves in their way, as if it were a right way, but do not recognize Christ, the right way.

For his wrath will soon burn. But well to all who trust in him.

97) This piece belongs in Hebrew to the preceding verse, 1) which is completely (totus) arranged like this: "Worship the Son, lest he be angry, and you perish with the way, for his wrath will soon burn. Blessed are all they that trust in him." So the meaning is, "Arise quickly and make haste, worship Christ, lest you perish in his wrath, and deceive yourselves, as if there were still a long time. You should know that his wrath will burn up quickly and in a short time, suddenly, if you do not take care of it, he will come, as it says Matth. 24, 48. 50. "But if that wicked servant will say in his heart, My lord is not yet coming for a long time, then the lord of that same servant will come in the day that he does not take care of it, and at the hour that he does not take care of it." Thus it is said in Prov. 1:27 [Vulg.], "When suddenly calamity cometh," and in 1 Thess. 5:2 f., "For ye yourselves know assuredly that the day of the Lord shall come, as a thief in the night. For when they shall say, There is peace, there is no danger; then destruction shall quickly overtake them." So this threat is terrible, because when the wrath of God will suddenly seize them, there will be no one to save them.

At the end, he closes the psalm with an exceedingly beautiful summa. This is, he says. Summa Summarum, "But good to all who trust in him." For this is why he suffered, this is why he rose from the dead, this is why he was appointed king, this is why he received all things as an inheritance, that he might save all who trust in him.

99. But this trust alone makes one righteous, without the works of the law, as the apostle teaches in the letter to the Romans [Cap. 3, 28.] and to the Galatians [Cap. 2, 16.]. But it is exceedingly difficult [to have this confidence], since so many adversities are set against it, and so much good draws us away from it.

1) Wittenberg and Jena: uckv^rurn; Erlanger: Ä<l Ääversum.

So it is good for those who are not annoyed by the fact that divine grace is needed for this, but not human strength. For in such a way the benevolent spirit does not dwell eternally, but comforts the frightened again without End. He says, "If you fear his wrath, do not despair, but trust. "Blessed are they that trust in him." For this is why his wrath terrifies, so that he may urge you to trust in him. Amen.

The third Psalm.

V. 1 A psalm of David when he fled from his son Absalom.

Why this psalm is set earlier than others that deal with much earlier events is of little concern to me, for I have not yet been able to discern sufficient reasons for the arrangement, since the history of the 51st Psalm, about the wife of Uriah, undoubtedly happened earlier than the history of this psalm, and the histories of many other psalms are earlier than this one.

It is not my intention to teach the explanations of all interpreters, and yet I have not yet decided which one to choose from so many different interpretations. I am not inclined to secret interpretations, especially since I am looking for the real and true (germanum) meaning, which can dispute in the quarrel, and strengthen the instruction in faith.

But that in this psalm a historical conception (intelligentia) must take place, much seems to contradict it. First of all, what moved St. Augustine, that the word [v. 6] "I lie down and sleep" seems to be a word of the resurrected Christ; secondly, that at the end the blessing of God is pronounced over the people, whereby one receives the conviction that it concerns the whole church. Therefore, St. Augustine explains this Psalm in three ways: first, of Christ as the Head; second, of the whole Christ, that is, of Christ and the Church, the Head and the body; third, spiritually (tropologica), of each individual person (privato).

I want to let everyone have their own opinion. But

Meanwhile, I will interpret [this psalm] from Christ, motivated by the same reason as Augustine, that the sixth 1) verse, as it seems, cannot be understood appropriately by anyone other than Christ. First, because lying down (dormitio) and sleep at this point certainly mean natural death, but not natural sleep, which can be taken from the fact that it follows: "I am risen" (exurrexi). For if he spoke of the sleep of the body, then he would have said: "I awoke" (evigilavi), although this does not have at all much on itself (urget), if one looks at the Hebrew word. Then, what would be new if he said that he had slept and lain down? Why should he not also say that he walked about, ate, drank, worked, suffered want, or any other such bodily work? Moreover, it seems incongruous that in such great affliction he should have extolled nothing but the sleep of the body, since the affliction would have forced him most strongly to watch, to try everything and to exert himself, especially since these two words, "I lie down and sleep," denote the quiet sleep of a man lying on his bed; but of such a nature is not the sleep into which one falls from sadness.

But it is more important for him to boast that he was resurrected because the Lord was his susceptor, who took care of him when he was asleep and did not leave him in sleep.

1) In all editions the text reads: ynintns, but in both Hebrew and Vulgate it is the sixth verse.

How can we say this glory (in a new spirituality [nova religione]) of any sleep of the body and not 1) also of every daily sleep? Especially since the help (susceptio) of God at the same time indicates the utmost abandonment of the one who sleeps. But this does not take place in bodily sleep, where the sleeper can also be protected by people as guards. This helping of God indicates that it is not a sleep, but gives to understand that there is great suffering (laborem).

Finally, this view is also supported by the word which is written here: XXXXXXX, which is here is set without closer relation and in Hiphil (transitivum tertii), and means: I have made to rise or to wake up, as if he wanted to say: I have made myself awake, I have awakened myself, which is certainly more appropriately understood of the resurrection of Christ than of bodily sleep, both because those who are asleep are wont to be awakened, and because it is no great thing, nor worthy of so great a sermon, that anyone should awaken by himself, since this happens daily. But this will be something completely different, because it will be introduced by the spirit as something new and special.

Since this is the case, it follows that wherever the title of a psalm indicates a history, it is not always necessary that the history be sung about in the psalm, but that the understanding of the history was the cause, because the prophets recognized from the enlightenment of the Spirit that future things were indicated by it.

2) So the meaning of this title must be: A psalm (that is, a song) [to] David (revealed to him, or happened to him by the Spirit) when he fled 2c., that is, on the occasion of such history. Nor does it rhyme that the psalm should have been composed by him at the time of this history and the flight, since he was in exceedingly great anxiety through fear and sad expectation. But the Holy Spirit wants to have a serene (lucidum) and calm tool, not even in the challenge, but only after the challenge man understands what is meant by happened to him. Therefore, it is very likely that the psalm was written long after the history, when he calmly saw the secrets that lay in what had happened to him.

But it is to be noted that in all superscriptions "David" is the dative, which in this case expresses the same as the preposition ad with the accusative. According to this way of speaking in the other prophets it is said: The word of the Lord happened to (ad) this or that [Jer. 1, 2. Vulg.] or through (in manu) this or that [Isa. 20, 2. Vulg.]. It is peculiar to this prophet that he calls the word of God a psalm, a song and an instruction, and adorns it with other titles, as we shall see; then, that he ascribes to himself by the dative the revelation of this word, so that the Holy Spirit has praised this very special (singular) prophet or the very special prophecies of this book.

It will be necessary that we know the history of 2 Sam. 15, 14 ff. exactly in order to understand its secrets. First, there is Absalom, who means the Jewish people, both by the image (figura) that lies in his deeds and by his name. Namely by the name, because Absalom means a father of peace, which would be a happy sign, if other things do not force to understand it from the evil peace that the world gives, that is, from the hatred of the cross of Christ.

4 For this people had a very special abhorrence of the cross and the evils of the world, especially since the goods of the world and the peace of this life were promised to them in the law. Hence their speech [Jer. 6:14]: "Peace, peace!" while there was no peace, because they did not keep the law, nor could they keep it, but the apostle also calls them enemies of the cross [Phil. 3:18].

5. but after the fact [he is an image of the Jewish people], because it is written of Absalom 2 Sam. 14, 25. f. that he was the most beautiful man in all Israel, and there was no defect in him from the sole of his foot to the crown of his head, and his hair was of such unheard-of abundance that it was shaved off every year for two hundred shekels, according to the royal weight,

1) non is in all editions, but it seems to us that either nou or ^{uo}Miniio should be erased.

1) where it is said that it was sold to women to decorate their heads.

This is the synagogue, which has a glorious appearance before all the peoples of the earth through the fame of the fathers, through the privilege of serving only the one true God, through the gift of the law, knowledge, prophecy and many other things, Rom. 3, 2. 9, 4. f. Furthermore, the exceedingly rich head of hair means the shining order of the priests and Levites, who at the head and at the top of the synagogue had abundance in riches and pleasures and reveled and courted, of whom it is said: "The Lord will make the crown of the head of the daughters of Zion bald" and [v. 24] "a bald head for a curly hair", that is, instead of their delicious priesthood 2c., and Ps. 68:22: "But God shall bruise the head of his enemies, along with the skull of their hair, who continue in their sin."

7 For this also, that Absalom, when he was to be slain, hung by his hair upon an oak tree between heaven and earth, signifies that the priests clung to their carnal opinions, and touched and understood neither the heavenly nor the earthly things of the law. And that the hair was shorn off and sold to the women means that the priests, who are of such a nature, are cut off from the head of the synagogue in spirit, and have given themselves only to the lusts and desires, for even the lusts do not adorn anyone, but they [the lusts] receive a great adornment and attraction from the fact that such great distinguished people are devoted to them and sold.

008 And now to the matter. Absalom, who sought the kingdom and the inheritance against his father David, drove him out of the city on the advice of Ahitophel, who later hanged himself on a rope in his house. Thus the Jewish people are against Christ and say [Luc. 20, 14.], "This is the heir, come, let us kill him." Likewise John 11:48: "If we leave him, they will all believe in him." For this they make use of the counsel and the help of Judas the betrayer, who armed himself like Ahitophel with soldiers and servants, but also went down like Ahitophel into the house of his conscience, and, despairing, hanged himself with a rope. For Ahitophel means: My foolish brother. David alluded to this in 2 Sam. 2) 15, 31. when he said: "Lord, make Ahitophel's counsel foolish," as if he wanted to say: May he be foolish and a fool in truth this time.

9. but that David [2 Sam. 15, 30.] went out barefoot and with his head covered, means that Christ was led out to Golgotha, who also literally went barefoot and with his head covered by the crown of thorns and blood. But according to the secret interpretation (allegorice), the head, the divinity, was hidden in weakness, and the feet bare, that is, the humanity was completely left to itself.

10. that David returns to the city after Absalom is killed means the resurrection of Christ after the people of the synagogue died in sins and finally 3) were overcome. For at that time their cheeks are smitten and their teeth are broken, as this Psalm [v. 8/ says, so that they can no longer eat Christ, for He dies no more henceforth [Rom. 6, 9.]. Therefore he says:

V. 2. O Lord, how many are my enemies, and how many set themselves against me!

This psalm has almost the same purpose (scopus) and the same opinion as the previous one. For here, too, it begins with a lament and the futile presumption of Christ's adversaries and closes with a triumphant consolation, saying [v. 8]: "For you smite all my enemies," and [v. 9]: "With the Lord one finds help," 2c., only that here it deals with the matter more briefly and the heart movements (affectum) of the sufferer more extensively.

12 For there are three things that greatly distress a man who is in suffering, his loneliness, his helplessness, his despair, which are further increased and strengthened by three

2) In all editions: "I.KkS."; the Weimar one has the correct place in the margin.

3) Instead of camouflage in the editions, which does not seem to us to fit, we have adopted taillern.

1) The text of the Vulgate can be interpreted in such a way that the shorn hair was sold for two hundred sekels; according to your text of the German Bible "his head hair weighed two hundred sekels".

Pieces at the adversaries, their quantity, their violence, their confidence.

(13) Because of his loneliness and the multitude of his adversaries, he says, "O Lord, how many are my enemies! Otherwise, if he were not lonely and forsaken, how would he suffer? how would he be challenged? how would he be touched? since he would lean on an equal or even greater number of those fighting for him, as the devil realized, Job 1:9 f.: "Do you think that Job fears God for nothing? Hast thou kept him, and his house, and all that he hath, round about?"

014 To his powerlessness and to the power of his enemies belongs this, that he says, "There are so many set against me." For he would not suffer even as an individual, if he were not oppressed as the weaker by stronger, as Samson, though he was alone, could not suffer anything from the Philistines, whom he so often smote [Judges 15:15]. Therefore this is to be noted as a general rule, that he has no suffering (patientiam) who has something with which he can retaliate and avenge himself, or by which he resists, so that he cannot be oppressed. For both are found in a suffering man, that he can neither avenge himself nor resist.

(15) It is more difficult to "stand against someone" than to simply be afflicted, just as it is more difficult when one is powerless than when one is alone, and more difficult when the enemy is strong and insurmountable than when there are many of them. Therefore he says: "They stand, are upright, are firm, are strong, have the upper hand, are mighty against me, but I stagger, fall, am weak, am completely thrown down. For this their superiority and his powerlessness he expresses by the word: "They fight against me", as he also expressed the same power above in the 2nd Psalm: "The kings of the land rebel". But over these two pieces this [third], which now follows, penetrates in the strongest and most extreme way:

V. 3. Many say of my soul, "It has no help from God. Sela.

16 Christ truly had to hear this on the cross [Matth. 27, 43]: "He has trusted in God, who will now deliver him, lusts for him".

as it was also proclaimed in the 22nd Psalm [v. 8. 9.]: "All who see me mock me, open their mouths, and shake their heads: let him complain to the Lord, and he will help him out, and save him, if he has a desire for him." For this confidence, mocking, ridiculing, mocking, singing songs of victory and boasting of the adversaries, as over an enemy completely overcome and hopelessly destroyed, is the utmost and bitterest tribulation, since, after all, when one has fallen and been defeated by many and strong enemies, it is only then that it is most terrible, when the hope of rising again even with God Himself is denied, as it is also said in the 41st Psalm. 1) Psalm [v. 9.]: "They have determined a knave upon me: When he lies down, he shall not rise again." But we know that Christ was in this desperate situation (desperation); not as if he himself despaired, but that all, even his disciples, despaired of him, that is, they had no hope in him that he would rise again, so that he was forgotten in the heart, as of one dead, as the 31st Psalm, v. 13. says. Here a comforter is sought, but not found, yes, instead of comfort, despair is poured on it with the most bitter mockery, which is diabolical.

17 In Hebrew it is written in general (absolute): "By God", 2) without the pronoun ejus, which, as it seems to me, has an emphasis, as if he wanted to say: They say not only that I am abandoned and oppressed by all creatures, but also that God, who helps all, sustains all, cares for all, does not sustain me alone, above all things. Job seems to have tasted me through such a challenge, since he says Cap. 7, 20: "Why do you make me to stumble upon you?" For any challenge, even if the whole world and at the same time the whole hell would gather in one heap, is nothing compared to the one when God comes upon man. Against the same, Jeremiah prays with trembling, Cap. 17, 17: "Be not thou terrible unto me, my confidence in adversity," whereupon it is said in the 6th Psalm, v. 2: "O Lord, punish me!

1) Wittenberg, Jena and Erlanger: "ks. 40." Otherwise, they do not have the Vulgate count.

2) In the Vulgate it says: Xon est sainsixsi in Deo ejus, he has his help in his God.

not in thy wrath", and we will see this more often throughout the Psalter. This is the completely unpleasant and quite actual hell, as will be said in the same 6th Psalm [v. 6.]: "For in death you are not remembered" 2c., indeed, if one has not experienced this challenge, one cannot even think of it.

Note the modesty, yes, the very special attitude of the one who is challenged in this play. He says in the form of the question, "How are [my enemies] so many?" by which he wants, as it were, to present himself as innocent, and he indicates that he is wronged. But he does not dare to accuse them and give them the name that they are unrighteous or sinners, but uses an undecided word, saying, "Why are they that afflict me so many? But afterwards, after the victory, he pronounces steadily and confidently that they are sinners and unrighteous, saying [v. 8.], "They that are hostile to me without a cause (as our [Latin] text has), and bruise the teeth of the wicked (peccatorum)." For while he is tormented in the temptation, it seems to him as if he were alone; God alone is opposed to him, and is irreconcilably angry with him; at that time he alone is a sinner, all the others righteous, and work together against him at God's command. 1) There remains nothing else but this inexpressible groaning, by which he, without realizing it, supported by the Spirit, says and asks: "Why then do so many torment me one? But also David himself, when he was in the same trouble in this history, said 2 Sam. 15, 26: "But if he says thus: I have no desire for you; behold, here I am, he will do with me as he pleases." O, what a great self-denial, that he also chooses for himself that God should stand against him 2c.

19 At the end of this verse, the Hebrew word "sela" is placed; since we will encounter this word often, we will deal with it here once and for all. Even nowadays it is not sufficiently known what it is used for or what it means. The seventy interpreters have put for it in the Greek translation, what St. Augustine explains by pause, under-, and the word "sela".

breaking and cessation of the psalm singing, as, on the other hand, he σῦμμασμα the performing or calls the continuation of the singing of the Psalms. He also says that wherever ἄψασμα or sela.

is a change either of the things or of the persons is noticed. He is followed by Cassiodorus.

St. Jerome, on the basis of various things that he quotes from Origen in the Letter to Marcella, expresses the opinion that it rather means the connection of what precedes with what follows in the chants, or certainly that what is said continues (sempiterna esse); therefore Aquila, an extremely careful interpreter of Hebrew words, has translated it by "always" or "for all eternity" (in sempiternum).

Burgensis says in the 83rd Psalm that it means nothing at all, but is only as it were an addition to the melody, and has nothing but the melody to which it is added, and he denies that it means the constant duration (sempiternitatem). Therefore it is found only in the Psalms, because they are chants, and written to a melody, and in One Chant of Habakuk, and in this chant also only once, 2) at the place [Hab. 4, 3.]: "And the Holy One of Mount Paran. Sela."

He is almost followed by a newer, Stapulensis, who thinks that among the Hebrews "sela" is something similar to the signatura of the final notes among the vocals Evovae, that is, in eternity, Amen, which is not sung with the antiphon, although it is connected with the melody of the same.

Johann Reuchlin in his Elementarlehre (rudimentis) der hebräischen Sprache cites two opinions, one of Jonathan Chaldeus, who, as he writes, translated sela: that is, in the power of eternity (virtute saeculorum), to which 3) Rabbi Eleazar added that where sela is added to any passage of sacred Scripture, the same will have no end, neither in this

2) In Hebrew and in our German Bible, "sela" appears three times in the prophet Habakkuk. In the edition of the Vulgate, which we use (Tournay 1885), it is omitted not only in Habakkuk, but also in the Psalms everywhere.

3) Here the Basel edition offers erina instead of: eui.

time, nor in eternity; the other of Abraham Ben Esdra, who thinks that sela means just that which is true (vere); and this is also assumed by the Hebrews, that also according to their opinion there is nothing in it, but that it is only connected with the melody (harmoniae), as Burgensis has said.

Such a great difference is the cause that I must confess I do not know which of these comes closest to the truth. Namely, what makes me question (movent) against all these sayings is this. First, that the examples from the Psalms and from Habakkuk do not puff (quadrant). For although this, that in this place [Ps. 3, 3.] sela is put, speaks for the opinion of St. Augustine against St. Jerome, because the thing changes, but not the person, nor the preceding and the following are connected by the same, yet it speaks strongly against both, that it is sometimes put at the end of the Psalms, sometimes in the words of one and the same person, and [in such words,] which continue the very same exhortation, as this may be seen in the third and fourth Psalms. For at the end of the 3rd Psalm it is said, "Thy blessing upon thy people, Sela"; and in the 4th Psalm, v. 4. f., "Speak with your: hearts upon your camp, and wait, Sela. Sacrifice righteousness." Here is a continuous exhortation of the same person to the same persons, and yet Sela is interposed, which is contrary to St. Augustine. But that it is put at the end [Ps. 3. Ps. 9. Ps. 24. 2c.] is against St. Jerome.

Now, even if the opinion of both is defended in every way, whether by connecting the sentences (sententias) or the persons, or by separating them, this still does not serve as proof (ad hoc), because one could say why it is not put in the same way in the Psalms wherever sentences or persons are either distinguished or connected, and that (not seldom) in a clearer way than where it is put, as he who pays attention to it easily recognizes.

But that it does not mean the permanent duration (as Burgensis rightly considers it to be) is sufficiently proved even by this verse, which we now treat, in which it says: "It [the soul] has no help with GOD, Sela."

Dear, who should be so nonsensical as to claim that Christ or even the righteous have eternal tribulation without help from God? since it is said in the 8th Psalm [v. 6] that it shall be but little and for a short time, as we shall see. And Ps. 83, 9. it says: "And help the children of Lot. Sela." Will Asshur then come as a helper to the children of Lot forever? Yes, then [if Sela was to indicate a constant duration] Sela would fit very few verses. For example, Ps. 4, 5. reads, "Harten auf euren: Lager, Sela." And Ps. 4:3: "And have the lies so gladly. Sela." Shall the children of men wait for ever, and love lies for ever?

Thus, only the opinion of Burgensis remains, which I neither accept nor reject, although it could also be said against him why such a musical appendage (cauda harmonica) is placed here and not also in other places.

In the meantime, I will stay with the seventy interpreters, who also in many other passages, I do not know how it comes about, have an extremely godly understanding, although they often deviate from the actual meaning of the word, as in the passage in the 2nd Psalm [v. 12]: "Receive discipline"; how clearly and distinctly they have expressed there what the Hebrew text has said somewhat obscurely: "Kiss the Son"! For this means in truth to receive Christ, when one takes chastening and the cross upon oneself and, as Paul is wont to say, participates in the sufferings of Christ. Otherwise they would be people who confess that they know Christ, but deny him in deed. For not he that speaketh shall be saved, but he that liveth JESUS Christ crucified. But to live Christ means to be crucified, as Gal. 2:19 f. says: "I am crucified with Christ. But I live, yet now not I, but Christ liveth in me." So here also I do not know what they [the LXX] mean by their διάψαλμα according to the gramma tic meaning have wanted. I want to interpret it (divinabo) to secrets.

For they seem, as they are wont to do, to have indicated a secret, since they have dared to interpret it by dividing, pausing, stopping, which sela does not mean among the Hebrews; nor have they easily-

The reason for this is that it is certain that not even the smallest letter or tittle is written in vain in the Holy Scriptures [Matth. 5:18].

(20) So I suppose (I would like to take this for myself) that it denotes an exceedingly great movement of the heart, by which the one who sings the psalm (psallens) is temporarily moved by excitation of the spirit. Because this is not in our power, we cannot have it in every psalm, nor in every verse, but as the Holy Spirit gives it, we are moved. That is why Sela is placed in the Psalms in such a way without order (confuse) and without any discernible reason (rationem), so that he [the prophet] may indicate by this very fact that it is a secret movement of the Spirit, unknown to us, not even to be provided by our ability, which, when it comes, since the words of the Psalm cease (omissis), requires a calm and still mind, which becomes capable of the illumination or movement that is offered. Thus, in this verse, since it deals with the exceedingly great spiritual challenge of having to suffer God in His wrath, let alone the creature, the prophet has been moved to feel and recognize this [challenge] with great vehemence (profundo affectu).

This is my opinion, without wanting to oppose the opinion of others, and this may be enough about the word sela.

V. 4. But you, O Lord, are the shield for me, and the one who sets me in honor, and straightens my head.

21. three things he opposes to other three things: the shield to many who afflict him; the honor to many who set themselves against him; the head to those who blaspheme and revile him.

Therefore he is lonely before men and according to what he feels, but before God and in the spirit he is safe in the strongest protection and not lonely at all, as it says John 16:32: "Behold, the time cometh, that ye should leave me alone: but I am not alone, for the Father is with me."

(23) Thus he is powerless and oppressed in appearance and in the sight of men, but in the sight of God and in spirit exceedingly strong.

and thus confidently boasts in the power of God with the apostle 2 Cor. 12, 10. 9.: "When I am weak, then I am strong, and will most gladly boast of my weakness, that the power of Christ may dwell with me." And of the whole church it is said Ps. 68, 10.: "And thine inheritance, which is barren, thou restorest."

This is how it is before men, and as the unwise look at it, it is desperate for him, and even with God there is no salvation for him anymore, but deeply hidden under this storm he is heard and exalted, according to the words of Ps. 81:8: "When you called on me in distress, I helped you out and heard you when the weather overtook you" (in abscondito tempestatis). Truly "hidden under the storm", because this storm of tribulation hides the exaltation and salvation so much that nothing less than salvation is before one's eyes, and one does not feel that God hears, but only that He is angry.

(25) He who understands or has experienced this will understand at the same time how foolish and sacrilegious it is taught by many that man by nature can love God above all things, since there is no man who, if left to his nature, should not look upon death and the punishment of death, let alone hell, with horror, and who could suffer the threatened wrath of God; and yet God cannot be loved above all things unless this is overcome by love for God.

Therefore the words of this verse are not words of nature, but of grace, not of free will, but of the spirit, of an exceedingly strong faith, which through the darkness of the storm, death and hell also recognizes God who forsakes him as his shield, God who persecutes him as his helper, God who condemns him as his Savior. For He does not judge according to what one sees and feels, "like horses and mules that have no understanding," Ps. 32:9, but He recognizes what one does not see. For, "The hope that is seen is not hope; for how can one hope for that which is seen?" Rom. 8, 24.

27. the same opinion is what is written Ps. 54, 5. [Vulg.]: "For strangers (see, many and foreigners 1), namely God-.

1) Instead of alii in the editions will be read ullkni. After that we have translated.

loose and adversaries) have risen up against me (for I am a solitary and lonely one), and strong men have sought my soul (behold, strong men and those who have the upper hand over the weak), and they have not had God before their eyes". As if he wanted to say: They do not believe that God is with me, but that it is desperate for me, and they even think that I am detestable to God. Likewise Ps. 86:14: "God, the proud are set against me, and the mob of tyrants are after my soul, and have not thee before their eyes," that is, I am forsaken and alone, they are many that afflict me; I am powerless and oppressed, they rise up and stand mightily over me. I am a man in whom there is no hope, and they say that I have no help from God either, but those boast defiantly because of the victory over me.

Thus we see that the life of the righteous man according to the example of Christ must be completed in these three pieces of the cross [§ 12], so that he is lonely, powerless and desperate, until he becomes worthy in such a way that God is his shield, sets him in honor and exalts him. This is what happened to Joshua with the children of Israel; in the war he stood against the people of Ai as if he were fleeing, but by this cunning of war he destroyed them completely, Jos. 8, 14. ff. In the same way the children of Benjamin were defeated by the children of Israel, Judges 20, 32. ff. 20:32 ff, when they pretended to flee, but immediately turned and struck them so that they were almost wiped out. For the cross and suffering is an exceedingly dangerous ambush and a very ruinous escape for the world, by which the devil, the world and the flesh are most easily and powerfully overcome, and according to God's marvelous counsel are defeated while they conquer.

But it is clear that in this passage gloria ["honor"] is taken as gloriatio, or the very thing of which one boasts, according to the manner of speaking of Scripture, since it is said: "My confidence (spes) in adversity," Jer. 17, 17., and Ps. 22, 10.: "My confidence when I was at my mother's breasts", and Ps. 142, 6.: "I say, You are my confidence", that is, it is You in whom I hope and from whom my confidence comes. So God is my mercy heartiness, the Lord is my enlightenment and my salvation 2c.

So also here: "Thou art he that settest me in honor" (gloria mea tu), of which I boast; so that the meaning is: Those trust in their honor, and boast of the multitude of their riches, Ps. 49, 7. [loosely from the Vulgate]: "Their strength is their glory", but I do not boast of my strength, which I do not have, nor do I become ashamed in my powerlessness, which I suffer, but boast of thy strength. Thy power is my glory, as it is said in Ps. 89:18, "For thou art the glory of their strength," and Jer. 9:24, 23, "Let him that will boast boast of this, that he knoweth me: let not a wise man boast of his wisdom, let not a strong man boast of his strength, let not a rich man boast of his riches." So also 2 Cor. 1) 10, 17.

If someone should now have pleasure in a sharper grammatical determination (rigidior grammatica), that here actually the Greek xxxx means, which in Latin is used to be rendered by gloria, and therefore is something different than gloriatio, which, as one thinks, is called by the Greeks $\zeta\alpha\upsilon\chi^{\alpha}$, and by the Hebrews XXX or XXXXX, it is also understood in such a way, not without rhyme, that GOD is the glory of the righteous man, as [the apostle] 1 Cor. 11, 7. calls the man "the glory of GOD" and the woman "the glory of the man", because GOD is glorified (glorificatur), honored, praised, glorified in his saints, whom he has redeemed. Again, they are also glorified (glorificantur), since God has honored them with such a great benefit by confessing that they were not helped by their own power, but by God's power.

But with me there is only a slight difference between these two words, especially in this place; only that gloria [honor], apart from the person of the one to whom it befalls (passi), denotes the good opinion which others have of him and a name of good sound, but gloriatio [boasting] denotes the person's own disposition (affectum) and his confidence in GOD. Let each one accept what he wants in this, for in the spirit and before God, one can

1) In the Basel edition only: "OoriiNN.;" in the other editions: 1. Oor.; in the Weimar richtig: II l'or. X.

You can neither have honor without boasting, nor boasting without honor. For in order to boast and be blessedly hopeful in God, there must be a good opinion of you with God, and this you must both know (sentire) and firmly believe, and so by your honor, which you have known and believed, God makes you rejoice and boast in God. For who should not boast, exult, despise everything, and be immensely hopeful who knows or believes that the opinion of him is good with God, that is, that God thinks good of him, is pleased with him, wants to help him, contend for him, praise him among all.

Again, it is not enough that the opinion of you is good with God, and that there you are loved, praised, pleasing (that is, honored), if you do not also know or rather believe this. But you should know that if you believe this, the boasting and joy of conscience can in no way be lacking. Thus it comes about that there must necessarily be at the same time that God be glorified (glorificari) and that the righteous boast, as it is said in Ps. 106, 47: "That we may praise your praise," and that God be at the same time the honor of the righteous and his boasting; the honor in God, the boasting in the conscience. For the honor is the good opinion of another, but the boasting, the hopefulness and the defiance because of one's own honor.

29 So you see how great faith and strength these words contain. He says, "Though many set themselves against me, think evil of me, have the worst opinion of me, yet I know that I shall not be put to shame. My glory is the Lord, in whom I have constant confidence that he thinks the best of me, and I boast of this opinion of God about me.

"Who aligns my head." Although I know that this "head" is understood by others to mean both Christ Himself and the mind of Christ, it still seems to me to be a figurative and figurative (tropologica) conception. Therefore, I believe (this is my opinion) that it should be taken quite simply according to the common way of speaking in Scripture for glorification, so that the clear sense of this whole speech would be: "He who aligns my head", that is, he has

He lifted me up and put me in an exalted place, according to the words of 2 Kings 1:25, 27 ff: "Then Evilmerodach king of Babylon lifted up the head of Jehoiachin king of Judah out of the dungeon, and spoke kindly to him, and set his throne over the throne of the kings that were with him at Babylon." Here it is clear that "to lift up the head" is to exalt the whole man himself and set him in honor and dominion. Thus Christ, who was signified by Jehoiachin, king of Judah, when he died and descended into hell, and when it was already said to him, as he had nothing to hope for, "He has no help from God," is immediately exalted by the right hand of God out of the lowest hell (inferiori lacu, Ps. 30:4) above all heavens, above all authority, appointed King above all kings and Lord above all lords. In the same way it is said in the 110th Psalm [v. 7]: "He will drink from the brook in the way; therefore he will lift up his head," that is, he will be exalted above all.

And as according to the custom of Scripture "to lift up the head" signifies dominion and power, so according to a not dissimilar idiom "to lift up the hand" signifies to have the upper hand and to be mighty in deeds, as Isa. 49:22: "Behold, I will lift up mine hand to the Gentiles, and to the nations will I cast up my banner; and they shall bring forth thy sons in arms" 2c. So also Ps. 74:3: "Lift up thine hand against their hope." Thus "to lift up the feet" means to be swift on the way, as in Gen. 29:1, where we have [in the Vulgate], "Now Jacob set out on his journey," where the Hebrew text says, "Then Jacob lifted up his feet." But also in our German mother tongue we use the same way of speaking to encourage the walkers to walk quickly by saying, "Heb die FüÙe auf," leva pedes tuos.

I have discussed this more extensively, because the right understanding lies largely in the manner of speech (in tropis locutionis), especially in the sacred Scriptures, which have their special kind (idiotismos); if one does not know this, a great fog arises, sometimes in broad daylight. So it is that the head is erect

I will be exalted to kingship and glorified.

(30) I always urge and remind that these are words of faith, hope and love, by which we are instructed in Christ, so that we may not fall away in all fear, for they are written for our learning and comfort (as the apostle says in Romans 15:4), that through patience we may have hope. For it is a difficult thing and an effect of divine grace to believe that God lifts up our heads and crowns us in the midst of death and hell. For here the exaltation is hidden, and there is nothing before our eyes but despair and no help from God.

Thus we are taught here to believe against the hope of hope [Rom. 4:18]. This wisdom of the cross is nowadays very much hidden in deep mystery. For there is no other way to heaven than this cross of Christ. Therefore we must be careful that the active life with its works and the contemplative life with its speculation do not seduce us. Both are very pleasant and quiet, but therefore also dangerous, until they are properly tainted by the cross and disturbed by adversities; but the cross is the most certain thing. Blessed is he who understands it.

v. 5. I call upon (clamavi) the Lord with my voice, and he hears (exaudivit) me from his holy mountain. Sela.

The Hebrew text speaks in the future tense, as St. Jerome also translates: I will call and he will hear; and it pleases me better than the past tense. For it is the voice of one already triumphant, praising, extolling, and giving thanks to God, who has protected, sustained, and exalted him, as he had hoped in the preceding verse. For this is the way of those who triumph and praise, that they tell what they have accomplished, what they have suffered, and sing a song of victory to their helper (adjutori), as in the 66th Psalm, v. 16. f.: "Come, listen, all you who fear God; I will tell what he has done for my soul. To him I cried with my mouth, and praised him with my tongue." And Ps. 81, 2.: "Sing joyfully

God, who is our strength" (adjutori). And 2 Mos. 15, 1. [Vulg.]: "We will sing to the LORD, for he has done a glorious deed" 2c. So also here he sings that he has been heard, that he has slept, that he has been protected, that the enemies have been defeated, that the teeth of the wicked have been shattered, with a heart that is completely full of gratitude and joy.

Without a doubt, this is what causes the change, and that he, who until then spoke to God in the second person, suddenly addresses the word to others and speaks of God in the third person: "He hears me," he says, not: You hear me; likewise: "I call upon the Lord," not: I call upon you. For he desires that all may know what good God has done for him; this is the manner of a thankful heart.

But that it is said in the Hebrew in the future tense, "I will call and he will hear me," contains a stronger emphasis (affectum) than "I have called" in the past tense, though it does not exclude the past time, rather, because of the strength of the expression (vehementia) it includes the past time; and to explain this, if I can, the prophet's disposition (ejus) is of this kind: I, who have already experienced how good, how kind the Lord is, how he does not forsake, how he does not despise those who call upon him, how faithfully he protects, sustains, and exalts all who cry out to him, will henceforth so hold myself against him that I will take refuge in him alone with complete confidence. Nor will I fear many hundreds of lousy ones, I am ready to hope in him, although I would have to suffer much more and greater, and (as Job [Cap. 13, 15. Vulg.] says) even if he should kill me, I will hope in him. He is the God in whom all should trust and be undaunted, and it is not fitting that anyone should despair of Him. O the wretched people who, broken either by the crowd or by the greatness of their misfortune, do not know how mighty, how wonderful, how glorious this God saves those who call upon Him!

33. This attitude is also indicated by the following words: "I am not afraid," says

He says, "before many hundreds of thousands"; likewise: "With the Lord one finds help. In the same spirit he says Ps. 34, 2: "I will praise the Lord always," as if he wanted to say: I, Thor, who until now have praised the Lord only at one time, namely in happy and calm times, I did not know how powerful he was also at the time of adversity, therefore I will henceforth praise him also at the time of adversity. For there are people who praise God when everything is going well, according to the words [Ps. 49:19, Vulg.]: "He will praise you when you do good to Him," but in times of adversity they fall away so completely that they rather take refuge in something else than in God, indeed, they cannot even call upon Him, let alone praise and glorify Him.

But here we are instructed to pray the fourth verse of the 18th Psalm at the time of the cross: "I will praise and call upon the Lord, and I will be delivered from my enemies," so that God will please you and be loved by you even when it seems to you that he cannot please you at all and is worthy of all hatred. For this love for God is righteous (castus) and firm. This is what Isaiah Cap. 48, 9. [Vulg.] says: "I will restrain thee with my praise, that thou be not cut off." For by this praise the heart is kept in check in the midst of the waters and whirlpools of temptations, that it may not fall away from the love of GOD. But this is the work of the Spirit, not of nature, which is most perfectly fulfilled in the One Christ, and prescribed as an example for all who are of Christ.

"With my voice." This, thinks St. Augustine, and after him Cassiodorus, is said not of the bodily voice, but of the voice of the heart, and even of this only when it is exceedingly pure, because of the pronoun "mine"; because that would not be its voice, which would be interrupted by impure thoughts of the one praying. I believe that this is true, but I do not mean that the bodily voice is excluded, because the voice of the heart, when it is violent, cannot refrain from breaking out also into the bodily voice. For Christ on the cross also spoke with a bodily voice.

He has taught us to call in fear, so that we may call on the Lord with all our strength, both inwardly and outwardly.

35 He says, "From his holy mountain." I see that this mountain is understood in different ways. By some it is understood of Christ, who was heard in relation to himself, others understand it of the highest divinity, still others interpret it in other ways. I like the interpretation of the mountain of the highest divinity, only that one is careful (as I let myself think) that this mountain has no name. In the 2nd Psalm, v. 6, he said: "the holy mountain Zion", on which he was appointed king as on a lower one. Therefore that mountain had to be called by name, since he could not have ruled it if he had not known it; but here he by whom he is ruled, and from whom down (de) he is heard, cannot be called by name (innominabilis), since he has neither a form (speciem) nor a name.

It seems to me that we are all instructed by this that we must indeed expect divine help from above in the time of temptation, but that the way, the time and the nature of the help is not known to us, so that there is an opportunity for faith and hope, which are based on what is neither seen nor heard, nor does it come into the heart of a man. And so the eye of faith looks up at the inner darkness and the darkness of the mountain, and sees nothing but that he who looks up and expects help to come to him is weakened. He looks to the heights and waits for help from on high, but he does not know what the heights are like and what kind of help they will be. For though Christ knew all things, yet in all things he was likewise tempted for us, so that even to him in the hour of suffering this mountain was in a certain sense unknown and incomprehensible according to his humanity, which he also expresses in another psalm, the twenty-second, by saying [v. 4. Vulg.], "But thou dwellest in the sanctuary," that is, in a hidden and inaccessible secret. For just as

As God is ineffable, incomprehensible and inaccessible, so is His will and His help, especially at the time of abandonment.

Therefore, if faith does not make a man experienced here, and proves the challenge, it cannot be taught in any words what this holy mountain of God is. So it is the same as if he said: "He has heard me from His holy mountain" (that is, as it is expressed in ordinary life: He has heard me in an unspeakable and incomprehensible way, that I would never have thought it. I know that I have been heard from above, but in what way I do not know. From above he has plucked me out, and from on high he has received me (as we will hear elsewhere), but I do not know what this "from above", this height, this mountain is.

(37) It is the same when he leaves and is not heard. For we know not whither the wind goeth, or from whence it cometh, though we hear the sound thereof when it bloweth, as Christ saith John 3:8. And Job, Cap. 9, II [Vulg.], says: "When he [GOtte] comes to me, I cannot see him; when he goes away, I cannot know him." "So (says Christ) is every one that is born of the Spirit." He departs with him who departs (that is, he is forsaken when the Spirit departs him), and comes with him who comes (that is, he is heard when the Spirit hears him), but neither knows what is done with him or how.

This is what the little word "holy" indicates, which, as was said above [35], means something separate and secret, and precisely that which can be attained neither through the senses nor through the mind; whoever is transferred into it (rapitur) is transferred into the invisible God, and is purified, separated, sanctified in the most perfect way. But this thing is hard and unbearable to human nature, unless the spirit of the Lord floats on the water and covers the darkness of this depth until it becomes light.

38Therefore all folly lies in the fact that man does not remain silent to the counsel of God, but desires that he be given the way and be helped at the time that he has chosen and that pleases him, whereby he makes for himself a mountain that cannot be called by name, and thus desecrates the holy mountain of God by touching it [Ex. 19:12] with his thoughts, as much as there is in it. For such a man is like a horse and a mule, who suffers the Lord as far as he feels or understands, but where it goes beyond his understanding he does not follow, because he lives not by his faith but by his reason. This can be proven with the examples of all the stories of the Old and New Testament (as the apostle Heb. 11 does), in which one finds that God always saved His saints in such a way that the way and the way and the time were not at all in view, but since the help was expected from above and from heaven, 1) it happened to all, since they did not mean it.

Therefore it is very well spoken: "From his holy mountain", that is, from the highest deity. But not all understand what they say. For to be heard by the highest deity is (as I have said) to stand in despair, and to be heard in an unimaginable way, so that nothing less is felt than the help or hearing of the deity. For here faith and hope speak, or a story is told of faith and hope that have been heard. But faith and hope, which have been heard, feel nothing, experience nothing, recognize nothing of the hearing, since they deal with things that are not seen.

This is what the word "sela" at the end of this verse indicates, namely, that this attitude is worth standing still for, since one must not pass by it lightly. It is such a difficult thing to expect one's salvation from the holy mountain of God. For an unwise man does not understand these deep thoughts of God, as the 92nd Psalm, v. 7. says. Therefore, "the Lord also brings to naught the counsel of the Gentiles and turns away the thoughts of the nations," Ps. 33:10, because

1) Erlanger and Weimarsche: expsetata, in the other editions: inxepaarata.

"He knows that the thoughts of men are vain," Ps. 94, 11. Yes, in this trepidation the believer must exclaim: "All men are liars," Ps. 116, 11. It is so necessary that all reason be put to death and taken captive under the obedience of God.

v. 6. I lie down and sleep (ego dormivi et somnum cepi), and awake, for the Lord has me.

41 The word dormivi in Hebrew indicates the position of a reclining or sleeping person, but somnum cepi indicates the sleep itself, so that the meaning is: I have lain and slept, so that it indicates he has been laid in the grave, has rested, and has been dead. This resting is commemorated in many places in Scripture. Thus Gen. 49:9, [Vulg.] "Thou hast rested, and lain down like a lion, and like a lioness. Who shall rouse him?" And Ps. 4, 9. "I lie down and sleep altogether with peace," where exactly the same two words are found as in this verse, but not translated in the same way [in the Vulgate]. So also in our mother tongue we say, "I have lain down and slept," so that by your first word you must understand resting, by your last sleeping.

This is the rest Ps. 16, 9. [Vulg.] "And my flesh shall rest in hope," and Isa. 11, 10. [Vulg.] "And his grave shall be glorious (gloriosum)." For thus St. Jerome translated, but altogether brazenly (fidenter). But the Septuagint, "And there shall be rest his honor (honor)," or as it is in the Hebrew, "And his rest shall be his honor (gloria)," as if to say: Whereas the honor of other kings comes to an end with death, and their honor (as the apostle [Phil. 3, 19.] says) is put to shame, the honor of this king, on the other hand, begins with death, with which his shame comes to an end. It is the same with all who belong to Christ, according to the words of Ps. 116:15: "The death of his saints is accounted worthy in the sight of the Lord," because their life is full of shame in the sight of men. But this only in passing. We want to come back to peace.

This is the rest which the ancient Sabbath once signified (for Sabbath means rest), which even now our holidays signify, as through Christ makes us dead from our works (that is, our sins) and resting and celebrating, so that we alone live God, and now it is no longer we, but God who works and reigns in us. For this reason it was commanded in ancient times with such strictness that no service work (servile opus) should be done on the Sabbath, but that the day should be holy to the Lord. St. Augustine has beautifully interpreted this about the first book of Moses, and teaches that this is to be understood from our works, which are always sins. Therefore, we must do only lordly works (herelia), free works, and princely works, yes, divine works, after Christ has made a Sabbath for us, by erasing our works through his Sabbath and rest.

For this purpose, Christ wanted to lie in the grave on the whole Sabbath day, so that the matter and the time, the name and the image (figura), all coincided, and he emphasized the extremely conscientious observance of this rest, since it is terrible if someone is still busy in his works at this time of grace and holy rest, and is found without the divine works. As the Jews, to whom it was said [Ex. 20:8], "Remember the Sabbath day, that thou hallow it," do not understand it at all, remain in their works, and by hallowing the Sabbath, most grievously profane the Sabbath. But this belongs to the secret interpretation.

Let us return to Christ, who by these words indicates his burial and death, as stated in the beginning of this psalm. For it is not necessary to believe that he preaches such glorious things about the natural rest and the natural sleep, especially since the preceding and the following make it necessary to understand him about a particularly great tribulation, and that he speaks of a wonderful victory over the enemies. Through all this he enkindles us to faith in God by praising the power and grace of God, that he is mighty to raise us from death, by singing and presenting to us the example of this in his own person. For there is nothing that could frighten us wretched people more than the terror of death, with which we were all punished in the first Adam; and there is no more pleasant message than that we hear that this curse has been changed, or (what is even better) overcome, and that this death has not only been defeated, but also transformed into a helper and servant to a better life than we could have had.

Therefore, in the death and resurrection of Christ, the greatest consolation that could be proclaimed to the human race is proclaimed to us, namely, that the evil common to all men, death, has been so conquered, so subjected to the believer, that he is compelled to cooperate more powerfully to life (which he seems to devour) than anything else. Who should not sing here? Who should not rejoice with Christ here? Therefore, this virtutem of Christ, which is exceedingly joyful, had to be presented not merely with dry words and in plain speech, but in a psalm and full-sounding song (as the songs of victory are wont to be), so that we would be all the more inspired to despise this life and love death, since music by nature (genuinam) has the power to make and excite the mind. Therefore Elisha also had a minstrel [2 Kings 3:15], and Moses had drums made for war, Numbers 10:9. Therefore the Holy Spirit wanted to use it [music] in such a salutary and necessary matter, so that, since it is difficult to put life aside and to desire death, he would the more easily move us to it by singing the exhortation, and show that we should the more easily be moved to it.

43) In addition, he uses little words, which extraordinarily weaken the abhorrence of death. He says: "I lie and sleep", he does not say: "I am buried and dead. For death and the grave have already lost their power as well as their name, and death is now not even a death but a sleep; the grave is not a grave but a bed or a little bed. This he does, not only because the words of the prophecy had to be set somewhat darkly and mysteriously, but much more so that he made death exceedingly lovable to us, not to mention very contemptible, since in it, as in the sweet rest of sleep, we have an undoubted and better resurrection and awakening is promised. For who should not be quite sure that he will be awakened or awake again, who rests in a gentle sleep and does not die? But here he says that he did not die, but slept, and therefore he awoke again. And just as sleep is useful and necessary to restore the strength, as Ambrose says in the hymn: [As it is necessary] that sleep restores the tired limbs, so death is useful, and now arranged to help to a better life. This is what he will say in the following psalm [Ps. 4, 9.]: "I lie down and sleep entirely in peace, for you alone, O Lord, help me to dwell safely."

(44) Therefore, those who are in Christ must not see death itself in death, but also a certain life and resurrection, so that the word may stand, John 8:51: "If anyone keeps my word, he will not see death forever. How will he not see it? Will he not feel it? Will he not die? No, not at all, but he will see a sleep, and by having the eyes of faith fixed on the resurrection, he will pass through death so smoothly (labetur) that he will not even see death, and to him death, as I have said, is no death either. And again John 11:25: "He that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live."

45 But all this begins in baptism and is completed at the end of life. For (as the apostle says Rom. 6:4), "We are buried with him through baptism into death." This, I believe, is to be understood not of the spiritual death of sin alone, but also of the bodily death, that sin does not wholly die until the body is destroyed, or as Paul [Rom. 6:6.] speaks, until the sinful body ceases. Therefore, we are immediately prepared for death in baptism, so that through death we may the more quickly attain to life.

Here St. Augustine asks, why he said in the future tense: "For the Lord will keep me" (suscipiet)? Because this is how it is said in Hebrew, although our [Latin] translation has the preterite "he has kept" (suscepit). And although it is true that in the

In the prophets the tenses of the past and of the future are mixed together, whereby both are to be indicated, that what is prophesied to come is future according to time, but that it is to be considered as having already happened according to the opinion (scientiam) of those who make the prophecy, Nevertheless, this may also serve for our comfort and admonition, that the Lord Christ our Head has not only kept him, but will also keep him in all his members who follow him, so that it must be understood in such a way that he speaks for himself and with us in his person and in the person of all of us.

46 But this Hebrew word which Jerome translated: He woke me up, and elsewhere: He sustains (sustentat), has a certain emphasis which the Latin (latinitas) has not rendered, namely, as Reuchlin interprets, he will sustain me, he will come to me, he will be near me, which roughly gives the sense that the one who dies will not be abandoned by the Lord, but is sustained from above, as it were by God's hand stretched out and laid upon him, so that he does not fall into the depths, but rather is pulled out and lifted up, wherein is expressed with marvelous art the manner of a dying man, and God sustaining him. For he who dies there seems to perish and as it were to be swallowed up from below; but there the hand of God sustains him, which approaches him from above, so that he does not perish, so that he is rather lifted up into life, and indeed himself (sibi) perishes and falls, but God is resurrected and comes forth.

V. 7. I am not afraid of many hundreds of those who baptize, who lie about against me. 1) Arise, Lord, and help me, my God.

This third verse of the Song of Victory expresses the same thing as the preceding and following verses, that is, it praises to us the holy hopeful heart that despises adversity. For we have said that this is spoken in the person of the one who is thankful and rejoices against God, praises and proclaims his liberator, his virtue [1 Petr. 2, 9] and grace, so proven and strengthened by the experience of adversity, that in the future he will definitely not fear any misfortune under the protection of God, whom he has already recognized and experienced. Although in Christ, who has risen from the dead, tribulation no longer has a place, or death, or the lurkers of people who oppose him, there is no doubt that such a spirit prevails and triumphs in him, of which it was prophesied that it would be in him. All this was not done for the sake of Christ, who had no need of it, but for our sake, who, though we have overcome some tribulations, have yet to overcome most of those that remain. Therefore, we must be admonished that once we have tasted the grace of God's assistance, we will be strengthened to endure much greater things, since we have been strengthened to the highest degree by the example of Christ. And for this reason the prophet seems to me to alternate with the tenses of the verba in such a way that he sometimes says in the past tense [Vulg.]: "I called with my voice to the Lord and he heard me," and: "I lay and slept and awoke," sometimes in the future tense: "I will not be afraid of many hundreds baptizing," sometimes in the present tense: "Arise, Lord, help me," and again in the past tense: "For you have slain all my enemies," 2c., so that he speaks this in the person of the suffering Christ, but at the same time instructs us by this example of Christ that what has already happened and what is yet to happen are one and the same for us.

1) The following words are in the Vulgate, to which the explanation refers, still drawn to the seventh verse.

So he also said Joh. 12, 27. at the hour of suffering: "Now my soul is sorrowful. And what shall I say? Father, help me out of this hour. But this is why I have come to this hour" 2c. In short, one must get used to this way of speaking, that in the prophets and the psalms many things are said at the same time as if they had happened at the same time, and some things as if they belonged to a later time, which happened earlier; as here in the person of Christ: "Arise, Lord, and help me," belongs to the time before the suffering, but what precedes: "I have called with my voice to the Lord, and he has heard me", and: "I am awakened" 2c., belongs to the time after (post) the suffering. Moreover, it is understood according to its members, as I have said, that it is spoken from a heart that is full of praise and awaits the future challenges with exceeding courage, arming and admonishing itself with confidence in the divine power.

But this is too well known to need to be proved, that it is not said to God, who sleeps or lies down, "Arise," but either, as Augustine says here, it is attributed to God what he himself works in us; that he arises when he makes us arise, just as it is said that he spoke in the prophets when he made the prophets speak, and the apostle says 2 Cor. 13:3, "Seek ye that ye may know him that speaketh in me, even Christ?" or it is said that he rises and opens when he shows by present effect that he assists us. This way of speaking is more common than the former, according to which it is said in Scripture that something is done by God when it is either felt or recognized by us that it is done, as Gen. 22:12: "Now I know that you fear God," and Luc. 7:47, where he had said of Mary, "Her many sins are forgiven," but afterwards, revealing this to her, says [v. 48], "Your sins are forgiven you." In such a way God, although He never does not help, is nevertheless called upon to help, yes, He has given and helped so that He might be called upon, and so that one does not fall away, He helps in the meantime until He can help.

But it seems also that this verse [v. 7. Vulg.] is opposed to the first two [v. 2. and 3.]. It seems to be opposed to the first two [vv. 2 and 3], so that against the multitude of those who oppress him he says: "I am not afraid of many hundreds of those who are baptized, who set themselves against me", against the power of those who set themselves against him: "Arise, Lord", and against those who boast that he is in despair (desperationem): "Help me, my God"; or, even more, this verse would be opposed to the multitude of enemies (tribulantium), the following verse (vv. 8? to the power of those who set themselves against him, because it says: "For you strike all my enemies on the cheeks", and the last verse to those who state that it is desperate standing around him, saying, "He has no help with GOD": worse, "you find help with GOD, and your blessing upon your people."

48. There is an emphasis in these words: "I will not be afraid of many hundreds of baptizing people who are laying themselves against me," as if he said out of an exceedingly great fervor of faith: I will not be afraid, though not all the rulers of the people alone, but also some nation itself [set itself against me], yea, though there were many thousands of nations, and, that I may add it, if they had so caught me one and solitary, that I was utterly compassed about, and had nowhere to escape, even then I will not be afraid, but will be safe; not of my strength, but because thou, O Lord, dost open up 2c. Thus, I say, the Holy Spirit graciously prompts us everywhere, that we may have a completely confident courage in faith in God and in hope in Him.

v. 8. for thou smitest all mine enemies in the jaws, and bruise the fangs of the wicked).

The preterite [percuissisti and contrivisti] stands for the future tense when it is taken in the person of Christ before the resurrection; but if it is understood of the time after the resurrection, it is a continuation of the song of victory and the praise of God for our admonition, as has been sufficiently said.

Jerome translated from the Hebrew instead of: sine causa: "the cheeks", in this way: For thou hast smitten the jaws of all mine enemies, and thus it is quite true that it follows: Thou hast broken the teeth of the wicked. And so here seems to be a repetition of the same thing (tautologia).

But this is the order: I will not fear, I say, many thousands, nor will my faithful fear any multitude, however wicked and mighty, for I have already experienced how you strike those who seek to consume and devour me, raising me up also from the

1) In the Vulgate: Huoniana tu percussisti orunss uävi>r8untk8 uüüi sinn causu, üeut's peceutoruna ooutrivisti.

Kill them so that they can no longer devour me, and strengthen my believers through the Spirit so that they cannot harm them.

50 But this smiting could also be understood of the destruction of the Jewish people by Titus and Vespasianus. For though they are still biting and blaspheming against Christ and the Christians, yet they are bruised and crushed, that they can eat no man. Therefore they have teeth and jaws, but bruised and crushed, as it is said elsewhere, Ps. 58:7 [Vulg.]: "God will break the teeth in their mouths, the chins of the lions the Lord will crush."

51. but in this figurative speech he uses "jaws" and "teeth" for biting words, after-talk, slander and such harmful things by which the innocent are oppressed, as it is said in Prov. 30:14: "a kind that has swords for teeth, that eats with its molars, and devours the wretched of the land, and the wretched of the people." For by these Christ was devoured, since he was condemned to the cross before Pilate by their cries and accusations. Thus the apostle Gal. 5:15 says: "If ye bite and devour one another, see that ye be not consumed one of another." In many other passages of Scripture, too, this figurative speech of teeth and cheeks is frequently found, and is clear enough in itself.

52. but the bride of Christ also has teeth, Hohel. 4, 2, 6, 5. Your teeth are like the flock of circumcised wool that comes out of the flood," that is, the rebuke with which the church bites and punishes sinners, and converts and incorporates the bitten, is like shorn sheep, gentle, for the punishers are without anger and zeal, then also shorn, that is, they are free from concern for temporal goods, not seeking their gain and the wool of the sheep. For even the apostles could not preach the word and serve at table at the same time, as Apost. 6, 2. is written. But about this elsewhere.

These teeth are pictured in the jaw that Samson picked up and struck a thousand men with, Judges. 15, 15. Therefore, God also mercifully bruises and breaks the teeth of sinners (in a milder sense) when, through the grace of conversion from

He makes the accusers and slanderers of the righteous into their praisers and eulogists, just as he destroyed St. Paul, the most ferocious wolf, who was exceedingly strong by very strong teeth, and made him an apostle, a devourer of all the Gentiles to this day. On this opinion also says Isaiah, Cap. 2, 4: "They shall turn their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks," as if to say, "They shall turn their pernicious tongues into wholesome ones, which work the earthly-minded (terrenorum) people, so that they may be plowshares in punishing, and pruning hooks in gathering the people to Christ.

The teeth can also be understood according to the secret interpretation, as St. Augustine says, of the principes among the sinners, by whose power everyone is cut off from the community of the rightly living and is, as it were, incorporated into the evil living; 1) to these are opposed the principes among the righteous, as the priests, who by good example and word persuade people to believe, to go out from the world, and to join the church as members. And for this purpose, what is said in the Song of Songs Cap. 4 and 6 about the teeth. But everyone may indulge in such spiritual interpretations as he likes, I will not deal with it further.

But this psalm will not be of no use to comfort weak consciences, if it is interpreted morally (tropologiam), and if the enemies and the teeth of sinners are understood to be the extremely burdensome attacks of vice and conscience over an evil spent life. For here the heart of the sinner suffers in truth heavily, lonely, powerless, despairing, and if it does not accustom itself to lift up its eyes against the attack of its sins and to call upon God against conscience, there is danger that the evil spirits, which in this commerce creeping in darkness [Ps. 111, 6.] seek to catch the soul, will at last plunge it into despair through sadness.

54 Therefore, the heart must be most strongly

1) Here the Basel edition has the marginal gloss: Xota, nostrorum æntiurn exeolumnieationem invbniss works on, here you will find the spell of our teethj.

and one must say confidently with Christ, whether against the sins that persecute the conscience or against the punishments that impugn blessedness:

V. 9: With the LORD you will find a sheath, and your blessing upon your people. Sela.

55 A very beautiful conclusion, and as it were a summa of all the aforementioned movements of the heart. But the meaning is: It is the Lord alone who can help and bless, and even if the whole Hanseatic League of all misfortunes would come together, he is still the Lord who can save. In his hand is help and blessing, so what should I fear? What should I not fear? since I know that if God wills it, no one will be lost, no one will be cursed, even if all should perish and curse [him], if God wills it, none of them will be saved and blessed, however much they preserve and bless themselves, and, as Gregory of Nazianzus says: If God exists, envy can do nothing, and if God does not exist, all effort (labor) can do nothing.

56. to this opinion also Paul says Rom. 8, 31: "If God is for us, who may be against us?" So again: If God is against them, who may be for them? Why? Because the help is with the Lord, not with them, not even with us, for "the help of men is of no avail" [Ps. 60, 13.] Therefore it is said in Revelation 7, 12. "Praise, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and praise, and power, and strength fei our GOD" 2c.; likewise therein [v. 10. Vulg.]: "Salvation is with our GOD and the Lamb"; and Ps. 109, 28.: "If they curse, bless them"; and Mal. 2:2: "I will curse your blessing" and turn your curse into blessing.

57 Thus saith the blessed Christ, and so saith the Christian soul in the midst of tribulation, It is not that they destroy and curse me; it is not with them, but with the Lord, to preserve and bless. Nor does it profit them to preserve themselves by their own strength, and to bless one another; it is not with them, but with the Lord, that help and blessing are to be found.

they will be corrupted and cursed; again, when he protects and blesses, they seem to corrupt and curse us at the hour, but in truth we are protected and blessed. This is what the 146. 1) Psalm, v. 3. wants: "Do not rely on princes, they are men, they cannot help."

58. And in order to have comfort in this confidence, it is forbidden in the Law of Moses before times that one man should not bless another, in that God says, 4 Mos. 6, 23. ff. [Vulg.]: "Thus shall you bless the children of Israel, and thus shall you say to them, 'The LORD bless you, ...' so will I bless them." O a wholesome and necessary commandment!

59. Why do you think that God does not want any man to be blessed by another? This happened for no other reason than because He already then considered the word Matth. 5, 11: "Blessed are you when men revile you and persecute you because of Me, and speak all kinds of evil against you, when they lie about it. For so it is with men, as Ps. 10:3 [Vulg.] is written, "For the sinner is praised in his lusts, and the wicked is blessed"; whereas, of course, the righteous is reproved and cursed. Quite rightly and exceedingly, therefore, the Lord says, "I will bless them," which he repeats, as it were, in this verse, saying, "Over thy people [find mau] thy blessing."

Therefore this verse must be read in such a way that the emphasis and the tone with a raised voice lies on the genitive domini ["with the Lord"] and on the pronoun tun. ["thy"], so that by the contrast we may at the same time recognize the attitude which is full of the sweetest confidence, which as it were ridicules the evil attempts of the adversaries, and mocks their confidence, in this vow: "With the LORD is found help, and thy blessing upon thy people," so that we may learn to despise the curse of men, and not to seek their blessing, since we know that it is with GOD alone to save and to bless. In the same opinion, God mocks them in Isaiah, Cap. 41, 23: "Defiance, do good, or do not do evil."

Harm", as if he wanted to say: You are neither able to harm us nor to benefit yourselves.

61 First, see that he puts the help before the blessing, of course in the right order, because the blessing in the holy Scriptures expresses the progress (profectum) and the increase, as Gen. 1:28: "He blessed them, saying, 'Be fruitful and multiply,'" which cannot happen unless the one who is to be blessed is first protected, so that he does not perish. And in a fitting manner he contrasts these two things with the first two verses; the help of the Lord to the enemies and to those who set themselves against him, for these perish; but the blessing of the Lord to the cursers and to those who say, "He has no help with God." For this is the most severe cursing.

62. For since the wicked have nothing left to do to the righteous, who have been destroyed by them, only one thing remains, that they speak disparagingly of them, revile them, blaspheme (as Christ showed us on the cross), where they strive to eradicate the good report of those [righteous], both with God and with men; with men by evil reproach, with GOD by attacking the good confidence of their conscience, that they also should not boast in GOD, but should be put to shame on both sides. At the same time, the serious challenge to blaspheme is touched upon here, by which man is driven to despair by the devils, so that he thinks that the curse of God is pronounced upon him, and thus does not consider God to be God, since he does not think of anything good for Him. For this is to blaspheme God, of whom we are commanded to hope all good things from Him and to provide ourselves with the best for Him, since we are commanded in the first commandment to serve Him in faith, hope and love, as it is written in the Book of Wisdom, Cap. 1:1: "Provide yourselves with the best for God, and seek Him with a simple heart."

64 And this is perhaps the reason that he so often changes the person. For since he had said in the third person: "With the Lord one finds help," as if he wanted to praise God to other people, he immediately returns to the first person.

second person back, saying, "Thy blessing." For since this blasphemy tears away from GOD the very furthest, and he flees, as it were, the curser and seeks another giver of blessing, while yet there is no other who can bless, he reminds us that we are to turn to GOD the very furthest when we are turned away from Him the very furthest in the contestation. And this movement of the heart, because it is something very special and exceedingly violent, is perhaps not without reason designated by the word sela, of which enough has been said above.

We have interpreted this whole psalm from Christ. Now, if anyone does not like this explanation, he will have no difficulty in understanding it from David, as an example of such suffering and the same movements of the heart, which, as we have seen, were described in Christ and in every Christian, except that the fifth verse alone will cause some difficulty in this interpretation. But let us give those who are better able an opportunity [to do better], and briefly interpret the psalm thus:

66 "O LORD, how many are mine enemies!" namely Absalom, Ahithophel and all the people, as it is written in 2 Sam. 15.

67 V. 3. "Many set themselves against me, many say to my soul, It has no help from God. This was done by Shimei, who cursed David in 2 Sam. 16:7, saying, "Come out, come out, you bloodhound, you loose man!" and threw stones at David, saying [v. 8], "The LORD has rewarded you; see, now you are in your misery." 2c.

68. v. 4. "But thou, O LORD, art the shield of me, and the one that setteth me in honor, and setteth up my head." For there [2 Sam. 16, 11. f.] he said, "Let him be subdued, that he may curse, for the LORD hath told him. Perhaps the LORD will look upon my misery, and repay me with kindness for his cursing today." With these words he indicates that he has not yet despaired, indeed, that he has strongly trusted in God, so that he acknowledged and justified His commandment and His will.

69 [v. 5.] "I call with my voice

the Lord, he will hear me from his holy mountain." This he did when he said [2 Sam. 15, 31.], "Lord, make the counsel of Ahitophel foolish," and perhaps also otherwise, which is not written. For, as I have said, it is not credible that he made this psalm in the tribulation, but after the tribulation.

(70) O strong faith, that a man should speak thus to God when he is angry, that he should cry out to him who smites him, that he should fly to him who drives him out, that he should praise him as his shield, his honor, and as the one who sets up his head, whom he feels is forsaking him, disgracing him, and oppressing him; an exceedingly delicious example of Christian faith. He says [2 Sam. 15, 20.], "I will go where I can go," as if to say: I do not know where I will go; that is to believe, to go into such great darkness, where you do not know at all what will happen to you, and yet you have good confidence and do not doubt that you will be heard.

71 [v. 6.] "I lie, and sleep, and awake, for the LORD keepeth me." This, in my judgment, is to be understood thus: I was then such a man that it was desperate for my life, for my honor, and for all my affairs; I was like one that was dead, and went down into the pit, as much as there was in fact and in the sight of men, and truly nothing lived in me but faith; neither did it seem to me otherwise, if I should be restored into the kingdom, than if I should be raised again out of the sleep of death, and out of the grave. For into such peril and to such gates of hell the Lord is wont to lead those whose faith he would try; for a man who suffers these things is not at all different from a dead man.

(72) Or if this interpretation is not to your liking, well, this may be [David's] affectus: I was immersed in this affliction, and just as those who are overcome by a deep sleep do not feel that they are alive, and are quite like the dead, so I am from too great affliction in a deep faintness (ecstasi).

I was already really dead, as Gen 45:26 f. is said of Jacob, when he heard that his son Joseph was reigning in Egypt, awoke as it were from a heavy sleep, but still did not believe them; for he had so despaired of Joseph. But when he saw the chariots and all that Joseph had sent, his spirit came alive again.

So David also says here that he has revived and awakened from the deep sleep of the heart and, as it were, from death. For I confess that I cannot understand it from the natural sleep and the natural rest; but also David, when he returned, says 2 Sam. 19:22: "Do you think that I do not know that I have become a king over Israel today?" in which he obviously indicates the position of the heart, of which we have said that he had despaired of the kingdom as far as the present facts were concerned.

74. v. 7. "I am not afraid of many hundred lukewarm ones that encamp against me round about. Arise, O LORD, and help me, my GOD." This he says, having already been reinstated [to the kingdom]. Henceforth I shall fear no evil, if thou be with me, as it is said in the 23rd Psalm, v. 4. Only arise and save me, as you have done now, and be only my God, then there will be nothing for me to fear.

75 [v. 8.] "For thou smitest all mine enemies in the jaws, and shatterest the teeth of the wicked." For the people are smitten with Absalom, and "there was a great slaughter that day, twenty thousand men," 2 Sam. 18:7. and so they are smitten and dashed down who were already devouring and destroying him.

76 (v. 9) "With the Lord you will find help, and your blessing upon your people. Sela," as if to say: Though Simei with his had bored their cursing teeth into me, saying, "He hath no help with GOD"; "now thou art in thy calamity," 2c. yet blessing and preservation are with the LORD alone. To Him alone be glory forever and ever, amen.

The fourth Psalm.

V. 1. a psalm of David, to be sung on strings. 1)

To my mind, this is an exceedingly dark psalm, and hardly any other has been interpreted so differently. This great diversity proves that the right understanding of it has not yet been made manifest.

First, let us consider once and for all the title, which we will have more often from now on. Before Jerome's translation, it was translated by the elders: in finem, which they indeed unanimously declared "upon Christ", whom the apostle Rom. 10, 4. calls "the end of the law" (finem), saying: "Christ is the end of the law, he who believes in him is righteous". This "end" they again take to be twofold, that Christ was raised up (intentus) from the law as it were to the end and summa, and that he himself made an end of the law, so that we owe him nothing more, or, as the Peripatetic philosophers speak, he is finis quo and gratia cuius. But what this is to serve as the title of the psalm, I cannot see, unless you tear this apart quite forcibly, and put others together. For not all psalms that have this heading speak of Christ, unless this means speaking of Christ when speaking of some work of God's grace, because without Christ we have neither great nor small things. But then one would have to put this heading over all the Psalms.

After that Jerome translated: "To the victor" (victori); followed by: "To the victory", from which Lyra draws the opinion from Rabbi Solomon 2) that the psalm was made for the singers, the Levites, to sing in alternate choirs (al-ternis choris) should be anxious to overcome each other, perhaps by measuring (mensus) the holy, sweet song of David, which was used for the praise of God, according to the custom of the exceedingly large screamers, who are called canons (chorales) in our cathedral churches. To whom these may sing I do not know, I only hear that they roar for the stones and for the wood. And then, trying to reconcile this with the fact that others have written about it in finem, he says that this is the end (finem), the victory, namely in the shouting, which the choir, who would be victors in the singing of this psalm (namely at the behest of the prophet), has sought. Can then also these foolish antics be taught with such great seriousness?

But we read in the first book of Chronicles, Cap. 16, 19-2t., that three kinds of singers were ordered by David; the one who should sing with harps (nablis),³) that is, init psalteries; the second who should sing with the zither, or, as the interpreter is also wont to say for it, with the lute (lyris); the third who should sound brightly with brazen cymbals. To these were added at times the drums and the trombones. And of the third 4) kind it is written there [v. 21.], with zithers an octave higher (super octavam) lenazeach, which one [in the Vulgate], translated epinicion, that is, a victory song. Hence it is perhaps from this that lamnazeach is translated: To victory, that a psalm designated with such a title should be a song of victory.

Here I confess my ignorance. For if this is so, I do not know why the title: "A song of victory" should not also be written to all other psalms, which either have the same or also greater things des-

1) In Latin, Luther has here the translation of Jerome: vū toriuin in orʼanis lʼniinnʼ Duvüt. The Vulgate offers: In tinnin in ourininidns, lʼUnnnj Vuvlü.

2) In the Erlanger: "Hubdi Sul."; Baseler and Wittenberger: "liuln LiU"; Jenaer: "Nutzi suli". That we have correctly resolved, about it compare Walch, St. Louiser Ausg., Vol. I., IM, § IM; idüi. Col. 370, z 219. The Weimar offers: ÜuUi [aiomonn.

3) In the Vulgate, the Wittenberg, the Jena, the Erlangen and the Weimar: "nnkUs"; in the Basel: "undilis".

4) In the Bible, v. 21, it is the third kind; but in the order as Luther has indicated it here, it is the second kind.

The psalm and its like contain the same kind of victory. Then again, there will be a difference in what kind of victory is sung in the psalm, since some celebrate the victory of Christ, but others the victory of any Christian who is in suffering or temptation.

Johannes Reuchlin in his Septena translates: Ad invitatorium, which means that Such psalms are a kind of stimulus to awaken and exhort the spirit of man, and the origin of this word fits extremely well. For, he says, it means: He stops, he urges, he compels, he urges, as Ezra 3,¹) 9. [Vulg.]: "To drive the workers who did the work of God," and again [v. 8.]: "To drive the work of the house of the LORD." But even the content of the psalm is not contrary to this, because in my judgment it is only an exhortation to do the work of the Lord, that is, to suffer the cross and death. But whether this cause of the title is constant and continuous in all psalms, I leave to the reader to investigate and judge.

I gladly accept that a song of victory and an invitational are one and the same, because such songs of triumph tend to inflame and incite the hearts to war in an extraordinary way; the psalms also encourage the faithful of Christ quite powerfully both to the wars and to the victories of the cross. And so I can also harmonize everything with each other: To the victory, the victor, to the incitement, to the end, because everything has its purpose, that we, encouraged by this incitement of the Spirit, may be victorious, and attain the end of all enemies and of all ungodly (peccatorum), so that nothing is left but the triumph of glory.

"On stringed instruments" (in organiz); here the genus is no doubt taken for the species, that is, [stringed instruments] for zithers. For it has already been said that the songs of victory were sung to zithers, 1 Chron. 16, 28. [Vulg.] For it is "strings" at this point in Hebrew a general term for any musical instrument.

I am silent of the praise and power of music, since this is abundantly dealt with by others, only [that I will note] that here it clearly appears that the use of music was formerly sacred, and adapted to divine things, but that in the course of times (like everything) it has been put into the service of lavishness and pleasure. For by the same the evil spirit of Saul was driven out, 1 Sam. 16, 23, and to Elisha the prophetic spirit was given, 2 Kings. 2) 3, 15. This very dark psalm has been interpreted (as I have said) in various ways. Augustine believes it to be either the words of Christ after his resurrection, or of a man in the church who believes and hopes in Christ. I pass over Lyra and Burgensis; the former understands it as spoken by David against the followers of Saul, the latter that it is spoken against the idolaters. Jerome thinks that it must not be understood differently than by Christ. All (singulae) interpretations of these people go beyond my concepts; I will follow my: spirit and let my sense rule, but let everyone his opinion.

These are my thoughts that this Psalm is a very general exhortation to all the people of God, especially to those who do not know the works and ways of God and shun the wisdom of the cross. Among these, the Jews were the first, and still are, the children of Israel, who should be the most experienced in this. For, as the apostle Rom. 3:19. says, "We know that what the law saith, that saith it unto them which are under the law." Therefore David, proved by one of his temptations, or rather by many, teaches us by his example what to do and how to behave in any tribulation, and so this psalm, according to its title, will be one that exhorts to victory, which is also indicated by the words themselves by which he makes himself known as the teacher of those people, saying, "Dear lords (filii viri), [v. 4.] recognize, [v. 5.] be angry, [v. 6.] sacrifice, hope" 2c.

V. 2. Hear me when I call, God of my justice (Cum invocarem, exaudivit me Deus justitiae meae).

2) Erlanger: "2. Re." instead of: 4.

1) Wittenberg, Jena and Erlangen: Lgäru" 4.

2 Right from the beginning he instructs the fainthearted and those who are full of complaints, teaching them by his example that in any affliction one should not run elsewhere, but should call upon the Lord. He says: As often as I have called (but I have called as often as I have been in trouble, as the 120th Psalm, v. 1. [Vulg.] says: "I have called upon the Lord in my distress"), so often has he heard me, for the Lord is so kind and ready to have mercy on those who cry out to him, why then do you pusillanimous ones fill everything with your complaints, seek vain consolation, flee to men and know nothing of this one remedy, nor do you seek it?

Pay attention to the divine artist and incomparable speaker. With one and the same entrance he does three things. First, he addresses the children of men, 1) and, concerned for them in brotherly love, teaches them where the afflicted must flee to, by his own example and with very modest boasting. I, he says, have always done so, and believe that you also should do so. Secondly, in order to make them well-meaning and willing, he at the same time praises to them the goodness of God. He says, "He has heard me," as if to say: I am firmly convinced that He will also hear you most graciously, if you will only dare to do so and call upon Him. Thirdly, which was the main thing, as an extremely good speaker he begins with thanksgiving and praise, which is the best way to win the goodwill of God and men. For this is also how we are commanded in the prayer of the Lord, that we should begin: "Our Father", by summarizing and repeating with this word in the sweetest spirit all the benefits of God.

This is undoubtedly the reason why he addresses the word to the children of men, which he should have addressed to God; but he did not want to leave them behind and come alone and empty before the face of God. That is why he tries to win the goodwill as a grateful one, and at the same time instructs the weak as one who is eager for the salvation of the brothers. For in the following part, he immediately addresses the word to God alone, in-in which he says "You have comforted me," where he has already brought those whom he addressed in the first part with him to God's face, so that they now not only hear what he did in previous tribulations, but also see the example by which he is accustomed to flee to God in present tribulations, thus comforting them most lovingly by word and example.

4. now [comes] this: "GOD my righteousness", for which can also be said without danger: GOD my justice (iustitia mea). Although I do not want to deny that it means that justice is from God, and that God alone makes just, it seems to me that the prophet touches on the epitome (summam) of the question or complaint that the weak are wont to bring forward, namely, that they think that they are wronged by the adversaries, and therefore they are justly unwilling and angry. The prophet does not attack them sharply, but (as I have said) instructs them sweetly by his example and admonishes them to forget their righteousness and to bring the whole matter home to God, who judges rightly, and not to presume on righteousness more than is good for God, as Peter says of Christ, 1 Peter 2:23. 2, 23: "Who did not reproach when he was reproached, nor threaten when he suffered, but brought it home to him that judgeth righteously" (that is, he committed the matter to GOD who judges righteously). Thus he says here: As often as I suffer injustice, I call upon the GOD of my righteousness, being ready to take for righteousness whatever he may judge; therefore I know nothing of any other righteousness that is mine, but only GOD himself and his holy will.

5. Is this not an exceedingly artful way of comforting the weak, not condemning their cause, nor justifying it, but taking it from them and transferring it to God, at the same time drawing them to God with their cause, so that they may consider it their righteousness, whatever God may do, and thus bear God's will patiently?

This understanding I follow all the more gladly, because in my opinion (mihi) "my righteousness" according to the custom of the Scriptures is more

The Scriptures rather call it "the righteousness of God" (justitiam Dei), Rom. 1, 17: "The righteousness that is before God (justitia Dei) is revealed in it through faith", and Ps. 31, 2: "Save me by your righteousness" (not by mine). On the other hand Gen. 30, 33: "My righteousness will testify to me today or tomorrow," and Ps. 7, 9: "Judge me, O Lord, according to my righteousness and godliness." For this is the righteousness among men, which God also avenges, although it is not sufficient for anyone before God, and it happens that sometimes something evil is done unjustly, which is not suffered unjustly. He therefore quite rightly withdraws them from trusting in their own righteousness and leads them to God, so that they will not be worthy before God to suffer much greater things, however righteous they may be before men.

(6) And this is indeed a very useful doctrine, which is always neglected by men. For if this were kept, there would not be so many courts, quarrels, rights, disputes and lawsuits. For everyone cries out: Justice, justice, justice. Such a man is rare, who, according to the example and word of this prophet, would make his justice GOtte home and let him be the GOtte of his justice, or rather his justice. Therefore, the whole world rages because of righteousness and justice with wars, murders, troubles and innumerable horrible sins and evils, and it happens that righteousness is almost the sole cause of all injustice. For they are so blinded by error that they think that justice is also with God, which they, instructed by their own opinion (dictaminibus), their own counsel and the statutes of men, have recognized as justice, about which much should necessarily be said, if we were not now doing other things.

Who comforts me in fear. 1)

This is a repetition of the same thing (tautologia), because, it is the same "to be heard-.

1) In the Vulgate: In tridulationo <Uluta8ti iniüi In the tribulation you only provided wide space.

and "to be given wide space (dilatari) in tribulation," as Ps. 118:5 [Vulg.]: "In anguish I called upon the Lord, and the Lord heard me, and comforted me by giving me wide space" (in latitudine).

But "you have given me wide space" or this "wide space" (latitudo) is a Hebrew way of speaking and a figurative speech (metaphora) or an interchange of words (metonymia), which is peculiar to Scripture, for which we say "consolation" without figure, as, on the other hand, instead of "constriction" (angustiam) we say sadness and affliction. For just as the heart and all the senses are constricted (contrahuntur) when they flee and abhor sad things (for when misfortune breaks in from all sides, there is generally a constriction and a pressing into the constriction from all sides), so they are given room and expand when the misfortune is removed, and good and lovely things are again given. And indeed, the nature of sadness and joy is actually expressed by this word, for both in the forehead and in the whole face I see how they are contracted by sad events, but expanded by pleasant events. Therefore it is said of the wicked in the Psalms, "And it shall be narrow unto them in their anguish" (et contrahentur in angustis suis). Therefore the apostle Rom. 2, 9. also puts these two things together: "tribulation and fear" (angustiam), namely the evil, and the escape from the evil, but in such a way that one cannot escape from it.

It seems that rather dilatasti me than: dilatasti mihi should have been said, but it is a peculiar way (idiotism) of the Hebrew verba that they are more often put without relation (absolute), and include the accusative in the notion (abstractum); or are resolved into their verbal noun, as, "thou hast made wide for me" (dilatasti mihi), that is, thou hast made a wide space for me (latitudinem), thou hast been the one who has made space for me (dilatator meus), that is, thou hast given me comfort as often as I have called upon thee in my affliction.

2) In the editions, the 18th Psalm is cited, but wrongly. Weimar edition in the margin: Ps. 16, 46.

And so then the good will is won, at the same time the weak are also instructed, yes, if you want, you can consider this verse as it were the summa of this whole Psalm. For he sets it as his task to instruct the weak that they should call upon GOD and command their cause to GOD, praise GOD's righteousness, seek no comfort elsewhere, but expect the same most certainly and abundantly (magno fructu) from GOD; and that exceedingly powerfully by his own example, uniting himself with them as it were as a comrade and making their accident his own.

Have mercy on me and hear my prayer.

(7) He says: I confess that you have heard me as often as I have called upon you, for which I not only give thanks, but by this I am also certain that, just as suffering will continue to abound among us forever, so you will also hear those who call upon you forever. In this confidence I call upon you again now, when I am in fear, so that you may hear me again.

8. But since in Hebrew this verse is the last part of the first verse, I would like this whole verse to be understood, according to my thoughts, as a form prescribed for the weak, according to which they should keep themselves when they are unjustly afflicted, and that this little piece is, as it were, a pre-chewed food, by which the prophet wanted to instruct them as children what words they should use when they wanted to call upon God, namely these: "Be merciful to me and hear my prayer," so that they would first ask God for mercy for themselves and their sins, with which they might have earned much trouble, and thus in the meantime forget vengeance and put their cause in God's hands, but then ask that they be heard. "For the righteous first accuses himself," Prov. 18:17 [Vulg.], and: "He who pleases God first has mercy on his soul," Sir. 30:24 [Vulg.]. Therefore he begs first for mercy for himself, only then he asks to be released from the punishment. But I would not dare to assert this firmly.

(9) It may be, therefore, that in a new tribulation a new calling will take place.

Nevertheless, what I have said must be observed, that we should not be so much concerned about the punishment as about the sin, first obtaining the mercy of God, so that we do not forget, according to the quite wrong way of the fools, our guilt that deserves the punishment, and see only the foreign guilt that carries out the punishment on us, leaving the beam stuck in our eye, and striving to pull the splinter out of our brother's eye. For first we must ask that the cause of the affliction be taken away from us (which is sin), not the affliction. Therefore, God must first have mercy on us, then hear those whom He has had mercy on.

(10) So you see that the Psalms were written (editos) by the Holy Spirit to be a comfort to the afflicted; therefore, what do those have to do with the Psalms who do not want to suffer affliction? But what people today want to suffer less affliction than those who deal with the Psalms day and night, or should deal with them? Does not the word Amos 6:5 apply to them [Vulg.]: "They made themselves think that they were playing the psaltery like David"? How should they sing psalms, since they fill the whole world with murder for the sake of their wealth, privileges and rights, and are not satisfied by hurling their own curses (fulminibus)? That is why nowadays there is no other custom of the Psalter than to let himself be howled and murmured; this is a very shameful custom, and yet it happens again and again.

V. 3. Dear sirs, how long shall my honor be profaned? How do you love the vain so much and the lies so much? Sela. 1) 11 St. Jerome translates thus: "You children of man, how long, my illustrious people, do you shamefully love vanity and seek after lies? [Filii viri, usque-quo, incltyi mei, ignominiose diligitis, etc.] Surely St. Man here correctly captures the meaning of the Hebrew words. For in this verse there is nothing about "heart".

1) In the Vulgate this verse reads: klü Uomimim, ugcioHio Sravi eorüe? nt quiü üiliAitis vuuitut^m, 6t Hiiueritis monckueiuni?

Therefore it is evident that our [Latin] translator, whoever he may have been, has erred, and has read Beth for Kaph, and, what is more. One word into two; that instead of XXXX (which means "to shame") he read XXX XX (which means "heart, why"). Therefore, where Jerome has translated ignominiose (ignominious ways in one word, there that one has translated with two words "corde, ut quid" (hearts, why), and where the Hebrew text has, there our [Latin] translator says graves, what Jerome has rendered by gloriosi mei or incltyi mei, because "glory" is designated with the Hebrews almost with the same word as the heaviness (gravitas).

The Hebrew text has also not "children of men" but fili XXX, that is, of a man 1), a hero, and as it is said in the 1st Psalm, v. 1, "a blessed man" (beatus vir), because here fili XXX is not written, by which the fleshly birth is designated. Therefore we see that he does not indicate children according to the flesh, or that he does not address them as children according to the flesh, but as a master (magister), teacher or any other superior calls his subordinates children.

Therefore, I will first give my opinion, and then we will look at other things. I translate this verse like this: Filii viri, usquequo gloria mea ad ignominiam, diligitis vanitatem et quaeritis mendacium? Sela. (Men, how long shall my honor be put to shame? How long will you love what is useless and seek after falsehood?) 2) So the words of the prophet seem to me to be in the person of God or Christ, who first addresses the Jews, then also the Gentiles, as the apostle is wont to speak, so that the meaning is: O you children of Israel, how long will my name be disgraced among you? How long is my honor exposed to shame (patet) through you, since you forsake me, who am the truth and the life, who love the useless and seek after falsehood? Now let us see how this is done.

(12) I have said that this psalm is an exhortation to those who, because of lack

1) Weimarsche: viri, üerois. In the other editions: ülü iierois.

2) See Luther's first translation of the Psalms at 'the beginning of this volume.

In faith, when crosses and injustices befall them, they become angry and lose heart. This is a sin (vitium) of unbelief and an offense (crimen) of spiritual idolatry. The children of Israel are accused of being such people in the wilderness, Ps. 78:8: "An apostate and disobedient kind, to whom their heart was not steadfast, and their spirit held not faithfully to God." Here, obviously, the sin of the heart is punished, namely, that they did not trust (God), did not want to know about the cross, and did not recognize the way of God, for he says there [Ps. 106, 13.]: "They did not wait for the counsel of God"; this sin they are accused of in the entire Old Testament.

(13) From this offense came immediately the outward and manifold idolatry, according to the diversity of the innumerable inclinations of the heart, that the one sought this God, the other that God, and each transferred the honor due to God to the creature from which he either had obtained comfort, or yet hoped to obtain it.

14 Since the glory of God and His service consist in sincere faith, strong hope, and perfect love toward God, it necessarily follows that he who neither trusts in God, nor believes in Him, nor loves Him, but finds comfort in some creature, turns the glory of God to shame, and seeks the name and work due to God from the creature. But so do all who fall away in the time of temptation [Luc. 8, 13] (because he is mainly talking about them).

Therefore, the world is full of idolatry from its beginning to its end. Although they do not always worship images of creatures, they have such an attitude, which is the source and head of all idolatry. But this is (as I have said) trusting in creatures, taking pleasure in them, delighting in them (which one should do only against God), that is, unbelief and distrust, and thereby also contempt and hatred against God.

16 Thus it says Ps. 106, 20: "And they turned their honor into the likeness of an ox that feedeth on grass." By this verse he describes exceedingly beautifully the power of ab-

GOD'S Glory. He calls "their glory" the glory of God, because only with them was the glory of God (that is, the right faith and worship); through this glory of God they also had glory with God and men. So also 1 Sam. 4, 21: "The glory (gloria) is gone from Israel," and Rom. 1, 23: "They have changed the glory (gloriam) of the incorruptible GOD into an image, like corruptible man." For what is this, that the glory of GOD is changed, but that the service of God is changed? For the service of God, if one wants to express it in the shortest possible way, is nothing other than the glory of God; the glory of God is nothing other than that one believes in Him, hopes in Him, loves Him, because whoever believes in Him considers Him to be true and ascribes truth to Him. He who hopes in him believes that he is powerful and wise and good, since he can obtain help and salvation from him; and thereby he attributes to him the power that he can help him, the wisdom that he knows how to help him, and the goodness that he wants to help him; but this is that he is truly God, and that one truly believes him to be God. Then the love for him follows immediately, in that he is pleased with such a god of his own free will, and takes an exceedingly delicious good opinion of him. But he who does not believe [God] makes him a liar [1 John 5:10]: he who does not hope [in Him] makes him one who is either powerless, or does not know how to help, or does not want to help; which is terrible. Then contempt for God must inevitably follow. Therefore, he then turns to the creature (for the human heart must necessarily believe, hope and love something), and trusts either in wealth, or favor, or in his powers, or something else, or in a foolish delusion that is preached, be it about the right God, or about a false God. If he now and then feels comfort (by permission of God), he falls on it with his whole heart and his love. And so the power, the goodness and everything that belongs to the glory of God is turned into shame and attributed to the one to whom it is not due.

Thus says God, Isa. 42, 8: "I will not give my honor to another, nor my glory to idols," that is, he gives all goods also to his enemies, but he reserves the honor for himself alone, because any goods that one receives or seeks should not be attributed to anyone but the one God, by which it is preached that he alone is good and he alone is true God [Matth. 19, 17. Joh. 17, 3]. Now if this is understood in this way, I believe that this verse is easy, namely, that those who know nothing of the cross and have no faith desecrate the honor of God as soon as they are struck, and take refuge in anything other than God, do not seek counsel, help and salvation from him who has them, but seek it from themselves or from the creatures (with whom they are not), by not believing the last verse of the preceding Psalm: "With the LORD is found help, and thy blessing upon thy people."

(19) Now let us consider the affectus and emphases in this verse. First of all, in order that it be a sharp and insistent admonition, he addresses them with a very dignified title, and says: "Ye children of the man" (filii viri). Which man is understood here, whether Abraham, 1) whether Israel, or Christ, will come to the same thing, although I would like to understand Abraham as the most suitable, since I understand it first from the Jews. For he is called to be the father of many nations, because not only in this passage, but also in Isa. 51, 1. 2. it is said: "Look at the rock from which you were hewn, and at the well from which you were dug. Look at Abraham, your father, and Sarah, from whom you were born. For I called unto him while he was yet single, and blessed him, and multiplied him," as if to say: Take heed, not as ye are born of him carnally, but as I have called him, and he is justified, not of the flesh, but by faith in me. You must do the same if you want to be his children. As John 8:39 is written, "If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do Abraham's works."

1) In all editions: Abrahae, for which Wohl Abra- ham

So also here. In order to hold Abraham up to them as their father, not according to the flesh, and to exhort them to become his spiritual children, he rather says: "children of the man" than: "children of a man", and although they are rather an adulterous kind and bastard before God, since they boast of the heredity (carnem) of Abraham without his faith, he nevertheless dignifies them with such honor, so that he makes them all the more loving and effective to such people, as those are, whose name he gives them, just as Paul [Gal. 1, 2] still uses the word "churches" for the Galatians, even though they were already deceived and torn out of the faith of the church. Nevertheless, he covertly reproaches them for their degenerate mind, that even though they were the children of such a great hero, they did not show themselves to be his children.

(20) After that, this question, "How long?" also has an extraordinary force, and at the same time praises the kindness of God's long-suffering, but at the same time pities the exceedingly heavy and protracted loss of their salvation, as if he wanted to say: Since you are, indeed ought to be, children of so great a man, of whom alone you boast: how long do you prove yourselves to be such people, with such exceedingly grave danger to your blessedness, and your abuse of divine patience, and are so degenerate as to be children of this so great a man in name alone? But this you do, neither believing nor hoping in God in whom he believed; yea, this honor of confidence in me you turn elsewhere to my shame and yours. For you do not know that in adversity there is nowhere else to run but to me. For (as it is said in Isa. 46:4), "I will do it, I will lift up and carry, and I will save." Why does someone else seize this honor, who cannot do enough for it? Why is it not given to me, who alone can and will do it, to whom alone it is due? You see how he is friendly, but his complaint against her is very sharp. Now this also has its special weight, that by the very significant contradiction, his honor will be disgraced, he does not demand any honor, but his own honor; a godly mind should by and tremble when it hears this. For it is frightening to hear that the honor of God is turned into shame, the praise of God into blasphemy, which all creatures endeavor to hold in honor with all their strength [Ps. 19:2].

And he himself makes this matter such an important one that he uses an elliptical speech, namely aposiopesi or the concealment of a thing, since he omits a word by saying, "How long will my glory be turned into shame?" namely, turned and perverted, just as Paul says, Rom. 1:23, "They have turned the glory of God." 2c. For by this concealment (aposiopesi) he indicates that this shameful deed was so great that it would not be right (fas) if one wanted to name it, because of the horror that one must have before such an all too great ungodliness. For the guilt would have been much lighter if you had misused the created things for shame and brought down the honor of my work into disgrace, as it happens when a vessel is made of gold that is not worth the gold, when a nobleman is without honor. But that my honor should not only not be given to me, but also be taken away from me, and not only be taken away, but also be turned into shame, that is a shameful deed, at which the heavens are terrified, which the ears cannot bear, which the tongue is afraid to speak. Behold, with how mighty words our God urges us to believe in Him, that is, to our blessedness.

Now it would be easy to rhyme the other translations with mine, although they do not give the meaning exactly. "Ye children of men" 2c. [in the Vulgate], as if to say: Ye are in truth children of men, more than children of the man to whom ye ought to belong, but ye have his flesh and your fathers', not their faith in you. "How long are ye heavy of heart," how long are ye faithless in your hearts, and, plunging down through the heaviness of your unbelief, set your confidence on things, and ascribe the honor which ye owe to me to creatures? as has been sufficiently said.

So also the translation of Jerome: "Ye children of men, how long do ye shamefully love vanity?" as if he were wanted to say: This is to the dishonor of me and of you, that you cast off confidence in me, and love other things than me, who am the truth 2c.

In a beautiful order he says first that the vain is loved, then that the lie is sought. For the first of all is the heart (affectus) itself, or the love, or the will, or the aspiration; if this is perverse and ungodly, it immediately gives birth to ungodly, false and lying opinions (opiniones - delusion). For on these two things (as it is said in the first Psalm) rests the whole life of every man. Thus it comes about that contrary to Moses, Deut. 12, 8, every man does what he thinks is right. This endeavor, this counsel of the wicked, these vain thoughts of men, the Spirit punishes as a lie in this passage, and so generally in all Scripture, as we shall see in the Psalter. So the love of the vain turns away the heart; when that is turned away, the mind is immediately infected with evil opinions, so that, as it loves things evil, so it also judges things evil, and, after the mind is blinded by malice, thinks in error and its lies that it walks in truth, in wisdom, and entirely in the light.

Every word here has an emphasis. "The vain" (vanitas) is, as Ecclesiastes Solomon very abundantly describes throughout the book, everything that GOD is not. For if the help of man is vain, how much more the help of all other things? This is the vain thing, then, that the man who does not know the grace of the cross does not seek help and comfort in God, but in something else, for neither salvation nor any good can be found elsewhere than in God. All other things are an affliction of the spirit, and in truth more a stimulus and tickle to comfort than a consolation, and rather a stimulus to salvation and good than salvation and good.

(21) Furthermore, "to have vanity" (vanitatem) is not yet the greatest evil. For "all men are nothing at all" (vanitas [Ps. 39:6]), and "there is nothing new under the sun" [Eccl. 1:8], or if it is an evil, it is a tolerable one. For there is no one, even among the saints, who does not, more or less.

less than he should, hopes, trusts, desires, fears, loves and hates. But this body of death, these laws of sin, these vanities (vanitates) must be hated, not loved, not enjoyed. To use the comfort and help of creatures is not evil, but to love them and cling to them, not to trust in God out of love for them, that is ungodly.

(22) The lie is also a lesser evil than "seeking the lie", since someone can be deceived and accept "the vain" for truth, but "seeking it" is ungodly. For since all men are liars [Ps. 116:11], we must not seek to obey our opinions, our judgments, or, as they say, our dictaminibus, and govern our lives according to them, but we must strive to the utmost to abstain from them and yield to the opinion of God and be guided by His judgment and act according to it.

Therefore, nothing more pernicious can be presented to a Christian than moral philosophy and the statutes of man, if they are presented in such a way that man is to believe that he is walking rightly in these things before God. For in this way it will happen that he will rely on these counsels and judge, condemn, persecute everything that he sees being done against him, and thereby reject the cross of Christ and completely despise the way of God, which is best and most favorable when we live without our guidance and counsel and, as it were, follow Christ in the pillar of fire through the desert and on an untraveled path.

24 For this means to love not "the vain" but the solid ground, to seek not the lie but the truth, all of which can be better felt at the time of suffering and adversity than can be said in words or thought out in the heart, for in order to understand God's words, experience is necessary (as we have often said). For they do not want to be spoken or known, but to be lived and felt, as he does who says in the 116th Psalm, v. 11: "I said in my fear, All men are liars." Why liars? Because he is put into the terror of suffering, and, being lives by faith in God alone, and having abandoned trust in the creature, in which he sees all men drowned, confidently proclaims that their affectus is vain, and all their counsels and efforts are lies, because they are without faith in God; But if they are without faith, then they are also without the word of God; if without the word of God, then they are also without the truth; and so indeed everything is lies and vain that is apart from faith, which is the truth for the sake of the word of truth, in which is believed, and to which one clings by faith.

(25) So we have the understanding of this verse, that all men are ungodly, idolaters, desecrators of the divine honor, who in any affliction fall from faith, hope, and love to the confidence and comfort of creatures, and by these efforts protect and govern themselves.

Enough has been said about the little word "sela". For here, too, it seems to me to be used to designate the emphasis (affectus), because it is indeed to be regarded as something great that the whole human race is in such a depraved state of mind and delusion that it loves the vain and seeks the lie, so that this matter cannot be sufficiently talked out and inculcated.

v. 4 Recognize that the Lord leads His saints in a strange way; the Lord hears when I call upon Him.

(27) A most salutary instruction, for this is the reason why the children of men abhor the cross, which is the way of truth and solid ground, and rather follow vanity and lies, trusting in creatures, because they know nothing of God (as the apostle says in the first letter to the Corinthians [Cap. 15, 34]); they do not know, I say, what God is doing, what He wants, what He thinks when He afflicts us with tribulations. For they judge, like horses and mules, according to what is before the eyes and what is felt. But then there is nothing but shame, poverty, death and everything that is shown to us in the suffering Christ; if you look at this alone, and do not recognize the divine will in it, suffer it (feras).

and praise, then you must inevitably become angry at this cross and take refuge in your actions, where you immediately become an idolater and give the honor due to God to the creature.

When Christ gave John 16:3 as the reason why the Jews would persecute the apostles and expel them from the synagogue, he said: "They will do this to you because they do not recognize my Father or me. How then did they not recognize Him, since they disputed so much with Christ for (per) God? But to recognize Christ is to recognize the cross, and to recognize God under crucified flesh. For this is what God wants, this is the will of God, yes, this is God. Therefore, because they hate and persecute the cross and the word of the cross according to their inclinations and opinions as something that is opposed to vanity and lies, this is the reason why they do not recognize God or (which is the same) do not recognize the will of God.

29. so also Joh. 6, 53. when he said: "If you do not eat my flesh and drink my blood, you have no life in you", this was a hard speech [v. 60.], so that also many of his disciples were angry and went behind him [v. 66.]. Why a hard speech? Because to eat this flesh and drink this blood is to be incorporated into Christ through faith and to share in his sufferings. But this is what the evil mind and the heart corrupted by wrong opinions detest most. This is what he says here: "Do not be afraid, do not think that you will perish if your inclination and your mind are turned away, if everything you suffer goes against your opinion, but be sensible, know the Lord, know his will, turn away your eyes so that they do not look after your vanity, for "the Lord leads his saints strangely. He seems to kill, but in reality he makes alive; he strikes, but in reality he makes well; he puts to shame, but in reality he puts to honor; he leads down into hell, but in reality he leads out of hell, and the like, about which we have said many things in the foregoing.

30 So what is more miraculous than this divine

What is his will? He has set himself high, but he looks at the low [Ps. 113, 5. 6.], he makes people fools, so that they become wise, he makes them weak, so that he makes them mighty. But the former is before the eyes and is felt, but the latter you will not obtain unless you have faith. For so also Peter says, 1 Petr. 1, 11, that in the prophets the sufferings are testified before as the first, and after that the glory.

(31) Therefore, we need a reminder and admonition by which we are established to know God in such cases. He says, "Know ye that the Lord leadeth strangely," as if to say: Why do you waver? Why do you seek counsel and help here and there? Why do you love this and that comfort? All this is vain; not only does it not help, but it is also a lie that deceives you. Recognize and be sure, hear and believe, it is a firm and unchangeable judgment that everyone who wants to be a saint of God, who wants to obtain His grace and be pleasant and pleasing, must necessarily suffer, so that God may be wonderful to him. But He could not be wonderful if your counsel and help or any creature could help you. For this is not wonderful, because it is not beyond your comprehension. But when things are desperate, both for you and for all other creatures, and the matter is committed to the will of God alone, then behold, your righteousness shall break forth like the light, Ps. 37:6, and the Lord shall bring forth your righteousness like the noonday, in a way and at a time that neither you nor all the world could have imagined. 32. a "saint" is called in this passage in the Hebrew XXX, because he is quite actually holy who has obtained mercy, whom we call one justified by grace. And this speech [in the Vulgate] must be understood as a distributive one, or that the singular be put for the plural, in this way [Vulgate]: "Ye shall know that GOD hath led His saint whimsically," that is, His saints, which is said as much: Ye shall know that GOD wonderfully governeth man, and wonderfully dealeth with every one whom He justifieth.

and clothed with his grace, so that you may learn that everyone who wants to please God (as I have said) must know this counsel of the Lord and this good, pleasing and perfect will of God. For the apostle also says in Romans 12:2 that this will can only be tested through the renewing of the mind, in which our inclination and our opinion always disappear (occidit).

33 "The Lord hears me" 2c. Again, he teaches the weak by word and example, for he could have referred it to "the holy one" (sanctum) and said: The Lord will hear him if he calls upon him; or he could have harmonized the first part of the verse with the following in this way: Recognize how wonderfully] the LORD has led me. But, as I have said, these sudden changes of persons indicate a diversity of movements of the heart and miraculous shifting [from one position to another] [translationes]. The person of the prophet, then, must be imagined as being concerned for the children of men in exceeding love, and counting himself now among the saints, now among the sinners, that he may win them all. He says: The Lord will hear his saint; if this should move too little, I say that he will hear me, who am also one of the saints, that is, one of those who obtain his grace.

34 And notice his attitude, that he at least advises the children of men that they should suffer God's hand; but because this thing happens in faith, he cannot show what he says; God cannot be seen (as I have said). Therefore he does the utmost he has and can, he promises, namely the help of God, as if he wanted to say: This one thing I have that I can do for your comfort, for I can confidently promise you that you will be heard. Therefore trust, do not love the vain, do not change the glory of God, but wait, and be strengthened by my example, because I am quite sure that the Lord will hear me, not only at this hour, but as often as I call upon him.

35 Thus we see the exceedingly godly care of a spiritual soul for its brethren. For he dare not boast, and yet.

he is forced by the brother's need to use himself as an example, as the apostle Paul does in many places: "Be ye followers of me, even as I of Christ" [1 Cor. 11:1], and 2 Cor. 7:2: "We have hurt no man" 2c. For in order to avoid this boasting, he seems to have said in the first part of the verse in the third person: "his saints" (sanctum), so that he would not boast in vain honor that it was he with whom God acted wonderfully. He did not do this in the following part, because "calling upon God" does not give rise to great boasting, but is rather a sign of sorrow.

Therefore the good Spirit teaches us that when we are led astray (that is, in tribulation), nothing else must happen but that we suffer the Lord who leads astray, and cry out to Him, not fleeing from suffering, not seeking lies and what seems good and right to us; this is the most harmful beautiful appearance.

V. 5 If you are angry, do not sin. Speak with your heart in your camp and wait. Sela. 1) 37 The Hebrew text, as Jerome translates (auctore), has this: Be angry and do not sin; speak in your hearts in your camp, and be silent. It is obvious that here in our translation [the Vulgate] the pronoun quae and the connective et²) are superfluous. Also the verbum compungimini has forced the interpreters to assume a different sense than the text gives. Therefore, let us first look at the Hebrew.

After the prophet in the third verse had withdrawn the children of men from vanity and falsehood, that is, from false inclinations and opinions concerning the creature, and they could now counter: What then shall we do? On what shall we base ourselves? Do we have to leave everything so completely? He answers in the fourth verse that they should trust in the Lord and rely on the Lord.

His mercy, knowing that since God works it, it is not for destruction but for salvation (however miraculously), whatever they suffer from those who wrong them.

(38) If then they should complain again: And who then can remain unmoved and not be angry? Who then should not at least lament and complain against those who do wrong? he answers sweetly in this verse: "Be angry (he says), but in such a way that you do not sin when you are angry. I know that the movement of anger is not in your power, but beware that you do not consent to it. So Paul says Gal. 5, 16: "Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not carry out the lusts of the flesh," and Rom. 6, 12: "Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, to render it obedience to its lusts," and Rom. 13, 14: "Wait for the body, but so that it become not lustful."

39. all this is because the evil lusts of both unchastity and wrath are in us, but we are to deal with them so that they do not rule, that is, that we do not obey them (as Paul said). Thus he complains Rom. 7, 19. that he does what he does not want to do, and does not do what he wants to do, and again [v. 25.] that with the mind he serves the law of GOD, and with the flesh the law of sin. Why is this? Because he would like to be without evil desires, but cannot, and only have pure desires, but cannot, as he also says in Gal. 5:17: "The spirit lusts against the flesh, and the flesh lusts against the spirit. These are contrary to one another, that ye do not the things that ye would."

It is therefore clear that the verb "be angry" in this passage is not a word of instruction or exhortation to good wrath against sin, but a word of permission or allowance for evil wrath against offense, because of the inevitable and insurmountable weakness of the flesh. St. Augustine also says to this verse: "Be angry and do not sin," that is, even though anger arises, which is already out of our control because of the punishment of sin, at least mind and heart should not consent to it, which is in the flesh.

1) In the Vulgate: Irascimini, et nolite peccare, quae aicitis in cordibus vestris, et in cubiliis vestris compungimini.

2) In the edition of the Vulgate, which we use, et.

We are born again to life in God (secundum Deum), that we serve God with our mind, if we still serve the law of sin with our flesh. He says this very well and beautifully.

41) So the meaning is clear: "If you are angry, do not sin," that is, because you complain that you cannot help but be moved, be grieved, be angry, tremble (for all this is what the Hebrew word means) because of the great evil of the wrong you have suffered, well, your heavenly Father knows this weakness of yours. Be moved and angry, but do not go so far as to think, say, do or allow anything evil against your soul, and thus sin against God, against yourselves and against your neighbor.

42. this understanding I take all the more readily, because the spirit of Paul (which I always desire to follow) Eph. 4, 26. has the same understanding, since he says: "Be angry, and do not sin"; and that he does not speak of good anger (which is commanded against sin), indicates what follows: "Let not the sun go down on your wrath," which he says badly of evil wrath. But this very passage of Paul has caused me to interpret this Psalm of the injustice suffered by the weak and their complaints, which are to be kept in check by godly exhortation, and that confidence must be directed to GOD. For Paul uses this verse with the same intention (scopum), as is sufficiently obvious to everyone.

Here, however, the question of the first impulses (de primis motibus, as they say) raises its head, and where venial sin ends and mortal sin begins. The apostle, to be sure, sets the sun's going down as the goal, since he says: "Do not let the sun go down on your wrath," but this again they make doubtful whether the visible sun must be understood, which we see going down at a certain hour, or the spiritual sun, Christ, which they think goes down instantly by consent, which is mortal sin (per mortalem consensum). Unless an unavoidable necessity compels it, I flee the secret (mysticas) mind in the Scriptures.

and also advise that one should flee him, because he is extremely dangerous. That this sun in Paul means something different than the visible one, I do not admit for myself, although I do not condemn that other opinion.

Moreover, I know that no presumption is more dangerous than to make a distinction between venial sins and mortal sins, especially in the hour of excitement and temptation. I am speaking of the sin committed in the excitement of a surging mind, since both unchastity and anger, or any other passion, tend to possess a man not only in one hour, but sometimes for many hours, so that he himself is uncertain whether he has consented or not. Yes, not infrequently, by divine providence, it is the mere and involuntary suffering of a good and sincere heart, which is so hidden that he fears, indeed, almost believes, that he has consented. By this means, the divine mercy is wont to keep its beloved in the humility which has adorned them before others with glorious gifts, lest, puffed up by the same, they should haughtily exalt themselves above others and be lost.

Therefore, the apostle's teaching is the safest and wisest for me, that at least in the evening every man should go into himself and put away the anger he may have felt when he wants to go to sleep and be reconciled with his brother. For no more suitable time can be appointed for this than the setting of the sun and the end of the day, when all business and works are finished, and the mind is now calmer and ready to put away this and all wickedness, whether he has consented to it or not. For who can tell how often he fails? And in every work one must fear the strictest judgment of God.

43. it follows: "Speak in your hearts upon your couch, and be silent." It is quite clear that it is the same super cubilia [Jerome], in cubilia (in Hebrew), in cubilibus [Vulg.], for in Hebrew it reads almost as if there were a movement toward a place. Christ uses this expression Matth. 6, 6: "When you pray, go into your closet and close the door" 2c.

44. I am forced to follow the worst teacher here (as they say in Proverbs), that is, myself, because I see that the Hebrew text is not interpreted by anyone, yes, as much as I can, I will follow the spirit. For it is the manner of those who suffer injustice to lead out, crying out and filling the air with lamentations, so much so that even the apostle Eph. 4:31 lists crying out among the movements of anger, saying, "Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and crying out, and blasphemy be far from you. 2c. Now in order that the prophet may keep the children of men in check, so that they do not break out, as he had forbidden them to be angry in the first agitation, but in such a way that they did not sin, he now teaches them that they are not to make a noise in anything, but to speak in their hearts in their camp, expressing by this what they are to do so that, moved by anger, they do not sin, namely, that they speak to themselves and keep silent. This I do not understand differently than according to the understanding of the prophet Isaiah, Cap. 30, 15: "By being silent and hoping you would be strong." For here not only the "silence" is mentioned, which is done with the mouth, but in general the patience itself and the quietness in contrast to the noisy being, as it is said in Ps. 37, 7.: "Be still unto the LORD, and wait for him," and Ps. 65, 2.: "God, they praise thee in the coamings of Zion," and Isa. 41, 1.: "Let the isles be silent before me, and the nations strengthen themselves."

In general, according to this scriptural expression, "to be silent" means the same as to put away impetuosity, to temper anger, to restrain the mind, as we also say in our mother tongue to the angry, to pacify them: "Hush, hush, stop. Therefore also with the Hebrews of this right silence the grave XXXX is called, because there the human being desists and goes completely into silence. For in this place also Isaias had foreshadowed and said [Cap. 30, 12. Vulg.], "Ye have hoped for slander and clamor." For the heart of the enraged and offended surges that slander and clamorous nature bubble forth, whereby they presume to wreak vengeance and prevail. But in restraining such a heart, he says, "If you turn back and be quiet, you will be helped, for it is not by noise but by silence that you will be victorious. Then follows: "By being quiet and hoping you would be strong," that is, if you are silent, keep quiet, restrain your impetuosity, abstain from noisy behavior, do not seek revenge but await my hand, leave the revenge to me, leave the matter to me, behold, then you will be strong and overcome. For I will fight for you, you shall be silent.

46 Moses says in Exodus 14:14: "The Lord will fight for you, and you will be silent. What is this: "You will be silent"? That is, you will be silent, you will do nothing about the matter, but you will act as if the trade is none of your business. This "be silent" is nothing else than having calm patience; this way of speaking is frequent in the holy scriptures.

47 Therefore also Isaiah says there, since they did not want to obey this request to observe silence [Cap. 30, 16]: "And say, No, but on horses we will flee, and on runners we will ride. For what is this but that they wished to defend themselves by wantonly taking action (tumultum), not to be saved and made strong in silence and hope? Hence it follows [v. 16, 17]: "Therefore you will be fugitives, and your persecutors will overtake you. Your louses shall flee from one rebuke, yea, from five ye shall all flee, until ye be left over, as a mast tree upon the top of a mountain, and as a banner upon the top of a hill." I believe that from these words it is clear what there is silence and tumultuari, namely the one is suffering and resting, the other is being moved and setting everything in motion, and, as they say, stirring up heaven and earth. This verse teaches this silence.

The meaning is: "Talk with your heart in your camp, and wait", that is (as one is wont to say), consider, reflect, do not be hasty, and do not immediately come out with what anger brings to you. First take counsel with yourselves, "for the wrath of man does not do what is right in the sight of God" [Jac.

1, 20], and as a pagan also says: Beware of doing and speaking something when anger moves you. But St. Gregory also says: "It is better to avoid anger by silence than to keep the upper hand by talking back. This opinion we use to express in German: "Bedenk dich, und halt inne."

Now let us consider the words. The first is: "Speak with your heart", that is, they should consider it well, and not obey the anger, which goes out quickly, and has the word on the tongue, not in the heart, according to the saying Sir. 21, 28.: "The fools have their heart in their mouth, but the wise have their mouth in their heart." This is a beautiful and apt conversion (*conversio*¹) of the saying. This verse also reminds us of the same thing, that we should turn our mouth to our heart, not immediately pour out what the temptation brings in. For to have the heart in the mouth is to speak carelessly, which is what angry people usually do; but to have the mouth in the heart is to speak carefully, which is what calm and gentle people do.

Therefore, in this passage we can imitate the same conversion, and say that speaking with the heart and thinking with the mouth (that I say so) are opposed to each other; the former is found in wise men, the latter in fools. But in order that they may speak more readily with their hearts, he adds that they should do this in their camp, that is, seek solitude, flee from disturbing noise. For when the body is at rest, and the external noise is quieted, the mind is also more easily calmed, so that it can talk to itself and consider the matter. And as for this challenge it is useful to withdraw (fuga) and be alone, so in some other challenges solitude is dangerous. This I say according to my sense, but I leave to everyone his opinion.

In what way then do we want to bring our [Latin] translation in line with this? It is necessary that another word be added, as Augustine also teaches, who arranges it in this way:

"What you speak with your heart," add: "speak that" (dicite), which Augustine draws elsewhere, but according to our sense would turn out thus: Since you are angry, you are quick to say everything that comes into your mouths; what you want to say, do not hurry to say, but speak it with your heart, that is, speak carefully what you want to say. For Christ also used this way of speaking against Judas, saying [John 13:27], "What you do, do soon," that is, what you want to do, or have already set before you to do. So also here: "What ye speak," that is, what ye will speak, speak with your heart. What you want to speak foolishly in the impatience of your anger, take care that you consider it in your heart and speak wisely.

Now, what is this: "And on your camp bear sorrow" (compungimini). What kind of harmony is there between being still and bearing sorrow? According to my judgment, it is that when an angry man goes into himself, he bears sorrow, displeases himself in that he has become agitated, and thus comes very close to the stillness of which it was said before, through the influence of bearing sorrow. Therefore, when he speaks with his heart, he sees (especially on his bed, and where he stands alone) how foolish was the agitation and impatience of his anger; if he had followed it, he would have fallen shamefully; and changed by this suffering over himself, he abstains from the noisy being to which he had been aroused, and is now silent, since the fervour of revenge is not a little subdued. Whoever has something better, may gladly communicate it; this much I have been able to do.

(49) What "sela" means at the end of the verse, we have sufficiently said. For it is an excellent gift of grace that he who has been provoked to anger and impatience by injustice and temptation should be able to show such an attitude, that he should bridle his tongue, withdraw into solitude and be silent. For on this opinion (scopum) Paul treats (as I have said) this Psalm Eph. 4, where at the end [v. 32.] he says: "But be ye kind one to another, cordially, forgiving one another, even as GOD forgave you in Christ."

1) With this conversio is meant: In ors oor in eorcke os.

V. 6 Sacrifice justice (sacrificium justitiae) and hope in the Lord.

(50) A strange teaching, for what is the sacrifice of righteousness? Who can offer righteousness to God, which he should rather obtain from God through any sacrifice? In short, he distinguishes the sacrifice of righteousness from all sacrifices of cattle and any other things, because these two sacrifices are most strongly opposed to each other: the sacrifice of righteousness makes sinners, the sacrifice of things makes the righteous. In the former we seem to give something to God and work righteousness, in the latter we only want to receive from God and confess our sin. Thus it comes about that the sacrifice of things, since it makes puffed up by righteousness and works, fills people with impatience because of the injustice done to them, since they are aware that they have earned something far better; therefore they are also the more fiercely inflamed to revenge, because it seems to them that they must protect their righteousness.

51) So this is the sacrifice of righteousness, that one judges God to be righteous and praises Him, but accuses oneself as a sinner and says that one is worthy of all that one suffers, saying with the 119th Psalm, v. 137 [Vulg.]: "Lord, you are righteous, and your judgment is right." Such [sacrifice] is described by a very beautiful example Dan. 3 [in the Prayer of Azariah, v. 31. f., Vulg.], "In all that thou hast let pass over us, and all that thou hast done to us, thou hast done according to right judgment, and hast delivered us into the hands of our ungodly enemies," and afterward [v. 39. f.], "With sorrowful heart and bruised spirit we come before thee, as offering burnt offerings of rams and oxen, and many lousy fat sheep. So let our sacrifice be accepted before thee this day, and let it be acceptable: for thou wilt not bring to shame them that hope in thee." Likewise Baruch Cap. 1, 15. teaches the prisoners in Babylon the same, and says: "And say, The Lord our God is righteous, but we bear our shame justly, as it is now."

52. but this sacrifice must be made with a righteous heart, mouth and work: with the heart by acknowledging sin in truth; with the mouth by confess them without hypocrisy; with the work of willingly bearing the punishments due to sinners. Many, of course, say with their mouths that they are sinners, but neither with their hearts nor with their deeds, which they prove by the fact that they do not want to be called sinners by others, nor do they want to be thought of as sinners, nor do they suffer injustice. If you are a sinner, why do you flee punishment? If you think you do not deserve it, why do you say that you are a sinner? For this is the glory of the righteous, that they have honor and peace, Rom. 2:7, but tribulation and anguish is the sin of them [v. 9].

Therefore, those who sincerely ascribe righteousness to God, but sin to themselves, are the people who offer the two sacrifices of righteousness praised in Scripture. The one may be called the morning sacrifice, of which the 50th Psalm, v. 23. says: "He that offereth thanksgiving praiseth me; and this is the way that I show him the salvation of GOD." The other is the evening sacrifice, of which the 51st Psalm, v. 19. says: "The sacrifices that please GOD are a troubled spirit; a troubled and bruised heart Thou, GOD, wilt not despise." And this is perhaps indicated by this verse here, which in the Hebrew says in the majority, "Sacrifice the sacrifices of righteousness," so that it includes both sacrifices.

(54) Therefore, in every challenge and injustice that befalls us, we must not arrogate justice to ourselves and hold on to it, but reject it altogether and sacrifice it to God. Those who do not do this excuse themselves, accuse their adversaries, justify themselves, and are generally involved in court battles, slander, lawsuits, disputes, quarrels and other works of the flesh, which the apostle lists in Gal. 5:20. They bite and devour one another, [v. 15] so that not only is love lost in the spirit, but they not infrequently kill one another in the flesh as well, and waste their wealth in litigation.

(55) But if Christians offered these sacrifices of righteousness, where would rights and laws remain? But that is why we are taught these sacrifices, so that rights and laws would not be necessary. The king of Babylon acted ungodly by holding the children of Israel in captivity, as they say Dan. 3 [Prayer of Azariah, v. 32]: "You have delivered us into the hands of the most unjust cruel king on earth," and yet the king of Zedekiah and those who remained in Jerusalem offended God more by resisting him and demanding justice. But those who willingly gave themselves into it, and put away the boast of their righteousness, pleased God very well, so that these, in the midst of Babylon and her enemies, were preserved, honored and honored, but those in the midst of Jerusalem perished among their friends, became ashamed, declined, because those [in Babylon] offered the sacrifices of righteousness without cattle or any other things, but these offered the sacrifices of cattle and other things without righteousness, because they wanted to be righteous, and did not recognize their sin; but those recognized their sin and ascribed righteousness to God.

56. From this we see that the chaos and tartarum of the courts and Roman artifices, with all their books, customs, traditions, rights and justices, is a strange thing to a Christian man, and that it does not belong to a fair ecclesiastical life, and that it has only been indulged and tolerated for the service of the weak, so that they would not do something worse out of a desire for their own revenge, or overwhelmed by the force of impatience. And yet nowadays at Rome and at the courts of the bishops they rely on this (only tolerated thing) in such a way that they not only let themselves think that justice reigns there, but also, in order to increase such justice, even heap quarrel upon quarrel (lites litibus emant), humble all people's quarrels and quarrels from all ends of the world to themselves, so that never has any court of any secular or pagan emperor been heaped with so many things, and quite unholy things, which at the same time (one must wonder at this) concern only holy and divine things, which have been most shamefully bought, rebaptized, sold, resold, robbed, devoured, and ruined.

The jurists call the present Roman court a fountain of righteousness, while it would be more appropriate to call it a flood of wickedness, because from there the desolation and oblivion of these sacrifices of righteousness and of the knowledge of Christ has swept with unspeakable violence and impetuosity over the whole world. In short, today Rome is much more similar to the kingdom of hell than to the kingdom of heaven.

(But) if anyone will admit that we have sacrificed righteousness, confessed ourselves sinners, and taken upon ourselves the punishments of sinners, what good is it? Must we not perish and die in our sins? Doesn't God hate sinners? What danger are you putting us in by this teaching of yours! The prophet answers: Be of good courage, only "hope in the Lord". For so did Daniel's comrades Dan. 3, when they had said [Prayer of Asariah, v. 29], "We have sinned and done evil," they soon regained hope and said [v. 40], "For you do not put to shame those who hope in you." This is what I have sufficiently said above [§ 44] from Isaiah [Cap. 30, 15.], "By being quiet and hoping you would be strong," that we should not avenge ourselves as if we were righteous, but, suffering without noise and in silence, confess our sin, commend our cause to GOD, and confidently await His mercy. For He will soon come and do justice to those who suffer injustice [Ps. 146:7], and will avenge the poor. Thus, GOD will be our strength in our weakness. For if the trust in our righteousness is not removed, and we do not confess that as sinners we are worthy of all misfortune, then hope and salvation cannot take place, because God alone looks upon the lowly.

V. 7. Many say: How should this one show us what is good? But, O Lord, lift up over us the light of thy countenance. 1)

59. this verse is torn apart in us [in the Vulgate], in that the first part becomes the

1) In the Vulgate: Nutti dieunt: tzuis ostendit undis dona? LiZnatur est kuxer nos turnen vuttus tut, voruine.

The last part is drawn to the following verse. The Hebrew text reads in the translation of Jerome thus: "Many say: Who shows us what is good? Lift up over us the light of thy countenance, O Lord." But it seems to me that it must be translated and divided thus, "Many say, Who can show us a good sign above us? The light of thy countenance, O Lord."

60. but he turns his speech to God, complaining, but with your extraordinary restraint and modesty, about the unbelievers and those who do not want to be persuaded (as especially the Jews were, the people with a hard neck [2 Kings 17, 14.]), that they do not want to believe those who admonish them amicably, unless (as Christ says [John 4, 48.]) they see signs and wonders. So also the apostle says 1 Cor. 1, 22. that the Jews demand signs and the Greeks ask for wisdom. Thus it comes to pass that they are always vexed at the word of the cross and the doctrine of faith. This is what he says here. Since he had reminded them that they should sacrifice their righteousness and hope in God, and expect good things from him, those who do not believe him and who are not sent to hope are annoyed; they desire a good sign, namely such a sign by which they could be sure of the future good things that they had been commanded to hope for. Who, they say, will show us a good sign about us? Who will make us certain that good things will come upon us? By what sign shall we know it? as if they wanted to say: Everything appears completely opposite, and the signs of the most evil things about us surround us on all sides. This kind of people is widespread, who by such distrust tempt the Lord, like the children of Israel in the wilderness.

You can see that from this flows the whole sea of superstition and extremely foolish vows, even among Christians, when they are not quite happy, or the grain is in danger, or even a leg hurts, or someone is affected by some temporal harm or fears to be affected. How anxious we are in all these things to know by a good sign that this will not come, or if it should come.

that it will be averted. Then one runs to the magicians, to the soothsayers, yes, also to the devils. But also innumerable are the counsels, with which we only and only direct that we do not finally hope in God, or that we do not hope without a good and sure sign.

The miser hopes in God, but only as long as he has a well-filled bag and the ground cracks from the weight of the grain. The strong man trusts in his strength as long as he is healthy. The mighty and the fame-seeker trusts in it as long as one thinks highly of him and his rule is strong. By these signs they think to be sure that they have a gracious God. Now if this or any of yours falls away, so does their hope, unless you give another or a greater sign as support.

It is the same in spiritual matters, in the forgiveness of sin and the repose of conscience, where not a few obtain assurance, neither by faith nor by hope, but by trusting in works or in the intercessions of others. And in general, these people seek a good sign as the support of their hope, without which they do not hope, and therefore do not hope in God, because they do not hope purely. For the hope that is seen is not hope [Rom. 8, 24].

The prophet could have called these people by their proper names: Tempters of GOt, unbelievers, children of unbelief, disobedient, recalcitrant, obstinate; but he is silent of all this, and relates only their work in the simplest and humblest words. "Many say," he says, "who can show us," 2c., leaving to GOtte the judgment of the work, and to those who are to judge of it, because in a godly spirit he rather sympathizes with them, and bears sorrow for their case, than that he should accuse them severely.

(64) He therefore rejects their error, saying that what they seek is not a good sign for us. For God is not gracious to those to whom he gives these goods, rather,

1) Instead of Huikte (in the Weimarschen), which should be read, the Jenaer and the Erlanger have: yuietE.

because this is a very bad and exceedingly deceptive sign, 1) he gives a better and more reliable sign, namely: "The light of your face, O Lord", as if he wanted to say: Knowing no sign is the best sign, but one must base oneself on faith and hope alone. For faith shows us goods, and is a good sign over us. For he that believeth in him shall not be put to shame, as it is said in Daniel 3 [Prayer of Azariah, v. 40.], "They that trust in thee shall not be put to shame." Those who firmly believe in God without signs are sure of all goods; without this faith, no works, no signs, no miracles make them sure. Faith is called "the light of God's countenance," because it is the inspired illumination of our minds, and a kind of ray of divinity poured into the heart of the believer, by which every one who receives it is guided and exalted, as it is described in the 32nd Psalm, v. 8: "I will instruct thee, and show thee the way which thou shalt go; I will guide thee with mine eyes," and Psalm 44:4: "For I will guide thee with mine eyes. Psalm, v. 8. "I will instruct thee, and show thee the way which thou shalt walk; I will guide thee with mine eyes," and Ps. 44, 4. "For they took not the land by their sword, neither did their arm help them; but thy right hand, thine arm, and the light of thy countenance." Likewise Ps. 89:16: "O Lord, they shall walk in the light of thy countenance." Therefore he speaks cheerfully in the 27th Psalm, b. 1.: "The LORD is my light and my salvation."

This is illustrated in the pillar of fire and the pillar of cloud by which the children of Israel were led and guided through the wilderness. For in this way we are led through unknown and desolate ways by faith alone, without the help of all men, that is, through suffering and tribulation. And as there the present pillar walked before its face, so here faith has the present God, so that, as it were, from the face of the present God comes the illumination of the heart, so that it is quite rightly and actually the light of the face of God (that is, the knowledge of and trust in the present God). For he who does not know the God who is present to him or does not feel, he does not yet believe, he does not yet have the light of the face of God.

1) Instead of aLert, which should be read, the Jena and the Erlangen: aukvrt.

So there is no difference whether the light of the face of God is understood in an active way (active), as He Himself enlightens us by His presence by kindling faith, or in a passive way (passive) as the light of faith, as we confidently feel and believe in His face and presence (for face means presence in the Scriptures, as is known), for it is the same, and both are at the same time: GOD who enlightens, and the enlightened heart; GOD who is seen by us, and the present GOD.

This is the word Israel, 2) by which Jacob was called, when he saw the Lord face to face. For with his face he saw the face of God, that is, through faith he became present to God, placed as it were before His [God's] face; again, he saw God present and ready to help, as if placed before His [Jacob's] face. This is why Israel is called the one governed by God (directus Dei), that is, the one who is governed or guided in the right way by God alone. For this is by faith, therefore Israel is the same as a believer or one who easily believes (credulus), except that it expresses the power and manner of faith exceedingly properly.

Thus, "Blessed is he (as he says in another Psalm [Ps. 94, 12?]) whom thou, O LORD, chastenest, and teachest by thy law." Therefore, in Jeremiah [Cap. 18, 17.], he threatens the Jews that he will show them his back and not his face, namely, he will leave them in unbelief and ignorance of GOD. We see what is a good sign about us, or who shows us what is good, namely this faith, which, because it is the light that shows us the present God and the face of God Himself, naturally shows us all the good that God is, since it puts Him before us, and shapes trust in Him [rech]. Therefore, it does not stand with a man to instruct a man.

2) Depending on how this word is derived, either as here: "the man who has seen God", or like Gen. 32, 28.: "who has fought with God and has prevailed", one uses the spelling: "Israel" or "Israël".

Now it will be easy to harmonize the other translations.

The common translation [the Vulgate] is closest to this sense: "The light of your face is sealed upon us, O Lord." While those seek who can show them the goods, wanting rather to see them present than to believe, here he does not desire that they be shown, but boasts that the light of the face of God (that is, the knowledge and confidence in the present God, as has been said) is sealed and pressed upon them, and this understanding is sufficiently evident from what has been said.

Jerome: "Many say, Who shows us what is good? Lift up over us the light of thy countenance, O Lord." He says the same thing in the manner of a petition. But he raises the light above us when he raises us by that light. For it is faith above all our comprehension. Therefore, this "lifting up" is nothing other than pouring out upon us the light of faith, which in itself is the most high, so that we ourselves may be lifted up. Therefore, it can also be called "sealed" because it is closed to us and incomprehensible, but takes hold of us and captivates us in its obedience.

Hence it comes that this verse cannot be understood from the natural knowledge of the will of God 1) by reason, as this is the opinion of many who say that the first principles (principia) in moral things are known in themselves, as in visible things. This is false. Faith is the first foundation of all good works, and this is so utterly unknown that all reason abhors it to the utmost. Reason, when it comes to the highest with its powers, says, "Who can show us what is good?" For thus say many (that is, all who are guided by reason).

V. 8. You make my heart glad, though they have much wine and grain. 2)

The first part of this verse is also drawn to the preceding verse, which in Hebrew makes up one verse with the following, which St. Jerome translates thus: "You have given joy to my heart; from that time their grain and their wine have been multiplied.

It seems to me that this verse makes the judgment about the unbelievers and the believers that the belly is their God to those, but the true God to these. For faith in God, or the light of the face of God, gladdens the heart and fills the inner man with a constant and true joy, since through the forgiveness of sin it works peace and a sure confidence in God, even in the midst of suffering. For there can be no joy, no peace, unless there is a clear conscience. Thus the apostle also describes Gal. 5, 22. joy as a fruit of the spirit, and above [Ps. 4, 2.] the prophet said: "In fear you comfort me." And so it happens that just as the suffering of Christ abounds with us, so also the comfort of Christ abounds with us, because of the faith by which one trusts in Him, as it is said 2 Cor. 1, 3. f.: "Praise be to GOD and the Father of our Lord JEsu Christ, the Father of mercies, and GOD of all comfort, who comforts us in all our afflictions." For who should not be joyful, even in defiance of all the evils of the world and of hell, and say with the apostle, Rom. 8:31, "If GOD is for us, who can be against us?" if he believes that GOD is with him and for him? But when will he firmly believe that God is for him, if he has not, proven through many trials, learned in well-practiced faith that God is for him?

It is impossible, then, that he who has the light of God's countenance should not rejoice with all his heart. For such a one, because he is righteous, has peace; because he has peace, he rejoices; because he rejoices, he fears no one, and defies all, even death and hell, being certain of the presence of his God. Therefore, after the words, "The light of thy countenance, O Lord," follows quite properly the saying, "Thou rejoicest my heart," as also in the 68th Psalm, v. 4. "But the righteous must rejoice and be glad before GOD (in conspectu Dei) and be glad from the heart."

1) Here you can find in all editions: what we cannot prove lexically. We have assumed instead that is found in § 245 of the 22nd Psalm. This means, as Baier indicates, the perfect knowledge of the will of God.

2) In the Vulgate: Veāisti InelītiLni in oortie meo. krueti kruru^nti, vini et olvi sui inūltiplieati sunt.

What about the others, the unbelievers? Will they ever have joy of heart? No, for "the wicked have no peace," and the wicked have no joy, says Isaiah [Cap. 48:22], for Paul says in 2 Cor. 1:7: "Just as you were partakers of the suffering of Christ, so you will also be partakers of comfort. But these were not partakers of the suffering, therefore they will not be partakers of the consolation. And Prov. 14:10 says, "When the heart is sad, no outward joy will help." What do they have? That which they have desired. "I have left them in their heart's conceit," he says Ps. 81, 13. as one also reads Ps. 78, 18. that he had satisfied their demand, that they might tempt (tentationi) him, since they demanded food for their souls, 27.:) "and rained flesh upon them like dust," where it follows [v. 30. f.], "While they were yet eating thereof, the wrath of GOD came upon them." This is also repeated by the apostle Eph. 5, 6. as he calls them "children of unbelief" on whom the wrath of God comes.

(70) To these he gives the stinking pleasures of the belly for the joy of the heart, because they ask who can show them what is good, and think only of present and sensual things, but do not have the light of the face of God. That is why he says here that their grain and their wine have become much as they wanted, describing their misery with mild words, but leaving it to each one to judge how great it is, measuring it according to his joy and according to his goods, which are opposite to those. For what goods can he have who does not have God? What joy is there where the heart does not rejoice in GOD? What delight is there where the troubled conscience always feels that God is against him?

So it is an emphatic diminishing speech (tapinosis) and a striking (epitatica) comparison. The righteous have joy of heart in God. What do the unbelievers have? Abundance, he says, of temporal things and nothing else. O wretched possessions, O bad inheritance, of which the unbelievers are quite worthy! For what should the sows have but the deceitful and vain trotters, that is, the filth and refuse of true goods?

They have the goods that they wanted to be shown to them; they have the goods that they did not want to do without, so that they would be called a light of the face of God. Gifts are given to them, like the children of Abraham's concubines, and they are set apart from the heir Isaac, to whom the whole inheritance was left. Just as they are distinguished in merit, so also in fruit and reward. The unbelievers wanted visible goods; they now have them; the believers wanted invisible goods; they now have them in the gladness of heart. Now, as in the preceding verse he showed such people as laborers, so in this verse he shows that such fruits have also followed, which on both sides are quite different, nay, opposed to each other.

You see with how great contempt he reproves the splendor and goods of this world with a short word, telling that these are given to the unbelievers, comparing them with his inestimably great goods.

Now it is easy [to harmonize the different translations] with each other. For there is no difference whether one says [Vulg.], "They are multiplied (multiplicati sunt) by grain and their wine" (that is, they are enriched, made great, made strong, spread out by their temporal and earthly goods) or [Jerome], "Their grain and their wine have been multiplied," as every grammarian understands. For it is a brief description of their happiness, which Job, in the 21st chapter, and the 144th Psalm, v. 11. ff., have more fully described.

But that the prophet in this passage does not speak of the sacrament of the holy supper, as many think, Augustine proves by the fact that in a significant way is added: "their grain", "their wine", not without closer definition (absolute.): grain and wine, since it is obvious that by this pronoun "you" he speaks of the many who say: "Who can show us what is good?" For this has reference to those ungodly and unbelieving, who have nothing to do with the Lord's Supper, since they are swine and dogs that can never be filled, as Isaiah [Cap. 56, 11.] says. Then it would be inconsistent, if he suddenly interrupted the train of thought (sententiam), and mixed in strange things, alone under a related (relativo) name, whereas before he would not have mentioned any of them.

To this it is added that in the Hebrew and in Augustine 1) it is said: "a tempore" (of the time), where [in the Vulgate] we have "a fructu" [of the fruit], since, as much occasion as the "a fructu" has given to ours to understand it of the Supper, [the text in the Hebrew gives just as much indication that it speaks of their grain, which they have "of the time", that is, (that it speaks] of temporal things. "Of time," he says, they have what they have, that which time is wont to give of temporal needs and pleasures. This also seems to me to be said in diminutive speech (per tapinosin), namely, that even of the eternity of the face of GOD they have nothing, but only "of time" their goods.

According to our sense, that "a fructu" can be understood in this way: From the quantity and abundance of their grain and wine they have been so enriched, as if he wanted to say: Happily and with much fruit their temporal goods prosper them. This, again, prevents it from being understood properly of the Lord's Supper, since Christ's faithful are not multiplied by the fruit of the Supper, but they themselves are the multiplied fruits and effects of the Supper, so that according to this sense it should rather be said: From their grain and wine the fruits are multiplied.

But this too is the sign of a hidden (obliquae) accusation, that it is said: "ye Grain", "their wine", namely, in that the prophet sharply touches (mordens) the vice of the desire of the unbelievers, as if he wanted to say: This is their real nature, because these things they seek, these they love, only these goods they know how to enjoy.

Now it is of less importance that in the Hebrew "olei sui" [of their oil] is not written, because it is not important if it is added or not. It is certain that by this expression of the Scripture temporal abundance is indicated, like Gen. 27, 37: "With grain and wine and oil I have provided him".

1) Shouldn't Hieronymo be read instead of AuZustino? Compare § 67 at the beginning.

and after that: "What shall I do to you now, my son?" But I suppose that it was added by the interpreter on the occasion (ordinante) of the spirit, so that the one who would read it would be reminded that he should understand nothing else than temporal goods, since Oel also does not allow the slightest presumption in relation to the Lord's Supper.

Hereby, however, I do not want to have offended the understanding of those who have understood it from the sacrament. Everyone may have his own way, if only faith and peace remain untouched. Nor is it our intention to refute the works of others, but to come closer to the right understanding as much as we are able. The good is not rejected by praising a better and an exceedingly good thing more than the good.

V. 9. I lie down and sleep completely in peace, for you alone, O Lord, help me to dwell safely. 2)

73. these two verses [in the Vulgate] are in the Hebrew One verse. Jerome translated thus: "I shall at the same time (simul) rest and sleep in peace, for thou, O LORD, hast made me dwell in particular safely."

These two words: "I lie down and sleep" have been widely discussed in the previous Psalm [v. 6], namely that by them natural death and the grave are signified, although I know that St. Augustine makes a figurative speech out of it (tropologisantem) of the forgetting of temporal things, although he himself confesses that this is not attained in this life (teneri).

The expression in id ipsum [in the Vulgate] means the same as the adverb simul [in Jerome], and means as much as harmony, as in the 133rd Psalm, v. 1.: "Behold, how his and lovely it is that brethren dwell in one accord with one another (iin unum)," that is, together (simul) or in ick iponin, and Ps. 122, 3. [Vulg.]: "Cujus participatio ejus in id. ipsum," that is, "that keep themselves together with one another (simul)." ³⁾

2) In the Vulgate: In paes in ick ipsnin ciornirninn et recjuiesenin, eznoniam tn, Donckne, sinAulariter in 8pe oonMtnisti ine.

3) This is how Luther translates this passage in the first Psalter translation in this volume Col. 110.

So the meaning is: Assured by the light of your face and certain that you are with me and for me, I am full of joy, that is, I will die in peace, and gladly I leave this life, because (as the 23rd Psalm, v. 4, says) "though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for you are with me.

Therefore, according to my judgment, by simul dormiam and simul requiescam the same is said what we express by "sleeping with them" (condormire) and "resting with them" (correquiscere), namely that he confidently expresses that he will sleep together with his fathers, as in the books of the Kings it is often said: "He slept with his fathers", and in the books of Moses [1 Mos. 49, 29.]: "I am gathered (congregor) to my people" and [5 Mos. 32, 50.]: "He gathered (appositus est) to his people"; and to Moses it is said [4 Mos. 27, 13.]: "You shall gather (ibis) to your people" and [4 Mos. 20, 24.]: "Let Aaron gather (vadat) to his people" and the like.

(74) Thus faith, which is exercised through many sufferings, makes death accepted as a sleep of peace; but to unbelievers it is a terrible and hard plague. For what else do you think he intends by this glorious boasting and praising of his death, but not only to give an example by which we can attain to a quiet and sweet death (that is, by the way of the cross and suffering), but also at the same time to leave it to the judgment of each one, that the death of the unbelievers described in contrast must be considered an exceedingly evil death, which is exceedingly frightening by terror, horror, dismay, in which there is no resting and sleeping, but, as the Psalm says [Ps. 140, 12. Vulg.], "An unrighteous man shall be seized with his calamity at his death," and again [Ps. 34, 22. Vulg.], "The death of sinners is exceedingly miserable" (pessima), for "the bloodthirsty and the false shall not bring their life to the half" [Ps. 55, 24.]. [1 Thess. 5, 3.]: "When they shall say, There is peace, there is no danger, destruction shall quickly overtake them." So very modestly and hiddenly he frightens them with their evil death, praising his exceedingly good death, because he desires more to move them sweetly with his example than to urge them by terror to the life of the cross and faith, setting before them the fruit of that life, such a glorious death.

For thou, O Lord, hast made me to dwell in singularity (singulariter)" (in spe constituisti). This saying is taken from the 5th book of Moses, Cap. 33, 28, and frequently repeated throughout the Scriptures. Therefore, let us go to the source of it. Moses says, "Israel shall surely dwell alone." The same is said [Deut. 33:12], "The beloved of the LORD shall dwell safely," and Jer. 32:37, "They shall dwell safely" (confident). It therefore becomes clear that Moses said confidenter et solus where David said singulariter in spe, since in both passages are the same words and in the same sense. Therefore, because the interpreter [in the Vulgate] interposed the conjunct et in Deut. 33, 28, which does not appear in the text, it should also have been placed in this verse, namely: singulariter et in spe. For it also often happens in the Bible that the conjunction is omitted, which nevertheless must be put in the translation, as, Habakkuk 1) 4, 11: "Sun, moon stood still", instead of: Sun and moon. So also here: safe and lonely, or safe and alone, or special and confident, as if David wanted to say: Verily thou hast fulfilled this in me, in that thou hast made me dwell apart and safely, which thou promisedst in Moses, saying, Israel shall dwell safely and alone."

And so he concludes his psalm with the general and fully valid (authentica) saying of Moses, by interpreting at the same time in the best way against the carnal mind of the Jews, what Moses actually wanted to be understood by this word, and by adapting it to his cause. For since Moses says that Israel dwells securely and alone, and in this psalm Israel is beautifully described as having seen God face to face according to the example of Jacob, and the light of his answer is the light of God.

1) In all editions: "Adolis 2." Possible would still be: Jos. 10, 13. - In our Vulgate it says in both places ei.

litzes (that is, believed in God), he rightly says that the promise and fulfillment given to Israel belongs to him, and that it has happened to him that he dwells safely and separately. But Jacob also expressed this confidence concerning himself, when he said [Gen. 32:30.], "My soul is recovered." For what was this but that he might dwell apart and secure, sure of his salvation? For his soul was recovered, but in hope and assurance. This security and very certain assurance of salvation is the confident and solitary spiritual dwelling, namely in God Himself, and the salvation of the soul itself.

Therefore, the prophet does not fear death, but says that he will sleep in peace with his fathers, because he had become sure and certain of salvation. And so we see a certain characteristic that David read in Moses, by which he exercised himself, and brought to light his spiritual mind, being encouraged therein by many a temptation.

But what is "alone" or "dwell in particular" or "be employed" (constitui)? For "to dwell confidently" (in spe) or "to dwell securely" (confidenter habitare) in itself seems to be known. To my mind it seems to be the same as dwelling freely and securely (secure), so that solitude is freedom, as the 88th Psalm, v. 5. f., says [Vulg.], "I have become like a man without succor, free (liber) among the dead," that is, alone and secure. And more to the point is Richt. 18:7: "They saw the people that were within dwelling safely, in the manner of the Zidonians, quietly and securely; and there was none to harm them in the land, or to be lord over them; and they were far from the Zidonians, and had nothing to do with people." Here it is evident that their solitude is their safety, since by fleeing from men they had separated themselves for the purpose of being safe, which they could not have been if they had had to do with other men. Therefore, even now those who want to live their lives safely and quietly seek a secluded and lonely place. From this nobility comes the status of monks (that is, people who live in solitude).

The people who live in these places flee to lonely places for the sake of safety, because of the dangers from the world and people.

Therefore, singulariter is the same as secure, except that singulariter expresses the essence of security, namely, the removal of danger. But if this is not also done in the spirit at the same time, it will make monks who are only hypocrites, since they seek to avoid only the external dangers. He is speaking here more of spiritual security, which is so great that even in the midst of the dangers of the world, in death, in hell, it is secure and no more afraid than if it were alone, and it is all the more alone the more dangers it encounters. This is the grace of faith and the power of a good conscience toward God. And see if Jerome did not feel this security in this verse, when he says: "For thou, O Lord, hast made me dwell in safety."

Summa Summarum: "to dwell singularly confidently" means to be secure and trusting of one's salvation in God's mercy, by which it happens that he awaits death as if it were an exceedingly sweet sleep. This, as I have said, is the result of faith, which (as Paul says in his letter to the Hebrews [Cap. 12, 11]) is exercised through suffering and brings forth this peaceful fruit. But just the opposite of this will happen to the wicked.

For this reason, some (so-called) doctors of theology must be strongly detested and rejected, who teach us that we must be doubtful and uncertain whether we are in grace with God, and thus whether He is our God and we are His people. And they have invented for us their distinctions that the sacraments, insofar as they concern the power and might of God who works in them, exert a certain effect of grace, but insofar as they concern the recipient, they are uncertain in their effect; and this doubt, they claim, is a godly one. O these pernicious people! For if this is true, and every Christian must doubt godly in such a way, then this very certain article of faith has already perished, "I believe a holy church, the congregation of the saints," because I should not claim of myself that I am holy, nor you of yourself, nor anyone of himself; so we are all uncertain. And in such a way we are all uncertain whether we have a God, and the whole church has come to ruin.

But away with these quite foolish and exceedingly godless heresies! Everyone must take care that he does not doubt in any way that he has a God, that is, a Father, Creator, Savior and Giver of all goods, so that he may dwell safely and confidently and not roar like the very unstable sea (what Isaiah [Cap. 57, 20.] said of the ungodly). For if you believe this of the saints, that they are safe and secure, why do you not believe the same of yourself, since you desire to be like the saints, and have received the same baptism, the same faith, the same Christ, and in all things the same? Yes, in an exceedingly ungodly way you believe something else.

of you as of the saints, who teach that all 1) must doubt as you doubt. So either you teach in an evil way that doubt is godly, or you believe in an ungodly way that what you have commanded to be doubted is certain, because faith cannot be based on a doubtful thing. Nor could I have believed that these impious fables and exceedingly harmful opinions were even creeping in secret in the Church of Christ, if I had not both read and heard that great theologians set them up and protect them as the very most certain articles of faith, and condemn the opposing Christian (catholicam) opinion as heretical. So great is the blindness of the noblest in the church, so great the wrath of the Lord. But this is to be dealt with in another place and with other people.

1) Thus the Weimar one. In the other editions: oos.

The fifth psalm.

V. 1. a psalm of David, to be sung for the inheritance. 2)

What "to victory" means has been said once and for all in the previous psalm.

About "the inheritance" I read many things, but nothing that was sufficient for my simple mind. For what Lyra and his people cite as their opinion at this point, that is not my opinion, I also do not understand it. I want to say what is my opinion.

(2) It is certain that this psalm does not speak of suffering and affliction, for in it the person of the psalmist is not mentioned at all, but the whole lamentation is about the wicked, unrighteous and evil. Therefore, in my judgment, it is intended (scopus) that the prophet prays against the hypocrites, the deceitful works saints, the false prophets, who have been praying against the people of God and the inheritance of Christ with human and spiritual evil.

They are seduced by the same laws that Christ calls Matth. 7, 15. and Joh. 10, 12. "ravening wolves" and the apostle Tit. 1, 10. "useless talkers and deceivers".

And to come to our time, as he does in the previous Psalm [§ 5 f.] in relation to the law (juris), so he attacks here the ungodly teaching (professionem) and the abuse of theology. Because this is the most harmful persecution, which goes on under the appearance of truth and godliness (since it always uses the name of God), and devastates the heritage of God most of all, therefore he glows with the most violent movements, prays with so many repeated words, accuses the ungodly with so many names, and burns completely with zeal, so that he could say of himself the word, Ps. 69, 10: "I am almost jealous to death for your house."

4. for there is no other cause for which Christ is so inflamed, even Peter and

Paul, and let it be so much as because of these seducers (φ/ιεναπύνας) and.

Wage servants, against whom also the prophets lay themselves with all power (toti). Therefore, we will see that through this Psalm the false prophets, the hypocrites, the heretical people, the superstitiosos and all the lights of men are punished, which devour the people of God through the falsification of the word of God and the false appearance of the works.

5 So the title correctly says: "For the inheritance" or: "To the inheritance", because he wants to preserve the people of God to their Lord. For the people of God is the inheritance of the Lord, as the 33rd Psalm, v. 12, says: "Blessed is the people, whose God is the Lord; the people he has chosen for an inheritance", and Ps. 47, 5: "He has chosen us for an inheritance, the glory of Jacob, whom he loves", which was also said in the 2nd Psalm, v. 8: "I will give you the Gentiles for an inheritance", and in many other places.

But he says in the majority: "the inheritances" (hereditates), although there is only One inheritance of Christ, because it is necessary that it must be distributed in many places because of the multitude, which one cannot teach and govern. Therefore, as there are many shepherds and stewards of God's one inheritance, there are also many inheritances entrusted to them. Therefore, in different places there are also many deceivers and destroyers of this inheritance.

7 But this also shows the great movement of the prophet, that he would rather name the people of God with the word "inheritance" than with the name church, people or synagogue, so that he would arouse the more disgust of the destroyers, and would gain the more favor for himself and similar shepherds like him. Now since every man loves his inheritance exceedingly out of natural zeal, how much more God, who says 2 Mas. 19, 5. "Ye shall be my own," whence also he says afterwards [in this Psalm, v. 11.], "For they are contrary unto thee, O Lord."

(8) At the same time, just by using the name "inheritance" he also secretly indicates the purpose (scopum) of this whole psalm through a beautiful figurative speech. For the inheritance

(hereditates) must be cultivated, effort and work must be put into them, so that they bear fruit and are made better. For this reason, they have many insidiousnesses, even enemies and desolators. Thus the people of God need laborers, teachers and rulers, by whose effort they are made GOtte, and exercised by the word of God; again, by wicked teachers they are corrupted and desolated. Thus, it is sung here "for the inheritance" and by best caretakers.

It should be noted that this Psalm is not to be understood of the Church of Christ alone, but of all the people of God throughout the ages, who have always had their seducers and persecutors, so that according to the title, the general meaning of the Psalm is: "For the inheritance".

(10) I would have nothing against it, but would gladly agree, if someone wanted to understand by the inheritance parts the two opposite kinds of people, one of which is based on their powers, the other on the grace of God, although everything comes to the same thing.

v. 2. 3. Hear my words, O LORD, hearken unto my speech. Hear my cry, my King and my God, for I will pray before you.

Thus the Hebrew text divides these two verses. But the last part of the second verse our [Latin] text connects with the following verse and says: "For I will pray to you" 2c. Jerome's translation is also little different, except that instead of "my crying" he has "my howling" (rugitum), for which Lyra puts "my thoughts," and instead of [listen] "to the voice of my prayer" he says: "to the voice of my crying."

12 And here I must first (primus) stand in danger with my opinion. For I have said that this psalm mainly fights against the works saints and the godless theologians, whose only task is to nourish the arrogance of the heart, as also the holy virgin describes them [Luc. 1, 51.]: "He scatters those who are hopeful in their heart's mind." For all ungodly doctrines come from the root of arrogance, so that St. Augustine also calls hopefulness the mother of heresies in many places, because only which teaches humility properly, as it is said in Prov. 11:2 [Vulg.], "Where pride is, there is also reviling (contumelia.), but where humility is, there is also wisdom." For it is impossible that a hopeful man should not be vituperative, all reproving and judging, as it is shown in the Gospel, by the Pharisee's conduct against the publican, the humble sinner, and Simon the leper's against the sinful woman [Luc. 18:11, 7:39].

The prophet has in mind the hypocrites of his time, who were extraordinarily puffed up by the righteousness of works, but who did not consider the great sins of spite, arrogance, avarice, and the like, nor did they believe that they needed the grace of God, walking securely in their ways, without fear of God, as all such people always do, always have done, and always will do. Therefore, he begins the psalm with a prayer, humbly seeking God's mercy, and by doing so, above all, punishes their arrogance, as if to say: Those godless people are full, they are holy, they are righteous, they are healthy, they do not need a doctor, and they do not seek your grace to become righteous. But I, poor child of man, am full of all sin, despairing of my works and powers, having nothing to do but pray and call upon thy mercy.

14 Therefore, here is to be noted the very beautiful distinction of the law and the faith, or of the spirit and the letter, which St. Augustine teaches in his writing "Of the Spirit and of the Letter", saying: The law of doing (factorum) says to man: Do what I command; but the law of faith says to God: Give what you command. And again: What the law of doing commands (imperat) by threatening, the law of faith attains (impetrat) by faith. Therefore the people of the law (the theologians of works) say, I have done, and are hopeful, as if they were justified by the works of the law and their own works; the people of faith say, I pray, that I may do. The latter trusts in works and does not seek the mercy of God; the latter considers its own righteousness as dirt [Phil. 3, 8J, and sighs for God's mercy alone. So also the apostle Rom. 10, 3. says: "They do not know the righteousness that is before God, and seek to establish their own righteousness, and so are not subject to the righteousness that is before God." Thus the letter always puffs up and kills, the spirit humbles and makes alive [2 Cor. 3, 6.], for [1 Petr. 5, 5.] "God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble."

(15) But he prays with great fervor (affectu), as he prays with a prayer repeated three times, and yet indicates no other cause for praying than that he will pray and be heard, "for early (he says, v. 4) I will pray to you, and you will hear me". But why do you want to pray and be heard? "Because thou art not a GOOD (he says, v. 5.) to whom ungodly beings please." What is this? Nothing other than that God loves the prayers who humbly call upon him for his mercy, and hates the arrogant people who are presumptuous about their righteousness.

16 Behold, therefore I will pray, because I know that it pleases thee, I know that thou wilt, I know that thou hast so commanded, that man may despair of himself, and beseech thee for thy justifying mercy. You want, I say, that man should recognize himself as a sinner, and that his whole life should be nothing but a prayer, a groaning for Your mercy, as it is said in Luc. 18:1: "Pray always," and Ps. 105:4: "Seek His face always." Since the wicked, presumptuous people do not do this, or do it only for a moment, even pretending to do it, when in fact they are satisfied with themselves, you are right to hate them, since they know neither what is theirs nor what is yours.

17) See now the order and the power of words 1): "words", "crying", "voice of my prayer". Likewise: "hear with the ears", "understand", "pay attention". These words prove the exceedingly great, urgent desire (affectum) of the one praying. First, "hear with the ears," that is, listen.

1) Vulgate. V. 2. f.: Verdu ine" auribus perestie, voiuiue, iutetliM eluiuorem nieum. tutende voel orutionis ineue etc..

But it would not be enough if you heard these words and did not also understand my "crying", or "howling" or "my thoughts", as if he said after the usual way of speaking: I speak indeed as one who is not eloquent, and is in fear, but I am not able to do it to such an extent as I would like to be understood. Therefore, what I say too little in words, you understand all the more abundantly in the sense. Therefore I also add my crying, so that what the words do not express to the one who hears them, my crying indicates to the one who understands it. But when thou hast understood, O Lord, take heed, and mark the voice of my prayer, lest thou despise that which thou hast heard and understood.

18. not as if with God there were a different hearing, understanding, attention than with men, but that our desire for God must increase in this way, that we first desire to be heard, then that what is heard may be understood, and that what is understood may be taken care of, or that it may not be neglected.

(19) And in these three pieces the three parts are fully understood, which are used at the entrance to a speech (partes proemiales), namely, to make the listener favorable, to teach him, to attract his attention; so here the prophet commands God his thing as such, which is worthy, easy and honorable for God, but very necessary for him.

20. "My king and my God". With these words he clearly hits the godless works saints, since they live without a king, without God, since they are satisfied with themselves. And this is one of the words by which it is indicated what this psalm has its purpose (scopus). For to have a king and God is not to be presumptuous in any matter concerning one's own person, to place oneself entirely under God's government and let oneself be guided by Him, then also to carry everything home to God, that one has received it from Him and must receive it from Him. They do not do this at all, or they do it hypocritically, because they ascribe not a little to themselves, indeed, since they do not ascribe everything to God, they ascribe nothing to him. For whoever ascribes anything to himself, he puts also ascribes honor to himself. But he who ascribes honor to himself ascribes everything to himself, nothing to God, to whom either all the honor is given or no honor is given, because he does not share it or does not share it, as he says Isa. 48, 11: "I will not leave my honor to another. Therefore they rule themselves, but not from God; they are kings to themselves, idols to themselves.

21. for I will pray before thee. He confesses his poverty, he has nothing, only that he hopes to receive through his prayer, that he may be a praying man, not a man who works out something himself (orator - operator).

(22) And in these two pieces, that we have a King and a God, again the epitome of our whole life is expressed. He is our King, in that He takes us away from us and brings us to Himself; He is our God, in that He receives us when we come, and fills us with Himself, that is, with divine goods. The former state is the cross, the departure (phase - the Passover, Ex. 12, 11.), the passage, the leading out of the world, out of the vices, and in general the killing of our person; the later state is that we are taken up [by GOD and glorified.

Therefore St. Augustine also says in this passage that the Scripture is more accustomed to call the Son a king than the Father. For Christ, by his twofold nature, has directed both. By the kingdom of his humanity or (as the apostle Hebr. 5, 7. speaks) of his flesh, which comes by faith, he conforms us to himself and crucifies us, making right men out of wretched and hopeless gods, that is, wretched and sinful men. For because we went up in Adam wanting to be like God, he went down to be like us, to bring us to know ourselves. And this happens through the mystery of the Incarnation. This is the kingdom of faith, in which the cross of Christ reigns, which casts down the divinity, which has been sought in a wrong way, and puts humanity and the despised weakness of the flesh, which has been left in a wrong way, in its place again.

24. But in the realm of the Godhead and the Lord-

In the second place he will make us like his transfigured body [Phil. 3, 21], when we will be like him, and no longer sinners, nor weak, nor those who need to be led or governed, but kings and children of God, like the angels. Then indeed "my God" will be said, which is now said in hope.

Therefore, he does not inappropriately say first "my King" and then "my God", just like the apostle Thomas John 20:28: "My Lord and my God", because Christ must first be grasped as a man and then as God, because the cross of His humanity must be sought rather than the glory of His divinity. If one has Christ as man, he will bring Christ the God of his own accord.

26 This is hard for our flesh, which would rather have Christ as God than man, because it desires glory more than the cross, it dreads that it should seek glory through the cross, just as Moses fled from the serpent, while when he took it by the tail and the serpent was turned into a staff, he performed marvelous miracles and was made a god to Pharaoh. Ex. 4, 4, 7, 1.

V. 4. Lord, early you will hear my voice, early I will send to you and take heed (mane astabo tibi et videbo),

It will take effort before I can penetrate the sanctity of this verse and understand it. I know two things: one, that "early" in Scripture, according to the secret sense (mystice), means the time of grace, which Christ, "the Sun of righteousness," [Mal. 4:2] illuminates by his glorious coming forth as often as he visits man; the other, that to the morning time, according to the literal sense, are attached mainly the holy and divine works, as praying and teaching, by which the spiritual "early" is pictured.

28. hence it comes that the LORD looked upon the camp of the Egyptians at the time of the morning watch, and put them to shame [Ex. 14:24.], and Ps. 46:6: "God help her early," and Ps. 63:7: "Early I speak of thee." But also of the godless teachers the Psalm says.

[Ps. 127:2: "It is in vain that ye rise early, and eat your bread with sorrow."

29 Micah speaks even more clearly about this in Cap. 2, 1. [Vulg.]: "Woe to you who think on that which is not fit (Hebrew that is, impiety), and who deal in wicked wives in your camp. Early, when the day dawns, they perform the same, and their hand is against the LORD." This they did (as Isaiah Cap. 10, 1. writes), because they taught the people unrighteous laws and false interpretations of the law, which they had devised, by which they devoured the people, both in soul and body, so that [Ps. 5, 10.] their jaws are rightly called an open grave. Therefore Micha 2, 2.] follows: "They snatch fields to themselves and take houses, which they desire; thus they do violence to every house and to every inheritance." Amos 4, 4. [Vulg.]: "You bring your sacrifices early" 2c. Let this be enough to show that the morning time was formerly used for sacrifices, for the fulfillment of justice (justificationibus) [of the law], for teachings, for lectures [from the Scriptures] and in general for divine things, as even today the same custom is kept in the church.

(30) Therefore, in the meantime, I will put aside the "early" in the spiritual meaning, and I will understand, as much as I can, the "early" of time, but I do not know whether I will hit it right. For the early time (mane) has always been assigned to divine things, although it has not always been applied to them in the right way. It seems to me that the prophet separates himself with the inheritance, both from the godless teachers and hearers, and from 1) the godless work saints, if not according to place and time, but certainly according to the heart and his desires, because he accuses both here, since he had to come together early with the others to act divine things and to hear the law of God.

(31) But since they counterfeit the law of God by their statutes, or do not teach it aright, and therefore also live ungodly, and do holy and good things, but speak their fables, that they may please the great multitude, and grow fat, as they do theirs

1) In the Jena and the Erlangen: nt instead of: ud.

The prophets are often accused in the prophets, and today we also see and hear everywhere in the churches that for the sake of the most shameful profit one subjugates oneself to all things in the houses of God and sermons: so the prophet asks and wishes that he may deserve to be heard, and that he may become worthy to hear his God, not the word of a man, but the word of God.

32 For these people do as it is written, Isa. 30:9-11: "For they are a disobedient people, and lying children, which will not hear the law of the LORD; but say unto the seers: Ye shall not see; and to the showmen: Ye shall not see us right doctrine; but preach unto us softly, look unto us deceitfulness; depart from the way, make yourselves of the way; let the Holy One in Israel cease from us." This Paul also describes 2 Tim. 4:4, saying, "They shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall turn unto fables."

33. So the meaning is: I unhappy man, who am among the people who do not want to hear the truth, who abhor the word of the cross, but love such teachers who cover their ears, as also Isaiah Cap. 6, 5. says: "I dwell among a people with unclean lips" (because of their ungodly teachings). Though I come early with them to hear thee, yet, behold, I hear not thee, but the people teach their ways and the works of men. Therefore, O my King and my God, hear me at that time of the morning, because at that time I do not send myself to them (adsto), nor pay attention to them, but toward you the mouth of my heart is wide open, with you I stand, to you I offer myself, that you may instruct me, that I may see and be taught, according to the saying [Isa. 54:13. Jn. 6:45.], "They will all be taught by God."

(34) And so you see that all the fervor of this [our] prophet is kindled because he sees how the people of God and the inheritance of Christ are deceived and devastated, since they are not taught what is right, and everything is full of false teachers and useless talkers who deceive souls, which, as it is the most harmful evil, also grieves a godly soul the most.

35. for how can there be a sadder an

How more pitiful a picture than to see a wolf raging among the harmless flock of sheep, so that he leaves not even one alive? This is how an ungodly teacher rages among the simple-minded souls of Christ. For the same thing Paul also proclaims Apost. 20, 29. with tears beforehand, when he says: "I know that after my departure there will come among you terrible wolves, which will not spare the flock" 2c.

(36) And because of this movement and sense [of the prophet], I almost want to revoke the explanation of the two previous verses, and it almost seems to me that they would be more correctly understood by exceedingly violent movements of the heart, by which the afflicted prophet, looking (again, afterwards says) at the multitude of their ungodliness, is compelled to invoke his King with so often repeated prayers against these tyrants over the laws, and his God against these idols that occupy the chairs. For this mind is better suited to the actual purpose of the psalm, although the other mind is not unsuitable either.

(37) But also this third verse 1) is very true to the same purpose, that he asks that not man's word but God's word and work be taught, and it is related to the previous ones in this way: My words, O my King and my GOD, hear with the ears, understand my howling, take heed to the voice of my prayer, for I will pray to you. What do you ask? This most necessary gift, that thou resist these ungodly teachers, who early occupy both the time and the place of teaching in an ungodly manner, and hear me in what I ask for this time. But what do you ask for this time? This is that I may stand with you, be your listener, be instructed by you as my teacher, see by your enlightenment, not be deceived with the others by these ear-burners, since you are my King who governs me and my God who preserves me. And so the prayer against the false teachings and works is completed.

1) versus is missing in the Baseler, in the Erlanger and in the Weimarsche.

38 "Early," he says, "you will hear my voice," early I will pray something, that I ask, you will hear; but this is that I pray for all teachers and listeners of the word, which is used to be acted early. Just as there is hardly a prayer in the Psalter that is more fervent and repeated in so many words, so there is no other prayer that is more necessary and more salutary for all of us today, nor has any prayer been more necessary, nor will any other prayer be more necessary at all times.

Therefore, a godly Christian should learn to make it a priority to pray to God for the inheritance, and (according to the example of this prophet) pray this psalm most fervently, so that the word of God may go forth among the people of God. For the people of God get their life, their pasture, their preservation from nothing else than from the word of God, as Christ says Match. 4:4: "Man does not live on bread alone, but on every word that passes through the mouth of God." For when God's word goes forth, all is well in the church. For what is the cause that nowadays the church is not only withered by abundance and splendor, but almost devastated, but that God's word is put on the back burner, and we learn the laws of men and the Roman tricks?

40 In order to render the words emphatically (ad energiam), Jerome translates thus: "Lord, early you will hear my voice, early I will be prepared for you, and will consider. Does not this word, "I shall be prepared," fit in very well with the sense given before? For what is "to be prepared unto God" but to be instructed and directed toward God? Thereby he indicates at the same time that he does not want to be prepared for men. This is not contradicted by the fact that Johann Reuchlin says according to the manner of the Hebrews: "Early I will prepare (ordinabo), so that it is a verb that denotes an activity (activum), of which Scripture makes use in preparing and ordering the sacrifices, so that it generally indicates a willing, ready, self-denying mind, and (as it is said) a heart devoted to God, which sends itself into all his will. For only this is a right

Sacrifice, which is offered to God, if one prepares oneself in this way, sacrifices, prepares, sends, leniently proves. It is obvious, however, that according to the Hebrew idiom adstabo [I will send myself] or ordinabo [I will prepare myself] is a verb without closer relation (verbum nominale seu absolutum), which means as much as: I will make a preparation (ordinationem) or a sacrifice, add: of myself. Therefore it is not inappropriately translated: Adstabo himself wants to send me]. At the same time we are taught that in hearing the word of GOD we must not pay attention to the man who is speaking, but to GOD who is teaching.

41 But also the word videbo stands without closer relation instead of: I shall see, that is, I shall be enlightened, I shall be instructed, I shall be a lookout, namely, for truth and righteousness. Micah 7:9 [Vulg.], "He will bring me out into the light; I will see his righteousness." For he does not know God's righteousness whom God has not instructed. All others are useless talkers who speak out of their heads.

For this reason Christ gave the Holy Spirit to the apostles and the church, so that he himself might speak in us and not we ourselves; this is what is sought here. If he were to send himself to men (adstaret), he would not see, but would become blind, as Christ says Matt. 15:14: "One blind man leading another." But now, because he will send himself, he will be put in the right order (ordinabit se), and will be GOTte dressed, he will see and be enlightened.

If someone likes the "early" in spiritual interpretation more, which is the beginning of the time of grace, when the church started to send and see God, I do not argue against it. I am not inclined to follow spiritual interpretations where I can have the letter. Nor would I say anything against it if someone wanted to understand "send oneself early and take notice of it" in such a way that it means: to sacrifice oneself, not to boast in one's own righteousness from the sacrifices as if they were given to God, but that one expects to receive righteousness from God.

Vv. 5-7: For thou art not a god to whom wickedness pleaseth; he that is wicked abideth not before thee. The glorified do not stand before your eyes; you are hostile to all evildoers; you kill the liars; the LORD abhors the bloodthirsty and the false.

With seven names he accuses the evil teachers and their disciples, the saints of works; he has such a great fervor for a pure godly life and teaching. Therefore, one must hear these words in spirit and faith, like all words of God. For these people of whom he speaks here, if one looks at them according to the outward pretense (larvam) and appearance, will by no means appear as such as is spoken of them here; so much so are they adorned with the sheep's clothing and the name of Christ. Indeed, their own opinion is that what is said of them here concerns other people, whom they consider to be their adversaries. Therefore, they do not acknowledge the names and the works that are described here, but rather reverse them in such a way: For thou art a GOD to whom our godly nature is pleasing, and we, as good men (benigni), shall well abide before thee, we shall stand as righteous men in thy sight. You love us who do good, you will keep us who speak the truth, you will esteem the meek and the sincere. For such glory these godless people dream of themselves; the opposite, what is said here, they push away from themselves onto the truly godly, righteous and dear children of God. And this quarrel lasts until the end of the world.

45 Thus Esau and Jacob quarreled with each other in the womb of their mother Rebekah [Gen. 25:22]. Thus [1 Kings 3:16 ff] the two harlots quarreled before King Solomon over the living son. The heretics and false teachers always arrogate to themselves the title of the church, of truth, of righteousness, and are above men because of their beautiful appearance and splendor; but before God they are below. But the orthodox (catholici) have this title alone, and finally attain victory without all pomp, because they are righteous before God.

46 Now let us look at the seven words: "ungodly beings," "wicked," "glorious ones" (in justi), "evildoers", "liars", "bloodthirsty", "false". To these he proclaims six evils: "they do not please God," "they will not remain before God," "they will not stand before the eyes of God," "God is an enemy to them," "he will kill them," "he has abominations against them.

The first is "godless being" (iniquitas), which [in Latin] should have been translated more correctly by impietas; for as said in the first Psalm 7], godless being means (impietas), hence [Ps. 1, 1.] "the counsel of the godless"; but this is (as I have said) just the unbelief and the wrong opinion of God and God's words and works, although he feigns a godly being by a beautiful appearance from the outside. Therefore, our God, because He is just and pious [Deut. 32, 4], cannot want (that is, have no desire, no pleasure in) the godless being. For it is in this place the word from which XXXX, Ps. 1, 2. comes, that is, his delight (voluntas ejus), namely, in the law of the LORD, or desire, or coveting. And the opinion of this verse is nearly interpreted by the 51st Psalm, v. 18: "For thou hast no desire to sacrifice, otherwise I would give it to thee, and burnt offerings are not pleasing to thee." Why does he not delight in them? Why do they not please him? Because the sacrifice of a fearful spirit is missing (which is the sacrifice of the godly being); therefore there is an ungodly being, which causes that (as it is said in Prov. 15:8) the sacrifice of the ungodly is an abomination to the Lord.

48. So the meaning is: This is why I want to pray before you, this is why I ask you to hear me early, this is why I want to send myself to you and pay attention to it, because I know that the prayers of the wicked are not at all pleasing to you, nor are their works and sacrifices, as they presume in vain, since they themselves are blind and deceive others with themselves by covering their wicked nature with works and sacrifices, so that they do not recognize it and humble themselves, and are satisfied as if everything were fine because they have done the works.

49 In the same way Isaiah chap. 1, 11. punishes them: "What do the multitude of your sacrifices mean to me?" and afterwards [v. 16.]: "Wash, cleanse yourselves", as if he wanted to say: The sacrifices themselves, as long as ye are unclean and ungodly, without

Faith and hope in my mercy (which alone makes righteous and takes away the ungodly) cannot please me, however beautiful their appearance. You are eager for works and judge according to appearance, and so you appear godly and righteous in your eyes. But I look into your heart and judge according to truth, and so I find you ungodly. So also Christ says to the Pharisees [Luc. 16, 15.]: "It is you who justify yourselves before men, but God knows your hearts."

(50) This is what this verse wants, since it says: "You are not a god to whom godlessness is pleasing", you are not deceived by the appearance of works, that you should accept the godlessness of the heart. Rather, those deceive themselves who, deceived by this appearance (larva) of works, never recognize this godless nature, and while they think that they please you most, they please you least of all.

(51) So also this, "He that is wicked abideth not before thee." Hebrew XX, that is, the wicked or evil, so that it can refer to the ungodly and to the ungodly being. For where ungodly being, unfaithfulness, unbelief reigns, there also reigns guile or wickedness at the same time. For whoever is forsaken by the saving grace of God, what else is he good for but evil? Therefore, it is very fitting for this passage that "evil" be understood here as the root and all the old leaven of malice and wickedness [1 Cor. 5:8], by which we are inclined (if we do not have the grace of faith), as soon as there is opportunity, to plunge into every shameful deed, as Christ says to the apostles [Luc. 11:13]: "So then you who are evil may give good gifts to your children."

This wickedness, of course, can conceal itself very nicely under seemingly holy and godly works, until, provoked by the occasion, it reveals itself. You can see many people who are gentle, humble and kind in words and signs and works, but if you only touch them with a finger, you can immediately turn them into exceedingly cruel and pompous people who are ready to do anything evil. These days, they are called by a very honorable name.

They are called "passionate people" (passionati) because they must not be called wicked because of the beautiful appearance of their good life, but in the meantime they will surely perish themselves and at the same time destroy those who, according to their example, fail to kill wickedness. For the passionate resounding of such wickedness is a sign that there is a lack of godliness (that is, of faith against God), and that the godless nature reigns. Therefore, these will not remain before God nor dwell with Him.

Thirdly, there are the "injusti"; whether these are the same people or others, the Hebrew calls them XXXXXX. This actually refers to those who outwardly break out into the work and perform evil deeds and do evil with word and work. Admittedly, ungodly nature and wickedness often remain hidden (unless the law has become apparent to someone according to his spiritual understanding, by which he recognizes himself as wicked with the apostle Rom. 7, 7. 8.), and make an evil tree, but the XXXXX bring forth its fruits by following the wickedness of their ungodly heart. Of these the preacher Solomon says Cap. 10, 13: "The beginning of his words is foolishness and the end is XXXXXX.

XXX", which one has translated by "harmful foolishness" (errorem pessimum). Here also the beautiful order is to be noted. First, the ungodly nature, by which it happens that we are left to ourselves without the helping grace of God; then follows, as the second, wickedness, by which we are inclined to do what is in us, that is, all evil. Third, unrighteousness, transgression, the fruit of this ungodly nature and wickedness.

54. but also these will not remain before your eyes, or, as the Hebrew text has: "the XXXXXX will not stand (statuent) before your eyes." But it is the verbum statuent entirely the same as that rendered by past time in the 2nd Psalm, v. 2: Astiterunt reges terrae instead of: Assist or statuent, that is (so that the meaning of the unrelated verb may be clear), assistentiam sui facient So here: They will not stand by, they will not before the Lord, they will not appear 2c. But they imagine that they do this in the highest degree by their false opinions and works; for they also do not believe that they do evil, even though they do evil.

Fourth: "You are an enemy to all evildoers. This little phrase (oratiunculam), which consists of the verbum that we said in the first Psalm meant the same as act or do among us, and of the noun that has been translated in various and inconsistent ways (as we shall see), we often read in the Old Testament. But I see that the prophets, especially Hosea [Cap. 4, 15.] 10, 5. as it were in derision instead of BethEl call the place BethAven, where Jeroboam, the first king of Israel, had set up the golden calves for worship, so that the people would not go to Jerusalem to sacrifice there, and finally fall away from him to the king of Judah, as one reads 1 Kings 1) 12, 27. ff. And where BethEl, that is, the house of God, should be said, they say BethAven, which some translate by "the house of an idol" (namely, of the opposite meaning), but others) more correctly: the house of godlessness or idolatry.

56) Following the opinion of the latter, it pleases us to understand by XXX the impiety and idolatry, but not only the idolatry by which one serves idols of wood and stone, but mainly that which Samuel 1 Sam. 15, 22. f. describes violently against Saul and speaks of it in this way: "Do you think that the Lord is better in sacrifice and burnt offering than in obedience to the voice of the Lord? Behold, obedience is better than sacrifice, and heedfulness better than the fat of rams: For disobedience is a sorcerous sin, and to resist is idolatry and idolatry." This, then, is the religion of Saul, the raging disobedience, the perverse superstition, the unholy XXX; as it is everywhere severely condemned in the Scriptures for having prevailed in the Old Testament; so no pestilence rages more perniciously today, in that every one leaves the office to which he is called, and strives to serve GÖtte with another noble of his own invention.

Thus, the bishops, who are the best, leave the ministry of the word and the care of the people to the most unworthy and unlearned people, and put all their efforts into increasing their property, or the buildings, or the income and splendor of their church, thinking that they are doing God a service by being disobedient. Even the priests and the clergy, who are the most holy, prefer to do something for God rather than their office. For here we say nothing of the wicked; but the Roman court is not even considered in this [because it is entirely wicked]. Yes, these unholy endeavors of disobedience have spread so exceedingly that no man can sufficiently describe it. For in every state you will find this among Christians, that they set aside the observance of God's commandments and serve God according to their statutes and opinions.

(58) This, I say, is the appearance of works, wherewith they cover, as I have said above, as with the shadow of Behemoth [Job 40:16] their ungodliness, their wickedness, and every transgression. In general, this garment, which the wolves put on, and the pernicious hypocrisy devastate the sincere godliness and the Christian religion much more horribly than any sword, famine, pestilence 2c.

(59) Behold, then, how the prophet also burns against this ungodly piety and this wholly unspiritual spirituality (irreligiosissimam religionem), so that he abhors none more vehemently, and says, "Thou art enemy to all evildoers." "To all," he says, and, "Thou art enemy"; with the others he did not add "all," but here, lest they, deceived by their accused superstition, should think that they are pleasing to God, he proclaims that they are worthy of God's hatred, and all, without any exception.

(60) For indeed, even among men, this perverse servitude, which is shown while right obedience is omitted, is displeasing. For who would suffer that a shepherd, to whom the sheep are commanded, should forsake the sheep, and begin to lead them away?

To serve a master in the bedchamber? This is what Aesop's fable teaches us about the donkey who wanted to imitate the dog's flattery, but was beaten with knuckles because he left his duty in the queue and occupied himself with a foreign office.

(61) It is precisely this corruption that causes many to be weary of their order, their profession, and to look upon another's office as if it were better, and to be disgusted with their own. One runs away from the priesthood into a house of worship, another steps out of this profession into that. This is what Job says, Cap. 6, 16: "Those who shrink from the frost, on them the snow will fall"; they escape the rain and fall into the water.

(62) But this little may be enough about this greatest and most common wickedness, which we will henceforth always call disobedience or idolatry, that is, the holy service (latrām) of the wicked, which does not obviously violate the commandments of God (like the publicans and the harlots), but by the appearance of great works and excellent godliness, and as Bernard calls it in the 91st Psalm, v. 6. Psalm, v. 6, by "the pestilence that corrupts at noon" (daemonium meridianum [Vulg.]), by which he understands with the apostle Paul [2 Cor. 11, 14.] Satan, who disguises himself as the angel of light. An example of these people is masterfully shown and described in Saul 1 Sam. 15, 13. ff. See there.

Therefore sm is translated by many quite rightly not only "godless being" but also "toil and labor" (dolor et labor [Ps. 10, 7]), because this disobedience indeed has much toil and labor, and, as it is commonly said: It is more sour to earn hell than heaven. For the devil is hard on his martyrs, but never restores them, so that also the Lord proclaimed beforehand through Moses that he would give the people of Israel into the hands of the enemies, so that they would serve foreign gods there, who would not give them rest, neither by day nor by night [Deut. 31:16, 17].

64 Thus the preacher Solomon says Cap. 10, 15: "The work of fools becomes sour for them", and it is often said in the same book [Cap. 1, 14. 2, 17. 4, 16.]: "vain and sorrow" (vanitas et afflictio spiritus). When Chri

But even though Jesus is oppressed, his yoke is gentle and his burden light, because he restores all who are weary and burdened with joyful confidence of heart, if only they come to him. But those shall speak the word which is written in the book of Wisdom, Cap. 5,¹) 7. [Vulg.], "We have walked arduous paths."

65. whoever wants to pursue this matter further, read Paul Rom. 12, 3. ff. and 1 Cor. 12, 11. ff. where he deals with all diligence that each one should walk in his measure, so that there is no confusion of the members, since the eye begins to do the work of the feet, or the feet the work of the eyes, but keep the rule Prov. 4, 25: "Let your eyes look straight before you, and your eyelids look right before you. "Look before thee, and wait upon thyself."

66 Against this perversity (pravitatem), proverbs also arose among the pagans: Let each one practice the trade he has learned, and: Cobbler, stick to your last, and: Let everyone stay in his own skin.

He thus says correctly and with extraordinary emphasis: "You are enemy to all", because in fact this godless being is exceedingly hateful, which so provokes, emboldens and challenges that for this reason the synagogue is called in the prophets a people who provoke God to anger, embitter Him, outrage Him. God is said to feel this bitterness when He causes it to be felt in the hearts of His saints. This understanding (as I have said) this Psalm is full of, as we shall see and see.

68. fifth [Vulg.]: "You will destroy those who speak the lie." Here he punishes the teachers and the teaching of the ungodly being. For the Hebrew word XXX seems to me to signify in general the kind of speech by which a thing is taught or explained (enarratur) or told. Hence also means a thing that has happened or rather is told. This way of speaking was also retained by Lucas, Luc. 2, 15. [Vulg.]: "Let us now go to Bethlehem and see this word" (the thing that happened and was told). Namely in the third book of Moses he clearly distinguishes between XXX and XXX, which both mean to speak or to speak, since it is so often written, "The LORD spake unto Moses, and spake," where the first is XXX, which means he spake. Hence it is quite common in the prophets, "And the word of the LORD came unto me, and spake." Hence ^XXX means in general, to declare something doctrinally, which is then set forth by the word XXX in particular. And though this meaning and distinction might not always be carried out, yet for the time being let us use these words in this way until we see something better. It is certain that what is here expressed by "speak" is taken in many places for teach, as in the 119th Psalm, v. 46: "I speak of thy testimonies," and Ps. 60, 8: "God speaketh in his sanctuary."

Therefore, as the life of the wicked, so is their doctrine; as they act, so they speak, that is, wicked and evil and unrighteous things, all of which he groups 1) under the name "lie. This lie he has called above in the 1st Psalm, v. 1. [Vulg.] "council of the wicked", yes, "chair of pestilence" or of mockery. The raging of these people still reigns today, and of them the apostle says 2 Tim. 3:7: "Ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth." These are the ones who strongly insist on teaching good works (as they think), even though they do not yet know what good works are, because they have no knowledge of faith. Thus it comes about that they crucify and torture the people quite miserably with their lies and ungodly fables from the moral teachings of the philosophers, from the rights of men, from their accepted statutes and traditions, of which enough has been said above, and about which we will speak more often later.

Sixth, "The Lord hath abhorred of the bloodthirsty and false." In a short summa he summarizes what kind of people they are in their life and intercourse with their neighbor, that is, they love no one from the heart. For since they are destitute of the grace of godliness and are left in their wickedness, it is necessary that they should only be of their nei-

They are poisoned from the soles of their feet to the top of their heads. They pretend everything, they have a friendly face towards many people (corrident), among themselves they call themselves extremely good friends, they write and talk like that, they have the appearance of loving and kind people, and they hide under this cover that they are "bloodthirsty people", but all this is falsehood. This becomes evident when they begin to feel offended, or when a case arises where they should show their goodwill: then suddenly their falseness comes to light, and their bloodthirsty anger, spitefulness, and what follows from it, bursts out. For they have loved no one but for their own benefit, not that they might do good, but that they might receive good.

Therefore find these words of the spirit, which does not look at the outward appearance (faciem), but tests the hearts and kidneys. For the words of faith dispute against the beautiful appearance, and have their purpose in the time of the cross. There one will find how those who are such people hate every man and love no one sincerely, because they love only themselves.

(72) And from this disease suffer most of all the martyrs of the devil, the most holy and the most spiritual, of whom we have already said that they are ungodly, malefactors, children of disobedience under the garb and appearance of godliness, the power of which they deny altogether.

(73) If you do not believe or know this, consult experience. The whole world is full of this complaint, that there is no faithfulness nor faith among men, that everything is done and said in deceit and hypocrisy, so that they cite the word of Micah (which is written there Cap. 7, 5. 6.), which they have not read, yet, instructed by experience: "No one believes his neighbor, no one relies on princes; keep the door of your mouth from the one who sleeps in your arms. For the son despises the father, the daughter sets herself against the mother, the cord is against the in-law; and a man's enemies are his own household."

74. Therefore Christ teaches that you should beware of men. For if you give them

If you are too willing or useful, you will have false friends, but if you offend them or do not keep it with them, especially for the sake of God and the truth, you will have the most bloodthirsty enemies, so that the character of men could not be described with a more fitting nor shorter statement than that it is bloodthirsty and false.

For it is so rare that one does not act wrongly against his neighbor, and someone is a loyal friend. He lives with you in a friendly way, he greets you, he smiles at you; but if you ask him to help you with ten florins from his surplus, then you would have already lost a friend; again, if you should not be at his beck and call in all things, even unjust things, then you would have lost a friend. 1) In short, if you do not act in such a way that you allow yourself to be used for everything he desires, but do not use yourself under any condition of his, you will not have friendly relations with a man for long. This teaches us the experience as a master, therefore this verse is easy to understand.

Nevertheless, they still do not recognize their misery. For they despise all this, believing nothing less than that they are "bloodthirsty and false"; first of all because of those apparent works. By trusting in them they are puffed up and blinded, and do not see themselves. Secondly, because they love themselves, and are quite kindly indulgent to their own infirmities, and have always before their eyes, not how much evil, but how much good they do. To this is added a greater cause of blindness, that they think it a [godly^ zeal to hate those by whom they are injured, or rather by whom they think they are injured, since it behooves them, by reason of their excellent justice, to hate the ungodly.

(77) Inverted by this raging, they go so far as to ignore the beam in their own eyes, but noticing the splinter in the other's eye, they want people to think of them as kind and faithful people; but they rather condemn those as bloodthirsty and false, and so they throw out the word, which is

God pronounces upon them that he has abominations against them, in constant nonsense from himself to others. That is why they do not understand the Scriptures when they read them, do not accept them when they hear them, as if they were not concerned with them, and become just as incorrigible people as those of whom it is said in Matth. 11, 17: when one whistles to them, they do not want to dance, when one complains to them, they do not want to cry. Only to them God loses both His words and His works.

(78) Nor is this a small cover of this wickedness, that when they lose some friends, they find or have others with whom they associate in the same falsehood. Deceived by the mutual agreement with these (although it takes place in falsehood), they do not pay attention to how many they hate and despise, but against how many they are well-disposed (even if it is hardly the thousandth part), and do not turn back to the fact that Christ commanded that one should not despise even one of the little ones [Matth. 18, 10].

79. Behold the fruit that trusting in works and in one's own righteousness produces, namely, not knowing oneself, being stiff-necked and incorrigible in such great evil of ungodliness, wickedness, disobedience and all sins. Such great abominations can be hidden, nourished and preserved with such a light covering and little appearance! Then, to appear and sacrifice early before God in such great abominations, believing that one pleases God, not even begging His mercy, but giving thanks with the godless Pharisee that one is not like other people [Luc. 18, 11.]: is this not frightening to see and to hear? Is not the great movement of this prophet over such nonsensical behavior quite reasonable?

Now let us conclude these three verses [vv. 5-7]. The first two verses describe the sins with which they sin against God; there are four of them: two in the first verse, namely "ungodly nature" and "wickedness"; the first of these sins is turning away from God, that is, the lack of a sound heart (affectus) and a right mind; the other sin is turning to oneself, namely, the tendency to evil works and rebelliousness against good, that is, a perverse position of the heart and a perverse mind. Through these two sins, the person himself is described and the rotten tree as they are before God.

Two sins are described in the second verse, namely "iniquity" and "wickedness", the former of which is the public transgression (praevaricatio) and the practice 1) of wickedness, and the omission of the worship of God, but the other is an outward appearance of worship, but disobedience and idolatry. For in these two pieces all that there is of evil fruits and works (universitas) is summed up, which we do in divine things (circa divina), so that the one sin is to do that which is contrary to the works of GOD and the worship of GOD; these are the XXXXXX ["the glorifiers"]; the other sin, that one does pretended things, and that under a beautiful appearance, contrary to obedience to GOD; these are "the wrongdoers".

The third verse describes the sins with which they sin against men, of which there are three. First, "lying," since they draw others away from the right worship of God by their words, examples and ways, and seduce them into their ungodly idolatries by making them like themselves in the things that concern God. Secondly, hatred and everything that follows from hatred, which is why they are called "bloodlust". Thirdly, "falsehood" and everything that follows from it, since they only make use of people for their advantage, benefit and well-being (voluptate), in which all sins of a perverse love are included. For even in the carnal 2) love of the sex, there is falsehood and deceit, as is evident. For since hatred and love are the chiefest of all movements of the heart and works, it is sufficiently evident that in these two things, in that both hatred is bloodthirsty, and love is false, the whole puddle of a vicious (vitiosae) change and life is comprehended. For a sincere hatred fights against the vices and the sincere love seeks what is the other's, not their own.

83 Now let us conclude the whole train of thought (sententiam). They (he says) come early, but they do not pray, do not need you, do not ask to be heard; they are full, full of the filth of so many vices (that is, of their own righteousness), they do not stand with you, nor do they sacrifice themselves to you, that they may be formed by you, that they may be enlightened, that they may see: but rather they want to give you a form, and form you (as *Isaia*s Cap. 46, 5.) according to the idol of their heart, judging you according to their opinions, so that they cannot see, but only become more blind and hardened. This must happen for their sake, because you do not love godless beings, as they think, but hate evil, and have an abomination against them altogether. But I come, and send me unto thee, and offer me up, that I may be fashioned of thee, that I may think of thee according to thy will, that I may see, and be enlightened. Those come and want to offer you their good and their merits, but only take away all the greater sins and evil. I come to ask you for your good, and to confess my evil to you. Because those are healthy, they do not need a physician; but I am sick and in a bad way, therefore I seek a physician. This is what the following verse continues.

v. 8. But I will enter into thy house upon thy great goodness, and worship against thy holy temple in thy fear.

A magnificent verse, an excellent saying! The words contain a contrast, likewise also the sense. For there are two things by which this life is exercised, fear and hope, as it were those two springs (irrigua) Richt. 1, 15, one above, the other below. Fear comes from beholding the threats and terrifying judgments of God, as in His sight no one is pure, no one who is not a

1) In the first edition and in the Basel edition: "eKeetus, which in the Wittenberg, Jena, Erlangen, and Weimar editions (as we think, incorrectly) has been changed to "Kso tus. Cf. K 53 at the beginning: "Which outwardly break out into the work and perform misdeeds" 2c.

2) In the first edition: in amore sxxns aurnaU. In the Baseler, the Wmenberger, the Jenaer and the Erlanger onrnli in esrnLlis has been changed, as we think, not well.

There would be no sinner, no one who would not be condemned. The hope comes from seeing the promise and the exceedingly lovely goodness of God, as it is said in Ps. 25, 6: "Remember, O Lord, your mercy, and your goodness that was from the world," so that before his face there is no one who is not pure, no one who is not righteous, no one who cannot be blessed. 1)

And between these two [fear and hope] one must always move, as between the lower and the upper millstone, and at no time deviate either to the right or to the left, for this is found in the wicked, who practice the two opposite pieces, security and presumption. Through security they deviate to the left, putting the fear of God behind, as the 14th Psalm, v. 3 [Vulg.], says: "There is no fear of God before their eyes" [Ps. 36, 2. Rom. 3, 18.]. By presumption they depart from the right, since they presume that all their doings (omnia sua) please God, without fear of God, for since they do not realize that they are sinners, it necessarily follows that they do not fear God, as the 10th Psalm, v. 5, says: "Thy judgments are far from Him." Thus, instead of the judgments of God, they reproach themselves with a kind of indifference (ignaviam) of God, instead of the mercy of God with their own righteousness. Thus it happens that they cannot fear and cannot hope. This, then, is the contrast he sets up: They are without fear of you, regard your terrible judgments as nothing, and worship you safely, like the Pharisee in the Gospel, Luc. 18. Then they enter your temple on their great righteousness, and come before your face as those who have no need of your mercy.

86. but I, being aware that I cannot be safe from you and your judgments, despair of myself, and so I go to your temple to place myself before you, so that I may have your mercy alone before my eyes, which is great, even infinite.

Just by looking at them, I take courage and am sure, as the 26th Psalm, v. 3, says: "For your goodness is before my eyes, and I walk in your truth." But coming in this confidence, I will worship thee in thy temple, but in thy fear, not presuming that by myself I shall please thee; yea, I will fear lest my obedience and my worship deserve reproof. By this fear I will preserve your honor, and keep my humility, not justifying myself, but humbly awaiting your terrible judgment, hoping for your mercy to forgive me.

So you see clearly that this psalm has its purpose (scopum) on the different worship of the godly and the godless, the humble and the hopeful. For he compares them with himself in this work which was done in the morning, namely, to enter into the house of the Lord and to worship in his holy temple. For there the greatest and noblest works and teachings are done.

There is also a beautiful contrast in the words, but mixed up. For "the goodness of God," which is the object (objectum) toward which hope is directed, he sets without the name of hope. Again, fear, the object of which is the judgment of God, he puts without the name of judgment, while it seems that he should rather have juxtaposed goodness and judgment, or hope and fear. But the essence (natura) of hope and its object had to be expressed, namely the goodness, yes "the great goodness of God", because godly people already fear more than enough and approach God and divine works with great reverence.

(89) And these two things, hope and fear, are by far the most pleasing and godly works, which those godless works saints, as they neither teach nor understand them, so neither do nor can do. Even today (as I said) the whole world is full of the godlessness of such people, who do not let people, who have been drawn into trusting in works and their own righteousness, come to the fear of God and the hope in His goodness,

1) In the Wittenberg and in the Jena edition, Hon is deleted three times in this last sentence, and also Roth translated it as if it did not stand. Out of misunderstanding they offer: verno munäus, iwmo jusdus, nemo sulVU8 O8S6 possit.

They learn forever and never come to the knowledge of the truth [2 Tim. 3, 7], and, as Christ says Matth. 23, 13 [Luc. 11, 52], have the key of knowledge (that is, the power to teach the knowledge of God), but do not come in themselves and resist those who want to enter.

90. these godless people, who are presumptuous against the judgments of God, and certainly despise the great goodness of God, Isaiah also punishes many times, saying [Cap. 1, 11.]: "What is the multitude of your sacrifices to me?" [V. 15.]: "Though ye pray much, yet hear I you not" 2c. Therefore follows [v. 15. f.], "For your hands are full of blood. Wash, cleanse yourselves" 2c.

91. Nothing can please God unless it is done in humility. Humility cannot exist, however, if one does not fear God's judgment in any work, no matter how good it may be, and is presumptuous only of His goodness, which He bestows freely by grace. The people of Israel resisted this godly behavior most of all out of a certain natural and innate presumption, since they were extraordinarily puffed up and hopeful because of the law and the works of the law.

You might ask how David could promise that he would go into the house of the LORD or the temple of God, since in his time there was neither a House of God nor any temple, but only the ark of the covenant in the tabernacle of Moses served in place of the temple. But also in another place he says about the house of the Lord, Ps. 122, 1. f.: "We will go into the house of the Lord, and our feet will stand in your gates, Jerusalem", and Ps. 134, 1. [Ps. 135, 2.]: "You who stand in the house of the Lord, in the courts of the house of our Lord", so that one could suspect that David did not make these Psalms or that Ezra changed them later.

But in my opinion, he seems to take every place where God is worshipped for the House of God. For it is also known that the place where Abraham sacrificed was called BethEl (that is, the House of GOD), which Jeroboam, by decorating it with the golden calices, later built.

He made it a Bethaven (that is, a house of idolatry) [1 Kings 12:29, Hos. 4:15, 10:5]. But also Jacob, Gen. 28, 19, when he was on the mountain Moriah, that is, of sight, on which the temple of Solomon was built afterwards [2 Chron.

3, 1.], had slept, and had set up a stone, he said, This stone shall be called the house of God [Gen. 28, 22.]. 1)

Therefore, I will postpone the secret interpretations for the time being, and understand the house and temple of God to mean a physical place, namely, the place where people come together to worship God and hear His word, as was the place where Cain and Abel sacrificed and heard God's word. After that, the altars of all the fathers, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Job, were in different places, until it came to the Tabernacle of Moses and the Temple of Solomon, and now to very many and indeed magnificent church buildings.

For just as there has never been a lack of God's word in the world, so also there has never been a lack of worship. Therefore we must admit that in all lines there were places where divine service (res divinae) was performed, which in the course of time has grown to such glory, quantity and greatness as we now see before our eyes. For what did Jacob do differently, Gen. 35, 1. ff., when he wanted to sacrifice and commanded that they put away the idols, but that he preached the word of God according to our way?

Since hypocrisy and false doctrine (which always hypocrites and defiles the best) are very prevalent in worship, so that even in the case of the first two brothers, Cain and Abel, sincere godliness and glittering hypocrisy fought with each other, this psalm also strongly contends against this godless piety and its false doctrine in the early worship.

1) Because all editions offer the same text, we did not want to make a transformation with the same, because we do not know whether the error contained therein is to be put on Luther's or on the printer's account; however, the former is the more probable. It is known that Abraham sacrificed on Mount Moriah [Num. 22, 14. 1 and Jacob saw the ladder of heaven at BethEl [Num. 28, 19. 1.

(97) For what should he do with men in a sincere manner in small matters, who in the sublime and highest work, the service of God, acts perversely and ungodly, where even the beautiful appearance is all the more harmful, the more glittering and the more similar it is to a supremely excellent work? In short, nothing is more dangerous in the world than false religion or idolatry. For this is the source of evil under the name of all that is good.

98. So the House of God and the Temple at any time and for any godly people is their place where God is worshipped. For it can be said that He dwells there in truth, where He is rightly worshipped, especially in the common gathering of His believers. Therefore, one place cannot be called a house of God or a temple any more than another because of the size of the cost, or the space, or the building, or the multitude of the people, but (as I have said) because many come together to pray, to serve GOtte, and to hear his word, as it is said in the 102nd Psalm, v. Psalm, v. 23, "When the nations come together, and the kingdoms to serve the LORD," so that the place is called a house of GOtte for the sake of the people (which in truth is the house of GOtte), and not the people for the sake of the place.

99. But there is a wonderfully powerful superstition that such temples are built, consecrated and maintained in the whole world, in which no care is taken both that the people in the place are godly and that a right worship is established, as they may be courting through dominion, wealth, splendor, splendor of the building, and such worldly vanities, and (that I say it with this Psalm lately) something is done (lament to God) in the places of worship rather than to go in on the great goodness of God and worship in the fear of God, or to be instructed on how to go in and worship, since they alone are established for these [aforementioned] things.

100 Therefore, it is not surprising that they are more often struck by lightning than ordinary (profanae) houses, because in no other place is more shameful abuse, God

The name of God is not stained in the same way because it has not been invoked over them. Even though evil is done in other places, the name of God is not stained in the same way, because he has not been invoked over them. But in holy places what is only single evil elsewhere is always double evil.

V. 9. Lord, guide me in your righteousness for the sake of my enemies; direct your way before me (dirige in conspectu tuo viam meam).

In Jerome the Hebrew text is rendered like this: "Lord, guide me in your righteousness, for the sake of my persecutors (insidiatores) judge your way before my face. I have said that from the beginning of the world there have always been false works-saints and lying teachers, as Peter also teaches, 2 Petr. 2, 1. Therefore there has never been a lack of false religion and idolatry in the world.

102 He calls them persecutors (insidiatores), because in fact nothing is more treacherous (insidiosus) than this wickedness of the serpent, of which the apostle feared much for the Corinthians, since he writes [2 Cor. 11:3]: "But I fear lest, as the serpent beguiled Evam with his craftiness, so also your senses be beguiled by the simplicity in Christ."

For the Hebrew expression may mean "enemies" (inimicos), as our Latin translation has it, but actually they are those who seek to do evil with wicked cunning, that is, by insidiousness (insidias), admittedly under a good pretense. These people the apostle calls [Tit. 1, 10.]

φρεναπάτας, the means deceivers, namely such people who fill people with false opinions, especially in the things concerning God. And this meaning agrees extremely well with the purpose of this Psalm, that godly and sincere people have no destruction to fear so much as the deceitful teaching of false religion and doctrine, so that this verse admonishes that one should guard against it by prayer alone. For this is the serpent that seeketh after our heel, to turn us back from the way of pure godliness. Therefore, it could also be translated quite appropriately: for the sake of my deceivers, transgressors or destroyers.

We must get used to understanding "the righteousness of God", which I will encounter more often later, according to the correct biblical (canonica) meaning, namely, that it is not that according to which God Himself is righteous, according to which He also condemns the ungodly, as it is usually understood, but, as St. Augustine says in his book "Of the Spirit and the Letter", the righteousness by which He justifies man, namely, the justifying mercy or grace itself. It is, as St. Augustine says in his book "Of the Spirit and the Letter", the righteousness with which he clothes man by justifying him, namely the justifying mercy or grace itself, by which we are counted righteous with God. Of this the apostle Rom. 1, 17. says: "The righteousness that is before God (justitia Dei) is revealed in the Gospel, as it is written: "The righteous shall live by faith", and Rom. 3, 21.: "Now without the law the righteousness that is before God (justitia Dei) is revealed and testified by the law and the prophets."

105. But the righteousness of God is also called our righteousness, because it is given to us by His grace, just as it is called the work of God that He works in us, just as it is called the word of God that He speaks in us, just as it is called the power of God that He works in us, and many other such things. Thus it is said in Ps. 31:2, "Save me by your righteousness," and Rom. 10:3, "For they do not know the righteousness that is before God, and seek to establish their own righteousness, and so are not subject to the righteousness that is before God." Therefore Ps. 24, 5. is translated [in the Vulgate] not clumsily: "He shall receive blessing from the LORD, and mercy from the GOD of his salvation," since the Hebrew text has "righteousness" instead of "mercy," because "blessing from GOD" and "righteousness from GOD" (justitia Dei) are the same, namely the mercy and grace of GOD Himself, which has been granted to us in Christ. And this way of speaking of the righteousness of God in Scripture has caused many people many difficulties, because it is quite different from the ordinary human way of speaking. However, it must not be rejected altogether that the righteousness of God is the righteousness according to which God is righteous, even according to the aforementioned way of speaking.

so that by one and the same righteousness both God and we are righteous, just as by the same word God creates and we are what he is, so that we are in him, and his being (esse) is our being. But this is too high to be in the place now, and spoken of in a different sense than those understand it, though it is useful and necessary; yet it must be spoken of at another time.

This is also very appropriately said, which the Hebrew text expresses thus: "your way before me", where we [in the Vulgate] have: "before your face my way", just in the opposite opinion, and the Hebrew text agrees with the previous part so closely that one would like to call it a repetition of the same thing (velut tautologice), because "your righteousness" and "your way" are almost the same. For the way of GOD is the righteousness of GOD in which one must live and walk, not in our way or in our righteousness. This is the way of God and the way of the righteous, about which it is said in the first Psalm, v. 6: "For the Lord knows the way of the righteous," which also John the Baptist wanted, 1) when he said (Marc. 1, 3.): "Prepare the way of the Lord." But it is the way of GOD, because, as he says 3 Mos. 26, 12. [Vulg.], he walks in us, that is, works in us, lives in us, speaks in us. "For it is not ye (saith Christ Matt. 10:20.) that speak." But our [Latin] translation does not say incorrectly, "my way," because through the action of God in us it is also rightly said of us that we work, although this working is rather a being pulled, a being drawn and suffering, that God works in us, as this verse indicates, since he says, "Guide me," "direct your way," by which he indicates that he does not act of himself, but is guided and driven by God.

(108) Also, this does not conflict with "before me" and "before your face. For both ways of speaking are common in the language of Scripture (sacrae linguae), that we must do everything before the face of God, as it were in God's presence and in the presence of God.

1) In the Jena, in the Weimar, and in the Erlangen: voluü; in the Basel: novit; Wittenberg: noluit.

Light of his countenance, which is not in our free will, nor in our righteousness, but is the office of divine grace. And so our [Latin] translation shows by this word that by "my way" the way of God is understood, which the Hebrew expresses by "your way". Again, by "before me" the Hebrew indicates that the way of God is ours, which our [Latin] translation (noster) expresses by "my way," that it is incumbent upon us to turn our faces to the way of God and to walk our way before the face of God. It is therefore the same way of God before our face and our way before the face of God; both must necessarily happen at the same time.

169. but this way of speaking accuses the wicked and punishes their folly, because they turn their faces to their ways and walk in them, turning their backs on the way of God, as it says in the third book of Moses Cap. 26, 27. f.: "If you will walk contrary to me, I will also walk contrary to you in anger" 2c. They take heed to their way and their works and follow the same, the way of God and the works of God they neglect, as it is said Isa. 2, 8: "They worship the work of their hands, which their fingers have made." And the same Cap. 5, 12.: "They look not on the work of the LORD, neither do they regard the business of his hands." All this happens (as we have often said) because they abhor the way of the cross and the life of faith, which compels them to lay aside what they are and what they hold, vainly serving GOD with men's commandments and doctrines, as the same Isaiah Cap. 29, 13. and is repeated in the Gospel of Matthew Cap. 15, 9.

The word "direct" (dirigere) is very frequent in Scripture. By it, the right nature (rectitudo) or the right direction (directio) of the heart is recommended to us, as Ps. 119, 7: "I thank you from the right heart" (in directione cordis), and Ps. 73, 1: "Israel nevertheless has God for comfort, who is only pure (recto) of heart", and in Song of Songs 1, 4: "The pious love you", so that the word directio is even sometimes put without closer relation (absolute), like Ps. 99, 4: "You give piety" (parasti directiones), that is, you alone work righteousness (rectitudines); everything that is only somewhere from a right heart, that is your work. For these people alone love God and are pleasing to Him. But this right nature is a healthy opinion and right understanding of God, which is opposed to the corruption (pravitas) of the heart, of which we have often said that this is the position (mentem) of the heart of the hopeful, the counsel of the wicked, carnal wisdom, and the like. And this is called a right heart, which does not seek what is its own, but what is God's, and with a simple eye and a straight (directo) gaze attaches itself to the will of God, paying attention to this alone in all things, in happiness and in misfortune, and also not wanting to know or pay attention to anything else.

1) In the Jenaer, in the Weimarschen and in the Erlanger recte instead of: recti in the Vulgata.

A corrupt (pravum) heart, however, is one that seeks its own, is self-centered, seeing with a false (duplici) eye, and pretends to seek God's will, when in fact it seeks its own will in it. This corruption is so deeply attached to the sinful (viciosae) nature that only God can investigate it. Jer. 17, 9. 10.: "The heart is a defiant and despondent thing (pravum); who can search it out? I the LORD can search the heart and test the kidneys."

Since the prophet fears that he will be diverted into this corruption, he prays for the inheritance that the way of God may be directed before him, that is, that he may always walk and live with a righteous heart, which is done through pure and full faith in the spirit.

Therefore, against the wicked and the evildoers, who put aside obedience to God and serve God with their works, he sets the righteousness of God and the way of God, that is, obedience to God, in which he desires to be led and guided like a sheep, for the sake of his enemies, persecutors, and the treacherous and exceedingly harmful corrupters of God's inheritance, and that mainly in their most noble works, which they call a work of worship (latrīae), which, it is evident, is most full of ungodly abuses, superstitions, heresies, hypocrisies, lies, and vanity. All these things have the wickedness of clothing themselves with the appearance of a very good work, and sell themselves for it, so that this warning cannot be sufficiently inculcated.

V. 10: For in their mouths there is nothing certain, their inward parts are heartaches, their mouths are open graves, with their tongues they dissemble. 1)

This is the division of this verse in Hebrew, which with us [in the Vulgate] is almost two verses. Jerome has thus: For in their mouth is nothing righteous (rectum), their inward is deceit (insidiāe), their throat is an open grave, their tongue they make smooth (laevificans). And all this is indeed correct, only that one thinks it should be said more correctly vanitates instead of insidiāe according to the Hebrew, but there is little in it. But it is clear that the prophet speaks of the word of their doctrine, because he accuses them: first of lying, secondly of vanity, thirdly of harmfulness, fourthly of deception, by which they cause that which is incurably harmful to be clothed with a good appearance. But everything is obvious and clear from what has been said before.

115 "Liars" he says. These masters, who are ready to teach all, have a mouth and speak, but (as it is said in 1 Tim. 1, 7.) they do not understand either what they say or what they put, that is, they understand neither the words nor the thing. Therefore there is nothing right in their mouths, even though they are considered to be teaching the most important and true things. Yes, as Jannes and Jambres 2) resisted Mosi, so these also resist the truth, 2 Tim. 3, 8., they dare to argue with all, even to persecute others who hold to better things. On the same opinion

1) Vulgate: Quoniam non est in ore eorum veritas: cor eorum vanum est. Sepulchrum patens est guttur eorum, linguis suis dolose agebant [, judica illos Deus].

2) Baseler, Wittenberger, Weimarsche and Erlanger: Jamres et Mamres; Jenaer and Vulgata: 4ann68 6t Llanidr68. The latter reading is correct, for 2 Tim. 3, 8. occurs >ia^M as a variant.

Job 42:7. said, "You have not spoken rightly before me, as my servant Job did."

But the fact that they speak nothing certain (rectum) or not the truth is the cause of their doing evil and acting wickedly (pravitatem), that is, that with all their teaching they are out to make man seek his own, to trust in his merit and works. Or at least they do not put an end to this evil, nor do they teach against it, nor do they make man nothing, so that he becomes a fool and recognizes himself as a sinner. Thus it comes about that while God is to be worshipped with fear, and (as Ps. 2, 11. says) He is to be served with fear, and one is to rejoice with trembling, every work of worship (latrīae, as they call it) is to be accomplished on the great goodness of God [Ps. 5, 8.], they make people sure and presume on their works.

(117) For this is how Job's three friends deal with the whole course of their argument, in that they say nothing about the mercy of God (which Job alone exalts with fear of His judgments), but only about the righteousness that exalts the good and condemns the evil. Therefore, they are rightly rebuked by God as those who have not spoken rightly, although it is true that no one is found righteous before God by his works, however great and much they may be. Nevertheless, it is also certain that everyone who trusts in Him (even without works) is righteous. By this trust he is sure that all his doings (omnia sua) please God, and that he sins and has sinned nothing. On this word, Job's friends accused him as a blasphemer, judging from the plague that had befallen him that he had certainly sinned and deserved God's wrath, which he could have averted by good, meritorious works.

But what shall I do, you will say, when they speak so well, and so rightly and truly, that they cannot be refuted by reason, as the friends of Job, even when they speak God's own words out of the midst of the Scriptures?

119. I answer: He speaks mainly of those who counterfeit God's word. For he reveals this cover of wickedness, as he says: "Their inside is heartache" or void being, as if he wanted to say: Their words have a beautiful appearance, and are holy and true, but they are not rightly applied, they are drawn on a false understanding. Therefore Jeremiah, Cap. 5, 1. 2. says: "Go through the gates of Jerusalem, and look, and learn, and seek in their street, if ye find any that do right, and ask after faith; and I will be gracious. And if they say: By the living GOD, yet they swear falsely." Same [Cap. 23, 28.], "He that hath my word, let him preach my word aright." What is this but that the word of God Himself can be spoken both truly and uselessly (vane)?

(120) Therefore, although they seem to teach correctly in appearance, their inside is heartache (vanum) and their heart is sacrilegious (vanum). For they do not hold (sapiunt) what the words teach in truth, but they want it to be seen as if the words meant what they hold. Thus truth becomes a cover for lies and falsehood (vanitatis), and he even puffingly expresses by this speech "their inwardness is heartache" what it is about the doctrine of the hypocrites, namely that they pretend something else by heart than they cherish inwardly: they pretend godliness and cherish and cultivate godlessness. This is the angel of Satan, who disguises himself into an angel of light, this is the cunning of the serpent, which pretends that one will attain divinity [Gen. 3, 5], this is the spirituality of the angels, of which the apostle Col. 2, 18. says.

Neither do those speak evil (absurd) who say that the same word XXXX means not only deceitfulness (insidias) and vanity (vanitates), but also perversity, because they are in fact perverters of the words of God, as it is said in Jer. 23:36: "You pervert the words of the living God, the LORD of hosts. By this perverting they also become perverters against themselves (vani) against the truth 1) and persecutors against other people, as Paul says 2 Tim. 3, 13: "The longer they persist, the worse they become, seducing and being seduced."

1) Erlanger and Weimarsche: veritnt" instead of: verituti.

This inversion was once modeled in all idols, both carved and cast, which Moses not so obscurely indicated in Exodus 32:2 ff, where he wants to describe the making of the golden calf and says that Aaron took the earrings of the women and designed or formed them by fusion (opere fusorio), and made a golden calf (where in Hebrew instead of "by fusion" it says "with a stylus"), because it would happen that ungodly teachers would not take the words of God, which are the earrings of the daughters of Israel, of the believing souls, our unique ornament, into such forms (formas) that they would have to be understood according to their meaning, and again people would seek teachers after their ears itched, and the rulers (rectores) would (as the apostle says [2 Tim. 4, 3. 4.]) would turn to the fables. For Jeremiah also, in the 8th chapter [v. 8. Vulg.], almost interprets Moses, saying, "Verily a lie hath the lying pen of the scribes designed." The same, Cap. 10, 2) 3. ff, and Isaiah, Cap. 44, 12. ff, say in long speech of the dressing (formatione) of an idol. But also in Ezekiel, Cap. 16, 17, Jerusalem is punished because she had taken the beautiful gold and silver utensils of the Lord that had been given to her, and had made herself male images of them, and had committed fornication with them.

But all this is almost a joke if you compare it with our times, when nothing is praised so highly as God's service and the church, the house of God, while in the meantime no one serves God less than those who, with so many customs, so many new works of their own invention, partly cause discord, partly seek honor, partly pursue profit, and we in general seek what is ours.

124. But for all these things, they refer to God's word, teaching that one must pray and do good, and the like. Or what evil act (malum), what monstrosity, what abomination is not covered today with the terrible name of God, and of the holy apostles Peter and Paul, and of the Church? since (to explain other things) they have not yet said it.

2) In all editions: enn 9.

The spiritual sects (faciones) are spiritual only for the purpose of venting their spitefulness on each other and filling their bellies, although they murmur this and similar psalms daily for the salvation of other people, armed with a brazen forehead, so that they do not notice with how great force (aestu) the words of the prophet resound against those who murmur them.

Your throat is an open grave.

(125) There is no doubt that the prophet, in these words, which contain an extraordinary intensification, indicates their insatiable voracity, since he is not content with having compared their maw to a grave which in itself devours all, but compares it to an open grave ready to devour insatiably.

The holy scripture attributes these teachers of wickedness to avarice and devouring of the people, as Christ Luc. 20, 47 says that the scribes devour the houses of the widows and offer long prayers. And Micah 3:3 says, "Ye devour the flesh of my people; and when ye have flayed off their skin, ye break their legs also; and break them as into a pot, and as meat into a kettle." And a little later [v. 5], "Thus saith the Lord against the prophets that deceive my people: They preach that it shall be well where they are fed; but where they are not fed in the mouth, they preach that war must come." Likewise Amos Cap. 4:1: "Hear this word, ye fat cows that are in mount Samaria, and wrong the poor, and oppress the poor, and say unto your masters, Bring hither, and let us drink." But Isaiah speaks of it still more extensively Cap. 56, 10-12.: "All their watchmen are blind, they all know nothing; dumb dogs they are, which cannot punish; are slothful, lie down, and love to sleep. But they are strong dogs of the body, which can never be satisfied. They, the shepherds, have no understanding; every one looks to his own way, every one is stingy in his own state. Come, let us get wine and drink to the full; and tomorrow shall be as today, and much more."

This, if you look at the rulers of the church today, and those who are considered teachers of the people, will need no explanation (glossa). For what is the use of recounting the incredible avarice, the gluttony, the ostentation, and the more than worldly excess of the bishops of Rome and all the bishops, the priests, and the religious clergy, since they make themselves the talk of the people every day by their own insolent echoing, and confirm this [talk] by deed? For where do they not publicly sing of the avarice of the clergy? And all this is done under the title that they preside over the people of GOD. Is not their jaws rightly called an open grave by the prophet? For they rob everyone of everything, but even so they are not yet satisfied, but are full of greed, as today so also tomorrow, and still much more to devour.

(128) There is trouble when these things are spoken, and these are words which are seditious, and grievous to godly ears. But they also gave offense and were seditious when the prophets spoke them to the rulers of the synagogue, so that they were shamefully killed as heretics and seditious against the authorities.

129 The same Isaiah says Cap. 5, 7-9: "He waits for justice, behold, it is toil; for righteousness, behold, it is lamentation. Woe to them that set house against house, and bring one field to another, until there be no more room, that they alone may possess the land. It is in the ears of the LORD of hosts." Likewise Amos, Cap. 6, 1-6. says: "Woe to the proud of Zion, and to those who rely on Mount Samaria, who boast the noblest over the Gentiles, and walk in the house of Israel! Go to Calne, and look, and from thence to Hemath, the great city; and go down to Gath of the Philistines, which have been better kingdoms than these, and their border greater than your border. Ye that regard yourselves far from the evil day, and seek always to reign iniquity; and sleep upon beds of ivory, and make your beds abundant; and eat the lambs of the flock, and the fatted calves; and play upon the psaltery, and make up songs for yourselves, as David did; and drink wine of the vials, and anoint yourselves with balm;

And care nothing for the harm of Joseph."

(130) But I must restrain myself and not add more, lest I be considered to have sinned against the sacred canons, and to want to steal the patrimony of Christ and the goods of the church in contempt of the censures, and to claim that this temporal possession of kingdoms and lands is unlawful. For I would not be safe enough before the most holy papal right, even if all prophets and apostles were with me.

(131) It is enough that the prophet Amos has here considered the kingdoms that are around Israel, though they are great and very rich, less than the riches of the priests and the pleasures of the elders of the people, so that he showed us what their mouth is, which is called an open grave. Nowadays you would rather call it the mouth of hell, as Isaiah Cap. 5, 14. says, and "the soul of hell, wide open beyond all measure". So much is sought with ever new artifices even for the little that is left to the people, from which they can hardly live, since everything else has already been devoured, and the word Ps. 14, 4. is also fulfilled: "They devour my people, that they may feed."

Therefore it follows that since the ungodly teachers do not teach the way of God, nor do they seek anything else, not even from God, but their own, that they seek much more their own from men, so that Paul confidently dares to call them Phil. 3, 2. dogs, since he says: "Behold the dogs, behold the evil workers, behold the cutting in pieces," and afterwards [v. 19.]: "Which end is condemnation, whose belly is their GOD." But in the Epistle to Titus, Cap. 1, 12. he calls them, "liars, evil beasts, and foul bellies," for in both places he speaks of seducing teachers.

For this reason the prophet abhors their wickedness with a holy indignation and punishes their evil desires with a shameful name, as if he wanted to say: What do these swine do with their ungodly doctrine, by which they corrupt souls, but that they serve their bellies by seducing the people through them, and as insatiable devourers they snatch up nothing but earthly things without end and measure, they gather them together and multiply them? Yes, just as the apostle in the letter to Titus calls them "bellies" in a quite ignominiously disparaging way (tapinosi), so you see that he calls them a "maw" here, as if he wanted to say: You are altogether maws, and otherwise nothing, and that like an open grave, since you deal with nothing but devouring the goods of men. After this way of speaking we say: He is not a wicked man, but wickedness itself; and [say] a vice (scelus) for a vicious man, so also belly for a belly servant, throat for one who serves the throat, glutton (voracitas) for a glutton; in German, "It is with you only eating and drinking."

I would have added another sense, that they are called a "maw" for this reason, which is an open grave, because they devour people's souls to hell by their ungodly word and work (this sense is treated by St. Augustine), but it seems to me too far from the literal sense. I pass over this one, because it is also easier than this literal one, especially as far as the connection of the preceding with the following is concerned. But I do not want to prescribe the judgment of another.

Since the teachers of the people, like the Levites, are fully justified in reaping the corporeal from the people, because they sow the spiritual, it happens, because avarice and ignorance of the way of God prevail, that instead of the spiritual they sow ungodly teachings, which contain carnal sentiments (carum sapientia). Because these are more pleasing to the foolish multitude than what is truly spiritual, the people are easily deceived; and in the meantime those reap their bodily goods, until they also devour their lying goods with all their possessions, so that those gain for their ungodly work the bliss of the ungodly in this world, but those are destroyed for their ungodly piety both in body and soul with double ruin.

136. it is also not without special cause that the prophet prefers their jaws to a

He did not want to compare a grave with any other kind of eating (voracitati), perhaps because only the goods that have been obtained by ungodly teaching (ministerio) and pretending (titulo) are so unfortunate that they never come back to any godly use, just as the corpses that have once been buried do not return to life. For he does not say, Their jaws are an open shrine, as if there were hope of one day taking up again what has been put into it, but a grave; if anything has been put into it, there is no hope of taking it up again.

For the inheritance of Christ and the church has indeed this grace even today, especially the richest goods, that they serve whores, muleteers and generally the lowest yeast of mankind in such a way, also by wills and succession, so that these goods are not worthy to serve the poor believers of Christ, as also proverbs and experience show.

Therefore this is the privilege (privilegium) of the evildoers (operariorum XXX), that is, the martyrs of the devil, that they devour many things and do not share them with any of the faithful of Christ. Hence the saying that the so-called spiritual goods bring harm by being touched and used, and consume all other goods with which they are mixed. Some say that this is because they are so holy and consecrated to the service of God (divinis), but others say that because they are so cursed and banished like Jericho [Jos. 6:26], they should never serve with goods that are in good use, since they are deprived of their proper use.

139) Lastly, he says that they pretend with their tongues, make their tongues smooth, or, as it is called in Hebrew, flatter and caress with their tongues; this belongs to the preceding. For they do not think that their task is to benefit the people by reciting godly doctrine, but that they may please the great multitude by telling godless fables. 140 For they are careful not to offend the ears of the people, that they may be fat and have abundance, and they belong to the number of those of whom Isaiah Cap. 30,¹) 10. says, "Preach to us gently," and Paul 2 Tim. 4, 3. says, "They themselves will charge them with teachers after their ears are gnawed," and Rom. 16, 18. says, "By sweet words and splendid speech they deceive the innocent hearts." For these people do not serve Christ our Lord, but their bellies. Therefore they do not speak the truth, for fear of shameful poverty, but they speak what the mob likes to hear, because they hope for abundance thereby, and so they become open graves.

These frivolous, flattering, but hypocritical (dolosas, as our translation has it) tongues, which are more harmful and corrupting than all adder poison, he scourges with this word. For the truth is rough, the word of the cross harder (horridius) than the garment of John the Baptist, which was made of camel's hair, for the voice of the caller in the wilderness of ungodliness is not clothed in soft garments. Therefore, a preacher of the Word of God must necessarily either be poor or not remain rich for long.

And from this arose the one excuse with which nowadays all excuse themselves for not teaching and telling the truth, namely, that from this would come the downfall of the church, the monasteries and the patrimonies of Christ, and a significant thing would have to be broken off from the gullet and the belly. Therefore, in order to keep the cistern and the grave open all the more, one must let the tongue be false, one must flatter the rabble, turn a blind eye to their vices; then, if they are noble people (majores), one must also praise their vices as virtues, consider everything they have said, done or omitted as a revelation (oracula) of God, but punish and persecute everything that goes against it as heretical and ungodly.

143. for then the throat will be secure, the belly will be well provided for; then you will not be banished, nor will you be deprived of your benefice.

1) In the Latin editions:

Yes, if you let your tongue be even more false and flatter more sweetly, then open your mouth wide, the grave will be even more open, and your belly will expand, you will be showered with benefices and gifts, you will be adorned with praises; your speeches will be golden, your books worthy of immortality (cedro digni), and everything you step on will become roses.

That the world today is full of such flatterers, I think, is clear to everyone, since even the clergy are all aglow with zeal to make their tongues be false in such a way. Thus it comes that Ezekiel says, Cap. 13, 18. f.: "Woe to you who make pillows for people's arms and pills for their heads, both young and old, to catch souls. When ye then have caught souls among my people, ye promise them life; and profane me (that is, the truth, teaching false delusion of me) among my people for a handful of barley and morsels of bread, that ye may condemn to death souls which ought not to die, and condemn to life souls which ought not to live, by your lies among my people, who love to hear lies."

145. what this very beautiful saying means, and how it interprets this whole passage, which follows [v. 21.], "I will rend your feelings (that is, the flattering speeches and "sweet words" [χριστολογίας], as the apostle calls it), and will deliver my people out of your hand, that ye shall fah them no more." Behold, this is the oxen and a handful of barley 2c. But it follows [v. 22.], "Wherefore ye falsely grieve the heart of the righteous, whom I have not grieved (for a flatterer must not only teach the ungodly false things, but also persecute the righteous doctrines of the righteous, or else his wake would soon close); and have strengthened the hands of the ungodly, that they turn not from their evil nature, that they may abide alive; therefore preach ye no more useless doctrine, neither prophesy" 2c. So it is obvious that our [Latin] translator understands by the hypocritical (dolosam) tongue the flattering and covetous tongue, which for the sake of

For the sake of these earthly goods they teach the ungodly ungodliness, and persecute the godly of the godly. Therefore there is nothing certain in their mouth, and their inwardness is heartache, perverse, deceitful. Thus the meaning of this verse is evident.

I myself am displeased with my immense prolixity and my disorderly talk, that I inculcate with so many words the exceedingly short words of the spirit. But when I consider that I am not writing for learned, nor perceptive, nor highly gifted people, but for simple and ordinary people, who mostly belong to the clerical class (clericis), it seems to me that I am still too short and taciturn, especially in these matters, which are of the highest necessity, I feel that I am still too short and taciturn, especially in these matters, which, as they are most necessary to know, are also suppressed by superstition and idolatry throughout the world, and are already alienated from the hearts of men by long use, so that it seems to me to be necessary that the voice of thunder always resounds, in order to thereby shake and awaken the natural man.

147. therefore let a choosy (delicatus) reader know, either that I have not written this for him, or let him be mindful that he must be patient with weaker and coarser people, and let me, after the example of the patriarch Jacob, Gen. 33, 1. f., with the herd of the tender children, the sheep and the [nursing] cows, follow their footsteps gradually, as I see that they can [go], lest, if I overdo them, the whole herd die in one day 2c.

V. 11. Blame them, O God, that they fall from their nobility; cast them out because of their great transgression, for they are rebellious against You.

The first part of this verse is connected with the previous one, but this has little influence on the meaning. Now the prophet asks that the ungodly hypocrites and evildoers, who have been described and accused up to this point, be declared to be such people by divine judgment, because they are approved, excused and defended according to human judgment, as if they were righteous and true, and this name could not be taken away from them as whether he said with Jeremiah, Cap. 5, 30. f.: "It stands abominable and terrible in the land. The prophets teach falsely and the priests rule in their office, and my people like it that way. How will you fare in the end?" For who could resist those who are safe in the judgment of both the people and the rulers? But this is how the godless workers behave against the one proclaimer of truth. Therefore it cannot be otherwise than that he brings forward many annoying, seditious, offensive to godly ears, erroneous and heretical doctrines, which must be condemned both according to the judgment of the priests and the princes and according to the judgment of the people. But what does he do in the meantime? Only this, that he asks God for his judgment and commands him the matter.

The Hebrew word translated "judge them" (judica illos) is interpreted by Jerome as "condemn them" (condemna eos). It actually denotes the judgment by which it is made known what kind of people they are by revealing their ungodliness. Paul also refers to this opinion in 2 Tim. 3, 9: "Their foolishness will be revealed to everyone, just as it was to him; they will not do it for a long time," as if the prophet wanted to say: See to it that, just as everyone is now on their side, loving them and exalting them, so now their foolishness will be revealed, and everyone will hate them, reject them and detest them, so that people will see that they have wickedly approved what you have condemned.

For we have seen and still see that this has happened to all heretics, that they first pleased men, but afterwards their bones are scattered (as the 53rd Psalm, v. 6, says), they have become ashamed, because God spurned them. Meanwhile their honor and praise and applause and splendor must be borne. "But I (as Jeremiah Cap. 20, 7. f. says) have become a mockery of them daily, and every man ridicules me. For since I have spoken, called, and preached of the plague and disturbance, the word of the Lord has become a mockery and derision to me daily." 2c.

151 This, then, is not merely part of the last judgment, but it is a prayer that the

May truth triumph through God's judging, which those people oppress through the judging of a human day. Judge thou, God, for men judge evil.

Let them fall from their thoughts" (a cogitationibus suis). "Thoughts" in this place is an expression of the same meaning as in the first Psalm, v. 1, "the counsel of the wicked." Therefore it is not simple thoughts, but we understand by it, as there and elsewhere is already sufficiently said, the ungodly delusion, sense, mind, that which reason enters (dictamina), about God and divine works and words, what has been invented by men and communicated to others through teachings. Therefore, in both words there is a diminutive way of speaking (tapinosis), in "thoughts" and in "their". It is their thoughts, not God's, according to the saying Isa. 55, 8. 9.: "For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord. But as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts."

What else does God indicate with these words than that the thoughts of men, however holy they may be, are earthly, vain and lying, as it is said in the 94th Psalm, v. 11: "The Lord knows the thoughts of men, that they are vain."

Therefore he calls them in a disparaging way 2) "thoughts", as vague and unstable movements of the heart (because that is called a thought), which seem to be more firmly and permanently founded than the rocks in the sea. But also Paul, 3) Hebr. 13, 9., admonishes, 4) that they should not let themselves be carried about by various and strange doctrines, and Eph. 4, 14. that we should not let ourselves be weighed and swayed by all kinds of wind of doctrine. The plague of Egypt sufficiently shows these inconstant flies. Christ also said for this reason Matth. 11, 7. that the teaching of Jo-hannis is not a reed which the wind weaves to and fro. But our doctrine of faith is a solid rock, a rock wall, a stone wall (petra, rupes, saxum), which defies both the winds and the tides of the whole sea forever, therefore its [faith's] righteousness is also forever.

But what is this, that he desires, not that their thoughts, but they themselves should fall? St. Augustine thinks that this verse is spoken by the prophet as a prophecy, not as a prayer, or if it should be a prayer, then it is asked that they may fall in a good way, and change and turn to the salutary thoughts of God, and I like this opinion. But I am still pressed by this expression of the hypallage, 1) which seems to me to have a similar meaning as the word Ps. 81:7: "He turned his back from the burden," because in the world, where the princes of darkness rule, someone will strive in vain to prevent ungodly teachings and thoughts, because trouble must come. But we have to take care that we turn away from the teachings and thoughts that stubbornly try to cling to us, and that they never fall from us, so that they penetrate us again and again and fight us most stubbornly.

Since this is the case, it is obvious that those who want no heresy to remain, no error, no ungodliness to exist, do not deal with anything else than that, after the heretics have been burned, they alone should be heretics without hindrance (libere). For this verse indicates that we are to be in battle against the thoughts of men, but not to have rest from them, since the prophet asks that not they [thoughts from men] but men should fall from them. For by the very tamest glue and the greatest harlotry the human heart and its counsel cling together, so that even for the grace of God great effort and labor is necessary.

157 But he preferred to say "fall" rather than turn away, because he wants them to move from arrogance to humility. For thoughts inflate, so that sinners cannot recognize themselves, nor humble themselves to the grace of God.

But whoever wants to follow the understanding (which pleases me) that it is spoken as a prophecy, can easily bring it about that the wicked fall from their undertaking, when their confidence in it falls away, so that they cannot carry it out, not unlike what is shown in the building of the tower of Babylon (for there [Gen. 11, 1. ff.] the office, undertaking, work and end of the wicked teachers is depicted very beautifully), where they could not complete what they had begun. This is also illustrated by Christ Luc. 14, 28. f. in the parable of the one who wanted to build a tower. The 21st Psalm, v. 12, speaks in this sense: "They made plans that they could not carry out."

So they fall from the execution of their counsel by perishing, leaving behind them a monument where all can see what they intended and could not carry out; just as the Arians have fallen, but their memory and their thoughts, which they left and did not carry out, are still left, for all people to mock and talk about. Such a judgment the prophet has here both preached and implored against all godless teachers and workers, who present their own thoughts, that they should fall and not carry out what they think against godliness. This happens when they are judged by God, as it is said, because as long as they are judged by men, they increase and rise in their thoughts.

160 Why did he not simply say, "Cast them out," but added, "because of their great transgression"? And the word "cast out" in Hebrew means a scattering, as the builders of the tower of Babel were divided and scattered over the whole earth, and had to stop building the city, Gen. 11, 8. This also says the holy virgin Luc. 1, 51: "He scatters those who are hopeful in their heart." Of this matter Samson gave a prelude with his foxes, Judg. 15, 4. For in such a way

1) tropus- an interchange in the Composition of words, e.g. here: "that they fall from their nobles" instead of: that their nobles fall from them.

a realm becomes desolate, which is divided in itself.

For no heretics have ever been overcome by force or cunning, but by discord among themselves, and Christ does not fight against them in any other way than by sending the spirit of deceit [Isa. 19:14] and discord among them, as among the Shechemites, Judges 9:23, among the builders of the Tower of Babel, and in the New Testament among the Arians, Donatists, Pelagians. 9, 23, among the builders of the tower of Babel, and in the new 1) testament among the Arians, Donatists, Pelagians. But also the Jews perished at the last destruction through disunity, so that Hilarius, the holy man, boasts in his book of the Trinity that the war of the heretics is the peace of the church; for their discord is followed by their physical dispersion.

162 Christ indicates this when he describes Luc. 11, 22. the strong armored man who will be stripped of his armor in such a way that he says that everything he relied on must be divided and scattered. So also Hosea Cap. 10, 1. 2. proclaims, describing similar great transgressions, that they would perish by being scattered, and says: "Israel is a desolate vine, its fruit is even so. As much fruit as it had, so many altars it had made; where the land was best, there they founded the most beautiful churches. Her heart is rent asunder, now shall she find her iniquity; her altars shall be broken down, and her churches shall be desolate." These words interpret this verse very appropriately. For what does the multiplication of the altars according to the amount of fruit mean but this: Israel grew so that she had many cities, and so many altars they set up? as Jer. 2:28. is written, "As many a city, as many a god hast thou, Judah." By this certification they soon hasten their dispersion, each part desiring the ruin of the other, that it alone may accomplish its own.

163. the meaning is this: they are ungodly in many ways, they are guilty of many superstitions and idolatries, they are also divided among themselves, like the Pharisees and Sadducees, and their Successors in our time, therefore scatter them because of this [great transgression], so that their ungodliness may cease, in that the strength of unity is lost.

If this is true, it can be seen that a great persecution, destruction and scattering is imminent for the church; since it is divided into so many sects, and its members fight miserably against each other, it is threatened with a tremendous fall with a great crash. For there are no longer so many altars as cities, but almost as many as heads. Even brotherly love has perished, without which everything that is done in life must necessarily be idolatry, because what is God's is not sought. Therefore, you can rightly call the glittering change of all priests, religious and all people who put love in the background (as it is now in the church) "great transgression", by which we are also divided and will shortly be scattered "each in his own way", as Isaiah Cap. 53, 6. as the foxes of Samson most excellently illustrate (as I have said), in which the heads stood apart, but the tails were joined by fires (Judg. 15, 4.).

165. "For they are contumacious to thee" (irritaverunt te), in Hebrew: "They have embittered thee." We have said [§ 59 ff.] that before other sins this most enraged, angered, and embittered [God], that that which is commanded is omitted, and another is done, as if it were better, which is not commanded, namely, XXX, disobedience itself, idolatry, wrongdoing. Therefore, the prophet attributes this to them, that they are contrary to God and provoke Him to anger, which is also what other prophets do, when they say about the house of Israel that they provoke [God] to anger, provoke, provoke (as has been said).

But it is to be noted that for "transgression" in this place [in the Hebrew] another word is set, which is different from the previous ones. For here not XXX or XXX but XXX is set, which is a general expression for any transgression. Isa. 1, 2. [Vulg.]: "I have brought up children, but they have despised me," that is, they have sinned against me, or, they have despised me with their transgressions. Therefore Hierony-

1) In the original and in the Weimar: nostro instead of: NOVD.

The translation of the word "scelerum" [here, Ps. 5, 11] is: because of the multitude of their shameful deeds (scelerum). But what these transgressions are in particular, he has listed above [v. 5 ff.], when he says: "You are not a God who is pleased with ungodly beings." For he wants to indicate by all this that they sinned, transgressed and did evil in many ways, so that they were even rebellious to God, while they thought that they pleased Him. Therefore, "great transgression" (multitudo impietatum) is said not only because they are divided into many sects according to what was said before, but also because every sect sins in this manifold way, which he described in the seven pieces (septenario) mentioned before.

v. 12. Let all who trust in you rejoice forever, for you protect them; let those who love your name rejoice in you. 1)

166 All this is one verse in the Hebrew [in the Vulgate two]. St. Jerome has thus, And let all rejoice who hope in thee, forever shall they praise, thou shalt protect them, and glad in thee shall they be who love thy name. There our text has said gloriabuntur for laetabuntur. But also elsewhere the translations of words expressing violent movements are extraordinarily different, so that only in the Hebrew source one can find everywhere their constant meaning, by which they differ from each other (constans differentia).

Here we see that four words expressing a movement of the mind are accumulated: rejoice, trust, boast, be glad. But also the word: "You protect them" almost [also] indicates such a movement, that of hope. How then are they different? It is difficult to explain, because these movements are rare and high (ardui), they cannot be recognized nor taught, because they have been experienced.

(167) This one thing is certain, according to the whole meaning of the psalm, that it speaks of the joy and security of the heart, not of that which comes from the removal of external evil.

1) Vulgate: Ht laejentur omnes, hui kperaut in te, in ubternuin "xsuUadunt: et dabitAdis in eis.

^Aloriudnntur in te omn68, <^ui äiÜAUnt NOM6N tuurn.

(where patience reigns), but by the forgiveness of sins, purity and confidence of conscience (where hope reigns). For this was his purpose, that he taught by what means they might become righteous and godly, namely, by the mercy and fear of God, not by iniquity. But all seek to rejoice and be glad; but not all seek it in the right way, therefore they do not find it. Therefore let us divide this verse into two parts, so that it may contain, as it were, a repetition of the same thing (sit tautologicus), namely, that this, that he says, "Let all who trust in thee rejoice, let them glory forever in thy shielding," is the same as, "Let those who love thy name rejoice in thee."

168 For it is seen that he opposes these movements of joy to the XXX XXXX, that is, to those who do evil, or (as it is more often translated) who cause heartache (doloris), because, as it is said, this idolatry and pretense of works is the trouble of fools, which makes them sorrowful and sad, but never in truth makes the heart glad, as they say, Mal. 3, 14. [Vulg.], "What profit is it that we lead a sorrowful life before the Lord?" And Isa. 58:3: "Why do we fast, and thou seest it not? Why do we afflict our bodies, and thou wilt not know it?" and likewise they speak in this whole chapter and in the following, which deal extensively with this affliction.

Do you want to know where the true joy of the heart is? He says, "Let those who trust in you rejoice." This description is certain, and this judgment stands firm; the joy of the human heart is not based on works, not on any things, but on hope alone. Whoever seeks to obtain joy elsewhere besides this hope will labor much and in vain, but it will also become worse with him, as with the woman in the Gospel [Luc. 8:43], who had the issue of blood and consumed her goods with the physicians. The same happens to those who, in the anguish of their conscience, run hither and thither, sometimes consulting this, sometimes that, sometimes doing this, sometimes that, and trying everything to calm their heart.

They do not seek the peace and quiet that they can also have in themselves. The false teachers help in these tortures by teaching works, pardons, indulgences, and pilgrimages out of ignorance, and by giving false consolation, and by seducing with similar trades that creep in the darkness, just as today there is no number of all these things.

Since this hope is taught so often in the Psalter, let us depart a little from the matter at hand and deal with it in more detail, so that we may know once and for all the meaning (vim) and the manner of hope, for it is very necessary for frightened and fainthearted consciences to know.

171. So, just as impatience, sadness, despondency (confusio) do not actually and in the first place come from the quantity and magnitude of afflictions, adversities and any other evils, but rather from the position of the heart, which abhors such things, and unwittingly desires the opposite, well-being, pleasant life, glorious things (gloriosa): so despair, spiritual sadness, despondency of a troubled conscience do not actually and in the first place come from the amount and greatness of sins, but rather from the position of the heart that abhors sins and unwise seeks an abundance of good works, righteousness and blessedness.

The first part is clear, because here he says: "Let all who trust in you rejoice" (sperant). When he says that all who trust should rejoice in the Lord, he does not allow it to be understood as if anyone were exempt, not even those who are in tribulation; indeed, it is of these that he speaks primarily, that they rejoice in the Lord, while they have tribulation in themselves or in men. These are the faithful of Christ, who, as they have much of the suffering of Christ, so also are abundantly comforted by him, as the apostle [2 Cor. 1:5] speaks. For they know where and in whom they ought to rejoice and be glad, even in the Lord [Phil. 4:4]. Therefore, by this their wisdom they are not grieved, not despondent, not impatient, because they do not seek well-being, pleasant life, and glorious things. From half they go through the midst of both good and evil, as it is written [Prov. 12:21], "Nothing shall trouble the righteous, 1) whatever may befall him," and Prov. 28:1, "The wicked fleeth, and no man chaseth him: but the righteous is confident as a young lion."

But those who are ignorant and unwise, and do not want to know that one should rejoice and be glad in God, what else do they do but be sad, create trouble for themselves, become impatient, not because unpleasant and sad things come, but because when they come, according to the position of their heart, they foolishly do not look to God, but to their well-being and pleasant life. Thus they flee, but cannot escape, because they do not flee to where one must flee. Therefore, the whole cause of any sadness is the foolish desire for joy and glory; if the heart did not cling to it, the adversities would be of no avail, so that it is a very true saying: The world is ruled by opinions. And for each one things are of such a nature as his opinion of these things is: if one despises them, they do no harm, neither do they profit; but if one esteems them highly, then they profit and harm.

The second part is just as certain, because many and great sinners have been saved; and even those of whom he says here that they rejoice in the Lord, will have to say with Job [Cap. 9, 3]: "We cannot answer him for a thousand. And for this reason they have many and great sins. In these, God undoubtedly shows that the cause of despair is not the multitude of sins, but the lack of understanding of the heart, which at the time of anguish of conscience seeks good works to oppose the sins that beset it. For it thinks (according to its shameful delusion) that it could have overcome the sins by works, and still can. If now a man does not find these, and does not know that one must look up to God's mercy, he despairs with necessity, not unlike the impatience of one who, setting aside looking up to God, seeks how to oppose evil with good, but does not have it; for no works can suffice against even a single sin, not even against a venial sin.

For thus speaks the wretched conscience of an ungodly man who is dying and hastens to the judgment of God, and disputes with himself: O wretched man, if I had done much good now, if I had done no evil, if I had remained pure! What do these exceedingly foolish and ungodly words indicate but that this saying of Augustine is absolutely true: The ungodly is also struck with this punishment, that when it comes to dying, he forgets him, since he forgot God while he lived? He seeks good and hates evil, and does not realize that he has never done such evil things and sought after good less than at this very hour in which he speaks this and entertains this exceedingly foolish opinion, for he proves that he does not trust (sperare) in God, but is presumptuous because of his works; for if he wanted to trust in God, he would still have Him present and could trust in Him. [He is a man who looks back on past works so that he might rely on them; but they are rightly absent then, so that he might rely on them. If he trusts in God for the sake of works, (since he dreams that he could then trust in God more confidently and cheerfully if he saw a multitude of works before him), he is convicted of trusting more in works than in God; but what is there more frightening and more ungodly than this?

176. but the righteous, though they sin, do not despair, because, as they pass in the midst between the bodily evils (that is, the sufferings of this life) and the good, so also between the spiritual evils (that is, the sins) and the spiritual good, not being presumptuous that they live well, nor despairing because they sin, knowing that neither of them is to be rejoiced in nor grieved over, since they are

know that they are God's gifts, or a withdrawal of God's gifts; but they themselves cling to the Giver Himself.

177 This is what Proverbs says, Cap. 24:16: "A righteous man falls seven times and gets up again, but the wicked sink into misfortune," that is, they do not get up again but fall into the misfortune of despair. For if then thou trustest, or wouldest trust, if thou hadst done good, much more must thou trust when thou hast done evil, lest the word be said unto thee, Ps. 49:19 [Vulg.], "He shall praise thee when thou shalt do evil unto him," and this [Luc. 8:13], "In the time of temptation they fall away," and thou heap not ungodliness upon ungodliness, and fall into the blasphemy of disobedience.

178. Therefore, it is very much to be feared that both kinds of misfortune will befall the wicked, that, just as they make themselves believe that they rejoice and are glad in God, while they have honor and all well-being, when in fact they do not put their trust in God, but in His gifts, namely, that it will go well with them, as the temptation proves, they are thus also most strongly of the opinion that they trust in the Lord (especially in our extremely dangerous times, which are very much concerned with the appearance [larvis] of works), because they live holy, spiritual and (as they call it) also according to observance, while in truth, without knowing it, they trust in their holiness, as the hour of death will prove. Then, when they come to judgment, and die quite confidently, because they are conscious of a good life (in this confidence they hope in GOD, that is, they extinguish true hope), it will be to them as to him who sets his foot on a log floating in the water, and suddenly falls into the deep, or as Isaiah Cap. 30, 13. says of them, "So shall such iniquity be to you as a crack in a high wall, when it begins to trickle, which suddenly falls in unawares, and is broken."

(179) Therefore, just as patience that exists only in well-being is not patience, so also hope that is based on merit is not hope, and as easy or possible as it is to have patience in well-being, so it is not hope that is based on merit.

It is easy to have hope when there is merit, for there is danger on both sides; there that man may be hopeful in safety, here that he, puffed up by righteousness, may put the fear of God (that is, the exercise of hope) behind, since the nature of patience is that it is only present in adversities, so also the nature of hope that it is not otherwise present than in sins. Shall we then commit sins, that we may be able to hope? Far be it from us! There are already plenty of sins that we have committed and in which we were born, so that hope has to fight a great battle against them, since even good works are nothing but sins before God.

Is God cruel, then, that He condemns all that is ours? No, but the ineffable mercy of God, in order to be able to communicate Himself to us and to remove the trust in us from us (which is solely contrary to mercy), gave the law, by which He decided everything under sin, so that He might have mercy on all, Rom. 11, 32, because where the law is not, there is no sin; where there is no sin, there is no mercy; where there is no mercy, there is no blessedness; where there is no blessedness, there is no God. And so the power of sin is the law [1 Cor. 15:56], but the power of the law is mercy, the power of mercy is hope, the power of hope is blessedness, and the power of blessedness is God through Jesus Christ our Lord, for He is the God who makes blessed (salvos faciendi) and the Lord who saves from death, Ps. 68:21 [Vulg.]. For the law works sin for us, mercy works (that is, fulfills) the law, hope works mercy, blessedness works hope, GOD works blessedness, and all things in Christ. Thus blessedness descends from Christ the God to sin, and we ascend from sin to blessedness in Christ the man.

From this follows this: Just as in temporal things the good is given for its own sake by God, so that through it we may learn to serve God all the more, to trust in Him, and to love Him, where it is through the fault of our heart (affectus) that it is given to Him as a then more heavily and less, rather in adversities more easily and more is served, in him is trusted, and he is loved: so goods of grace and merits are given by God in spiritual things, so that we are taught by them to trust the more strongly in God. And behold, through the guilt of our heart, which is presumptuous of it, it happens that by this a trust is least of all drawn (speretur), but that it happens that one can more easily trust (sperare) in sins. Therefore it seemed necessary to the divine goodness to raise up the cross, and by its preaching to make the faithful blessed, the foolish and the sinners, but to reject the wise and the holy, as he 1 Cor. 1, 23. f. We preach Christ crucified as foolishness to the Greeks (the wise) and as an offense to the Jews (the saints), but as divine power and wisdom to those who are called, both Jews and Greeks (that is, sinners and fools)," and so on, as it is beautifully stated there.

Therefore, just as it is extremely dangerous for a person to always be left in good days, because he either never or very rarely learns to love God, so it is even more dangerous for a person to be left in many merits and graces of God until death, because he will hardly ever learn to trust in God. Therefore, it is through God's mercy that they not only fall into anguish of conscience, but also, if they are even hard, finally fall into a very obvious work of sin, such as fornication or similar shameful deeds, and God must keep them with such great concern that, against His mercy, He leads them to mercy and delivers them from sin through sin.

But this is something quite unheard of for many, and they might object: So then one must only sin, and wholly refrain from good, or (as also the apostle was reproached, who taught the same thing) [Rom. 3:8.] "Let us do evil, that good may come of it." For if we speak in this way, we will be regarded as paving the way for sin, and the good will not come out of it.

as if it were harmful to salvation. We answer: By these words, not only are good works not forbidden, but rather they are highly praised, and sins are fundamentally taken away by the best way of teaching (optimo magisterio), since they teach that good comes from within, and that sin must be killed within. For only this attitude (the head of the old serpent), which is completely hidden and carnal in an extremely subtle way, which trusts in these works and most stubbornly resists hope, which is based solely on God's mercy, must be trampled underfoot, torn out, destroyed, and one must realize that if one has not led a good life, one should not therefore despair, but also not hope because one has led a good life. But the former is difficult, but the latter is even more difficult, because in the latter one fights against sins alone, but in the latter one fights against good works and sin at the same time, that is, against the attitude that one is presumptuous of good works.

For if I say that patience does not endure when everything is going well, do I therefore condemn the [good] things, the [proper] power (potestatem), peace, life, since one cannot live without them, and they are the good creatures of the good God? Not at all, but that the heart is attached to it (affectum illorum), that I condemn. Thus it comes about that sometimes these things have to be called by an evil name, which they do not deserve, as that they are called "vain" in Ecclesiastes, and "thorns" by Christ in the Gospel, without their own fault, but because of the vanity of another, as Rom. 8:20, 22: "The creature is subject to vanity, against its will, and is afraid under it."

(185) So also these very good works of the wicked, since they are God's gifts, by which at times others are helped, but they themselves [the wicked] are corrupted, without their [the good works] being to blame, but because of the defilement which is done to them by the wicked, are called XXX, ungodliness, idolatry, disobedience. Thus Moses speaks of them under the cover of his angel.

(Deut. 28:1) 30: "A wife you will trust, but another will sleep with her. A house you will build, but you will not dwell in it. You will plant a vineyard, but you will not make it common," and many other things in this way, by which, as he preaches, they will have trouble, but strangers will enjoy it. For what else does he teach there but that they do good, but that they are punished by it, others should be helped.

This removes the objection that some raise: how can a good work done apart from grace be sin, such as giving alms, taking care of the needy, and the like? As if Christ really did not know that prophesying and doing deeds in his name and hearing his word are good things, which he will nevertheless condemn as evil deeds, and say Matt. 7:23: "Depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity," or that if a harlot adorns herself with gold and precious stones, she does not necessarily sin with the good things she wears. Therefore, the wicked can benefit others and do good, but not themselves in any way; rather, God works through them, who works everything in everyone, even in the wicked.

187 All this is proven by this firm reason, that according to the unanimous judgment of all, hope is a theological virtue, which has only God as its object (pro objecto, as they call it). But God is goodness and our mercy, which is promised to us. Anyone who trusts (sperat) in something other than the promised mercy (that is, in God) is already presumptuous and has lost hope. The same is done by the one who hopes in God at the same time as he hopes in his merits. Just as God cannot be loved at the same time as another (as St. Augustine teaches), because then He is not loved above all things, so one cannot trust in Him (sperare) at the same time as anything else, because then one does not trust in Him above all things. But one also cannot believe in him beside another, because then not in him over everything is believed. So even these three virtues [faith, love, hope] are divine that they have only one divine object, author (subjectum), worker, 1) work, art and way. For here the bridegroom holds the secret of the chamber with the bride, he alone with her alone, while in other works everything is carried out by the daughters of Jerusalem or the comrades; all others limp on both sides, worshipping their Baal at the same time as God.

188 Finally, these sayings are also proven by the fact that hope has to do with things that are not seen, just as faith and love do. Romans 8:24: "Hope that is seen is not hope, for how can one hope that which is seen?" Just as he who believes what he sees, what does he believe? He who loves what he sees, what does he love? Absolutely nothing but a fleshly shadow image (spectrum) and something far inferior to God, not the essence (rem) but the appearance (larvam). But he who hopes in his works, who sees, holds, has, feels that on which he relies, does not hope in the Promiser, whom he cannot see, cannot feel, cannot comprehend, of whom he has heard only through the Word that He is made known to him. This is very difficult, repugnant and hard for our flesh, because in these things his [the flesh's] death reigns.

Therefore, what is said in the Song of Songs about the bridegroom and the bride, and reads as if it spoke of a lustful and carnal love of men, yes, also everything that still happens after the sex of man and woman, means just the extreme opposite of such pleasure, namely, the completely perfect works of faith, hope, love, that is, death and hell, as it says there [Hohel. 8, 6.], "For love is strong as death; and zeal is firm as hell." And again [v. 7.], "Many waters may not quench love, nor rivers drown it. If one would give all the good in his house for love, it would all count for nothing." This cannot at all be understood of the heat of pleasure.

Many try to penetrate and talk about the secret, negative, real and symbolic (mystica, negativa, propria, symbolica) theology, but they do not know what they say or what they put, because they do not even know what an affirmation or a negation is, or how it happens; nor can their interpretations be read without danger, because as they themselves have been, so they have written, as they have thought, so they have spoken. But they held the contradiction of the negative theology 2), that is, they loved neither death nor hell, therefore it was impossible that they should not deceive both themselves and their readers.

I wanted to say this as a warning, because everywhere, both in Italy and in Germany, interpretations (commentaria) of Dionysius about mystical theology are carried around, that is, mere suggestions of such a science, which wants to blow itself out and be seen, so that no one believes he is a mystical theologian, when he has read, understood and taught this, or rather has let himself think that he understands and teaches it. Through life, yes, through death and damnation, someone becomes a theologian, not through understanding, reading or contemplating (speculando).

192 Again the word of the apostle is held up, Rom. 5, 3-5: "Affliction brings patience, but patience brings experience, but experience brings hope, but hope does not put to shame." Here, at least, it seems as if the apostle puts hope among merits, so that therefore the Magister Sententiarum [Peter Lombards] with the whole crowd of theologians accepts this description of hope as the correct one: Hope is the certain expectation of a reward that comes from merit. For those people have no other hope than that which comes from merit. What else could follow from this opinion than the downfall of the entire theology, the ignorance of Christ and His cross, and (as lamented in Jeremiah [Cap. 2, 32]) the forgetting of God forever?

2) Cf. Walch, old edition, vol. V, 1129,? 121: 'MeoloMa n6Aativu, rightly defined, is the holy cross and the temptations in which one does not see God.'

1) Jenaer and Erlanger: subfectum operatorena.

193 But what will they say to us, that they themselves confess that faith, hope and love are infused virtues and the foundation (principia) of all good? For even they themselves do not say that merits precede love (fieri). Furthermore, they firmly assert that hope and faith are infused at the same time as love, so it is certain, according to their own opinion, that hope does not come from merit, but merit from hope, and yet they reverse this opinion when they describe hope, contradicting themselves by deriving hope from merit.

194 Furthermore, what do they say to the apostle when he says that patience is a work of affliction? Rom. 5, 3. But who could endure any tribulation without hope? For he who despairs never attains to patience, nor to experience, nor to glory in tribulation, but on the contrary grows worse and worse through tribulation, as Christ teaches Matt. 7:26 ff. about the house built on the sand, which has a great fall when the winds and the waters beat against it. He also shows this with the seed that fell on the stone [Luc. 8:6], which went out, but when the sun shone on it, it withered away, falling away in the time of trial; therefore hope must be there at the beginning of the tribulation.

195. But see also this: If hope comes from merit alone, then no sinner can have hope, but only the righteous. Who then can turn to repentance? Where will a righteous man be if no sinner repents? Or how will he repent if he cannot hope for the mercy of God? Should one say to a dying sinner: "Far be it from you! Do not hope, you have no merits from which hope can come to you? This would then no longer be doing theology, but doing devily (diabologisare). For the devil's exceedingly powerful voice would then be: "Do not hope, for you lack merit; for in death is the noblest, highest, and very best workshop of hope, and death itself brings about hope in the most artful way. It is so this description of hope is quite wrong, and I would rather confess that I do not understand the apostle's word than allow such a description of hope to be formed from it.

Therefore, I will put forward my opinion. First of all, it is certain that grace, that is, faith, hope and love are not poured in unless sin is poured out at the same time, that is, the sinner is not justified unless he is condemned, he is not made alive unless he is killed, he does not go to heaven unless he descends to hell, as all Scripture testifies. Therefore, when grace is poured out, there must necessarily be bitterness, tribulation, suffering, under which the old man groans, being very unwilling that he should perish. If he is patient in this affliction and awaits the hand of Him who works on him and pours grace into him, he is proven and will attain hope, faith and love, which are poured into him on this occasion (hoc negotio). This happens as often as we encounter that which is contrary to us and our will, and all the more so the more it is contrary to us.

This, I say, is the way, not only how the first grace is poured in, but also for all subsequent growth. For the old man is crucified more and more, and sin is cast out, as more and more grace is poured in, even unto death, as it is said in Revelation 22:11: "Let him that is godly be godly, and let him that is holy be holy," and John 1:16. "We have received grace for grace", and as Paul says Rom. 1, 17: "We are justified by faith through faith", [2 Cor. 3, 18]: "we are transfigured from one clarity to another", "we receive victory after victory", Ps. 84, 8. So it will be rightly said of us that we pass from one hope to another.

It is clear, then, that the apostle is not speaking both of the hope itself that is attained and of the assurance of the heart in hope, in that after the tribulation and the infusion of hope (when it seems to him that he is without hope) a man feels that he hopes and believes and loves. For then one tastes how kind the Lord is, and man begins to hunger and thirst that he may suffer even more, so that the tribulation may work even greater hope. Therefore, it is necessary that faith, hope and love be present in the beginning of every good work and suffering, and yet, after the work and suffering, this [faith, hope and love that was hidden] is revealed, so that those who are proven may be revealed, as Job was tempted and Abraham, so that they may also be known of themselves, and be certain that they believe, hope and love God, as it is said to Abraham [Gen. 22, 12]: "Now I know that you fear God," that is, I have made you know it, as St. Augustine interprets it.

For one must not only believe, hope and love, but also know and be certain that one believes, hopes and loves. This happens in secret, when the storm is there, this happens after the storm.

200 Peter also teaches us [2 Pet 1:10J] that we should be all the more diligent to establish our profession through good works, since it is different to be good or to become good than to know that one is good or has become good. A bloodthirsty and treacherous man is not otherwise found to be a bloodthirsty and treacherous man than when he is irritated, whereas before he seemed to be a kind and sincere man, even he thought himself to be so.

Thus, in those who endure it and are proved, the cross works a hope that endures to the end (that is, it [the cross] begins it, increases it, and brings it to light, and makes it certain and causes it to be known), but in those who do not endure it, but are found reprobate, immediately from the beginning there is a despair that cannot be overcome (impotentissimam). Therefore, Tauler, the man of God, and all who have experienced it, say that God is never more pleasant, sweet, and a better friend to His children than after the probation of tribulation.

The apostle says of this hope that it is brought forth through experience [Rom. 5:4]. For just as children are more intimately attached to their physical father

Christ, the bridegroom, also shows his bride a love (voluptate) contrary to the flesh, namely after the embrace; but the embraces are her death and hell. Here, that great mystery [Eph. 5:31] prevails: "There shall be two in one flesh," Christ and the church; indeed, a great mystery, because it comes very hard, but brings exceedingly sweet fruit, and a posterity quite like God's, works that are completely blameless (inculpata), because in such a way the vine is purified, that it may bring forth more fruit. Now if this is true of every degree of hope, that it is wrought by experience, how much more must we believe that the apostle says and understands this of the perfect hope, which comes from many and various tribulations?

Now let us consider the words of the apostle, who calls hope the effect of experience, experience the effect of patience, patience the effect of affliction, which the Magister [Sententiarum] has called with too strong an expression the merits from which hope comes, or at least they have not sufficiently understood those merits. For truly, the active life, in which many trust presumptuously, by which they also understand merits, does not produce and work hope, but presumption, not unlike the puffing up of knowledge. Therefore the suffering (passive) life must be added, which kills and destroys the whole active life, so that nothing of merit remains of which a hopeful man may boast.

204. When this happens, if man perseveres otherwise, hope arises in him, that is, he learns that there is nothing to rejoice in, hope in, or boast about except God. For since tribulation takes everything away from us, it leaves us with God alone, for it cannot take away God (Deum), but rather brings God to us. But when everything is taken away, including good works and merits, and we persevere here, we find God in whom alone we trust, and so we are saved by hope.

205. Therefore, although the saints of works say that they trust in God with all their confidence, they immediately fall away as soon as their active life (which is their entire strength) begins to be challenged, whether by the contempt of men or by the distress of conscience before God, and they show that they have been more presumptuous about their lives than that they have hoped for God's mercy, since no active life is of such a nature that it would be sufficient before God, indeed, which would be pleasing to all even before men to the end, as it says [Ps. 143, 2]: "Do not go into judgment with your servant, for before you no living person is righteous."

But only the suffering (passive) life is completely pure, therefore it also works hope and honor, and in this we must become similar to the image and example of Christ, our King and Duke, who began with an active life, but was completed through suffering, in that all his so many and so glorious works were made nothing at all, so that he was not only counted among the wicked before men, but also abandoned by God.

Everything must be taken away from us so completely that not even the best gifts of God, that is, the merits, in which we would like to trust, should remain, so that the sincere hope is placed in the completely pure God, only then is man pure and holy in truth. This trade goes on in many tribulations, and indeed in many sorrows, but in the greatest ones where we begin to approach the greatest adornment of hope, that is, the removal of good works and the good conscience that is based on our life. For in other things, when either goods or health or honor are taken away, both hope and patience do not contend against impatience and man, since man is so exercised in these that he learns to patiently despise them as such, which will never return. But in these storms of conscience and the downfall of merit, hope fights against despair and almost against itself, yes, against God, whom man feels to be angry against him, as against such a one who has no good merits, which he cannot do without and yet must do without, which tortures the spirit most miserably, and makes him, stretched out with Christ, count all his bones [Ps. 22:18], so that someone could rightly call hope a spiritual patience or a patience in suffering the guilt, as, on the other hand, one could call patience a bodily hope or a hope in suffering the punishments. For what is this, that one is challenged in conscience and by despair, but to feel that the guilt cannot be remitted, that God will not be merciful, that all good works fall away from the beginning? And yet, if a man perseveres and hopes for hope, when there is nothing to hope for [Rom. 4:18], he will be found worthy, and through this tribulation, stripped of merit, will be clothed with hope, and crowned with the crown that shall not be put to shame forever. For God is not angry in truth, nor does He want the guilt to be indispensable, but rather He compels us to hope more in His mercy than in our merits.

But our saints of works, who have received as daily food (saginati) the active life of merits, abhor nothing so much as this cross of their merits, since they are deceived by the word of the Magister [Sententiarum], that he says hope comes from merits, by which they understand works, but the apostle understands tribulations, that is, the death and cross of works.

See, then, how far we have strayed from the right knowledge of hope through the one word of the Magister [Sententiarum], which has been misunderstood. And this error has produced innumerable torments of conscience, perhaps also the eternal damnation of many people. For while they strove to find hope and peace by works, but, as they sought them, tribulation of both conscience and body confronted them and resisted them, which is the right workshop of hope, they did not recognize it, and cast it from them; since they could not find another, they necessarily had to despair. This also is not to be forgiven.

They were surprised because they sought hope in a way that leads to presumption, and since they were hindered, or, as Hosea says, their way was covered with thorns, they did not realize that this hindrance was the true way to hope, so they fell away.

211 Hence comes today the great multitude of those who are weak, fainthearted, fearful, and fickle in all their ways. For it is not because of this that you are challenged with despair or distress of conscience, so that you run to trust in works, but, on the contrary, are turned away from works. For this battle is entirely spiritual, although it is very sour, and must be carried out between you alone and God alone, in that hope alone perseveres and waits, and God commands the whole thing, and God overcomes against God, as it is written of Jacob Gen. 32, 24. ff, that he alone wrestled with GOd and overcame Him, and therefore in the same place he received the blessing from Him whose name he was not permitted to know; therefore he called the place Pniel, saying, "I have seen GOd face to face, and my soul is recovered."

Now if someone is allowed to walk in the way of presumption in well-being, and, without this challenge, to increase in his works, where will he end up? Perhaps not him in despair, but despair in him, because he does not know God, nor has he learned that he is whimsical in this his counsel and works.

Now one can see the value of Cicero's saying, which is often quoted: The consciousness of a well spent life is an exceedingly pleasant memory. It is certainly true, but at the same time it is extremely harmful, and the more pleasant this memory is, the more so. But this is not to be remembered by a Christian, for whom rather the awareness of a life in which he has suffered well (bene passae) (that is, which has been made nothing) is exceedingly pleasant, so that [Jer. 9:24] he who wants to boast may boast of the Lord. Job does not speak like this, for after he had said [Cap. 27, 6]: "My conscience does not bite me.

If he is not justified "for the sake of his whole life," he still does not dare to boast, but is afraid and asks his judge for forgiveness. Nor Paul, 1 Cor. 4, 1) 4: "I am conscious of nothing, but in this I am not justified." Nor Jeremiah, Cap. 9, 23. f.: "Let not a wise man boast of his wisdom, let not a strong man boast of his strength, let not a rich man boast of his riches; but let him that will boast boast of this, that he knoweth and knoweth me, that I am the LORD, which do mercy, and judgment, and righteousness in the earth: for these things please me, saith the LORD."

214. So not on any gifts of God (so that we do not commit fornication with them, as it says in the prophets), but on God Himself, the Giver, one should trust, hope in Him, cling to Him. This is what the 116th Psalm wanted to say [v. 11]: "I said in my trembling, All men are liars." This trembling has been the tribulation in which man is instructed how vain and lying all men are who do not hope in GOD alone. For man is a man until he becomes God, who alone is true. By partaking of Him, he also becomes truthful by adhering to Him in true faith and hope, after he has been made nothing by this hesitation.

For what can a man who hopes in God come to other than his complete destruction (in sui nihilum)? But where can he go who goes into nothingness, other than to where he came from? But he came from God, and from his nothingness, therefore he returns to God who returns to nothingness. For he also cannot fall out of the hand of God, who falls out of himself and all creatures, since God's hand embraces him on all sides, for [Isa. 40, 12.] "he grasps the earth with a dreiling," 2) as Isaiah says. So now fall through the world, where will you fall? Certainly into the hand and the bosom of God. Thus the souls of the righteous are in the hand of God.

1) Jenaer und Erlanger: 1 Oor. 14.

2) See Luther's marginal gloss on Isa. 40:12. Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. VIII, 1774: "A measure three fingers wide."

(Because they are out of the world, they are regarded by the unintelligent as if they would perish [Wis. 3:1, 2]), 1) Like a small stone that falls through the air or water, but does not also fall through the earth.

But the busy and beautifully glittering saints of works, who, being heard by their opinions, seek with all their righteousnesses only that they may grow and be fat and great, and in no way want to become nothing, but something great, where will they end up? Of course, if they are pushed back into their nothingness and yet are not brought to God, they will perish eternally.

But I know how many things can be objected to from the holy scriptures and the sayings of the fathers and the legends of the saints. Again, I also know how dangerously it is understood if it is not understood according to this rule [§ 214], because everything serves this opinion. But I will give one example for the sake of example.

We read in the writings of St. Jerome that St. Hilarius said to his soul when he was afraid to die: Go forth, my soul, why dost thou fear? For three and ninety years you have served Christ and you are afraid to die? If one wants to understand this in such a way that he said it because he trusted in the works of his life, then one will also understand that he rather went to hell than to heaven.

219. Why does one not also look at the word of St. Agathon, which is completely contrary to this? He had looked with his eyes toward heaven for three days and was afraid [to die]. When he was asked by his disciples why he was afraid and did not trust in the life he had led so well, he answered: "In truth I am afraid; I know that I have kept the commandments of God as much as I could, but God's judgments are different from those of men. But also the fear of Hilarion indicates the same; for if the works had been enough for him, he would not have been afraid. Therefore, he was forced to look for another anchor of his confidence, and from the previous gifts

God had shown him, to conclude (sibi praefigere) that God would be merciful to him.

220. for this not a little causes one to create hope when one is mindful of the past or present benefits of God that one has received, yes, it is a brightness of the face of God and a good sign over us, which kindles faith and hope. Thus, the children of Israel were commanded to be mindful of the works of God and of the execution from Egypt [Deut. 8:14], so that, as Isaiah says [Cap. 48:9, Vulg.], by restraining their mouths with the praise of God, they would not perish.

221. Are there, then, no merits? Why then are we taught by so many commandments of Christ and the apostles that we should work good, sow seed, build [on the foundation of] gold, silver, precious stones 2c.? I answer, This is what I said, that very many are deceived by a false sense of good works, for truly good works are to be done, and the tree of the Spirit must bring forth its fruit, of which Gal. 5, 22. is written. But they do not understand this word of Christ John 12:24: "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit." Nor John 15:2: "Every branch of mine that bringeth forth fruit, he purifieth it, that it may bring forth more fruit."

For this dying and cleansing (which happens through the infusion of faith and hope and love) causes man, stripped of his works, to learn to trust in God alone and to do good works, now not for himself, as if they were merits with which he sought a reward, but in vain and out of a free willing heart to please God, trusting nothing in them, but by them serving the glory of God, as Christ Matth. 5, 16. says: "Let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father in heaven."

223. Those who do good works in this way do not do them for themselves, but for God, as it were as instruments of God; they do not presume to do them, and they are satisfied with God alone, in whom they hope. Those who do not do works in this way are apes of holy men. Even the life of all saints must necessarily become superstition if they have not learned to praise the heavenly Father in these [good works. It is therefore rightly said in sPs. 25:10]: "The ways of the Lord are all goodness and truth," that is, good works are done when he alone works them completely and totally in us, so that no part of the work belongs to us.

Therefore this shall be a rule unto thee: Where Scripture commands that a good work be done, you must understand it as forbidding you to do a good work, since you are not able to do it, but to sanctify the Sabbath, be dead and buried, and let God work in you. But you will never be able to achieve this, 1) if it is not through faith, hope and love, that is, by killing yourself [Col. 3, 5] and all your works.

So there are merits, and there are no merits among us. They are there because they are gifts of God and works that He alone does; there are no merits because we cannot be more presumptuous because of them than any man, who is the very worst of sinners, in whom God has not yet worked anything. Thus we are, we were, and we all remain the same before God at all times, so that the inflated nature (inflatura) of the one may perish against the other, as Paul says in 1 Cor. 4:7: "What do you have that you have not received? But if thou hast received it, what boastest thou, as having not received it?" Mark the word: He that puffeth himself up, and seeketh his glory in the gifts of GOD, doeth the same as if he said, he had not received them. Where then is there any inequality left? Nowhere, as he says there, "Who has preferred you?" that is, who has declared you better than others? As if he wanted to say: Nobody.

226. From all this, notice well how the divine judgment is so completely equal [against all] (aequitatem acquissimam), and GOD does not judge the

He has given the law on both sides to all men who are in this life, from which we see that just as the righteous have no cause to be presumptuous, so sinners have no cause to despair. But both have the same law, that they should hope in him. This alone makes a distinction between the despairing and the presumptuous, so that the 119th Psalm may rightly sing [v. 75. Vulg.], "O Lord, I know that thy judgments are right, and in thy truth thou hast humbled me." Behold, in the truth of GOD he [the psalmist] becomes nothing, and according to the righteous and equal judgment of GOD he has become the very last.

This is also the intention of the law of faith and hope, that is, to make all of us the first sinners and the very last, that is, to make us equal, and yet to work through us very unequal and very different things. Truly, God is wondrous in His saints.

Thus we are all urged by the commandment of God to hope in Him, and by the same we are also deterred from despair and presumption, and now God is all in all, the same and the same, but at the same time exceedingly unequal and entirely different. For it is He who is simple in multiplicity, diverse in simplicity, equal in inequality, unequal in sameness, the lowest in sublimity, the lowest in height, the outermost in the innermost, and vice versa. Thus he is mighty in the weak, weak in the mighty, wise in the foolish, foolish in the wise, in short, all in all. But this I want to have said in such a way that the pious ears do not hear it, who are annoyed by the truth, which they have never learned in their unhappy questions.

229 Another pusillanimous and weak conscience would say: How, if I cannot hope, and thus feel my insurmountable despair? Then we will also say that one need not despair even if one feels that one despairs. This is not despair, which does not want to despair, and bears sorrow, that it despairs, but it is an

The challenge of hope, without a doubt the most severe of all challenges, which at the same time contains the greatest and eternal hatred against God, blasphemies, curses and all the malice of hell (which should not be spoken) against the highest, most blessed and glorious Majesty.

230 What do you want to do now? Certainly this: First, acknowledge that you deserve this and that it is the fault of your sins. Then you must be wise, and bear this weakness and affliction gratefully and with praise as an exceedingly salutary atonement for your sins, as it is said in Ecclesiastes, Cap. 10:4: "If the defiance of a mighty man go against your will, let not your indignation be, for forbearance stilleth great evil. Let this alone be your concern, that you do not give room to hatred, blasphemy, despair as much as you can, but, even with a single weak sigh, resist it (remurmures), and know, as Isaiah Cap. 42, 3. that he will not quench the smoldering wick 1) nor break the crushed reed.

I will say one thing boldly and freely: There are no people closer to God in this life than these haters and blasphemers of God, but also no more pleasant nor dearer children. And here a greater atonement for sin is made in a moment than if you were to repent for many years with bread and water. So it is also true that a Christian in death (where this temptation is strong) can get rid of all sins in a short moment and fly to heaven, if he behaves wisely in this trade. Here the unspeakable groaning reigns, Rom. 8, 26.

Secondly, throughout your life you must pray for hope, but in such a way that you do not refuse to bear God's will in your weakness until death, saying with your Prince and Lord [Matt. 26:38]: "My soul is sorrowful even unto death." But you shall pray in such a way that you do not doubt that God will give you the hope that is to come. For

1) In the Latin editions except the Weimar: li^nnm instead of: linnni in the Vulgate.

He who willed you to pray, who taught you this prayer without your help, willed it because he intended to hear you. Therefore bear it patiently when it is delayed, but have no doubt that it will be given to you; "it will surely come, and not be forgiven" [Hab. 2:3], meanwhile you must hope for hope, since there is nothing to hope for [Rom. 4:18].

For this you will have the rod and staff of God [Ps. 23:4] to uphold and comfort you, namely the first commandment of God and the greatest of all: "You shall have no other gods beside Me. In this commandment we are not only reminded, admonished and enticed to believe in GOD, to hope in Him, to love Him, but it is commanded to us under the utmost penalty and guilt (for that is to have a GOD). But by this commandment you are not freed from any sins, yes, it outweighs all sins, especially since at the time there is an opportunity to keep and fulfill this commandment. For even if you had sinned against all the other commandments, and in many ways, you would not have sinned as much as if you had despaired against this first commandment at that moment. For this would be downright denying God, which is frightening even to think. For who can say to his God to his face: You are not God? Yes, who can hear this? And yet, the one who despairs says this with full and eternal fervor of heart. The one who is challenged lets himself think that he says the same thing, yes, he even says something like that, or what is more correct, he suffers that this is said in him by the devil.

But how, you will say, if he troubles and worries me with the provision that I hope in vain if I am not provided for? I will speak about this in more detail at the 22nd 2) Psalm, when Christ gives grace. In the meantime, it is enough that this is the most dangerous challenge. If you know the cause of the devil or the wisdom of the flesh, you will know at the same time what remedy you can use to counter it.

2) Weimarsche: pn. XX.

First, then, you must hold fast and be absolutely certain that this thought is not from God, and therefore expel it with all diligence as one that displeases your God in many ways. But that it is not from God, you can see from this sign, that everything that is from God causes one to keep His commandments and do His will, for God does, thinks and wants nothing else than that His will be done. But this rash affliction, whether you are provided for or not, he has not commanded you at all, so that he has also forbidden you to do it, Ps. 55, 23: "Cast your concern on the Lord", and Matth. 6, 31. 33: "You shall not worry. Seek first the kingdom of God" 2c.

236. The devil also occupies you with this useless and harmful worry for no other reason than so that you forget the commandment of your God, by which he commands you to hope and believe, and at the same time, in a deceitful way, draw you to think only of yourself and love yourself, so that you begin to seek your own. For this is his last and highest trick, by which he wants to bring us to the point that self-love is our concern, and thus he makes us guilty of the commandment of God. But what good would it do if you were to occupy yourself with this thought even to the end of the race? Nothing would follow from it; you would not become certain, nor would God think differently about you.

Therefore, against this work of the fools, and against the devil that instigates such things, you shall hurl in the face the thunderbolts of Scripture. First of all this word, Ps. 1, 2: "Blessed is he who speaks the law of the Lord (not his own understanding) day and night," and this saying, Sir. 6, 37: "Always remember God's commandments, and always remember His word." Ex. 13, 9: "Therefore it shall be a sign in your hand, and a memorial before your eyes." And Matth. 7, 21: "Not all who say to me, 'Lord, Lord,' will enter the kingdom of heaven, but those who do the will of my Father in heaven," and many such sayings.

238 For God demands nothing else than that we do His will with constant concern. If

If we do this, the commandment will be fulfilled by itself, without us having to worry about it. But that man of traffic wants you to be concerned first about yourself and lastly about God's commandments, so that you will prefer yourself to your God in this way, and not love him above all else, and even not have a God. For if those hardly persevere who most zealously cling to God's commandments, where will those remain who leave them and allow themselves to be mixed up in strange and useless thoughts? So you should say to the devil or to your heart: God has not commanded this, but has told me to hope; only with this task I want to occupy myself; even if I wanted that, I would not be able to do it.

Secondly, that this thought is not from God, you can also easily see from this sign that the devil is plotting two very great evils against you with these proposals; first, that you should tempt God, which he also had in mind with Christ on the pinnacle of the temple. For he endeavors to occupy thee with this issue, that thou shouldest desire to be sure of thine ordinance, or to see a sign from heaven. For what is it to be anxious about one's destiny but to be impatient because of the uncertainty of the divine counsel? But what does this impatience do but tempt God by desiring to be certain of God's counsel as far as one's own person is concerned? In short, such a person has a hatred for God, that he is God, because he does not want to know anything other than what he knows.

240. Therefore, you must confront this terrible sin with the word of God, as Christ did when He said [Matt. 4:7], "It is written: Thou shalt not tempt God thy Lord." For thou must not desire to know his secrets, which he willed that thou shouldest not know, and be joyful in this his will, which he commanded thee to observe in all things. But if you love this will of his hidden counsel, you are already provided. Thus from the keeping of his commandments follows of itself, without all our care, what we seek so anxiously and in vain by wrongful effort before the commandments, and yet never because the commandment of God is the way to God. If we have lost that way and seek another, trying to do so out of the devil's temptation by caring for our salvation and happiness, we will inevitably fall into error and lose both the way of God and the way that is far away, and thereby also both our salvation and our happiness.

The other exceedingly great evil is that the devil is trying to bring you into the same deep fall that he himself has done and into which he has plunged Adam. For what else does he intend with this concern for your welfare than that you should desire (as we have said) to know God's counsel? But to desire to know God's counsel is to desire to be like God, as He desired, saying [Isa. 14:13, 14], "I will ascend into heaven, and be like the Most High," and to Adam [Gen. 3:5], "Ye shall be like God, and know what is good and what is evil." And this again is that you do not want GOtt to be your GOtt fei, which is the greatest of all sins. And so you see how cunningly he incites you against the commandments of your God by these abominations, so that you do the same fall that he has done.

Therefore, he must also be struck down here with the words of God, which say, Proverbs 25:27: "He who eats too much honey is not good; and he who studies hard things is too hard for him. And Sir. 3,¹) 22-26.: "Stand not in high estate, nor think beyond thy ability; but what God hath commanded thee, of that always take hold. For it is not good for thee to look for that which thou hast not been commanded to do. And that which is not thy commandment, thou shalt not be presumptuous. For you are commanded to do more than you can do. Such arrogance has deceived many, and their presumption has overthrown them."

243 Since these commandments of God forbid this rash concern for the works of God, which are shown to us to be beyond our comprehension and understanding, and His judgments are incomprehensible, we must rather practice the commandments of God with fear, so that we may confidently hope in Him, and drive these impossible endeavors back on the devil's head, and with Joab, 2 Sam. 10, 12., confidently, prepared for God's work, say: "Be confident, and let us be strong. But let the Lord do what pleases Him." O a fine example! If he had previously disputed whether the victory with God would be provided beforehand, he would not have fought, but rather he would have become careless through disputing and would have done strange things, but would have been shamefully defeated.

244 And here behold our exceedingly great folly, our utterly foolish folly, our unspeakable folly. We take wives, we build houses, we plant vineyards, we buy goods, and no one disputes here beforehand whether it is proper or not, whether the woman will be chaste or an adulteress, whether the house will burn or remain, whether the goods will perish or endure. In short, all our works, but especially our sins, we confidently begin and carry out without worrying about what God has provided for these things. Here His supreme counsel is quite safe from our iniquity; everyone thinks about it, makes it his business, and strives to carry out what he has undertaken before he inquires or disputes about the oversight.

Why does this happen? Because it is not commanded by God, it is certainly our thing, chosen by us. But when it comes to the works of God and His commandments, this question immediately arises, the counsel of God is attacked, yes, we first begin to debate whether we should obey God's commandments before we know His secrets. Does this not anger the divine majesty with the most bitter perversity, that we are so patient and careless (obliviosi) about his counsel in our own affairs, and so impatient and forward in his? Is it not so that, just as no leaf of a tree falls to the earth without his will, so also your soul cannot be 2) blessed without his counsel? Nor will a hair grow on your head without his counsel;

2) It seems to us that a HON is to be put before Ü6t, or at least must be added from the preceding.

1) In the Latin editions: Cooles. 30.

Without it, you eat no bread and drink no drink. Here you do not argue, here you do not hesitate, here you do not tremble, here you do not care about his advice, but immediately go to work; but there you are completely full of questions and hesitation.

At least now recognize that these thoughts did not come to you from God, but from the devil, who at that time was very angry and extremely cunning, so that he would draw you away from the commandment and the most loving will of your dear God through unnecessary things. Quite rightly and very appropriately, Ecclesiastes says Cap. 11, 4. f.: "He who looks at the wind does not sow, and he who looks at the clouds does not reap. Just as you do not know the way of the wind and how the bones are prepared in the womb, so you cannot know God's work, which He does everywhere."

What is the situation now? Shall we do nothing because he does everything and we do not know it? Far be it from us; for it follows [Eccl. 11:6], "Sow thy seed early, and let not thine hand depart in the evening: for thou knowest not whether this or that shall come to pass (that is, that which is sown in the morning, or that which is sown in the evening); and if either come to pass, so much the better." You see how God teaches us that we do not know everything and yet we should not desist, but rather He commands us to work all the more because we do not know what will happen, while those wicked people do not want to do anything because they do not know what will happen.

For this is what the devil seeks, that they should work nothing in life, nor sleep in hope and peace in death, and at both times be rebellious and disobedient against God for God's sake, yet in such a way that it is not they who are to blame, but God Himself, since He no sooner invalidated His counsels by revelation and nullified the glorious majesty of His divinity by invalidating His counsels than He weighed them [these people] down with His commandments. For these exceedingly holy people would then have gladly done everything that was commanded, if only they had first known what God intended of them, that is, if they had not had a God and a commandment-giver; for he could not have done what was commanded.

not be God either, if He is, thinks and knows no differently than we are.

But again, if God revealed His counsel to us, we would first become fearful, then despisers or despairing people, just as there are people now who think it is harmful to preach grace and providence, because many are offended by it. Thus, man, who is dust, acts sacrilegiously against all that God wills and does, and is heated only by this one thing, that he is without the fear of God, that is, without God. For God could not be feared if he did not think secret things about us; then neither faith, nor hope, nor love would have any place. Woe to you, you raging wickedness!

250 Let us return to hope to finally put an end to the long speech. There are two things to consider in hope: our merits and the divine promise. Between these two things you must place hope in such a way that you know that hope is based on the promise, and from hope comes merit, so that merit is the work of hope, but hope is the work of the word or promise.

Therefore, in order that you may hope, it is not necessary that you have merit, but rather that you look with sincere simplicity to the word of promise, which is given to you freely by grace, so that by hoping in it you may then bring about merit. This is also what the apostle Paul does, who in his letter to the Galatians does almost nothing else than to prove that our righteousness does not flow from the law or from works, but from the promise of God who blesses. For this mercy of God, which by grace makes the promise, and the truth, which fulfills the promise, are the causes of hope. By these the heart is stirred to hope, to call, and to live well; if these were not and had not been revealed to us, neither faith nor hope would have any place.

Therefore, what faith and hope have to do with (objectum) is God, who gives the promise by grace, or only the word of the Promising One, and nothing else. If one does not pay attention to this everywhere and always, hope must fall away at the same time, just as a house built on the sand must fall as soon as the waters and the winds strike it. For upon this rock of promise and infallible word is the church of Christ built, as it is said, Prov. 18:10: "The name of the Lord is a stronghold; the righteous runneth and is protected," and also in the 61st Psalm, v. 4: "For thou art my confidence, a strong tower before mine enemies." Here nothing of merits is mentioned, but only God is remembered and His name, that the prophet should put his confidence (spem) in it.

It follows, then, that hope does not come from merit, but on the contrary, merit from hope, or hope from hope in hope, so that it is there before merit, with merit, after merit, just as we do not grasp righteousness in this life, but only strive for it, always seeking it, always desiring to be justified, always desiring that our sins be forgiven, always asking that the will of our Father in heaven be done, always that His name may be hallowed. And just by this we are nevertheless counted righteous by God, as He says [Matth. 5, 6.]: "Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness." Thus it will also be rightly understood that hope always increases of itself, in that the tribulations have the same effect, if only they are borne in such a way that we are found approved.

It can be seen from this that the other virtues can perhaps be perfected by doing, but faith, hope and love can only be perfected by suffering; I say, by suffering the work of God within. For the works of the other virtues are the fruits of faith, hope, love, as if you were to see faith incarnate, hope incarnate, love incarnate; and in general they practice only gross works.

255. and here the bride of christ defiles

again her feet, of which she boasts that she washed them, and again puts on the skirt of which she boasts that she took it off, since this cannot be done without infirmity, which is done through the corrupt flesh. But it is seen that the work of faith, hope and love is the same. For what is faith but the movement of the heart which is called believing, hope but the movement which is called hoping, love but the movement which is called loving? For I believe that these are human dreams (phantasmata), that the habitus is something other than the active occurrence (actus)¹) of them, especially in these divine virtues, in which there is nothing but suffering, a pulling, a movement, by which the soul is moved, shaped, purified, and impregnated with the word of God, so that in general what these virtues have to do with is nothing other than the purification of the by, as Christ says, so that he, purified, may bear more fruit [Joh. 15, 2.].

Finally, the other virtues have to do with gross, bodily things, externally, but those internally with the pure word of God, by which the soul is seized, but not grasped, that is, its skirt and shoes are taken off, it is stripped of all things and ideas (phantasmatibus), and is carried away by the word (to which it is attached, yes, by which it is seized and whimsically led) "into the wilderness" (as Hosea says, Cap. 2, 14.), into the invisible, into the chamber [Hohel. 1, 4.], into the wine cellar [Hohel. 2, 4.].

But this leading, this pulling, this purification tortures them miserably. For the way is steep and narrow, to leave everything visible, to be deprived of all one's senses, to be led out of everything one is used to: yes, that means dying and descending into hell. For it seems to her as if she is perishing from the bottom up, since everything is taken away from her, on which she relied (stetit), with which she dealt, on which she hung; she touches neither the earth nor heaven, feels neither herself nor God, and says [Hohel. 5, 8.]: "Tell my friend that I am in love with him.

1) The oadtus here is: faith, hope, love; the aetus: believe, hope, love.

sick," as if she wanted to say: I have become nothing, and have not known it; entered into darkness and gloom, I see nothing; by faith, hope, and love alone I live, and am weak (that is, I suffer), for when I am weak, then am I strong [2 Cor. 12:10].

This "leading" is what our mystical theologians call: going into darkness, rising above being and non-being (super ens et non ens). But I do not know whether they understand themselves when they attribute this to the actions of the soul (actibus elicitis)¹ and do not rather believe that the sufferings of the cross, death and hell are indicated by it. The cross alone is our theology.

From this, I think, the apostle's word can be understood, how hope is the work of patience proven through tribulation [Rom. 5:4], because through all this man is, as it were, perfected, adorned, finished, 2) like a vessel by the hand of the Master, so that he stands out far above what is visible and what can be understood, having learned to trust not in merit but in God alone. Just as a golden vessel is prepared by fire and hammering for the honest use of its master, not that it may either retain its color or perform any work of its nature (for it is gold); for it is not as gold but as a vessel that it has this use; nor has it been adorned that it might become gold, but it has been prepared that it might become a vessel for use: Thus a man is prepared for God's use by hope alone; but not works prepare hope, for that would be to make the former out of the latter.

For this reason I like very much the way of speaking of the Scripture, which describes this purification and effect of hope by the word "exit" (exitus). Prov. 25, 4. 5.: "Remove the foam from the silver, and it becomes a pure vessel (egreditur). Do wickedness from the king, and his throne shall be established with righteousness." And of the golden calf 2 Mos. 32, 24. is said after

1) Dgl. Ps. 14,? 10 ff.

2) sxtUuEur here has the same meaning as in Cicero: xuiūs ex ovis - to hatch eggs.

The same way of speaking is said (in the Vulgate), that it "came forth" (egressus), that is, prepared. Hence the word at Holy Baptism, Ps. 121, 8]: "The Lord keep thy entrance and thy exit", that is, the beginning and the end of the challenge, as St. Augustine speaks of it.

For this reason it is a mistake to say that free will has an active part (activitatem) in a good work, when we speak of an inward work. For the will, which we have just called "believing, hoping, loving," is a movement, a drawing, a leading of the Word of God, and a kind of constant purification and renewal of the mind and senses, from day to day, toward the knowledge of God. Although this suffering is not always equally strong, it is always suffering. "Behold, as the clay is in the potter's hand (says Jeremiah Cap. 18, 6.), so are ye of the house of Israel in mine hand." Dear, what active part does the clay have when the potter gives it a form? But through this suffering it comes out of its shapelessness to the form that is similar to the one that the master had in his imagination.

Thus, through hope, which comes through the effect of tribulation, we are conformed to the divine image and (as Paul says) created in the image of Him who created us [Col. 3:10]. But of the will, which has become flesh or has come out in the outward work (effusa), it can rightly be said that it cooperates and has an active part; just as a sword in its movement does nothing at all, but acts only as a sufferer, but in inflicting the wound it has helped the one who cuts with it by its movement (cooperatus est). Therefore, just as a sword does nothing to help it move, so the will does nothing to help it will (ad suum velle). This willing is the movement which the divine word brings forth, a mere suffering echoing of the will, which then cooperates in the work of the hands, by praying, walking, working 2c.

But now I have digressed more than enough, at last let us return to the Psalm.

V. 12. Let all who trust in you rejoice; let them glory forever.

First we want to see the meaning of the words, then the reason the prophet had to speak this way. Only "those who trust in him" (sperantes) will rejoice. But who these are who trust in him, we have already said enough. And it is said: "in you", not in their thing, not in any creature, since there are people who also trust in men. It is to be noted that XXXX, which is very frequent in Scripture and is translated: eternally, everlastingly, without end, always and forever (in aeternum, semper, in saeculum, in saeculum saeculi), and the like, in Hebrew, according to the idiom peculiar to that language, denotes a time of uncertain and indefinite duration, but not exactly eternity (aeternitatem) everywhere. Therefore in the law of Moses it is often said [2 Mos. 12, 14, 28, 43.]: "This shall be with you and all your descendants for ever", while all their things should finally cease. This seems to me to be not improperly expressed in Latin by the words semper, perenniter, perpetua; in German by: "immerdar," or "always and forever." For thus we speak in German what is written in the 103rd Psalm, v. 9: Non in perpetuum irascetur, neque in aeternum comminabitur, "will not be angry to the end, nor will it be everlasting".

But what caused the prophet to express these thoughts of his heart so abundantly? Certainly the conduct of the wicked, whom he saw (as Job chap. 21, 13 says) grow old in good days, and that they lived as if it were theirs alone to rejoice, be glad and boast. This is such a deceitful and effective trouble that even many prophets complain that they have been challenged and afflicted by an adverse fate (atra nemesi). For just as distress arises from the glittering of works and temporal merits, so also from the glittering of temporal rewards. Therefore, the 73rd Psalm, vv. 1-6, says of them: "Yet Israel has God for comfort whoever is pure in heart. But I almost stumbled with my feet, my footsteps almost slipped. For it grieved

I was on the glorified ones when I saw that the wicked were doing so well. For they are not in any journey of death, but stand fast as a palace. They are not in misfortune like other people, and are not afflicted like other people. Therefore their defiance must be a delicious thing" 2c.

265 And the prophet Jeremiah says Cap. 12, 1: "Why do the wicked prosper, and the scornful have all the abundance?"

And in the 144th Psalm they say, v. 14, 15: "There is no harm, no loss" 2c. "Blessed are the people," they say, "who thus prosper."

But Job, Cap. 21, 7, speaks of this in more detail. 21, 7: "Why then do the wicked live, grow old, and increase in goods?" 2c.

The prophet speaks against these appearances, glitter and distractions and draws the godly people away from them, so that they despise the pleasures of those people and turn to the true joy that is in God. Therefore, one must notice throughout this verse a twofold contrast, from this way: We seem to them to be sad because we suffer, being deprived of goods, while those rely on them and are joyful; both of these, when perceived with the senses, annoy very many and deceive them. But inwardly, where we live in hope and they are dead, we are joyful and will be joyful, but they are neither joyful nor will they be joyful. But our joy is so exceedingly true and firmly founded that of it alone it must be rightly said, "They will rejoice" (laetabuntur), while the joy of those people is more a sadness, if you look at the inward.

Thus he completely condemns the joy of the wicked, and praises the joy of the godly. Since the latter has no outward appearance, but the latter has a great appearance, faith is necessary (the prophet, filled with the spirit [in spiritu positus], speaks words of the spirit); otherwise you will not understand it either, and you will be annoyed by their annoyance. For the carnal man can understand nothing of that which is of God, that is, that there is joy in the deprivation of all goods, even spiritual goods, since he can understand nothing of joy in the deprivation of all goods.

unless the good is presently there and is perceptibly possessed by the senses. But we must boast of the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ (Gal. 6:14).

Since the Hebrews use the future indicative instead of the optative, which they do not have, and since we have seen from what has been said that all the emotions (affectus) in this psalm glow with an extraordinary zeal, it is reasonable (sanum) to understand this verse as being spoken out of the zeal of a holy indignation, and to say something like this: What do these wicked ones rage about? What do they deceive the souls of men with their exceedingly wicked outward appearance? I beseech thee, O Lord, condemn them and their joy, cast them out, expose their hypocrisy, let them fall from their shells, that only those may rejoice who hope in thee, that it may be known and known by all that there is no joy anywhere but in thy great goodness. O Lord, it burns me too much that I cannot persuade them of this, that they do not hear; therefore judge them and expose their vain nature and our truth.

And so we have where and what true joy is, namely, confidence in God's goodness and a confident conscience. For this is also said by those who have experienced it, that there is no greater joy than a clear conscience, nor greater sorrow than a troubled conscience, as the wise man says [Prov. 15:15]: "A good courage is a daily comfort," and Ps. 26:3: "For thy lovingkindness is before mine eyes, and I walk in thy truth."

For a happy and pure conscience cannot come from any other source than by beholding the goodness of God, as it is said in the 4th Psalm, v. 7, 8: "Lord, lift up the light of your countenance upon us. You make my heart glad." But in what do those have their joy? In much grain and wine and oil, that is, in the joy of the sows, in the satisfaction of the body.

273. "Eternally let them praise." This word Jerome has not badly translated thus, "Forever shall they praise." For it is thought that by this is signified the joy which is expressed by the voice (vocalem), whether by singing or by speaking, as we, when we

We are accustomed to do this when we are happy, either by speaking sweetly, or by singing, chatting, praising or extolling what we are happy about, as it says in the 51st Psalm, v. 16: "Let my tongue extol your righteousness," that is, praise with joy.

274 So if the word "eternally" belongs to "let them rejoice" or "let them boast," the prophet persists in his zeal and strife as if to say: Let them gossip in their things, boast of themselves and their own, sing to themselves: not only will they not boast and rejoice in truth, but they will not rejoice forever. "The joy of the hypocrite (as it is said in the book of Job Cap. 20, 5.) lasts a moment," and Job 21, 13. [Vulg.]: "They grow old in good days, and in a moment they go down to hell."

275. Their boasting is so uncertain and inconstant, but it is not lasting either, since it is clouded by many sad incidents. But however well everything may go, the end of their joy is sadness, and their foolishness will be revealed, as happened to Jannes and Jambres [2 Tim. 3, 8. f.]. Why do these wretched people deceive and corrupt themselves? But they that trust in thee shall rejoice and be glad for ever: and there shall no stranger be mixed among them (as the wise man saith [Prov. 14:10, Vulg.]).

Here we see the fruits from which we can know if we are in grace (as they say): "The fruit of the Spirit is joy," Gal. 5:22. And there is no reason why we should say that we do not know this. If joy is eternal and constant, and the praise of GOD endures, even in suffering, this cannot be a deceptive sign. For "by their fruits you shall know them" Matth. 7, 16]. The cross proves everything. Therefore, if you can say with the 18th Psalm, v. 4: "I will praise and call upon the Lord, and I shall be saved," you will be blessed in truth. Because the joy of the wicked cannot endure this cross, they do not rejoice forever and ever.

277] The other fruit that follows is [talking about God's word], speaking gladly, preaching sweetly, hearing the word of Christ, praising His righteousness, singing about His goodness, and on the other hand.

abhor the ungodly fables, evil talk, lewd words, and such like yeasts of the world. Can we not perceive this with our senses, especially if we have been challenged for this, if we have been forbidden this, if for this reason we have suffered either hatred, reviling, terror, or some other evil? For even then this will be an unmistakable sign that Christ lives in you, if you persist in praising, extolling and glorifying the grace of God against the hope of men.

Therefore he did not connect "eternal" with the word "praise" in vain, because the joy of the spirit, which bursts outward, arouses many adversaries of the truth, as we see that this happened to the apostles, Acts 2, 13, 4, 5, 18. 2, 13. 4, 2. 5, 18. 1) 2c., and because some are found praising Christ, the goodness, truth, righteousness and grace of God, but not eternally, because they do not trust in Him enough, nor rejoice in Him enough, for in time of temptation they fall away, nor persevere in the face of wickedness, nor dare to praise God (that is, the grace of God) either everywhere, or against all, or at all times.

There are also many such people today who tell the truth only to the common man (vulgo), who suffers everything, not to those from whom they fear to suffer persecution, to whom they should tell it above all. But if you tell them the truth, they are the rulers of the people, they will expel you from the synagogue, put you under ban, and drive you out to the city. - Listen to what follows:

For you shield them 2).

280 Jerome translates this: And you will protect them. If the Lord is the protector, who can be responsible? And if it were not such a great thing to praise God's goodness against the wicked and the liars, it would not have been necessary to give us this encouraging promise. For he knows that the gates of hell will rise up against our joy; but

1) In the editions, 3 is added, but there is nothing like that in this chapter.

2) In the Vulgate: et datütadis in eis --- and you will dwell in them.

Be confident, "the God of Jacob is our protection", they will not overpower us. He himself wants to dwell in us. "He that is in us," says John (1 Ep. 4, 4.), "is greater than he that is in the world." [Rom. 8, 31.:] "If GOD is for us, who may be against us?"

In consulting the Hebrew, I find here the verbum that constitutes a complete concept (absolutum), which is also set in the 2nd Psalm, v. 6: "But I have appointed my king," of which Reuchlin says that it means as much as to decree, to appoint, to set before. Therefore, according to the peculiarity of the Hebrew language, "Thou shalt dwell in them" means as much as: You will make an order over them, you will make regulations over them (constitues), you will be a steward over them, you will provide for them, you will govern them, which Jerome has rendered correctly, but not completely: You will protect them, for the meaning of the Hebrew word extends further.

282 So also this word is a complete term (absolutum): "Let them praise" (exsultabunt), or: They will praise (laudabunt), as if he wanted to say: They will be and shall be preachers and proclaimers of the good news (evangelisatores, which comes very close to the meaning 3) of this word). For evangelisare means to preach a cheerful, pleasant, lovely, good word, which, as we have said, is what the Hebrew word means. But the cheerful word is nothing else than the forgiveness of sins, the great goodness of GOD, the consolation of a sorrowful conscience. But what happens to these preachers and to those who praise this grace, we see in the apostles and martyrs and all the saints. Again, how Christ dwells in them, reigns and sustains them, we know. But who will dwell in those? Who will protect them? Who will govern them? They do not need that, they are strong, they are the giants of the earth, they are the mighty gates of hell, the chair of the devil, because he is the prince of the world and dwells in them. Now follows the second part of this verse:

3) Weimarian: gi'niüeatio instead of: significato. But this is corrected in the supplements.

Let those who love your name be glad (gloriabuntur) in you.

Although Jerome correctly translates: And they will rejoice (laetabuntur) who love your name, our [Latin] translator has nevertheless beautifully rendered the Hebrew word, which expresses a different kind of joy than the first word laetabuntur. And as I let myself think (sicut mihi divinat meus morpheus), that [laetari] actually means to rejoice, to take joy in oneself and to have it, but this [gloriari], to express joy and to rejoice, and as it were to make joyful, or as the Latins say: jucundum esse. Now when any one is rejoiced in himself of his joy (jucundus est), there is joy with gladness (gaudium in gaudio), whereof the 68th Psalm, v. 4., says, "They shall rejoice from the heart," and Ps. 21:7, "Thou rejoicest him with gladness" (laetificabis eum in gaudio). Otherwise we are (as it is thought) glad for ourselves, joyful for others. Thus it is said in 1 Sam. 2, 1: "My heart is glad in the LORD," that is, pleasing (jucundum) [to him]. And 1 Chron. 17, 32: "Let the field be glad, and all that is therein," as that poet figuratively said of glad seeds, because they make us glad by their sweetness.

But I am foolish to struggle so much with the words, since there are many others in this language which denote cheerfulness, the constant different meanings of which I neither can nor will teach; it is enough that one should only express the opinion that this kind of joy here present belongs to the grateful disposition by which we are filled with gratitude and joy toward the benefactor from whose gift our joy derives. Through this gratitude we are pleasant to our benefactor, and correspond to his wishes, as a happy field to him who cultivates it. And that this is understood in this way is seen by this sign, that in the beginning of this verse the word "let all rejoice" (et laetabuntur) is put without a closer determination (absolute), but here "let rejoice be in you" (et laetabuntur in teo), so that in the former word he says indicates the feeling of gratitude in general (absolute), but in the latter the received benefit is referred to the benefactor with joyful gratitude. For that one rejoices over a benefit is also shown in the 122nd Psalm, v. 1: "I rejoice in that which is spoken to me," 2c., where the word is found which is set in the beginning of this verse. I do not say that this is peculiar to the two words according to a continuous (constanti) rule, but that they can be so distinguished in this place by the fact that in the one case another word is governed by the verb (ex regimine), in the other case a closer determination is not added (et absoluto statu). For in the 32nd Psalm, v. 11. [Vulg.], "Rejoice in the Lord," and Ps. 97, 12. [Vulg.] The same word is found in the 32nd Psalm, v. 11 [Vulg.]: "Rejoice in the Lord" and Ps. 97, 12 [Vulg.]: "Ye righteous, rejoice in the Lord" with a different governed word (cum regimine), with which this verse begins without a closer determination (absolute), unless this makes a rule that one should rejoice in the Lord, just as those would say that one should rejoice in the good deed without a thankful disposition.

1) Virgil,

But this meaning fits very well to the sense. For as in the first part of this verse the prophet described joy in affliction, so in this last part he describes joy in well-being, or joy in gladness, which is not true nor sincere unless a man rejoices in the Lord, as Isaias says [Cap. 61, 10.], "I rejoice in the Lord." All this cannot be better understood (as has been said) than if we set before us, with the prophet, the perverse kind [Deut. 32, 5. 20.] in regard to which one would have to completely reverse this whole verse, since in repugnance, instead of being joyful, they grieve and despair of GOD, nor do they boast eternally by speaking good of GOD, but constantly grumble by speaking evil of GOD. Therefore, God does not protect them and does not dwell in them. On the other hand, in good days they burst forth and boast greatly, not in the Lord, but in themselves and their works; they please themselves, they admire their own, for they love their name, and seek their honor, so that one may speak of them with right could reverse this whole verse from such people in this way: And all shall be afflicted that put not their trust in thee; always shall they murmur, and thou shalt forsake them; and they shall glory in themselves that love their name.

Therefore the spirit of the prophet distinguishes and paints in this verse briefly and beautifully (mire) in an exceedingly suitable way both kinds of time, both kinds of people, both kinds of mind and works by a very appropriate contrast. For it is impossible that he should not be afflicted who does not trust in the Lord whenever any affliction comes. But a man who is sorrowful cannot but murmur continually, since the praise of God is nothing without gladness of heart. But inevitably, such a sad and impatient person who grumbles against God must also displease God and be more and more abandoned by God. For God does not dwell in Babylon, but in Salem, that is, His place is in peace, Ps. 76, 3. and on him who is quiet and humble rests His Spirit, Isa. 66, 2.

On the other hand, it is impossible that he who trusts in the Lord should not rejoice, even though the whole world would fall to pieces and collapse, for the debris would fall on a man who does not fear. But he who is joyful cannot but think good of God, praise His praise, and encourage himself. Therefore, this patient and cheerful person who praises God is worthy of God's protection and dwelling in him, and will not admit that he rejoices, hopes and boasts in vain, but will surely receive it. And this is the crossroads where the bloodthirsty and the false separate themselves from the merciful and those who are well pleased [with the will of God], as far as the time of darkness (nubilum) and the hour of trial are concerned.

Therefore, as I have often said, our Saul has no better remedy against the evil spirit from the Lord than for our David to take up the strings and play with his hand [1 Sam. 16:23], that is, when thy soul is troubled, begin some sweet song or remembrance of thy God, and immediately you will feel relief, and you will learn that the counsel of the wise man is proven [Sir. 11, 26.]: "When you are in trouble, remember that you can be well again," and again [Cap. 30, 25.]: "For sadness kills many people, and yet serves nowhere." For here in sadness music (also contrary to the proverb [: There is no cheerful head upon a sad heart]) 1) is the most suitable entertainment, as the prophet says in the 43rd Psalm [v. 5.], "Why dost thou afflict thyself, O my soul, and art so troubled within me? Wait upon GOD; for I shall yet thank him, that he is my help and my GOD."

Again, it is impossible that he who loves and seeks not God's name but his own name and honor, as often as any fortunate circumstance occurs, should not please himself, should not blow himself out, should not boast, should not rejoice in himself. But he who is pleased with himself in his well-being, what else should he do but, as the proverb says, "One ass weeds another," speak good of those who speak good of him and praise those who praise him, and those in turn speak good of him who speaks good of them and praise him who praises them, as it is said in the 10th Psalm, v. 3. Psalm, v. 3: "The sinner is praised in his wicked lusts, and good is spoken of the wicked," "Godfather over the fence," and again. And this is the utmost that they can do, that is, to be stingy with vain honor, to boast, to glory in themselves; their end will be in shame [Phil. 3:19].

On the other hand, it is impossible for anyone who loves not his own name but God's, however wholesome and blissful life may smile upon him, to please himself, to take pleasure in himself, or to boast. But the one who displeases himself for this reason and thinks less of himself must necessarily seek and love only God's name, praise and honor, and say: "Hallowed be your name," but let my name and the name of all men be profaned [Song of the Three Men, v. 58]: "Let all his works praise the Lord"; but let no one praise the righteous but you alone; the blessing of the wicked is to be considered a curse.

1) Roth inserted this proverb.

2) Erlanger: lauäetur instead of: lauäatur.

290 Imagine, then, and notice, that the prophet (if you want to understand this verse) is standing in such a place, where he is challenged by a twofold trouble when he looks at the life of the wicked. One is that everything is unfavorable for him, further, that everything he says and does is considered foolishness and ungodliness, which moves him to sadness, impatience and despair. The other is that all kinds of happiness (omnia prospera) are abundantly returned to the ungodly, that everything they say and do is carried on, praised and already completely dedicated to immortality, which is the most frightening of all and arouses the most anger. Thereupon he [the prophet] speaks, indeed angrily, but he does not sin with it in his heart on his camp, is silent and, expecting the end [of this matter], speaks this verse. For if someone asks what one should speak with his heart on the camp, of which the 4th Psalm, v. 5, says, one answers rightly: Nothing else than what is taught in this verse, that he should comfort himself in the Lord, while those boast of themselves quite uselessly.

That is why he keeps a very appropriate order. For the challenge on the left is the earlier and less dangerous, because on that side only a thousand fall; but on the right ten thousand fall. The latter is also much more difficult and dangerous, and only those who have been long exercised by the former have to endure it.

Each of these two temptations is a kind of furnace that serves to prove, as it is written, Sir. 27, 6: "As the furnace proves the new pots, so the tribulation proves a man's mind." Concerning the second tribulation, it is said, Prov. 27:21: "A man is proved by the mouth of praise, as silver in a crucible, and gold in a furnace." In what way? Certainly in such a way that in the former a man is found who is sorrowful and murmurs [against God], but in the latter a glorious man who loves his name and speaks well of himself; and as in the former quite actually the fall of the great multitude takes place and of those whom we despise as sinners, so in the latter there is a very severe destruction of the fat in Israel and the elect, and those whom we honor as wise and righteous, that is, the wicked, as it is said in Ps. 78, 31: "And strangled the noblest of them, and struck down the best of Israel," and Isa. 5, 14: "Their glorious and joyful ones shall go down" (that is, to hell).

God has always struck the great and the rulers so much, that He might frighten us and recommend humility as the safest thing, so that the 76th Psalm, v. 13, actually says of the great: "He who takes away the courage of princes, and is terrible among the kings of the earth. But even so God does not judge the tyrants. For of whom, who was counted among the noblest, does one read in the holy Scriptures that he did not bring his honor into everyone's mouth (nobilitarit) by some outstanding case, if you count from Adam to Peter? Namely, God took such great care that the great ones were humbled, since it was necessary for the salvation of the inferiors that they be granted the great prestige (prosperitatem) of honor and dignity, so that they would not become such people who loved their own honor and sought to exalt their own name. Again, one or the other of the common people is hardly remembered who made a bad name for himself by an evil deed, like Achan [Jos. 7, 1.], and the man, 4 Mos. 15, 32. who picked up wood on the Sabbath.

Here we must discuss the question of what "the name of the Lord is," about which many people have written many things, even in different languages. The Hebrews boast that they have ten names of God, as St. Jerome also testifies, among which they emphasize the one with great superstition, which they call Tetragrammaton, by whose power they promise themselves I do not know how much protection and effects, while in the meantime, through their godless unbelief and blasphemy of the name of Christ, they use the name of their God uselessly without ceasing, and are also concerned about nothing less than that they bring about the salvation of souls through the name of the Lord. Their superstition has also spread to the Christians, so that they praise, engrave and attach these four letters everywhere.

But they do not care whether they themselves are godless or godly, presuming, as magicians do, that they have miraculous powers in letters and signs.

But we must know this, as befits Christians, that without the godliness of faith everything is superstitious and damnable, so completely that neither Christ nor God Himself can serve anyone for salvation if one does not have Him in faith. Therefore, every name of God, yes, every word of God, has an almighty power for the salvation of body and soul, if one possesses it in reverent faith. So it is not the name, but faith in the name of the Lord that does everything; nor is one name more effective than another. For if the name Tetragrammaton alone has such great power, the church acts foolishly in that it does not bless, baptize and perform all its sacraments in this name, but in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit; and it would be something marvelous if the church of Christ, which has the Spirit of God, had not yet known this, since it knows everything that is of God.

If you now also want to say: The Tetragrammaton also contains all this in itself, and the perfections of all names, so that when the name of the Holy Trinity is mentioned, or of God, or of the Lord, then at the same time the Tetragrammaton is also mentioned. Why then is it separated from the other names? Why does it not work in all what it works separately? Or is it so holy, and the other names so unholy, that it is defiled when it is mixed among them, or so envious that it should envy the other this honor of power? So these may remain inventions of the Jews. The Christians should have a better knowledge (sapient), namely that all names of God have one and the same power, if one has the godly faith; without the same also the name of the holy trinity cannot be of use to you.

But since everything happened to them in the image, I do not want to deny, so that one may believe that not even the smallest letter nor a title was written in vain, that in the name Tetragrammaton a different and special image was displayed before the others.

which was to be revealed in the new testament. Therefore it was considered unpronounceable at that time, and still now it is considered so by the Jews, because they quite stubbornly detest the revealed secret of it. Therefore we also want to assume, whether to joke or also to do Kabbalah with them, that the name Tetragrammaton is a secret sign (symbolum) of the name of the holy Trinity, and the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, which is now revealed, was then preformed (adumbratum) under four letters. To make this probable, let us take our proof (arguemur) from the letters themselves, from their number and from their meaning.

The meaning is this: X the primordial beginning (principium), X this, X and, X this. 1) If this is put together according to the grammar and in Latin language, this sentence (oratio) results: Principium istius et istius [the primordial beginning this and this]. This fits in all pieces to the name of the Holy Trinity, because the Father in the Godhead is the primordial beginning of "this", namely of the Son, and "this", namely of the Holy Spirit. For these pronouns "this and this" designate the Son and the Holy Spirit somewhat obscurely, as was appropriate for this testament, in which the mystery of the Trinity was not to be revealed, but only indicated. But also the name of the Father is not clearly expressed, although it is made known through the name principium more than the Son and the Holy Spirit, in which it is also indicated that no one (as Christ says Matth. 11, 27.) knows the Father nor the Son, unless it has been revealed to him, since even today the mystery of the Holy Trinity is not known, although the name has come to light, unless the Holy Spirit teaches it.

It is therefore clear that to those under the name Tetragrammaton the number of the divine persons and their nature are not differently prefigured, as to us under the name Trinity,

1) This sentence is correctly interpung only in the Basel and Weimar editions. In the Wittenberg and Jena editions: Vat, et He ists. In the Erlangen edition: 1 et N ists.

so that, just as the word Trinity, when it is dissolved, will yield as its opinion: Father, Son and Holy Spirit, so also Tetragrammaton, when it is dissolved, will yield: the primordial beginning of this and this, somewhat obscurely, but still the same, because three persons are taught alike and a twofold exit (duae processiones), as in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.

Second, the number contains four. This is the first plane square, which consists of the first two simple, equal proportions, the former of which is: one to one; the latter: two to two. 1) Now the square is formed by the twofold exit (gemina processione) and the proportion of one to one and of two to two, beginning with unity and ending in quaternity. But these proportions are unequal according to arithmetic, but equal according to geometry; but this belongs to mathematics.

Thus, in the square of this divine name, the unity of the essence (substantiae) of the Father is indicated, from which [essence] One proceeds (procedit), the Son, who is equal to Him by the first simple proportion; but from both [the Father and the Son] the Holy Spirit proceeds by a second exit, being equal, as it were, to the Father and the Son by another simple proportion, just as the proportion of two to two, and of one to one, is geometrically equal. But since this simple proportion is the most perfect, the first, and the source and head of the proportions, where neither of the two parts is greater than the other, nor of one, nor of two, nor of one, nor of one.

1) We have followed here the reading of the Wittenberg and the Jena edition: oui eonstat duakus proportionibus simplis ashuualibus primis, Huarmn prior S8t uuii8 ad unum, xostsnor duorum ad duo, which (according to what is said in the following paragraphs) is the correct one. The Basel, the Weimar, and the Erlangen offer: qui constat duadus proxortionibus simplis primis, yuarmn prior est, uuii8 ad duo, posterior duorum ad yuatuor. We imagine that Luther, in what is said here, had approximately the idea expressed in the diagram below. The 'n' indicates the Father, the 'n' the Son, the 'TU' the Holy Spirit:

is surpassed (exceditur) by both in greatness, because one is equal to one in all things, and two to two: so it happens that the equality of the persons in the divine essence (in divinis), which exist by themselves (subsistentium) only by two exits (processiones) and not several, is indicated to the ancient Fathers in a hidden way by the secret sign (symbolo) of this very beautiful square or Tetragrammaton. For the Son is equal to the Father through the first exit; the Spirit is equal to both through the second exit.

Here one can also easily bring the four relations (relationes), which are quite common among theologians, the active begetting of the [Father] (generatio activa), the suffering begetting [of the Son] (generatio passiva), the active breathing [of the Father and the Son] (spiratio aotiva), the suffering breathing [of the Holy Spirit] (spiratio passiva), for these four constitute (that I say so) the Triune and One God, just as these four letters constitute His name.

Thirdly [we prove this] from the letters themselves and their kind. The first syllable ends the first proportion in the letter X,²) which is a gentle breath (lenis spiritus), so that it indicates that this going forth in the Godhead is not carnal, but spiritual and exceedingly kind and sweet; for the breath letter, when pronounced, is nothing else than a kind of sweet going forth of the wind or blowing, so that it signifies exceedingly appropriately this going forth of the Son. In the same way, the whole name in the second proportion is terminated by the same gentle breath, so that the second going forth may also be understood as a spiritual one, and not otherwise different from it than that it is the second and proceeds from the first; nor is the Spirit otherwise different from the Father and the Son than merely by proceeding from both. Since these exits are spiritual and of the most spiritual nature, the entire primordial beginning (principium) must necessarily flow into the entire highest being (principatum), so that it cannot be divided. Thus there is an ineffable majority in the simplest unity.

2) This confirms the reading we have adopted in the preceding.

This, I say, or something like it, seems to be depicted in the old Tetragrammaton; but now it is revealed in all languages, so that now the Tetragrammaton is not necessary, no more than the whole Hebrew language, to recognize God. This is supported by the fact that Burgensis says that for this reason the Tetragrammaton is said to be unpronounceable, because it does not have the descent of any Hebrew word, and one is also not able to recognize its meaning by analogy, so that it is obvious that according to divine counsel these Hebrew letters are indeed connected with each other, but nevertheless, as it were, a foreign expression was produced that did not belong to the Jewish people, which could not be designated (insignificabilem), just as one could produce from the Latin letters any expression that the grammarians do not know, only in order to designate and retain something (memorandi causa). This is what the Valentinians brought to bear, as can be seen, in their ἀβράζας, a Greek expression. 1)

It has been rightly said that the name of the Lord is unpronounceable, because at that time the mystery of the Trinity was not revealed, although it was darkly hinted at. It is also rightly said that only God was given this unique (unicum) name, and that it designates God according to His essence and inner nature. For in truth, God is in Himself nothing other than the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, the Trinity, and that which is said of birth 2) and departure. This cannot be found in any creature, therefore the Tetragrammaton cannot be attributed to it, while otherwise the names of a king, a lord, a god, a strong one, an exalted one, and other similar ones are applied to and attributed to those who stand in the place of God. For the outward works of God can be compared to angels and men, but a Trinity in unity they cannot be. There-

They can also manage the affairs (nominiibus) of God, but they cannot use the name Tetragrammaton and the Trinity.

From this, I believe, the difficulty of Ex 6, 2. f. can be easily solved, where many struggle what the spirit wants, since he says: "I am the Lord, and appeared to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, that I would be their almighty God, but my name XXX³) has not been revealed to them", while Gen 4, 1. and more often long before the name Tetragrammaton is set. I say: I do not believe that the letters are to be understood, namely, that they were not revealed to them, unless at that time the letters of his name had not yet been compiled (compositae) or written, but that he did not publish the meaning of this name, that is, the faith in the Trinity and the knowledge of Christ, neither in the time of the fathers, nor of Moses, nor of the whole Old Testament, but only let it be given in a hidden way (inspirari) and signified by images.

There are people who think that the Tetragrammaton is the name JESuS, with the letter X inserted, and I wish that this could be proven and would be true. But since the evangelist Matthew Cap. 1, 21. derives the name JESus from "to make blessed", in that the angel says to Joseph: "Thou shalt call his name JESus, for he shall save his people from their sins," but the Tetragrammaton (as I have said) is not derived from any other word, so it will be difficult to establish this, to say nothing of it, that in the Hebrew word, which means "to make blessed" (salutem) or a savior, the letter p is necessary and, as one says, essential (substantialis), which the Tetragrammaton does not allow, and therefore did not form the name JESus. But others may judge about this. This is said, so that one is aware of the superstition of the Jews.

295. What, therefore, is the name of GOD, of which the prophet says in this place that one should

1) The followers of Basilides (around 125 AD) used the word as their watchword, which contains the number 365 in Greek numerical letters.

2) Only the Weimar one has, according to the first edition: nativitate, the other editions: unitate.

3) 2 Mos. 6, 3. is written in the text rürv.

Because it is not just one name. Paul calls him 1 Tim. 1, 17 "the wise man", as he says: "the only wise man"; there, "the eternal king, the incorruptible and invisible one". In the same epistle Cap. 6, 15. 16. he says, "the blessed and alone mighty, who alone has immortality." John says 1 John 4:16: "God is love." Hebr. 11, 16. says: "God was not ashamed to be called the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob."

And how? if we bring in here the whole Dionysius about the divine names, and again what he has written about the mystical theology, until we leave GOtte no name? Since he cannot be grasped with the mind, how could he be pronounced with a name? But we want to leave it to other, idle people to play their games with this (speculanda); we want to take the name of the Lord here in a simple understanding, not for the [word] by which he is called, but for what is preached by him, according to the words Prov. 22, 1. [Vulg.]: "A good name is better than great riches," and the same Cap. 10, 7.: "The name of the wicked shall rot," and Ps. 22, 23.: "I will preach thy name unto my brethren."

The name of God is therefore a good rumor, praise, glory, honor, proclamation of God, as the 102nd Psalm, v. 22, clearly shows: "That they may preach the name of the Lord in Zion, and his praise in Jerusalem. Behold, he says, the name of the LORD and his praise are the same, and are preached by the same proclamation. Ps. 148,¹) 13.: "Let them praise the name of the LORD, for his name alone is high; his praise goes as far as heaven and earth."

Since God alone works everything in everything, it certainly follows that God alone deserves the name of all works. He alone, then, is good, wise, just, true, merciful, kind, holy, strong, Lord, Father, Judge, in short, everything that can be called anything, or everything that can be praised.

We therefore cannot presume anything of the name [of the same], and, as we are men who accomplish nothing but sin, lies, vanity, so also we have a stinking and shameful name, that all men are liars [Ps. 116:11], and all men are nothing at all [Ps. 39:12].

300) Therefore, our name is sin, falsehood, vanity, unrighteousness, wickedness, perversity, and everything that can only be said evil by someone. When we recognize and confess this, then we act rightly, for then we create, reject and lose ourselves, our works and our name; 2) We love, desire and seek GOD, GOD's works, GOD's name, saying with the 54th Psalm, v. 3. "Help me, GOD, by your name," as if to say: In my name I will perish, yes, I am 3) already lost, but in yours I will be blessed.

It is quite clear that the prophet speaks all this against the ungodly vain glory of the ungodly hypocrites. For as these have the impudence to justify themselves, like the Pharisee in the Gospel [Luc. 18, 11.] and Simon the leper [Luc. 7, 39.], so also this frenzy is found among them, that they boast of themselves and love and praise their name, treat all others with derision, accuse, judge and reproach the tax collectors and sinners with the worst names. But godly people and believers in God, when they boast, they boast in the Lord and ask that the name of the Lord be sanctified, praised and honored. With them one finds that they accuse themselves, judge, condemn, consider themselves inferior to all, put themselves at the bottom, and so do not know their name at all.

But even here the cross is the only judge and witness of the truth, since there are people who boast that they love the name of the Lord, with great confidence even on the paper: In the name of the LORD, and: Glory to God alone, likewise: To GOD be praise, and: In the name of JEsu, and the like; indeed, who does not make use of that apt and very Christian speech, used exceedingly frequently in ordinary life: Thanks be to God?

For what could be more blessed than the church today, if there were none of those who boast of this, and did not uselessly use the name of his Lord; but this is a rare bird. For if in truth they love the name of the Lord, and not rather their own, why then do they become unwilling, and take it with the greatest impatience, when they are called by their own name, that is, when they are called fools, or wicked men, or have some other swearword attached to them? Why then do they not recognize their name here, and say: Thanks be to God, and: Glory to God alone? Why do they resist so vehemently the truth that another says to their face, since they themselves say the same of themselves out of such a pure heart (as they gossip)? Therefore, the very cross shows that all men are liars, so that the psalmist rightly said, Ps. 116, 11.: "I said in my trembling, All men are liars."

304. You see, then, how suddenly [with man] the hatred of his name is changed into the very fiercest love of his name. At the same time, the false love of the name of GOD reveals itself, since he [man] becomes extremely impatient when the name of the LORD is taken away from him by another, whom he himself has continually, and in a lying manner, cast away from himself, and has rejected him from himself, saying: To GOD be the glory, and: Thanks be to GOD, but I am a sinner. Who would be able to perceive this attitude, which is hidden deep in the heart, if Christ did not take care to prove us through the cross and shame? And this is an excellent saying of Gregory: How each one is in himself in secret, this shows a disgrace that is inflicted on man. For then, instead of "Thanks be to God," blasphemy will soon ensue.

But this bouquet finds a little branch with which it can cover itself and excuse itself in sins; first, the word of Augustine: He who does not respect good gossip.

He is cruel; and again: A good conscience is necessary for you, your good reputation for your neighbor. Then the word 1 Petr. 4, 15. f.: "Let no one among you suffer as a murderer, or a thief, or an evildoer, or one who takes hold of a foreign office. But if he suffers as a Christian, let him not be ashamed, but let him honor God in such a case." But Jerome also teaches publicly that if one wants to cast suspicion of heresy on someone, he should not be patient.

First of all, here we are speaking in spirit with the prophet and before God. We are to be honest with everyone, not only before God, but also before all men, Rom. 12, 17. And 2 Cor. 4, 2: "We prove ourselves right in the sight of God against all men's consciences"; and 1 Thess. 5, 22: "Avoid all evil appearances." Christ also praises those who suffer persecution for the sake of righteousness, Matth. 5, 10.

It is quite true that we should not lie before men or acknowledge a false accusation, but rather die, like the woman who was beaten seven times [with the executioner's sword], of whom Jerome tells. But just as we must suffer death and any evil innocently for the sake of righteousness, so we must gladly suffer the damage to our name, not seek to defend it with impetuosity, or seek to repay the wrong done to us, but, innocent as we may be before men, confess before God that we have deserved much greater damage both to property and 1) life, as well as to our name. For we must acknowledge that just as good and life, so also a good name are good creatures and exceedingly good gifts from God. But we must not consider ourselves worthy of them, and not think that we are wronged if they are taken from us, but rather recognize ourselves unworthy of them all, and gladly do without them if God wills it.

Therefore, it is not necessary for you to confess that you are an adulterer or a murderer.

¹) It seems to us that after the context reruin et vitao should be read instead of: reruni vitas. It should also directly res 6t vitam.

You must not confess or acknowledge that you are innocent if you are not, or acknowledge such an accusation that is made against you; indeed, you must not confess or acknowledge it either, lest you lie in the same way as the one who is lying to you about this disgrace. And yet you must be composed and calm when you testify that you are innocent, but he will not believe you and nevertheless accuses you, just as you must not say that your life is nothing and your flesh is only a phantasm, or your gold is copper, so that you may show yourself humble, but you must confess these things as they [in truth] are, and yet, when they are taken from you, not resist, nor even reclaim, nor avenge yourself.

In this way you must not resist those who harm your good report and disparage you, even though you must testify to your innocence, nor confirm their lies by an ill-timed silence. This is what the Christians of Lyons in France once did: when they were accused of eating children in secret, they were constant to the point of death, and said no to it. And when Jeriah, Jer. 37, 13. ff, accused Jeremiah of wanting to flee to the Chaldeans, he answered, "It is not true, I will not fall to the Chaldeans." Nevertheless, since they did not believe him, he had to suffer being innocently beaten and thrown into prison. But Christ also constantly defended his doctrine before Annas, which he condemned by questioning him in an oblique manner; and yet he received a blow from the servant and suffered innocently that the same accusation was raised against him by the unbelievers.

(310) According to this rule we must also walk today, since the exceedingly ungodly flatterers of the great ones rush and rage, and insidiously call innocent good people names, that they are heretical, vexatious, erroneous, seditious, offensive to [pious] ears, disrespectful to the pope and disparage him, and the like, as they see fit.

These abominations, I say, must be suffered, but not acknowledged [as right]. If they now keep the upper hand and, with the rake

If they are not satisfied with the good name they have been given and continue to rage, we should confess to God that we are suffering what we have deserved, and that God's name, not ours, is being taken from us by force, and even justly, since we are not worthy of this name; but inwardly in faith and conscience and outwardly in confession we should cling to him most steadfastly. For it is not from us that they take away the good name, for it does not belong to us, but to God, through whose gift it was with us. Yes, they take away from themselves [to their detriment] our good name, since it was given to us for this reason, that through it they might be brought to God, instructed by the light of our good works, so that they might praise our Father in heaven. Nothing, then, is taken away from us by the good name, since they cannot take it away either in conscience or in confession, but can only extinguish it in their own opinion, and that to their own detriment, so that we must have more pity for their misery than that we should grieve over our harm. Since we now confess our innocence in this matter and with good cause reject the evil name from us, we do not serve ourselves but them, our slanderers, even against their will.

312. in this spirit, according to this guideline, these ostriches do not care for their name, but seek only that they may not suffer disgrace, and do not rest until they have subdued their adversaries (if they are able), and have recovered their name, by driving out violence by violence, according to the rule, or rather the error, of the jurists (juris). And lest by neglecting their good report (as they think) they should become cruel [§ 305], they become impious and cruel at the same time, by avenging their good name as if it were theirs, not God's.

Therefore they misuse in the most perverse way the extremely beautiful saying of Augustine: He who does not respect a good rumor is cruel; and again: Your good reputation is necessary to your neighbor. For it is not necessary to rage and reclaim the mantle against the Gospel, because your

Your neighbor needs your coat. Nor must you defend every thing, even life itself, because your neighbor needs these things. So, too, one should not forcefully reclaim a good rumor because it is necessary for one's neighbor. It is enough that in all this the accusation has not been accepted [as true]. After that it is necessary that one wants to suffer even greater things for the sake of God, so that the other cheek is also ready [Matth. 5, 39.], and yet it is not acknowledged that the beating on the first cheek was done justly.

But that these quarrelsome and obstinate protectors of their rumor are only hypocrites, and that they falsely say that they do this out of love for the name of the Lord, and that they do not seek their name, but God's, you can prove by this sign. First, that they are quite heedless in other matters of God. For they are also not so fervent to do God's will and seek His kingdom, which they would do to the utmost if they sincerely loved the name of God. Then they suffer patiently that the same name of the Lord and the good report of their neighbor are corrupted. Yes, they themselves are the very first to destroy the name of the Lord to their neighbor in order to appropriate it for themselves. Such people today are those who think that they cannot be Christians and orthodox believers (catholici) if they do not search for people whom they would like to revile and condemn as heretics, so that they prove that they have another name of God and another God in them than they persecute in their neighbor.

(315) Therefore do not think that those are lovers of the name of the Lord who are at hand to call others by an evil name, and to praise themselves alone by a good name. It is the same name in all, and cannot be loved more in yourself than in your neighbor. You are in error if you bear grief and are unwilling when you are called a heretic, but laugh and rejoice when your neighbor is thought to be a heretic: how much more are you in error if you defile another for the sake of a beautiful appearance, since you do so only for the sake of the

for the sake of a beautiful appearance, so that you may cover the ugliness of another, just as honest members cover dishonest ones, 1 Cor. 12:23.

316 But let us return to the words of the prophet. "Who love thy name." We have said that the name of the Lord is the rumor, the knowledge (notitiam), the praise of the Lord, which must certainly be in others, that is, in us through faith and confession, so that not our righteousness, virtue, wisdom, but God's may be revealed, grow and reign in us. For thus we are baptized in the name of the Lord, that now not we but God may live in us, and the name of the ungodly perish, that only God's name may be in us; for as all our works are his, so also is the name his, and so both the thing itself and the name are ascribed not to us but to God.

Therefore, it is not improperly said that by the name of the Lord is understood either Jesus Christ or the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, because these are the names of God, who alone has every good name. So also, whoever loves the name of JESu, loves at the same time the salvation of God, the truth of God, the mercy of God, the virtue of God, the wisdom of God, and all good. For all these are included in every name of the LORD. When he does this, he necessarily hates his name at the same time, and does not boast of a man's wisdom, salvation, or virtue, because they are null and void, so that he may be worthy to have the name of the Lord in him, so that he himself may be saved, and God may be praised.

Therefore, we must pay attention to the emphasis that both words, "love them" and "name" have. He does not say, "Who write, speak, make to be heard, indicate, think, sharply dispute, know," but, "Who love your name." For who should not see how many there are of those who have GOD and His name in their mouths, and yet do not boast of it? Their heart is vain, and the love in the innermost part of their heart is perverse; if it is perverse, nothing can be rightly directed; if it is right, nothing can be wrongly directed.

than become. With the saints God is holy, with the perverse He is perverse [Ps. 18, 26. f.].

Now what it is to love the name of the Lord cannot be better understood than from the kind and nature of love, which consists in seeking not one's own, but that of whom one loves. Therefore, only he who loves the name of the Lord, who despises his name and the name of all, and desires that only the name of the Lord be exalted, spread, praised, and made known to all men, is proved to be such. In order for this to happen, it is necessary that he thinks, says, does, and suffers everything that he believes can serve to have the name of the Lord recognized and exalted, even with damage to both his good and his name. Hence he cannot be stingy with vain honor, but is found to be a willing (prodigus) despiser of himself, boasting in no thing but the Lord, whose name alone he loves and seeks.

320. whoever, then, in the time of prosperity, and when he looks to his own, is well pleased and loves to hear his name, is proved by the furnace, which Solomon calls in Proverbs Cap. 27, 21, "the mouth of praise," as one who loves not the name of the Lord but his own. As such, the prophet here scourges those godless people who boast in the confidence of their own righteousness. Of these it is also said in 1 Sam. 2, 3: "Leave off your great boasting and defiance, leave out of your mouth the old things, for the Lord is a God who notices, and does not allow such boasting to succeed."

Paul also boasts that he is able to do all things, but in Him who makes him mighty [Phil. 4:13]; otherwise he boasts of nothing but his weakness, 2 Cor. 11:30. The Blessed Virgin summarizes this beautifully and briefly in this verse [Luc. 1:49]: "For He has done great things for me, who is mighty, and whose name is holy." As if to say: I have done nothing, he has done great things for me, who alone works all things, who alone is mighty in all, who for this reason also alone has the name. To him alone be the glory, who alone does what is holy, what no one may appropriate and usurp.

For whoever recognizes that it is not his work, how could he be so sacrilegious as to ascribe the name to himself from another's work?

He therefore sanctifies the name of the Lord in truth who abstains from arrogating it to himself. This is done by the one who acknowledges that every good work does not belong to him, but to God alone, so that he, as the 145th Psalm, v. 17, says, "may be holy in all his works. Behold, this is the second commandment, "Thou shalt not uselessly take the name of the LORD thy God." This is what we pray when we say, "Hallowed be thy name," that is, as the 111th Psalm, v. 9, says, "Holy and holy is the name of the LORD."

But these ungodly saints of works break in sacrilegiously and stain the name of the Lord without end, ascribing to themselves righteousness, virtue and wisdom, and in this they like to hear their name.

From this it follows that the more gifts of God a man is adorned with, the more dangerous his position, and the more necessary the fear of God is to no man, lest he stain God's name and ascribe to himself something of what is God's, or patiently suffer it to be ascribed to him by others. This is the challenge at the right hand, where ten thousand fall, namely the arrow that flies by day, the pestilence that destroys at noon [Ps. 91:5-7].

For this reason alone, St. Gregory dares to assert in many places that the good works of all saints are impure, because they cannot sufficiently abstain from the name of the Lord, nor hold it as holy and honorable as it should be held, unless the passion of nature is completely slain, which is not accomplished in this life. For how few are there who, at its name and its praise, are more frightened and afraid than of a GOtte sacred thing, which is terrifying when appropriated? Yes, we laugh merrily, and suffer it patiently like swine, when we are tickled with such praise.

1) In the Wittenberg, the Jena and the Erlangen: 146.

But where will they remain who, as if they were giants, put one mountain on top of another and build a Babylonian tower, and wage war against the Lord and his name, and with immense desire seek praise and great name (famae) in a senseless way, so that they completely take away both the work and the name of the Lord and attribute it to themselves alone? while in the meantime they chatter nothing else than: Hallowed be thy name, glory be to God alone, thanks be to God, in the name of the Lord, amen, and with such appearances and make-up they color, paint and paint the eyes of their Jezebel [2 Kings 9:30]. Namely, the world is so full of those who want to rob God of His honor and be like Him, who desecrate the name of God, who stain the honor of God; and there is no one who notices it, so much so that they fight for the name of God, even against the name of God, in a frightening way, and stand in an irreconcilable discord.

How great a desecration (religio) is it considered when a layman touches the chalices, the chasubles, the linen cloths in the churches and on the altars, because they are consecrated in the name of the Lord! But the name of the Lord Himself, by which everything is sanctified, is stained and defiled by no one more shamefully, that is, by touching it with the most disgraceful ambition, than they themselves, those accursed consecrators, the damned saints of works, who vaunt their works and words most vainly.

Therefore he loves the name of the Lord in a reverent way, who trembles with godly reverence before his own praise and good name, abstaining from it as if it were the oil, of which Exodus 30:25 ff. commands that it be kept holy, that it not be made like it, nor that any man's body be anointed with it, but only the tabernacle of the congregation and its utensils 2c. For he that honors and sanctifies the name of the Lord in this manner shall be sanctified by it again, as it is said in the 18th Psalm, v. 26, "With the saints thou art holy."

329 But not only should the name of the Lord be honored in such a way that one does not touch it, does not presume to touch it, does not presume to touch it, does not presume to touch it.

He does not anoint himself with the same, but he desires that this name be made holy and honorable to all men in this way; and in order that this may be done, he omits nothing, either in doing or in suffering. Thus we read of St. Thomas Aquinas that he made the sign of the cross over himself under his robe as often as he heard people praising him, which is certainly a very good and godly habit of showing reverence [to the name of God].

The sum of all that is said is commonly pronounced in this way: Let no man exalt himself when he is well. It is a short word and easy to say, but very hidden and difficult to understand, and it is recognized only by those who have experienced it, as the 111th Psalm, v. 9 f., says: "Holy and holy is his name. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom; it is a subtle prudence; he that doeth it, his praise endureth for ever."

331. But those who know no other fear of the Lord than that which deters from gross sins and lusts by the fear of punishment understand nothing, nor will they ever learn to boast of the Lord, since that is the right fear of the Lord, if we fear that we may not presume on anything that is the Lord's, that is, His virtue and His name, and by our presumption defile it, no differently than we fear to touch holy objects, lest we defile them. In this fear we must increase in such a way that we do not arrogate to ourselves not only temporal but also spiritual goods, also knowing that in these nothing is ours but the custom that is necessary for us and for our neighbor, which has been granted to us solely through the goodness of the Lord, that we should possess it with godly reverence and give it home to him with faithful gratitude.

332 Those who are of this nature, their praise endures forever. Their praise? 1) Of course, because they do not want to boast about themselves, nor about the praise of any other people, but only about God, as Paul says in 1 Cor. 4, 5: "Then one will be praised by God."

1) The words: Maüantio soruii? are omitted in the Wittenberg, Jena and Erlangen.

praise from God", and Ps. 34, 3. it says: "My soul shall boast in the Lord", and again 2 Cor. 10, 18.: "For this reason a man is not competent, that he praises himself, but that the Lord praises him". But God praises and glorifies only those who reject all praise from themselves and assign it to Him, who do not want their works to be seen, who want nothing but the praise of their Father in heaven, whose name they love. Therefore God praises and honors them again, as it is said in 1 Sam. 2, 30: "Whoever honors me, I will also honor; but whoever despises me, he shall be despised again."

It is very difficult, but necessary, to expect praise and name from God alone, and in the meantime to abandon all names in all things, and, if something of this kind occurs, to hold on as if it had not happened, and to carry it home to God; and also not otherwise than to tolerate it with fear for the sake of the salvation of others, rather than to have it as one's own. For this is indeed serving the Lord with fear, and rejoicing with trembling [Ps. 2:11], when one neither despairs when he is challenged, nor is presumptuous when he is comforted, as we have often said.

V. 13. for you, O LORD, bless the righteous; you crown them with grace, as with a shield).

Jerome has thus: For thou, O Lord, wilt bless the righteous, as with a shield of mercy (placabilitatis) wilt thou crown him. He omits the pronoun time, and the pronoun eum [him] is more appropriate than nos [us], for it refers to the righteous. It seems to me that the genitive [placabilitatis in Jerome] should more properly be changed to the ablative: "As with a shield thou hast crowned him with mercy." But there is a greater emphasis in separating it. For our [Latin] translation begins the last verse with the vocative "Herr," which in Hebrew is the end of the middle of the verse. But this verse, in words that are a little different, has the same meaning as the last verse of the third Psalm: "With the LORD one finds

Help and thy blessing upon thy people." As there [in the 3rd Psalm] the tone and the emphasis lies on the words "thy blessing" and "with the Lord", so it can be perceived here with the pronoun "thee" and the vocative "Lord". The understanding of this depends on the opposition of the twofold kind, the godly and the godless. Men bless the ungodly way and curse the godly way, but you, Lord, bless the godly way; as is widely interpreted above in the last verse of the 3rd Psalm.

But he gives the reason for the preceding verse, in which it is said that all rejoice who trust in the Lord, that they glory in the time of adversity, and that God protects them, but that in the time of prosperity all rejoice in the Lord who love His name. They do this because they know that it is you alone who blesses the righteous. Instructed by this knowledge, they despise the blessing and the curse of men, who bless only those who love their own name, but those who love only the name of the Lord, that is, the righteous, always pass away. Therefore, he did not add "the righteous" for nothing, obviously indicating the godless adversaries who bless not GOD but men with an opposite blessing.

Here again the words of the prophet are to be observed, who speaks in the spirit. As above he called them evildoers, wicked, ungodly, who in the sight of men and in their own eyes have nothing less than this evil appearance, but have the appearance of a godly being, but deny his power [2 Tim. 3, 5.]: so he calls "the righteous" those who are such people in spirit, but seem to men to be worth nothing less than the name of righteousness, since they must be foolish, wicked, senseless in the sight of those glittering saints who are secure through the blessings that flow to them from their virtues.

This disease, or rather the ravages of the ungodly nature, has become so rampant in the church today that one must despair of a cure; so much has everything found its full extinguisher that

1) In the Vulgate: ut seuto donas voluntatis tuas coronasti nos.

If you are against it, you will be declared a heretic and a child of the devil without any hesitation. If you grumble against it or have misgivings, you must immediately be declared a heretic and a child of the devil, a child of perdition without all shyness.

337. In such a way must the holy and honorable name of God suffer today, so it is desecrated by the exceedingly senseless lusts of men, so it serves the cruellest tyranny of the very worst Turks in the church, and has become entirely a cover of shame of all wickedness and evil, so that you can see nothing more frightening when you open the eyes of the spirit, than that nothing but the greatest, innumerable devilish works are attributed to the name of God, again nothing but the best and most Christian works are attributed to the name of the devil.

For nowadays it is not allowed to resist and reject it, if some flatterer of the great ones has attached the name of the Lord to some nefarious deed, and has adorned his devil's activity with the prestige of God, Christ and the apostles, but if you do not want to be burned as a heretic, you must worship this Satan and Antichrist for the sake of the prefixed name of Christ and praise [his deeds] as divine works.

On the other hand, if God does something contrary to these abominations in the name of the Lord, one must not favor, approve, or promote it, but believe and say that it is done by the devil's power and in his name. For what should our raging ingratitude against Christ deserve but that we, who are given over to a wrong mind, should be permitted to sin without end and without fear in the sin of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, which can be forgiven neither here nor there, by condemning God under the name of the devil and worshiping the devil under the name of Christ? [Ps. 119, 137. Vulg.:] "O LORD, thou art righteous, and thy judgment is just." For if God gave the heathen, because they knew God but did not give thanks to Him, in a wrong way, so that they committed those abominations which the Apo-

If he has thus smitten the Jews for not receiving Christ, with how great a calamity would we be smitten, who have received him and confessed his name, but now, perverted by such great wickedness, mock and defile his name? But what a great cross this must be for those who love the name of the Lord. How dreadful it is to live at this time, and to hear and see this intolerable defilement of the divine name!

In the meantime, therefore, we are to learn these conflicting judgments of God and man, and set them before us, lest we err with the unwise, nor fall away, not knowing the counsel of God. The saying is certain: Whoever wishes to become righteous must become a sinner; whoever wishes to become understanding, good, righteous, yes, godly, a Christian and orthodox, must become unintelligent, evil, perverse, yes, devilish, heretical, unbelieving, a Turk, and, as Paul says [1 Cor. 3:18]: "Whoever among you thinks himself wise, let him become a fool, that he may be wise." This saying, I say, stands firm, because such is the will in heaven, which has purposed to make wise by foolishness, good by wickedness, righteous by sin, righteous by perversity, understanding by ignorance, orthodox by heresy, Christian by unbelief, godly by diabolical form.

If you now ask, "In what way?" it will be said quickly and briefly. You cannot become the kind of person in God that you would like to be unless you first become the kind of person in yourself and before men that He wants you to be. But He wants you to become in yourself and before men what you are in truth, that is, a sinner, a wicked man, unwise, perverse, devilish 2c. These are your names, this is how it is with you, this is the right truth, this is humility. When it has come to this with you, then you are already such a person before God as you would like, that is, holy, good, truthful, righteous, godly 2c. For this reason, you are another before yourself and men than you are before GOD alone. Why are you surprised, what do you grieve 1) if you displease both yourself and right, and the saints of the world he condemns. For in the people? If you did not please them, you could not those, having lost their name, dwells the holy and please God. "If I were still pleasing to men (says Paul honorable name of God, by which they are sanctified; but Gal. 1:10.), I would not be Christ's servant." in these, since the name of God is cast off with them, is

are men, as if we did not know that under the name of Christ even the apostles themselves suffered reproaches from the false apostles. So surely we like to be deceived by the name of the holy apostles and the governors of the apostles (apostoli eorum), if it can only be granted to us that we please them, so that the word may be fulfilled, Ps. 53, 6 [Vulg.]: "God scatters the bones of those who please men; they have become ashamed, for God has spurned them," and Isa. 3, 12. [Vulg.]: "My people, those who praise you happily, they deceive you and destroy the way you should go."

Dear, how powerful and frank a description is this: All are deceived who are praised; the praisers are deceivers! Who should not fear to be praised? Who should not wish to be blamed? Do not those alone lead and teach rightly who punish what is ours, and say that we are wretched people? Truly it is so. For also in Revelation Cap. 3:17, the angel to Laodicea is told, "Thou sayest, I am rich and full, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked."

344 Since this is the case, every Christian must be most careful not to follow the great multitude and the judgment of the great multitude, and to despise or praise him who is considered either praiseworthy or reprehensible by men. For here is the danger that the Lord of glory will be approached, who wants to be counted among the evildoers [Isa. 53:12], and with those who are considered evildoers he will remain until the end of the world. For those who are sinners in the sight of men, he will make them sinners.

For the same reason, the more wretched you are in yourself, the more you must not despise and despair of yourself. For since you must not judge and condemn a sinner, nor despair of him, neither must you judge and condemn yourself, whether you have become a sinner against yourself or against men, any more than you must praise and justify yourself before yourself, nor be presumptuous because of yourself, whether you seem to be something to yourself or to men, but boast only of God and delight in his name, which is good in the sight of his saints.

346 But I believe that the figure of speech of the synecdoche is sufficiently known, that "the righteous" [benedices justo in the Vulgate] is said in the singular for "the righteous" in the plural, or instead of a general sentence, in part: "You bless the righteous," that is, any one who is righteous. Then, according to scriptural usage, to bless is the same as to praise, to extol, to wish well, to be benevolent. The opposite is cursing, blaming, wishing evil. If this happens from God, it is something real (res) and a work, because when he speaks, it happens [Ps. 33, 9.], but if it happens from men, nothing follows it.

347. But the righteous is called, as is clear from much of what has already been said in the first Psalm, in spirit and in secret, who is righteous not in his own eyes nor in the eyes of men, but in the eyes of God. It is this one who believes and trusts in God, of whom you can rightly say: The righteous is a sinner, but on a different stage and according to different standing, as we have said.

348. "You crown them with grace as with a shield," that is, you surround them, as it says in the 125th Psalm, v. 2: "The Lord is around His people," and Ps. 34, 8: "The angel of the Lord is around those who fear Him."

1) Erlanger: tndnrns, instead of: tnrdraris.

and Deut. 32, 10: "He led him, and guarded him like the apple of his eye." But this also happens in the spirit, that we do not feel it, while we perceive with our senses that of which the 118th Psalm, v. 12. says: "They surround me like bees" 2c.

Therefore the grace, the good will, this goodness of God must be grasped in faith, so that we do not fall away, since our Saul encloses us all around, 1 Sam, 23, 26. Thus we see many consolations that God gives us, but in the spirit, so that he may provoke us to trust in him, as it is said in Deut. 32, 11: "As an eagle carries forth his young, and soars above them"; in such a way "he rides on the cherub, and soars; he soars on the wings of the wind", Ps. 18, 11.

And this I have said in many words, but still not enough, as it is due, about these movements of faith, hope, love, joy. If this occurs again hereafter, let us refer to it, so that we can put an end once and for all to the lengthy elaboration and be shorter from now on. And after we have finished this fifth psalm, we want to set the first milestone here (sit primi stadii modus), so that, refreshed by a short rest, we can go to the sixth psalm all the fresher.

Because it has seemed good to us to stop here a little, we want to add for the benefit of some, instead of a conclusion, two verses which are very often sung in the whole church at the end of the Psalms: "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit," 2c. because they are very closely related to the last two verses of this Psalm, in which it has been taught that one should praise and love the name of the Lord. They read thus:

Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit, as it was in the beginning, and is now, and ever shall be, for ever and ever, Amen.

In verses that have a very deep spiritual mind, one must lift up the heart, so that what is sung with the voice is also sung with the mind and in the spirit. In these is the epitome of all prayers and movements of the heart.

not otherwise than in the first part of the holy Lord's Prayer, "Hallowed be thy name," all the following petitions are included, and in the first commandment of the holy Ten Commandments all the following ones, so that, just as the first commandment is the measure and guide of all the other commandments, and the first petition of all the other petitions, so in this way the movement of the heart in this verse is the first and highest of all movements of the heart. For nothing is to be prayed for that does not first serve to honor the divine majesty, that his name may be sanctified, nor is anything to be done in works that does not first seek that which is God's, lest we have another God. Therefore, we must not be moved more violently by the desire (affectu) of any thing than by the pursuit of the glory of God.

Yes, if we sing this verse in the spirit and with the mind, we accomplish in a short epitome the whole set of all sacrifices of the Old Testament. For what was it otherwise, that slain cattle were offered to God, than that we carnal men, slain by sin, should be offered to God, living unto righteousness to the praise and honour of his grace? For thus saith Hosea, Cap. 14, 3. "Then will we offer the bullocks of our lips;" and Ps. 51, 21. "Then shall the sacrifices of righteousness please thee; then shall bullocks be offered upon thine altar;" and Heb. 13, 15. "Let us therefore through him offer the sacrifice of praise unto GOtte alway, that is, the fruit of lips that confess his name."

And there is no other sacrifice in the New Testament than the one in this verse, so that also the sacrament of the altar is called a Eucharist, that is, a thanksgiving, because when we perform it, we actually carry out the opinion and sentiment of this verse. For it is not enough that we partake of the body of the Lord, if we do not do it in remembrance of Him, as He commanded.

But as many as murmur this verse daily, so few are those who fulfill what is indicated by it. Therefore, each one must take care of himself and remember what he owes to God through the admonition and exhortation of this verse.

Therefore, we say that to the three Persons, not some glory (gloriae), but all glory (gloria) should be, because it is the same and the very same glory that the one and triune God has, just as One is Majesty and Divinity. Thus we confess the holy revealed name of the true God. Therefore, a very great faith is necessary, which we are also enjoined to practice in this verse; for these are incomprehensible things that we are speaking about, and they are the main pieces of our faith.

But in order that we may conform to the common custom, it pleases me in all this that the Father be ascribed power and might, the Son wisdom and counsel, the Holy Spirit kindness and love, and that they be taken according to these characteristics, so that he who praises God the Father may at the same time sacrifice his own vain glory, and confess his weakness and inability, nor desire to be strong and mighty, except in God the Father.

357. When he praises the Son, let him also abhor his own wisdom and counsel, slaughter these beasts and sacrifice them, confess his unwisdom and foolishness, nor desire to be thought wise and prudent, either in himself or in men, but only in his God the Son.

When he sings praises to the Holy Spirit, let him lay aside confidence in his own righteousness and goodness, confess his sins, and desire to become righteous and good through God the Holy Spirit, and slay the beast, the delusion of his own righteousness. Thus it happens that we leave everything to God, but nothing to ourselves but shame and the confession of our evil, our misery, and that we are nothing. Thus we are righteous, giving to each what is his.

But let no one be so minded as to think that he can sing this verse worthily, but let him sing it more in such a way that he desires (optative) than that he actually performs it (indicative), so that it is at the same time a prayer, a praise and a thanksgiving, since no one is without vain honor, boasting of his virtue, wisdom and goodness, nor is anyone found who does not deprive God of some of his honor and offer this sacrifice impurely.

But this must be prayed in such a way that the words: "As it was in the beginning, and now, and forever," are a common prayer, that is, that he desires that all creatures from the beginning to eternity praise God with him, whereby God is asked, praised and glorified for all and with all. This is the most pleasant and powerful prayer, because it is done in the greatest communion, whereby what is lacking in us is supplemented by the communion of all the saints and especially of Christ. It is most safe to sing in this great communion (universitate), where the deficiencies of our voice are supported and made perfect by the multitude of the perfect.

Therefore, it is impossible for a man who is caught up in vain honor to sing this verse, unless, as it were, with a frightful roar, he disgraces this whole lovely harmony of the whole creature, thereby loading and accelerating misfortune upon his own head. From this shameful honor may Christ Himself deliver us, who is our glory forever, amen.

The sixth Psalm.

V. 1. a psalm of David to be sung on eight strings. 1)

The "victory" (victoria) and the "playing of strings" (organiz) have been spoken about in the fourth psalm. The secret interpretation of the "eight" (octavae) has been treated in detail by many, who we want to let rule their sense. We, however, want to follow those who speak simple-mindedly without a secret interpretation, and hold that according to the grammatical or historical understanding, the octava was a stringed instrument or a zither of eight strings, since the 33rd Psalm, v. 2. The meaning is that this Psalm was one of those which were sung "to victory" "on stringed instruments" (of which we have said above in the fourth Psalm from 1 Chron. 16, 19-21.), but in such a way that it was to be sung on the appropriate instrument of eight strings, namely the zither, so that octava was added in the title to designate the type [of instrument]. It is also not known to me whether the instrument of eight strings was the highest, or the middle or the lowest 2) kind of zithers. The psaltery of ten strings seems to have been the highest, since we read that it was often used in sweet and festive psalms. It is certain that the psalms [with the title:] "to the victory" used to be sung on zithers, which often name the titles of the psalms with the general word "Saitenspiele".

It is not to be doubted that these were all models of things to come, and that these eight strings have not been both ordered and praised in vain. In my opinion, I agree with those [commentators] not only about the eighth day of the future resurrection, but also about the situation of the present church and about a more or less complete and more detailed view of the future resurrection.

The prophet's intention (animi causa) is that the zither was the highest of the eight strings and distinguished from the others. Therefore, already according to the prophet's intention (animi causa), we can entertain the godly thought that the zither of eight strings was the highest and noblest and distinguished above the others, just as we think that the psaltery of ten strings was the highest [psaltery]; and therefore it was distinguished by this title, adding the name octava.

But it is said in the beginning that the psaltery and the zither are distinguished in that the psaltery, because it has the hollow part (cavitatem) in the upper wood, lets the reverberation sound from above, whereas the zither, which is hollow in the lower wood, sounds from below. Through this, the two mysteries of the death and resurrection of Christ may be represented, in us the killing of the flesh and the making alive of the spirit, so that the singing of the zither in the revelation of truth is nothing other than the work of the cross, the killing of the members, the destruction of the body of sin, through which man is led upward from his earthly wisdom, so that he seeks that which is above, where Christ is; But the singing of the Psaltery is the work of the Spirit, justification, blessedness, peace, and the like, which come from above through faith and hope. Therefore, the zithers were also used quite appropriately for the psalms "for victory," as it is said, because the work of the Lord, that is, the cross of Christ, needs encouragement 3) so that one carries it to the end and achieves victory through perseverance.

But since in this psalm the highest degree of this cross and of the killing and the outermost border of the death, yes, also of the hell is described, then the highest zither (that is the octava) is added to it even puffing. The number

1) In Latin, probably according to Jerome: ^ä victoriam in orMnis super octavam psnlmus David. In contrast, the Vulgate offers here as at the beginning of the 4th psalm: In uein in earminidns, psalnns David, pro octavs.
2) Erlanger: inürma instead of: inüina.

3) In the Basel: sxüortations instead of: ^xüortatorio.

Eight is frequent and holy in the holy scripture (as Jerome says) from the eighth day of the circumcision and the eight souls in the ark of Noah. It is also said of David that he was the eighth and last son of Jesse, and Zacharias, the father of John, received the language again on the eighth day, and the like. But the number eight is a cubic number (numerus solidus), a completely equal square with six equal sides, which contains 24 plane triangles and eight cubes (solidos), like a cube, 1) which is also a square figure, which is common in the holy scriptures, and is assigned by the philosophers to uniformity and constancy. Furthermore, the number six (to which also this psalm belongs) is the first perfect number, so that by the singing of this zither the firm, constant, perfect and completed killing of the old man is indicated, which is indeed described in this psalm. But why the same title is not given to other psalms of the same content, we do not want to know (to use Augustine's words), because God did not want us to know.

Therefore, the words of this psalm will puff on the one who sings on the octava, that is, who is martyred with the extreme chastisement of death and hell, which is also indicated by the words themselves. Therefore, in my judgment, it stands thus: This psalm does what the previous one taught. For we said there that the nature and power of hope is shown in the midst of the misfortunes and sins of a suffering man. What kind of feelings he has, what kind of violent movements, what kind of sighs, what kind of words, what kind of counsels, that is set forth in this psalm.

Therefore, we can assume that the content (sententiam) and the teaching of this psalm is a general one, which does not only apply to Christ, but to any Christian who suffers such. Now if the chastisement of the purgatory (this is my opinion) is the fear of death and the dread of hell, because of the lack of right and perfect

Love, the Church exceedingly appropriately prays this psalm in the person of the deceased, so that it could not pray anything more appropriate.

(2) But those who are in such distress and are chastened by it have an irreconcilable struggle with the evildoers who rely on works and teach that one should rely on them, and resist this killing [of the old man] in the most pernicious way. For it is not our work, but God's alone, that is done here, which one endures, in that hope alone suffers most valiantly; but it is not taken away by works of men, nor is comfort received; indeed, he who is in such trepidation recognizes that all men are liars [Ps. 116:11]. Therefore, he does not punish the persecutors, but the wrongdoers, the false comforters, most severely, because they do harm to this work of God through sweet appearances, since their delusion does not want to suffer that this is done by God, since they are always teachers and originators of despair and presumption, but never of hope.

(3) Nor should it be thought that all believing Christians are afflicted with the cross of this psalm. For not all are tested with all [temptations], though all are tried with many and various tribulations; as we read in the Gospel that only the One Cananaean woman, the Syro-Phoenician, was afflicted with a suffering of this kind. For Christ would not listen to her cries, nor to the intercession of the disciples, until she suffered it, with the greatest self-denial, being compared to little dogs, not to children, while others were either blind, or lame, or afflicted with similar gross sufferings and ills.

(4) So this is actually the challenge of those who have great faith, and, as is said of David [1 Sam. 13:4, Acts 13:22], of those who are after God's heart, the elect. But the same must be learned, so that we will be ready when God wants to test us with it at some time.

5 And why should we not try (which many have already tried), in order to know the various kinds of sufferings, to find the kind of order in the preceding Psalms? since the various Psal-

1) Luther has here the shape of the cube continuously in mind. The 24 plane triangles are created by drawing the diagonals on the six faces of the cube; the eight cubes by dividing the cube into eight equal parts.

The words of the book are only to indicate the attitudes and the advice in the various afflictions.

Now we see that the first Psalm presents us with the perfect image of a godly man or people with short and general words and sayings, but definitely such a man as the various attitudes expressed in the Psalms show him, namely a spiritual man who only allows himself to be determined by the law of God, who also does not allow himself to be made unstable, neither by prosperity nor by adversity. Again, he presents us with the opposite image of the wicked, then the end of both, that God knows those, but does not know these, that therefore these will perish, but those will be preserved. Thus, one can see that this Psalm is quite correctly placed at the beginning as a kind of summary, from which one may see what is dealt with in the entire Psalter.

In the second psalm he teaches us the head and the originator of the godly people, Christ, then his place and his kingdom, where and from where it goes out, and how far it should be spread, namely from Zion to the end of the world, admittedly against the will of all opponents who rebel against it in vain. Finally, he describes the manner and customs of this kingdom, namely, to serve [the Lord] with fear and joy, and to be ready to trust and hope in him in the time of wrath.

In the third Psalm, this king and head of the faithful people is introduced as an example of suffering and glory, that he is not a duke in name only, commanding and demanding much but doing nothing, but one who precedes the people over whom he is placed in the righteous direction of the office of a duke and leader, mighty in deeds and words, and first (incipiens) in doing and teaching.

In the fourth psalm, the people who follow the duke are introduced, first of all, through bodily and lighter sufferings, by which they are trained to despise the many earthly things and goods of this life (which he calls "much wine and grain"), and thus attain to hope, in which they can sleep with peace. And here is the first and lowest

Step of the cross described for the beginners and the weak.

10) In the fifth Psalm man, after being strengthened by temporal sufferings, is subjected to the much more dangerous spiritual challenges and wars of the word, where he has to fight with the thoughts of Satan, namely with heretical and perverse opinions, which fight against pure faith and hope, and even with the most spiritual beast, hope, which came from the [great] goods, through which the angel fell from heaven [2 Petr. 2, 4]. 1) Therefore, here the matter is conducted with much fiercer and stronger movement of the heart. Here the powers of the heart alone suffer, and the spirit is martyred for the sake of the truth and sincerity of faith. We see that Paul had such a violent movement of the heart against the Jews and the false apostles.

In this sixth psalm, the final and perfect battle with death and hell is finally fought. This kind of battle is not waged with men, nor because of temporal or spiritual things, but within the spirit, even apart from and above the spirit in that supreme anguish, where no one hears, sees, feels, but the spirit, which pleads with inexpressible groaning for the saints, and, as it were, fights with God Himself, to whom no name can be given, and who can be known by no one but He who has experienced it, of which we shall now see.

V. 2. O Lord, do not punish me in your anger, and do not chastise me in your wrath.

(12) It has been asked whether anger (furor) is different from wrath (ira), whether punishing (arguere) is different from chastising (corripere). And it is known that "punish" and "chastise" also occur together in other places, as Ostenb. 3, 19.

1) It is possible that Luther had the passage Is. 14, 12 in mind according to the common understanding at that time. However, he later stated that it was a mistake to understand this passage as referring to Lucifer's fall. Cf. Walch, old edition, vol. VI." 391, s 10.

I have punished and chastised (castigo)", so that here the last "corripias" is the same as castiges or disciplines. But those who want it to be a repetition of the same thing, let them have their way. Meanwhile we want to make the distinction that "to be punished" is the same as to be rebuked; "to be chastised," that he who has been rebuked is beaten (percuti). This we learn from the custom of men, where a guilty person (reus) is first accused and rebuked, then, when the sentence has been passed, he is chastised (plectitur). So also the children, if they have done evil, they are first punished (arguuntur), then beaten.

But this reprehension of the heart in the spirit is the fear and trembling of the conscience before the judgment of God, for which Christ suffered for us in the garden, as Isaiah, Cap. 53, 11, foretold of him, "His soul labored." And, beginning to mourn and to tremble, he said [Matt. 26:38.], "My soul is sorrowful unto death." For here the soul finds itself deprived of all confidence, and is placed no other than horribly guilty alone before the eternal, and indeed wrathful, judgment seat of God. Of this Job says, Cap. 9, 1) 12 [Vulg.]: "If he should suddenly ask, who could answer him?" For he falls silent, not unlike that guest [at the wedding] in the Gospel, Matth. 22, 12, who fell silent when asked about the wedding garment. Then what follows there [v. 13] expresses: "Bind his hands and feet, and cast him out into utter darkness," expresses the same thing that is said here, "to be chastened in wrath." For the conscience, when it has been punished and convicted, immediately feels nothing but that eternal damnation is inflicted upon it.

(14) And there is no one who understands this supreme affliction (since he cannot understand the lesser ones either) unless he has tasted it, and therefore we cannot duly speak of it. Job suffered the same before others, and frequently; then David and King Hezekiah, Isa. 38:10 ff, and a few others.

Theologian" 2) Johann Tauler of the same not rarely mentioned in his sermons.

(15) This seems to me to be the temptation that Christ foretold in Luc. 21:25 ff, since he also lists, among other evils of the last days, the terrible signs from heaven, by which [temptation] 3) men pine away for fear and waiting for the things that will come upon the whole world, so that at the most dangerous and evil time there is also the worst and most dangerous tribulation. But even at the present time we have seen many who have suffered such things, and because they knew no counsel, have become senseless, or are constantly hardening themselves, grieving and being consumed. One of the fathers also suffered from this in the desert and said: "The fear of God also consumes the bones.

(16) Here, no one can stand against us, nor can he presume to prove himself a right discriminator between servile fear and love, according to his stupid head. This work of God cannot be comprehended by any knowledge, no matter how great; here it is dark in the depths [Gen. 1:2]. At the same time there is the very servile fear and the fleeing of punishments, and the most fervent love, as Christ says in the 142nd Psalm, v. 5: "I cannot escape, no one takes care of my soul." Love is hidden in unfathomable depths, servile fear comes to light with unbearable power. The spirit floats on the water [Gen. 1, 2.], and an inexpressible groaning is left alone. Finally, what this affliction accomplishes can be deduced from the signs that this psalm lists.

17 First, he pleads against the wrath and anger of God, which he has not done.

2) This is what Luther calls Johann Tauler, because he attributes the book "Eyn deutsch Theologia" (published by him in 1518) to Tauler. In the borrede to the same he says (Walch, old edition, vol. XIV, 207): "To estimate according to possible memory, the matter is almost after the manner of the enlightened Doctor Tauler, order of preachers." Cf. Walch, St. Louis ed. vol. XVIII, ISO. Walch, old edition, vol. XIV, 206, K3.

3) According to the original edition, the reading in the Erlangen and Weimar editions is: qua, referring to tentatio, which we have chosen because Luther interprets it this way in his interpretation of this Gospel in the Church Postil (Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XI, 57 f., s 28), where he also remembers Tauler. The other editions offer: quikus, referring to *terror*⁶⁸, "the frightening signs".

1) Erlanger:

if he had not felt his wrath and anger. For he does not refuse to be punished and chastised, but asks that this may be done in mercy, as is said in the 26th Psalm, v. 2. "Test me, O LORD, and try me; purify my kidneys and my heart," and in the 139th Psalm, v. 23. "Search me, O GOD, and know my heart; try me, and know how I mean it."

Therefore, in this verse, he apparently teaches a twofold rod of God, one of mercy, the other of wrath. Thus Jeremiah, Cap. 10, 24, says: "Chasten me, O Lord, yet with measures, and not in thy wrath, lest thou wear me out"; and Job, Cap. 7, 20, 17: "Wherefore makest thou me to stumble upon thee?" "What is man, that thou esteemest him great, and grievest with him?" This tribulation is also called in Scripture a day of visitation and insight (inspectionis), because God by His sight alone torments the wicked, which they cannot bear, as Habakkuk says, Cap. 4, 6: "He looked and cut in pieces the Gentiles, so that the mountains of the world were shattered." So we read in Exodus 14:24 that the Lord alone looked upon the host of Egypt, and immediately terror came upon the Egyptians, and their flight followed. Yes, this is the Day of Judgment, which will last forever, from which no one can hide, from which no one can escape, unless he takes hold of the mercy of God through hope in Christ Jesus our Lord.

19 Now this psalm teaches us that if anyone is distressed by this evil, he should flee to no one but the angry Lord Himself. But this is very difficult and laborious, and nothing else than hoping, since there is nothing to hope for, and doing completely impossible things, as much as the heart feels, in which this exceedingly lamentable struggle is going on. King Hezekiah tells this struggle about himself, and says Isa. 38, 14: "O Lord, I am in distress; soothe me." Again he immediately adds, as if he felt the rejection [v. 15, Vulg.]: "What shall I say? or what will he answer me, since he himself has done it?" as if he wanted to say with Job, Cap. 9, 16: "Though I call upon him and he hears me, yet I do not believe that he will answer me.

hear my voice. Namely, hope and despair alternate with each other in such a way that people, even if they are heard when they call upon God, do not feel it at all, that they do not even believe that their voice has been heard.

20 Therefore, this Psalm also confesses badly, when it says: "In your anger", that what he suffers is from God, so that he can say: What shall I say? What relief will he give me? Will he then hear me? Will it do me any good if I pray, since I am sure that he himself will do it?

(21) Therefore, those who in the lesser tribulations have not learned to flee to Him who smites them (that is, to God), as it is abundantly written in the prophets that one should do, since He does all things: how should they, in this greatest of fears, take refuge in Him who is most felt that God Himself does it?

Therefore, all other temptations are, as it were, only a children's teaching (rudimenta) and a prelude to this greatest of all temptations (perfectissimae), by which we are to become accustomed to flee to God against God. And from this passage I have taken what I disputed earlier 1) about the torment of the souls in Purgatory, that Purgatory seemed to me to be, as it were, a "near despair" and almost hell, from which souls could be delivered neither by the way of intercession nor even by indulgences, but only by the prayer of the church, may they be purified and perfected in love by them [the punishments in purgatory (poenis)], or may they do enough for sins, which I do not know. For even a living person who endures such things could not be helped by indulgences, but only by hope and 2) the intercession of the faithful. 3)

23. but this must be known, that those who suffer such things must keep the teaching of this psalm very carefully, so that they do not digress, do not complain, do not seek comfort from men, but by this teaching.

1) In the 95 theses against indulgences in 1517. Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 70 ff, thesis 15 ff.

stand still, suffer the hand of God, and with the prophet turn nowhere but to the Lord, saying, "Oh, Lord, do not punish me in your wrath." If they do not let themselves be found in this prudence (as those who are initiated into this matter advise), they will fall out of the hand of God, who heals and purifies them, to their utmost harm, fleeing to the miserable comfort of an ineffectual creature, not unlike the clay falling out of the potter's hand while being worked, and being broken worse, until it becomes utterly useless, or deserves to be rejected as unfit.

24 Jeremiah teaches this very beautifully and in detail in the Lamentations, where he says, among other things, Cap. 3, 24-29: "The Lord is my portion, saith my soul; therefore will I hope in him. For the Lord is good to him that waiteth for him, and to the soul that asketh after him. It is a precious thing to be patient and hope in the help of the Lord. It is a precious thing for a man to bear the yoke in his youth, for a forsaken man to be patient when things come upon him, to put his mouth in the dust, and to wait for hope," that is, to hide his face, and withdraw himself from the company of men, as though he were buried with the dead in the dust.

25 From such a sense is also that in the 143rd Psalm, v. 3. f., spoken: "He lays me in darkness like the dead in the world. And my spirit is troubled within me; my heart is consumed in my flesh." In this silence and in this solitude this purification is accomplished, as it is also said in the 55th Psalm, vv. 5-9: "My heart is troubled in my body, and the fear of death is fallen upon me. Fear and trembling have come upon me, and dread has overtaken me. I said, O that I had wings like doves, that I might fly and stay! Behold, I would depart far away, and dwell in the wilderness. I would hasten, that I might escape from the tempest and the weather." This is said in Hebrew of the movement of the wind and the whirlwind [which in Latin is "of the despondency and tempest in the spirit (a pusillanimitate spiritus et tempestate)], but it is the same in sense.

V. 3. Lord, have mercy on me, for I am weak; heal me, Lord, for my bones are troubled.

Secondly, he confesses that he is weak, forsaken by his strength, since it cannot bear the unbearable punishment and chastisement of God's wrath, as if to say: The terror of your wrath is too fierce for me to bear, and if you do not grant me the grace of your strength, I must despair and perish completely. Thus it is said Job 9:13: "He is GOD, his wrath no man can quench; under him the proud lords must bow." And Moses says, Ps. 90, 11: "But who believes that you are so angry, and fears such your wrath?"

(27) And he shows the greatness of the movement of the heart by repeating the name of the Lord so often: "Lord, have mercy on me," "heal me, Lord," "O Lord, how long". For this is also what those who are afflicted by lighter temptations do, that they so often repeat the prayer for help and the name of the Lord with their heart and mouth.

(28) Those who pray this Psalm do not really want to express the forgiveness of sins by the word: "Be merciful to me" (miserere), which is sometimes indicated by the word "kindness" (clementiae), or that the Lord is "a merciful" (miseratoris), as in the 111th Psalm, v. 4: "The merciful and compassionate Lord" (misericos et miserator). Psalm, v. 4: "The gracious and merciful Lord" (misericos et miserator), but grace or strength, whereby the soul is strengthened, so that it is well with the word: "I am weak" or I am powerless. For powerlessness is helped up by strength. Such is the nature of this challenge, which is described in these words in the most real way, but (as I said) only he understands it who has experienced it. But in this verse the prophet speaks of the weakness of the spirit, not of the flesh, that is, that neither hope, nor love, nor even faith is sufficient to bear it, unless they are strengthened.

Thirdly, he says, "that his bones also are troubled," and therefore desires to be healed. But who wants to understand this?

what it is that the bones are terrified? For he does not speak of a bodily terror in the bones, since they are shattered either by fever or some other disease. And this lack of experience has also been the cause that some famous fathers understood by "bones" the powers of the soul. I do not reject their opinion, but I have said that the powers of the soul (may they be powers such as understanding, will, reason, memory, and the like, or virtues, infused or acquired) are indicated in the first part of the verse by the word: "For I am weak". For grace in the proper sense (which the prophet asks for by the word: "Have mercy on me") strengthens the heart and its powers against that spiritual weakness, because he speaks in the spirit.

30 Therefore, in this passage the bones must be taken according to the grammar in the proper sense for the bodily bones in our flesh, which are frightened by weakness and the terror of the spirit, so that they tremble and have no strength, yes, are also no longer bones, also can no longer carry the body. Thus it is said in Isa. 38:13, "He broke all my bones like a lion." For this is what we sometimes see in the dying, where some tremble and stretch terribly in fear and agony. For that is where God works this tribulation, where man can now no longer run to human consolations, and is forced to suffer the hand of Him who cleanses him. For in this way sin must be killed and separated from us, so that we love God above all else and become inflamed with unspeakable desire for Him, and these earthly attitudes, which sin works, become incomparably less than this desire is now, which seeks God, that is, His grace and mercy.

This is what is meant by saying that we must love God as much and more than we have loved creatures. Those who postpone this until death must suffer this great purification. However, God is not loved nor desired with such fervor if man is not burdened with such great tribulation, which forces him to seek and call upon God with a mighty cry of the heart, especially when he is deeply immersed in laziness and has been sluggish in the killing of his flesh. For this death will be all the harder, the more lively the multiple practice of sins has made the mind that is to be killed. And it is to be hoped that those who have suffered this death and hell in their lives will have it less in death.

(32) I may be speaking things here that seem inconsistent and outrageous, especially to those who presume to gain easy access to God through indulgences or letters of grace or works. But, as I cannot prove this opinion of mine if someone does not believe these words of the prophet, so for their sake I cannot depart from the words of the prophet. "Let every man be sure of his own opinion" [Rom. 14:5]. I know what I speak; let them also see whether they know what they speak. It is certain that no one will attain to God's mercy unless he has a great hunger and thirst for it, like the one who says [Ps. 42:2, 4]: "As the deer cries for fresh water, so my soul, O God, cries to you. My tears are my food day and night", and another Psalm [Ps. 63, 2. f.]: "My soul thirsts for you in a dry and arid land where there is no water. There I look for thee in thy sanctuary."

(33) No one hopes that a satiated or a weary soul will be filled by God, who only fills the hungry with goods, how much less will he give eternal life to those who disgust it, even despise it against this life, but only to those who seek it most eagerly and with inexpressible sighs, asking and knocking for it.

Because we would not do this in this life, especially when it is quiet, he has presented us with death and many tribulations, through which we are forced to seek mercy and life, as Job says [Cap. 10:12]: "Life and mercy you have done to me, and your care preserves my breath."

35 Therefore it is certain that to those who suffer this affliction the bones of the body are so terrified that they cannot perform the office of the bones, as on the other hand we see that where the heart is joyful and filled with joy, the bones receive strength, as it were, to leap, and are able to lift with them even the very heavy and stinking flesh, and can carry everything, so that one feels that joy pours out through the bones, as it were like a watering (irrigatio) [refreshes a dry land], as it is said in Proverbs 3:8: "This will refresh your bones" (erit irrigatio). Yes, also the poet 1) says: A cold shudder ran through his bones. The movements of the soul exert such a reaction on the body. Therefore he rightly says: "Heal me, Lord," because he is also so ill in the body that the bones do not carry him. So great is the power of this affliction that it does not leave a corner free in all forces that it does not frighten and break. And this is the highest cleansing of sins, the highest repentance and the fullest satisfaction.

V. 4. And my soul is greatly distressed.

Fourthly, he complains that his soul is frightened, that is, the lower part, namely the life according to the senses (sensitivam). For when the spirit and the bones are terrified, there is no sense that does not also become sad, so that now there is nothing left in the spirit, in the body, in the soul, that would not be taken over by the bitterest sadness and fear. For the soul feels the sting of death, which makes the senses exceedingly sad, just as the spirit feels hell, which is unbearable. But that the feeling of death and hell is in this fright, the following will show. In the meantime, it must be known that for those who are in this fright, there is nothing so sweet in the whole creature that the sight of it could give them even a hair's breadth of pleasure, nothing so sweet that it would delight their ears; there is no desire to taste anything, to eat, to drink, to touch, to smell, yes, everything is exceedingly bitter. But it is death on all sides, on everything they only look at and feel. They are most miserably tortured (distenduntur) between life and death: before death they have a horror, life they do not have.

I believe, however, that it is important for everyone to be aware of this.

1) Virgil, Veners, lid. II, v. 120.

It is known that soul (anima) and spirit (spiritus) are distinguished according to the use of Scripture, although the philosophers follow their own sense (sua). For this is what the apostle 1²) Thess. 5, 23. teaches us: "But he, the God of peace, sanctify you through and through, and let your whole spirit, together with soul and body, be kept blameless unto the future of our Lord JEsu Christ." Origen and Jerome have written much about this in various places. "Through and through" the apostle said, that is, as he interprets himself, through the spirit, through the soul, through the body. But also from the Gospel we have [Marc. 12, 30.], "With all thy heart, with all thy soul, with all thy mind, and with all thy strength." It is not the place to say more about this now.

Oh Lord, how long?

38) Here some add a verb, namely: how long will you not pull me out, will you not make it better with me? For these, the pronoun "you" speaks: "Oh Lord, how long?" In the same way the 13th Psalm, v. 2. f., says: "O Lord, how long wilt thou forget me? How long wilt thou hide thy face from me? How long shall I be anxious in my soul, and fearful in my heart daily?" where he not only asks that the help be hastened, but also, as it were impatiently, complains about the delay, about the harshness of the postponement, since, as in all movements of the heart, in fear, love, hope, hatred 2c., the delay is hard and heavy, as it is said in Proverbs 13:12: "The hope that is consumed anguishes the heart," so it is heaviest of all in this suffering of death and hell. For here it is true what they say, that one hour in purgatory is longer than many years in this life.

In short, human nature cannot endure that this affliction should last even a little while, nor can it contain it entirely, but tastes only a few drops of it. So again it is said of those who, having been raptured, enjoy heavenly joys.

2) In the issues: 2 IUSSA.

The soul is so strong that it can hardly perceive a drop, since this life could not bear the richness of the pleasures of that life. If one of these two movements should become too strong or be prolonged, it is thought that the soul would soon have to depart, if there were not a miracle of divine power. Therefore the prophet, with these words, "Ah, thou Lord, how long?" indicates with extraordinary emphasis the inexpressible groaning of the inmost spirit, in the man who suffers this.

V. 5. Turn, O Lord, and save my soul; help me for your goodness' sake.

Again, in this verse he indicates that his soul is lost and that he is damned (for that is how he feels at the time of this challenge), since he asks to be saved, namely from the death that oppresses him, and to be helped out of hell, which is already devouring him with an open mouth, as we read [in the masses] for the souls: Deliver them from the jaws of the lion, lest hell devour them, lest they fall into darkness, and Ps. 9:14. it is said, "Thou liftest me up out of the gates of death," and Hezekiah says [Isa. 38:10.], "Now must I go to the Hollen Gate."

41 And he beautifully shows the power of hope, since he has nothing but the goodness of God before his eyes, saying: "For the sake of your goodness", as if he wanted to say: Not for the sake of my merits; how nothing these are, is proved enough and more than enough by the terror of your wrath, and the fright of my heart, my bones and my soul. Therefore help me for the sake of your goodness, so that your honor and the praise of your mercy, which you have shown to me by giving me help, may endure forever. For though I am not worthy to be saved and helped, yet you are worthy to be praised, glorified and loved forever. But you cannot be praised and your goodness cannot be praised unless there are people whom you save from death and whom you rescue from hell.

42. thus it is said in the prayer of Manasseh, the King Judah, v. 15 f.: "But if you will help me unworthy according to your great mercy, I will praise you all my life. For all the host of heaven praiseth thee." Behold, by this art God makes His mercy exceedingly worthy of praise to us, exceedingly sweet, and that we sigh for it with all our heart, as it is then worthy to be praised (since it is eternal, and of so great a majesty), attacking us with the calamity which we have deserved. But those whom he does not attack with such misfortune, but lets them go in their ignorance, it is not to be wondered at if the mercy of God seems small to them, and they have an excess of it, and are disgusted with this heavenly manna.

(43) Through this consideration, all the talk of those who earn grace through the somewhat meritorious actions (actibus congruis) and glory through the fully meritorious actions (condignis) falls away in an instant, since they prepare themselves to bear this unbearable judgment of God through the works of their own righteousness, in unbelievable nonsense. Therefore, at the end (of this psalm, v. 9.) he attacks them with great bitterness, turns to them, and speaks with tremendous vehemence: "Depart from me, all evildoers," as we shall see. There it remains: "Help me for the sake of your goodness." My righteousness has disappeared, my virtue has fallen away, my merit has perished; my iniquity has been found out to death and hell. Blessed and glorious shall I be, when it shall be given me to breathe again in thy goodness.

(44) And so we are taught that, just as we should not be presumptuous on our part, so we must not despair at all, but call upon God's goodness even against the power of death and hell, however unworthy we may be. For what sins, what evils are so great that they should force you to despair? For here you hear that no one, not even death and hell, should be driven to despair, when the greatest sins and the greatest misfortunes must necessarily be present.

V. 6: For in death you are not remembered; who will thank you in hell?

(45) Here he clearly reveals the emotions that run through this entire psalm, confessing that he has felt death and hell. For he does not speak this of a thing unknown to him, after the manner of the sophists, who presume to speak of any thing according to what they suspect of it (divinare), but he relates what he has experienced and describes clearly these sensations. Help me (he says), that I may praise your goodness forever, and do not punish me in this your wrath; for, because in it is death and hell, you are not remembered and praised. For here the word Proverbs 16:14 applies: "The king's wrath is a messenger of death." So Hezekiah says Isa. 38, 19. 18.: "Only they that live praise thee: for hell praiseth not thee, neither doth death praise thee; and they that go down to the pit wait not for thy truth." And Ps. 115:17: "The dead shall not praise thee, O Lord, nor they that go down into silence." But also in many other places in the Psalter we will find this anguish of heart indicated.

(46) What then is in death and in hell? First, that one forgets God, then that one blasphemes Him forever. For here the care for oneself and the love of oneself prevail with the most impetuous and unrestrained vehemence, therefore man cannot have the goodness of God before his eyes. For he seeks an escape, and does not find it; then he immediately falls into the most ardent hatred against God, and wishes first that another God were, then that he himself were not; and thus he blasphemes the highest majesty, and desires out of all his strength (as I have said) that it should not be, and if he were able, he would bring it about that it should not be. And this fleeing and enmity against GOD lasts forever. Then the word of the first Psalm [v. 4] is fulfilled: "The wicked is like chaff that the wind scatters," namely, he flees but cannot escape.

But here someone would like to object: What should be said then with the word, which everyone leads in the mouth: From hell there is no salvation? For it is clear that the punishment of hell does not befall anyone except the damned. I answer: Although I do not remember to have read this word in the Holy Scriptures, it seems to me to be taken from this verse of this Psalm, then also from many other passages of Scripture. But it is ill understood by these carnal people and by all who do not know our theology, as if for this reason no one should taste hell, because there is no salvation from hell, since on the same ground we would also like to say that Paul did not taste heavenly joy (coelestia), because one cannot lose blessedness; and sin is no longer felt, because it has been forgiven in baptism.

Therefore it is true that when this fight is there, one sees nothing but hell, and that no redemption is before one's eyes, and one thinks that everything one feels is eternal. For it is the wrath, not of a mortal man, which must one day come to an end, but the wrath of the eternal God is felt here, which never comes to an end. He says: "Do not punish me in your wrath"; to be punished in the temporal wrath of a temporal man is low.

Then everything that happens in hell also happens here. There is not much lack of hatred and blasphemy against God, only that love is strong, like death, and zeal is firm, like hell, and here finally keeps the upper hand in praising God. Otherwise, love fights with hate, hope with despair, mercy with anger, praise with blasphemy, perseverance with flight, in short, heaven with hell in the hardest, fiercest and most severe way, with unbelievable agonies of the soul.

But what do we lose words for, since with all words we can obtain nothing but a mere indication (indicium) of this affliction? An understanding and a feeling of it cannot be obtained in any other way than by suffering and experience, although every one of us, if he is not without understanding, is told by his heart and conscience, when he hears this, that this is something that is indicated by these words, which is not yet known, but is terrible when it is known.

V. 7. I am so weary with sighing, I wash my bed all night long, and with my tears I wet my bed.

This verse can be arranged in two ways, either by taking the verb: "I am weary" (laboravi - I have worked myself to death) separately, without reference to another word (absolute), or by combining it with the words: "from my sighing. Although the latter order is the more common, we will leave it in place this time and keep the former. In this order, the repetition (tautologia) also seems to me to fit more appropriately to what has already been said, so that that the bed is washed with sighs or sobs (lavari) is the same as that the bed is wetted with tears; there the sighing corresponds to the tears, the washing to the netting, the bed to the bed.

In Hebrew it says: I will make my bed swim, and I will make my bed melt. One rightly asks from where any man should have so many tears? Augustine, as he is wont to do, follows spiritual interpretations, and many others follow him. But we take bed and bedding according to their grammatical meaning, in which the body rests during the night, as is the custom among men, and we understand the tears and the sighing in such a way that they, according to the exaggerated manner of speaking (per hyperboles), wash and net the bed. For it is never and nowhere heard that any saint has shed so many tears even in one night, let alone every night, that he has wetted his bed, let alone washed it.

But let us take the hyperbole in such a way that it is applied to the work of tears only outwardly. Otherwise, because the words of the spirit must be considered in the spirit, there will be no hyperbole if one considers the heart of the one who suffers this. The latter does not show how much he is able to do, but how much he wants and desires, as the Fathers say of Mary Magdalene, that she did not speak in right consideration (secundum) of her powers, when she said to the gardener [Joh. 20, 15.]: "If you have carried him away, tell me [where did you lay him?] then I will fetch him." For he who believes, hopes, loves, misses the fact that everything is possible for him. Therefore, because God looks at the spirit of men, but not at the works, and does not examine the outward appearance of the works, but at the kidneys and hearts of men, the prophet speaks here without hyperbole, yes, he says out of a righteous heart that he will wash his bed with sighs and tears. Even though he is not able to do this, it is still counted to him before God as if he had already done it, because he has such a fervent desire that he would like to do it. Therefore, we would do right if we read in the form of desire (optativo): Oh, that I had so many tears, that I could wash my bed with them every night! as Jeremiah, Cap. 9, 1, says: "Oh, that I had water enough in my head, and that my eyes were fountains of tears, that I might weep day and night for the slain of my people!"

So this verse is also a witness how terrifying this battle of death and hell is, that he wants to do the impossible so that he will be freed from it. And therefore I easily believe the stories of those who write that souls [of people] who were either still alive or had already departed, sometimes confessed that they would rather suffer the greatest chastisement of this life in this life until the day of judgment, than suffer a short time in purgatory. For this agrees very well with the opinion of this verse. But Hezekiah also, Isa. 38:15 [Vulg.], confesses that he would rather spend his whole life in bitterness than suffer these gates of hell. "I will remember thee" (he says), or (as it is better rendered in Hebrew) I will put home to thee (promovebo ad te) "all my years in bitterness of my soul." He wishes his whole life to be exceedingly bitter, if only it would befall him to escape this wrath and fury.

48 And this is also confirmed by the repeated presentation of what has already been said (tautologia), of which we have said above that this is a sign of the determination with which this movement of the heart seals its exceedingly great seriousness. See, then, with how many manifestations he demonstrates the suffering of this exceedingly miserable struggle, how he he-chooses to endure all the miseries of the world because he chooses to weep so many tears. What is left for such a one in the world to delight in? Is he not most perfectly dead according to the flesh, because he resolves to live unto God in the spirit, and chooses 1) not at table, not at work, not by day, not at a work [to weep] where others might weep; but in bed, and on his couch, and at night, when all others are at rest and refreshed from their weariness, does he take upon himself so great a task, and indeed a quite unheard-of one, that he will shed tears until he swims in them? Perhaps those who have once been in sudden danger of death can feel the meaning of this verse to some extent, but in the real battle of death and hell, this desire and this undertaking can easily be wrung from a man, yes, he himself easily undertakes it and does it if he can, and is ready to promise and do much greater things.

(49) "I am weary" (laboravi-I have labored) (he says); a very appropriate word for the present transaction, by which he indicates that he has been in anguish and in great distress. For so it is taken Isa. 53, 11. "Because his soul labored" (laboravit), that is, has been in great anguish, as it is said [Matt. 26, 38.], "My soul is sorrowful unto death." Here, I say, travail compels him to be willing to do and suffer such heavy and great things. Blessed therefore are they that mourn, because they shall be comforted [Matth. 5, 4.], who afflict themselves, weeping and humbling themselves, lest they should be compelled to suffer this affliction. Other things [to be said here] will be taught by custom and experience.

v. 8. My form is decayed with mourning, and is grown old; for I am troubled in every place.

Reuchlin has it thus: Verminavit ex iracundia species mea, in that he wants verminare [to be plagued by worms] to be the same in a transferred way as to be gnawed, as a garment is gnawed, destroyed and ruined by the moth. But it is the same sense as in our [Latin] translation. For the prophet wants to say that this fight has such a power that it changes the whole appearance of man. And this is not to be wondered at, since it also consumes the bones and the blood; therefore he says that through this affliction he becomes pale and shapeless. For even any affliction at last disfigures a man's deportment and reputation. But what other afflictions accomplish gradually, this one accomplishes rapidly in a short time by the exceedingly great violence of the attack of sadness. We read that many have suddenly turned gray through great sadness, how much more will people deteriorate and grow old through this struggle?

51 Similarly, Ps 39:11, 12 says: "Turn away thy plague from me, for I am faint at the strength of thy hand. With thy rebuke thou punishest man for his iniquity, and makest his soul languish like a spider. You make his soul languish like a spider." Hebrew it means: You have made his beauty like a little worm, that is, his face or his form. That's what he calls it here: My form is eaten up by worms (verminavit) or gnawed by moths. For facies is that wherein the beauty of man consists. Yes, the same words are also set Ps. 31, 10. as in this verse: "My form (oculus meus) is decayed with mourning" (ira).

Hence he takes oculum ["the eye" in the Vulgate] for appearance and "form," since it is also the same way of speaking among the Hebrews, and means both the eye and the form, so that the sense is [Vulgate]: "My eye is fainted," that is, in my whole form I am suddenly changed and made shapeless. This is done by wrath, not my wrath, but wrath par excellence (absoluta), that is, the tribulation of death and hell itself. So also the apostle [Paul] often calls wrath par excellence (absoluta) death and hell, as Rom. 5:9: "So shall we ever more be kept from wrath by him, after we are reconciled."

The same is what follows: Inveteravi inter omnes inimicos meos; better in Hebrew: among all that fears me. That is:

1) Baseler: eleZit instead of: eÜAit.

Fear is all around me, everything oppresses me, all creatures are against me, I have nowhere to flee to. That is why I grow old before time, because I am so frightened, and my whole reputation is changed.

This verse also indicates another power of this misery, which consists in the fact that he, fearful and frightened by the wrath of God, at the same time has no comfort in any creature, but everything he looks at is against him. For the creature acts with its creator, especially when even its own conscience deviates from him. Therefore, everywhere there is anger, everything is fearful, everywhere there are enemies. He indicates this by not simply saying: Among my enemies, but [Vulg.]: "Among all enemies", that is, among those who are all enemies, I who am in such a situation, since no one keeps it with me. Thus it is said in Job 9:19, [Vulg.] "No one will dare to bear witness for me."

(53) But I believe that David, who was afflicted with these tribulations, became very weak toward the end of his life and was so chilled that he could not get warm when he was covered with many clothes, as it is written in 1 Kings 1:1. For, as I have said, this wrath consumes everything and makes people faint. Thus we have described this terrible affliction according to its signs, according to the hardships [that it brings with it], according to the counsel [that there is for it] 1). Now follows the consolation and the leading out of death and hell.

v. 9 Depart from me, all you workers of iniquity, for the Lord hears my crying.

(54) Why then, dear one, does he alone cast away evildoers from him with such great displeasure in the sight of others? For in the 5th Psalm we have

55 ff] He says that those who establish the worship of disobedience, their own righteousness and spiritual idolatry. Furthermore, he calls them to depart from him, although he did not complain about them until then [in this Psalm], but only about the wrath of the Lord. What have the ungodly workmen to do with the wrath of the LORD?

1) People in this high affliction have no other counsel than the mercy of God. Cf. K 59.

Especially since such people, who are both completely sure and assume the opposite of God in everything than he complained about in this psalm, could not bother him in this challenge. And, what seems almost incongruous, he calls them away for this reason, because the Lord hears their weeping. Did those ungodly laborers then go about it, that the Lord should not hear him? To this we say:

(55) He suffers entirely from violent movement, and that very seriously, therefore he does not speak why he does it, but only what he does. For thus we see that those who, carried away by some violent movement, speak to themselves are, as it were, nonsensical, and speak things that do not belong to them, since we do not know from what cause they speak. Let us, therefore, go into the movement which prompted these words.

56] I see that this has been observed in general throughout the Psalter, that the prophet, as often as he has spoken in a particularly great excitement (exstasi), immediately attaches to it a short exclamation against the opponents, which is either full of indignation or of lamentation, as in the passage Ps. 116, 10. f.: "I believe, therefore I speak. But I am greatly afflicted. I said in my trembling, All men are liars." And after he had said in the 39th Psalm, v. 12. [Vulg.], "Thou makest his soul languish like a spider," 2) he immediately adds, "Alas, how nothing are all the children of men." But we see that in human affairs, too, the same thing happens in opposite ways, since when someone has recognized the matter and grasps the truth, he is soon carried away, and either becomes indignant or complains against those who hold or teach the opposite. An excellent example of this is St. Augustine in the 9th book of the Confessions, in the interpretation of the 4th Psalm [where we see] with what impetuosity he is carried away against the Manichaeans, while he is interpreting the Psalm, and what art it takes to teach the subject matter (proposita) in such a way, that one is led to and at the same time refute the opposite and make an attack against the adversaries. For how can we refrain from this, if we teach the right and true godliness, that we should not at the same time make an attack against the ceremonialists and those who act the word falsely, being full of indignation that they either do not know this or once taught us the opposite?

57. So also here. Since he had been instructed by this exceedingly great tribulation to trust only in the mercy of God, and that no righteousness of his own was sufficient, but he knew how those who had not been instructed by this temptation teach and do foolish and ungodly things under the appearance of godliness, and how inexperienced they are in these things when they occur, he calls them to depart from him. 1) Otherwise they are at hand to teach all men in the world (for this is what this kind of people generally do, who are most unwise wise and most unwise), as blind guides for the blind [Matth. 15, 14], who are always learning and never come to the knowledge of the truth [2 Tim. 3, 7]. Then, what is the greatest evil, they cannot be taught, persuaded or corrected.

(58) Yes, as Jannes and Jambres resisted Mosi [2 Tim. 3:8], so also these resist those who have gained salutary knowledge through the experience of such a great controversy, without ceasing and with insolent outrageousness, whereby a godly man is sorely afflicted beyond measure. Therefore he attacks them quite justly out of a zeal of love, in which he desires that the truth, which is known to him, should become common to all, and that the contrary error should be put to shame, by speaking full of exceedingly righteous indignation: "Depart from me, all workers of iniquity." 2c. Yes, there will hardly be a psalm in which the complaint about this challenge is described, in which the prophet does not at the same time punish and accuse these ungodly plodders, as we will see.

1) Because this postscript follows only towards the end of the following paragraph, we have anticipated it here to facilitate understanding.

(59) So it is only a violent movement of the heart that he tells them to depart from him because the Lord hears him. For what he wants by stating this reason, he gives to understand by what has been said before, namely, that God alone saves those who call upon him because of his goodness, since before him no one is justified by himself, and (as Moses, 2 Mos. 34, 7., says) no one is found innocent. Since this is the case, and he has explained this in the entire psalm, he rightly introduces that he does not want to acknowledge those who hold and teach the opposite. It is enough for him to know that the Lord hears his crying 2) 2c. Here also belongs the word Matth. 7, 23, which the Lord will say to those who prophesied and did deeds in his name: "Depart from me, all you workers of iniquity," because he uses the verse of this Psalm in general against all who trust in themselves and not in his pure mercy.

v. 10: The Lord hears my supplication; the Lord accepts my prayer.

In general he had said that his weeping was heard, now he describes in particular what kind of "weeping" it was. And note that he also repeats the name of the Lord three times: "The Lord hears," "the Lord hears," "the Lord accepts," to indicate the fervency of confidence and to fortify hope against the adversaries he defies.

But "supplication" in Hebrew is an expression that actually means asking for mercy and grace, so that it corresponds to the word above [v. 3.], "Lord, have mercy on me," and the following, since we have said 28P that grace and power may be requested. But the "prayer" [serves for this], to ask for averting the evil, so that it corresponds to the word [v. 2]: "Oh, Lord, do not punish me in your anger" 2c., unless someone wanted to say that this ["supplication" and "prayer"] is doubly set, in order to raise up and fortify the heart.

(61) Now these are words of hope, which exercise and admonish the conscience where it already has the upper hand, just as the fore-were the words of hope, which suffers and struggles and almost succumbs. We see that these words do not teach, but put into practice what was taught in the 5th Psalm in the verse [v. 12]: "Let all who trust in you rejoice" 2c.

(62) For the words themselves sufficiently indicate the manner and disposition of his heart, namely, that with great effort he sets before his eyes the mercy of God, in order to oppose it to the horrific images of sin, death and hell. For since it is certain that he speaks in hope and in the spirit, but does not yet stand before God in the present vision, it is at the same time certain that he is saved in hope, has obtained God's grace in hope, has comforted himself in hope, and speaks all this in order to drive away from himself the exceedingly burdensome multitude of those evils.

And it is this that he inculcates the goodness of God through such frequent repetitions, fighting what opposes it, as it were, with mighty and strong blows, and exhorting his weakness to hope through powerful sermons.

For this is how one must act (as this master teaches us) in sorrow, or when sin torments the conscience; not snoring, not yielding, but also not waiting until the affliction subsides of its own accord, or until the thing that contains the consolation appears present; all this is a behavior that serves to ruin; but one must fight bravely, sigh, and strive with all diligence to make firm the good opinion that God has toward us, as he said in the 3rd Psalm, v. 4. Psalm, v. 4. "But thou, O Lord, art the shield unto me, and dost set me in honor, and upright my head"; and in the 30th Psalm, where he complains of a similar affliction, he makes an exceedingly good firm confidence in GOD, and says [v. 6.], "For his wrath endureth for a moment, and he delighteth unto life," that is, our GOD does not want death and hell, but life and blessedness. So it is also said in the 32nd Psalm, v. 7. [Vulg.], "You are my shield against the tribulation that has surrounded me."

65 Yes, in all the Psalms, where this or a similar suffering is lamented, it is immediately remembered.

how to draw hope and have a good confidence in God according to the words of Wis 1:1: "Think that the Lord is able to help. For if this thought and this confidence of conscience do not arise, the tribulation will triumph, and there will be no one to pull us out. This confidence, however, is brought about with great effort, but not otherwise than through the Word of God and Jesus Christ.

66 So also here. Since he did not know at all that his crying was heard, he nevertheless arouses this confidence in himself by frequent remembrance and strengthens it by first repeating and asserting it, so that he also attacks the adversaries and is certain that one has God as one thinks of him. As hope is, so is the thing [which one attains through hope) (qualis spes, talis res), for in truth man is governed by opinions here also, but by opinions of GOD (that is, about GOD), may they be good or evil.

V.11. All my enemies must become ashamed, and be very afraid, and turn back, and become ashamed suddenly.

This verse could perhaps be understood by persecutors, because it calls them enemies, but in order for this last to be related to the previous, we do not want to understand any other enemies than the very XXX XXXX the evildoers. For we have said [§ 56] that the prophetic spirit in every Psalm is directed at the same time against these people, where this affliction is described, because (as I have said) the war and strife take place without ceasing with these ungodly people, who not only do not hear this humility of the godly and the praise of God's grace, but also persecute it, as the 109th Psalm, v. 16, says: "And he persecuted the wretched and the poor and the afflicted, that he might slay him." And the 69th Psalm, v. 27, says, "They persecute him whom thou hast smitten." With these it is found, as with Job's friends, that they boast that the afflictions of godly men are laid up for them by God deservedly; and they side with God against those, and pronounce it that God has rightly become hostile to them. Meanwhile they are themselves quite sure about God, as if they could escape the judgment of God.

Since everything that is held against these wicked people has the same effect as if one told a story to a deaf person, and they cannot hear what is of the Spirit of God because of their puffed-up carnal mind, the prophet desires that they be dealt with briefly and that their wickedness suddenly be put to an end, namely in such a way that, even if this kind of challenge should come upon them, they would feel the wrath of God and feel the terror of death and hell. So also Jeremiah prays, Cap. 17, 18.: "Let them be put to shame that persecute me, and me not; let them be terrified, and me not"; and there [v. 17.]: "Be not thou terrible unto me, my confidence in trouble." And Ps. 9:18, 21: "Oh that the wicked should be turned to hell, all the heathen that forget God;" and, "Give them, O Lord, a Master, that the heathen may know that they are men" (that is, that they are vain and liars).

(69) "For the law only causes wrath," Rom. 4:15, because it reveals sin, by which the conscience is put to shame, which, when it is put to shame, is terrified by wrath and death, and by the indication of the law recognizes that it deserves it. For this fear brings about a sudden and violent conversion, disgraces and frightens the hopeful, pushes them back into nothingness, and forces them to lay aside the pride of their own righteousness and to seek the mercy of God. For if they themselves have not been proved by this suffering in their own experience, they read, hear and do all in vain. "For only adversity teaches us to pay attention to the word" (as Isaiah Cap. 28, 19. says), that is, the word of God becomes understandable to the unintelligent when they have been well martyred through suffering. The cross of Christ alone is an instruction in the word of God, the purest theology.

70 But "very" and "suddenly" can be understood in two ways, so that these words refer either to the time or to the nature of the challenge. If it is interpreted to the time, it is this, that not

But if they are interpreted as meaning that they will not be afflicted with some minor affliction, but with the gale-force wind of this highest and greatest affliction, the nature of which is the most severe. But if the nature of the affliction is to be interpreted, it is that they are not afflicted with some minor affliction, but with the gale-force wind of this highest and greatest affliction, the nature and character of which is that it is exceedingly fierce, and therefore most fiercely humbling and instructing to grace, since both their own wisdom and their own righteousness make the wicked so obstinate and obdurate that, when they are sometimes struck with lighter temptations, they boast without fear, even in tribulations, as if they were righteous and sincere martyrs. So stubbornly do these ravaging wolves disguise themselves in sheep's clothing that they become even more hardened and strengthened in their ungodliness by what they are beaten with to make them mend their ways.

(71) But they cannot withstand this terrifying visitation (frigoris) if they are disgraced because of their sins and are terrified by the wrath of God. For this is the terror that casts down the secure godless people; in the same no one can stand but the sincere hearts that are rightly instructed by the fear of God and hope. Therefore, as impossible as it is to endure this wrath of God, it is exceedingly necessary for the unbelieving and unintelligent, and alone powerful enough and sufficient to humble them.

With such terror Paul was attacked from heaven, when he was surely striving for God with great impetuosity; suddenly a light shone around him, and he said with trembling and fear: "Lord, what do you want me to do? Apost. 9, 1. ff. Here is put into action what Jeremiah says, Cap. 23, 29: "Is not my word like a fire, and like a hammer that breaks in pieces rocks?" And in the 21st Psalm, v. 10. "Thou shalt make them as a furnace of fire, when thou shalt see three; the LORD shall devour them in his wrath; fire shall devour them." This he would not say if he had not experienced it. For this furnace of fire and the fire

It is precisely the punishing in anger and the chastening in wrath of the Lord that drives guilty consciences into insurmountable and inescapable fear, just by looking at and contemplating the divine judgment.

In this verse he compares the anger and wrath of the Lord, or rather, he interprets it in other words. For "to be punished in wrath" is nothing else than to be put to shame, that the conscience of man must be ashamed and is found guilty before the eternal judgment of God. But before this judgment the conscience of no man is found innocent, as the 143rd Psalm, v. 2, says: "Do not go into judgment with your servant, for before you no living man is righteous." For what does "not being righteous" mean but to be found guilty and to be put to shame? And again, Ps. 116:11, "I said in my trembling, All men are liars."

Therefore he wishes those unwise ones to turn back here and become ashamed, who are still secure in themselves and boast. He says [Ps. 21, 9.], "Thy hand shall find all thine enemies, thy right hand shall find them that hate thee." And again [Ps. 83, 17.], "Make their faces full of shame, that they may have to inquire after thy name."

For in this (as I have often said) the wicked differ from the godly, that both are liars, and not righteous before God, and are altogether vain, but the godly this affliction brings to the knowledge of themselves; when they have attained this, they flee from the wrath of judgment to mercy, and are saved, as it is said in Proverbs 12:7: "Turn the wicked, and they shall be no more." Some understand this to mean, "Turn them," namely, to the knowledge of themselves, and now that they have been humbled, they will cease to be ungodly through the attainment of grace. But where they have not been turned, they have no self-knowledge, therefore they do not seek grace, and remain in their vanity, falsehood, and ungodliness.

75 Furthermore, "to be chastened in wrath" is nothing other than "to be greatly terrified" (as he says), namely, that death and hell will be inflicted, and since this wrath is soon and suddenly

(As it is said in the 2nd Psalm, v. 12), blessed are all those who trust in him. For the wicked do not. For also in the same Psalm he indicates these two evils, as he says [v. 5]: "He will one day speak to them in his wrath (that is, he will punish and rebuke them), and with his fury he will terrify them" (that is, he will chastise them). And 1 Sam. 2:10. it is said, "They that contend with the LORD shall perish; upon them shall he thunder in heaven." And we have many similar sayings in the Scriptures, in which this mighty falling away and terrifying of the heart is described both in the saints and is prophesied against the ungodly, so that those who are humbled may be comforted and exalted, but those who are humbled may be struck down and oppressed, and so He wills that all men be helped and that no one perish.

But there is a beautiful play on words (allusio) in this verse in the Hebrew in the two words: "they must return" and "they must become disgraced", which could not be reproduced in the Latin (non retinuit). Because there it says by a transposition of the letters XXXX and XXXX. But he repeats XXXX, they must be put to shame, out of a fierce zeal, wishing that what he suffers may turn on the adversaries, so that they may also cease to be hopeful and persecute the humble, as it is said in the 54th Psalm, v. 7.Vulg.]: "Turn the adversity to my enemies," and Proverbs 11:8: "The righteous is delivered from adversity, and the wicked is put in his place," and Ps. 32:10: "The wicked has many afflictions, but he who hopes in the Lord will be embraced by goodness." So also in the 79th Psalm he asks that the wrath depart from him and turn to the wicked, saying (v. 5. f.): "O Lord, how long wilt thou be angry, and let thy zeal burn as fire? Pour out your fury on the Gentiles who do not know you (that they may learn to know you), and on the kingdoms that do not call on your name," so that they too may learn that they need your glory and call on your name. So also in this psalm the prophet prays that he may not be chastened in anger, but those who do not call on the Lord may be chastened.

But it is said 54 ff.] It is said that the enemies of the godly are primarily those who are called evildoers, who are the authors of the heart being secure in an evil way, and faith and trust in God not being recognized. Therefore, they have to deal with them continuously, which would not be the case if they were also sighted at times in a similar tribulation.

(78) Now, if anyone wants to understand by the evildoers and enemies the devils, who at this time of calamity fiercely persist, and urge despair by putting good works before [the challenged one's] eyes [and pretending] that if anyone had done them, he would have no cause to despair, so that they may quench the despair by presuming to have done them.

and strengthen presumption through despair, and meanwhile capture the soul through this kind of ungodliness, so that he does not serve God in the right godliness of faith and hope, for the sake of His goodness, - if someone, I say, wants to understand it this way, I have nothing against it. For the devils are in truth those who incite the soul to disobedience in the most unholy way under the pretense of obedience, since it is their nature to disguise themselves as angels of light, but then most when it should be least, that is, in the tribulation.

(79) But I believe that the prophet speaks against men (as I have said), against the enemies of true godliness, of whom it grieves him that he has heard and known that they drag very many with them to destruction (foveam) through their foolishness.

The seventh Psalm.

V. 1. The innocence (ignorantia) of David, of which he sang to the Lord, because of the words of the Moor, the son of Jemini.

(1) Many have struggled over what the purpose (scopus) of this psalm is, of whom the title says; and even now one argues about it. In the meantime, we want to follow the Burgensis, which seems to me to be closer to the matter [than others], and judges that it is not to be understood by Saul, but by Simei. In order to recognize this, we want to cite the words of the history from the 2nd book of Samuel. For there it is written in the 16th chapter, v. 5-11, when David fled from his son Absalom: "And when king David was come to Bahurim, behold, there went out a man there of the family of the house of Saul, whose name was Shimei the son of Gera. He went out and cursed, and threw stones at David, and at all the servants of King David. For all the people and all the mighty men were on his right hand and on his left. And Shimei said as he cursed, Out, out, thou bloodhound, thou loose man, the LORD hath recompensed thee for all the blood of the house of Saul, because thou hast reigned in his stead.

Now the LORD hath delivered the kingdom into the hand of Absalom thy son; and, behold, now thou art in thy calamity, for thou art a bloodhound." And when David's servants were about to kill Shimei, David said, "Let him curse, for the LORD hath said to him, 'Curse David. Who then can say, Why doest thou thus? And David said unto Abishai, and unto all his servants: Behold, my son, which is come out of my womb, is after my life: why not now also the son of Jemini?"

(2) It is therefore evident that the son of Jemini is called Shimei and is the one who cursed David, although Saul is also called a son of Jemini, 1 Sam. 9:21, because they were of the same family, as is said [2 Sam. 16:5].

3 At the same time we have the words about which David sang this psalm, namely the curses of Shimei, in which he falsely interpreted crimes against him as an exceedingly violent and impetuous slanderer. For we do not read of Saul that he spat out such words against David. Therefore, he must necessarily be

This is what the text of this psalm will tell us about the powerful words of abuse that are narrated in this passage [in the 2nd book of Samuel].

4. it still remains [to discuss] why he rather calls him XXX, which denotes a Moor. Almost all assume that it is a figurative speech, because blackness contains the taint of wickedness in itself, as also the poet [Juvenal] says: Hic niger est, hunc, tu Romane, caveto [This one is black, therefore beware of this one, O Roman], as on the other hand we call white the one who is pure and sincere, and [in the Latin language one says] of a heart that it is white (candor animi), if it is without falsehood, as also well-known proverbs speak. It is therefore assumed that David deliberately omitted the name of the same and called him by a new name that corresponded to his character. If this does not please you, you may think that he had two names, which can be seen very often in the holy scriptures, as you can see in the genealogies of Christ Matth. 1 and Luc. 3. So also of the father of Zacharias, Joada [2 Chron. 24, 20.], is said in Matthew, Cap. 23, 35. that his name was Barachias. But even then the reason remains that he preferred to call him by the name of a Moor rather than Simei, because this word describes his wickedness better.

5. furthermore, what his "ignorance" 1) is, since this happened to him, he already explains himself freely what he understands by it. For since David did not recognize the curses of Shimei at all [as justified], that even at his death he gave his son Solomon the command (1 Kings 2:9) that he should bring his [Shimei's] gray hairs down to hell with blood to punish his cursing, it is clear that he prays his innocence before the Lord, and that this "ignorance" is nothing other than his "innocence". For of that of which we are not conscious, it is also rightly said that we are ignorant in regard to it.

6. but since it is ungodly to rely on one's own

(Proverbs 12:2,²) and he is a fool who relies on his heart, Proverbs 28:26. Therefore, what has been said about this innocence is to be understood in such a way that nevertheless the judgment of God is to be feared, and one does not rejoice in the safety of innocence, unless we first give glory to God and confess before Him that His judgments are different from our judgments and the judgments of men, so that after we have received permission in this way, and without coming too close to His judgment, we confess our innocence before men. For David, when he heard that he had been falsely accused of crimes (to the extent that his conscience bore witness to it), nevertheless feared, because he knew that by God's command those defamatory words would be directed against him, that they would be true before God. He also did not completely rely on his conscience, just as the apostles did not trust each other when they heard that one of them was a traitor [Matth. 26, 22]. For such is the conscience of every godly man: however innocent it may be, it fears guilt where there is no guilt. This causes the fear of God and the unfathomable depth of His judgment.

Therefore, although David is innocent, he fears that he has done what he hears is being held against him, especially in the time of trial, when God seems to side with the adversaries, and he thinks that God is striking him for the sake of the things that are then held against him, even though he knows nothing about them. Therefore, as little as he is aware of this evil before himself and before men, he nevertheless fears that he might be guilty at least in his heart (for God tests hearts and kidneys [Ps. 7, 10.]), and teaches us in this Psalm the word of the apostle 2 Cor. 10, 18.: "For this reason a man is not competent, that he praises himself, but that the Lord praises him."

8 Although this psalm was made about David and his innocence, we must believe that this was also written for the teaching of all of us, since this evil of slander is common in the world, as Paul says,

2) Vulgate: "He who relies on his thoughts acts ungodly."

1) In the Vulgate, "innocence" is expressed by innocentia.

Rom. 15:4: "But whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope."

(9) But we shall see how they are minded, and what minds they ought to have, and are able to have, who in faith and godliness will bear and overcome the calumny. For he has placed this persecution exceedingly well in the seventh place. After having instructed us in the previous psalms in the calamity by which we are cleansed from sins, he now finally wants to instruct us completely to a perfect fear of God, so that we should fear that we have sinned even where we have not sinned, and be perfected by such a great hatred against sin and love for God, so that we fear unconscious sins, even what is not a sin, as sins.

(10) For this perfection we do not need a persecutor like Absalom, of whom it is certain that he will persecute us ungodly, but a slanderer like Shimei, of whom we must fear that he will revile us with truth, even though we are innocent, and yet we cannot let go of our innocence altogether, but should be like Job, who also suffers something of the kind from his friends, and says, Job 27:5. f.: "Far be it from me to do you justice; until my end come, I will not depart from my piety. From my righteousness which I have I will not depart; my conscience doth not bite me for all my life." Thus (as we touched on something of these things in the 5th Psalm above) we are indeed to confess our ignorance before GOD, who alone knows the hearts of men, but before men we are not to forsake our innocence unless our hearts punish us. For just as one should not deny sins before God (before whom no one is righteous), so we should also confess and assert the truth before men, before whom we can and should live without wrongdoing. And this instruction, which David obtained through what happened to him, he shares with us. Through it, we can avenge ourselves of slander far more blissfully than Apelles once avenged himself through his image. Therefore he says:

V. 2. In you, O Lord, I trust, my God. Help me from all my persecutors and save me.

(11) This is the first attitude (affectus) [that should be found in us (§ 9)], that we should not be carried away to vengeance and zeal against the slanderers and persecutors, as man is wont to do, who is vanity and falsehood ("vengeance is mine," he says [Deut. 32, 35. I will repay]), but we should take refuge in the Lord above all things, and denounce both the persecution and the slander before Him, with full hope and confidence in His help, which our innocence and good conscience will help us to achieve in this case.

12 So here he asks that he be helped by all his persecutors. For David was persecuted by two of them: Absalom with crew and action, Shimei with tongue and slander, who undoubtedly either was not alone, or at least did not please himself alone in the practice of this wickedness (in hoc malo); or he says "of all" in the same sense in which Ps. 6:8 [Vulg.], "I have grown old among all my enemies," namely, because he suffers violence and slander at the same time, everything seems to be hostile to him, and there is no one left to come to his aid, as indeed everything is set against him as a single individual. Thus he says, "From all my persecutors," that is, because all men and all things persecute me. In what "help me" and "save me" are different, I believe, there is not much; he may have understood "helping" for the good and "saving" from evil, or one can assume that he repeated the same thing tautologically for the sake of emphasis.

(13) This verse can be held against those who do not believe that faith and hope are necessary for those who want to pray or receive the grace of God or the healing effect (effectum, as they say) of the sacraments, since the prophet asks here for his help and salvation, because he also boasts that he has trusted in the Lord. This is certainly the case with everyone who believes, hopes or loves. But he says: "In

I trust in you", not in me, not in a human being, which we have dealt with more extensively in the 5th Psalm above.

V. 3. lest they take my soul like lions and tear it apart, because there is no savior. 1)

14 Jerome, according to the Hebrew, has thus: Ne forte rapiat ut leo animam meam, laceret, et non sit, qui eripiat [lest, like a lion, he rob and tear my soul, and there be none to pluck it out]. "Rob" (he says), rend, obtain for prey, as a raging beast is wont to do, lest someone understand a simple capture; then "like a lion," namely, a cruel wild beast, rend and also tear. What? The house or the cattle? No, but my soul, that is, my life, which the body has from the soul, as in the preceding Psalm.

36] is said.

He does all this so powerfully to indicate the greatness of his need and to put it on his heart, so that he may receive an answer all the more quickly, yes, so that he may also provoke himself to a more ardent passion of the heart, because we must pray vigorously and with serious intent if we want to obtain something. But there is no doubt that David was in such a situation at that time that it was to be feared and expected that he would be caught and torn apart by Absalom and Shimei as by roaring lions, and he had no other hope and help than in God. In such a situation are also all others who suffer violence with slander; these understand these words and their opinion very well.

V. 4. 5. O LORD my GOD, have I done these things, and there is injustice in my hands; have I done evil to those who lived peaceably with me, or have I wronged those who were hostile to me without cause.

15 Here he comes to the matter of which this psalm deals, and he treats the words of the Moor Shimei, as the title says. The slanderer had accused him, first of all, that he was guilty of the blood of the house of Saul, and said, "Out, out, you bloodhound, you loose man!" [2 Sam. 16, 7], secondly [v. 8] that he had taken his kingdom by force. Therefore the Lord repaid him in two ways, by shedding his blood again through his own son, and by taking his kingdom from him. He complains about both and testifies that he is innocent.

(16) But the prophet teaches us to meet this second challenge in a twofold way, namely, to say no to it (negative), and to attach a condition to it (conditionaliter), so that we bring with us the good confidence of an innocent conscience as far as conduct before men is concerned, and fear our hidden faults before God's judgment seat. For this twofold disposition is found in these verses, in this way: Lord, my God, so little have I done these things, so entirely is this wrong not in my hands, so entirely am I not the author of it, that his blood has been shed and he has lost his kingdom, that I also have not repaid him and his own for the evil they have done to me, although I could have done it more often, when I had him alone in the cave in my power, 1 Sam. 24, 5. and took away his spear in the camp, 1 Sam. 26, 11. ff. (17) Not only have I not repaid him evil, but I have shown him good for evil, as Saul himself testified, 1 Sam. 24:18, when he said, "You are more righteous than I am. You have shown me good, but I have shown you evil." So much is missing that I could be a bloodhound. Now if something has been hidden about me, if it is found that I have not been upright, and you judge me so, I am ready for what I deserve, for my enemy to persecute my soul 2c. 18 But here he seems to refer the "wrong" to the latter slander, as to the former the words, "Have I done these things," so that the sense is: I have not done that which is falsely imputed to me of the blood, neither is there any wrong in my hands; that I have obtained the kingdom, by this I have wronged no one, because I have not done this out of my iniquity, but by thy command.

19. but there is a much stronger emphasis in the fact that he has done so much evil to himself.

We are to learn to pray against slander with all our soul (magno corde), so that we may testify to our innocence, but also fear God's hidden judgment and be ready to suffer any misfortune if we are found guilty of slander. But this should be done in such a way that, although we testify to our innocence, we also fear God's hidden judgment and are ready to suffer any misfortune if we are found guilty. For even if you have God's commandment for you in every work, you must still fear that you may not have done right and deserve to be commanded the opposite, as Abraham had indeed received the repeated promise in Isaac, but nevertheless willingly offered him as a burnt offering in fear of God's judgment.

20 Thus also David, although he was not aware of anything, nevertheless gives up his kingdom and says, 2 Sam. 15, 26: "If the Lord says to me, 'I have no desire for you; behold, here I am, he will do with me as he pleases,'" and also allowed Shimei to curse, believing that this was also commanded to him by God, fearing everywhere that it would be right and just for him.

(21) However righteous, holy, innocent, true and godly your cause may be, it is necessary that you conduct it in fear and humility, always fearing God's judgment and trusting not in yourself but only in His mercy. Judas Maccabaeus fell in an entirely righteous war [1 Macc. 9, 18.], many are defeated in the most righteous matters and divine dealings, as is written of the children of Israel in the book of Judges Cap. 20, 20-25. is written, because they acted not in fear, but in confidence in their righteous cause, not in God's mercy. But also the apostle says 1 Cor. 4, 4: "I am well aware of nothing, but in this I am not justified."

22) This is what David, when tribulation came upon him, teaches by his example, that no one should arrogate justice to himself, insist on it, rage for revenge, seek retribution by force or by right, as our clergy rage now, who want to be considered righteous and wise before others, but each one must first be anxious in humble fear that he may really do so.

before God, and shall offer to suffer the punishment he deserves.

23. Then, as he is innocent, he should pray against the adversaries, who cannot have a just cause against any man who has an innocent conscience; for that only God can have, and has. The judgment of God is different from that of men. "A man looks at what is before his eyes, but the Lord looks at the heart" [1 Sam. 16:7]. Therefore, if a man judges differently than what is before his eyes, he is a slanderer, like Shimei here.

(24) And to indicate this humility and fear of God, he carefully put in the title, "Because of the words of the Moor," because he knew very well that he deserved the persecution of Absalom, but does not excuse it; but the blasphemies of Shimei he does not acknowledge, or if they are true, he claims that he was unaware of them. He had deserved by his adultery and murder the evil that was done to him by Absalom, but he was not aware that he deserved the words of Shimei about Saul's blood; and yet he fears that he deserved them because of the terrible and hidden judgment of God. How this happens is what a godly and God-fearing heart feels when it is tormented at times either by slanderous people or devils.

The word which the Latin translation has translated in this place, and correctly, by iniquitatem ["wrong"], Hebrew XXX, actually means what iniquitas means among the Latins, that is, an injury, a wrong, less or more than it ought to be, as it is wont to be in dealings. Thus here it would have been wrong for him to usurp a foreign kingdom against the will of his neighbor, if he had done so. And what we have [in Latin]: Decidam merito ab inimicis meis inanis. Jerome has translated more correctly: And I have not left my enemies (who frighten me) empty of me, in that he wants (as I have said) that David not only did not repay his enemies evil with evil, but even did not leave them empty of him, that is, did good to the wicked. For this is also a kind of revenge, when one repays the offenders for their good deeds.

because we are also to love our enemies, although I do not know whether this translation sufficiently reflects the Hebrew.

(25) Notice, then, what an evangelical level of righteousness David has attained. For to repay evil with evil seems fair to a carnal sense, but it is also forbidden in the law of Moses, unless it is done by the judgment of the authorities (superioris), not by one's own power. The opposite level to this is to repay good with good; this is rewarding and servile. These serve God in such a way that they do not want to suffer evil or death, although he only presses us with evil so that we learn to serve him out of a pure heart (pure) without any consideration of good or reward. The third stage is to repay good with evil. This is vicious, yes, more than vicious. The fourth stage, repaying good for evil, is the gospel of Christ. But he says that he preserved this stage in an excellent way, because not only did he not repay evil with evil, 1) but to those who had repaid him for the good they had received. He did good to those who had repaid him for the good they had received, as was said above about Saul.

V. 6. So my enemy pursues my soul, and seizes it, and tramples my life to the ground, and lays my honor in the dust. Sela.

This does not seem to me to have been spoken out of a confident courage (affectu fiducia), as many think, as if he had been certain that this would not happen because he did not deserve it. For we believe, because he began in humble speech, that this is also sung in the same fear of God. For, as I have said, although he was not aware that he deserved the blasphemy, but rather knew that he had been called to rule by God's command, yet in many respects he could not trust it and boast of it, both because God (as I have said) is wonderful in all His ways, and because we ourselves do not sufficiently recognize our heart.

In this way, it can happen that you either do not understand the commandment correctly or do not fulfill it correctly, and thus become worthy through a completely hidden sin, that the commandment is either annulled or changed, and then God stands against you, whom you think is on your side.

By this fear (as I have said) Abraham was instructed in the sacrifice of Isaac. This is clearly the highest level of the fear of God, where you are forced to renounce God Himself and His commandment for you, and to fear that He is against you, in short, because you have to fear that God does not want what He has commanded and willed, but forbids and hates it, while in other things we only fear that we have not done what it is determined is commanded.

Who could bear this inconstancy of the divine contradiction (that I say so), which is exceedingly constant by an incomprehensible constancy, if he is not a man chosen according to the heart of God [Apost. 13, 22.] like this David and Abraham, since here the truth of God Himself seems to waver, and he (according to all human judgment) is regarded for it as inciting to hatred against Himself? But in such a way the servile attitude of a hireling must be killed, in which we worship God for our own sake, in which we are puffed up in God and for God's sake, one against the other, are hopeful, jealous, hateful, and do all evil under His name and service, and for the salvation of souls (as they say). For which of us, having either Abraham's or David's promise, would not enforce this very commandment of God even against the angels, if someone were to expect us to do the opposite? The carnal mind is so deeply planted in man that it is necessary for God to show Himself to us in an inconstant manner, as it were, so that we may be instructed not to cling to any thing, even a divine and eternal thing, with a wrong mind.

The prophet offers three things to be destroyed, which we lose with great pain, the soul, the life, the honor. The soul he offers to persecution and seizure, the life to it, that it be trodden to the ground, the honor that it be laid in the grave. For in the Hebrew it says: And he buries or lays my honor in the dust, which, however, is the same with our [Latin] text [et gloriam meam in pulverem deducat], but clearer.

1) Instead of reüit should probably be read rsäüiüt.

But he seems to distinguish "soul" and "life" in such a way that "soul" (as we have said above s§ 14) is the essential life itself, by which the body is animated, but "life" is the change or that which is put into work by the soul in the body (res gestas), as also with the Greeks ζωή and βίος seem to be distinguished. And although we use the same word "life" in our German language, we take it in a very different sense when we speak of natural life and the works of life.

30. and he declares with these words his mind which he had when he said 2 Sam. 15, 26. "saith he unto me, I have no desire toward thee; behold, here am I," and 2 Sam. 16, 10. "The LORD hath said it unto him, Curse David." For then he was ready to lose the soul, the life, the honor of the kingdom, as is evident. Therefore he now sings this in this spirit, to instruct us all by his example what we and those who suffer similar things should think, speak and do. So the meaning is: If I have been such a man before you, so be it, I will gladly allow it. Let Absalom and Ahitophel kill my soul, and let there be no one to help me from my persecutor and deliver me from the one who seizes me; I am ready to suffer your will and endure the punishment I deserve.

Then may he also trample to the ground, that is, destroy and annihilate everything that I have lived or accomplished in life, so that it will henceforth be nothing in the eyes and ears and memory of men; I will gladly lose this. I may also be found in my life as one who has been evil, useless, harmful, who is worthy of being trampled to the ground in the most contemptible way, whom everyone throws down and tramples on like dung in the street; but my enemy shall be exalted, esteemed great and lifted up to heaven, and all that he does shall be in the sight of you and in the sight of the People wonderful and great, and all that he has always done, is doing, and will do, be highly respected.

31 Not only that, but my honor, my present power, and the power that is to come, he shall not only make low, but shall bury it in the dust, and it shall never return, and it shall be eternally obscured. Let the throne of my kingdom perish, let my wife and child perish, let my friends perish, let my possessions and everything perish, let the glorious promise given to me by the future Christ perish, which I have loved incomparably more than anything else, on which alone hung my hope, honor and joy: I too, with my father Abraham, sacrifice to you this Isaac of mine, who is by far the most beloved of all.

32. O what a man who is truly chosen according to the heart of God! Who can duly measure this movement of the heart, let alone talk it out? We think it is the greatest thing to suffer death, and to approach life. He is not only ready to die an ordinary death, but also to be seized by the persecutor, and, delivered into the hands of the enemy, to be taken away, not to fall asleep among the crowd of loved ones who mourn him, but to be killed among raging, jeering, triumphant enemies. For what do we not do, what sorrow do we not cause, if even one work or word, which is ours, is censured or not highly praised? But he, who was highly praised by so many victories in wars, by so many miraculous deeds, by the victory over Goliath, over the bear 1) [1 Sam. 17, 36. f. 50. f.], by so many godly works, by so many excellent institutions (augmentis) of the service of God, does not only allow that what is his remains unpraised, but also that everything is trampled on forever like the dung in the streets and, as everyone tramples it more and more, is destroyed.

What kind of murder, what kind of impetuous actions do we at least take on ourselves, if we can't do them by deed, even if we can't do them by deed?

1) In the Baseler, the Wittenberger and the Erlanger the comma after "Goliath" is missing.

against the whole human race, whether for ancient titles of dominion (ditionum), or whether for some minor privileges at the present time in his own affairs? But he, who is thrice anointed king by God's command, who has received the infallible promise that Christ should be born of his race, not only willingly gives his whole kingdom with such a great honor, but is also ready never to receive it again, to remain rejected and without honor forever, after all this so great and immeasurable ornament is buried even in the dust. What can be thought purer, deeper, more sublime, to say it briefly, more wonderful than this attitude?

He had all this by divine right, and it was commanded to him in more than one place by God. Why does he not rage for the divine right? Or is he ungodly, that he does not reclaim, protect and maintain his dominion with bloodshed and death? as we are nowadays considered the most godly people, when we move heaven and earth for temporal things, pretending that it is a divine right, but do not fear God at all, who, even if we had something according to divine right, would rightly destroy everything, because he has been offended by this pride and strife.

(35) If David feared that God's commandment had been changed against him, who had been made king by so many signs, by so many commands of God, by so many anointings of the prophets, and who had received the future Christ by such a firm promise, what commandment, what promise, no matter how much it comes from God, can be a cause for hope, for war, for strife, and similar misery? It is truly to be feared that the church is least of all where one rages most for the church, since we see that God does not like it at all when one misuses His promises and is terrible in His counsel and commandments over the children of men.

(36) But this is enough. I am not saying this because I want to see anyone deprived of his right or of what is due to him, or because I want to see him deprived of his right or of what is due to him.

that it may be attacked, but because we are to be instructed by these words of Scripture and examples that he who obtains and possesses something, however justly titled, should possess it with fear; and not by force, but with prayer and patience defend it, and be ready to yield if it pleases God. For the Scripture cannot be sufficiently explained unless it is brought into connection with examples of the present time, and shown by them what it means.

37 For it is seen that both the Greek and the Latin Churches have sinned in the dispute over the principatu, because neither has yielded to the other, whereas in the fear of God both should have yielded. Neither of them would have lost such supremacy, but it would have been preserved much more happily if it had been preserved not by contending but by praying bishops, that is, not by the will of men but by God's mercy: as here David indeed prays, and yet at the same time also offers himself by asking, as it were with Christ, that the cup be taken from him, and yet obediently yields to the will of God. Thus it is written in the law of Moses [Deut. 16, 20, Vulg.]: "What is right, you shall also do in a right way." Thus it comes about that even he who has the most righteous cause before God is culpable if he does not defend the same in the fear of God. God does not look upon the proud and the quarrelsome, however righteous they may be.

Thus we read that it happened to Job, for whose cause God Himself passed judgment, and yet rebuked him Himself [Job 38:1 ff].

Such fear and humility are also necessary for us today, who fight for the integrity of theology and the power of the Church. We can be criminal before God on both sides, even in the most righteous cause, if we do not seek the mercy of God through prayer rather than through trust in our cause. We must pray that the truth may win the victory. If it does not please God that this should be done through us, let it be done through someone else who pleases Him. Hope no one to serve or defend in a good way any commandment of God, if he transgresses the first of all commandments (which is the service of God in fear and humility). For by this commandment all others are regulated; without it they are no longer commandments.

40 Nothing pleases GOtte that is not done in fear and humility. But where is this to be seen in the church today? What is the church today but a kind of disorderly bunch of mobs, where we rave only for righteous things and divine right, without all fear of God; and while we fulfill all the commandments, we ruin the head, the life, the rule of the commandments. O blindness, blindness, blindness!

V. 7. arise, O LORD, in your anger; rise above the wrath of my enemies, and restore me to the office which you have commanded me. 1)

This is said in Hebrew in one verse. However, it is a very obscure verse and even today it is not known what or what it is talking about. Jerome translated it thus: Surge Domine in furore tuo, et elevare indignans super hostes meos, conserge ad me in iudicio, quod mandasti [arise, O Lord, in thy wrath, and rise in displeasure against my enemies; arise, and stand by me in the judgment which thou hast commanded]. But indignans super hostes is not so included in the Hebrew. I too will venture to do so, and translate the verse word for word thus: Surge Domine in ira tua, et leva in iracundiis tribulatorum meorum, et suscita ad me a iudicio, mandasti [arise, O Lord, in thy wrath, and rise above the wrath of them that affright me, and raise up judgment for me, thou hast commanded (it)]. Since the word [XXX] which our Latin translation) renders by in finibus is related among the Hebrews (and in general it is ambiguous) 2) to the word "to anger," therefore, following Jerome, I have derived it rather from anger than from the area (finibus).

1) Vulgate: Sur[^] Domino in ira tua, et oxaltaro in ünibus inimioorum meorum, et oxsurgo Domino, Dons meus, in praecepto, quoã manãasti.

2) These brackets are set by us.

But this peculiar expression (sologism): a iudicio, mandasti, which our Latin translators) have eliminated (sustulerunt) by the pronoun quod, is also found in other places, as, Ps. 51, 10.: Exsultabunt ossa, humiliasti, where we [in the Vulgate] say: ossa humiliata, as if one would say here: a iudicio demandato. According to my sense, I would not add quod, but quia, as: "for thou hast broken them," "for thou hast commanded." But the word exaltare [in the Vulgate] or elevare [in Jerome] or leva [Luther] is equally ambiguous, and may be understood of raising (levandum) and of ravaging. This is also set here without a word governed by it (in statu absoluto), and can mean that the Lord may send desolation upon the fury of the enemies, in this way: Arise above the fury of the enemies, that is, bring about the desolation and destruction of the fury with which those rage against me who frighten me, namely Absalom with his. It amounts to the same thing expressed by leva or elevare or exaltare. For he means to say, Arise, that is, arise, that thou mayest arise, and stretch forth thy hand over them against their fury; entirely in the same sense in which he says Ps. 138:7, "When I walk in the midst of fear, thou restorest me, and stretchest forth thy hand over the wrath of mine enemies."

Et suscita ad me [and encourage you to me), where for ad me [in the Vulgate] we have: Domine, Deus meus, because 3) can be read without periods [XXX], both "my GOtt" [XXX] and: "to me" [XXX]. And suscita is said of him who is awakened and encouraged, as it were, from sleep, as it is said elsewhere Ps. 44:24: "Awaken thee, O Lord, why sleepest thou?"

A iudicio, or, as our Latin translation has it, in praecepto, seems to me to be understood of the office from which the judges and the rulers take their name, of which it is said in the first Psalm, v. 5: "Therefore the wicked do not abide in judgment," and Ps. 122, 5: "There the chairs sit in judgment," so that a iudicio means the same thing is as for the sake of judgment or in matters of judgment, as in the 68th Psalm, v. 30.: "For thy temple's sake (a templo) at Jerusalem shall the kings bring thee gifts" (that is, propter templum), as it is also Ps. 4, 8.: 1) "From the time of their corn and wine they are increased." This use of this letter X, or of the preposition a or ab, seems to be synonymous with a conjunction, which gives the reason, on the opinion of the word Ps. 81, 5.: "For such is a manner in Israel, and a right of the GOD of Jacob." So also here a iudicio, that is, because it is the office (iudicium) which you have commanded.

So also Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. 19, 6. when he appointed judges, he said, "See what ye do, for ye keep judgment not unto men, but unto the LORD," and afterwards [v. 8. Vulg.] he appointed [Levites and priests and of the chief fathers in Israel] that they should judge the judgment and the cause of the LORD among the inhabitants of Jerusalem (ejus). Thus, he asks that God intercede for the sake of judgment, so that the wicked may not prevail, who exercise their tyranny rather than the judgment of the Lord among the people. But it is easy, if one accepts this opinion, to understand by praeceptum the same as by iudicium, because the judges in the court execute the commandment of God, which the tyrants rather overrule, as has been said.

So this must be the meaning to which this grammatical understanding helps us: Arise, Lord, and show your anger, suffer these things no longer, oppose the fury of my persecutors and stretch out your hand over their cruelty, so that you may nullify their attacks against me. Wake up at last and remember me; and this I ask, not for my sake, but for the sake of judgment, lest all things be sacrilegiously reversed and confounded, while there is no one to manage affairs, especially since, according to thy order and commandment, affairs are to be managed. So much for the grammar.

42 Let us now consult theology and ask why he gave the enemies the

What is the reason for this? What is the reason for God's wrath, and again claiming the kingdom, since he has been so willing to renounce it and do good to the enemies?

First, after he has offered himself and his own in fear and humility, it is certain that this prayer does not come from an evil heart. Then, having given glory and righteousness to God, he surely prays against those who take dominion by force. For the fear of God causes that in a right way the divine commandment is carried out, by which, as he knows, the kingdom and the administration of judgment are commanded to him. In addition, take that he does not seek what is his own, but what is God's, because you (he says) have commanded that I should administer judgment among the people. Therefore he did not want to put the word "kingdom," but rather the word "judgment," so that he might show that he is leading God's cause, not desiring the pomp, but the work. "For if anyone desires the office of bishop, he desires a good work" [1 Tim. 3:1].

(43) He calls upon God to be angry, not because he wants them to perish, but in the sense expressed in the previous psalm, that they may feel the wrath of God, and by resisting them and destroying their attempts, God may restore them and make them well. If they do not feel the wrath, the unwise people continue to increase their sins, to persecute the godly and the devout Christians, and even to persecute God's commandments without ceasing, thinking that they are doing God a service. For how should the community of the godly exist in the world if God did not finally reveal His wrath against the wicked and execute the cause of the wretched and the right of the poor? [Ps. 140, 13.]

44 Therefore, as he himself makes the deep sea boil [Job 41:22], so he again stills the floods of it and sets a goal for the sea, saying, "Hither shalt thou come, and no further; here shall thy proud waves be laid down," as is written in the book of Job [Cap. 38:11]; likewise, as he stirs up the fury of the wicked, so he again subdues it. Thereby he makes known his anger that their wickedness is not pleasing to him.

1) Cf. Ps. 4, § 72.

45 He asks for three things: first, that he may rise up and show his anger by withdrawing his good will from them, which they insist upon; second, that he may put down the anger of those people and nullify their plots; third, that he may turn back to him and restore to him the judgment of God, not because he deserves it, but because God has not only promised and done it, but also commanded it. Now he seeks nothing more than for the truth of God to stand firm and for his command to be fulfilled; if that were not the case, he would gladly yield to its wrath.

(46) And here the troubled heart, after the darkness of the tribulation is over, begins to breathe again, trusting in the mercy of God, so that we too may learn to do the same in our tribulations, for this has been done and written as an example to us.

V. 8. that the people may gather to you again, and for their sake come up again.

(47) In this verse (so that we may remain in this attitude after it has begun in us) David shows that he is not concerned for himself but for the people. For first of all, he asked to be reinstated in office, without regard for himself or the people, but with only God in mind, who had commanded that he should first serve God's will in it. Now he descends from love toward God to love toward his neighbor, so that he may serve the people with the same command of God. I beseech thee, O Lord, that the multitude of the people may again surround me, follow me, be subject to me (for he speaks in the manner of a wish [optative] in the indicative futuri), as he boasts in the 144th Psalm, v. 2. He says: "He who subdues my people under me", because it is for their good if they obey you, since you have given me to them as king, so that they do not go astray like sheep without a shepherd, and are not, like a people without a leader, exposed to any robber. If I am unworthy, yet thou art worthy that I should obey thee, and they are worthy that they should obey thee.

not be given up to plunder and scattering for my sake, but after I am restored as head, bring the exiles of Israel together, Ps. 147:2, and the members to their body.

(48) For a godly ruler of the people, as far as he is concerned, will gladly lose everything, and will only desire to perform the service he owes to God and man, and will fear that his misfortune will bring danger and ruin to the people.

49 As an example for this serve you St. Athanasius or Hilarius or similar people, who were expelled from their [bishop's] seats at the time of the Arian sect. For I do not see from where one could take an example in our time, since no one would dare to commit anything that would make him worthy of expulsion. Although these holy fathers were quite far from shameful ambition, they nevertheless wished (as Hilarius himself confesses), because the office of the priesthood was imposed on them 1), that the Arians might be overthrown, and that they might serve GOtte in their [bishop's] seat and be expelled. But they feared with sorrow and fear that the people entrusted to them, because they were absent, would be damaged by the heretical wolves, and felt it painful that violence was done to the word of God. If you pray the Psalm in the person of these people, you will also see the example of David and experience how well the words rhyme with the movement of the heart.

50 It would be the same example if a bishop or high clergyman (praelatus) were banished or expelled for the sake of truth, or because he administers his office godly, and the people were turned away from him, seduced by poisonous persuasion, slander and lies.

(51) For if the people were not endangered by another evil, they would certainly be provoked to lie and to hate the truth by slandering and reviling their prelate, who is a good man. Now since by such [calumnies] all Israel is perverted, and for the sake of fei-

1) Basel: eovaxosiü instead of: impositi.

David sighs with such vehemence that he also invokes the wrath of God against their anger in a prayer that was certainly necessary for the preservation of the people. For it is better that those wicked perish than that the people be entangled in wicked opinions, since the apostle [Gal. 1:8, 9] even expresses the wish that those be accursed who had turned the Galatians away from the truth.

52 But he chose the words with special care. He did not mean to say, "That the people gather to me," but says, "That the people gather to you," that is, they will be gathered to you. By this he indicates not only what we said above, that the judgment is not of man, but of God, which is held at God's command. Therefore those do not gather to men, but to God, who gather to a man who serves in the work of God. He also uses the expression (tropum), according to which it is often said of the Lord in Scripture that He is in the midst of His people, as Ps. 46, 6: "God is in her, therefore she will abide", and 2 Cor. 6, 16. from 3 Mos. 26, 12: "I will walk among you, and I will be your God, and you shall be My people."

53 In this way he speaks very appropriately for this matter. For Absalom and those who follow him do not seek to serve through love, but to rule by force, not to gather the people to God, but to themselves. They want to be the idols around which the people are to gather, for it is not God's honor and the people's salvation that they seek, as befits faithful mediators, but their tyranny. Therefore, with this word he strikes at the arrogance and ambition of all those people who preside over the people only for the sake of ruling for their own benefit. In order for this not to happen, the chosen man of God asks so godly and fervently. This evil is certainly rampant in the Church today out of God's wrath, since we fear the punishments (censuras) of men far more than the threats of God, because we look at the persons, we do not see God.

54. So also this [Vulg.]: Propter hanc [synagogam populorum] in altum regredere, or as the Hebrew text has, "Come up again." He does not say, Set me up again, but: Come thou up again. He says, Not for my sake, but because of the congregation of the people [Vulg.: synagogam populorum]. For I grieve for them, their fall 1) and seduction grieves me greatly; for them I pray, not for me. See then, just as above in love toward God he asks for the judgment that God has commanded, so here in love toward the brethren he asks for their salvation, being godly concerned on both sides that it may not be enough for God, and that the people may perish for His sake, so that the office of God may exist, that He may govern the people, and the obedience of the people that it may be rendered, lest the people be without God, or God without the people. Oh, this is a word that the bishops, shepherds, rulers, and heads of the Church (magnatibus) should be commanded to keep in mind and apply with zeal!

55. But when did God forfeit his height, so that it should be necessary for him to ascend again? This happens when an ambitious man sits in God's place. For since this one subjugates the people of God more than God, he certainly exalts himself, as much as there is in him (as Paul says [2 Thess. 2, 4.]), above everything that is called God or worship, and this one is the Antichrist. Now if it should happen in the church that all bishops were ambitious and ruled over the people, and the people submitted themselves, not to Christ, who could doubt that the Antichrist ruled? But God will come up again when He throws down the people who are ambitious like Absalom, and again sets up judges, as of old, who gather the people to God, teach God's commandments, and set aside the statutes of men.

(56) No one is surprised that this means that God is coming up again, that is, that God is coming down again.

1) In the Jena and Erlangen: eauMiu instead of: easurri.

I mean that his judgment, his power, his office, his service will be awakened again, since we know that the prophet speaks in the spirit. Therefore, this is to be understood from the spiritual ascension of God, who ascends when we become subject to Him, hear His word, see His works, and all this through the service of men.

Therefore, this Psalm is by far the most fervent prayer to obtain good bishops and rulers [of the Church]. Would that God would have us pray this prayer today, each one in particular, with the fervor that the words require, for never has it been so highly necessary to ask for this.

For what do we see in the church today that corresponds to these words? Where are those who bring the people to Christ with the same zeal as to themselves? Who takes such great care that Christians should fear God more than the power of the bishops? In sins that offend God, we even laugh safely; when we offend the bishops, we bring all kinds of plagues upon ourselves.

59. Furthermore, we compel to our splendor, to our ceremonies, to our power, to our laws, but so much is lacking that we gather ourselves to the word of Christ, to the love of the Spirit, that we also strive with the greatest zeal that the people do not recognize Christ and the truth, nor that the believers in Christ are in harmony, especially princes and kings, until we have also submitted to this, to teach that it would be a nuisance if the people were to hear Christ's pure, godly teaching (pietas), because (in our opinion) there would be no small danger involved if the people knew the gospel purely and loudly, if they preferred the word of God to the words of men, if they preferred to do right, godly works rather than childish, glittering works: Of course, hunger and poverty would result from this, or at least the splendor that we have snatched from the world would fall away. In short, today is that dangerous time in which we are forced to worship not God but men.

V. 9. The Lord is judge of the people. Judge me, O Lord, according to my righteousness and godliness.

60 Here he explains himself clearly and gives an account of what he wants to be understood by the return of God, by the judgment that he has commanded him, by the community of people who gather to God. Why, he says, should I not speak like this? It is not we who rule, who judge, who speak; the LORD judges the people, his alone is the judgment among the nations, he speaks, he judges, he does all things in us. "I will not be lord over you, (saith Gideon Judges 8:23.) neither shall my son be lord over you, but the LORD shall be lord over you." Behold, the holy man did not allow the people to be gathered to him, since he was also called upon to do so, but led them back to the Lord.

61. whereas 1 Sam. 8, 7. the Lord said to Samuel: "They have not rejected you, but me, that I should not be king over them," not as if it were evil to desire and have a king (for afterward he himself gave them kings), but because in a blind excitement they sought a king more than they sought God, since they did not seek that they might be brought to God through the king; Therefore, they were worthy of a tyrant who subjected them to himself, not to God, as happened to Saul, whose desire they had.

62. from all this it is clear that it is a manifest wrath of God when He Himself does not judge or rule, but lets ambitious people like Absalom hold the judgment seat, so that we are not worthy to hear God's word nor to see His works, as Christ foretold Luc. 17, 22: "the time will come when you will desire to see a day of the Son of Man, and you will not see it."

In Hebrew, the future tense is: "He will be judge of the people," which can be understood either as a wish (optative) after the manner of a prayer, as follows: I beseech thee that thou mayest be the judge of the people, lest thou be the judge of men, and thy people be deceived by the words and works of men; or as assertingassertive in the manner of a confidence that the prayer is heard (and this pleases me), in this way: I have confidence and am sure that I am heard, that again your word, your work, your judgment will gather the people whom those wicked have scattered with their words and works and have turned them away from you for my sake.

Therefore, after having first led the cause of God and the people, he finally leads his own cause and asks that his innocence be made manifest, since neither God's nor the people's cause could have been restored if his innocence had not been vindicated by the overthrow of the wicked. So now the need in which the honor of God and the salvation of the people stand forces him to ask that his cause be vindicated. For as long as he is unjustly condemned, neither God's judgment nor the obedience of the people can truly take place, since they do not hear the unjustly condemned, but hear those who unjustly condemn and persecute him.

65. Thus we see that it is not enough for someone to suffer for a righteous cause than for the sake of truth, if you command GOD's cause and are willing to yield and be laid in the dust with your honor, but you must earnestly pray that GOD be judge and vindicate the cause of truth, not for your own benefit, but for the service of GOD and the salvation of the people, whose salvation is not without danger, nor without your fault, if you, in foolish humility, do not pray most earnestly for the preservation and restoration of the truth and your righteousness. For you must not care so much how humble and despised you may be, as that the people may not at the same time be alienated from truth and righteousness and entangled in lies and injustice. You must suffer lies and injustice, but in such a way that you do not lose love for others, who are concerned, not about how you rise, but about how they should be treated, so that they do not become angry and perish. "For the sake of my brothers and friends (he says [Ps.

122, 8.)) I will wish you peace." Thus Paul gives thanks to God (Phil. 1, 12, 13.) that his bonds not only did not hinder the gospel, but even helped to promote it.

(66) He says, "Since you will judge the people, and this is yours alone, and so the people will gather to you again, and you will be in their midst, as I have asked, now, so that this may proceed the more blessedly, judge me also according to my righteousness and piety, to show how the invectives of the Moor the Jeminite are false and lying, so that my falsely accused righteousness may not in anything harm this your judgment and the salvation of the people.

But we have said in the fourth Psalm [§§ 4 and 5] that in Scripture "my righteousness" is something different from "the righteousness of God," namely, that the latter is the own righteous cause of each one, by which he is blameless before men and in his conscience, although it is not sufficient before God; but this is the grace and mercy of God, which also makes us righteous before God. Therefore, he carefully adds "my" to separate it from the one of which he says at the end (of this psalm, v. 18): "I thank the Lord for His righteousness." He may be dividing his righteousness and his piety between the two above-mentioned pieces [v. 4.], "Have I done these things," "is wrong in my hands," which Shimei had reproached him with; so that his righteousness is that he was not guilty of Saul's blood, yea, rather, that he did not repay those who did him evil with like, neither did he leave his enemies empty of him; his piety, or righteousness, or simplicity (as it is in the Hebrew), is that he did not usurp Saul's kingdom by his own power.

But what is that [that is added in the Vulgate] super me? Jerome translates: Which is in me. But which man's righteousness is not in him? But perhaps he adds this to make a greater distinction from to make [and emphasize] that the righteousness of God, by which we are justified before God, is not in us, but in God and apart from us, namely, so that He may not leave anyone an opportunity to puff himself up before God on account of his own righteousness, although for the sake of other people's salvation one must seek to justify piety before men, as has been said.

V. 10. Put an end to the wicked and promote the righteous, for you, righteous God, test hearts and kidneys.

Again, the [Latin] interpreter uses a different translation here, as he is wont to do. For what he translated in the fifth Psalm by malignus, saying [Ps. 5, 6]: Neque habitabit juxta te malignus, he translates here by or nequitia, and what he translated in the first Psalm [v. 1] by impiorum, he has rendered here by peccatorum. But what impious, impietas, malignus, malignitas means (impious, impiousness, wickedness, malignity) has been abundantly said in the first and fifth Psalm. Moreover, the Latin interpreter has taken away the word "righteous" at the end of this verse and connected it with the following verse against the Hebrew and the Greek, also not without impropriety, by saying [v. 11. Vulg.]: "My righteous shield is with the LORD", as if the righteous could have another, an unrighteous shield with God.

In Hebrews and in Jerome it says thus: "Let there be an end to the wickedness of the wicked, 2) and let the righteous be vindicated; the tester of hearts and kidneys [is] the righteous GOD." But he teaches us by this example that we too should work more by prayer to GOD against the wickedness of the wicked for the innocence of the righteous than by our own efforts and bluster. For we fight in a different way than the wicked; they fight with violence and rebellion, but we fight with prayer, with words and with patience.

1) Thus Luther translates in the first translation of the Psalms (in this volume Col. 8). Jenaer and Erlanger eonsuEtur. In the Basel is consummetni- throughout. The Wittenberg edition has eorikurntztur soon, < ori8Ulniri6tur soon. The sense is the same in both cases. The Vulgate says eousuruetur.

"Let it be consumed" (says the prophet), which is as much as "let it come to an end," let it fall away, let it cease, as in the 104th Psalm, v. 35: "Let the sinner come to an end on earth, and the wicked be no more." On the contrary, the opposite is requested, "that the righteous be confirmed," that is, that he be given prosperity, that he be promoted and fortified, the more the ungodly are consumed. And it would not be unrighteous to take justum, in contrast with the wickedness of the ungodly, as an abstractum, in the neuter gender, for righteousness, or the righteous cause, or the cause of the righteous, as the apostle Rom. 5:7. says, "Scarcely any man dies for righteousness' (pro justo) sake"; but there is little in this.

(68) But it must be understood that David also prayed this verse as an example to us, in order to instruct us in the right attitude. For he did not pray it because he sought revenge, but out of a zeal of love for God and man, just as the preceding ones. For those who desire vengeance pray not last, but in the first place for the downfall of the adversaries. Here, however, he was first concerned for God, then for the people, and so he comes to his cause in turn, and lastly to the adversaries, of whom he wishes for their sake to come to an end, so that the service of God and the salvation of the people will not be endangered (as we have said). This danger cannot be averted unless the wickedness of the wicked is brought to an end, and the cause of the innocence of the righteous is judged and confirmed by God being judge and avenger. Therefore, just as at the time when David suffered the tribulation, the wickedness of the wicked consisted in the tyranny of Absalom and his, who oppressed justice, so in the Church, for anyone who is unjustly oppressed, this wickedness is the violence and tyranny of his Absalom, which he suffers.

69 We have not yet had "hearts and kidneys"; they are frequently thought of in Scripture, and we want to treat them here once and for all. The third chapter in the third book

The text of Genesis, which instructs the priests about the peace offerings, deals almost entirely with kidneys (renibus seu renunculis), the nets of the intestines, and the lard and fat of the intestines, and makes the offering consist of these. It is probable that from this passage came the so frequent mention of the kidneys, therefore we must consider their nature.

The naturalists say that the two kidneys are attached to the loins, and these are the instruments of unchastity and pleasure, just as the heart is the seat of fear and confidence, the spleen of laughter and happiness, the liver (jecur seu epar) of love and hate. Therefore they also want that ren comes from the Greek word, which means to flow, because from the kidneys flows the shameful moisture of unchastity. So also the loins, in which the kidneys rule, have the shame of unchastity upon them in all Scripture, as in the word [Luc. 12:35.], "Let your loins be girded." And Heb. 7, 10.: Levi was still in the loins of his father Abraham. And (Gen. 46, 26.): Out of the loins of Jacob had come [six and] threescore souls. It is clear, then, that by "kidneys" are meant the pleasures and lusts which must be sacrificed to GOtte by the killing of the cross. 1)

The same pleasures or the joys that are connected with it also mean the net of the liver and all fat, that all joy, all love with its pleasures are to be sacrificed to God, and that one is to rejoice and delight in nothing but God, who alone is to be loved. Thus it says 3 Mos. 3, 16: "All fat is the Lord's. Let this be an everlasting custom." Paul, taking away the covering of Moses, Phil. 4, 4. 2) expresses this thus: "Rejoice in the LORD always, and again I say, Rejoice." David also understands Moses in the same spirit and shows that "fat" means joy, Ps. 63, 6: "That would be my heart's joy and delight (adipe et pinguedine repletur anima mea).

1) In all Latin editions erueis is found, not eai-Ms. Roth offers: "of the flesh". Our reading would probably like to be put right according to Rom. 8, 6, namely erueis -- which happens through the cross.

2) In the Latin editions: priino Tdessal. ultiuo. Luther may have been thinking of 1 Thess. 5, 16.

When I should praise thee with a merry mouth."

Therefore, he who kills love (amore), unchastity, pleasure, earthly and corporeal things, and loves God, enjoys God, has his pleasure in God, and also enjoys what is God's, sacrifices to God the liver, the kidneys, the lard, the fat, the net. This is what the law commands the priests, that is, all Christians, who are the priestly race and the royal priesthood, the holy people, the people of ownership [1 Pet 2:9].

3) St. Augustine agrees with this, who everywhere understands the kidneys as the pleasures. Rightly (he says) is the pleasure of temporal and earthly things attributed to the kidneys, because this is also the lower part of man, and it is the region where the pleasure of carnal procreation dwells, through which human nature is transferred by the production of offspring into this miserable life, which is full of deceptive joy.

But the heart, because it is the dwelling-place of sensation, signifies the counsels, the aspirations, the mind, the judgment, the opinion, the disposition, the thoughts, the aestimationes, and the like. Therefore he sets the heart rather than the kidneys, because pleasure is both sought and pursued by opinions, and each is gratified by that which he judges to be good for him when he has attained it. Therefore the apostle Rom. 8, 7. says that to be carnally minded is enmity against God, because carnal wisdom seeks the lusts that are contrary to God, and is moved by them, is carried away by them, which God has forbidden. The meaning, then, is that GOD alone searches out, knows, examines, and tests the thoughts and pleasures of all men, the desires and lusts of all men, for he discerns the spirits accurately (est spirituum ponderator), Proverbs 16:2. [Vulg.]

But why did he want to say this at this point? Or in which context does this stand with the preceding? He had said: Let the wickedness of the wicked come to an end, and let the cause of the righteous continue. But because the judgment of men is different from that of God, indeed, God's judgment before men is just the opposite, because they look at what is in front of their eyes, the judgment was passed on David on the basis of Absalom's and Shimei's reputation that he was a bloodhound and guilty of only misfortune. It says in 2 Sam. 15:13: "The heart of everyone in Israel follows Absalom. Thus Absalom had a delicious reputation and was just, righteous and good in the eyes of all men; but David was foul and wicked, evil and harmful. Since it is therefore a tremendous challenge to be abandoned by all the world, since all are united with the adversary, he necessarily appeals to God's judgment, who judges according to the heart.

71 And with this procedure he consoles himself and strengthens his hope by taking a right and good confidence in God, as if he wanted to say: Though all forsake me, yet all fall to Absalom, though he is strengthened, yet I decrease and fall away, yet, O Lord, since thou art a righteous God, and judgest differently from men, testing us all according to the heart and kidneys, thou knowest how wrongly they act; You see the heart and the kidneys; what they think, what they seek, what they delight in, you recognize; again, what I think and want; you are well aware of this, although the latter has the beautiful appearance, but I lack it; but it is different in the hearts and kidneys. Therefore, I ask you to put an end to their wickedness and to promote my righteousness. For in Hebrew this verse is evidently one containing a petition, since the little word XX is added, which is translated by the adverb "o" or "I beseech thee" (obsecro), I beseech thee that there may be an end of wickedness, as in the 118th Psalm, v. 25: "O¹) Lord, help."

(72) So we are instructed by this verse that we should not fall away from the cause of truth, even though many, or even all, of us may belong to the adversaries.

1) In the Vulgate: "0", in Luther: Obscuro. - Erlanger: Ps. 128.

should fall away. For even today it is nothing new that the whole multitude errs with all the great ones and takes the unjust cause in defense. And even though it is hard and difficult to bear this standing alone, since the foolish men boast for this reason alone that their cause is insurmountable, yet God lives, whose judgment must be invoked and firmly adhered to, because He tests hearts and kidneys, for He is a just God. Therefore, the word "righteous" definitely belongs to this verse,²) because the whole force of this sentence lies in this word, and through the contrast it indicates that men are unrighteous judges.

From this it follows that hearts and kidneys are taken in two ways, either as they are not killed nor offered to God, or again as they are made righteous and cleansed by grace, because he immediately also speaks of the pious hearts, showing which hearts God, who tests and searches the hearts, accepts, saying:

V. 11. My shield is with God, who helps the devout heart. 3)

The Hebrew text is translated like this by Jerome: Clypeus meus in Deo [my shield is in God]. For it denotes protection and defense. And they are words of a man who encourages himself to hope in GOD against the multitude of adversaries who rely on men as protectors, especially against the words of Shimei 2 Sam. 16, 8: "Behold, now thou art in thy calamity," and "the LORD hath delivered the kingdom into the hand of thy son Absalom." So (he says), you rely on a man who judges according to outward appearance; I have confidence that I am protected by God, who judges according to the heart. Therefore, the emphasis must be placed on the pronoun "my" and on "God" (domino), in contrast to the pronoun "your" and the word "men". Your shield is with men, "my shield is with GOD". For so shall we also do according to this example in a like case.

2) Cf. § 67.

3) Vulgate: ^u8tumñ6jMorinmmeums Domino, yui kslvos taeit reotos oorão My righteous assistance is from the Lord, who helps those who are righteous^s of heart.

In the same way, another emphasis must be placed on the pronoun qui and the accusative rectos, in this way: Man helps the evil hearts, but "God helps the pious hearts." For these words are necessary for those who suffer such things, so that they may acquire in their hearts such a constant good confidence (opinionem) in God, and keep it against all reasons that urge something else, so that they do not fall away from the hope in God's help.

But what a "pious heart" is, we have abundantly spoken of in the first Psalm [v. 1, § 6 f.]: "In the counsel of the wicked", namely, that he has a pious heart who has the right mind (opinionem) with regard to God, who is not guided by his own mind, that is, who believes and hopes in God. For faith alone makes the heart righteous, purifies and fortifies it through a right, true, holy opinion of God. And this serves the purpose very well, since Simeon endeavored to prove his curses also with the reputation of the LORD: David was rightly driven out, and Absalom was rightly come into dominion, to show how the wicked hearts give themselves a righteous appearance by a beautiful appearance, and defile the pious hearts, especially when the applause of the people is added to it.

V. 12. God is a righteous judge, and a God who daily prophesies. 1)

It is different in the Hebrew: GOD is a righteous judge, and a strong one who wraths daily (indignans); and what is rendered by "a strong one" (fortis) is the name of GOD, which is XX, so that it would be more correctly said: GOD is a righteous judge, and a GOD who wraths daily; 2) therefore also "and patient" [in the Vulgate] is an addition. The interrogative numquid with the ordinary punctuation of the verse belongs to the interpreter, not to the text.

1) Vulgate: Deus iudex justus et fortis et patiens, numquid irascetur per singulos dies? (God is a righteous God and strong and patient; should God be angry every day?)

2) We have followed the reading of the Wittenberg: indiAQatur; in the other editions: indiAHLtor. This reading: iudi^nutur is repeated.] 80.

78) David's hope increased so much in this trial that he not only did not doubt that he was heard and would be saved, but also admonished the adversaries to fear God's judgment and vengeance, and announced to them that whatever they had done against him would come upon their heads. And although he sang this after the tribulation was over, so that it may seem that he, instructed by the outcome of his tribulation, was comforting the afflicted and reproving the wrath of the afflicted, and teaching others by his example and the danger of his adversaries, it is nevertheless to be believed that in the midst of this trade 3) he had such thoughts, which he publicly expressed afterwards in this song. For he never despaired of God, therefore he recognized that it must come to pass that this would happen to his enemies, just as also now and always every righteous person, when he sees the wicked raging unjustly against righteousness, confidently thinks and says that God, of whom he knows that He is a righteous judge, will not suffer this, as it is said in Ps. 9, 19: "He will not forget the poor man so completely." And this David indicates not indistinctly, since in the same history Sam. 18, 5.] with such great concern he gave the order that they should preserve his child Absalom for him, because he knew and feared that the evil would fall back on his head, as it did, and here he announces it beforehand to all those who follow that one.

Now let us hear what this preacher proclaims to the ungodly adversaries, desiring in godly care to snatch them from danger, and in truth repaying them good for evil. This you should know, GOD is a judge, but a righteous one, who does not look at anyone's person, nor is moved by the crowd, nor is deceived by the praise of men, nor is taken in by appearances, nor is differently minded by favors, nor is bribed by gifts. For by these things men become not only unjust judges, but also despisers of GOD, the righteous judge, thinking that it is enough to please men. Again, for the sake of men, he does not condemn the lonely, the violated, the cursed, the oppressed, the poor and despised. In short, even this single word, "God is a righteous judge," has power, if rightly considered, to comfort the humble and to terrify the hopeful. Peter testifies, in the first epistle Cap. 2, 23, that it was powerfully demonstrated in the suffering Christ, saying, "But he put it in the home of him who judges aright." For he who considers this word easily forsakes vengeance; indeed, he also laments for his adversaries that they bring God's judgment upon themselves.

80. And "the strong one is angry daily," that is, continually, so that you wicked do not think that God is merciful to you, because you rise up and are mighty in wickedness. You should know and believe that it is different from what it seems; God is angry, He detests you, He is angry, He is angry (for all this, they say, is what the Hebrew word means) daily. All this is said to the wicked, who neither believe nor fear, because they do not feel the wrath. For the words of the Spirit are proclaimed of an absent thing, which is not seen, but must be grasped by faith. Our [Latin] translation seems to reverse everything by referring the first part (of the verse) to the ungodly and the last part to the godly. For that God is just and patient, we understand [in the Vulgate] from this, that this passeth over the wicked, who must be terrified; but that he is not angry daily, that this passeth over the good, who must be comforted, according to the words of Ps. 103:9, "He will not always be angry, nor hold wrath forever," and Ps. 55:23, "He will not leave the righteous forever in disquietude." But the Hebrew text rhymes better with what follows.

V. 13: If one does not want to convert, he has sharpened his sword and strung his bow, and is aiming. 1)

1) Vulgate: Nisi eonyerm tueritis, stage suum vidradit, urenm suum bstëndit, et xaravit illum sif you do not convert, he will draw his sword; he has drawn his bow and slashed him).

In Hebrew it is said: Si non convertet, gladium suum acuet. But also the one who sharpens and sharpens the sword prepares it for swinging, so that there is no great difference between sharpening and drawing. Of the word: Si non convertet it is doubtful whether it refers to God's threat, 2) or to the wicked who is to be converted, although Jerome refers it to the one to be converted by saying: For the one who does not convert, he will sharpen his sword. Perhaps the verbum stands without closer relation (absolutum), so that si non convertet is as much as: If no conversion will take place. But if it be said, "If ye be not converted," or, "For him that is not converted," or, "If there be no conversion," it takes nothing from the sense; which we will now see.

The prophet takes a lesson from a crude, human parable in order to frighten [the wicked], because he speaks against ignorant and hardened people, who do not grasp the sharpness of the divine judgment (of which he had spoken before), if it is not shown to them by the application of human sharpness. Therefore he does not speak of a rod, of a stick, nor of any other sharp punishment among men, but only of that which brings death, namely of the sword and the bow, in order to bring to their minds the judgment of eternal judgment, of eternal death, of eternal sharpness. For what is the sword of God but the word of eternal judgment? Of this it says in the Letter to the Hebrews, Cap. 4, 12: "The word of God is living and powerful and sharper than any two-edged sword"; by which Christ will say: "Depart from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire" [Matth. 25, 41]. For the word "sword" means at the same time the work of cutting and killing, especially since it is said that it is sharpened and drawn for this purpose.

82. to the same unintelligent people it refers that he, not satisfied that

2) In the original edition: venm eoMininationsNi; in the Wittenberg, the Jena, the Weimar, and the Erlangen: veum eoinminalörern; in the Basel: Del eorllminationerll. We have followed the latter reading.

When the sword is held out to them, they also add the bow; they do not have enough of the bow, but also describe the arrows. The neck and forehead of wickedness are so hard that they need so many threats, and yet they still do not soften. But the bow is the same as the sword, namely the word of judgment, which is repeated again and again in a different way. That he says: "He has prepared him" is the same word as above [v. 10]: "Promote the righteous", so that you should understand that the bow is prepared, strained and applied to the wicked, in order to slay them now, just as the sword is drawn to cut them down.

But he describes beautifully with these words that the wrath of God is exceedingly near upon the wicked; yet they do not understand this until they feel it. For what would it have availed Absalom and Ahitophel if they had prevailed in their wickedness for many thousands of years, and then suddenly they had been cut off to eternal death by the sword of God's wrath? Nevertheless, it would be seen that the wrath would have been a sudden and exceedingly close one for them. Thus it is written in the Book of Sirach, Cap. 5, 4. 7-9.: "Think not, I have sinned more, and no evil hath befallen me. He is able to be angry sooner than he is merciful, and his anger against the wicked has no end. Therefore do not delay turning to the Lord, and do not put it off from one day to another. For his wrath cometh suddenly, and shall avenge it, and destroy thee." And in the 34th Psalm, v. 17: "But the face of the Lord is upon them that do evil, to cut off their remembrance from the earth."

V. 14: And hath laid upon it deadly projectile; his arrows hath he prepared to destroy. 1)

He remains with the simile, but very appropriately expresses at the same time the eternal torment, which is to die and to burn. Vas sein Geräth], to speak in the Hebrew manner, denotes as a general expression any work that is to be done.

1) Vulgate: in so varavit vasa mortis, savütus 8UÄ8 arüentibus eüeeit sAnd thereon he hath prepared instruments of death; his arrows he hath made to burn).

The word "instrument" is used in all things, as Ps. 71, 22 [Vulg.]: "I will thank you with instruments of psalm" (in vasis Psalmi), that is, with musical instruments, and Ezek. 9, 1 [Vulg.]: "And every man has an instrument of killing in his hand", that is, an instrument of death or killing. Thus the apostle Paul Apost. 9, 15 [Vulg.] vas electionis, which is not understood by those who do not know the idiosyncrasy of Hebrew to be the same as in Latin instrumentum electum his chosen instrument, namely because Christ wanted to use him to convert the Gentiles before the other apostles. But those [who do not know the Hebrew] understand it to mean that he alone received into himself the grace of election (gratiam electionis), although Christ expressly added that he would therefore be a chosen instrument (vas electionis), "that he should bear his name before the Gentiles and before the children of Israel," and that he should suffer much for the sake of the word of Christ. So here he calls the arrows and deadly projectiles "implements of death" "according to the same Hebrew" peculiarity, so that the unintelligent would not think less of this threat if he simply called them implements, either for play or for hunting, but so that they might pass through the terror of temporal death to the terror of eternal death.

"His arrows he has made burning", he has added for reinforcement (per auxesin), and either he declares or repeats "deadly projectile". So that they would not again disregard the arrows, he reproaches them with exceedingly harmful and deadly arrows, while he beautifully maintains the sublime way of speaking, which consists in short and mighty words. Jerome translates: He has prepared his arrows to burn. Our [Latin] translation speaks darkly and almost un-Latin (barbare). For what does it mean: "to prepare burning arrows"? (ardentibus sagittas efficere)? does it mean that they, themselves burning, should hurl arrows? The occasion [for this clumsy translation] was that the Hebrew text says XXXXXX in the pluralis, which Jerome translated by "to burn". It should have been said thus-can: And thereon Hai he put projectiles to kill, his arrows he prepared to kindle, or: that they should be kindling. For the Hebrew cannot be translated word for word in this way: He prepared his arrows to be flaming.

It was not enough to say, He hath made his arrows fiery, though he spake of them. For the word "he hath made" or "he hath prepared," of which we have said in the first Psalm [v. 3, § 62] is here expressed by \wedge 2, which does not mean that something is made by a master craftsman or by art, but that someone handles it and uses it, so that it denotes that both the deadly projectile is already prepared and the fiery arrows are already prepared, but God uses them and handles them in such a way that they kill and set fire to them, whereby He presents the already dawning wrath and sharpness before the eyes. For he is already dealing with it, that the wicked shall die and burn, even though they do not yet die and burn.

Moreover, the expression "burning" also denotes persecution and desolation, as in the 10th Psalm, v. 2. [Vulg.]: "Because the wicked is rash, the wretched must burn" (incenditur), that is, he suffers persecution. The summa is this: By these words "death" and "burning" he undoubtedly proclaims eternal death and hell, of which it is said in the sixth Psalm in the words "wrath" and "fury," likewise "punish" and "chastise," likewise "be put to shame" and "greatly terrified." Job also complains about these arrows [Cap. 6, 4], and elsewhere in the Psalter we will also see it.

It should be noted that in no psalm have we had such a great threat and indignation against the wicked, nor has the Spirit attacked them with so many words. For in what follows he also enumerates their attacks, and shows that they will not only be in vain, but will also fall back on their heads, so that it may become clear to all who suffer violent blasphemies, for their comfort, how much God hates the slanderers before others. For it is against slander that this psalm is actually written (as I have said).

v. 15. Behold, he hath evil in his heart, he is with child with mischief; but he shall bring forth a defect, 1)

He describes their mischievous plots, which are ultimately corruptible to "none but their own authors," and calls them iniquity, toil, and wickedness. Jerome translates thus: Ecce parurit iniquitatem, et concepit dolorem, et peperit mendacium [Behold, he gives birth to iniquity, and is pregnant with toil, and gives birth to falsehood]. The first word, of which we have already said that it is unrighteousness [in the Vulgate] and iniquity [in Jerome], is in Hebrew just the word s, of which we have heard above in the 5th and 6th Psalm. Psalm 2), that from it the "evil-doers" (operarios iniquitatis) have their name, where at the same time it is also said that the same word is more often translated by toil (dolore), as in the 10th Psalm, v. 7: "His tongue causes toil and labor"; likewise Ps. 90, 10: "And if it is delicious, it has been toil and labor." Therefore it could also have been said here: Behold, he begetteth toil (dolorem).

But these two words and XXX, that is, toil and labor (labor et dolor), are commonly associated with each other, as here and in the Psalms already mentioned, so it would be more correct to say here: And he is pregnant with labor (laborem). For it actually means "labor" of work, as in the 127th Psalm, v. 1. "It worketh in vain that buildeth thereon." To this corresponds in our German language the common way of speaking in the same numerus of words and with the same meaning: "It is toil 3) and labor," so that XXX is really "toil," from making tired, XXX labor, from working, to express the toil and difficulty which is in the anxious undertaking of the heart, and in the mind's arduous Struggle, fatigue, slackness and fatigue.

But we have said that the life of those who act ungodly is such, for [Isa. 48:22.] "The ungodly have no peace, saith the Lord," and come not to the rest of which Christ says, Matt. 11:28. f.: "Come unto me, ye that labor and are heavy laden (as if he meant to say, ye that are in XXX and XXX toil and labour), and ye shall find rest for your souls." So very near is the punishment of the wicked, that in the very thing wherein they do evil they are smitten and troubled. Finally, pleasure is also work, and Pliny says: "Even all pleasure produces disgust when it is frequently recurring;" and Augustine, in the first book of his "Confessions," says very well: "You, Lord, have commanded it, and so it has happened that every disorderly mind has its punishment in itself. And in the Book of Wisdom it says, Cap. 5, 7: "We have grown weary in the way of wrong and destruction, and have walked in difficult paths, but we have not known the way of the Lord.

This punishment, or hardship, or work, is quite real and especially wearying, as often as the endeavor occurs that one wants to deliberately fortify his own against godliness, and, as the apostle Rom. 10:3 says, does not recognize the righteousness that is valid before God, but strives to establish his own righteousness, which is manifested in exceedingly evil and spiritual deeds of shame. Therefore, we have said above that this evil is most prevalent among those who strive to become righteous through superstitious spirituality (religione), through idolatry, through disobedience and their own self-invented suggestions and works, while in the meantime they leave the commandment of God or of men unfulfilled, which they were required to fulfill. For these, because they walk contrary to God, are also contrary to God, and they necessarily suffer many complaints, so that of all that they undertake, nothing remains but toil and labor, as the preacher Solomon in many places quite appropriately calls vanity and misery of spirit [Eccl. 1, 14, 2, 11, 17, 21, 4, 4, 6, 8], whereas while those who are driven and guided by the Spirit of God enjoy great peace in God, even though something sad happens to them. Thus we see that XXX is translated first of all injustice (iniquitatem), here unrighteousness, then trouble; if all this is brought together in one, we get wickedness, which is quite anxious to be held under a respectable title for righteousness and godliness. For true godliness does not need toil to be godliness.

(87) So David, already fortified by hope and having conquered his temptations, laughs at the violence and plots of his slanderers and oppressors; indeed, he laments them before the eyes of all, saying: "Behold (he says) what has come to pass with my slanderers; let anyone see how great a misery they have fallen into, how incomparably more wretched they are than I." (87) And so David laughs. Not only does God threaten them without ceasing, not only do the sword, the bow, the deadly projectile and the flaming arrows hover over them, but they are also martyred by the present punishment, and they receive in themselves the reward of their wickedness, while they take it upon themselves and fiercely seek in what way they might suppress me, and make themselves secure when I am removed from the way. They have more grief about how they may destroy me than I have about perishing. Yes, I, who have surrendered to God's will, await everything confidently. Those cannot be sure and calm until they give birth to what they conceive and fulfill what they intend. And yet, because their thoughts go against righteousness and God, they torment themselves in vain with the toil and labor of these thoughts, for they make designs against God which they will not be able to carry out, Ps. 21:12.

88. but the prophet touches on what Absalom said 2 Sam. 16, 20. and 17, 5. f.: "Rathet, what shall we do?" Then with many counsels the matter was anxiously treated, how they would kill David. But all suggestions were in vain out of God's miraculous counsel, not unlike

The Jews acted against Christ with much trouble and labor, so that they would kill him.

89. We always find (says Augustine) that those who inflict the same suffer greater tortures than those who seem to suffer them. Yes, this is the case in the commission of any crime. How many reenactments does a robber fear? Which hour, which place, which person does he consider safe? With how much fear is an adulterer tortured? How many tricks does he use before he can reach his goal? Thus, in every misdeed, especially in slander, there are greater torments than advantages, since the wretched man must suspect all danger, all evil. However, the one who trusts in God is as fearless and sure as a lion, and despises everything by trusting in his good conscience, which testifies that he is walking in truth and innocence.

In this verse we are taught the best comfort 1) in the challenge of slander, namely, that we should command God's cause, and not be grieved or distressed, nor should we proceed noisily. It is enough that we know that we are leading God's cause, in which we are to share the suffering with those [blasphemers] in such a way that we are plagued by them outwardly, but they by themselves inwardly; they are to be our burden, while in the meantime not only we, but much more they themselves are a much greater burden.

Behold, then, the exceedingly wretched condition of the wicked and the slanderers. God is a burden to them, we are a burden to them, they are a burden to themselves. Who should not rather have mercy on them than be angry with them in great impatience? Verily, every one of us knows that this threatens the wicked, and that they deal with such things as are here enumerated. But when the hour of slander comes, we do not all persevere in this knowledge, and are too much grieved that the plots of the slanderers against us have happy progress.

We do not want to do anything against others, but we claim that they would not do anything against others.

Now let us look at the real meaning of the words. "Behold" (he says), as if full of wonder he invited all people to this delicious spectacle, which appears far different before our senses. "He gives birth to trouble" (parturit dolorem). He chooses the words very appropriately, since "to give birth" is as much as to exert oneself with great effort, as if he wanted to say that they are anxious for effort by taking the simile of women giving birth, by which he beautifully illustrates the anxious efforts of the wicked and the slanderers, which consist (as I have said) in fortifying their own against the truth with much care and danger, since (as it is said in Proverbs) One lie requires seven other lies to appear as truth. And St. Jerome says: The untruth (falsitas) needs many things to be considered as truth.

93 "And he goes pregnant with trouble" (et concepit dolorem). It seems as if he should have said in reverse sentence order: Behold, he is pregnant with labor and gives birth to trouble, because the pregnancy is there sooner than the birth. This he seems to me to do for the sake of describing to us the manner and prudence of the wicked and the slanderers, who then, when they hasten to suppress innocence, are quite unwilling to suffer delay, and are more anxious first to exercise the malice of their heart than that they should wisely take counsel; they begin [to act] rather than to consider. For they are not guided by reason and counsel, but by impetuosity and iniquity; therefore they would rather that it should be done than that it should be deliberated. But when the deed of infamy is done, then they begin to look for counsel, by which they might obtain that they have acted rightly. Only then do they become pregnant with work and take upon themselves the task of defending their wickedness, which they have carried out with evil presumption.

Thus Absalom, after he had driven out his father David and had given birth to his XXX [2 Sam. 16, 20.] said: "Rathet zu, was sollen wir tun?" Thus the Jews first seized Christ, and only after that did they seek false witness.

1) ampliti, which is missing in the original edition, we have also omitted. It seems to be added ampliti in the later editions, because one has taken offence at the Construction: Doosmur Optimum eousolutionom, which is nevertheless richtrg.

by which they may accuse him. Thus every slanderer first gives birth to his XXX, and inflicts it on his neighbor; after that he seeks that he may stand justly or safely. Of this say the Proverbs of Solomon Cap. 30:20: "So is the way of the adulteress; she devoureth and wipeeth her mouth, saying, I have done no evil." This bearing of toil and being pregnant with labor we are wont to pronounce in German thus: "Thou wraekest mischief, there thou shalt have to do." And in the manner of a proverb: "You're going to bake it, and you'll hardly eat it out." That is why the foolish wrongdoers (XXX operarii) also begin under great difficulty and danger, that is, they give birth to trouble, and with much work and effort they try to protect what they have begun, that is, they are pregnant with work.

Therefore he teaches very well that an evil beginning before the council is trouble, and the council after the beginning is work. For the twofold kind of wickedness and foolishness is found in these ungodly slanderers, both the deed before the counsel and the counsel after the deed, so that with the wicked everything is wrong. But we understand it in such a way that this being pregnant with work takes place at the same time as the birth of toil. For this is how the ungodly slanderers speak when they start their evil deeds: Well, when it will be done, something will be found to answer or to defend it with, as the Jews, Matth. 28, 14, said to the guards, whom they had bribed with money, so that the truth concerning the resurrection of Christ would not be revealed: "Where it would come to an end with the governor, we want to nurse him and make sure that you are safe. Behold, how they are pregnant with labor, as they take upon themselves the burden of finding remedy for their wickedness in the future. So here Absalom and his are boldly giving birth to their XXX child. But with what advice they want to protect it, they do not yet give birth, but are pregnant by acting, as it is said in Proverbs 14:16: "A wise man fears and avoids what is bad, but a fool travels through it foolishly." But what they give birth to out of pregnancy follows:

94 "And gives birth to wickedness" (iniquitatem), which in Hebrew means lie, falsehood and uselessness, and fits the matter perfectly. For of this kind are the counsels, the defenses and excuses of the wicked after they have done the deed of shame, namely, mere and quite cold evasions, lying pretenses and vain deceits, with which they adorn themselves, persuade the people and besmirch the oppressed; then vain and futile efforts to fortify their iniquity. In all these things they lose a lot of effort and work, and at last they do everything in vain, as we see, even in examples of our time, that such things happen. But at this point we understand much more an incorrect birth and a miscarriage than an ungodly or lying birth. For he speaks of the vain endeavor and vain counsel whereby Absalom was deceived and deceived, when he gathered all Israel, and so sought to destroy David. For there his counsel and his birth became so vain, and so lacking, that it also fell upon his head, and that which he reproached against David destroyed him, as follows:

V. 16 He dug a pit and dug it out, and fell into the pit he had made.

The prophet uses figurative speech, by which, as we said above, he also indicates a kind of spiritual interpretation in things. As the cross of Christ is life according to spiritual interpretation, in that it seems to kill, while it makes alive, so Absalom dug the pit here and carried it out to force David into it, but did not know that he would just thereby make David free and destroy himself. But he aims at the fact that Absalom, trusting in the crowd, intended to oppress David as a single and solitary man, forsaken by all. For this is the pit of death which he prepared and dug for him. But behold, this very thing happened to him, that, forsaken of all, hanging alone on the oak tree, he was pierced, and cast into a great pit in the forest, and a very great heap of stones was laid upon him, as 2 Sam. 18:17. is written. This is the pit from which he tells here and makes a spiritual interpretation of it. For Absalom did not prepare this pit for David, but he himself suffered the death he intended for him. Thus it is also said, according to the custom of men, that an evil has been prepared for us, into which our imprudent adversary has fallen, even though he has not prepared anything of the kind. Therefore this verse is spoken in a proverbial way and is a general saying, like this: There is no law more reasonable than that those who help to death by art (necis artifices) perish by their own art.

This is said (as I have said) for the comfort of the oppressed, so that they may be sure that the evil intended for them will come upon their slanderers; but at the same time also for the terror of the slanderers and persecutors, whose excessive presumption and certainty must be frightened; but the weakness of those must be helped.

97 But see how he expresses the heat and the snorting rage of the wicked, that he does not say plainly, "He has made a pit," as he says afterward, "The pit he has made," but, "He has dug and digged a pit," as if to say, "Their feet hasten to shed blood. In such a way they are busy and active to prepare and dig a pit. They leave no stone unturned, they explore everything. Not content with digging and digging the pit, they make it deep, so that they may destroy the innocent as quickly as possible and in the deepest way.

Although the Jews hastened to kill Christ in this way and prepared everything to do so, they were not satisfied with a simple kind of death, but, digging a very deep pit, they brought him to the most ignominious death on the cross. Thus, every slanderer is not satisfied with corrupting his neighbor as quickly as possible, if he cannot also corrupt him in the most ignominious way possible.

This ignominy of death he indicates by the digging of the pit that has been covered up, because the deeper a person is sunk, the further is he is removed from the light and the hope that he will rise again. For no wicked man is so foolish that he wants to be regarded as having destroyed an innocent man without a cause; indeed, the more wicked he is, the more he tries to appear as if he is acting from a completely just cause and that he is being destroyed for the most shameful thing. Therefore it is necessary that he digs a pit for him that is already prepared and executed, and yet it is not said that he executed or dug the pit for himself, but that he did it because he neither sought his own death nor disgrace, but rather fell into it unawares.

Again, here is a peculiar idiom (soloecism): "He has fallen into the pit, he has made", where ours [in the Vulgate) add "which", but I [add]: "because", as above [v. 7, § 42], and where we have aperuit [he has opened], in Hebrew "he has prepared" (paravit) is said. This is minor, because on both sides it is understood that the pit is dressed rather than dug, against the memory of all men, because he wanted to be understood what is said.

v. 17. His calamity shall come upon his head, and his iniquity shall fall upon his crown.

Here is not XXX, but XXX, of which we have said [§ 85] that it actually means work, not toil (dolorem). He says, "His labor shall come upon his head"; and "iniquity" (iniquitas) is a word which we have not yet had, namely XXX, which actually means: rapacity, violence, or wrong done by force, tyranny, as the hawks rob the little birds. For from this word svvy), Reuchlin says, the night owl (accipitrem nocturnum [XXX]) has its name, from robbing.

But he looks back to what he said in the beginning [v. 3.], "Lest they take my soul like lions." For Absalom, after he had gathered all the people together, had everything ready to take David by force and devour him, but he himself, the wretched man, was dragged away.

and devoured, and so his work and his attack fell out of his own head. It seems to be the same sense as in the preceding verse, whose secret interpretation he interprets with clear words. Only in this there may be a difference, that in the preceding verse the work itself is indicated, namely the death and the ruin, by expressing the hole and the pit, but in this verse the counsel and the prudence, with which this hole and this pit was prepared and dug, so that we may know that God takes care of those who are afflicted with slander, against the violence of the slanderers, so that even the misfortune they have in mind and the counsel they rely on may fall back on them, so that we may not give up hope.

For here is the incomprehensible way of God's judgment, that he catches the wicked only with their own counsel and leads them into the destruction which they themselves have invented. In such a way he kills Goliath with his own sword. Thus it is said in Job 5:12-14: "He brings to nothing the schemes of the crafty, so that their hand cannot execute them. He fäheth the wise in their cunning, and overthroweth the counsel of the perverse, that they walk in darkness by day, and grope in the noonday as in the night," that is, they are most foolish and blind when they are most wise and keen.

Therefore, with great emphasis, he calls their work their counsel, their cunning, their wisdom. In truth, they have nothing but work from these, for no fruit follows from them, and they do not reach their goal because God resists them. This is what happened to the Jews who tried to corrupt Christ. What did they accomplish but that they labored in vain and (as the 2nd Psalm [v. 1. Vulg.] says) were intent on vain things? Here, however, he does not call it labor alone, but also says that they came back on their head fei, because this very counsel, in trust of which Absalom gathered the great multitude of the people, was to his destruction. He would be safer if he had stayed in the city according to Ahithophel's advice and sent out the twelve thousand men. "But," as the Scripture 2 Sam. 17:14 says, "the LORD sent it so that the good counsel of Ahithophel might be hindered, that the LORD might bring evil upon Absalom."

For this reason, Scripture comforts us by teaching that the raging of the wicked is nothing more than a great, but in truth futile effort, with which nothing is accomplished, and such an effort is to be directed back at themselves, just as it seems as if the tides and waves of the sea want to break the shore, but soon they collapse back into themselves and disappear, and their threats become a mockery.

This is a viable way of speaking in Scripture: To come or fall or descend on the head, on the crown of the head. Thus Sirach, imitating these verses, says Cap. 27, 28-30: "He who throws the stone on high, it falls on his head. He who stabs secretly wounds himself. He who digs a pit falls into it himself. He who sows to another sows to himself. Whoever wants to harm another, it comes over his own neck, so that he does not know where it comes from. Speaking in the same way, 2 Sam. 1:16 says, "Thy blood be upon thy head." And almost everything, both evil and good, is wished on someone's head, as Deut. 33:16: "The grace of him that dwelt in the bush come out of the head of Joseph," because the head is the first and most valuable member of the whole body.

But at the same time he indicates that both should come down from above, from God, both the vengeance on the wicked and the help for the godly. Therefore, from God's order, his iniquity falls on his crown, and his misfortune (labor) on his head. But it seems to be tautologically the same, that the misfortune comes on the head, and the iniquity falls on the crown; it is therefore repeated, so that it is a sign of firmness and certainty, as is said above. For the ignorant wicked ridicule even the threats of God, as if they either do not come to pass or are postponed for a long time.

1) Thus translated by Luther and Luoullr in the first Psalmer translation, in this volume Col. 9.

would, so they must probably be inculcated with the misfortune.

v. 18. I give thanks to the Lord for His righteousness, and I will praise the name of the Lord Most High.

He closes the psalm and the prayer with a beautiful phrase, as if to say: All this is to be said and prayed by me against the curses, slander and insults of Shimei and men, to protect my innocence and my righteousness according to my conscience and before the eyes of men; by the way, I do not trust in it, nor do I regard it as such that I could stand before God with it, as the apostle 1 Cor. 4, 4. says: "I am aware of nothing, but in this I am not justified," and [2 Cor. 10, 17. f.]: "But let him who boasts boast of the Lord. For therefore is not a man proficient, that he praiseth himself, but that the LORD praiseth him." So I also have another righteousness of which I boast, namely the righteousness, mercy and grace of God, according to which He forgives my sins and justifies me before His face. Because of this righteousness I do not boast, nor do I thank myself for it, as if it were mine. But I thank the Lord for it and will thank him forever, to whom alone it belongs. Therefore I will gladly serve the Lord and the people with my righteousness and resist the wicked, but I will seek my salvation in the righteousness of God.

In a most wondrous way, the prophet states this in one and the same verse and with the same words, that he gives thanks to God and praises God's righteousness, and describes the nature of it, namely that it is a gift of God by grace, for which one must praise Him and sing to Him. Therefore, the words: secundum justitiam ejus must be understood here as being the same as: "for the sake of his righteousness", so that the meaning is: I will praise the Lord forever, for it is he who makes righteous. If he did not do this, then my righteousness would not exist according to my conscience. And for this sense also speaks what follows, since it is said as it were repeatedly:

"And I will praise the name of the LORD Most High."

For "the name of the Lord" is, as we said above [Ps. 5, § 295 ff.], the praise by which he is praised as good, merciful, a helper 2c. And whoever believes in this name becomes righteous and blessed. For GOD is such to every one as he believeth. But the damned and the wicked do not attach a name to him; the former not because they do not hope for anything good from him, the latter not because they have no need of him. Therefore it is said in Proverbs 18:10: "The name of the Lord is a strong lock; the righteous walketh therein, and is protected." And Rom. 10, 13: "Whoever calls on the name of the Lord shall be saved."

(108) Since righteousness and blessedness and a happy conscience come from this name, if one believes in it firmly, but not from our own efforts or works, the prophet teaches correctly that one must only ascribe to the name of the Lord the righteousness that is valid before God, and sing to it, praise it and glorify it, so that others may also come to know the same name through this confession and praise, believe in it and be saved. Almost the same thing is said in the 51st Psalm, v. 15. "I will teach the transgressors thy ways, that sinners may turn unto thee." And again [v. 16.], "That my tongue may boast of thy righteousness"; since the wicked boast of their righteousness; as is often said.

Therefore, to give thanks and to praise here means not only the expression of gratitude on the part of an individual, but also the public ministry of the word of grace, through which the name of God is made known to men.

The prayer of this psalm will be useful and necessary when one has to pray against the devil, be it in the hour of death or in any other challenge to despair. For this is really the devil, that is, the slanderer, who accuses us, and makes the conscience distressed even in those things in which we have done right and pleased God; then also makes what we have done wrong exceedingly great, on both sides, as an exceeding

A burdensome and impetuous Simei, a very nasty Moor, who curses, insults and drives along with such words [2 Sam. 16, 7, 8.]: "Behold, now you are in your misfortune! Out, out, you bloodhound! The LORD has recompensed you for all the blood of the house of Saul.

other things that can be drawn from this history for a secret interpretation. In this, David is an example to all of us, teaching us that we must suffer this, but at the same time expect God's blessing for this abuse and tribulation.

The eighth Psalm.

V. 1. a psalm of David, to be sung on the githith. 1)

1 This is a new title. What he wants with his torcularia [winepresses] has been talked about in so many ways that I confess that I am at a loss and do not know who among so many has the best understanding. For there are three psalms in all, which have the word torcularia in the first place in their titles; this eighth, which is attributed to David, the eighty-first, a psalm of Assaph, and the eighty-fourth, a psalm of the children of Korah. It is not probable (what also the best among the Hebrews admit) that David made this psalm in the winepresses of the Palestinians 2), since from the same reason it would follow that also Assaph and the children of Korah made theirs there; Nor do we read that David was in the winepresses of Palestine, but in Geth 3) (which was later called Gaza because of the similar pronunciation of the letters), a city of Palestine, although XX means winepress, which is here called XXXXXX, super torcularibus.

will be. It is also not enough for me what others assume that this psalm was made to be sung at the Feast of Tabernacles, where people gave thanks to God after the fruit harvest and the grape harvest were finished.

Accordingly, since we are looking for the literal meaning, I would almost like to agree with the opinion of Lyra, who thinks that Githith is the proper name of a musical instrument, or one must admit the old fathers, who follow the secret interpretation and understand by "winepress" the tortures and sufferings of Christ and the church, since also some other psalms are designated by some peculiar, uncommon word (as we will see in its place), by which we should be moved to seek the spirit. In this I leave to each his opinion. But it is rightly said that "winepress" is suffering according to a secret interpretation, like Is. 63, 3: "I tread the winepress alone", which everyone understands of the suffering of Christ.

But St. Augustine understands by "winepress" very puffingly the service of the word of God in the church. Several scriptures agree with this opinion, as Is. 5, 2: "And he digged a winepress in it." For just as the oxen that thresh in the threshing floor signify the preachers, 1 Cor. 9:9, so also those who tread in the winepress signify the same. Therefore, marc and chaff, wheat and wine in Scripture everywhere mean the people who are either instructed in the Word of God or have hardened themselves against it, of whom it is not now the place to speak.

(3) And this opinion agrees with the purpose (scopum) of this psalm, in which it is described that the name of the Lord is glorified on earth, the people are subjected to Christ, and the enemy is destroyed. Since it is said that from the mouths of young children and infants he has given power and exalted his glory, it certainly refers to the preaching of the gospel and the word of the cross, through which this is done.

1) In the Vulgate: vieteriam ^or also: In. unsinlno torularidus ksalmus David.

2) "Palestinians" and immediately following "Palestine" stands here for Philistines and Philistaea, as in doseptius, ^raüaaol. 1, 7, 2, 6, 6, l. 2c. for DtiilistakÄ.

3) This is how "Gath" is written in the Vulgate, Jos. 19, 13, 45.

everything has happened and is happening. For surely the word of the cross, like a winepress, crushes and humbles the people of the world, gathering many into one body, like wine into a vat. And so it pleased the prophet to sing of a spiritual winepress. For even so it is not inappropriate that the winepress is understood to mean suffering, because the word of the cross crucifies the old man and forces him to endure various sufferings for its sake.

V. 2. O Lord our sovereign, how glorious is your name in all the earth, when people give thanks to you in heaven. 1)

4. these two verses are in Hebrew One; and the one name of God is the holy one, Jehovah (tetragrammaton), the other is Adon, which is not exclusively holy (profanum), and also in common use among men. However, the [Latin] interpreter has taken the liberty of saying dominus noster in the nominative case, where Jerome more correctly translated Domine, dominator noster noster, [HErr, our ruler. "Glorious" (admirabile), which in Hebrew is XXXX, means splendid, great, excellent. Hence Jerome says, How great is thy name. However, Jerome rendered the word magnificentia by gloria, but in Hebrew it actually means praise and thanksgiving (confessionem). From this word come the names Judah and Judea, which are named from praise and thanksgiving [XXXX]. Gen. 49:8: "Judah, thou art, thee shall thy brethren praise." For what the interpreter has here translated by quoniam elevata est magnificentia tua super coelos, Ps. 148, 13. is thus expressed: "His praise goeth as far as heaven and earth." And in general, the same thing seems to be expressed in both verses, since it is also said there, "His name alone is high," which here means, "Thy name is glorious," and what there reads, Confessio ejus super coelum et terram, here means: Magnificentia super coelos.

But I foresee that from what has been foretold [Ps. 5, § 295 ff] it is known that the name of God is not one, but many, namely all that can be said good, so that he is the same as a good rumor, fame, good opinion, preaching, by which he is praised, believed, known, hoped for, loved, feared (that is, (that is, is rightly revered and honored), as he alone is mighty, wise, good, righteous, true and kind, and at the same time the glory and renown of men perish, so that henceforth no one is mighty, wise and valid, but all [as the apostle Rom. 3, 23] are found to be sinners, and lack the glory they should have in God, who were righteous in an ungodly way and full of their own glory, as it says in Ps. 9, 6: "You rebuke the heathen, and destroy the wicked; you destroy their name forever and ever."

5. for no one is henceforth mighty in his own strength, but he who is weak and suffers all things, who believes in Christ, does not avenge himself, nor does he set himself free [from suffering], even if he could, but gives glory to God, expecting His strength to deliver and avenge him (as Paul boasts [1 Cor. 12:9] of his weakness). No one is wise in his wisdom, but becomes a fool before himself and before men, giving the glory of wisdom to GÖtte alone, who, having been proved, will give him the glory of wisdom in heaven for an inheritance.

6 Thus no Christian is justified by his righteousness, but by giving the glory of righteousness to God, he is reckoned among the workers of iniquity in his own eyes and in the eyes of men, so that in lowliness his judgment may be taken from him (Isa. 53:8), and he may be justified by faith and hope, waiting for the righteousness of God to praise him, "for therefore is no man proficient, that he should praise himself" (2 Cor. 10:18). This is what the pronoun "thy" intends, for it sets the name of the LORD against the names and honor of men; but then the name of the LORD is glorified, exalted, and loved, when our name is made void and hated, both by us and by all men.

7 This opinion is also expressed in the 113th Psalm, where it says [v. 3.

From the rising of the sun to its setting, praise be to the name of the Lord," and again [v. 4], "The Lord is high above all nations; his glory goes as far as the heavens." And Mal. 1, 11.: "From the going forth of the sun even unto the going down of the same my name shall be glorious among the Gentiles," and again [Mal. 1, 11. 14.], "My name is great and terrible among the Gentiles." Isaiah also says, Cap. 11, 9.: "They shall neither perish nor perish anywhere in my holy mountain." Why will they not perish? "For (he says) the earth is full of the knowledge of the Lord, as it is covered with the waters of the sea," as if he wanted to say: The knowledge of God and the glorious praise of His name, which through the gospel will fill the world like an overflowing sea, will cause them to live meekly toward one another and without harming one another, because they will not quarrel about wisdom, nor about power, nor about righteousness, since they know that this is not theirs, but God's. In the same Isaiah 2:17, it says: "All the high places of men must bow down and humble themselves, the high people, and the Lord alone will be high at that time, and the idols will be completely over.

8. it pleases me that these two words "Lord" and "our ruler" are distinguished in this way, that by the former the highest Godhead is indicated, which remains in itself, but by the latter God's kingdom and that with which he has to do, by which he rules over us and governs us through the word of faith, which is fulfilled through Christ's incarnation, which is our mercy seat [Rom. 3, 25], in whom the whole fullness of the Godhead dwells bodily [Col. 2, 9]. For by Him we are drawn to the Father, and in the world are ruled by Him, as it is said John 14:6. 1): "No one comes to the Father except through me." Therefore also the pronoun "our" is not without cause rather connected with "ruler", and not with "Herr". Therefore first "God is known in Judah, in Israel his name is glorious" [Ps. 76, 2.], but now your name is glorious in all lands, among all the Gentiles. So you see how this verse rhymes with the title, that the name of the Lord glorified by the winepress of preaching has humbled the Gentiles throughout the world [and brought them] to One faith and the grace of Christ.

But it is more important that one recognizes what follows: Quoniam elevata est magnificentia tua super coelos. The Hebrew text and Jerome have: Qui posuisti, not: Quoniam elevata est. I see that almost all understand this honor or glory or praise of God to be Christ, the Son of God, who, taken up into heaven and seated at the right hand of God, sent the Holy Spirit, who through the apostles glorified the name of God throughout the world.

And the opinion of these commentators has not displeased me, that this part of the verse indicates, as it were, the cause of the first part, namely, that the name of God was glorified because Christ went to heaven. For only after the Holy Spirit was sent could Christ be glorified, as it says in Rom. 1, 4: "Who is powerfully shown to be a Son of God according to the Spirit, who sanctifies since the time He rose from the dead, even Jesus Christ our Lord," and Joh. 16, 14: "He will glorify Me, for from Mine He will take it." But the Spirit could not be sent unless Christ was raised from the dead, taken up into heaven, and set in dominion over all nations, as John 7:39. says: "For the Holy Ghost was not yet, because JESUS was not yet glorified." So also in the second Psalm, v. 7. he says that he preaches what GOD commanded him (which is certainly fulfilled by the Holy Spirit), having said [v. 6.] that he was appointed king from the holy mountain of GOD Zion.

But this seems to be somewhat opposed to the fact that the opinion that Christ is called the praise or the prize does not seem to fit well with the verse in the 148th Psalm [v. 13]: "His praise goes as far as heaven and earth", nor with the words of Ps. 113, 4: "The Lord is high above all nations, his glory goes as far as heaven", because here it is prophesied that the praise does not only go over

1) In all editions: 4oan. 6, only correct in the Weimar one in the margin.

The Lord said that he would be exalted not only in heaven but also on earth, and that no one understands praise (confessionem) of Christ in this place. But this need not move anyone, for Christ is called the glory (gloria) of God, Isa. 46:13: "I will give salvation in Zion, and My glory in Jerusalem."

Therefore, just as the apostle dares to call it righteousness, virtue, wisdom, honor, redemption, sanctification of GOD, because through it we declare GOD righteous, recognize and confess Him as mighty, wise, glorious; and in turn we, by offering this sacrifice of righteousness, wisdom, virtue 2c. honor and serve GOD, we in turn deserve to be justified by Him, to be strengthened, to be made wise, as He says 1 Sam. 2, 30. "Whoever honors Me, I will also honor; but whoever despises Me, he shall be despised again," for this is the sacrifice of thanksgiving (laudis) with which He is praised, as He says Ps. 50, 23. and the way to see the salvation of GOD. For this sacrifice no one offers, because he has lost his name and calls on the name of the Lord in faith, that is, the wisdom, power and righteousness of God, as I said, and meanwhile suffers to be thought weak, foolish and wicked, knowing nothing of vengeance, judgment, glory: so that in the same name God may be honored and we, with the same righteousness God may be justified and we, in the same wisdom God may be wise and we. And this is what Peter, 2 Petr. 1, 4, says, that in Christ the greatest and most delicious things are given to us, that through them we become partakers of the divine nature, and which (as it says in 1 Petr. 1, 12) even the angels desire to behold.

So we also understand the same Christ rightly under the praise that is raised above the heavens. But at the same time we also learn what benefit his ascension has for us. For he says Joh. 16, 7: "It is good for you that I go. For if I do not go, the Comforter will not come to you." For this is what the prophet wants to show, that the praise of God, by which he is praised in us, and we in him, is a far different one than the praise of the People. Our praise, because it is the praise of God, or of God, is not in the public and on the scene of the world, nor is it revealed to men, nor even to ourselves, but rather, as our life is hidden with Christ in God (Col. 3:3), so that we may seek the things that are above, so also our praise is taken away with Him and hidden in God, so that it may exist in faith and hope, not in a present thing.

Therefore, the praise of God is the same with which God is praised and we are praised, and the same glory and praise, as it is said in 106. 1) Psalm, v. 47. [Vulg]: "That we may glory in thy praise" and Ps. 20, 6. [Vulg]: "In the name of the Lord our God we shall be glorified", and Ps. 34:3 [Vulg.], "My soul shall be praised in thy LORD," for, being patient in shame, stripped of our name, we are the truly lowly ones upon whom GOD looks, and the hungry souls whom GOD satisfies.

But it was proper for the prophet to use the word "praise" or "honor" as a short epitome, because he lived in the time when the truth was not yet revealed. But what this praise was, and what it implied, was for the apostles to bring to light. For they had taught that he alone must praise God above all things who desires to be praised rightly and godly; but he praises God above all things who alone ascribes to God righteousness, wisdom, power and all good things and gives thanks to Him for them. No one does this other than he who lives in faith, hope and love, who is oppressed in the world by inability, foolishness and sins, in his own eyes and in the eyes of men, since no one can bear this well (feliciter) if he is not armed with faith and hope.

This, then, is the brief epitome of this verse, that between God and men there is a certain exchange (quoddam mutuum), which through Christ is brought about in a wonderful and exceedingly sweet exchange (commercio). The people have a certain exchange (quoddam mutuum) on the

1) In the editions erroneous: 104. The Weimar one has the correct citation in the margin.

Earth nothing more delicious than the name of the Lord, because this they praise, preach, confess before men as only mighty, wise, holy, just 2c. And this is that the name of the LORD is glorious, marvelous, famous, and greatly esteemed in the earth, for this is by the future (per adventum) of Christ. Again, Christ gathers around Him those who thus preach Him, confess Him before men, and know His name, and goes to them and ministers to them, praising, extolling, and confessing them before the Father and His angels in heaven, knowing their name, and He Himself is their honor and praise in heaven, as they are His honor and praise on earth.

This is that he says: Quoniam elevata est gloria tua super coelos [for your glory is exalted above the heavens, that by all means this glory of God must be understood, by which we are praiseworthy and honorable (gloriosi) before him in Christ, and his name wonderful, by which 1) he is praised and glorified in us before men. In this alternation (mutuo) of names and praise, many sayings of Scripture can be harmonized and understood. Here belongs the word Ps. 72, 14 [Vulg.]: "And her name shall be esteemed in his sight." Again Ps. 91, 14: "He knows my name, therefore I will protect him." So says the bride in the Song of Songs, Cap. 2, 16.: "My friend is mine and I am his," and in the 111th Psalm, v. 3.: "What he ordains is praiseworthy and glorious." Again [Habak. 3, 3.], "His praise the earth is full of; heaven and earth are full of thy glory." For in this change consists the righteousness of God, by which we become righteous when we praise and honor Him by doing what we owe, and again He honors us by giving us the reward we have earned.

(9) But (as I have said), as easy as it is to speak and understand this exchange of praise between God and us, it is difficult to do. For it is difficult that one should renounce every name in this age and in the age to come, and become nothing, both in its

The name of the Lord cannot be great to us on earth, nor can his praise be higher to us than the heavens, unless this happens. It is more likely that the name of the Lord will be exalted on earth than that his praise will be exalted in heaven. Thus says the Blessed Virgin [Luc. 1:46], "My soul exalteth the Lord." Afterwards, being sure that she would also be exalted in heaven because of this exaltation, she says [v. 47]: "And my spirit rejoices in God my Savior." For it is not possible that he who blesses God should not be blessed by God, nor is it possible that anyone should love, praise, and delight in God, and that God should not love, praise, and delight in him again.

But here a simple mind might have misgivings, because it has so often heard that we do not first love God or do good to Him, as it is written: "Not that we first loved Him, but He first loved us" [1 John 4:10], and Romans 11:35: "Who gave Him anything before, that He should be repaid?" And Joh. 15, 16.: "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you." Joh. 6, 44.: "No one can come to me unless my Father draws him."

How then do we first lift him up, that he may lift us up? To this it is to be said: The holy scripture describes both, the grace of God and the fruit of his grace. Therefore, we must use caution 2) not to take what it speaks of the fruit to mean the tree itself. If this is mixed up untidily, then the Pelagians' error of free will follows from it, which attributes to us the lifting up in a good work. For God alone makes the tree good, in front of us and without us; this tree is necessarily more than the fruit. But it is also necessary that the fruits be there sooner than the reward.

Therefore, this passage of the Psalm and others similar to it do not belong to the beginning of grace, but to its end, namely, the reward that comes to the first grace and its fruits, so that we can see from this and similar passages that through this promise of the change of God's good deeds we are stimulated to persevere in good fruits. In this way, whoever is converted and praises God, that is, whoever, having received grace, lives to praise God on earth, God praises him again at the same time and forever in heaven; at the same time, I say, and forever, that is, in the present life and in the life to come. For he who glorifies God in his life must necessarily again have a happy and calm conscience, trusting in the mercy of God, through which he recognizes that he again pleases God and is praised in heaven. Our heavenly praise is so close to the name of the Lord on earth, even though we are continually plagued with shame in the eyes of men. Then, if the praiser perseveres, his praise in God is constant for eternity. Thus we must understand the word of Zech. 1, 1) 3. and similar: "Turn to me, and I will turn to you".

But the opinion of those who regard the second part of this verse as the cause of the first, among whom also our (Latin) interpreter seems to have been, must say that the praise of God was in heaven before the name of the Lord was glorified on earth, and that Christ accomplished this by his ascension above the heavens, so that by the sending of the Spirit the name of the Lord might be glorified on earth, as is said. "The Holy Spirit was not yet there, because Jesus was not yet glorified", and so the praise of God cannot be understood differently than from the person of Christ Himself (Christ personaliter), who is exalted above the heavens.

And it would not have mattered much if both opinions had been held at the same time, and they are not so very different, since it is certain that it was through the exalted Christ that we received the Holy Spirit and could believe that we were pleasing and praised to God in the Heaven, and through the same Spirit we in turn could subject ourselves to praise the name of God in all lands, which is nothing other than that the exalted Christ would have been of no use to us if he had not been exalted for us, that is, if he had not, by his ascension on high, given gifts to men [Ps. 68:19J, by which they should praise him on earth. I will leave this to the judgment of each one.

V. 3. out of the mouth of the young children and infants thou hast prepared a power for the sake of thine enemies, to destroy the enemy and the avenger.

(10) This verse follows very appropriately the sense according to which we have said that by the exalted glory is understood the Christ who went to heaven, although it does not rhyme badly with the other opinion. Therefore, we want to give it to both views, in this way: Thy name, O Lord, is made glorious, but in a far different manner from that in which men are wont to do it; for the custom of men, if it may be called a custom, is this, that they do not wish to be praised by low and despised men, but, having to do with high things, they wish (as they say) to please men who are thin-sown (raris), and desire to be highly esteemed by great, wise, powerful men. Again, those praisers also praise them, because they are all lying (vanissimi), not otherwise than for their own sake, that they may also be praised, or profit. In this way, one donkey tends to another, and neither the praisers are truthful nor the praised righteous. This, I say, is the nature of men who are moved by the appearance of things present.

(11) But you [O Lord], because your things are hidden and are understood only by faith, you do not find among the excellent (praeclaros) people those who praise you; rather, it is they who most stubbornly resist your glory and honor out of nonsensical seeking of their own honor 2). That is why you provide despised and lowly

2) tiUi, which is here in all issues, should probably be erased.

People who are to praise you and glorify your name, who hate your name on earth, satisfied that you are their praise in heaven; and to make this known, you sent the Holy Spirit from heaven after you had taken your glory to yourself, instructing the apostles and people like the apostles, unlearned and simple-minded people, out of whose mouths you have given your praise.

12. Christ's interpretation (auctoritas) gives us cause for a great question at this point, since he cites Matth. 21, 16. and applies this verse to the children who praised him in the temple, saying to the chief priests and scribes, who were refusing the children that they should not cry out, "Have you never read: Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast thou praised?" For if this Psalm is understood by these children only according to the letter, as some would have it, then the preceding would no longer rhyme with the following, since before it was spoken of the name of the Lord, who is glorified in all the earth, which happened after the suffering. Then, if we take the letters according to the whole sharpness, these children [Matth. 21, 15.] were neither young children (infantes) nor infants, since they blessed Him in well-set words and sang sMatth. 21, 9.]: "Hosanna in the highest!"

(13) Again, one must not interpret in any way other than Christ, who has drawn this verse to them, and his reputation must be placed higher than even that of this psalm. So it is only left that the saying of this verse is a general one of all those who are simple and sincere in heart, who do not seek high things, nor do they have understanding in the affairs of the world, namely the children of light. Since their race is not confined to the narrow limits of any age, but is found in all ages of the world, in every age of life, it also fits the children quite well, not only because they are simple and pure in this way, but also because by their simplicity and innocence they bodily model this simplicity of faith in Christ for us, as it is said in 1 Pet. 2:2: "Be eager for the sensible milk, as the milk that now comes from the Lord.

born little children. For not by might, nor wisdom, nor greatness, but by inability, foolishness, littleness do they move, delight, overcome us. Thus the praisers of Christ, not with the strength of the world, not with words of human wisdom [1 Cor. 2:4], not by the greatness of giants, but by the foolish word and the sorrow of the cross, overcame the world and made the name of the Lord glorious in all lands.

(14) Therefore this verse sings of the wonders of the divine power, which was able to glorify its name in all lands in such an astonishing and inconceivable way; first, in the midst of those who praised their own names in the most senseless way, and for the sake of these [names] most stubbornly resisted the name of the Lord. For it was a great thing to blot out even the name of kings, and wise men, and saints in the world, and to make them nothing, and to set up his name alone. Secondly, because he whose name was glorified never appeared, and was signified by the word alone, while those were both present themselves, and could show their present things, by which they were able to establish their names. Thirdly, and most importantly, this invisible Christ was not glorified by great heroes (gygantes), not by famous men, scholars, rich men, nobles, but by fishermen, unlearned men, minors and infants, without any semblance of power or wisdom, while they were followed by whole crowds who knew how to use their mouths, 1) the wisest, most eloquent, most powerful men.

(15) Therefore the Hebrew says, "Out of the mouth of the young children and sucklings thou hast prepared a power," so that there is a stronger expression for the miracle [than in the Latin]. But "a power" others [also the Vulgate] have rendered by laudem [a praise], perhaps resenting the inconsistency that it does not fit so well that out of the mouth "a power" be done, as a praise, adapting to the viable imagination of the reader-convenient. And although "power" here could be understood in such a way that, according to a synecdoche and the Hebrew idiosyncrasy (idiotismum), it is the same as "price of power" (virtutes praedicatas), in my opinion it is better understood by that which is strong, mighty, powerful, so that the meaning is: "Out of the mouth of the young children thou hast prepared a power," that is, the word of GOD is very powerful, so that all the repugnant cannot resist nor contradict it, as it is also said in another Psalm [Ps. 141, 6. Vulg.]: "They will hear my words, for they are mighty" (potuerunt) (that is, for they have become strong and firm), so that we understand at the same time that Christ has established everything in the world only through the word of the preachers of the gospel, that through his weakness he has overthrown all men's power, through his foolishness all men's wisdom, through his anger all men's spirituality (religiones), because [1 Cor. 1, 25,] "the divine weakness is stronger than men are, and the divine foolishness is wiser than men are." In this way Lucas frequently mentions in the Acts of the Apostles [Cap. 6, 7. 12, 24. 19, 20.] that God's Word had grown very much and become strong, as it were showing the thing of which this verse speaks.

1) maximarum tnicearuin, which is drawn to the following in the editions, seems to us to belong to the preceding.

16 And here the rulers of the churches of Christ must be called upon, that they may know that by these words they are instructed concerning their office. For the power of Christ and of the church is not brought here from the world, it does not call upon the help of the temporal arm, it does not deal with fire or death, it does not trust in the weapons of kings and princes, but it is prepared from the mouths of young children, The prophet teaches without doubt that he who endeavors to make the name of the Lord glorious on earth in any other way than by the mouth of the young children, rather blasphemes and is convicted of making his name glorious rather than the name of the Lord. Such people are those who nonsensically insist that the Turks and unbelievers or heretics today should not be punished with the word of God, which they do not know, but with war and worldly turmoil or with the terror of the church punishments (censurarum strepitu): namely, these people presume to overcome by these things themselves what has been overcome by the mouth of the young children, and turn the kind mouth of the young children into the fearful proud mouth of the giants (that is, the sweet word of God into the tyranny of their statutes). If then there is someone who recognizes this evil and turns away from it, let him also learn what and how he should act in order to govern the people rightly.

17 First, he says, "Out of the mouth." This is a great, but also a faithful reminder for those who act the word in the church. For then it is rightly done to distinguish the mouth from the word, that the word be not of him that preacheth, neither rather preacheth, but let Christ speak by his mouth, as Paul saith, 2 Cor. 13:3, "Seek ye that ye may know him that speaketh in me, even Christ?" For the prophet could have said here: The young children have brought praise, but we presumptuous fable preachers had to be punished, who, without greeting the Holy Spirit, poured out before the people everything that came into our minds, yes, into our mouths.

(18) Yea, others diligently search and seek that they may not preach that which is well founded, that is, that Christ may not teach his word, but that they may teach their word. Therefore it follows that they not only do not destroy the enemy and the avenger, but rather strengthen him and give him cause for ridicule. To these also belong those who are conscious of their great learning and let themselves dream that an exceedingly great danger would arise from it if they did not teach others, pretending that they would bury the pound given them in the earth and have to expect the hard judgment of the Lord with the lazy servant. This is how much the devil mocks the rapturous thoughts of these people with ridiculous antics.

19. they should know, instructed by this verse, that it is not we who teach, neither should we teach our word, but that our mouth alone will give his word

He [the Lord] says that we can serve if he [the Lord] wills it and he has called. "You (he says) have prepared a power", not they, not we. So also in the Gospel the Lord gave the pounds to the servants [Luc. 19, 13. ff.], but only to those who were called. Wait, therefore, thou also, until thou be called; but in the meantime seek not the office of preaching, neither thrust thyself in, for by thy art thy belly shall not burst. I did not send the prophets (Jer. 23:21), nor did they run; I did not speak to them, nor did they prophesy." Many are miserably tormented by this temptation, so that their occupation is continually annoying and saddening them. This is what the devil does, so that he may make those restless who have well begun, and finally consume them through weariness. Therefore let him who is called give his mouth and receive the word; let him be the instrument and not the author. He that is not called, let him pray unto the Lord of the harvest, that he may send forth laborers, and work a power out of the mouth of the young children.

20. second [he says] "of the young children and sucklings". Here a minister of the Word is taught to be a young child with the young children, and (as Paul says) to become all things to all men [1 Cor. 9:22], that he may win them all, and be absolutely careful that he despise and disdain no one, as the children in their simplicity know no respect of persons at all, but are equal and the same toward everyone.

(21) For what is more corruptible in a minister of the word of God than to be different from the great and the rich from the lowly and the poor, since he is sent to serve all, to flatter none, to disdain none? You can hardly find anything else in the Scriptures against which the spirit fights as much as against the undue prestige of persons, because it is difficult to despise persons and appearances, and to love and seek people in the invisible God.

22. then they are also taught to be kind, not to use profanity, and, as Titus 1:7 says, not to be stubborn, not to be angry 2c. For young children and infants are not of this kind.

23) But also the boastful nature of those who walk in great things that are too high for them [Ps. 131:1] is punished by this word, by teaching high and heavy things that do not belong to the matter, which the people cannot grasp, even if they grasped them, they would not receive any benefit from it; and in general, all teaching is punished here that has come forth from human will (humanity) and is presented by some counterfeit of the carnal mind, which is not according to the teaching given by God.

Thirdly, he says "you have taught". For it is not enough to teach the word of God, unless it is taught correctly, as Paul instructed Timothy, that he should divide the word of God correctly [2 Tim. 2, 15]. For there are many arduous (anxii) and vain preachers who glow and storm, who do not know that planting and watering are other things than prospering, and want everything to be done immediately as they have said it, wanting it to be heard, not both because they speak the word of God, but because they are the ones who speak the word, and desire that the instrument [which gives the sound] be praised more than the sound.

(25) Among these are those who presume, by their well-considered and well-planned words, to sting and bite this one and that one, and to convert them immediately. Then it happens by God's miraculous counsel that they accomplish nothing less than what they intended. For the soul of a man feels by nature that the word is cunningly prepared for him and (as it is in Ezekiel [Cap. 4, 12]) covered with human dung, that is, stained by human passion; therefore man is disgusted by it and is rather irritated than converted.

26 But he is much more moved when he does not hear the intention of the speaker, but the free word. For it wants to be presented freely and sincerely in public, and to affect those of whom the preacher knows nothing, as we read many examples.

Therefore, let our task be to lend our mouth to the word, but let God's work be to give the accomplishment and prosperity. Thus said Christ, Matth. 21,

2. f., to the disciples whom he sent beforehand, that they would find an ass and a colt, which they had neither seen nor known about, and yet they went to bring these animals, which they did not know.

(28) Therefore, we should give up the foolish confidence that we are able to help the word in the listener, but rather we should persevere in prayer that he alone will work in the listener without us what he speaks through the teacher, for it is he who speaks and he who hears, and works all things in all. We are his instruments and tools, who can neither receive nor give anything if he himself does not give and receive it. Hence the 68th Psalm, with a carefully chosen word [v. 19.], says, "Thou hast ascended on high; thou hast received gifts for men," while the apostle Eph. 4:8. says, "He hath given gifts unto men."

Fourth. If the ministers of the word are such people, the word will undoubtedly be effective and powerful, and will not be preached in vain, as it is said in Isa. 55:11. The word that goes out of my mouth will not come back to me empty, but will do what pleases me (note: "what pleases me," not what pleases the preacher), and it will succeed in what (prosperabitur in his, ad quae) I) I send it" (not at all with those on whom [in iis, ad quos] the preacher turns or judges it out of his own iniquity).

30 Therefore, it is frightening and dangerous on both sides, whether one teaches man's word under the title of God's word, or whether one twists even the pure word of God according to one's own inclination. Both abominations have taken hold of the church today with extremely strong tyranny.

(31) Therefore, let every one who presides over the people of Christ with the Word be fearful and humble, and strive more by a pure prayer than by the power of his endeavor to teach the free Word, and this alone, in a simple way, using both his tongue and his mind.

also commands the souls of his listeners. For it is decreed that in the church of God there shall be no other master than the one who speaks [Matth. 23, 8.]: "One is your master, Christ"; and Ps. 60, 8. it says: "God speaks in his sanctuary" (that is, "in his sanctuary", which is the church). But where a man speaks or the devil speaks, there is without doubt the devil's whorehouse and synagogue. For as the word is, so is the people, so is God, so is worship, so is faith, so is conscience, so are works, and all things. Thus all things are wrought in man by the word alone.

. Therefore I fear that the innumerable books of both law and theology, which nowadays prevail in the church outside the Gospel, are those golden bowls full of the wrath of God [Revelation 15:7], which, as it is written in Revelation chapter 16, poured out upon the earth, into the sea, into the rivers of water, into the sun, into the air, 2c., bring much misfortune upon men. For how could there be a greater wrath and a more severe plague of God than that among Christians Christ is not taught, nor His faith acknowledged, and meanwhile decrees, decretals, sextals, clementines, 2) extravagants, moralia, summists 3) take over and oppress the wretched souls. 33. further, that we have said that no one should teach in the church unless he is called by God, in reference to this note, so that no one is in doubt as to what this calling of God is [that then this Berns is there],

2) The papal canon law, the so-called Corpus juris oououioi, consists of these four writings. The first part of it is the Oorotur drntiuii (Conoordiu diseordduutiuru euouurn, UNst. III), which the Camalduenfer Gratianus compiled in Bologna around 1143. In 1234, Pope Gregory IX had the Dominican Raymundus de Pennaforti add the Decretals (Oeorotaliuru CreMrii k. IX, üdd. V), to which, by Bonifacius VIII's order, a sixth book was added in 1298. Order in 1298 was added a sixth book of the Decretals (soxtus doerotuliuiu lidor m five books). The Llementineu (V libri Clolueutinuruui), another collection of Decretals, was added by Pope Clement V in 1313; with these the Corpus suris oououiei was completed. The papal constitutions that still appeared after Clement were only preserved individually as appendices of undetermined origin and added under the name Lxtravn^aiitos. when someone is appointed to the office of the word without his will, even against his will, by force of his superiors (majorum), whether they be spiritual or secular. "For there is no authority without from GOD," Rom. 13:1. Therefore, there is no doubt that GOD commands all that each of these two authorities commands. Therefore, we do not read in the Old Testament that any story went blissfully, if God was not first asked for counsel, and one received an answer either through an angel or a man. For how unhappily the children of Israel fought without God's command, we read in Numbers 14:40 ff. We see the same thing in the Maccabees. Thou shalt not doubt, if the LORD wills, he will seek thee, and rather send an angel from heaven to fetch thee.

And I would like to believe that it comes from this cause that nowadays neither bishops, nor priests, nor monks teach the word of God in the church, because there is almost no one left who awaits God's calling, but all are pressing for dignities, sinecures, idle lives and full bellies, so that now despair and a certain sluggishness of spirit make not only (as they say) monks, but also bishops and priests.

Therefore, you will not understand this calling of God better than by paying attention to the histories of the Scriptures and of all the holy men in the Church. For those who have taught from God's calling have always done great things, such as St. Augustine, Ambrose, and before them the apostle Paul. And in order not to make anyone again conscience-stricken, I speak of those who come to teach the Word of God. These, I say, must be most careful that they come when God sends them, as it says in Rom. 10:15: "How shall they preach if they are not sent? As it is written, "How beautiful are the feet of those who proclaim peace," and Mal. 2:7: "The lips of the priest shall keep the doctrine, that the law may be sought out of his mouth: for he is an angel of the LORD of hosts." Of the rest, however, which either belong to a bishopric or to the place of of a canon or to any other such spiritual dignity in which the office of the Word is not, I believe that a vocation is not necessary, since nowadays in these ranks hardly anything else is sought than a special way of serving God, in which, as Paul says in 1 Cor. 7:7, each has his own gift from God, one in this way and the other in that way.

(36) But let not those be condemned who, animated by godly zeal, despise goods, good report, and life, and seek to teach the word (though this is a rare bird); rather let them be praised, as the apostle 1 Tim. 3:1 says: "It is ever certainly true, if any man desire the episcopate, he desireth a goodly work." For why he says, "This is certainly true," and calls the office of bishop "a good work," follows [v. 2], "But a bishop should be blameless. A woman's husband, sober, temperate, sedentary, doctrinal," and whatever else is said there. Because this belongs to a bishop (he says), he who desires a bishop's office certainly desires a delicious work. For this office requires a man who despises honor, life, and all goods, for it is a service of the truth which preached and said [Matt. 10:22.], "And ye must be hated of all men for my name's sake." Since those who are dragged into it by force, against their will, will hardly bear it, it is hoped in vain that he will bear it who voluntarily presses himself into it, or is not moved inwardly by special grace to apply for it.

Now follows in the verse: "For the sake of your enemies", that is, for the sake of your adversaries or (as we have often translated this word) for the sake of those who fear you. Although this is said quite puffingly of the incarnate God, since God Himself cannot be afflicted, nor suffer adversaries, yet we understand it, so that we may continue in the sense begun, that all this is said of Christ with reference to the Person of the Father. We are comforted by this word, namely by hearing the Holy Spirit declare that our adversaries are not our adversaries, but God's adversaries, for they are not our adversaries.

are the adversaries of Him whose word and work they persecute. And as it is not we who speak and work, but God in us, so it is not we who suffer and are despised, but God in us. Therefore the apostle may say Eph. 4, 30. "And do not grieve the Holy Spirit of GOD, that you may be sealed to the day of redemption," and Zech. 2, 8. "He who touches you charges the apple of my eye." But the spiritual right has twisted this beautifully to the priests alone, as if the laity were not instruments of the Holy Spirit. 1 Sam. 2:30 says, "He that despiseth me shall be despised again." Why are we afraid or uneasy when ungodly people are opposed to our words or works? We want to let them rage, yes, pray for them with real concern, so that their eyes may be opened and they may see that they have not directed their attack against us, but against God Himself.

(38) What is it, then, that for the sake of the enemies a power is prepared out of the mouths of the young children? This is what he says, because he persists in comforting us in our weakness and praising the miracle of divine power, as if to say: Against the weak little children a strong Pharaoh shall be raised up, and the children of men shall lift up their tongues; neither shall there be lack of magicians, Jannes and Jambres, which shall do signs; 1) and in general the adversaries shall be very strong, both by force and by guile, which shall resist the truth; 2) for these things, I say, that they may not prosper, but, as the apostle 2 Tim. 3:9, that their foolishness may be made manifest to all, thou wilt give them [the children] mouth and wisdom, which all your adversaries [Luc. 23:15] shall not gainsay nor resist. For there are always sneezers and those who fall upon others (cadentes [XXXXX], as it is called in Hebrew), on earth, famous people in the world [1 Blos. 6, 4.], who, trusting in their power, break in and

The preachers of truth oppress the peaceful and simple-minded young children. But this is permitted in order that the power of the word may be demonstrated, which he brings to pass out of their mouths, in that through the weak he brings to shame that which is strong, 3) through the foolish he brings to shame the wise, and through those who are nothing he destroys those who are everything. Hence it follows:

39. "That thou destroy the enemy and the revenger." Jerome has it thus: that the enemy and the avenger may rest, that is, that he may cease, desist, and have the Sabbath from his evil works. For it is the Hebrew word from which Sabbath comes, that is, rest, to indicate that the enemy and the avenger will cease, either that they will be no more, as in the 104th Psalm, v. 35: "Let there be an end of sinners on earth, and let the wicked be no more," or because they will be changed into friends and sufferers, according to the prophecy of Isaiah, Cap. 2, 4: "Then they will turn their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks"; according to spiritual interpretation, they will turn their harmful tongues into wholesome ones.

40 He has a synecdoche: "The enemy and the revengeful," that is, all those who are enemies and revengeful. They are "enemies" because they hold and do the antagonism; "avengers" because they, in order to establish their own, rage against the children of God, and say (as Ps. 2, 3): "Let us break their bands, and cast away their cords from us." But there follows how they shall be destroyed [v. 6.], "He will speak to them once in his wrath, and with his fury he will terrify them." But I believe that in this Psalm it is more the wholesome destruction in the Spirit that is described, by which (as I have said) the ungodly is destroyed, that he may become a godly man. For this is the real task of Christ in the church, this is also the work of the Holy Spirit, which is directed more by the peaceful word of the gospel than by stormy rage. This is a sign that he says all this is done by no other art than that he creates a power out of the mouth of the young children for the sake of the enemies, and shows the works of his fingers, as will be said.

41. but it actually expresses the nature and customs of the opponents of the word of God, first of all that they are flesh and blood, and as it says in the 116th Psalm, v. 11: "All men are liars"; they do not want to suffer the truth, especially that which kills. "For to be carnally minded is an enmity against God, since it is not subject to the law of God, nor is it able to be," Rom. 8:7. Then, when the truth of God is told by the young children, those, as if their mind was hurt, in which they are pleased, now not only become enemies, but pretend to the beautiful name of truth and also eagerly prepare to take revenge for their opinion, and do not rest until they kill or suppress the apostles of truth for God's glory and out of zeal for the truth, and (as they thunder nowadays with a new title) for the glory of the holy church. So ready and obvious, indeed so necessary, is it that an enemy of God's truth should at the same time become an avenger of His lie. Although we see this evil very often in all things, even worldly ones, it triumphs quite surely and easily in matters of God and faith, where an exceedingly divine appearance can be given.

(42) Therefore, let every one who is called, or who is subject to teach the word, be prepared and certain that he will have adversaries who will not only not hear his teaching, but also, if he touches their authority (as he must do), will most bitterly take vengeance on him and persecute him. These words of the spirit will not lie, which put the young children into battle with the enemies and the vengeful. This is a very strange battle, but God has arranged it in such a way that it will end happily if the preacher believes that the matter is not being conducted by his own counsel, but by God's, and that he alone will see to it that he lends his mouth to the one who speaks and is only an instrument of the Word. He will certainly

The result will be a power that will surely destroy the enemy.

43. Whoever therefore teaches in such a way that he finds no enemy to resist him and no avenger to persecute him, because he does not teach according to the rule of this verse, does not presume to be a complete and righteous preacher of the word of God. But when the enemies and the revengeful break in and say [Ps. 2, 3.], "Let us break his bands, and cast from us his cords," or reproach him with the accusation of the prophets [Jer. 23, 33.], "What is the burden of the word of the LORD?" and this word of Zedekiah, who smote Micah, 1 Kings 22, 24. "How? hath the Spirit of the LORD departed from me to speak with thee?" Are you alone of all the wisest? - Then let him have good hope, and know that according to this verse he is a little child and an infant, but they are men like Nimrod and the giants. For we see that such things happened to the prophets, to Christ, to the apostles, and to all the ministers of the word, whose example, as it were an exceedingly dense cloud, makes us hearty, since we see that it agrees with this passage of Scripture to the least letter and tittle.

44. From this it follows that the rights of men and especially that dumb and sleepy theology of the wretched writers of sentences has never been a power of the mouths of young children and infants, nor has it had anything in common with what this verse says, because none of them has yet been found to have suffered any special evil, if not a feminine scolding when arguing, for because of their opinions they are not brought to the fire or to death; until they burst forth and, having been placed in the holy scriptures, begin to act the word of God. Rather, they are adorned with honors, they are given high positions and names, they are greeted in the marketplace, they are called rabbis, and they are excellent magistri nostri.

This doctrine has no enemies and vengeful ones, except like Pilate and Herod among themselves, or the Pharisees and Sadducees. For it would not cost much effort to also condemn the Thomists, the Scotists, the Modernists, then the priests, the bishops and the monks.

The prophet is not without reason surprised in Psalm 2 that the kings of the land, even though they were extremely hostile to one another, nevertheless rebelled, and that the chief priests, who were far separated from one another by factions, nevertheless counseled against the Lord and his anointed.

This I have said for those who intend to teach the word of God purely, so that they may know that according to the law of this verse, the more corrupt this last time is, and the more glittering the beautiful appearance of titles, names, dignities, offices, and customs under the name of Christ has become, the more they will have enemies and avengers. The judgment stands firm, that out of the mouths of the young children only a power is being prepared, which has adversaries, and destroys the enemy and the avenger. For it is not preached to those who are already friends, but to the enemies. It is a word of the cross and of offense; if it does not kill or hurt, it has already ceased to be a word of the cross.

v. 4 For I will see the heavens, the work of your fingers, the moon and the stars that you prepare.

(46) How much the good Spirit of God takes care to inflate us, to make us proud, courageous and, to allude to the word [spiritus], full of living breath (spirituales), that is, valiant, courageous and confident 1) against the enemies and the vengeful, but not otherwise than by trusting in Him. He had said that they are young children and infants, who have the least and weakest form, since they need help in all things, as much as is in them, are exposed to all suffering. But the same he now calls the heavens of God, namely the highest and most powerful form among all things, since it is able to do everything and to execute everything in all things that are subject to it, by light, movement, lightning, thunder, rain and other forces.

1) ventosos, trnmentes, plenos. These expressions, taken from the meaning "wind" which Spiritus has, cannot be accurately rendered here in German.

For it does not rhyme well that we understand by "heaven" the visible heaven. For what would be the very joyful glory of this exceedingly great prophet, that he should see the heaven which even the beasts of the field and the fowls, or, to say much, even the most godless men see? And perhaps he did not add the pronoun "your" (tuos [coelos]) without cause, to indicate that he was not speaking of any heaven, but of the one that is not heaven for men, but for GOD alone, since he alone dwells in it, knows it alone, serves it alone. For this visible heaven is also our heaven, since it also serves us in bodily things and is known to us. If this does not move you, then let yourself be moved by what the apostle Hebr. 2, 5. says when he wants to interpret this psalm and mentions the world to come: "For he has not put the angels in charge of the world to come, which we are talking about.

47 But I would not mind if someone insisted that this verse must be understood as referring to the new heavens and the new earth that will be created at the last day, as Peter preached in 2 Peter 3:13. So that at the end of the world, after all enemies and avengers have been destroyed, heaven and earth will be transformed into a new form, and everything will be changed, and the elect will see it and rejoice, as it says in Isaiah 65:17 ff: "Behold, I will create new heavens and a new earth, and the former shall no more be remembered nor taken to heart. But they shall rejoice and be glad for ever in that which I create." And to this sense also points the verbum in the time to come, "For I will see." For why should he say that he shall see, if he did not mean to indicate a future and different heaven? But also the apostle seems to understand Heb. 1, 10. ff. 2) this psalm of the future heaven, since he introduces the 102nd psalm [v. 27.], of the heaven which shall be changed, as a garment 2c. Whoever follows this Auf-

L) In the editions: Hebr. 2.

He will say that the preceding verse describes what the whole church will have to deal with until the end of the world, which is nothing other than the destruction of a power from the mouth of the young children, and the destruction of the enemy and the avenger of revenge, and even sin itself, and the avenger of sin, death, as 1 Cor. 15, 26. It says: "The last enemy to be abolished is death", so that when this is destroyed, the new heaven will be seen.

(48) Although this opinion is beautiful and true, we do not want to abandon the first one either, because we think that these two quite opposite figures are painted on the servants of the word. One of these is that in which they appear to men. This is designated by the names of young children and infants, namely weakness, foolishness and nothingness, which the apostle 1 Cor. 4, 9-13. expounds more extensively by saying: "But I consider that God has represented us apostles as the very least, as given over to death. For we have become a spectacle to the race, and to the angels, and to men. We are fools for Christ's sake, but you are wise in Christ; we are weak, but you are strong; you are glorious, but we are despised. Until this hour we suffer hunger and thirst, and are naked, and are beaten, and have no certain place, and work and labour with our own hands. We are scolded, so we bless; we are persecuted, so we endure; we are blasphemed, so we plead. We are always as a curse of the world, and a fegopfer of all people." Behold the weak character of the apostles; for such a man is, and must be in the eyes of men, an apostle and a follower of the apostles.

49. but again about the other figure, how it was in the eyes of God, with what fullness he spreads about it, saying among other things 2 Cor. 12, 11. f. [Vulg.] "Though I am nothing, yet the signs of my apostleship have been done among you, with all patience, with signs and with wonders, and with deeds." And 1 Cor. 1, 23. f.: "But we preach Christ crucified, an offense to the Jews and a foolishness to the Greeks.

But to those who are called, both Jews and Greeks, we preach Christ, divine power and divine wisdom." And 2 Cor. 13:3: "Christ is not weak among you, but is mighty among you." With all these sayings Paul shows how glorious a form the ministry of the Word has in God's eyes, since it trickles down like heaven the salutary teaching, thunders with threats, shines with miracles and signs, enlightens with promises 2c.

50 So this is the meaning of this verse: Out of the mouth of the young children thou shalt bring forth power, and shalt destroy the enemies and the revengeful, which shall be marvelous in the sight of all men; and not to think that the pride and power of the betters should give way to so great weakness. Nevertheless it shall come to pass; for we shall see thy heavens, and they that preach in the weakness of the flesh shall do signs in the power of the Spirit, and shall prevail; and they that are despised in the sight of men shall be above all authority and honor in thy sight, and in the sight of them that have thine eyes.

51 See also the order. First is the form of the young children, then that of the heavens, that he may show that an apostle or minister of the Word is not able to do anything in the glorious form unless he has first become strong in the ignominious form.

(52) But since people now powerfully abhor the former form and excel only in wealth, opulence, courtliness, and ostentation, what wonder is it that even in the latter form these people accomplish nothing, and are unable to do anything either by word or by sign? Therefore, when a pope showed his treasures to an emperor and added: "Mr. Emperor, can we say [Apost. 3:6]: "Gold and silver I have not"? the emperor answered him quite strikingly and wittily: "But, my dear father, even what follows, you cannot say: "Arise and walk!" For only to distribute priestly offices and to judge worldly quarrels, which is nowadays the business of the apostolic see, - which Turk or Scythe could not do the same? That would truly be an unhappy future of God in the Flesh, if he had come for the sake of it, to give the popes this power, which he rejected from himself with such great effort [Joh. 6, 15. Luc. 12, 14.]. But let it go; our time deserves to be governed in this way.

(53) This might move the simple-minded reader that the prophet says he will see the heavens, since he has not seen the time of the New Testament. But he speaks in the person of the people of God, who were to see then [in the future], saw afterward, and see now, and will see until the end of the world. For he does not so much care to express how he himself sees as how that is to be made manifest of which he says he will see, as if to say: Thy heavens shall be revealed, and shall be sent into all the world, and shall be set forth before all eyes, that I might see them, if I lived; but now I hear them, and see them by faith alone.

With the same manner of speaking and in the same person Jacob speaks Gen. 49, 18 [Vulg.]: "Lord, I will wait for your salvation", that means, I know that it will obviously come. And Ps. 98:3: "The end of all the world shall see the salvation of our God," which means (as Isaiah speaks [Cap. 40:5Z] as, "The glory of the LORD shall be revealed." And Simeon says [Luc. 2, 32.], "A light to enlighten the Gentiles," that is, to be revealed to the Gentiles. Therefore, by his seeing, he indicates nothing else than that the apostles and their successors will be publicly present and known before all eyes. And this is what the prophet rejoices in, namely, by delighting in the revelation of the Word and the mysteries of grace through the apostles and their successors.

54 "The work of your fingers" (he says). This is an image (metaphora) taken from human artists who make their works with their fingers, especially the more delicious and delicate ones. For what they do with their hands or feet is crude and has little to do with art, and is quite similar to the works of animals. This teaches that the preachers of the New Testament are far louder than the priests of the Old Testament, because they have received the spirit from the book.

The apostle says: "For the law could not make anything perfect" [Hebr. 7, 19]. But it is sufficiently known from the Gospel that "the finger of God" is called the Holy Spirit; whether this is called "the fingers" in the plural because of the diversity of the gifts (of which 1 Cor. 12:1 ff. is said), or the gifts themselves, is of no consequence. For the heavens are formed by the Holy Spirit, they are also formed by the gifts of the Holy Spirit.

55 And also what we have said in the first Psalm remains, that the verbum XXX denotes a lasting effect or a privates, as there is a house or a garment. This is clearly seen here, since he calls the apostles and teachers of the Word made by his fingers "works" (Hebrew XXXXX). Here also the other dignity of the apostolic figure is praised, which, although they are a sacrifice of sweepings before men [1 Cor. 4, 13.], are nevertheless God's most tender, most exquisite, most pleasing works. By men they are deprived of their form (deformantur), but by GOD they recover their form (formantur); to those they are sufferers, yea, a suffering; but to this they are a work. In this again a very strong consolation is given to the servants of the Word, that they should be strong in spirit, knowing that they are the works of the fingers of GOD, chosen by GOD according to all His will. For those need strong consolation who are sent out to fight individually and alone against the whole race. Therefore Christ also commands the apostles, Apost. 1:4, that they should not depart from Jerusalem until they had received power from on high, and that they should wait for the promise of the Father, as if to say: You shall not depart until you have become the works of my fingers.

At the same time he indicates with this expression, how good progress the word will have, if the servants of it are the works of his fingers. For 2 Mos. 8, 18. f. the magicians became ashamed at the third sign and said: "This is God's finger." So also Apost. 6, 1) 10.: "And they were not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit out of which he spoke." Therefore the devil, the world and the flesh resist all other things, but the fingers of God, who is spirit and power, no one resists; the south wind blows through the garden of the bride, so that its spices flow, Hohel. 4, 16. In the 147th Psalm, v. 18, it says: "He lets his wind blow, so it thaws", that is, the nations will convert and become soft. This is how Christ casts out the devils through the finger of God, and not in any other way.

Therefore, as weak, unfortunate, foolish as the apostolic figure is, which is described among the young children and infants, as powerful, happy and wise is the one who is praised by the heavens and the works of the fingers of God, so that it accomplishes what no one would think possible. So even all that goes on under the opposite figure, which is God's. For even Moses and Aaron in the first two signs were considered as little children and powerless people, but in the third and the following ones they kept the upper hand, as it were, as the heavens and the works of the fingers of God.

56. the moon and the stars, which you have prepared. Here the question arises, why he did not think of the sun, which is the glory of heaven. Perhaps because he sings the whole psalm of Christ, who is the sun of these heavens, as Ps. 19, 5. says: "He has made a tabernacle for the sun in them," because above [Ps. 8, 1. Vulg.] had said of him, "His glory goeth as far as the heavens are" [Cf. § 4 of this Psalm], and afterwards [v. 5.] will sing of him more widely with his right (proprio) praise, saying, "What is man that thou rememberest him? "2c. For he had to have a worthier and richer prize than the moon and the stars, therefore he had to be sung especially, although he is also sufficiently indicated in that the prophet said that the stars and the moon are prepared, since the foundation of the church and of the righteous is undoubtedly no other than the one that is laid there, which is is JESUS CHRIST [1 Cor. 3, 11.], the Sun of righteousness; as also Peter, 1 Ep. 2, 6. whom Isaias, Cap. 28, 16., cites: "Behold, I lay in Zion a choice and precious cornerstone; and he that believeth on him shall not be put to shame."

(57) So he could have said: The moon and the stars, which thou hast made bright, or made to shine by the sun, since it is said that by the sun, the source of all light, the moon and the stars are illuminated. But he preferred to say [Vulg.], "Which thou hast founded"; not without cause, that he might show that Christ is at the same time the sun of the heavens, and the foundation and rock on which the church is built and founded, and also prevails against the gates of hell, Matt. 7:24 and 16:18. And that he spoke in this way was more fitting than if he had spoken of its shining, because Christ indeed enlightens all men who come into this world, and the gospel is preached to all creatures, just as our sun enlightens everything; but just as the blind do not see the light that enlightens everything, so not all obey the gospel, but only those who in strong faith are founded on Christ, the enlightening sun.

This again is said for our comfort and admonition, for however much the enemy rages against the church and the saints of Christ, they will not prevail. For the foundation, Christ, the church stands, because God has founded it on Christ; it will not waver, for he who believes in him shall not be put to shame. Now since he wanted to speak of the faith of the church and of the righteous, on which alone they are founded, the word "you have founded" (fundasti) prevented him from adding the sun, since he himself is not founded, but is the foundation.

But this is something quite insignificant that he preferred to say: Quae fundasti than:

Quas fundasti, since both luna and stellae are feminine gender. For the Hebrew language has no neuter gender. It is enough that the moon and the stars, according to spiritual interpretation, are the church and the believers in Christ, who, founded on him by faith, are visible and recognizable to the whole world.

1) In the issues: 7.

2) Erlanger: solus instead of: sotis.

have become visible. Thus Daniel, Cap. 12, 3. says: "But the teachers shall shine as the brightness of heaven, and they that teach many righteousness as the stars for ever and ever." He is not speaking here of the doctrine and righteousness of men, as generally this passage is corrupted by very many, but of the doctrine and righteousness of God, which is in the Spirit. And this indicates just the spiritual interpretation, that he calls them the heavens, the moon, the stars, since they seem to be nothing less before men; yet they are seen, that is, they are shown to the world with signs and powers, but they are not believed by all.

Take heed of the distinction: the heavens he calls the works of the fingers of God, the moon and the stars: "which God has prepared." Does not God also prepare the heavens? Are not the moon and the stars also the works of his fingers? Why then does He make such a distinction? He alone surely makes both, and works both in both. His fingers make the heavens as well as the moon and the stars, and he prepares the moon and the stars as well as the heavens. But he used this distinction for this reason, lest someone (as the Corinthians did) should say [1 Cor. 1:12]. "I am Pauline; the other: I am Cephish; the third: I am Apollian." For the apostles did not prepare the church and believers, but GOD, who gives the prosperity; yet they are ministers (he says [1 Cor. 3, 4.]) through whom you became believers, that is, through whom you were prepared. But they themselves were not prepared by any others who were apostles before them, but they are the first (prima) works of the fingers of GOD, as it is said in Ps. 33, 6. "The heavens (coeli) were made by the word of the LORD, and all his host by the spirit of his mouth."

What need is there to admonish the rulers of the church to realize that it is not enough for them to be established in Christ with the others, if they are not the work of God's fingers, namely called and made by God? But what are they now but works of the hands of men, idols of the Gentiles,

Gold and silver? For they have ears and do not hear the word of God, they have eyes and do not see themselves, they have hands and do not use them to do good to others, nor is there a voice in their throat, for they do not teach. And so it has also become the custom nowadays to call them the creature of a man, and rightly so. For if they were works of the fingers of God, they would not be the creature of a man. And our time is worth listening to these pompous and insolent flatteries.

Yes, in the prefaces to their letters they do not distinguish between the grace of a man and the grace of God. They say: "By the grace of God and the apostolic chair, as if it were too little of God's grace, or not blasphemous (profanum), to equate in the same title God's grace and a man's grace. This abomination, which stands there in the holy place, pleases even those who should resist it with all their strength. But let this ungodliness pass away; our customs will be given their time, so that they will reign at the same time by the grace of the apostolic see and by the disgrace of the judgment seat of Christ. The apostolic see should have regarded it as a grace that had befallen it, if it had been worthy (mereretur) to receive co-workers, and to drive those to it who were unwilling, by wanting to impose, as it were, a burden, and not a grace.

V. 5. What is man, that thou art mindful of him, and 1) the child of man, that thou art mindful of him?

First of all, because this passage has given trouble to various exegetes, it is necessary to know that in the Hebrew there is not a separating conjunction, on which, although it is something trivial, Augustine, Cassiodorus and others base their opinion, saying: "or the child of man" refers to Christ, because of the separating conjunction, and: "What is man?" refers to all others. But the Hebrew text has consistently: "and the Son of man", saying: XXXXXX, and to this we want follow, on the reputation of Paul, Heb.

1) In the Vulgate and the other editions: sut; in the Erlanger and the Weimarsche: "t.

2:6, and want to understand both of Christ, since he says, "But one testifieth in one place, saying, What is man, that thou rememberest him; or 1) the Son of man, that thou visitest him?" But though the separative conjunction is retained, it does not compel that by "the man" should be understood another than "the Son of man," because it is permitted by usage that those who do a question in supreme wonder (as here) make use of both a separative (disjunctiva) and a conjunctive (copulativa) conjunction in the repetitive speech (tautologia), as in the passage [Micah 6:3. Vulg.]: "What have I done to you, my people, or wherewith have I offended you?" or wherewith have I grieved you?

After this it is to be noted: the Hebrew language calls the man with two names, as far as it concerns his nature, namely XXX and XXX. A third word, which is called and often translated by man, should be translated more correctly only by man, since from this the word XXX, wife or woman, is derived, as if he wanted to say: "Männin" (virago) or coming from the man (viracea), because it says 1 Mos. 2, 23.: From XXX that means, from her husband she is taken. Therefore also XXX is in the Scriptures generally the name of a husband or of a person in authority, and it is used in general more from the office than from nature, of which we have said in the first Psalm [§ 3].

XXX and XXX are distinguished according to Eusebius, 11. praepar. evang. 4. and St. Jerome in the "Hebrew Questions" in such a way that 2) XXXX actually means man according to the soul, XXX according to the body. And this is correct; for XXXX in Hebrew signifies the earth, from which he is formed according to the body, so that he is called XXX according to the word which signifies his origin and matter, as it were an earthly or of earth. It is clear that the apostle 1 Cor. 15, 47. f. had this in mind when he says: "The first man is from the earth and earthy; the other man is the Lord from the earth.

1) Here both our text and the Vulgate again have ant.

2) Instead of "Huocl," the Wittenberg edition has: ". 97."

Heaven. What the earthly is, such are also the earthly" 2c. And the [Latin] translator has also been anxious Ps. 49, 3. to render the difference in a foreign language, and has said: Quique terrigenae et filii hominum solle from the earth born and the children of men], where [in Hebrew] both children XXX, and children XXX are said, by calling. He calls the children XXX children of the earth or born of the earth, and speaks darkly because of the untimely derivation (etymologiam), but nevertheless sufficiently indicates that XXX comes from "earth", as if in Latin homo [man] was derived from humus [earth] and called humigenam [a son of the earth] or humanum [of the earth].

But XXX means, as Eusebius says, according to his descent a forgetter, and he divides the verse as it is also written in Hebrew: What is XXX, that you remember him? and the child XXX, that you take care of him? Johann Reuchlin says that XXXX comes from tribulation, pain, sorrow, which pleases me together with the opinion of Eusebius, because man has forgotten his God after his soul through sin, of course not with the forgetting, which is generally there. For who is so godless that he does not talk and think a lot about God? Yes, no one remembers God more often than the wicked, the cursers, the blasphemers and the hopeful, who (as Isaiah says [Cap. 48:1]) remember the name of the Lord, but not in truth nor righteousness, that is, they use the name of the Lord without ceasing, but uselessly. It would be good for them to forget the name of the Lord, as it is good for him to abstain from worship who does not perform it with a pure heart.

But XXXX means such a forgetter, who has forgotten God and Him in spirit and in truth, to whom God is already no longer a father nor friendly, but a judge, an enemy, frightening; as Adam was like when he fled from the face of God in paradise. Was he not too mindful of God here? Yes, he felt his presence too much, and would have preferred that he had been absent, which is what all devils and the damned would have preferred, too, who tremble before His face continually. So anyone who is abandoned by God, who is not instructed in His mercy, is XXXX miserable, sad, fearful, despairing and almost impossible to comfort. For who could comfort him whom his conscience grieves? But only that is a happy conscience, which trusts in the most gracious mercy, and dares to call Him Father with all confidence, fearing neither judgment nor death nor any misfortune because of this trust; as, on the other hand, only he is sad who does not have this trust, and feels this, Deut. 28:65 ff: "The Lord will give thee a trembling heart and a withered soul. In the morning you will say, 'Oh that I might live to see the evening! In the evening thou shalt say, Alas, that I might live to see the morning!' This forgetfulness, then, makes one and man; the statutes, counsels and consolations of men drive us most into it; but faith alone frees us from it and makes us again mindful of God, holding up and praising to us nothing but His mercy and love in Christ.

See, then, how carefully the contrast is chosen. "What is XXXX that you remember him?" God's remembrance and our forgetting he puts together very nicely, and I do not know whether in truth the prophet said for the sake of it, God remembers, so that he may refer to the derivation (etymologiam) of XXXX, or whether Eusebius from the word "thou rememberest" brought in (etymologisavit) XXXX, the forgetting, by derivation. For the other: "And the child of man, that thou shouldest take care of him", is spoken with a more hidden or even no antithesis, if one does not want to consider that the God of heaven and the child of earth are two completely opposite things, so that it is something exceedingly wonderful that the one takes care of the other, as it is said in the 113th Psalm, v. 5. f.: "Who is, like the Lord, our God? Who has set himself so high, and looks upon the lowly?"

Therefore, it is a great wonder that God remembers the man who is forsaken and despairing before himself and before all eyes, and has forgotten God, and feels nothing less than that God remembers him; and the heart of the Man must and can grasp this and believe that God is friendly, benevolent, kind to him, while he feels nothing but that He is angry, terrifying and unbearable to him. Who should not be surprised at this? Who should not say, "What is man that you should remember him?" These works of God are incomprehensible, and can only be grasped by faith, and one does not feel his feet in this, Ps. 77:20. So also, who can believe that God will take care of the Son of Man, since he is only despised by all, and there is nothing in him except that he is born of a woman and is of the same nature with her? For if he were the son of a king, a prince, a priest, a rich man, an honored man, it would not seem difficult for God to take care of him. Now nothing more contemptuous can be said of a man than that he is a "man's child" (unless he wants to say that he is not a man), for this name is common to all, the lowest and least of all titles.

And in these words: "The child of man", there is an enormous diminishing speech, as in the words of Pilate, when he said of Christ [Joh. 19, 5]: "Behold, what a man!" For he wants to call him by the very least name, of which no man takes much notice in another, and yet God takes such care of him that he calls him home [Heb. 2:6], and comes to him whom all men do not even look at [Isa. 53:3]. Therefore in the prophet Isaiah, Cap. 58, 7. the Lord punishes the haughty eyes of men, which are attached to the appearance of persons, saying, "If thou seest any naked, clothe him, and shalt not shun thy flesh." Behold, "thy flesh" he calls the naked, the hungry, the thirsty, the poor, and in general any that is exceedingly lowly. Of course, in such a way no one among us considers the figure which is the most common in all of us. Because of this fault, those wise men are worthy of dreaming up the general concepts (universalia) of Porphyrius or Aristotle, and seek the common essence with quite vain effort and lost labor, since they do not consider this common to all.

(universalia) of the Creator in itself neglect.

See now on the reprint. He does not only know the XXXX, but he remembers him, he never forgets him, he always thinks well of him, he never leaves him. Therefore an example of this matter is described Is. 49, 14. ff.: "But Zion saith, The LORD hath forsaken me, the LORD hath forgotten me. Can a woman also forget her child, that she have not compassion on the son of her womb? Though she forget him, yet will I not forget thee. Behold, in the hands I have marked thee; thy walls are ever before me." So he does not see alone, or send to the child of man from afar, but the Lord is near, and seeks him home, as one friend to another. Who, I say, believes this? But if it is not believed, it does not happen. Therefore, all outward appearances must be discarded, and nothing must be left behind but the man and the man's child, if anyone wants to be worthy of God's remembrance and care. For he knows the high things from afar, but looks upon the low and afflicted [Ps. 113, 5. 6.]. On the other hand, man pays more attention to everything else than to man and man's child, even though he is his neighbor and his flesh.

(59) But how does this rhyme with Christ, of whom, as we have said, the prophet actually speaks, as the apostle testifies in his letter to the Hebrews? But also in the letter to the Philippians, Cap. 2, 6. f., he briefly indicates this by saying: "Who, though he was in the form of God, did not consider it a robbery to be like God, but put himself forth, and took the form of a servant, and was made like another man, and was found to be a man in deeds." For he was not invented as a king, prince, or any other such person, but as a human child, like the least of men.

60. then he also became extremely like sinners, becoming sad, sorrowful, and like the least of us, bearing in himself the Father's wrath for us, and becoming the most despised son of the earth in the eyes of men, so that it seemed not only to him, but also to every other man, that God would not accept his

I do not think of him, I do not take care of him. Yes, he said of himself [Ps. 142, 5.]: "I cannot escape, no one takes care of my soul." And again Ps. 31:13: "I am become as a broken vessel." [P. 23.:] "I am cast out of thy sight."

But especially the prophet has in mind the time of Christ's suffering, when He began to mourn and to tremble [Matth. 26, 37.] in the garden. For at that time he was humbled, he became a XXXX before God and before himself; he became a child XXXX before men, and nothing else was left but nature itself, and the words as nature speaks them (naturae vocabula). For as I have said, XXXX refers to the soul, XXX to the body, and so it follows of itself that XXXX be said of man as he is before God, wretched and afflicted; a child XXX [of man] as he is before men, lowly and despised.

(62) Behold, then, this is the Sun of Righteousness, our King, at whom the prophet marvels with tremendous wonder. Will he then illuminate the moon and the stars and create, yes, found the heavens? He shines like this, worse than this, with these rays he illuminates the world that receives him. For this reason it is necessary that the moon and the stars be founded, lest they fall away offended by this light of their sun.

63 And this is the cause, since he had praised the heavens, the moon, and the stars in such a glorious spiritual interpretation, when it was expected that he would also speak of the sun, that he suddenly seems to speak of strange things, indicating, entranced in wonder, the ineffable glory of this sun, and pointing to it more by an admiring silence than with magnificent words, as if he wanted to say: Of the moon and the stars you have heard. Further, what shall I say of the sun. Astonishment overwhelms me; he is the sun, but who can grasp it, since he and a son is XXX? God, you are truly wonderful and highly praiseworthy that you remember this man and take care of him. How much more wonderful is it that you have set this sun to illuminate all? This is wonderful, this is more than wonderful and quite incredible to man.

(64) Now let each one see for himself, first of all, how much he suffers, or how full he is of the rays of this sun of righteousness. For since sin must be eradicated, which cannot be done without pain and disgrace, it is necessary that each one also become a XXXX and a human child, so that he may have pain inwardly and disgrace outwardly, and so that he may suffice and correspond to both names of his nature, and become like Christ, who first became like him.

(65) For we, of course, do not flee from anything so much as not to be XXXX and XXX, always delighting in adorning ourselves with other people's feathers and vestments, and attaching to ourselves what belongs to the righteous and the saints, that is, with joy and glory. But the sun of righteousness does not shine in such a way, 1) nor does it enlighten people of such a nature, nor does it base it on itself.

After that, if he has become such a man [as described in § 64], let him trust in the comfort of this verse and rejoice in it, singing and knowing that the Lord remembers him and takes care of the human child, as he has shown in Christ, his sun. Further, how Christ became in this way and a forgetter of God, and a man child, equal to us in all things, will perhaps be stated more expansively in the 22nd Psalm.

v. 6. You will let him be abandoned by God for a little while. But with honor and adornment you will crown him. 2)

Our [Latin interpreters] add to this verse: "And you have set him over the works of your hands", which in Hebrew is the first part of the following verse. The Hebrew text has thus: "And thou hast made him a little lacking in XXXXX which Jerome has translated: "in GOD". And it is sufficiently known that XXXX in the Scripture not only by God, but sometimes also by princes and judges, because they are God's representatives, as in Ex 21:6: "Let his lord bring him before the gods and hold him at the door", and Ex 6:2: "The children of God looked at the daughters of men", by which we mean the sons of the patriarchs, and also the giants; although if someone wanted to deny obstinately, and say that XXXXX is nowhere attached to men, I do not know in what way I should convince him, since in these two passages and others God could also be understood. But meanwhile we want to follow the reputation of others, which is too generally recognized 3) (receptiorem) to be contradicted. Our [Latin] translator, of course, as can be seen, translated it rather from the angels than from God, because it seemed to him perhaps very inconsistent to say to God: You have made him lack in God, since the speech seemed to require a different person for the one who lacks than for the one of whom he lacks (a quo minutus est). But this little offence is easily removed by the quite common mode of speech of Scripture, according to which it is wont to speak to the second person in the third, as 2 Sam. 14, 11. [Vulg.] "She said unto David, The king remembereth the LORD his GOtt." So also here it could be understood that the prophet spoke thus, "Thou hast made him a little lacking in GOD," that is, in thee; because it indicates a greater reverence when one speaks to superiors in the third person than in the second.

However, the individual expressions in the middle of this verse have been treated by many. Difficulty has been caused by "the angels" and the circumstantial word "a little" and the verb "you may lack" and the pronoun "him". 4) There was also no lack of people who took it upon themselves to understand it from the human nature in comparison to the angels. But we are only required to connect the following with the preceding, and that in a unified and simple way.

3) Jenaische and Weimarsche: reeoptiorEm; Wittenberger: rkoeptorsiu; Erlanger: rseextioruln.

4) In the editions (apparently wrong) "Meurn" instead of: euru. Compare the following paragraph.

Therefore, we want to accept only what we like and what suits us, and leave the rest with its originators.

This verse undoubtedly explains the previous one, in which it is said that Christ is the one whom the Lord remembers, and that the one who was despised by men is visited by God. Therefore the meaning is: You left him for a little while, but with great honor you received him, showing how you did not forget him, nor despise him, as it says Ps. 22:25: "For he did not despise nor spurn the affliction of the poor." Therefore, the pronoun "him" must be referred to, not to the Son of God according to his divinity, which is what those do who understand it to mean that he became less than the angels through his incarnation, but according to his humanity, in which he became sad and painful, since he bore our weakness, and seemed to be forgotten and abandoned before God, as he indeed was, as far as his own feelings and the judgment of men were concerned. For this psalm certainly speaks of the suffering of Christ and the glory that was obtained through suffering, as the apostle clearly says Hebr. 2, 9: "But the one who lacked a little time of angels, we see that it is Jesus, crowned with glory and honor through suffering of death" 2c. And paulominus does not refer to dignity, but to time. For we have had in the 2nd Psalm, v. 12. sun Hebrew) the same adverbium, "For his wrath shall soon [XXX] burn on" (that is, swiftly and after a little time shall his wrath burn on). And, in general, here nothing is dealt with the essence, the difference, the dignity of the natures, but with the duration of the suffering.

68 Now the verbum minuisti (you have diminished) reads with us, because the Hebrew has not rendered it, as if someone makes him who is great small, as the power, the dignity, the wealth of a man is diminished by taking away. Johann Reuchlin explains it: It has been lacking, it has been missing, it has been diminished, as it says 1 Kings 17:14: "And nothing shall be taken from the jar of oil.

and afterwards [v. 16]: "And the jar of oil lacked nothing". From this it is evident that in this passage it is indicated that Christ was abandoned by God, since He ceased to protect Him and He lacked, as He exclaimed on the cross [Matth. 27, 46]: "Eli, Eli, lama asabthani?" For this is what the prophet understands by the "little time," namely, the hour of which Christ said [Luc. 22, 53.], "But this is your hour, and the power of darkness." Therefore, since until that hour he was "mighty in deeds and words" [Luc. 24, 19.], he is suddenly and for a little while, namely for three days, humbled and abandoned by God in that power, subject to weakness and also to death and hell. For what it means to be forsaken by God, we will say in the appropriate place.

69 Therefore, in this verse he speaks of Christ almost in the same way as Isaiah Cap. 54, 7. f. speaks of the whole people of God, saying: "I have left you for a little while, but with great mercy I will gather you. I have hid my face from thee a little in the moment of wrath, but with everlasting mercy will I have mercy upon thee."

(70) Namely, all this is to serve us as an exceedingly strong consolation, so that we may learn to make a profit for eternal life out of the little tribulation of this time, lest, when we are troubled, we think that we are eternally forsaken by Him of whom we hear that He remembers the XXXX and takes care of the child of man.

However much He will humble us for a little while, He will surely take care of us and crown those who have suffered for a little while (modicum) with honor and adornment, as it says in 1 Peter 1:6: "You who are now sorrowing for a little while (modicum) in all kinds of temptations. And in the same epistle, Cap. 5, 10.: "But the GOD of all grace, who hath called us unto his eternal glory in Christ JEsu, the same shall make you full, strengthen, fortify, establish, ye that suffer a little while." And Paul, 2 Cor. 4, 17. f.: "For our tribulation, which is temporal (that is, lasting but a moment) and light, creates an eternal glory, which is above all measure.

(72) But here faith is needed, for it is marvelous before our eyes when it takes place; just as here also the prophet is astonished, and says, "What is man? (Quid est homo?) This can be spoken in Hebrew like this: What man is this (quam homo), that thou rememberest him! For the expression XX is in Hebrew sometimes as much as the interrogative quid, sometimes quam, as in the 119th Psalm, v. 97. "How have I so loved thy law! [quomodo dilexi] instead of: quam dilexi. And afterwards, v. 103 [Vulg.]: "How (quam) sweet is thy speech to my mouth!" And Ps. 84, 2: "How (quam) lovely are thy dwellings!" Yea, also in this Psalm, v. 2. "How (quam) glorious is thy name!" For this deceived the [Latin] interpreter, that he did not render clearly the Hebrew text, Isa. 38:1) 22. "And Hezekiah said, What shall be the sign that I shall go forth unto the house of the LORD?" 2) For he [Hezekiah] does not ask there, but he marvels at the sign which was given him, saying, "What sign that I should go out!" as if to say: Is not this a great and wonderful sign? So it would not be inappropriate to say here: What a man is this (quam homo), that thou rememberest him! This could be rendered thus: Is this not a wonderful man? Is not this human child wonderful? You remember him, while you forget him, you take care of him, while you rely on him! But this you do to leave him for a little while, but to exalt him for eternity.

If one holds on to this sense, it becomes clear that the Hebrew is more appropriately translated "by God" than "by the angels," because the prophet sings that God remembered Christ and left him, visited him and left him alone, humbled him and exalted him. However, one must not reject the common translation for this reason, even though the

It is clear that the apostle or someone else wrote the epistle to the Hebrews in Hebrew or in Greek, since it is certain that the apostle rarely quotes the sayings according to the original Hebrew way of speaking, but very often according to the Septuagint, also in other epistles, as he does with sayings from the 14th Psalm [v. 3] and the 5th Psalm [v. 10] in Romans 3, 10 and 3, 13. And this proves most strongly that the author of this epistle [to the Hebrews our passage] understood (legisse) and wrote of the angels, but not of God, that shortly before he introduces the testimony of this Psalm, he says Hebr. 2, 5: "For he has not subjected to angels the world to come, of which we speak." Then he immediately cites this psalm to prove that [the world to come] is subject to Christ, for one would not think that the apostle meant to say: For he hath not GOTte subject the world to come. Therefore, following the sense which the Hebrew gives (hebraeum sensum), we cannot understand it in such a way that Christ became less (minorationem) in comparison with the angels, since (as Erasmus also well remarks) he not only became less than the angels, but also the very least among men, and (as I have said) had nothing left but that he was XXXX and "the child of man". From the letter of the apostle to the Hebrews it is not clear what this means (quid velit).

Therefore, since Christ was forsaken by God, and now in the three days of His suffering He was no longer with Him in His power, what wonder is it if according to God's will He should also be forsaken by the angels? as He says Matth. 26, 53: "Do you think that I could not ask my Father to send me more than twelve legions of angels?" But lest one think that it is a small thing that one lacks angels or is abandoned by them, it is to be noted that God accomplishes all our salvation through the ministry of angels, as Ps. 91, 11. f. is written: "For he hath commanded his angels concerning thee, that they should keep thee in all thy ways, that they should bear thee up in their hands, and that thou shouldest not strike thy foot against a stone," and Ps. 34, 8: "The angel of the LORD encampeth about them that look upon him.

1) In the issues: lss. 37.

2) In the Latin editions, a period is erroneously placed here instead of a question mark. In contrast, in our Bible editions Isa. 38, 32. a question mark is put where, as Luther states here, an exclamation mark should be.

fear, and help them out." Thus an angel led the children of Israel out of Egypt [Ex. 14, 19. f.], and stood between their army and the army of the Egyptians. And (he says), My angel shall go before thee [Gen. 24, 7. Matth. 11, 10.]. Thus the angels saved Lot from Sodom [Gen. 19, 15.], and the angel preserved the three men in the fiery furnace [Dan. 3, 28.]. And, beloved, how often is the service of angels to men remembered in the book of Judges, as also in Zechariah and Daniel, so that Paul rightly said Heb. 1, 14. that they were ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for the sake of those who should inherit blessedness. Therefore it is not surprising that the prophet considers it a new miracle and an astonishing thing that all the fathers of old have obtained help and salvation through the angels, and that they only stop at this one Christ, and that he must lack their consolation.

From a similar movement of the heart speaks the 22nd Psalm, v. 5-7: "Our fathers hoped in you and were saved; they hoped in you and were not put to shame. But I am a worm and not a man, a mockery of men, and contempt of the people," as if to say: Those have obtained help in their adversities through their faith, and have never been forsaken unto death; but I am forsaken unto death, and my hope shall not come until after death. For such suffering is fitting for the New Testament. Therefore Christ, the Head, goes first, and is first forsaken by all, and must lack God and the angels. He is followed by all who believe in him and call upon his name. Therefore, just as St. Augustine in the book "To the Honoratus", where he treats the 22nd 1) Psalm, teaches correctly that the difference of the New and the Old Testament consists in this, that in the latter the fathers were indeed sometimes abandoned to the danger of life, but never to death, but in the latter all are esteemed like sheep for slaughter, and are abandoned in such a way that they fall into the most abominable death: so also in this Psalm the prophet praises the-

The same new suffering, and admires it before the old. Yes, not only the angels did not stand by him and serve him as they used to do, but also everything that can only be called by name, princes, kings, priests, elders, and those who adhered to him before.

"With honor and ornament you will crown him." Beautifully he makes here the contrasts; the honor he gives to XXXX, the ornament to the child of XXX, the crown to him who is abandoned by the angels. To understand this, let us first explain the words. "Honor" (gloria) is actually set in this place for what the Greeks say δόξα. Of this it is said Ps. 3:4, "He that setteth me in honor," and Ps. 7:6, "And layeth my honor in the dust." This is not only the splendor of the name, or, as they say, the rumor that is spread with praise, wanting honor (gloriam) to be distinguished from praise or [good] rumor by celebrity (celebritate), as if gloria were as much as claria and came from claritas, but it is also the high majesty of the most beautiful and greatest things that we possess, and of which this rumor is spread, and of which we ourselves also boast and are proud. Therefore the Lord says Matt. 6:29: "I tell you that even Solomon in all his glory (gloria) was not clothed as one of these." What else does he call "glory" (gloriam) than the splendor and majesty and abundance of goods by which Solomon was famous among all nations? Hence also in Hebrew "glory" (gloria) comes from a verb meaning "to be heavy," as we see in the 4th Psalm [§ 11] have seen.

But it is to be marveled at how variously and inconstantly the word "adornment" (honor), which is in Hebrew, has been translated everywhere; sometimes with adornment, sometimes with honor, sometimes with beauty, sometimes with glory (magnificentia), sometimes with splendor, sometimes with dignity. Ps. 104, 1. it says: "You are beautiful and magnificently adorned" (confessionem et decorem induisti). Ps. 96, 6: "It stands glorious and splendid before Him" (confessio et pulchritudo). These two words are rendered Ps. 45, 5 [Vulg.] thus: Specie tua et pulchritudine tua [In our Bible: and adorn yourself beautifully.... in your adornment. Ps. 145, 5: Magnificientiam gloriae sanctitatis tuae [of your glorious beautiful splendor]. Ps. 110, 3: In splendoribus sanctorum [in holy adornment]. Proverbs 14:28: In multitudine populi dignitas regis [where a king has many people, that is his glory]. All these passages have the same word or which of the same verbum Herkommen, which, as Reuchlin says, means: He has adorned, he has honored, he has glorified.

From this it follows that "ornament" (honorem) in this place is quite appropriately rendered for the Hebrew word, and means the other splendor of the great ones, which consists in the multitude of those who show them reverence, look up to them, adore them, are subject to them, serve them, follow them, assist them. For these are the adornment, the splendor, the beauty, the dignity of the king, so that "honor" and "adornment" are, as it were, opposite splendor: the honor that proceeds from the king and spreads to others; the adornment that, moved by this honor, many come and acknowledge him. Accordingly it is said in 3 Mos. 19, 32: "You shall honor the ancients." And these two honors multiply each other. For honor attracts many to pay tribute. But those who are attracted to honor soon increase the honor. Therefore we sing to God glory (gloriam) and honor (honorem) forever, that it may be and remain eternally multiplied; just as those two evils also multiply one another, which are

XXXX and "man's child"; for he who has forgotten God and has become miserable and afflicted, he is also immediately abandoned as a child XXX; for he of whom nothing is said, no one honors him either. As he is nothing in himself, so he is abandoned by all. "You will crown" is figuratively speaking, from the crown that is perfect on all sides and surrounds the whole, for: "You will surround him." 1 Sam. 23:26: "They compassed (in modum coronae cingebant) David and his men," and Ps. 5:13 [Vulg.]: "With the shield of thy grace thou hast compassed us" (coronasti). Therefore Christ, who became XXXX for us, despairing and afflicted by in all sides and in all things, now the dominion over all things, which is celebrated with much praise and glory, and he is well pleased and secure in all things; he, who became a child XXX, despised and despised, is now honored, adored, sought after by all. And he, who was forsaken by all, is now surrounded by all creatures everywhere, so that there is no creature that does not know or honor him, for the gospel is preached to all creatures for his glory.

Again, at his name bow all the knees of those who are in heaven and on earth and under the earth. For this crown of honor and adornment, that is, of the whole creature, has never been conceded to another, nor will it be. For those are honored and adorned only in part, and no one has everything, but only he who has been abandoned by all for a little while, having no honor and adornment in any part, yes, from all sides tribulation and ignominious treatment, so that he might be crowned with honor and adornment for this merit.

But this crown of glory and adornment is not yet completed, as Paul says 1 Cor. 15, 25. But now we do not yet see that all things are subject to Him [Heb. 2, 8.], because "He must reign until He puts all His enemies under His feet". Namely, this will be carried out until the last judgment. In the meantime, there remain people who do not honor him nor adorn him, and resist the full glory (plenitudini) of this crown.

V. 7 Thou wilt make him ruler over the work of thy hands: thou hast put all things under his feet.

75) Thus ends 1) this verse in Hebrews, in which the honor and adornment of Christ is explained. The "honor" is that he is Lord over all things, and so you see that the honor is the majesty of things possessed, as we said. The "adornment" is that all things are subject to him, all things acknowledge him, turn to him (convertit), hang on his beck and call. And even beautiful and obvious is

1) In the Vulgate, the last part: "All you have" 2c. is drawn to the following verse.

Both adornments, that of honor and that of adornment, are put together in this verse, in that at the same time the Lord and the subjects are described by the words: "You will make him Lord" and "you have put under the feet"; by the one the Lord and the honor are indicated, by the other the subjects and the adornment. The same two pieces are also contained in the 45th Psalm; the one in the words [v. 4. 5.]: "Adorn thyself beautifully. May you succeed in your adornment. Draw near to the truth, and keep the wretched in the right, and thy right hand shall do wonders"; the other in this word [v. 6]: "Sharp are thy arrows, that the nations fall down before thee in the midst of the king's enemies."

So here is the prince of the kings of the earth, and the lord of the rulers. Compare them with this king. Over what things are they ordered? Certainly over the work of the hands of God, but to none are all things put under his feet. The words "the works of the hands of God" have a very small sound compared to the high titles of the kingdoms, countries and peoples that strike the senses, and the show of coats of arms, images and monuments that the kings and princes of the world boast of. Under a low title and without a badge of honor, Christ's kingdom, which is infinite and eternal, is preached; he says, "The work of your hands," for by the name of earth 2) or heaven they could not be comprehended. For everything that God has created is subject to Christ, as it is said in 1 Cor. 15, 27. "But when He says all things, it is evident that nothing is excepted except He who has all things subject to Him."

But did he say in vain, "Thou hast put all things under his feet," and yet did not say, "Thou hast made him Lord over all things"? For he omitted "the works of God" from "put under his feet," and "all things" from "make him Lord," while he wanted both to be understood together. 3) Or does he speak like this

1) A comma is missing after insiAvium in the editions. 2) Jenaer and Erlanger: t "rra instead of: terras.

3) In the editions (except the Weimar one) there is a question mark here, but it does not seem to us to be an interrogative sentence. If it were an interrogative sentence, it should not be: ouaisit enim but: oinisitne.

out of disgust against pride and ambition? so that even he, who in truth has everything put under his feet by God, may boast of the title, that he has been made a lord over everything, and so that the possession is greater than the title, while on the other hand men not infrequently have only the mere titles of things, but are lords over very small things.

This is certainly to be understood in an apostolic way, that he describes Christ in such a way that he did not seek this dominion, but was appointed by God, so that we might learn that we should not take honor for ourselves, but were called, like Aaron, Heb. 5, 4. 5, 4. And, what one might wonder at, by these words such a tremendously great dominion is ascribed to Christo, and yet almost in every single syllable, ambition is punished by the way; here is no pompous word, as the decrees of men are wont to speak: All things in all the world hath he commanded us 2c., and the rights, both of heavenly and earthly dominion, to Peter, his key-bearer. Thus the bulls foam along, and from the defiant throat roll out lofty words (inflatoque rotant turgentia gutture verba).

But here he says: "You have made" (constituisti) and "him" and "over your hands work". See, with how concise, reverent, tender, and yet mighty (solidis) words he treats the ineffable kingdom of Christ, although instead of constituisti in Hebrew it says: "You have made him Lord", as Peter Apost. 2, 1) 36. says: "This one he has made Lord and Christ," 2c. as it is said of the sun, Gen. 1, 16. that it should rule the day, or as Ps. 136, 8. says: "The sun to preside over the day."

And he beautifully says: "The work of your hands", praising the possession of Christ without any outward appearance. For it is the way of men to rule over and preside over only that which is worthy, great, and much, and in general, from which they may derive profit, honor, and pleasure. But over that which is small, unworthy, or in need of their help and labor, they easily allow it to be the subject of others. But Christ, the Lord of all things, owns everything that is always counted among the works of God, may it be weak and despised, or mighty, rich and honored. He is not a king who rules, moved by the prestige of the persons, but everything that is God's creation, he recognizes as his, without any difference.

Therefore Christ's kingdom is such that not only can it be given to no one else, but even if it could be given to someone else, no one can be found to accept it. For even among those who are most ambitious, there is no one who would wish to rule over the weak, the meager, the disgraced, and over such people from whom nothing could flow to him. For all are vexed at these words, "the work of thy hands" and "all things," and have no pleasure in knowing what these words mean.

(79) Among these people were also the popes in the past, who presumed all things to themselves. But they did not seek to rule "the works of God's hands" and "everything", but everything that pleased them and some works of God that they themselves had chosen. The others, by which they might also have benefited, they did not respect, however much they belonged to the works of GOD and "all things". It must therefore be an exceedingly pure eye, and quite far from the prestige of the person and the attachment to deceitful appearances, which shall rightly discern the works of the hands of GOD. For in this respect there is no difference between the pope and a layman, an emperor and a beggar, an enemy and a friend, a wise man and an unlearned man, a saint and a sinner, a healthy man and a sick man, a living man and a dead man. He is the Lord over all, and all things equally belong to Him.

80. Therefore rejoice, O Christian, and everyone, whoever you are, who recognizes yourself as a work of God. This is said to you, and to a great comfort, if you believe it, that Christ is in truth made Lord over all. For even if your enemies counsel evil against you from afar. Dear, against whom then do they counsel? Against thee, or against Christ? For they belong to him as well as to you. Fear not; he is there present and here; he sees what they are doing against you and watches over you with greater concern than you watch over yourself.

Do you think that a thing that is possessed has greater concern for itself than the one who possesses it? What can the gold in the box or in the bag think for itself? Has not the father of the house also procured the box for the same, and is on the watch for it at every hour, anxiously worried about the reenactments of robbers and thieves? Or is the gold stolen from itself or from its owner? And a thief, does he injure the gold more severely, or its owner? Can we then think that a stingy man will be inflamed if his goods are stolen from him, and that Christ should not be inflamed at any injury to his goods? And how will he be obedient to his Father, who has put all things under his feet? If then they kill thee, burn thee, hurt thee, accuse thee, cast thee out (when thou art but subject to him). Dear one, whom do they harm? Whose good do they spoil? Yours or Christ's?

Woe to our unbelief, which, because of its godlessness, cannot understand these consolations and this great assurance. For we do not lack a protector and one whose own we are (possessor), but we lack the faith that believes that we are his property. For you certainly hear a word of exceeding great faith when it is said, "All things you have put under his feet, and have set him over the work of your hands."

83. But if thou sayest, I fear that my Lord himself will destroy me, because I am a great sinner, and have not deserved that he should possess me in this blessedness (felicitate), I answer: He will not destroy you, if you confess that you are his, and that he is your HER, for his are both saints and sinners, and all the works of the hands of GOD. "Let every tongue (Phil. 2, 11.) confess that JESUS is the LORD," and that "to the glory of the Father." And Rom. 10:9: "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth that Jesus is the Lord, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." Through

This confession and this faith (I say), if you are a sinner, you will not only be justified but also saved, says the apostle. Rather, he will condemn those who, though they are his, will not receive him as their Lord, as he says in Luc. 19:27: "But those, my enemies, who would not that I should reign over them, bring them, and slay them before me." For these will not, and yet are compelled to be subject to him. For we do not have a king who is a driver (exactor), but who is a savior, especially of those who are oppressed by plagues (poenis) or by sins. For with these, apart from the name that they are God's work, there is hardly anything left; but the works of God are His [Christ's] very own possession.

Therefore, if you sin and fall, do not despair of Christ, for you cannot fall from His dominion unless you have ceased to be God's work. If you now acknowledge his dominion, and say with him in the Book of Wisdom, Cap. 15, 2: "Though we sin, yet are we yours, and know your power" 2c. He cannot abandon you, and you cannot be abandoned by him, unless you have no confidence in his mercy. He will acknowledge you as his own if you recognize him for your Lord. For this is what God reproaches the wicked in the first chapter of Isaiah [v. 3.]: "An ox knoweth his master, and an ass his master's crib: but Israel knoweth it not, and my people hear it not."

(85) Christ therefore is set over all things for us as Lord, that he might help us in all things, and that we might take refuge in him, whether in sins or in death, whether in life or in righteousness. "If we live (Rom. 14, 8. 7.), we live to the Lord; if we die, we die to the Lord. For ours none liveth unto himself, and none dieth unto himself." He who lives lives to the Lord, he who dies dies to the Lord.

V. 8, 9: Sheep, oxen, wild animals, the birds of the air, the fish of the sea, and all that is in the sea.

These two verses seem to have given our [Latin] interpreter and others the cause that they understood this Psalm by a mere man and translated it by angels. Some great fathers are also of this opinion, because in the first chapter of the first book of Moses [v. 28] it is read that God subjected these three kinds of animals to man after he was created. And of course they have not a little pretense for this opinion, because it seems as if the prophet explains everything that is put under the feet by these verses in such a way that it is nothing else but the animals of the earth, of the sky and of the sea, and it seems that not much is attributed to Christ if the dominion over these animals is attributed to him, since also human kings rule even over men.

But against this opinion Paul testifies very strongly, not only in the Epistle to the Hebrews (if perhaps someone should say that the same is not from Paul), but also 1 Cor. 15:27: "He put all things (he says) under his feet." But since the Scriptures and the Word of God must have One, simple and constant mind, so that we do not (as they say) make a waxen nose of the Holy Scriptures, it is fair that we prefer the interpretation of Paul to that of all the other Fathers, be it Ambrose, Augustine, Athanasius or Jerome,

(88) This I say, lest any one, after the manner of the scholastic teachers, should immediately follow all that he has read in any of the famous fathers, as if it were spoken from heaven, as some are wont to do, who have thus cut up the Scriptures into mere lobes of different understanding, so that we have almost as many opinions as syllables. And I do not know whether I should approve or disapprove of the study of Magister Sententiarum and Gratianus, by which they have brought it about that we have become accustomed to devour everything that only someone has brought forward (omnia omnium), like unclean animals that neither split their claws nor chew the cud with their tongues. For this study is (according to my judgment) the source of so many questions, opinions, disputes, wars, which are now already more than three hundred years prevail in the schools.

Therefore, one may allow the holy fathers to follow their own opinion from time to time and, according to their inclination, to exercise their will in the holy scriptures outside of the right order. But a theologian, who investigates the pure, right understanding, must necessarily consult the holy Scriptures themselves about everything and judge according to them, as Augustine teaches in many places, and Paul commands [1 Thess. 5, 21.]: "Test everything, and keep what is good."

Therefore, these two verses seem to attribute too little not only to Christ, but also to any mere man, since in the first chapter of the first book of Moses, dominion over the earth is also attributed to him, and over all trees, herbs, wood, which here is not even attributed to Christ, as we read. And I confess that this passage has significant difficulty. Augustine with his own here takes recourse to secret interpretation, but he cannot escape [the difficulty]. For since he has prefixed "all things" and "the works of the hands of GOD," there is no apparent reason why, since he declares this, he enumerates only the sheep and oxen and fish and birds (may righteous or sinners be understood among these according to spiritual interpretation). For these are not all that were put under Christ's feet, but are included in all these. Why then are these listed before others? Why was it not enough to say: "All" and: "The works of the hands of God"? Because here sheep, oxen, birds, fish, cattle must be understood according to the letter. I confess my ignorance and have nothing to say, but I want to give others a reason to think, since I cannot do anything else.

90) How if the prophet had intended to set forth primarily that which is put under the feet of a mere man, because of the contentious, stiff-necked people, especially the Jews, who most of all resist the kingdom of Christ? Lest someone might object: God cannot contradict Himself, who already before (Gen. 1) told the mere man this, so that he could do it through time.

The first is that he has subjected himself to the rule of the kingdom; and so, under the pretext of the Scriptures, either deny that by the fact that all things were put under Christ's feet those things are also understood, or falsely deny the whole dominion of Christ, but prevent this mischievousness [by saying] that all things were put under Christ's feet in such a way that even of what God once subjected to men he not only did not want it to be exempt, but that it was subjected to him together with men. And this so completely that if men did not want to be subject to Christ (as they are in truth), they should nevertheless know that what is subject to them is subject to him, and that he has power over everything that is theirs, without all resistance, however much they resist him.

91. Then there is no offense that is more contrary to the faith in the Lordship of Christ than the abundance of the ungodly, especially kings and great men, in these things that were once given to man, so that it was necessary to declare explicitly that these things were put under Christ's feet, lest anyone should be offended and think, when he sees the ungodly people, especially the great ones, that they are not subject to him. For it is easy to believe that everything else is subject to Christ, except what the wicked have. For this seems to be given entirely into their power, of which also the 144th Psalm [v. 14. 13. Vulg.] says: "Their oxen are fat"; "their chambers are full." As if the prophet meant to say: Do not be offended, dear brother, that I have said that all things are put under Christ's feet, since you alone see the opposite in the ungodly, his enemies; for you see that nothing else resists. Know that even in their case everything they have is subject to Christ.

And this opinion is also reinforced when you emphasize the word "universas" as if he wanted to say: "There is absolutely nothing, not even among the rebellious wicked, not only among those who are voluntarily subject to him, that is not put under his feet. And this laments also the apostle, Hebr. 2, 8, 1) by saying: We do not yet see that everything is subject to him, as if he wanted to say: All things have been put under his feet, but it is not yet fulfilled and we do not yet see it, namely because the ungodly resist him. Therefore the birds of the air and the fishes of the sea are added to strengthen the speech (per auxesin), as if he wanted to say: All that man has is subject to Christ, whether the things which he possesses or the things which are subject to him Genesis 1; he is the Lord of all things.

(92) This would not be far off the mark if someone were to think that another [false] trust of the Jews was put down by this word, which was that they believed that they were doing God a service by the sacrifices and burnt offerings of animals as with their own goods, just as St. Stephen rebuked them, Acts 7:49 ff. 7, 49. f., from Isaiah Cap. 66, 1. that they presumed to build a house for him, while everything would already be, out of which a house could be built for him. So here, too, one might assume, since the prophet teaches that the new king alone is to be honored with honor and adornment, that there is no reason for them to presume to serve him with slain animals. For to him to whom all things are subject, even sheep and oxen and all things that have ever been given to man are subject.

So what could they give to him who owns everything they have? For the same [false] trust that they have, he also rejects Ps. 50:8 with the same reason and the same saying: "Because of your sacrifice I do not punish you," that is, I have no cause against you because of your sacrifices. Why? "For otherwise your burnt offerings are always before me" (that is, there is nothing you can offer me, for it is already before me). [V. 9-13. "I will not take bullocks from your house, nor goats from your stalls. For all the beasts of the forest are mine, and the cattle of the mountains, where they are by a thousand.

walk. I know all the birds of the mountains, and all the beasts of the field are before me. Where I hungered, I would not tell thee, for the ground is mine, and all that is therein. Thinkest thou that I would eat oxen's flesh, or drink goat's blood?" Then follows the right worship [v. 14. f.], "Offer thanksgiving to GOD, and pay your vows to the Most High. And call upon me in the still, and I will save thee, and thou shalt praise me." And at the end [v. 23.], "He that offereth thanks praiseth me; and this is the way that I show him the salvation of GOD."

See now if Assaph did not draw almost this entire psalm from this eighth psalm. For it deals (just like this psalm) with the praise of God in tribulations and despises the sacrifice of livestock, which, as he says, is rather God's than man's, to whom it was given in Genesis 1, so that they should certainly also know here that everything is Christ's, and that he can no longer be served with the things that they think belong to them.

95 We will also add something about superstition and Christian freedom. For since this is a general saying, that all things are subject to Christ, and this is declared according to (post) the law, it is necessary that he should order all things, and moderate all the precepts of the preceding law. Therefore, not only in order to quench the vexation caused by the abundance of the ungodly, nor only in order to remove the [false] confidence instilled by the gift under the law 2) and the sacrifices consisting of these gifts, but also in order to save the freedom of the spirit, which the ceremonies of the law likewise suppressed with foolish confidence or an even more wicked evil conscience, the reign of Christ had to be proclaimed and believed to be in force. For the ceremonies of the law consisted mainly in the distinction of animals, food, clothing, places, waters, celestial regions, and in general in the things that are subject to man, Genesis 1.

2) donatio is the offering of gifts in accordance with the law. Cf. § 92.

I) In all editions: 1 Cor. 15. Only the Weimar one has correctly Hebr. 2, 8. in the margin.

96 In this way the apostle also speaks of it I Cor. 10, 25. f. After he had spoken for Christian liberty against ceremonies: "All things that are sold in the meat market, eat them, and inquire not, that ye may spare your consciences," he adds as a reason the very general saying from the 24th Psalm [v. 1], and says: "For the earth is the Lord's, and the things that are therein." So also here the prophet seems to have directed a general saying about the Lordship of Christ against the stubborn adherence of the Jews to ceremonies, so that he taught that under Christ, to whom everything is subject, everything is free and permitted, whether they preferred to eat fish, sheep, cattle, birds, or abstain from them. "The Son of man (says Christ Himself Marc. 2, 28.) is a Lord also of the Sabbath." Why a Lord? Not other than that all things are in his will. Why a Lord of the creatures and animals of the earth, the sea and the sky? Not other than that all things are in his will. Thus under Christ, who possesses all things, all things are free and lawful, which are in heaven, on earth, and in the sea. Nevertheless, today there is a greater captivity by the decrees of men than was ever the case under the law.

I want to have mentioned and said all this in such a way that everyone can form his own opinion about it. From this (if it is true), these two verses are also clear, and the reason is obvious why he has especially mentioned these things of all, because it is fitting for the most free kingdom of Christ to claim that everything is free and safe to do, and to instruct us rightly in it.

It is still left that where we have [in Latin] pecora campi [the cattle of the field], the Hebrew text has more appropriately XXX XXXXX, that is, the wild beasts of the land. For pecora in Latin means domestic animals, which he had sufficiently expressed by sheep and cattle. And where we have [in the Vulgate], "Which walk in the paths of the sea," the Hebrew text seems to speak not of fishes, but of everything else that has its being in the sea. For it seems to me that these two verses

The first, the sheep and oxen in general, and also everything that has its being on the land; the latter, the birds under the sky and the fish in the sea, and everything that walks in the sea. Here you must consider that according to what is written in the first book of Moses, all birds and all aquatic animals were brought forth from the water [Gen. 1, 20. f.]. Therefore he connects in the latter group the birds under the sky with the fishes in the sea.

But someone might ask why he ascribes paths to the fish and to what walks in the sea, since in the sea nothing is to be seen less than paths, and just as little in the air. Perhaps because the whole sea is pathless, in which every animal makes its way, and yet a common and straight (regia) path never remains, nor is the same path trodden there more often. But this is something minor.

97) So, in this Psalm, it has been well described to us how Christ suffered, was crowned, preached and believed, because the title has indicated it to us from the beginning [§ 1] by its winepress [Githith].

Therefore, to inculcate anew his right worship, which is nothing but faith, praise, glory, thanksgiving, he repeats the first verse and says:

V. 10. O Lord our sovereign, how glorious is your name in all the earth!

For it is great and difficult to believe that this and the child XXX have such great glory and dignity. Therefore the prophet admonishes that this must be often repeated and constantly inculcated. For the saying stands firm that God faithfully remembers man and takes care of him (esse memorem visitatorem) and crowns him, but [takes care of] only those who have become utterly nothing through being forgotten, disgraced and abandoned. For in such a way as it is written in this Psalm that God has exalted Christ [from the deepest humiliation], he wanted it to be recognized that, according to this example, he will always exalt such people who are of the same nature. Therein

he has sufficiently indicated against which people his eyes are open and on whom they are firmly directed. For "the eyes of the Lord look upon the righteous" [Ps. 34:16] (that is, upon those who are nothing in this life, as

He is merciful to himself as well as to men, because "he looks down on the lowly things in heaven and on earth" [Ps. 113, 6]. And it is this mercy of his that makes his name great in all the earth.

The Ninth Psalm.

V. 1. a psalm of David, to be sung by the beautiful youth. 1)

Dear God, how great is the diversity in the interpretation of this title. One understands the death of Absalom, another the death of Goliath, another a musical instrument, another God's secret judgment, another youth, another the singer of the Psalm, and others still. Of all these things, whoever wants to, can look up Lyra, Burgensis and Reuchlin.

According to what I can see from the purpose (scopo) of the psalm, I will follow the title of the Burgensis, not its interpretation, which says that which is translated by pro occultis means youth in Hebrew. For this psalm is by all means a kind of general thanksgiving, a rejoicing, an encouragement, a prayer full of sweet movements about the fact that the enemies are defeated and shall be defeated again and again, which is only fitting for a people that lives in the midst of enemies, fights, conquers, triumphs, and speaks of past as well as present and future things. Therefore, I have no doubt that this psalm speaks of Christ's people, especially the martyrs and their person. To show this in something, let us treat the Hebrew title, which reads thus: XXXX XXX XXXXX XXXXX XXXX.

3. means "to the victory", and is above [Ps. 4, § 1] sufficiently interpreted. XXXX XXXX means: A Psalm of David. Now XXXXX XXX is left. If one with Jerome into two words (which Lyra does not allow),

1) Vulgate: In üneln ^Luther: aü vlotorium^ pro oeeultis ülü, vaviü.

so it means: about death or at death, and therefore some dream here the death of Goliath, others the death of Absalom. If taken as One Word, it is a nomen abstractivum nom Rerbum from the verbum 2], which means: he is hidden. From this verbum 2^ and young man and virgin, have their name because they were raised in huts and in secret, since it is very dangerous for tender age to wander in the world and be exposed to its lures. Therefore, youth also means the adolescent generation (adolescentium), namely the age that is hidden in this way and is raised godly in secret. Thus it is written of Jacob that he was a pious man who stayed in the tabernacles, Gen. 25:27, and of Esau that he was a man who knew how to hunt and was a husbandman. And from this custom arose the custom that the virgins are called in Hebrew (that is. hidden), as Is. 7, 14: "Behold a XXXX is with child" 2c.

David, however, by this title deliberately designates a strange (prodigiosam) youth, since he designates it as the youth XXX, that is, of the son or the son, since "having young men or virgins" belongs to a father or grandfather, or at most to a brother, or your guardian of anyone. For who is the Son of whom it could be said, as a son, that he has young men and virgins whom he instructs and raises up in secret? Therefore he evidently indicates Christ, who, by a new miracle, terminates the fleshly generation with his birth, and is only a Son, not a man's Father according to the flesh, and who is nevertheless,

By beginning the spiritual procreation through the new birth by means of baptism, he is the father of many sons and daughters, whom he raises up in the secret of faith, instructing them not to fix their minds on what is before their eyes, but on what is hidden, as it is said in Ps. 31:21: "You hide them secretly from everyone's defiance."

Therefore it is very probable, that by drawing both meanings together into one, signifies a new creature of the gospel, the offspring of grace, the youth of baptism, the people of the new testament, and the [creatures] of the Son hidden in truth, that is, the faithful and obedient [children] of Christ, whose life is hidden under death, whose salvation is hidden under the cross, whose honor is hidden under shame. For thus he hid them from the world, of whom David, the man filled with the Spirit, took it into his mind to signify them by young men and virgins, who are set at home and in secret.

For, among other things, this is also a praise of the Jewish people, that they have always kept away from the undertakings (studiis) of the merchants and traders, and have been satisfied with what the homeland produced, just as also their fathers, since these much-migrated (polytropi) and wandering people, as they indeed see the customs of many people and many cities, and (as they think) will be educated, so also follow the example of many exceedingly bad people and teach this to others. Corinth, Syracuse, Tyre and Alexandria proved this sufficiently, and the more important trading cities still prove this to this day, so that God did not unjustly expel the Cananites (that is, the merchants) from their land before all of them. He is educated enough, who knows the law of his God, and serves God purely and honestly, for which above all, especially in the case of adult youth (adolescentioribus), a withdrawal into seclusion and a fleeing from people is necessary. That pagan says: As often as I have been among people, I have come back as a worse person (minor). And another: Friends steal your time. And St. Bern hard says: I am never less alone than when I am alone. I say this, not as if I wanted to condemn this Mers class to loneliness, since it is also proven by frightening examples and the reputation of famous fathers that for the young age nothing is more dangerous than loneliness, but also danger in dealing with the big crowd.

What should one do? It is advisable to have a well-known teacher at home, under whose supervision the young people can speak, do or leave everything in good fear. And that means first to be, that is, to be well instructed at home. Then, when the youth has been instructed, it is called out into the office of governing the people. Then it shall do by inclination (affectu) what it did before by deed (effectu); then it shall be one in spirit, whereas before it was one according to the letter, in that it now despises from itself what is before its eyes, and teaches to despise what it has hitherto despised according to the instruction of another, or rather, has been instructed to despise. To this the monasteries and the general studies were once endowed. 1)

But I also do not want to reject that this hidden thing is not only understood by this part of the church, but also by the opposite part, the enemies, because he not only sings about the state and the work of the spiritual and hidden people, but also about the spiritual victory over the enemies, which is given to them in secret, because they fight spiritually, and these are defeated spiritually, thus fulfilling the exemplary wars (figurae bellorum) of the Old Testament, where the enemies were defeated bodily, because there was the revealed being (aperta) of the servant, 2) that is, of Moses, the figurative and outward figure 3) of the people, of the war, of the victory, as here the hidden being of the Son, that is, the spiritual and inner

The fulfillment of the people, the war, the victory.

4. it must therefore be Christ's people, whose life is hidden with Christ in God, who do not walk in the things that are manifest, but suffer much from those who walk in this way, and as victors in all things, they sing this to their Christ on account of their enemies, who are defeated in the hidden and spiritual war, so that it is hidden on both sides, both from the defeated and from the victors, both acting in the Spirit.

v. 2. 3. I thank the Lord with all my heart, and tell all his wonders. I am glad and rejoice in you, and praise your name, O Most High.

The order of the Psalms from the first to the eighth we have indicated in the sixth Psalm [§ 5 ff]. Now we must also try to show in what way the eighth follows the seventh, and this ninth from the eighth.

It is obvious that the first seven psalms are descriptions of the sufferings and tribulations, both of Christ, the head, and of the Christians, his members, among which there is no psalm that expresses his joy through praise and thanksgiving. For the eighth psalm is the first of all that begins to cheerfully praise the name, the praise, the honor, the adornment, and does not contain any lamentation, nor does it have anything to do with adversaries, but collects the fruit of the suffering in the previous psalms in a short epitome, telling how nothing the persecutors achieve, and how blessedly he suffered, and it was very fitting that he began with Christ, the head of all sufferers.

(6) Therefore, the eighth psalm also follows in a very good order after the psalms that speak of tribulations, and it sings of Christ in the first place among the joyful and those who are victors over the afflictions. For the afflicted must be comforted at times, so that they can endure, and therefore happy and sad psalms must be mixed in alternating order, so that this mixture of different psalms and (as it seems to one) this confused order may be a

The example of the Christian life, which is practiced under the various tribulations of the world and the consolations of God.

(7) Now that in the eighth Psalm the joy of the head, Christ, the victor over all sufferings, has begun, in this ninth also follows quite properly the joy of his body, the church, over the victory also in her tribulations, so that she is now also the comrade in consolation of him whom she followed in the way of suffering in the preceding Psalms, by her example and (as it is said) as it were with her finger she wants to point and confirm what is said in the preceding Psalm [Ps. 8, 3.]: "Out of the mouth of young children and sucklings hast thou prepared a power for the sake of thine enemies, to destroy the enemy and the avenger."

(8) He continues, I say, to show this power of the mouth of the young children, and that Christ is set Lord over all, so that one can not inappropriately regard this psalm as a well-executed example of the previous one, since in it the destruction of the adversaries, the enemies and the vengeful, and the glorification of the name and praise of God are treated in such a way that almost nothing else is treated. For, as it is seen from the eighth Psalm that David knew that power must be prepared out of the mouths of the young children, so now, lest it be thought that he spoke empty words without understanding (as Montanus 1) accuses the prophets of doing), he shows that he also knows the matter and all that pertains to this power (universum negotium).

The words: "I give thanks" and "I praise" are sufficiently interpreted in the last verse of the seventh Psalm: "I give thanks to the Lord because of his righteousness, and I will praise the name of the Lord, the Most High. "I rejoice and am glad" [is interpreted] in the 5th Psalm, where it is said [v. 12.], "Let all rejoice and be glad in thee." For what is here expressed by exultabo is there expressed by the

1) In the Baseler, Weimarschen and in the Wittenberger correctly: nt Nontanns proplmtas inensat; in the Jenaer: Montanas; in the Erlanger: Montanas. - The words: sins mante, without mind, are to be understood of utter insanity; for so Montanus teaches. Cf. Guericke, Kirchengeschichte (7th ed.), Vol. I, p. 294.

The future tense of the same verb is rendered gloriabuntur. Furthermore, Jerome has translated it there by laudavit, here by gaudebo. So difficult is it that an interpreter everywhere remains in harmony with himself. And what he promises there in the midst of tribulation that he will do, he does here, after he is delivered, with exuberant joy. For he who is in distress is sustained only by the praise of God, which he can offer when the calamity has come to an end, as it says in the 42nd Psalm, v. 6: "Why do you grieve, my soul, and are so troubled within me? Wait upon GOD, for I shall yet thank him that he helpeth me with his face." And there, v. 5: "For I would gladly go with the multitude, and go with them to the house of GOD, with rejoicing and thanksgiving, among the multitude that feast."

(10) Neither be moved to use words in the future tense of present things, for this is the custom of those who tell, or sing, or will do, to say, I will sing, I will tell, I will do, 2c., when they are already beginning.

11 See, then, how he who says he gives thanks, he tells, he rejoices, he is glad, he praises, bursts forth with such great ardor and such a great abundance of the sweetest movements of the heart, and is altogether so full [of divine thought that he cannot fully comprehend it in words (emphaticus). He does not simply say, "I give thanks," but "from my heart" and "with all my heart," and now recounts, not simply the works, but "the wonders of GOD," and indeed "all of them." He even leaps like John in his mother's womb, and his spirit rejoices in God, his Savior, who has done great things for him [Luc. 1, 47. 49.], and the miracles that follow. In this word, it is certainly made known what this psalm is about, namely that it sings of the wonders of God.

12. but the miracles are that through those who are nothing he converts those who are everything, and that through those who live in hidden faith and have died before the world he humbles those who flourish in honor and are respectable in the sight of the world, doing such great things not through faith, but through faith.

13) How does it rhyme that he says he will tell all the wonders with the words of Job 9:10: "He does great things that are not to be asked, and wonders of which there is no number"? Or who can tell all the wonders of God? To this we say that this is spoken in the great heat with exaggerated words (hyperbolico affectu), from which it is said in the 6th Psalm, v. 7: "I swim my bed all night long", because he has such a great zeal for the great deeds of God that he would like to tell all of them, as far as his desire is concerned, although he cannot do it. For love has neither measure nor aim, 1 Cor. 13:7: "Love believes all things, endures all things, endures all things." So it is able to do everything and does it, but God looks at the heart.

It is also possible that he said "all" because he intends to sing only about the works of God and nothing else, according to the words of Ps. 51, 15: "I will teach the transgressors your ways", and Ps. 17, 4: "That my mouth speak not the works of men. I will tell all wonders, that is, all that I will tell henceforth will be your wonders. We have heard that in the 6th Psalm, v. 8. [Vulg.], it was said in the same way to speak, "I am become old among all my enemies," that is, among those who are all my enemies.

15) "With all my heart"; this can be understood from the above, but I will leave it at that. For there are people, as will be said in the 12th Psalm, v. 3, who speak from a divided heart, that is, from a divided and divided heart, since they thank God as long as He is good to them. Others, however, "also lied to Him with their tongue, and their heart was not steadfast in Him," Ps. 78, 36. f., "who speak kindly to their neighbor, but have evil in their heart," [Ps. 28, 3.] as bloodhounds and false people. It never happens to them that they recognize the miracles of God, let alone that they ever tell them.

(16) Therefore, he who does not exalt himself in good days, nor in adversity against God, gives thanks to the Lord with all his heart.

but remains the same on both sides in sincere praise of God; but this is only possible for those who have been crucified with Christ and have experienced His suffering with Him.

V. 4. that you have driven my enemies behind you; they have fallen and perished before you.

17 Here he begins to narrate the miracles of God, namely the conversion of the enemies. Enough has already been said about the figure of speech, which is the most common in the Hebrew language, the synecdoche, of which some say it is the singular instead of the plural, others that it is a collective word (collectivum) instead of a distributive. It is [in Latin]: In convertendo inimicum [that you convert the enemy] and immediately after: Infirmabuntur [they will be made weak], namely, the same enemy or enemies. Next, what is offensive to grammarians: In convertendo inimicum, could have been translated in the second person: Since you will convert or have converted my enemy. For this is how he began and then continues the psalm in the second person.

But he uses words that are taken from heroes and warfare, so that it could seem to an inexperienced person as if he were talking about physical wars and enemies, since he mentions the enemies, then talks about the fact that they are driven back, put to flight, that they are also weakened and killed and destroyed. But all this, as Augustine says in this passage, is a benefit, not a punishment, and such a great benefit that nothing can be compared to it.

But according to a simpler understanding I understand by "turning behind" (conversionem retrorsum) nothing else than the flight of the enemies, in which they turn their back and go back to where they came from; just as the Egyptians said, Ex. 14, 25: "Let us flee from Israel; the Lord fights for them against the Egyptians." This passage was partly an example and partly a mirror for the prophet, by which he was instructed to establish this prophecy. For not by any human power, not by any weapon, but by the

He destroyed the Egyptians just by looking at them, as it says there [Ex. 14, 24. f.]: "Then the Lord looked upon the army of Egypt out of the pillar of fire and the cloud, and made a terror in their army; and thrust the wheels from their chariots, and overthrew them with impetuosity." So it is said in Ps. 104:32, "He looketh on the earth, he lifteth it." Habak. 3, 6. "He looked, and divided the nations, that the mountains of the world were broken in pieces." And Ps. 97:5 [Vulg.], "Mountains melt as wax before the face of the LORD, before the face of the Ruler of all the earth."

18. so that he says here [in Latin]: "before your face", takes away the suspicion, as if it was with weapons and carnal force, in which men trust and with which they fight, so that the flight, the inability and the fall of the enemies of the church must be understood in such a way, that they come entirely from a spiritual power and from heaven, as it is also said in Judges. 5, 20: "From heaven they fought against them, the stars in their heels fought against Sissera." Only that in this Psalm not a bodily flight, as was the case in those examples, but a spiritual flight, weakness and fall of the enemies is described, as I have said. For he speaks of the fulfillment and the hidden, which those examples indicate.

So what is the spiritual flight of the enemies? what is the weakening? what is the destruction? We can learn this from the image presented to us by the falling enemies. First, there is flight, then there is incapacity, which comes from the verb "to fall" in Hebrew, so that it is a fall by which the enemies, fleeing and being beaten, fall and die. Finally, the ruin and destruction by which they cease to be completely, so that even their memory is no more. By all this nothing else is described than the conversion and justification of the wicked. For the flight is a terror and the lost confidence of the conscience, the recognition of sin, the recognized power of the law. This is followed immediately by the weakening, the fall, the violent turmoil (tumultus) and the exceedingly blessed putting down (caedes), which we call repentance (contritio), namely the hatred against sin, and now also the death of the evil inclinations themselves. For then we immediately dislike what we liked before, and we like what we disliked before; we give way and turn our backs on that which we before brazenly pursued with unreasoning desire.

20) This is followed by complete destruction and extinction, when by God's grace the will is converted and not even a sign of the former life is left in us, namely by walking in a new life, according to the power of the resurrection of Jesus Christ, as the apostle teaches Rom. 6, 4. We can also see this in the example of the same apostle himself. Being an exceedingly fierce enemy of the church, and fleeing, and suddenly fainting, he said [Acts 9:6], "Lord, what wilt thou that I should do?" At last he was completely destroyed and had so nothing left of enmity that he worked for the church of God with all his strength, more than all the other apostles, 1 Cor. 15, 10.

But with what powers this victory will be achieved, he indicates by saying: "Before you" (a facie tua). In this is indicated the office of the word, through which the will of God, His mercy, His judgment 2c. is revealed, of which he will immediately say. For by nothing else is this flight, weakening, destruction of the wicked brought about, than by the word of God alone, in which the glory of the Lord is revealed. If God cooperates in this and makes Himself known to the hearts of the wicked by increasing, this victory will follow. Therefore, he did not want to say "before you" (a facie tua) in vain, rather than: through some other thing, or: through the word, in order to indicate the powerful increase of the word. For who would have been converted by the appearance (a facie) of the apostles, since they were contemptible in person?

How many hear God's word, who nevertheless persist in their ungodliness. But where the face of the Lord is revealed through the Holy Spirit, who teaches within, it follows at the same time that the enemies are driven behind them, their weakening, their destruction, as it is described in Isa.

5, 29. [Vulg.] reads: "His roar is like that of a lion, he will roar like the young lions, and will gnash his teeth, and will seize and hold the prey, and there will be no one to pluck it out." And Micah 5:7 f.: "The remnant of Jacob shall be among the heathen of many nations, as a lion among the beasts of the forest, as a young lion among a flock of sheep, whom no man can withstand, when he goeth through, treading and tearing. For thy hand shall prevail against all thine enemies, that all thine enemies may be cut off."

22 Therefore, with the most sincere gratitude, she attributes these miracles not to herself, but to God alone, and if she has cooperated with her service, she nevertheless does not say that this was directed by her word, but by the face of God, as Paul also says in 1 Cor. 3:7, 9: "So then neither he who plants nor he who waters is anything, but God who gives the flourishing. We are God's co-workers."

But why does he speak [in Latin] in the future time: fugabis, infirmabis, perdes, while he says praise and thanksgiving because of past things? Perhaps that we say it simply because he interpolates the prophecy about the things to come; therefore he also uses, mixed up, words in the future time and the past time, as this is generally the constant use of all the prophets, especially of the writers of the Psalms, while in truth the thing goes on in this way from the beginning, that the enemies of the church are both defeated, as well as defeated, and will be defeated in the future, and so firmly sees that the word of the Lord remains for eternity, and its truth for and for, and fits men in all times, in that the word always works the same, but in richer measure at the beginning of the New Testament.

23. add one thing more, that thou take heed to the difference of the persons, of them and of their enemies, namely, that those [the beautiful youth] are weak, foolish, and despised, but that these are mighty, wise, honored, and altogether "the mountains of the wager," as we have said from Habakkuk Cap. 3, 6. Said [Vulg.]: "He looked, and divided the heathen, that the mountains of the world were broken in pieces; and stooping down-the hills in the world before the ways of his eternity" (that is, his world). This is how it is said in Isa. 40, 4: "All mountains and hills shall be humbled", or how it is said there in Cap. 2, 11. it is said more clearly: "All high eyes shall be humbled, and whatsoever is high shall have to stoop down; but the Lord alone shall be high in that day." And Ps. 104:32: "He stirreth up the mountains, and they smoke."

I say, if you do not pay attention to this difference of persons, you will not sufficiently understand what these miracles are, of which he says that he will tell them. For what is more wonderful than that Peter, an unlearned, simple man and a fisherman, should convert the chief priests, the Pharisees, even kings of the Gentiles, and even Rome itself. That he should attack this city in the bloom of its greatness and power, in order to subdue it to himself, a coarse and poor fisherman, seems so foolish and ridiculous that it looks before the whole world as if he could hardly have undertaken anything else that would have been more ridiculous and impossible. And yet, that which so far exceeded the expectations (fidem) of all men was believed and happened, even though Rome resisted most stubbornly, and finally this city was overcome with the bloodshed of many martyrs. And, God be lamented, how much these miracles have fallen into oblivion today; indeed, they are not known and not heeded, even though they are still before our eyes.

V. 5. for you execute my justice and cause; you sit on the throne a right judge.

24 I say, my enemies have perished because you have judged my cause. Dear, what is this consequence (consequentia)? I have said that the diversity of persons makes the wonders of God glorious. For since the neglected in Israel (as Isaiah Cap. 49, 6. calls it) and the remaining from Jacob and the poor of the earth contend against the mountains of the betting, as has been said, there was neither hope nor prospect that this matter would be incumbent on the wretched, or that someone would be there to bring justice to the poor. For even Pilate, who otherwise, as it seems.

The man who was a very civil man was deceived by this appearance alone, and condemned Christ unjustly, and that knowingly, thinking that there was nothing wrong with a poor man perishing, and that there was no one to avenge him. But in the 140th Psalm, v. 13, it says: "I know that the LORD will execute the cause of the wretched and the right of the poor." For our God alone has this honor, that he looks upon the lowly and afflicted, and avenges; and these are his own works, and therefore wonderful.

(25) It is therefore one of the wonders of God to establish justice for the poor and to cast down those who hope, that He may justify those and condemn those, and to do as Isaiah says, Cap. 14:2: "And they shall be held captive by whom they were held captive, and shall have dominion over their captors. For this is the most glorious kind of victory, to make friends of enemies, and servants of persecutors, as the church did with the kings and princes of the world.

26. "You sit on the throne a right judge." For so it is said in the Hebrew [iudex justitiae instead of in the Vulgate: Qui iudicas justitiam] But He gives the reason, Wherefore he says that his cause is judged, because (he says) my cause is detestable to the whole race, and all men's judgment is unjust, since every man is a liar and an enemy of the truth which I speak and follow, so much so that even those who boast most of all of their wisdom, righteousness and spirituality (religione), namely of the world's mountains, persecute me most of all, who, not knowing your righteousness and seeking to establish theirs, .They are not subject to your righteousness, and by this pretense they bring it about that, because all men are moved to fall to them and hate me, they dare to imagine that you also will be an unjust judge, condemn my cause, and award justice to their cause.

27. but thou art a right judge; thine is the judgment seat, thine the verdict, and thine the dominion. Therefore I know, and have been sure, and am still sure, that thou wilt bring justice to my cause, and wilt drive my enemies behind, and cast them down, and destroy them. 2c.

On this opinion also the 93rd Psalm, v. 1. says: "The Lord is King and gloriously adorned," and again, v. 2. says: "From this time forth thy throne is established; thou art everlasting," and it follows, v. 3. 4. says: "O Lord, the rivers of waters rise, the rivers of waters lift up their waves, the rivers of waters are great and roar dreadfully, but the Lord is greater still on high." For this is the one consolation of the oppressed, that they know that Christ sits as a King and Judge over all. So Peter says 1 Pet. 4, 5. against those who blaspheme the holiness of believers: "Who will give account to him who is ready to judge the living and the dead." Although he does not actually speak of the last judgment in this psalm, he nevertheless terrifies with this judgment, as we will see, just as Peter does here.

28 From this we can see which people he calls his enemies. For since he boasts that God brings justice to his cause, it is obvious that he has suffered and been oppressed by the wicked, namely many, great and cunning people, before whom he was so utterly incapable, abandoned and despised that no man, but only God, has taken up his cause. For he would not boast of God as his avenger if he had not felt that he was abandoned and lonely before men.

(29) And so, without our inquiring into it, this verse reveals and describes to us the nature of both parts; that the part which is God's is afflicted and forsaken, but that the part which belongs to the world is powerful and surrounded by many. Namely, by such great exhortations we are comforted throughout the Scriptures when we suffer for the truth, yet even so we dare not confess Christ freely and publicly.

There the grammarians may see whether this is well spoken in Latin: Fecisti iudicium meum et causam meam. It seems to me that facere causam et iudicium is an expression peculiar to the Hebrew language for: "to lead a thing" (expedire), as it is in our German mother tongue. For the Latin say: agere causas and ferre sententiam. Here, however, is the word facere, of which we have said that it is as much as XXX, so that [ausge that] the Lord, where parties quarrel with each other and carry on quarrels, as judge puts an end to the quarrel, establishes the right and makes peace (faciat). For both words, XXXX and XXX, in Hebrew denote a judgment (iudicium), one of which he [the Latin translator] has rendered by iudicium, the other by causa, perhaps because in every legal transaction there are two tasks for the court, one that the innocent be helped to his right, the other that the guilty be condemned, as if he wanted to say: Both rights are mine: that my cause be helped to its right, and the cause of the other be condemned.

30: "Thou sittest on the throne" seems to be a paraphrase for: Thou art made king, thou art made judge, as Ps. 2, 6. [Vulg.]: "But I am set up king by him," as it is also said in the 110th Psalm, v. 1. "Sit thou at my right hand," which Ps. 97. 1. says in other words: "The LORD is king." For this has come to pass since Christ was taken up into heaven, as foretold in Isa. 9:7: "He shall sit on the throne of David, and in his kingdom, to judge and to establish it with judgment and righteousness from henceforth even for ever." Jer. 23:5 ff: "Behold, the days come, saith the LORD, that I will raise up unto David a righteous seed; and he shall be a king that shall reign, and do judgment and righteousness in the earth. And this shall be his name, that they shall call him: LORD, who is our righteousness."

(31) From these words it is evident that the honor of righteousness and wisdom cannot be attributed to any mortal throughout the ages. For however many kings there have been of whom the books of men boast that they have been wise and just, they have all been foolish and unjust. For though they have distinguished themselves in human and worldly wisdom or righteousness, yet they have been found vain, lying, and unjust in the sight of God and in that which is of God. This is clearer than the sun, both in the Roman empire and in that of the Jews. Did not the Romans give very beautiful laws? Did they not restrain proud nations through justice?

hold? But why did they persecute Christ and the Christians so cruelly? Of course, because their righteousness was a mere appearance in the eyes of men, but in truth it was nothing in the eyes of God.

32 Therefore the apostle 1 Cor. 2, 7. f. is bold enough to say: "We speak of the secret, hidden wisdom of God, which none of the rulers of this world has known. [1 Cor. 1, 20.] "Where are the wise? Where are the scribes? Where are the worldly wise?"

33 So Christ alone sits on the throne and in the kingdom in such a way that he is a king of righteousness and judge in these things that are God's. Therefore he alone reigns, and his kingdom shall have no end. For as the prophet compares his righteous judgment with the righteous judgment of men as an unrighteousness, so he compares his kingdom with the kingdom of men as a bondage and captivity. For he alone is actually king and reigns over everything, he is able to do everything, he wills everything in a righteous way, therefore all can rejoice who are unjustly oppressed in the world.

(34) And what is the whole great nature of the kingdoms and authorities of the world, in which judgment is executed and justice is done over temporal things, money, honor, pleasure, and the like, but a kind of fable or play? For in all these things sin is not abolished, neither is righteousness imparted, but only a pretense and an image is presented, that sin is to be abolished and righteousness imparted; and yet some people are so foolish that they take this play for serious.

35 But Christ's kingdom is always praised in Scripture for its judgment and righteousness, that it judges and kills the old man with its deeds, and justifies the new man. Therefore, it alone is attributed to Him by Jeremiah, Cap. 23, 5, that he establishes justice and righteousness on earth, in that he evidently states that all others on earth do not exercise either judgment or righteousness, but, as I have said, only set themselves up that way. Therefore, in the holy

In this way, we can assume a much higher judgment and righteousness in the Scriptures than in worldly things and rights. For judgment is the death of sin, righteousness is eternal life in Christ; this alone God can accomplish, not man.

Therefore the words of this verse have a kind of displeasure against the worldly judges and kings, as if he said in opposition (per antithesis): Why do those judges and kings puff themselves up, who judge against me for their cause? In truth, you alone are the king and the judge of all, compared to whom those are only painted kings, for you judge rightly even the sins that seem to be justice to those.

37 But you will ask, By what authority, by what people, by what legal process, by what administrators, by what witnesses did he carry out his cause and his judgment? It follows:

V. 6. You rebuke the nations and destroy the wicked; you destroy their name forever and ever.

(38) I thought we would hear here the clash of arms and the tumult of horses and horsemen, and behold, the sound of the word and the scolding he makes the instrument to carry out such a great trade. He only scolds, and everything is done. Who should not be surprised? This is it, that out of the mouth of the young children and sucklings, he brings to pass a power [Ps. 8, 3]. This is that the Spirit of truth punishes the world for sin, for righteousness, and for judgment [John 16:8]; by the word alone he does all things.

(39) And since he speaks primarily of the Gentiles, and this rebuke, if by anyone, is fulfilled either first or most of all by the apostle Paul, the teacher of the Gentiles, it is reasonable that he be cited as an example for this verse, since there is no doubt that what is said here was done by him. See how he chides Rom. 3:23: "They are sinners all at once, and lack the glory which they ought to have in GOD." And again [v. 9.], "We have proved that both Jews and Greeks are all under sin." And Rom. 2:1: "Therefore, O man, thou canst not excuse-who thou art that judgest, because thou doest the very thing that thou judgest. And Cap. 5, 12, where he proclaims that sin and death have penetrated to all men, he says: "Because they have all sinned."

In short, in this whole epistle, which, in my judgment, is both an interpretation of the whole Scripture and a brief epitome of it, yes, a light and a revelation, - what man does he not make a sinner in it? With how great confidence does he rebuke all? which no other book in Scripture does so abundantly, so clearly, that this gloss would not inappropriately be added to this verse: "Thou rebukeest the Gentiles," namely, by the apostle Paul; orally, indeed, many other Gentiles, but in writing especially the Romans.

40 But in this place he preferred to use the word "you rebuke" rather than any other, so that the simple preaching of the word would be indicated, because this was better suited to the matter, to express the manner of this whole trade, by which he converts the enemy and establishes the cause of justice. For "to rebuke" means to punish, to convict as guilty, to frighten, which happens primarily when the conscience of anyone is held to God's word. There the flight begins, there the presumption and the trust in oneself is put aside, and all strength of the flesh slackens and falls away completely. This does not happen if the simple speech does not move; for many hear, but, being without understanding, are not moved. Therefore, in the rebuke not only the word is praised, but also the power and efficacy of the word, where people hear and are startled by what they hear, as those Apost. 2, 37. at the word of Peter, which passed through their hearts, saying, "Men, brethren, what shall we do?" 2c.

41. And behold the spirit, which, though it does not deal in falsehood, is an unconquerable man of war. He fights with the word, but no one can resist the same. Why is that? Men fight against each other with weapons and bodily forces, where neither of them can snatch the confidence of the heart from the other; therefore neither gives way to the other. And even if they have to leave the body when they die, they still leave the heart.

The spirit does not lose its courage, and no one has ever been found among men who could have overcome the mind of another man. But the spirit does not fight against the body and its powers, but addresses its voice to the conscience alone, and immediately all resistance falls away, all confidence, all strength.

42. Who should not tell this as a miracle? For who can stand before this word of Paul Rom. 1, 18.: "For God's wrath from heaven is revealed against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men who hold out the truth in unrighteousness"? Who can stand firm? Who can be confident? Who can be bold when it is announced to him that the divine majesty is angry with him? Or who is not turned behind him, falls and perishes, when his conscience, reproached by the word of God, stands against him with an evil testimony? But if the heart of man is overcome by this art, and the spirit has taken the innermost part of the kingdom, what remains in man that is not overcome?

(43) And so mighty is this victory that we see that it is also true among men that he who is troubled by his conscience can suffer neither judgment, nor rebuke, nor rumor, nor danger, and that this proverb is true: Conscience is as many as a thousand witnesses, and that all-knowing one: He who has an evil conscience thinks that one always speaks of him. Therefore, it rightly follows:

44. "And kill the wicked." For so it is said in the Hebrew. For he who is struck by this chiding immediately recognizes his misery. Thus Paul, when he was reproached from heaven, immediately became an exceedingly godly disciple out of an ungodly adversary of Christ, and said [Acts 9:6], "Lord, what wilt thou that I should do?" The spirit of man cannot bear this rebuke, but, as if struck by lightning, it changes and is transformed. Thus it is said in Ps. 18:16: "From thy rebuke, from the breath and snorting of thy nose."

It is not necessary to remind here again that according to the figure of the synecdoche "to the godless" stands for "the godless", since this figure is so frequent, indeed, even in our mother tongue this exceedingly sweet manner of speaking takes place, so that one generally says: God helps your boldest (fortiorem), that is, the boldest. Therefore, in order not to become peevish, I will henceforth say nothing more about it, since it is enough for me that I have pointed out once and for all that this is almost the most common figure in sacred Scripture.

45 "The wicked", here is such a one, as we have sufficiently explained in the first and fifth Psalm, who is without faith and shines through great appearances, and seems to be nothing less than a wicked one. And this is the enemy who persecutes the most out of zeal for God and righteousness, whose conversion is exceedingly difficult and miraculous, impossible even to the mere word, unless the rebuke is added as a reinforcement.

46. "Their name you destroy." Behold, this is it that I have said, the wicked are such people as have a beautiful name. For it is said in the 5th and 8th Psalms, how the name in the Scriptures signifies the good report. They have the name that they live (as it is said in Revelation 3:1), and they are dead. Puffed up by this name, they certainly persecute the XXXXX as their adversaries, and defile them with a shameful name. Now their name will be destroyed, when they, scolded by the word of the spirit or rather by the spirit of the word, put away confidence, delusion and the name of truth, wisdom and righteousness, become weak, become fools and sinners, seek the grace of Christ in humility and the comfort of the fellowship of the Son with trembling, so that now they are no longer ashamed of the name of a fool and sinner.

47. "Forever and ever." This indicates that the scolding is effective. Once it has struck the heart, it changes the person so that he cannot boast about his name or become vain forever, but even if he falls at times, he does not lose the right opinion of God, always being aware that both a good work and a good name belong to God alone.

V. 7. the swords of the enemy are ended; the cities thou hast turned back; their memory is perished with them. 1)

All this is in the Hebrew One verse. Jerome translates thus: Inimici completae sunt solitudines in finem, et civitates subvertisti, periit memoria eorum cum ipsis. It is quite a dark verse. The construction seems ambiguous and unusual because the words: inimici defecerunt frameae in Latin are such that one does not know whether inimici and frameae are singulars or plurals, genitives or nominatives. I give my opinion and judgment without presumption. The word frameae, which is undoubtedly of Hebrew origin, from the word which means to cut, hence from cutting framea is called a sword or a knife, as if framea were the same as a cutting tool (scissorium, that I say so), -this little word, I say, is set for the Hebrew noun XXXXX, which is the plural of XXX, which means a sword; which is followed by our (Latin) Interpreter; or from the verbum XXX, which signifies to devastate, to destroy, after which Jerome translated, "devastations" (solitudines). Therefore, according to my judgment, this is the meaning:

Inimici defecerunt frameae or solitudines, that is, the devastations of the enemy have been devastated, or, they have ceased to devastate, so that it reads something like Ps. 68, 19: "You have caught the prison," and Isa. 33, 1: "Woe to you, you devastator! Do you think you will not be destroyed? And thou despiser! Do you think you will not be despised? When thou hast made an end of disturbing, thou shalt be destroyed: and when thou hast made an end of despising, thou shalt be despised again." And this verse almost agrees with the words that Isaiah also speaks, Cap. 14, 3-6: "And in that day, when the Lord shall give thee rest from thy mourning and from thy sorrow, and from thy hard service wherein thou hast been, then shalt thou speak such a word against the king of Babylon, saying, How is it?"

The driver is finished, and the interest has come to an end! The Lord has broken the rod of the wicked, the rod of the rulers, who smote the nations in fury without ceasing, and ruled with fury over the nations, and persecuted without mercy." And afterwards, v. 8: "Because thou liest, no man cometh up to cut us off."

Therefore, whether one says "swords" (frameae) or "devastations" (vastationes), it means precisely the persecutions of the church, with which they cut, persecuted and devastated the princes of this world, especially the Jews; these persecutions ceased completely when the Gentiles were scolded and the wicked perished, and their name was eternally destroyed. For it is a necessary consequence that persecution ceases when there is no longer a persecutor. Hence this syntax, "The swords of the enemy are fallen," where the genitive is placed first, is similar to that in the 3rd Psalm, v. 9: "The help of the Lord is." So also here: The enemy's desolations are left, that is, the enemy has ceased to desolate, just as, "The Lord's help," that is, the Lord helps.

50 But in finem [to the end] is said to give a strong emphasis, by which he expresses that the devastation of the enemy has so ceased that there is neither hope nor fear that it will begin again. For sometimes the wicked cease to ravage, but the end is not immediately there; for since the hatred remains, they begin to rage again as soon as there is time and opportunity. But those who perish salutarily through the chiding of the spirit and are transformed into other people because they love, can never return to persecution in eternity; indeed, they themselves suffer with those. And so the desolation has ceased with them to the end, that there is also no longer any hatred left, which is the source of persecution, but everything has been transformed into love, which is the source of peace and tranquility. In this sense Ps. 2, 9, is also said: "Like pots you shall break them."

51 But how did he turn the cities around? I don't like to do violence to words, and yet neither the context

(consequentia) nor the spirit in which the prophet speaks, that it might be understood of a bodily desolation. For it speaks the hidden and spiritual victress, whose weapons are the word and faith. Then she destroyed the Gentiles only by the rebuke of God, by putting an end to their name and their desolation. Therefore it must be understood in such a way that also the cities are disturbed by the same bell.

52 In the same vein, Micah, after speaking of the remnant of Israel who would be victorious in the midst of the nations, Cap. 5:8, says: "For thine hand shall prevail against all thine enemies, and all thine enemies shall be cut off. He adds, v. 9 f.: "In that day, saith the Lord, I will put away thy horses from thee, and will destroy thy chariots, and will cut off the cities of thy land, and will break down all thy strongholds," and soon after, v. 13: "And will break down thy groves, and destroy thy cities." Since this passage evidently speaks of a spiritual work, it speaks for us, and we shall say that here also cities are turned back, since the word of faith, when preached among men, comes, not to send peace, but the sword, and arouses the Father against the Son, the cord against their in-laws, so that, according to the perverse sense of man's world, 1) enemies are his own household, for in such a way the cities of enemies are blessedly turned back.

(53) And he names the cities above all, first, because in them there is a very great multitude, in the midst of whom the word must be preached; and secondly, because in them men have a finer sense (civilior sensus), that is, a greater prudence of the flesh, which is hostile to God. Therefore, Christ attacked the world in its best people and heads and those in whom it is most capable with his word; for if the cities are inverted, the rest of the great multitude in the world is also inverted.

1) In the editions: inimiei Dominos, for which probably according to Matth. 10, 36. with the Vulgate iuimiei kominik should be read.

turned back. But also St. Augustine, although he draws the noun "city" to the spiritual mind (tropologiam), nevertheless understands the tense "you have turned back" from the spiritual destruction. But I have also said before that one must pay more attention to the tense words than to the nouns in order to understand the spirit, as, Ps. 72, 8: "He will rule from one sea to the other" 2c. Here no other sea is to be understood than a fleshly one, and yet not a fleshly reign (after the Jewish manner) is to be understood. So here the cities are to be taken actually and according to the letter, but the destruction is not to be taken carnally, but spiritually.

So the sword of the enemy's devastation has so completely ceased that they themselves and their cities are also devastated and reversed. But who wants to look for another information, he has for himself the ambiguity of the Hebrew noun. For the noun is said, when it is written without iod, as in this place, to mean not alone cities, but also enemies. For the pronoun "their" [cities] (eorum) is not in Hebrew. Thus Reuchlin says of the passage Micah 5, 13: "I will cut off your cities" that it means in Hebrew: I will cut off your enemies. Whether there is something in it, I leave undecided. That is certain, may one say cities or enemies, the sense remains the same. For we have said that the refined people (civiles homines) and the children of this world are exceedingly hostile to the word of the cross because of their cleverness; these people also the word attacks the most, because our ram hangs with his horns in these hedges.

54. "Her memory has perished." It is evident that their name, which is destroyed, is something else than the memory, which falls away. For the name has been taken away from them, in which they pleased themselves, and has been restored to them, since they humbly confess of themselves that they are sinners and worthy of shame. Furthermore, all that is theirs, their goods, name, power, quantity, is so devastated by the word of faith that they do not even think of these things anymore. And so, in common life, they speak with a very

The common saying when speaking of people who have perished or of their deeds: "They are no longer remembered," that is, they are no longer in memory; the end of a complete desolation is that what is desolate is buried in eternal oblivion. Behold then the power of the word and of faith, which makes the ungodly blameless, and plunges their sins and weapons of iniquity into everlasting oblivion, that they may now be preserved eternally with God in another estate, another name, another power, another multitude.

The word [in the Vulgate] cum sonitu was translated by Jerome as "sammt ihnen," and in Hebrew word for word is like this: Their memory has perished, they. The preposition "sammt" is not in the text. But this expression [XXX] is similar to the verbum [XXX], which means sonore. This was assumed by those who translated: cum sonitu. But I simply assume a comma (hypodiastolen) [after memoria eorum], and put a connective [et], and explain it thus: their memory has perished, and they; since this Hebrew manner of speaking is also very frequent in other places, as is said in the 4th Psalm in the 9th verse [Ps. 4, § 751 [Vulg.]: "For thou, O Lord, let me dwell alone (singulariter-separate from others), [and] secure." Therefore, the prophet seems to me to have added stixi at the end, either as a conclusion, or to give a strong emphasis, as if to say: Their memory is perished, and they themselves. Namely, they have become nothing with all their things. "They are gone."

(55) Cum sonitu Augustine explains: "with noise or with turmoil", with which the wicked rage while they perish, and so that they do not want to perish, they resist, or that their memory perishes, while this very turmoil perishes at the same time. And what is the point of composing various glosses over a text that has been composed? as, cum sonitu, one would also like to understand it this way: as quickly as a sound has passed. For Job Cap. 14, 2. compares man to a fleeting shadow. In these things, let each one follow his own sense.

V. 8: But the Lord abideth for ever: he hath prepared his throne for judgment.)

Jerome has thus: Dominus autem in aeternum sedebit, stabilivit ad iudicandum solium suum. In this is more clearly indicated not only the duration, as our [Latin] interpreter reads, but also the office of Christ. It is twofold: to judge and to justify, to kill and to make alive, to condemn and to save. By judgment he humbles the worthy, by righteousness he exalts the humiliated. That he has thus prepared his throne to judge is what Malachi Cap. 3, 2. 3. says: "He is like the fire of a goldsmith and like the soap of the washer. He will sit and melt and purify the silver; he will purify and cleanse the children of Levi like gold and silver. Then they will bring grain offerings to the LORD in righteousness."

For thus, after the wicked have been destroyed by the rebuke of the heathen, and after they have lost their name, and have known and confessed their sin, there is nothing left but this daily purification from sin, the renewing of the mind from day to day, the going from one virtue to another, the destruction of the body of sin. This happens when we are either exercised by many a suffering, or by the constant remembrance of our sins, displeasing ourselves, groaning, weary in humility, as Ps. 51:5. says: "And my sin is always before me." Hence it is said Ezek. 20:43 ff: "There you will remember your ways and all your doings in which you have been defiled, and you will be displeased with all your wickedness that you have done. And ye shall know that I am the LORD, when I deal with you for my name's sake, and not according to your wickedness and your evil doings, O house of Israel, saith the LORD GOD."

58. this theology of the cross leaves some pending that raise idle questions 2) and walk on very dangerous paths in great

1) Vulgate: N äoirllvus in aotornum permanst, puravit in juäieio türonum kuuin.

2) ^naestionarii actually means: torturers, executioners, but here, according to the context, it is synonymous with the soon following: euriosi kxsoniutorss.

and wonderful things that are too high for them, as if they had nothing to grieve over. Of these, Isaiah, Cap. 58:1, says: "Call with confidence, spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet; and declare unto my people their transgression, and to the house of Jacob their sin. They seek me daily, and want to know my ways, as a people who have already done righteousness, and have not forsaken the right of their God." 2c. What did he mean by these words? Nothing else than that he kept these people, who wanted to inquire into the works of God (curiosos speculatores), from doing so, and brought them to the knowledge and consideration of their sins, so that they would take care of their sin [Ps. 38, 19.], and always deal with the things that God has commanded. For this is the judgment of Christ in man, so He exercises us in sorrow, repentance and sorrow for our sin. Therefore, theology, which goes into research (speculativa), but forgets itself and seeks the divine things that are too high for it, seeks Satan's fall and also finds it.

(59) We read in the biographies of the fathers how two younger brothers, who were troubled with a question about Melchizedek, brought it to an older brother. The latter beat his breast and said: "Woe to me, poor sinner, who does not respect my sins and occupies myself with these useless questions. Then they were ashamed, kept silent, and ran away in haste, each to his cell.

And how will our school theologians (nostris) stand, who do not deal with Melchizedek, but with Aristotle and Porphyrius in such silly questions, who waste the extremely precious time so shamefully and do not respect this judgment of Christ? In the Song of Songs, Cap. 6, 4. he also chastises the bride who was too eager to inquire of GOD: "Turn away thine eyes from me, for they make me to bristle." [Ps. 73, 5. f. Vulg. "They are not in misfortune like other people, and are not afflicted like other people, therefore they are in hope."

(61) But also those argue against this judgment of Christ in an exceedingly ungodly way, who deceive the people and promise them complete remission (remissiones plenarias, as they call it) of all punishment and guilt in a lying way.

and promise them security in a very vain way, saying [Jer. 6, 14.], "Peace, peace! and yet is not peace," and, as Isaiah [Cap. 59, 4. Jer. 29, 31] says, make the people of God trust in lies, and again Isa. 3, 12.: "My people, thy comforters deceive thee, and destroy the way which thou shalt go."

62. for the word stands firm, "He has prepared his throne for judgment." So also it is said in Ps. 122:5, "For there the chairs are set for judgment." For whom his sin doth not bite, how shall he thirst after the grace of God? But whoever does not thirst for it, how should he seek it? Whoever does not seek it, how will he find it?

63 And it is not said in vain: The Lord will sit on the judgment seat] forever; this must be referred to the time of this life. For after this life there will be no sin over which he could then sit in judgment, but even the Son himself will be subject to the one who has subjected everything to him by handing over the kingdom to God and the Father, after all his enemies have been put under his feet, as the apostle teaches 1 Cor. 15:24 ff. Therefore he always sits, because there is always sin, which he must judge in us, so that we perish, but he remains, and we are changed into him, and not he into us. But he who with Micah, Cap. 7, 8. f., will bear this judgment and say, "I will bear the Lord's wrath, for I have sinned against him," will also be worthy that, led out with the same Micah, he may see into the light, see the righteousness of God, and when he sits in darkness, the Lord will be his light. Therefore it follows:

V. 9. and he will judge the earth rightly, and the people will rule righteously. 1)

64. almost the same verse is Ps. 98, 9. [in the Vulgate] translated like this: Judicabit orbem terrarum in justitia, et populos in aequitate, which Ps. 96, 13. reads thus: Judicabit orbem terrae in aequitate, et populos in veritate sua. But also in other places these two words justitia and aequitas are quite inconstantly repeated.

one for the other, and sometimes aequitas instead of rectum, and again. But in this verse, justitia should have been placed first, and aequitas last. For so the Hebrew text has it, as Jerome also brings it: Et ipse judicabit orbem in justitia, judicabit populos in aequitatibus, that is, in rectitudinibus, which the 99th Psalm [v. 4.] expresses by directiones, since it says: Tu parasti directiones [you give piety[^]].

But we must understand righteousness and piety (justitiam et aequitatem), not only from the inward righteousness and piety of Christ, according to which He is righteous and pious, but from His works, by which He makes men righteous and just, and from His grace, by which He gives them righteousness and piety. For who else could stand before His judgment seat, however holy, if He judged men according to His righteousness and piety? As it can be said of Solomon that he was a king who reigned in riches, honor and peace, because not only he himself, but also his subjects became rich through him, had honor and enjoyed peace, as it is said 1 Kings 4:25: "Judah and Israel dwelt securely, each under his vine and under his fig tree, from Dan to Beersheba." Otherwise he would have had an exceedingly miserable and unhappy kingdom and government, if his subjects had all been poor, dishonorable, without peace (inquieti), foolish 2c.

(65) Thus the kingdom of Christ consists in truth, righteousness, godliness, peace, wisdom, not because he alone, but also because his faithful through him are true, just, righteous, peaceable, wise. For he would be exceedingly wretched if his own were liars, sinners, unrighteous, peaceless, unwise, as is the devil's kingdom. For thus Isaiah, Cap. 52,²) 1, foretold, "For there shall no uncircumcised or unclean reign in thee henceforth."

In order not to seek abundance and diversity, let us take ourselves out of it, or rather, let us use our freedom,

1) Vulgate: Dt ipss juüieudit ordern tssrue in ue^uitate, juäieudit poxuios in MStitiu.

2) In the Latin editions: Isa. 35.

And that righteousness and godliness, according to the 5th Psalm, are nothing else than the work of God's mercy and judgment, for there it is said [v. 8.], "But I will enter into thy house upon thy great goodness, and worship against thy holy temple in thy fear." And again [v. 9.], "O LORD, guide me in thy righteousness for mine enemies' sake; direct thy way before me."

67. for he who has God's mercy before his eyes and believes and trusts in Him with firm faith is justified, and so enters [into God's house] on His [great] goodness and is guided in righteousness, and is ruled in truth by Christ, who sits on His throne and judges the whole earth in such righteousness. And he that walketh thus in righteousness is assailed in his way by many terrors through the flesh, the world, and the devil, according to the saying of Ps. 140:6, "They set snares in my way," lest he dash his foot against a stone. For as long as we live in the flesh, the old serpent is after our heel, to destroy our way or to turn us away from the right way. Therefore, the judgment of God, which is held up to us here, instills fear, which preserves us, and causes us to depart from evil, so that our senses are not deceived by Satan, as Eve was deceived, from the simplicity in Christ, so that we continue on the right path we have begun, and this is the righteous character (rectitudo) or piety (aequitas).

68. Therefore, these two things may be considered in this spiritual trade, as in the case of physicians, the healing medicine and the preventive behavior (praeservativam), or that it is another thing that the sick person takes and another thing that he abstains from until he gets well; it seems to me that righteousness is grace, by which we become righteous through faith in God; but righteousness is a kind of abstinence, by which we abstain from all irritations, or refrain from all threats, by which a man may be turned away, or fall into his own crooked ways.

The first thing that can be done is to make sure that the people are guided in the wrong and evil ways, whether this is called perseverance or temperance or any other name.

I believe that the same two things are expressed by justitia and judicium, which are almost always put together in the Holy Scriptures, as Ps. 119, 121: Beati, qui faciunt iudicium et justitiam in omni tempore. The same two things I would like to understand by justification and the killing of the members, which must be exercised after justification, although the righteous being (rectitudo) refers more to the attitude (affectum) than to the restless being (tumultum) of the killing, which is accomplished by judgment and the cross. For he is righteous (rectus) who remains steadfastly unchanged and pure in his judgment and in his attitude, in spite of all cause and occasion given him from any quarter. This righteous character is described quite extensively in the 91st Psalm, where it is said [v. 1. f.]: "He who sits under the shelter of the Most High, and remains under the shadow of the Almighty, says to the Lord, My confidence" 2c. For this belongs to faith and righteousness. Then follows [vv. 4-7.], "His truth is shield and buckler, that thou shouldest not be afraid of the terror of the night, of the arrows that fly by day, of the pestilence that creepeth in darkness, of the pestilence that wasteth at noonday. Though a thousand fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand, it shall not befall thee." Why? Because he deviates neither to the right hand nor to the left, but walks in the middle of the straight and right road. And afterwards [v. 11.], "He hath commanded his angels concerning thee, that they should guard thee in all thy ways." Surely this guard causes him to persevere in the right way against all temptations that entice him to godlessness. Finally follows [v. 13.], "Upon the lions and vipers shalt thou go, and tread upon the young lions and dragons." What is this? Nothing other than that the righteous man overcomes all the temptations that are directed at his heels by his righteous nature.

69. this righteous being praises the Apostles Rom. 6 and 13 and in other places where he teaches that although we are justified by faith, yet he warns us to beware of obeying the lusts, and not to yield up the members for weapons of unrighteousness, but to renew ourselves day by day, putting off the old man and putting on the new man. And there is no doubt that the prophet in Hebrew said this in the plural: In righteousnesses (in rectitudinibus), which our Latin translation has expressed by the singular: In justitia (the translator has also changed this for aequitate), to indicate the innumerable creeping beasts of this great sea, and the great beasts with the small ones, that is, the many and various reenactments by which the way of justice is attacked, so that, although there is only One Justice (justitia) and One Righteous Being (rectitudo), nevertheless it is said of many, because it is exercised by many ungodly acts and is renewed as it were so many times.

From this we can understand how great a grace it is to have Christ as a judge in righteousness and godliness, and in how right order he has set righteousness before godliness, since there are many who begin to be justified by faith, but are immediately corrupted and turned away by perverse things to another way, since nevertheless (as they think) faith remains, at least the faith produced by their own doing (fides acquisita, as they call it). And this perverse nature or corruption is most dangerous in spiritual things, of which we have said in the 5th Psalm. Meanwhile, let us stay with this distinction of righteousness and piety until we find something better, since the same, I think, throws much light on a great number of scriptures in which these words are found.

70) This is perhaps something minor, but nevertheless it must not be passed over that the verb "he will judge" according to the Hebrew way does not indicate a work as well as an office and a dignity, as Ps. 110, 6: "He will judge among the Gentiles, he will do great battle, he will crush the head over great lands." Thus, in the book of the Richter said of the rulers of the people of Israel that they judged, that is, Israel rulers.

By this is signified that the kingdom of Christ is ordained, not to conquer cities and men, but sins and vices; and they that preside instead of this King shall preside in such judgment, having this end only in view, that they may make the people of Christ as pure as possible from sins and errors, as it is said in the 122nd Psalm, v. 5: "For there sit the seats of judgment, the seats of the house of David." For judgment is an office exercised against one inferior, by which he is reproved and cleansed from sins; righteousness is a service rendered against one superior, by which obedience is rendered to his word. The one concerns the justified spirit, the other the flesh, which is to be put to death; but both come from one and the same King and Judge, Christ, by means of the ministry of the word through the apostles and apostolic men.

71) It is not contrary to what has been said, if one wants to apply this verse as a general saying also to the last judgment of the last day, and in general to every judgment, whether it is according to severity, by which the ungodly are also overthrown in this life, or according to kindness, by which the elect are converted, because it is one and the same judgment of God over all. For those who do not want to be judged in gentleness, nor to be cleansed from their sins in piety, so that they may be saved in the righteousness of the Spirit, make for themselves a severe judgment out of the kind judgment, while righteousness and piety nevertheless remain in the vessels of mercy. For sin must be condemned by the right judgment of God, whether it be separated from the ungodly or clinging to them forever.

72) And in this sense the apostle treats this verse, as can be seen in Apost. 17, 30. f.: "Now God commands all men everywhere to repent, because He has set a day on which He will judge the world with righteousness by one man, in whom He has decreed, and He holds up faith to everyone after He has judged the world with righteousness.

raised him from the dead." This is also alluded to in Rom. 3, 5, 6: "Is God also unjust, that He is angry about this? Let that be far off! How else could God judge the world?" As if he wanted to say: He will definitely judge rightly. 73 For Peter also makes one and the same judgment of God out of the one by which he converts the ungodly and the one by which he condemns the unruly, saying: "For it is time for judgment to begin on the house of God. But if it begins with us, what will be the end of those who do not believe in the gospel of God? And if the righteous is hardly preserved, where will the ungodly and the sinner appear?" Here Peter makes use of the saying Proverbs 11:31: "If the righteous must suffer on earth (that is, if he is recompensed as a sinner and an ungodly man), how much more the ungodly and the sinner?" This is expressed in Hebrews thus, "Behold, wrath is recompensed for the righteous on earth, because he is an ungodly and a sinner." But Peter wants to say what is written in Ezek. 9, 2. ff. where the Lord commands a man whom he sent, who had a writing utensil at his side and was clothed with linen, that he should strangle and even cut off all. He says [Ezek. 9, 6.]: "Behold my sanctuary"; this is what Peter calls the time of judgment, which is to begin at the house of God.

74. so also Jeremiah says, Cap. 49, 12. "Behold, they that were not guilty of drinking the cup must drink; and thou shouldest go unpunished? Thou shalt not go unpunished, but thou must drink also." Behold, it is the same cup, but they drink in such a way that it comes to a different end with them, the one is cleansed and converted by it, the other is rejected and condemned. Thus it is said in Deut. 32:36: "The LORD will judge his people, and over his servants he will have mercy." It is therefore the same judgment for all, but the end is unequal.

V. 10. And the Lord is the poor man's refuge, a refuge in trouble. 1)

75 Here he describes the other, the victorious army, namely of the godly, just the XXXXX. In Hebrew, the same expression is used for refugium and for adjutor, which Jerome translates: Et erit dominus elevatio oppresso, elevatio opportuna in angustia [And the Lord will be an exaltation for the oppressed, an exaltation in due time in anguish]. For the prophet wants to indicate that the poor people of the apostles and martyrs have been elevated and have become victors through the word of Christ, and always will be, over the great and mighty of the world. In the same way it is said in Isa. 9, 11: "The Lord will exalt the warriors of Rezin against them", that is, he will make the warriors of Rezin victors. Thus he prophesies here that it will happen that the persecutors of the church, as the defeated, will have to concede victory to the victorious church. When this happened, it was unbelievable, but now it has become miraculous, as it was when it was preached; and all this is brought about by the chiding, judging and sitting of Christ on his throne.

76) What [in the Vulgate] is expressed by in opportunitatibus is called in the Hebrew: in time, and the same word is used as Ps. 1, 3: "He who brings forth his fruit in his own time. But the Latin interpreter translated it very well: In opportunitatibus [in due occasion], whereby both the impatient are punished and we are comforted. For the impatient, for whom every delay is too long, prescribe to God the time and manner in which they want to be helped, as they are punished Judith 8:10 ff: "Who are you to tempt God? Will ye appoint to the LORD of your pleasure the time and the days when he shall help?" He has promised those who ask, knock, seek, that he will give them everything, but the place, the time, the manner, that is, the opportunities he has reserved for himself alone.

77. for if he heard immediately how we cry, he would hear us to our great misfortune; first, because for faith, hope, and love there would remain neither a place nor a custom, if immediately according to our purpose our desire were fulfilled, as Ps. 78:30. f. of the Jews in the wilderness.

1) Vulgate: Lt kaetus 68t äominus rku^ium puupkri, uH utor in OMortuniMtidu8 in tributatione.

It is written that they did not desist from their lust (non fraudati desiderio [Vulg.]) when they demanded meat food in unbelief and impatience over the delay; but the wrath of God also burned against them at the same time, and they perished.

Secondly, if there were no custom of faith, hope, and love, there would be no purification of sins and no destruction of the sinful inclinations by which we senselessly seek after the things that are present and fall into the senses. But if the inclinations are not purified, and we do not become accustomed to doing without goods, we can do no good work, never please God, and therefore never be saved.

Divine mercy is so concerned for us that it is reluctant for our sake to give what it itself has commanded us to ask for, so that it may bestow on us a great benefit and an abundant gift. That is why Isaiah, Cap. 64, 4. says: "No eye has seen, without you, GOD, what happens to those who wait for him." Note the word, "Those who wait for Him," and, "What no eye has seen," to which the apostle adds 1 Cor. 2, 9: "And hath not entered into any man's heart," and instead of, "They that wait for him," he puts, "They that love him." For only those love God in truth who wait for the truth of the one who promises. But those who fall away love themselves. Thus it is said in Ps. 27, 14: "Wait for the Lord, be confident and undaunted, and wait for the Lord."

About this matter, Johann Tauler has said many excellent things in his German sermons. For these are pure (recti) in heart, of whom the 73rd Psalm, v. 1, says: "Israel nevertheless has God for comfort, who only is pure in heart," 2c. which rhymes very well with this. For we have said that a pure heart is one that does not seek its own, nor the evil way against itself, 1) and to such a heart the LORD is its comfort (bonus [Vulg. Ps. 72, 1.]), for these taste and see how kind the LORD is [Ps. 34, 9.].

81 And by these two names the state of ours is actually expressed, that is, of the hidden youth, or the new people, who live in the mystery of faith, and who are described as poor and afflicted. For as he had described the godless enemies as such people who have a famous name, great power, and swords, and great multitudes in the cities, who thereby outwardly have a beautiful appearance and great prestige, so on the other hand the godly had to be described according to their opposite form in their poverty, and yet the victory was given to this despicable group against those glorious people and the hope of Jordan, so that it might be established that he said he would tell the wonders of God by rejoicing in your Lord, who pushes the mighty from their seats and lifts up the lowly [Luc. 1, 52], and looks upon the lowly in heaven and on earth [Ps. 113, 6].

v. 11. 2) Therefore those who know your name hope in you, for you do not abandon those who seek you, O Lord.

What it is to know and love the name of the Lord and to hope in him is abundantly stated in the 5th Psalm in the verse [v. 12, § 316 ff.]: "Let all who love your name be joyful in you" 2c. But both the hope and the knowledge of the name of God belong to the figure of the XXXXX, to depict the same, because her life is hidden in hope, and she does not want to know her name, but only rejoices in the name of God, while the wicked boast of the things that are seen and of their own name.

But this can be understood as if it was said in the indicative Futuri: And they shall hope in thee that know thy name 2c., fo that from an example of deliverance in past time arises a strengthening of hope in future tribulation. In this spirit the prophet begins the fourth psalm: "Hear me when I call, O God of my righteousness, who comforts me in anguish," as it is said there. For this verse speaks to the consolation of the weak, so that all may trust in God.

1) In the original edition: nee in se ipsum üspravatur, which, as it seems to us, must be understood after 8 68. In all complete editions, except the Weimar one, ost is added, also in the Basel one.

2) In the Basel: Spirant instead of: sperent.

hope who call on his name, having seen so many miracles he has done in the past.

83. And this is spoken against the sense of the flesh: "For you do not trust those who seek you," so that they may learn to expect the appropriate time. For judging by all the senses, it looks as if God has abandoned those who seek Him. Against these storms of thought one must lift up the rock of this verse and confidently say: "You do not rely on those who seek you, O Lord."

V. 12 Praise the Lord who dwells in Zion, proclaim his deeds among the people.

(84) Behold, this verse also declares whom he understood by the one in the title, namely, the remnant of Israel, who, having left the old synagogue, which had a beautiful reputation in the splendor of the world and worldly holiness, are born by faith into a new people and a spiritual youth, which walks not in the ceremonial splendor of the letter, but in a new spirit, despising and laboring under cross and suffering. He shows this by calling on us to praise Him who dwells in Zion and to proclaim the deeds of God among the people.

For no one else has preached the mysteries of God to the Gentiles than the apostles and others who were converted from the Jews, as Isaiah Cap. 66, 19. f. foretold [Vulg.], "I will send some of them that are saved unto the Gentiles which are by the sea, unto Africa and Lydia 1) unto the bowmen, unto Italy and Greece, and unto the isles afar off, where they have not heard of me, and have not seen my glory; and they shall declare my glory among the Gentiles, and shall bring all your brethren from all the Gentiles." 2c. Likewise from Micah, Cap. 5, 7, we have said above about the rest of Jacob among many nations.

86 Neither is Zion to be understood figuratively in this passage as the church spread over the whole world, but we understand the same to mean the letter

after the city of Jerusalem, in which Christ founded, began and completed his church, since the prophet speaks of those, namely the first apostles and saints, who dwelt on Mount Zion and in Jerusalem. But Ps. 2, 6. was said about Zion, how Christ was appointed king on his holy mountain Zion. For he did not establish the church and then depart from it, but was established in Zion and dwells there, and has become very near to us.

This is said against the pretensions (larvas) of those who attribute the kingdom of the church entirely to human presumption and power, having in mind the prestige of men, as if Christ alone reigned in the triumphant church and left the contending church to men. For if we believe that what is said here is true, that Christ dwells in Zion, why do we labor so anxiously for our rights, titles and sinecures (ditionibus)? Why do we stir up so much trouble with our statutes, covenants, treaties, yea, wars and dissensions? And since we entrust our souls to him [Christ] in baptism, believing that they will live forever, why then do we keep, strengthen and protect our bodies and our goods in such a way by the doings of men? But such people do not believe that Christ dwells in us, therefore they receive the reward that their unbelief deserves; they are given over in a wrong mind to do what is not fit [Rom. 1. 28.].

88) The prophet also indicates that it will happen that the Jews will be abandoned and Christ will be preached among the Gentiles, since he predicts that the deeds of God will be proclaimed among the Gentiles, and now begins to list the sufferings and victories that happened to the believers among the Gentiles, as we will see hereafter.

89 "The doing" (studia), which is called in this place in Hebrew, some have translated by works, others by miracles, still others by counsel (consilia). I like above all that which our [Latin] translation has, studia, by which, as a quite general word, are comprehended the works, the undertaking, the occupation of every one.

1) The text here has et, which is missing in the Vulgate and in our Bible.

The word studium in the Hebrew is used to describe both the counsel and the work of God. God's deeds (studia) are therefore actually his wonderful works, which he performs with good deliberation (consulto). These are, as we have said, that he humbles the proud and exalts the humble, turns the wicked behind him, and is the protector of the poor. Because the Jews spurned and despised this, Paul says Apost. 13:46: "Behold, we turn unto the Gentiles." This proclamation also from among the Gentiles converted many, and angered many; for on both sides Christ is a sign contradicted; he is set for a fall and rising of many [Luc. 2, 34].

V. 13 For he remembers and asks for their blood; he does not forget the cry of the poor.

He interprets more clearly the deeds of God, which he taught to be proclaimed, namely for the comfort of the afflicted. For God is a slow retributor, as the wise man says Sir. 5, 4, and great is the richness of His goodness, patience and longsuffering [Rom. 2, 4]. For it is not before his eyes that he asks for the blood of the saints, nor that he is mindful of his poor; for this longsuffering it is necessary that we admonish ourselves by these spiritual psalms.

91 And again he describes the appearance of ours by beautifully indicating the cause of the title. For when he speaks of the blood and cries of the poor, does he not thereby indicate that they bear the image of death and all suffering? Truly, a new kind of people who live under death, rejoice under suffering, triumph under oppression, who, being forgotten, are heard in their cries! How could it be hidden deeper than under the blood? Therefore, if anyone has doubted that in this psalm the martyrs are speaking, read this verse and pay attention to their blood.

92 Thus we also see by what power the martyrs overcame, namely by blood and crying, and how far the church today has departed from the figure of the first church, which, even more bloodthirsty than

Babylon, rather, sheds the blood of others and cries out to heaven against herself, thinking that she is doing God a service by doing so.

93. But it matters little whether you want to apply this verse to past sufferings with which "the youth" of the martyrs were afflicted by the Jews, or to present and future ones, although the succession of the text, 1) fits more to the former sense, since among these 2) he makes known [to the Gentiles] the deeds of God, by which they [the youth] are delivered from the fury of the Jews, so that he may show what is to be preached among the Gentiles about the deeds of God, and why he is to be praised; For immediately he shall speak of the calamities which must be endured among the Gentiles.

94. But that God remembers the blood of the saints and does not forget the cries of the poor, we understand, first, by the kindness of the conversion of the ungodly, which happened through the merit of the blood and the cries of the martyrs, as St. Stephen converted St. Paul, St. Lawrence converted Hippolytus, and in short, the Church converted the whole world through blood and prayer. Secondly, according to the severity, against those who despise this kindness and remain in their godlessness, of whom Christ Luc. 18, 6-8. says: "Hear what the unjust judge says. But should not God also save His elect who call to Him day and night? I tell you, He will save them in a moment."

See how evangelical doctrine and evangelical life remain the same everywhere. It is the duty of Christians not to repay evil, not to pay like with like, not to avenge themselves. Thus, in this verse, the martyrs shed their blood, but they do nothing else but cry out, so that we too may be instructed that each one should be patient in his own cause, and without vengeance, and turn to God only with prayer, as it is done in the Bible.

1) In the Wittenberg, Weimar, and Erlangen: seHuentia textus; in the Basel and Jena: seouenk textus.

2) The Wittenberg, the Jena, the Weimar and the Erlangen have in Kos, whereas the Basel have in üas. We have followed the latter reading. Roth, too, seems to have read it this way, for he offers, "Because the prophet indicates God's deeds to be done among the Gentiles."

Rom. 12:19 says: "Do not avenge yourselves, my beloved, but give place to wrath, for it is written: Vengeance is mine, I will repay." But this was formerly a necessary commandment when the gospel was in bloom; but now that one's own opinions rule, it has become a counsel given to the perfect.

V. 14. Lord, be merciful to me; behold my misery among the enemies, who lift me up from the gates of death.

96 [What the Vulgate says: Vide humilitatem de inimicis meis, has] St. Jerome thus: Vide afflictionem meam ex inimicis meis. Therefore humilitas in this place evidently means a miserable state (vilitatem), oppression, toil, and it is also frequently taken in Scripture for the poor, as if to say: sadness and anguish of soul (molestiam animi), which he suffers among enemies. "Enemies" in this place actually have their name from hating, and are called in Hebrew: Haters. Furthermore, this idiom is unusual in Latin: Humilitatem meam de inimicis meis, because there seems to be something omitted (eclipsis), which is to be completed in this way: Behold my misery, which I suffer from those who hate me.

Now it is the movement of the mind, which is expressed in this verse, in those who, after having overcome some sufferings, are again oppressed, cry and pray that they may be delivered, so that the prophet not only indicates that the saints are exposed to tribulations continuously, but also describes the figure of the church, in whose person he sings, which gives thanks and praises in the former martyrs, sighs and cries in the present ones, prays and wishes for the future ones. Therefore, here too, as he asks that his affliction be regarded by the mercy of God, he recounts the earlier miracles of God, that he also raised him from the gates of death.

97 In my opinion, the apostle Paul gave a good example of this verse in the tribulations he was burdened with in Asia, when he wrote 2 Cor. 1:8 ff: "For we do not want to deceive you.

Dear brothers, our tribulation that happened to us in Asia, when we were weighed down beyond measure, so that we also refused to live and decided that we would have to die. But this happened because we did not put our trust in ourselves, but in God, who raises the dead, who redeemed us from such death and still redeems us daily, and hope in him that he will also redeem us from now on, through the help of your intercession for us.

Therefore, both the apostle and the prophet conclude from the greater to the lesser. If you (he says) lifted me up from the gates of death before, be merciful to me also now in my affliction, since those who hate me are burdensome to me. It is easy for a man to have faith and hope in a lesser affliction, when he has received the fruit of hope in a very great one.

I believe that this exceedingly heavy gate of death is a persecution, of which the apostle, as you can see, says that he had decided to die in himself. I know that in the Scriptures "gates" are taken for town halls or places of assembly where one received a judgment, as we will see in the following verse, but that others follow the figurative interpretation and understand by "gates of death" vices or sins through which one comes to death.

But let us be content with the simple sense, and understand death, as I have said, as bodily death, and the gate as the entrance to it, so that the gate of death is the entrance to death, or the instantaneous and urgent death. Although this is of little importance compared to eternal death, yet if it is not overcome by the victorious grace of God, there is no difference between it and eternal death, indeed, it is in truth the beginning of eternal death. Otherwise it is hardly called a slumber and a sleep or rest of the saints. Therefore, we have to pay attention to the emphasis in this word: "the gate of death", so that we understand that the apostle and the holy martyrs struggled with death in such a way that they felt a kind of taste of eternal death, which also Christ Matth. 16, 18. refers to by "the gates of hell".

seems to have. For if he had not wanted to indicate something more terrifying than sensual death, he would not have used such glowing and powerful words as he says: "Out of the gates of death."

V. 15: That I may tell all thy praise in the gates of the daughter of Zion, that I may rejoice in thy salvation. 1)

100. for thus this verse concludes in the Hebrew, and what is here expressed by annuntiēm, is above in the first verse by uarrabo, for it is the same word in both places [XXX]; but he might have translated thus: Pro- pterea enarrabo omnes laudes tuas. "To all praise" he says after the same manner of speaking after which he said above "all miracles." But this attitude has been treated in the 5th Psalm, where it was said how those rejoice in the Lord who love his name. For they delight in proclaiming and praising his praise. Therefore they pray that they may be helped, and hold undaunted that the Lord is their Helper. If he did not come, his praise would also completely fall away. As it is said in the 6th Psalm, v. 6: "For in death thou art not remembered," so also here he says that he is lifted up from the gates of death to tell his praise and to rejoice in his help.

Therefore, we see that this psalm is sung in the person of the whole. For the martyrs who have been killed do not recount the praises of God in the contending church, but the others who are still there or follow after peace has been obtained or the wicked have been put to death, for whom His praises are recounted, so that the works of God may be made known and His name may be known for the comfort and hope of the faithful and for the conversion of the unfaithful. For in heaven, where all see the glory of GOD, they have no need of a preacher to praise (praedicante). But on earth, where the glory of God is not comprehended in any way, since He works under such opposite guises that it seems that He has rather forgotten ours, than that he may remember us, it is necessary that this glory at least be glorified by the word and known in faith.

102 I believe that it is sufficiently clear that "the gates of the daughter of Zion" according to the Hebrew way of speaking designate the oerter, at which the faithful come together for God's word, for prayer, for the sacrament, for repentance and for the binding or loosing of sinners. For in the gates formerly sat those who were to judge, as it is said in Proverbs 31:23: "Their man is renowned in the gates, when he sitteth with the elders of the land." And it seems not improper (absurdum) to understand by "gates" in the law of Moses the cities, according to the figure of the synecdoche, since it says 5 Mos. 17, 2. and in similar places: "If among you in the gates a man or woman is found" 2c. I believe that the cities are called by this name because of the mystery of the future churches, in which the entrance and exit is both open and certain. The exit, I say, to the wars and works, the entrance to peace and rest. In these gates, God's praise is told, as we have seen and see.

"To the daughter of Zion" he says, as above, because the Church began on this mountain and from there has progressed over the whole earth. And perhaps he did not add in vain: "the daughter", and was not content to say: in the gates of Zion, because he foresaw that Zion and Jerusalem should be laid waste. Nevertheless, the Church, which is the daughter of the same, has its gates over the whole world, in which God's praise and glory are preached for the blessedness of the Gentiles, and judgment is held to put to death the sin of the old man, as has been said.

(103) "That I may rejoice in thy salvation" (in salulari tuo). The word salutare tuum is frequent in the Scriptures, and is generally referred to Christ, which is true, but not at all clear. For by salvator [savior] and salus [salvation] something else is signified than by salutare [help]. For secular is called by the Latins that which the Savior uses to confer salvation, as we say of food, drink, medicine, and similar things, that they are salutary.

things (salutaria). Thus Christ is most appropriately called salutare, since he himself is the medicine by which we are saved (salutare'). He is the bread that gives life to the world, and in general the physician and the medicine by which the sins of our souls are healed, by which we are also delivered from all evil.

So the meaning is: I do not seek salvation in myself or in any man, for the shell of man is of no use; I will gladly be forsaken of myself and of them, that it may be granted me to be saved in Christ, your Son, from all sin and all evil. For he is the most salutary ointment, he is our consolation, or as the apostle 1 Cor. 1, 30. says: "He is made unto us of God wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption." With these words he has very well interpreted the power of this word salutare, and the custom of Christ, and our incorporation into Christ. Only you must beware of the dreamers, the sophists, who make Christ our righteousness and wisdom in such a way that they always set him up either as the object or the cause of our righteousness, but they do not know at all their branch, which takes place through faith in him; of this alone Paul speaks. For faith in Christ causes him to live, move, and work in me, no differently than a healing ointment works on a sick body, and we become one flesh and one body with Christ, through the inward and inexpressible transformation of our sin into his righteousness, as this is represented to us by the reverend sacrament of the altar, where bread and wine are transformed into Christ's flesh and blood. 1)

104. who knows and has experienced this, immediately has a disgust of being helped by men (salvari); he gladly lets himself be condemned by them; he is happy about God's help alone; he rejoices and gives thanks to God that he is such a one to whom Christ is his help (salutaris), until he, made completely blessed, is similar to him who made him blessed by offering himself. Therefore the word salutare, because it includes the custom and the power of salvation, fits the contending church better than salus, which will rather be a thing accomplished in the world to come. Meanwhile, Christ is the leaven hidden under three bushels of flour until the whole is leavened. For with this he deals, this is his judgment, this is his chair in this time (as we have said), that he sweeps out sin in his faithful, and fills them with righteousness through himself, as it is said in Heb. 1:3: "He beareth all things with his powerful word, and hath made the purification of our sins through himself, and hath sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high."

1) This is still the papist doctrine of transubstantiation. Likewise in the following.

And quite beautifully, although somewhat obscurely, this verse seems to treat the sacrifice (sacrificium) of the altar, that is, the mass. For this must be done in the mass, first, that the praise of God (that is, the Gospel) be told, in which the miracles, the deeds, the works, the benefits of God are praised, and that in the gates of the daughter of Zion, that is, in the assemblies of the faithful; second, that the people be leavened with the wholesome leaven, that is, be filled with Christ and be refreshed, so that they may learn to be glad about the sheath of God. For this table is the table of a great and sweet banquet, of which we must eat with gladness. But this will fit those who suffer tribulation and humiliation from enemies, as is said in the previous verse.

But since in all other passages of Scripture it is stated that this sacrifice is to be celebrated in the midst of a congregation of many people and for the same, strange thoughts have often risen in my mind and are still rising, as to what is to be thought of the individual and private masses 2) in which that is not acted upon at all, for which this sacrament (mysterium) is instituted. There is neither preaching nor communicating, you might say that this is telling the praises of God, when the Gospel is read and heard by one person, but very seldom.

2) Compare Luther's writing "Von dem Greuel der Stillmesse," Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XIX, 1198.

and you want to think that this is communicating when a single person, who cannot be called a community (communitas), uses this sacrament. For I say it freely, that those are obviously mistaken who say this mass only to do some good work, as if this mystery were instituted to do a good work, and not rather primarily and solely to use the righteousness of Christ and to exercise the power of the help (salutaris) of God, as we sing: I will take the cup of salvation (salutaris) and call upon the name of the Lord. Not as if I condemn the silent masses (missas privadas), of which I know and have experienced that they have been very salutary to many, but only to those people who have been afflicted by great temptations, but because I believe that the custom of the same, which prevails everywhere, is hardly salutary to very few.

V. 16: The Gentiles are sunk in the pit they have made; their foot is caught in the net they have set. 1)

105 Instead of infixae sunt, Jerome has demersae sunt, which would fit nicely if we also put fovea [pit] instead of interitu [perdition]. For it is the same expression that means perdition, pit and net, perhaps because people perish by the pit and the net. And again, the same idiom is used here that we thought of in Ps. 7:16 [§ 98], since the Hebrew text omits the pronoun quem and simply says: they have fallen into destruction, they have made; just as: he has fallen into the pit, he has made. In short, the same expression which is there translated by "pit" is here rendered by ruin (interitus), and this verse is almost in all things like it and of the same opinion, so that it is evident that this saying was quite generally known as a proverb, which is held up to us there and in this verse. For also what is said here: "Their foot is caught in the net that they had set" is indeed different in the words, but in the opinion is no difference from what is said there [Ps. 7:17.], "His calamity shall come upon his head, and his iniquity shall fall upon his crown."

The meaning is obvious, that the godless persecutors of the martyrs are sunk in two ways; some according to gentleness, others according to severity. An example of severity was shown to us in the 7th Psalm in Absalom, who fell into the pit he had made for his father. This also happened to the Jews in the desolation of Jerusalem, since they had it in mind to desolate the church, just as Rome was desolated for this reason. The same must necessarily happen to all persecutors of the godly, even though they lie a little while above, as it is written, Proverbs 11:8: "The righteous is delivered out of trouble, and the wicked is put in his place." And Sir. 27, 28.: 2) "He who throws the stone on high, it falls on his head." All this and the like, like this verse, is spoken literally for the comfort of the suffering and weak, so that they may be sure that what they suffer will fall back on their adversaries, and that they will be saved, without this, that their adversaries will not only be subjected to their physical misfortune, but will also be crushed by a still worse evil in the spirit, since they both sin against godly men and also incur the punishment for their sins. This is expressed by Jeremiah [Cap. 17, 18.] thus, "Smite them twofold." Thus it is also written of Cain, Gen. 4, 13. that his sin clung to him, but that at the same time he did not escape his punishment.

But in this passage it is proper to look at the example of kindness, because it is an exceedingly sweet psalm, and [v. 6] it is said that everything is directed by the word 3) of rebuke. And this agrees with the following, where it is said [v. 17], that one can recognize that the Lord and [v. 18] that the wicked may be turned to hell, and [v. 21] that a Master may be given, that the Gentiles may know that they are men; yet the example of severity is not rejected.

(108) In order to make this clear to the simple-minded, let us put before them two opposing wars, that of the flesh and that of the spirit, in which the godly and the godless fight with each other in this world. I call the war of the flesh the one in which the wicked rage against the godly, as has been shown in the case of the martyrs. Here the wicked are always on top, yes, one sees how they succumb, while the saints only suffer, do not strike back, do not take revenge. There is only one thing they do, namely, they let the wicked rage and do as they please, fighting by acquiescence alone.

But [v. 19.] "the hope (patientia) of the wretched will not be lost forever," but death and whatever evil the wicked have inflicted on them will finally fall back on the head of the wicked, and they will be immersed in the destruction they have brought on themselves. For they will die, and calamity will seize the unrighteous people in their ruin, and they will never be saved from it either, as the righteous are saved. Now this is the fleshly struggle of the godly and the godless, this is the end and the victory of both. Thus the greater must serve the lesser [Gen. 25:23]; and he who has the upper hand, the reddish and bloodthirsty Edom, is trampled under by the later, Jacob.

The spiritual war is because of godliness and godlessness. Here again, the ungodly have the image of the greater and firstborn (prioris), Edom, but the godly have the image of the lesser and laterborn (posterioris), Jacob. Here, war is waged over religion, faith, opinions, the sense of the spirit; over all these things that concern God, for which also the carnal war arises and is waged, in that the godless establish their own extremely stubbornly, but pursue the cause of the godly in the most impetuous manner and condemn. Here, actually, the two children in the womb of Rebekah bump into each other, so that the mother herself, frightened by the danger, said [Gen. 25:22], "Since it should thus go with me, why did I become pregnant?" This is a very bitter struggle. Such a battle was that of the apostles against the Jews and false apostles, of the martyrs against the clergy and servants of idols, of the teachers against the heretics, and always and everywhere the lowly have such a battle against those who are hopeful in their hearts.

Here the wicked excel in numbers and valor, while the mighty, the wise, and the saints of works faithfully stand by them, as can be seen very clearly in the example of the Arian heresy. Then, among their troops, the reason, the sense and the opinion of the great multitude reigns, and they are exceedingly well armed on all sides.

The godly, however, have almost nothing except the thanks they offer because of their salvation; they are few; simple-minded people, fools and sinners are on their side. Then, because what they speak is beyond the sense, understanding, and delusion of the great multitude, they seem to be overcome by the very fact that they speak; indeed, they are despised and ridiculed. Then those become confident and puffed up by the opinion and applause of the great crowd and their great ones, and soon fulfill the word Ps. 14:6: "Ye desecrate the poor man's counsel, but GOD is his confidence." Until then, the righteous succumb, or seem to succumb, until the right time comes.

111. but if they persevere in this wholesome giving of thanks, whether they die or suffer in the meantime, the Lord comes in due time, saying, Not so, but the greater shall serve the lesser, that is, the victor shall be subject to the vanquished, as we have quoted above from Isa. 14:2: "They shall hold captive them of whom they were captives, and shall rule over their beaters." But he saith it, and so it cometh to pass, for [Ps. 33:9.] "As he saith, so it cometh to pass." But then it comes to pass, when (as he will say below [v. 17.]) it is known that the LORD establishes justice, and the ungodly is brought to nothing 1) in the work of his hands. For by the revelation of the truth this is known, as he said above [v., "Thou chidest the Gentiles, and destroyest the ungodly." For it is not by preaching, but by GOD chiding, making right, and giving prosperity, that the ungodly are turned back.

(112) But if the wicked have been changed and conquered in this way, it is still true that their foot is caught in the net they had set up, and that they have sunk into the destruction they had prepared, because their wickedness has itself suffered the destruction and the net that they had intended for the godliness of the righteous, in order to destroy them, and has itself perished. They did not, however, perish through the same destruction that they had inflicted, but through a similar one, because the destruction of godliness and godlessness are not one and the same destruction, but only similar in form. Therefore this passage is to be understood according to the figure used by the apostle Rom. 5, 14. ff. where he says that Adam is an image of Christ, while the latter is the author of sin, the latter of righteousness; but he is an image of the same origin, not of the same things.

Thus the wicked are plunged into the destruction that they brought upon the godly, since this is the destruction of the godly when they become wicked, and that of the wicked when they become godly; thus it is the same image, but quite a different thing. These two wars are perhaps painted by Revelation 13:1 ff, where he says to those who fight with the one beast [v. 10], "Here is patience and faith of the saints," and to those who fight with the other beast [v. 18], "Here is wisdom."

There are some, however, who interpret everything in this passage in an entirely spiritual way, and want "to be immersed in the destruction they had caused," that is, that the conscience should be entangled in the sin they had committed and caught up in it.

1) In the text eori-uit - to come to naught; in the Vulgate: est - he is seized, or as Luther translates: "he is entangled," that is, caught.

Others still more shrewdly, that the heretics and ungodly may be caught and entangled in their own speech. For as it is not possible for a liar to have a sufficient memory, so he cannot be careful enough; therefore it happens that they are easily caught by those who observe keenly, just as David killed Goliath with his own sword, and Christ binds the exceedingly strong and gives out the armor on which he relied [Luc. 11:22]; and in general we see that the Jews, the heretics, and all the hopeful have been overcome by this art.

Thus, 1 Sam. 14, Jonathan took it as a sign of future victory when they went to the Philistines if they were called by them [v. 10], but it would be different if the Philistines came to them. For even those who know warfare have this rule, that war must not be delayed until the enemy besieges the walls, but must be met when he is still far off, or better yet, when he is still in his own land; such were the wars of King David against the Gentiles in general. But even the Romans could not overcome Hannibal in Italy, but in Africa Hannibal could not win either.

What then does the divine omnipotence show us through this play with things? Nothing else than what is said here, that the enemies are defeated most surely and best by their own power, their own weapons, their own art, their own means of help. Yes, Christ also conquered death itself by death and the power of death, and condemned sin by sin [Rom. 8, 3.], just as he also conquered the curse by the curse, and gave us power to conquer the devil, the world, and the flesh by their own devices, making us firm and invincible against all their power and cunning by faith and patience. This is a beautiful and lovely understanding, but I do not know if it is appropriate for this verse. For the first understanding seems to be simpler, of the destruction of the ungodly and of ungodliness, which they have intended for the godly and godliness, whether this be of severity, or of goodness, or

The same judgment and work of the Lord, as we have shown above, but it does not work the same for everyone, because it is not received with the same effort.

Now we want to come to the meaning of the words, which, as we see, are quite figurative, by which, as we said in the 2nd Psalm, the Spirit wanted to indicate that it is also a matter of spiritual meaning (allegoricam). For something else is going on than seems to be going on when the wicked attack the godly, whether in carnal or spiritual warfare, for they seem to be the victors and the greater, but they are defeated and must serve the lesser. This spiritual interpretation is confirmed to me most beautifully and briefly by this word: "The greater will serve the lesser". As the greater and the lesser they are before the eyes, namely the victory of the latter, the service (servitus) of the latter. But the true service (servitus), which God regards, is not before the eyes, but is proclaimed by the word of God, and is perceived by faith alone.

Here again you see that one must pay more attention to the spirit in word than in name. And would God that all who are in distress would make this a common saying, so that they would be accustomed to comfort themselves frequently and to say against some sin or punishment: "The greater will serve the lesser. The greater is for us that which oppresses us; but be confident, the word of God is almighty, saying, "The greater shall serve the lesser." This is so certainly true in the future and after the attainment of victory that those who are the greater against us, that is, who persecute us, must also serve and benefit us in the present, so that even their tyranny, which is meant to serve our misfortune, must be a service to us and for our good. The judgments of God are so different from those of men.

"They sank" (demerguntur) seems to be taken from the Egyptians 2 Mos. 15, 10. where it is said: "They sank under (submersi sunt) like lead in the mighty waters." But also the whole verse forms the same history quite clearly. For just as the Egyptians sought to destroy Israel, having become far greater than it, so they perished by it: so also the wicked, who persecuted spiritual Israel, perished. But the sinking (demersio), or the putting (defixio) [into perdition indicates eternal perdition, from which they cannot be saved, whether you understand it according to severity or according to goodness. For the reprobate will not be called back again, and the truly converted will not eat again for all eternity what they have eaten. For there is a great gulf fixed between them, so that they cannot pass from hence, nor from thence to one another [Luc. 16:26].

Thus, in the 7th Psalm above, he has set words that are unequal in strength. [V. 16:] "He digged a pit, and fell into the pit which he made." There is something greater in "falling into the pit" than in "making a pit." So also here: "They are put into it, or sunk into the ruin which they had made." It is something greater "to be sunk into destruction" than "to prepare" or prepare destruction; as if he meant to say: The evil wherewith the ungodly are inferior to the godly seems to be their fall and ruin, but in fact it is only a kind of preparation, and more a purpose to bring them to fall and ruin. For they are afflicted with death and calamity, but they live, and it is well with them, as it is said in the 118th Psalm, v. 13: "They thrust me to fall, but the Lord helpeth me." On the other hand, it seems as if the wicked are raised up, fortified and exalted above the godly, and as if they are sinking them into destruction, but in fact it is only a preparation, an appearance, an attempt to rise up, and in truth more of a sinking, by which they will suffer destruction, yes, are already suffering at present.

The same must be said of the second part of the verse, where "to be caught by the net" is something heavier than "to set a net," and yet it looks as if the godly are seized, although only the net is prepared to seize them. I say they will be tempted, not caught, and

The wicked get no further than to set the net and prepare reenactments, but with vain labor. Again, they seem to be free and safe and to seize the godly, but in truth they are seized themselves.

And this verse, if it does not contain a repetition of the same thing, can be applied in its first part to the carnal warfare, in its last part to the spiritual warfare, because the ungodly, who fight according to their ungodliness, are full of cunning and guile against the doctrine of godliness. They do not present their own sincerely and slander what is foreign to them in the most deceitful way, until, when their deceitfulness is discovered, they are seized by God performing His miracles, or they become eternally disgraced by their counsel being revealed to everyone. For it is impossible that the wicked should not proceed deceitfully and deceitfully, since he is a liar from the sole of his foot to the crown of his head, and then also, according to his lying sense, burns with a completely impotent zeal, as we have a horrible example of in the Jews. But since he sees that he cannot gain the victory by open action, he turns to deceit and resists the truth of Moses just as the sorcerers of Pharaoh did knowingly and with deliberation. We will hear of such deceitfulness many times later, as we also see in the Gospel that Christ suffered the same everywhere.

Now, if anyone in a simpler sense wants to understand by "net" the stalking with regard to bodily death, we have no objection, for in such a way they stalk the saints even unto death, and yet the saints are delivered, and they are caught in death before they realize it, [1 Thess. 5, .] "For if they shall say, There is peace, there is no danger; destruction shall quickly overtake them."

I leave it, because it is known, that "the catching of the foot in the net" is taken from birds and wild animals, which the bird-catchers and hunters sang with this trick. Through these things, the ailments, the persecutions, the dangers and the fall of the souls are beautifully depicted, especially among the Hebrews. And to

I repeat here: in Hebrew, neither of the two verbs contains the relative quom, but simply: in the pit, they had prepared; in the net, they had set.

V. 17. thus it is known that the LORD establishes justice; the wicked is entangled in the work of his hands, by the word, sela. 1)

St. Jerome and the Hebrew text have so: Agnitus est dominus iudicium faciens, in opere manuum suarum corrui impius, meditatione²) semper.... And in truth the prophet says in the preterite agnitus est, not in the future cognoscetur. And "the wicked", which our [Latin] interpreter has translated by "sinner", is precisely the ceremonial-keeping work-saint, the Pharisee, who is proud of his virtue, who boasts of his works, who, in order to render service to GOD for the truth of the faith and for the glory of the holy Church, kills with great confidence the children of GOD, of whom we have spoken abundantly in the foregoing, who is called in Hebrew. But what Jerome expressed by corrui is more correctly called comprehensus est in Hebrew and in our Latin translation, although the meaning is not much affected by it.

But the prophet goes on to tell the wonders of God, that not only the idolatrous Gentiles, who are persecutors, have sunk into the destruction they have brought, but also those who think of themselves as holy and live in a right way have been found to be sinners; unless one wants to say that this verse is the light for the previous verse, and here what was said there somewhat darkly is made clear.

(116) I am more inclined to believe that the prophet intended to extend the power of the divine work and judgment to all things, so that the Gentiles would not be found to be evildoers only, by being

1) Vulgate: OvANOssetur clorninus iudicieu kaeiens, in opsidus ruunuuln snnrnm eonapreüensus est peeeator.

2) In the original edition and the Basel: Neäitutio. But the Weimar one has rightly changed this to: Neäitutione, as it must be called after the following.

The people of God are to be resisted for the sake of their actions, but their actions themselves are to be found sinful and evil. Paul may be taken as an example of this. When he had recognized that the righteousness that comes from the law is nothing but ungodliness, which makes one puffed up, he also recognized that not only all the evil he had done to the saints, that is, the pit he had made and the net he had set, were the very worst deeds, which before, burning with zeal for the law, he had considered the very best, but immediately condemned even the righteousness itself, which comes from the law, entangled in these works of his hands, as ungodly and evil, which he had believed served the highest righteousness.

(117) The meaning is this: If one knows the Lord, and so knows that he is the judge, or that he establishes justice, then no one can stand before him, however just, wise, and powerful he may be. For it is different to recognize the Lord as a judge than to recognize him as a merciful Lord. He to whom the Lord of judgment is made known falls down terrified, and is made nothing before his unbearable wrath. But to whom the Lord of mercy is made known, he rises joyfully and is exalted above all things before his incomprehensible goodness.

But it is seen that he worketh righteousness outwardly and inwardly. Outwardly by the word of the Gospel and the example of the saints, whom he justifies after the Gentiles have sunk into the pit they made. But this does not move sufficiently until he also looks at the heart inwardly and makes it tremble, as is said above [v. 4, § 18 ff] in the word "before you.

Therefore, he said "the work of the hands of the wicked," not the sins of the wicked, referring in general to those works which the wicked do as if they were good works, in which he also trusts, because of which he is incorrigible, neither hears God's word, nor, when he hears it, believes that it concerns him, without fear, certain that the kingdom of heaven will be given to him. Therefore, no one can convert such a man except the knowledge of the Lord, who judges, before whom no man can ever be saved.

no one is innocent. Nahum 1, 3 [Vulg.]: "The Lord, who makes clean, lets no one be innocent", and 2 Mos. 34, 7 [Vulg.]: "And no one is innocent before you by himself" 2c. Behold, then, the marvelous and terrifying power of God's judgment. The wicked presumed to fortify and save himself by the work of his hands, and behold, the judgment of the Lord is recognized, and immediately he is entangled in it and sinks, found to be a wicked man and a sinner.

This verse can also be taken as a general statement, although even the wicked does not believe that he will be entangled in this way: It is preached and known that the Lord establishes justice among the Gentiles, and at the same time it is known that there is no one among men who is not full of sins and entangled therein, since even those are entangled who have great works and virtues before others, which are all counted as sins before God. Thus it is said in Rom. 3:20, 23, 12: "No flesh may be justified in his sight by the works of the law," but "they are all sinners," "there is none that doeth good, not one." And here I like this sense best, that the ungodly is really he who, though he is a sinner, puffed up by his good works, does not believe that he is a sinner. Therefore, he has neither the right opinion of God nor of himself; even if he does not feel this himself, those who recognize [God's judgment] feel it.

What follows: Meditatione semper ["by the word, sela"] is called in Hebrew: XXX XXXX, and is a half verse, the last part of this whole verse, which none of the interpreters seems to have translated. Augustine indicates that XXX (that is, pause [diapsalma], 1) had stood in his codex, but of meditatio or XXXX [he says] nothing. And it is to be wondered what this expression wants to say, especially since it is so significant (tanta) that it alone makes up half a verse, since the first part is so long. For of we have said in the third Psalm. Also this is not certain, whether it is translated as nominative, ablative or vocative.

1) Compare Ps. 3, p 19.

meditatio, meditatione, 1) or o meditative. We have given the meaning of the same in the first Psalm [v. 2.], where it is said, "And speaketh of his law day and night." For it means to speak, to discuss, to chat, and in general all that is exercised by word or by song, yet in such a way that it is done with good deliberation, hence it is often connected with the heart, as Ps. 19:15: "And the conversation of my heart before thee," where the same expression is as here.

Again I confess my ignorance, only that I assume that the prophet talks about a good conversation (meditatione). I want to be the first to bring up unknown things, although the poet says that this is not very certain. How? if the prophet had wanted to praise the efficacy and the fruit of the Word of God by this one expression rather than by an exclamation? as if he wanted to say: Behold, the heathen are sunk in the pit which they had made, they are caught in the net which they set, the Lord is known to do right, and the wicked is ensnared in his works, and all this by the Word (meditatione), that is, by the ministry of the Word. O Word, O ministry of the Word, you are so small a thing, so despised, so weak, so foolish in the sight of men, and so great things are done through you! For thou alone art God's co-worker in all his wonders; not the power, not the wisdom, not the righteousness, not the grace of the world. For so also in our German language, when we are utterly astonished that something has happened through that of which we did not expect it, we are accustomed, either in exceedingly great indignation or astonishment, scarcely to name it, saying: Did he do that?

Thus it is said 4 Mos. 16, 1. [Vulg.]: "And behold, Korah" 2c. and it follows [v. 2.]: "And they were indignant", where the first "and" can also be referred to the astonishment alone. From the same agitation, we see, David also spoke 2 Sam. 18, 33. "O Absalom, my son, my son!" But here it is the

1) In all editions: raeditationem, but the ablative seems to us to be necessary after the immediately preceding words.

The movement of the heart is so great that if more words were added, it would move the hearers less, because the greater the astonishment, the fewer words it uses. And it is indeed astonishing that by the word alone such great masses of the world could be overthrown and degraded, as it was in Christ's time, when the world was in its highest bloom through power, wealth, arts, justice, sagacity, wisdom, prudence, eloquence.

Therefore, according to my sense, I would rather translate it in the nominative: "The word, sela", although I do not reject Jerome's translation in the ablative, because this emotion of astonishment rather uses the nominative. But we have said in the third Psalm that, in our judgment, sela is set in the Psalms as a sign of a great and extraordinary movement of the heart in such passages as this, which for this reason rightly occupies half the verse by an expression that could not be sufficiently expressed by many verses. For it is written 2 Sam. 23, 8 [Vulg.]: "David is, as it were, an exceedingly tender little woodworm", namely because he was a man who was completely full of the most tender, most sincere, most peculiar movements. Therefore, the reading of the Psalms is for us, as long as we are without movements of the heart, like the donkey singing to the lute. For in the Psalms he deals with nothing other than faith, hope and love, and not in the barren desert of idle speculation, but in the fullness of the many times experienced movements of the heart.

V. 18. Oh that the wicked should be turned to hell, all the heathen who forget God.

120 Again, he [the Latin interpreter] translates sinners instead of "ungodly". For he speaks (as I have said) of the trustworthy saints of works, whom no one can change unless they are converted to hell by recognizing that God establishes justice and that his wrath is upon them, so that they may fully recognize themselves. For I do not believe that "being turned to hell" may be taken here for damnation (when someone

I would not object), 1) because the prophet recounts the miracles of God in the conversion of the wicked and the Gentiles.

From this point on, the prophet begins to pray (and continues to pray) until the end of the Psalm, that God may add miracles to miracles, and that what He has done to the converted godless, He may also do to those who are still godless, hopeful, forgetful of God and despisers of God, who must be converted by the same word. What the "being converted to hell" is, we have seen in the 6th Psalm 46 ff]. and above at the word "ringing" [v. 6] and "before thee" [v. 4]; and at that, "that it may be known that the LORD worketh righteousness" [v. 17], we have sufficiently mentioned it. For no one is fully converted until he has tasted hell and heaven, that is, until he learns how wicked and miserable he himself is, and how sweet and good the Lord is, which is especially felt in the imminent danger of death and the terror of the last judgment, and is recognized in the hope and confidence in the mercy of God.

The forgetting of God" must here again not be understood in the way that the majority understands it, but as we have indicated in the 8th Psalm [§ 58] at the word XXXX. For no one presumes more to remember God and to do this over and over again than the wicked, the hopeful and the sinners, since they defile His name daily and in perverse delusion lead and blaspheme uselessly every moment, since they do not think of Him as it is in truth, even ascribing to themselves what is God's and to God what is theirs, that is, they measure God and His works and judgments according to their human sense and inclination, of which we have spoken sufficiently.

123. but he punishes the ingrained ungodliness of the Gentiles, not blaming them for having offended God, or for having departed from him, but for having made their offenses a right and a custom by long duration and complete habit.

1) Only in the Erlangen edition these brackets are not set.

that they no longer believe that God is offended by them, but rather that He is served and worshipped by them, as was the way of the idolatrous pagans and their idolatry. For he who transgresses once does not immediately forget God, but knows that he has done evil, and easily turns back. But he who forgets [God] offends Him without ceasing, and does not know that he offends Him, which is rightly found among the wicked. Therefore the wicked and the heathen have also forgotten God, and it is necessary for both of them to be turned to hell and to be entangled in their works.

(124) Now it is to be noted that this verse is not simply prayed against the ungodly, that they may be converted, but because they are the people who persecute those by their ungodliness and their hopefulness, which the following verse shows by giving, as it were, the reason for this prayer.

V. 19. for he will not forget the poor altogether, and the hope of the wretched will not be lost forever. 2)

He [the Latin interpreter] could have translated like this: Quoniam non in finem obliviscetur pauperis. This also corresponds better to the Hebrew and also excites the heart inclination towards GOD in a more sweet manner, for this lies in it: GOD will not forget whose, as he had said at the end of the previous verse, the Gentiles had forgotten, as if he wanted to say with the opposite figure of speech: The pagans forget God by persecuting the martyrs, but God will not forget the wretched, while, judging by the senses, on both sides, the opposite is evident, namely, that the wicked also seem to rage out of zeal for God, so much is missing that one should think that they have forgotten God; again, one believes nothing less than that God remembers the martyrs, who are completely abandoned to the point of blood and death. He even speaks in the spirit and requires the faith that understands how he can help the afflicted and the suffering with these words.

2) Vulgate: (jnoniain HON in ÜN6NI odlinv srit xanxeris, patisntia pauxerim non xeridit in ünsin.

and comfort the dying. But if one pays more careful attention to Hebrew grammar, what is said in the preceding verse, "All the Gentiles who forget God," applies more to those who impress upon the martyrs the word, Ps. 42:4, "Where is now your God?" and afterwards [Ps. 10:11. He says in his heart, "God has forgotten, he has hidden his face, he will never see it," so that what he said above about what the Jews suffered, "For he remembers and asks for their blood, he does not forget the cry of the poor," is also reported here about them in what they suffered among the Gentiles.

For both the Jews and the Gentiles have dealt with the martyrs by making them fainthearted in their faith in God, not only by persecuting them, but also by mocking them with the help of God, as they did with Christ on the cross, saying the word of the Psalm [Ps. 71:11]: "God has forsaken him; pursue and seize him, for there is no Savior." So even the wicked are not satisfied with killing the body that they should not also try to kill faith and hope. Therefore, according to the Hebrew in the preceding verse, by those "who forget God" can be understood not only those who forget themselves, but also those who use it to make one believe that God has forgotten the wretched; this meaning is clearly explained by Jerome in his interpretation.

The Spirit comforts us most sweetly with these words, so that we may know that the words or thoughts which arouse distrust, pusillanimity and despair in us are not from God, but, as the 42nd Psalm beautifully teaches, from the devil or from men, saying [v. 10 ff]: "Why have you forgotten me? Why must I go so sadly when my enemy presses me? It is as murder in my legs that my enemies revile me, when they say to me daily, Where is now thy GOD?"

128 Thus we see that the holy fathers were greatly exercised in faith and hope, and instructed in that they were

have no hesitation in saying that their pusillanimity is indeed from God, but nevertheless by the devil and by people who arouse this complaint of the heart by word and thought. Incidentally, this work is foreign to God, who cannot work against Himself. Therefore he works that one loves him, hopes in him, believes in him, is happy in him, so that his first commandment is fulfilled, in which he commanded: "You shall not have other gods besides me.

So this verse is also directed in holy indignation against those who reproach him that God has forgotten him, by saying: "He will not forget the poor so completely. For the suffering, the dying and the afflicted have need of such words, lest they become fainthearted. For this is written for our learning [Matt. 15:4], "that we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope." Notice, he says [in the Vulgate] "patience." And here he admits the forgetting of God, but he denies that it will last forever; for he leaves us for a little while, that we may trust in him, but not forever, lest we fall away.

Patentia pauperum, that is, that for which the afflicted wait. For the word "poverty" here is different from that in the first part of this verse, for, as said above, this also means affliction, namely, poverty of spirit, that is, those who are without consolation, of whom it is said above [v. 13], "He does not forget the cry of the poor," that is, of the afflicted. Thus he says here: That which the miserable expect (for the word is one which expresses expectation [expectandi] rather than affliction) they do not expect in vain, for hastening shall come the LORD the Redeemer, in whom they hope. Thus it is said in Ps. 55:23: He will not leave the righteous forever in restlessness. For what he postpones he does not take away, Jerome says in this passage, if one can only hope for it. Therefore, one must expect, but not tempt God to be there with His help immediately.

V. 20. Arise, O Lord, lest men get the upper hand; let all the Gentiles be judged before you.

He closes the psalm with two verses that pray for what he sang about above [v. 14. ff.], that it has happened and will happen, that is, that the wicked will be converted and perish after they have recognized God's judgment, and that the people of Christ will increase. But he calls them by a contemptuous name "men". He says: "Lest men get the upper hand," that is, since they are XXXX and very wretched, why do they puff themselves up and rise against your saints with pride and scorn [Ps. 31, 19.], trusting in the greatness of their power, wisdom and justice? Therefore let their strength cease, and let them be weak; and let them not prevail against thy saints for ever; yea, rather, let them be reproached and judged before thee, that is, let it be known of them that the LORD worketh righteousness; let them be overwhelmed with terror, let them know with trembling their ungodliness, and seek thy mercy in humility.

For it is different to be judged before God than before men. The judgment of God searches the kidneys and hearts, and finds no one innocent, and therefore it frightens and humbles everyone most violently and sends sinners to hell. But the judgment of men swims on the surface of the flesh, and inwardly invents no one guilty, and for this reason flatters and deceives all who trust in the same, as Isaiah Cap. 9, 16. [Vulg.] says: "And there will be people who call this people blessed by deceiving them, and those who are called blessed 1) will perish." "Unto me," says the apostle 1 Cor. 4:3, 4, "it is a small thing that I should be judged of you, or of any human day; neither do I judge myself: but it is the LORD that judgeth me."

132 Therefore, since all that is said, sung and done to the wicked is in vain, since they give no place to words, works or miracles, and are the adulterous generation, of whom it is said in Matthew 11:17, "We whistled to you and you would not dance, we mourned to you and you would not weep," only this remains for us to wish upon them out of a right zeal.

That they may be punished before the face of God, for they cannot bear this rebuke.

V. 21. Give them, O Lord, a Master, that the Gentiles may know that they are men. Sela.

Jerome translates: Instill terror in them, O Lord; let the Gentiles know that they are men. But in Hebrew the verse is divided thus: Give them, O Lord, a master (legislatorem) (or a terror [terrorem]); the Gentiles shall gain knowledge (scient); men [are] they, sela. The Hebrew expression XXXX, which our Latin interpreter translates by legislator, Jerome by terror (terrorem), - which of both it actually means, I dare not decide. But according to my judgment it seems to come rather from the word teach [XXX], from which also XXXX is derived, which means the law. For those who have followed St. Augustine, and understand antichrist or tyrants in this passage, do not satisfy me. For the meaning of this verse seems to be no other than that he wishes the understanding of the law to be opened to the Gentiles, as if he wanted to say: I desired that the Gentiles might be judged before you. Now as I understand this, I say, namely, that you implant in them the right knowledge of the law, then they will undoubtedly know themselves. [Rom. 3, 20. "Through the law comes knowledge of sin," Rom. 7, 7. ff, and again, Rom. 4, 15.: "The law only causes wrath," and 1 Cor. 15, 56.: "The power of sin is the law." For that the ungodly are hopeful without faith has no other cause than that they do not yet recognize the law and its power, for they do not know that it is spiritual and by its letter kills all men, concerning which the apostle deals much, nay, all, in his epistles to the Romans and to the Galatians. If this were not already treated more than enough, and known to you, we would also expound it more extensively here.

134 Therefore I would like to XXXX, since it is a derived word, which means that by which someone is, as it were, instructed by a means and becomes a knower (sciens).

1) Erlanger: yeatiüoatur instead of: deatiücaMur.

is translated by "legislation", or "instruction in the law", that is, that they should recognize the power of the law, which is soon followed by terror of conscience and horror of judgment, which Jerome translated. For a lawgiver terrifies no one until the law itself is properly understood. Then follows: The Gentiles will gain knowledge (scient), that is, they will become men who, before the law came, did not know their sin. For it is a verbum without a closer definition (absolutum), which closes the middle part of the verse by its saying so: Et scient gentes, that is, after the law is given, they will be instructed and will know, as it is said in Rom. 7:7 ff: I did not know that lust was sin. "But I lived without the law. But when the commandment came, sin came to life again." And this, of course, is what is so often said in the prophets sHesek. 20, 42]: "You shall know that I am the Lord," and [v. 26. Vulg.]: "They shall learn that I am the Lord," and: "He shall know that I am the Lord," because the knowledge of the law, which leads man to know himself, compels him to recognize and implore God's mercy.

The other part of the verse: "They are men, sela," now shows with great emphasis and movement how man is nothing at all and extremely miserable, as if he wanted to say: They may do as great things as they always can, they may pretend, they may make a lot of fuss, they may be strong, and whatever else can be said about them, they are still men. "They are men," that is, XXXX and miserable. And indeed it is a great thing to know that one is a man, that is, as he says here, what we have sufficiently treated in the 8th Psalm. With the same contempt also Isaiah speaks of it, Cap. 31, 3: "For Egypt is man and not God, and her horses are flesh.

and not spirit." And Joh. 2, 24. 25.: "But JESus did not confide in them, for he knew them all, and needed not that any should bear witness of a man: for he knew well what was in man." And Paul says 1 Cor. 3:3, "Are ye not carnal?" Are ye not men? And when he paints with restraint and moderation the vanity of man, he is wont to say [Gal. 3:15.], "I will speak after the manner of man," Rom. 3:5. and [1 Cor. 3:3.], "Ye walk 1) after the manner of man."

136. Namely, before God, man is counted for nothing at all, so that the Scriptures, although very reserved, nevertheless show the misery of human nature in the most expressive way, as often as it refers to us by the name "man", as Gen. 11:5: "Then the Lord came down to see the city and tower that the children of men were building. This a speaker would express far more strongly and say: which the exceedingly ungodly, mighty and wicked men built/ Thus it is only a disgrace that by God and in the Scriptures man is called "a man," because by this name he is declared to be a child of Adam, that is, of a sinner. Instead, He has graciously given us another name, that we should be called children of God, as it says in 1 John 3:1, and in the Gospel of John, Cap. 1:12: "To those He gave power to become children of God," and Ps. 82:6: "I have well said, Ye are gods, and the children of the Most High."

Therefore, the "sela" at the end indicates how rare and unusual this movement of the heart is, in which someone feels that he himself is "a man" as well as that others are "men. However, the law causes them to become aware of the best when the Lord appears and gives them the knowledge of it, and arouses terror in their conscience.

The tenth Psalm. *)

Lord, why are you so distant and hidden in time of need?

1. there is (in my judgment) no psalm which has so actually, abundantly and clearly depicted the character, the manners, the works, the words, the meaning, the fortune (fortunam) of the ungodly, as this one, so that, if something has been said too little up to now, or should be said, one can obtain from this a perfect picture of ungodliness. So this Psalm is the image, the pattern, the figure, the most perfect representation (idea) of the ungodly and of godlessness, that is, of such a person who seems more excellent to himself and to other people than St. Peter, but is an abomination before God. This is what led St. Augustine and those who followed him to understand this Psalm of the Antichrist.

(2) But because this psalm is without a title, let us take it as a very general saying, and let us see in it (as I have said) a common pattern (ideam) of ungodliness, not that we deny the interpretation of those, but rather because we take it generally, we include the Antichrist.

(3) Yes, it would not be inconsistent if we were to associate this psalm in its order with the previous one in such a way that we understand it to mean that the prophet sang there of the converted ungodly and prayed for those who were yet to be converted, but that here he sings of the ungodly who are still left and still have the upper hand in their power over the weak of whom he either cannot hope or is uncertain whether they can be converted or not.

4) But behold, what a great zeal he has, almost quarreling with God Himself, "Lord, why are you standing so far away?" 1) For so over-

Jerome says, and this is the movement in which someone who is in the midst of a tribulation, and, moved by a very great indignation over a matter, cries out against the very unreasonable tyranny of the ungodly and for the cause of the very innocent saints, as one is also wont to say: How can God suffer this? Thus Habakkuk Cap. 1 begins his book with the same entrance [v. 2. 3.]: "Lord, how long shall I cry, and thou wilt not hear? How long shall I cry unto thee for iniquity, and thou wilt not help? Why do you make me see toil and labor? Why dost thou show me robbery and iniquity about me? [Why then dost thou look upon the scornful, and holdest thy peace, that the wicked devour him that is more pious than he? And let men go like fish in the sea, like worms that have no master? [There is authority over justice. Therefore there is nothing but right, and no right thing can win; for the wicked overrules the righteous, therefore wrong judgments go."

5) Why do we wonder if we suffer injustice, since these men, who are full of the spirit, confess with such great emotion that they have suffered such things, and cry out that the law of God is torn asunder (laceratam), in which they obviously indicate the war of ungodliness against godliness, in which zeal is most inflamed? Who would not judge that Habakkuk was guilty of impatience at this point? But also later in the same chapter, v. 13 f., he says: "Thine eyes are pure, that thou canst not see evil, and thou canst not look on the affliction. Why then dost thou look upon the despisers, and hold thy peace, that the wicked devour him that is more pious than he? And let men go like fish in the sea,

1) Quare, Domine, stas a longe? Vulgate: Ut

*) In Latin, the superscription here is: Kalmus clseirnus, bebraica numerationo, sine titulo. In the Vulgate, however, this psalm is included in the ninth. Then the Vulgate remains against the Bible in the counting of the Psalms by one behind to the 147th Psalm. With Ps. 147, 12th: "Praise Jerusalem" then begins the 147th Psalm of the Vulgate. In between, the sequence is interrupted once again, in that the (Hebrew) 114th and 115th Psalm are drawn together into one, but the 116th Psalm is divided into two.

like worms that have no master?" In the same agitation Isaiah, Cap. 63, 1) 15. says: "Where is now your zeal, your power? Thy great hearty mercy keepeth hard against me." The same is found in Job, Cap. 21 very extensively.

6 The prophet also says here: "Lord, why do you stand so far away?" that is, you let us be oppressed and devoured, you do not hear and save us, you strengthen the hand of the wicked and promote their counsel. Yes, he seems to contradict himself, for he had said in the previous Psalm, v. 10: "A shelter in trouble", but here: "You hide yourself in the time of trouble", and he seems to tempt God, since he prescribes time and opportunity of help, and does not completely expect the hand of God.

(7) But under other emotions, one speaks differently and differently. For in this psalm the person of the afflicted and of him who afflicts him must be perfectly presented (formari). But the afflicted, though he suffers valiantly, is not without feeling, he has flesh and sensation; he breaks forth according to his nature, yea, according to his insurmountable weakness, and sighs, and cries, and becomes unwilling in impatience. Thus Christ says Matt. 26:41, "The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak." And he himself also asked that the cup might pass from him, in that he suffered from natural weakness, which, however, he immediately made amends for and overcame, saying [Luc. 22:41.], "Yet not my will, but thine be done."

(8) So it is in the battle of the righteous with the wicked. Although they persevere, it is with difficulty and hardship; sometimes the spirit is willing and confident, sometimes the weak flesh groans. In this struggle, the weakness of the flesh is somewhat yielded to, so that it cries out and groans, when it should rather rejoice.

(9) All this is for our consolation, so that we may realize that the saints of God were human beings like us, and that we may realize that what is said about the suffering of the cross and death must be overcome by a love that bravely endures,

But that it could not or should not be borne by the willfulness of the flesh and of the human mind.

Thus this verse, indeed the whole Psalm, is the voice of the flesh and of the lowly and outward man in the saints crying out, while the spirit bravely endures and waits for God [who helps him in due time.

V. 2: Because the wicked is arrogant, the wretched must suffer. They cling to each other and devise evil deeds. 2)

11 Jerome has thus: In superbia impii ardet pauper, capiantur in sceleribus suis, quae cogitaverunt [Over the hopefulness of the wicked the poor burns; may they be caught in their shameful deeds which they have devised]. But this hopefulness is not that in which someone is puffed up with himself on account of himself and is puffed up in his conceit, but the outward show by which he subdues and oppresses another, since he has become higher before men than the latter, as it is said in Exodus 15:1, "I will sing to the Lord, for he has done a glorious deed" (glorioso enim honorificatus est), instead of: He has shown very great hope, or: He has prevailed mightily, namely over the Egyptians. Thus it happens, while the Lord stands back and from afar, and hides himself in time of trouble, that in the meantime the ungodly rises above the godly and reigns over him by force, that is, is hopeful and triumphs over him. Therefore we may understand this word of pomp, grandstanding, triumphing, on which, as we see, a victor over the vanquished in the sight of men relies and defies, and is sure as if it were done for the vanquished, where then the party of the victor has only the task of destroying to the utmost all that is left of the vanquished. This is it that he says the wretch burns or is inflamed.

Reuchlin writes, however, that the Hebrew expression not only means to burn or ignite, but also to persecute, and here one must say: The wretch suffers persecution.

1) In the Latin editions: Isaias 43.

2) Vulgate: Diaboli peritiam, iniquitatem, in consilio, Huiusmodi.

gung. But the meaning of conflagration or burning is very appropriate for this passage, indeed, it has a greater emphasis, because the prophet wants to be understood that the wretched, where the wicked triumphs, are completely reduced to dust and nothing, as when a house, consumed by fire and reduced to ashes, leaves no trace of itself. In this the prophet beautifully shows the intentions and desires of the wicked, for whom it is not enough that they proudly exalt themselves above the godly, but they also direct their attack to destroy from the bottom up all their goods and what belongs to them, by subjecting themselves to greater things than they are able. Thus Isaiah says of them Cap. 16, 6: "But we hear of the haughtiness of Moab, that it is almost great, that also their haughtiness, pride, and wrath are greater than their might." This passage contains the same word that means "arrogance" here. And Isa. 10, 7. it is said of the king of Assyria (Assyria): "Though he mean not so, neither think his heart so, but his heart standeth to destroy, and to cut off not a few nations." And again it is said of Moab, Jer. 48, 29. f.: "It has always been said of proud Moab that he is very proud, hopeful, haughty, defiant and arrogant. But the Lord saith, I know well his wrath, that he is not able to do so much; and presumeth to do more than is his ability." Again, almost nothing other than the word that is here so often repeated, by which this arrogance, rage and impetuous action of the wicked is described when he has the upper hand, namely, the arrogance and cruelty of the victor against the vanquished.

(13) He therefore speaks with great agitation against the wicked, who indeed do not conquer, although they do conquer: but because all clearly perceive with their senses that the conquered are exposed to their cruelty and insolence, the weak flesh complains that the wretched must suffer (incendi), while the wicked are boisterous.

14. for that which the wicked are subject to is so great that it seems as though they were

would in truth eternally retain the upper hand. By examples we will grasp this best. Imagine that in the times of Arius 1) the orthodox bishops, who were sent into exile, were singing this while the Arian impiety was running riot, then you will understand how the prophet felt. For God does not want any enemy to be overcome by our strength, but by His arm alone, so that the work and the glory may be His alone.

(15) Therefore, one must not deal sacrilegiously with the heretics and the ungodly, as the disputing philosophers are wont to do; they are not overcome by the power of proofs, they are not guided by reasons, nor are they won over by the reputation of others, but are hopeful against all this and retain the upper hand until the hand of the Most High changes them. To do this, one must not be presumptuous in trusting in one's talent, eloquence and learning, but one must approach God with humble cries, as the example of this verse teaches us. Thus we have quoted the words of Job 41:18, 20 about the wars which, as we have seen, have been waged against the heretics and the Turks for several centuries, because we have undertaken them presumptuously out of human strength and according to human suggestions: "He esteemeth iron as straw, and mocketh the quivering spear." Satan and the enemy of the Christians will not be overcome by our actions, but only by our suffering and crying.

16 [What in the Vulgate reads:] "They are caught in the plots which they devise," Jerome renders: "May they be caught in their deeds of shame which they have devised." But everywhere the same meaning remains, namely this: Since the wicked are overconfident and oppress the poor, they do not get along at all and realize their wickedness, that they rather flatter themselves with these their shameful deeds, are happy about it, get entangled in it, harden themselves, and become a part of it.

1) Instead of [^]riavi in the Baseler, in the Weimarschen and in the Erlanger is to be read with the Wittenberger and the Jenaer [^]rinnis.

and become blind, and think that they are doing God a service. For this is by far the most pernicious kind of imprisonment, when someone is caught and blinded in his own counsel and works, by which only the wicked are to be punished, as Isaiah Cap. 5, 20. says: "Woe to those who call evil good and good evil, who turn darkness into light and light into darkness, who turn sour into sweet and sweet into sour.

17 Note, therefore, that the first destruction of the wicked is blindness, as Ecclesiastes tells Solomon, Cap. 4, 17. [1 Sam. 15, 22.] "Obedience is far better than the sacrifice of fools, for they know not what evil they do." "Whom God wills to punish, He will shut his eyes."

The Latin words do not reflect the emphasis that the Hebrew has. For the word comprehendi (to be seized) in this place does not denote a hostile capturing, but a sweet and friendly one, so that also Gen. 4, 21. is written of Jubal that he was the father of those who play (that is, who seize, handle, hold on to) on the zither and musical instruments, so that it means that the wicked flatter themselves in their wickedness, as it is also said in Proverbs 2, 14. 2, 14: "They rejoice in doing evil, and are glad in their wickedness," while they make themselves believe that they rejoice only in the very best things.

(18) Further, in consiliis, for which Jerome translated "in their shameful deeds," is ambiguous in Hebrew, and can mean both shameful deeds and deeds of plot, so that if it could be united into one meaning, we would understand the works that are done intentionally and deliberately. For the wicked do not consider themselves to be acting against the godly in an accidental or thoughtless manner, but with great and special deliberation and counsel, indeed, out of zeal for God.

(19) And this Hebrew word expresses most appropriately the frenzy which is the source of all evil, which I see they call nowadays a good intention and a well-formed precept (formatum dictamen) of sound reason. For it is to be wondered how they trust in how bold they are, how presumptuous they are, how they please themselves, how irretrievably they are caught and blinded, especially the bishops and the monks, but among these especially the more learned and holier ones, as if it were necessary, as soon as they say: I have formed a good intention for the glory of God and the salvation of souls and hold on to it, that then nothing of an evil intention would be left with them and no more evil work could follow from it. Then they also add this ungodliness, that they form or fashion the same [the good intention] from the natural powers and light of the intellect (lumine intellectus, as they call it), seeking divine grace only after the good intention is formed, or not at all; and yet they presume without all fear not only to contend and strive for this intention, but also to fill the whole world with blood and murder, if God permits it. If you tell them that this intention is exceedingly evil if it is not produced by the Holy Spirit as Master, and that one must despair of natural powers because man, as a liar, can do nothing but lie, and if this intention is conceived in fear and humility, one must wait for the hand of God alone, they will cry out that you are harboring heretical sentiments because you deny free will and thus condemn godly intentions.

20 Therefore, for our time, this verse can be rendered thus: The wicked are caught and please themselves in their good intentions, for whose sake, as long as they have the upper hand, they inflict suffering on the wretched (incidunt). Now I would like to understand this in such a way that this is called by the apostle 1 Tim. 4, 2. [Vulg.]: "who have a branded conscience," that is, to whom by violence his form is given (formatam), and as it were to the by nature evil intention 1) the brand of this wrong (adulterinae) intention is expressed by the foolish zeal, as the brand of an evil-doer is expressed by the branding iron, by human endeavor and human strength, which is is completely opposite to the natural form. Thus, even these completely blind people, who do not know the wickedness of human nature, strive to forcibly disfigure it through good intention, and since they have covered the natural lie of the human heart through this false intention, they are willing to submit to any cause for the glory of God, for the glory of the church, out of zeal for the faith and the salvation of souls.

(21) Furthermore, with regard to everything they have done, they have no doubt at all that it is exceedingly pleasing to God as a sufficient (merito condigni) and more than sufficient (super- erogationis [Luther: "exceeding merit"]). If you were to put them to the test, it remains to be seen whether they would allow their works to be compared to the merits of St. Peter. So great are the eyelids of this Behemoth [Job 41:9], so much are they caught by these their plots, the most wretched of men!

22 Now also the word "they devise" is more dainty and significant of this matter than any language could render, for in Hebrew it does not denote devising per se, but artificial and meaningful, as the finer artists are intent on a variety of their works. Ps. 52:4 [Vulg.], "All day long thy tongue thinketh upon iniquity." Hence Reuchlin says that from this verbum XXX theorica magistralis or mathematics has its name, and every art which investigates by reasoning (ratione) and proof. In this the spirit paints beautifully the thoughts of the goddess. Since they do not surrender to the grace of God, that they might be governed by it, but please themselves in their good intentions, it is incredible how industrious and skillful they are, both to align their works and to fortify them well. "They are vain subtlety and loud cleverness." There is also another meaning of the word, namely, to esteem, to cherish, to hold in value, so that one can see that with the wicked there is nothing more delicious in their eyes than their counsels, their thoughts, their good intentions.

23) See, then, how the Holy Spirit, who alone is the best speaker, does not lack words.

He lacks the ability to describe the matter adequately, actually, clearly and fully. Who could describe the blindness of the wicked more appropriately in a long speech than he does here in these three words? If one is careful, he has described it with so few means in such a way that nothing can be added or taken away from it, because he has not only described the blindness, but also their attitude and their whole behavior and manner with so few words.

(24) Now if someone is offended by our Latin translation, where it says: Quibus cogitant instead of: Quae cogitaverunt, he can get out of the offence by taking cogitare as a verb without closer relation (absolutum), so that the sense is: Quibus cogitant, i.e., in which their thoughts are indulged, their art, their prudence is proved, by which they are delicious in their own eyes, and as it is commonly said: "Who think much of themselves in their counsels and deeds, which also deceives them most," that is, comprehenduntur. For this is the reason why the prophet cries out and complains that the Lord is so distant, because the wicked are also hardened more and more by their shameful deeds, so that there is no hope that they will be overcome by the patience of the wretched, if the Lord does not help.

V. 3. for the wicked boasts of his courage, and the miser blesses himself, and blasphemes the Lord. 1)

This and the following verse have been shamefully torn apart in the translations, because they begin the following verse like this: Exacerbavit Dominum peccator, while in Hebrew it begins with the nominative peccator, and what precedes: Exacerbavit Dominum, belongs to this verse. For Jerome also has it this way: Quia laudavit impius desiderium animae suae, et avarus applaudens sibi blasphemavit Dominum.

26. again the words trouble us here, peccator [the sinner is the ungodly XXX, the devil's saint. Desiderium animae ejus is: what pleases him. Iniquus sder Ungerechtes, which Jerome translated by "the miser," is a general word that refers to a miser and such a person who does wrong to other people, since according to his will he hurts, harms, and does wrong to those he pleases, as the miser is wont to do. And our Latin translator has rendered it better by: "the unjust" than Jerome by: "the miser," since injustice and unrighteousness and wanton harm are on the one hand broader than miserliness, and on the other hand are more appropriate here, since he speaks of those who suppress godliness.

(27) This is the meaning: After the wicked has gained the upper hand and the wretched are disturbed, he is hardened and blinded in his evil deeds; to this he adds that he only praises, extols and glorifies his own, and strives to be such before men as he is in his own eyes. Therefore he strives that what pleases him, what he himself thinks, does and wants to be carried out against the godly, is approved by the consensus of all people as useful, holy, just, edifying, and that there is nothing in it that all do not praise; that, on the other hand, what the godly desire and hold should be just as unanimously condemned by all as harmful, ungodly, heretical, and, as in our time many such words have been used, 1) "vexatious, erroneous, seditious, offensive to Christian ears. And in these things the ungodly must have the upper hand, so that the speech and the sentiment expressed in this psalm would be appropriate in it.

28) Now the other destruction 2) of the wicked is that he goes so far in his wickedness that he boasts of his wickedness and that he can do harm, Ps. 52:3, so that the abomination stands in the holy place.

That which this verse says has been fulfilled by the tyranny of the [Roman] church for many years and will fulfill it even more in the future time. For here, because the name of Christ has become a cloak of wickedness, they have-

1) Cf. Walch, St. Louiser Ausa., vol. XVIII, 932 ff. 2) Cf. s 17.

If anyone does not declare as heretics, rebels and blasphemers all that they have done to harm Christ's people according to their will, all that they have ordered, all that they have only liked, to be approved (benedixerit) and praised, so that the Scripture may be fulfilled, which says [2 Thess. 2, 11. 10, "Therefore God will send them strong errors, that they may believe the lie, for that they have not received the love of the truth, that they may be saved." For the Antichrist, who is depicted in this Psalm, must be worshipped and feared with his body under the name of Christ, as is required by what we have earned with our ingratitude.

(29) It is also not improper that Jerome translated "the miser" instead of "the unrighteous", only that the unrighteousness is more abominable than the miser. Then in the Scriptures these godless bishops and idols of the Antichrist are ascribed avarice even before all others, especially Isa. 5, 7. f. and Ps. 5, 10. where he compares their jaws to an open grave, and it [avarice] will then [at the time of the Antichrist] stand in its highest strength and power, that it has never been seen nor will be seen so great, so that with the end of the world an end must be put to it in the same way.

30 Exacerbavit, which Jerome translated by blasphemavit, indicates the third wickedness of the wicked, which is that they provoke, provoke, and blaspheme God, of which the 5th Psalm, v. 11, said: "Cast them out because of their great transgression, for they are contrary to You." But it is not to be understood in such a way that the ungodly and even the Antichrist himself blaspheme God publicly and in such a way that one could perceive it with the senses, since he will use the name of the Lord primarily for powerful errors [2 Thess. 2, 11.]. For just by this the wicked gain the upper hand over the wretched, that they boast like Rabshakeh Is. 36, 2. ff. that they came from the Lord, it is God's business what they say, do, want and order: therefore all those must necessarily be deceived.

3) Cf. § 17 and s 28.

Those who are not driven by the spirit of God.

This is blasphemy, that they not only do not recognize their ungodliness and unrighteousness, but also praise it as godliness and God's good deed, thereby ascribing to God the most shameful work and the most abominable name, which provokes God to anger, who is otherwise the most loving Father to those who confess their sin. Again, the word and work of God, which he has addressed to his wretched, they not only do not hold in honor and do not consider it worthy of the name of God, but they attribute it to evil and injustice, thereby depriving God of what is his and attributing it to the devil.

32 Thus the apostle 2 Thess. 2 says of the prince of the wicked, the Antichrist, that he will not simply exalt himself above GOD, but [v. 4. Vulg.] above that which is worshipped, or that which is called GOD, or, as it is said in the Greek, above all said GOD and worship, to indicate that nothing can be exalted above GOD as He is in His nature, but insofar as He is preached, worshipped, and worshiped, that is, above the service against GOD, that is, in the opinion and mind of men, with whom alone He is preached and served by the word and faith. I do not understand this in any other way than that the word of an ungodly man should one day be preferred to the word of God, and that a man who sits in God's place should be feared and served more than God. This seems to be the aim of those who doubt whether the Roman Pontiff is a pure man and prefer his words to the holy Gospel of Christ, which is truly the greatest blasphemy.

V. 4. The wicked is so proud and angry that he asks for no one; in all his wiles he thinks GOD is nothing. 1)

Jerome: Impius secundum altitudinem furoris sui non requiret, nec Deus in omnibus cogitationibus suis. There is first the

1) Vulgate: seeunäum inuNituäinem ira" 8UU6 non HuasrM, non est Oeus In conspectu ojns.

note how fierce is the spirit of this psalm, which so often restates and repeats the word "the wicked". Then Jerome, instead of "multitudinem irae suae," has more correctly: secundum altitudinem irae suae, that is, because of his hopefulness and elevation and his puffed-up raging. For the Hebrew word actually means the height or the hopefulness, as Ps. 101, 5. [Vulg.]: "With the hopeful eye and the insatiable heart, with that I have not eaten." And Ps. 131, 1. "O Lord, my heart is not hopeful, and my eyes are not proud." In my opinion they read 2 for 2 and translated: Secundum altitudinem or secundum multitudinem, while in altitudine should have been said. But that the famous fathers referred this "multitude of wrath" to GOD is due to the fact that the distinctive sign in this verse was not placed correctly, for it refers to the ungodly.

34 And that our Latin translation has said: In conspectu ejus, and Jerome: In omnibus cogitationibus suis, does not hurt your understanding much; but in Hebrew is the same expression, which they have translated above [in the Vulgate] in the second verse by in consiliis, and Jerome in sceleribus, so that the reader can see that I have above [§ 19 ff.], and that by this word I have understood the abomination and hypocrisy of the wicked, which they call "the good intention," a godly zeal and love of the truth. For the spirit of this psalm is against this hypocrisy, by which they do not appear to blaspheme God, but think that they praise Him most highly; nor are they hopeful, nor do they harm the wretched, but persecute proud and godless people; nor are they caught in their schemes and deceived in them, but are driven by the completely free and certain truth. Thus they are exceedingly sure that God is with their counsels and their good intention; and in general everything that is laid to their charge in this Psalm: Psalm is so far from them that they consider it a disgrace and a blasphemy. They hope to protect the sacred truth and the glory of God and the

The church's fame is highly deserved when they fight against it with all blasphemies, tricks, artifices, and with all their strength, and [think] that this is rather found in those who persecute them.

35 Thus it is that the blindness of the wicked is the first evil, the cause of all this war and all misfortune. There are plenty of examples of this in Christ, in the apostles, in the martyrs; among the confessors, the bishop Athanasius and (his opponent, the Arian Lucius, 1) who even persecuted the orthodox with drawn sword and armed crew, as we read in the eleventh book of church history. The like, if it has not yet happened, will happen in future times by the bishops and monks for their benefices, rights and liberties, so that they may complete the measure of their fathers.

The fourth virtue 2) now of the most holy and learned men (that is, of the ungodly) is "the height of wrath", that is, hopefulness, exaltation, pomposity, pride of heart, of which the apostle also prophesied in 2 Tim. 3:2, saying, "There shall be men hopeful, glorious" 2c. And see the meaning and emphasis of the words. He ascribes to them not merely wrath, but a hopeful wrath (superbiam irae), because, as exceedingly hopeful despisers, they blow themselves up, exalt themselves, boast themselves against the godly because of their wrath and rage, as if they were the highest merits: so much is lacking in this, that they should have mercy on the wretched and be sorry for their wickedness, with which they rage. The cause of this iron neck and iron forehead (as Isaiah chap. 48, 4. calls it) is this, that they do not fight for money nor for other bodily things, but for God, for truth and righteousness (that is, for their motives, of which they are captives), in which nothing can happen that would be too much according to their judgment.

37 Therefore the prophet says rightly, "Impius secundum altitudinem seu multitudinem irae suae non quaeret." "He asks for no one." For it has the verbum quaeret no closer

1) Compare Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XX, 2127, §44.
2) Cf. 17. 28. 30.

Relationship (est absolutum) and denotes what I have already said in German: "He pays no attention to it, he asks nothing about it", he makes no inquiries, he does not care about it, he is not careful. For he who asks about something is careful, he stands in fear, he takes care. This one, however, goes about his head and neck, hopeful, without fear, sure of wherever his good intention takes him, nor does the hopefulness of his anger allow him to consider, ponder or investigate what he is doing. For he indicates this hasty carelessness when he says: "Because he is so proud and angry, he does not inquire of anyone," for not only does he not shy away from men, but he also does not have God in all of his proposals or before his eyes.

38. does this not mean to paint the wicked with the right colors, and to hit his attitude and his whole manner so surely that not a hair is missing from it? as Judges. 20,³) 16. is said of the children of Benjamin.

(39) If one pays attention to all of these diatribes, and which persons he attacks, namely the powerful, the princes, the authorities, the priests, the saints, the sages, who are something far different in the eyes of men and in their own eyes, one will have to say that the spirit of the prophet is heretical, vituperative, carries on slander, is angry, seditious, insulting to Christian ears.

(40) And so this verse has three colors of the wicked: hopefulness or proud anger, abrupt heedlessness, and contempt and neglect of God, but in such a way that (as I said) they do not allow anyone to be praised or glorified before them for their modesty, prudence, and godliness. For the wicked, as the manner of their life is quite peculiar, must be what they are not, and not be what they are.

V. 5 He continues in his doings forever; your judgments are far from him; he acts defiantly with all his enemies. 4)

3) In the Latin editions: ludieuin 18. The Weimar one has Richt. 19, 22. ff. in the margin.

4) Vulgate: Inquinatas sunt vias iUius in onini tsruporu, uukkruntrur judieia tun u taeis ejns, omnium inirueoruin snoruin donnnalzitur.

41. instead of inquinatae sunt [they are stained] Jerome and the Hebrew text have: they give birth, and it could seem that a Latin scribe instead of inquietae [restless] wrote: inquinatae, as if the interpreter had rendered the suffering of the one giving birth by "restlessness" (inquietudinem), if Augustine and the copies of the ancients as well as the Greeks did not stand against it. For Augustine reads: Contaminantur viae ejus [His ways are defiled]. So the sense of our [Latin] text will be: Though the ungodly may appear pure in his ways, yet, because he himself is defiled, his ways are at all times defiled, as it is said in Proverbs 30:12-14: "A kind that thinketh itself pure, and yet is not washed from its dung; a kind that carryeth up its eyes, and holdeth up its eyelids; a kind that hath swords for teeth, that eateth with its molars, and devoureth the wretched of the land, and the poor of the people." With these words, the same wicked one is described as in this Psalm.

(42) Of course, the wicked also have such presumption that, when they suffer something or their actions have gone badly, they boast of the crown of patience; indeed, they never have any other opinion of themselves than the best. Against these he says: "Forever" (in omni tempore, that is, both in fortune and in misfortune), whether they have performed something happily or have suffered misfortune, it is impure and defiled. As if to say with the apostle, Tit. 1, 16. [Vulg.], "Since they are an abomination in the sight of GOD, and untrustworthy, and unfit for any good work." And again [v. 15.], "To the pure all things are pure, but to the unclean and unbelieving nothing is pure, but unclean is both their heart and conscience."

43) Since the wicked, who set their righteousness on works, and are guided by their counsels, cannot be such men as are free from all times, from all works, from all things, and are indifferent to them, but cleave unto certain things, in which they trust, for whose sake they also make war: therefore he saith.

that their ways are at all times defiled, by which he means that this takes place most at the time when they seem to themselves to be most pure. And this passage applies to those who count morally good works among the works that should not be evil, because of the natural power of the free will for good. But the judgment stands firm: "His ways are defiled at all times."

(44) The Hebrew text is not far from this meaning, for to give birth is to be troubled and in pain, indicating that the deeds of the wicked, however good they may be, are not done out of a cheerful and willing heart, but out of a troubled, sad and sorrowful heart. For since they do not have the anointing of the Spirit, they do good only with hatred of the law and with difficulty; but difficulty and unwillingness also make the conscience sad. And this is what defiles all their good works, because they do them out of a restless, rebellious, unwilling, and sorrowful heart; or if they do them gladly, they are defiled by a still finer (subtiliori) defilement, because they do them out of a desire for benefit. And therefore, in truth, they always walk in defiled ways, whether they are compelled by threats or enticed by benefits, since they never do them out of love for God and an inclination toward righteousness. O what a mighty word this is! How many people are affected by it today, and it is not grasped, because, since they do as much as is in them and are concerned about moral virtues, they do not pay attention to this defilement of their hearts.

45 In Hebrew, the "everlasting" is connected with what follows: "Thy judgments are far from him," and it is simply said, "His ways are defiled or lie in birth pains," as if to say: All that he doeth good, that also is laborious, and yet at the same time defiled. And, as we have said above in the first Psalm, v. 1.

he calls them "ways," when in fact they are errors, because outwardly their works seem good to men, since they walk in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they [the wicked] are ravening wolves, because they are defiled.

1) The original edition has correctly after the Vulgate: inersüikilsk, that is, which one cannot believe. All editions have changed this to: inoMÜüü, except the Weimar one.

46 To this quite unfortunate name of the wicked, because their exceedingly beautiful glittering life is declared to be defiled before God, this is added, that the judgments of God are far from them. With this he expresses what he said, v. 4: "He regards GOD as nothing," wanting to show how they are without fear of GOD. Your judgments (he says), with which you will finally stand up for the wretched, and judge, and make all guilty who are hopeful, are so far from them that they are quite sure they will never come upon them. To these same people Isaiah Cap. 10, 3. says: "What will you do in the day of visitation and calamity that comes from afar?"

47. See then, since the godly Job fears because of all his works [Job 9:28, Vulg.], even though they are pure, the judgments of God are so near to him, because no living man is righteous before him when he enters into judgment with him, Ps. 143:2. But even though all the ways of the wicked are defiled, he never fears because of his works, so far are the judgments of God from him. Yes, in his pride he has something by which he expects to make God his debtor, namely, by the works to which eternal life is due according to their worthiness (condignis), then also by the works of equity (congruis) and the superfluous good works (supererogationis), as the school theologians (magistri) of our time have taught, who ascribe such merit to an act done in a moment that it is worthy of eternal glory. What Turk could believe that these things are taught in our country!

48 [Vulg.:] "He will rule over all his enemies" (dominabitur). Jerome: "He despiseth (despiciat) all his enemies." I do not yet know with certainty what the real meaning of this word is. For Ps. 12, 6. he [the Latin interpreter translates thus: fiducialiter agam in eo. Habak. 2, 3: Et apparebit in finem. But Proverbs 14, 1) 5: Profert mendacium testis dolosus. Now how does this correspond to each other: despiciere, dominari, fiducialiter agere and proferre? Our Latin translator, of course, seems to have remained the same in that he understood by dominari [to rule] the same as by fiducialiter agere [to act confidently], which Jerome expressed more clearly by despiciere [to despise]; for he who despises acts confidently and rules, as it were, as a superior over a conquered.

49 Johann Neuchlin says that the most knowledgeable Hebrews understand this word to mean: to think about something in oneself, to prepare something in oneself silently, to arrange something, to speak secretly in oneself. Let us follow this for the time being, so that the meaning would be: the wicked are so proud and despise everything in their lives so much that they also defiantly despise all who afflict them or their adversaries, and speak against them with contempt, as if they could do them no harm. If the Latin interpreter had translated [the word XXXXX] by a word that expresses a thing (neutrum), or by one that does not designate a person (impersonale), 2) the sense would have been clearer, and would have agreed with both the preceding and the following quite nicely, in this way: He despises all his tribulations, that is, he is so sure, so far away are the judgments of God from him, that he also scoffs when the future punishments of his sins are announced to him, since he thinks that they do not concern him; therefore he thinks and speaks contemptuously about them.

50) In favor of this sense is the fact that he has foreshadowed that the judgments of God are despised, by which the tribulation is inflicted and imposed on the wicked; then that not enemies, but his oppressors (tribulatores) means, namely, those who oppress and afflict him, as is said in the third and sixth Psalm [Ps. 3, § 18. Ps. 6, § 67]. Scripture everywhere attributes this contempt of punishment to the ungodly. Amos 9, 10.: "All the sinners among my people shall fall by the sword, they that say, There shall not so near be calamity, neither shall it befall us." Isa. 28, 15.: "For ye say, We have met with death.

1) In the Basel, Jena and Erlangen: krovsrd. 13.; in the Wittenberg: krovsrk. 41.

2) Luther thinks that instead of iniiiaioos, or more correctly triürUatorss, it should have been said: tridulatioos. According to our way of speaking, we would say: an abstractum instead of a concretum.

We have made a covenant with them and a covenant with hell; if a flood comes, it will not hit us. Micah 2:6: "They say that we should not be put to the sword, for such a sword does not 1) strike us; we shall not be put to shame like it, says the house of Jacob." So the word in this place does not mean to speak alone, but to speak defiantly and contemptuously, like a lord and superior. This is how the word Proverbs 14:5 [§ 48] can be understood.

become: Profert mendacium testis dolosus, that is, defiantly and contemptuously he speaks lies, not fearing the punishment of lying. But also the following verse indicates that this is the meaning of this piece, saying:

V. 6. He says in his heart, "I will never lie down; there will be no need for anything. 2)

See how he despises the future distress and the judgments of God! The Latin interpreter has not expressed the Hebrew, and has given the opposite meaning, which the text does not have. For it reads, as if the wicked man always intends to do evil, since he will never be moved by any misfortune. Therefore we will render both the distinction and the sense according to the Hebrew word for word, namely, thus: He saith in his heart, I will not lie down; 3) in generation and generation, that [I] be not in calamity. So also Jerome has it, who, of course, distinguishes differently: He says in his heart: I will not lie down from generation to generation, I will be without misfortune, by adding the verbum substantivum "I will be", which is self-evident in Hebrew.

52. it is therefore the manifest sense that the

The man who is ungodly speaks contemptuously against the tribulations that are proclaimed to him, saying, "I will not lie down forever, and I will be without calamity throughout all generations. So in both parts of the verse there is the same opinion by repetition of the same thing (per tautologiam). And there is in the verbum movebor [XXXX] a meaning (idiotismus) peculiar to the Hebrew language, as Ps. 15, 5.: "He that doeth this shall abide well" (non movebitur), and Ps. 125,⁴) 1.: "They that hope in the LORD shall abide forever (non commovebitur), as Mount Zion." For by this is signified the fear and fleeing of the conscience, whereof it is said in Isa. 28:16, "He that believeth shall not flee," and Ps. 1:4, "But such are not the wicked, but as chaff which the wind scattereth."

V. 7. His mouth is full of cursing, falsehood and deceit; his tongue causes trouble and labor. 5)

Jerome has it thus: Maledictione os ejus plenum est, et dolis et avaritia, sub lingua ejus dolor et iniquitas. First of all, it is clear from the Hebrew language that our Latin interpreter erred in the word amaritudo, and instead Jerome correctly translated: et dolis. For so it is also translated Ps. 24,⁶) 4. [Vulg.]: "He who does not swear falsely (in dolo) to his neighbor," since the word amaritudo [bitterness in its root has no X, like this [XXXXX]]. What our Latin translation here by dolus [deceit], Jerome by avaritia [avarice], translate it elsewhere by usura [usury], Ps. 72, 14. [Vulg.]: "He delivereth their souls from usury and iniquity." And Ps. 55, 12. both expressions are thus translated [Vulg.], "Usury and falsity let not from their lane."

54. I know that this verse is treated in many ways, and yet quite darkly.

1) The original edition has correctly according to the Vulgate: istos. All editions except Weimar's have changed this to sustos.

2) Vulgate: vixit euiiu in wr<le suo: Aon movel>or a ^euerutioue in heuern tiouem sink mulo.

3) It seems necessary to us that a punctuation mark is put here, because Luther promised to put the distinctive signs as they are in Hebrew; but there an athnach is put. Without this punctuation mark, what Luther says of Jerome's translation would not apply either: sliter äistinAueus. - Basel edition: in ^eueratione instead of: in AknstrationIn in the other editions.

4) Erlanger: 124.

5) Vulgate: Oufus luuleäietioue os Plenum est, et amarituäine et <lolo, sud lin^ua efus ludor et äolor.

6) In the Basel and original editions, correctly according to the Vulgate count: ks. 23. In the Erlanger, the incorrect improvement is: "sl5.Ä", which is also found in the Wittenberg and Jena editions.

has left. It is my conviction that, because he punishes the [wrong] use of the mouth and tongue, he is speaking of those who work on the word, that is, of the priests, the bishops, the teachers and the ministers of the word among the people, therefore he cannot be understood by those who privately rage with curses and abuse, but by the cursing that takes place in teaching and harms the people under the appearance of blessing. For when the word of God is preached in truth, grace and blessing are preached, as it is said in Rom. 1:16: "The gospel is the power of God, which makes blessed everyone who believes in it." This blessing was promised to Abraham a long time ago, Gen. 12:3. But even though I have abundantly treated the meaning of this verse in the 5th Psalm, v. 10, where it says: "In their mouth there is nothing certain," it is still worth the effort to treat it more often, because an ungodly teacher is such a powerful monster that can do much harm.

55 First of all, like everything else, he speaks this verse out of a fierce spirit, calling their teaching cursing and cursing, which they persuade the people is a blessing. Of these people the apostle says Rom. 16, 18.: "Who by sweet words and glorious speeches (benedictiones) deceive the innocent hearts." Isa. 3, 12.: "My people, thy comforters deceive thee." But the apostle also foretold in the Epistle to Timothy [2 Ep. 4, 3.] that teachers would be after their ears itched. These flattering sermons he now calls (as they are in truth) curses, as also Malachi Cap. 2, 2. says: "I will curse your blessings."

56 Then how great a spirit is in the word, "His mouth is full. It would have been easier if his mouth spoke the curse; but now it is full; he speaks nothing else, but whereby the people are cursed by God. This verse would also have moved me to understand the Psalm of the Antichrist, if I did not see that today the great ones of the Church and the elect in Israel, entangled in the same ungodliness by human statutes and earthly worldly wisdom, have nothing else to do with than to put their teachings (that is, their curses) into the People drive after the gospel of Christ (as they speak) is put under the bank.

For if I were to expound the administration of the church, as it is done today by the clergy and rulers of the church, in a proper, skillful, adequate, detailed and perfect speech, I would recite this psalm. For it has come to this with the impudent godlessness of our time, that if you asked them why they would not hear the gospel? they would answer you: they would have to pay for it; much of their income and their tyranny would go, then also many quite unreasonable laws would be abolished, and what is most terrible, the church and the clergy would have to be reformed. Then, however, the pomp, the pride, the dominion and the dealings of the world would also fall, and one would have to devote oneself to the service of the Word and to prayer, and live in poverty according to the example of the apostles, and stand in danger of one's life for the sake of the truth. So that this does not happen [they say], we would rather preach everything, even if the souls of the people may obtain the course through it, or something else more annoying.

(58) Thus it comes about that I do not dare to say that the Antichrist has already come, but I also cannot deny that everything that is going on rhymes completely with the Antichrist. And it troubles me not a little that almost all saints and our predecessors unanimously, as if the Holy Spirit had been their teacher, have drawn this psalm to the Antichrist, and we must nevertheless, if we do not want to deny the meaning, necessarily admit that this psalm is fulfilled today down to the smallest tittle and letter.

59 [Vulg. "Full of bitterness and deceit" or more correctly: "Full of falsehood and avarice" or: Full of usury and deceit. We have in the 5th Psalm

125 ff.] said that the ungodly teachers teach in such a way that they deceive the people and act falsely only to fill their belly, as also Paul says 1 Tim. 6, 5. "Those who think that godliness is a trade," and again Rom. 16, 18. "For such serve their belly" [Ps. 5, 10.:] "whose jaws are an open grave." It may have been the Holy Spirit

He wanted to say "simony", but he foresaw that extremely astute gloss-makers would come who would invent that simony is human right. Therefore, he rather said avarice, or fraud, or usury, which are divine rights that they cannot deny. Whoever does not recognize this, let him take heed of the decrees, decrees, and distinctions of our school theologians, 1) in which, as they themselves confess, hardly anything other than avarice, fraud, and tyranny is manifested. For by this example we shall the more easily understand this verse, because the matter is brought home to us and set before our eyes.

60. the word [in the Vulgate] "bitterness," which has not been accepted without God's will for so long a time and by common usage, I do not wish to reject, because flattery and human statutes, as much as they are gentle and pleasing to the carnal sense, will nevertheless afterwards embitter the conscience, since, not knowing Christ, they begin to be judged according to their works.

(61) "Toil and labor" (that is XXX and XXX we have treated in the 7th Psalm [§ 85], and said that XXX actually means toil (dolorem), which the Latin translator has translated here by labor, and that labor (laborem) means what he has rendered here by dolor. Here he praises the teachings of man quite excellently. For what does man have from all these but a troubled, miserable and tormented conscience? It is really and truly toil and labor under their tongues. And, alas, innumerable such people have been brought to ruin in the last three hundred years from the right and from scholastic theology. For thus we speak of the example half: Whether 2) it can be possible that another Antichrist comes, who will make it even worse? And it happens rightly that they, as much as they are tickled by heart by the doctrine of ungodliness, by means of which they have been

They prepare an easy access to heaven, yet inwardly, being without faith, they are tormented by the unhappy presumption of leading a good life, and labor very much, but labor in vain, so that with their generation, as it is said in the Book of Wisdom Cap. 5, 7 [Vulg.], "grow weary in the way of corruption and iniquity, and walk in difficult paths," and as Ps. 13, 3. [Vulg.] will be said [Rom. 3, 17. 16.], "know not the way of peace, and in their ways is vain accident and heartache," and as he said above [v. 5.], their ways are full of pain (parturiant [§ 41. 44]). This is the people of Ammon, the people of sorrow, 3) who were born through the abuse of their father, that is, through the drunken and corrupt teaching of the law. Although the law gives testimony of the righteousness that is valid before God, which comes from faith in Christ, they draw it to their own righteousness through their human opinions, and place it in free will.

(62) Behold, therefore, what it is to teach the people without Christ. For what he says here, "His mouth is full of cursing," he expressed above in the 5th Psalm [v. 10, Vulg.] thus, "For in their mouth is not truth," or what is right and good; and what is given here by "falsehood" or "bitterness" is there called, "Their inwardness is heartache," or their heart is vain. Here it is given by "avarice" or "usury" or "deceit"; there, "Their jaws are an open grave"; here: "His tongue sets up toil and labor"; there, "With their tongue they flatter" [Ps. 5, § 139 ff.] or, "With their tongues they dissemble." For here he says, not in vain, "under their tongue," indicating that, according to the tongue or the appearance, where it falls on the senses, the speech seems to be good in the eyes of those [who hear it], for their tongue is then flattering and smooth, but underneath and in fact there is toil and labor. So even this verse agrees with that verse in all things, but also the vehemence of the spirit is not dissimilar in both places, as has been shown in the emphasis and meaning of the words in both psalms.

1) In the original edition and in the Basel edition, the text reads: RÄÜotkeuu, but in the Wittenberg and Jena editions: Lla'istros nostros.

2) In the Basel: sie instead of: si, probably a misprint.

3) Cf. Walch, St. Louiser Ausg., Vol. III, 319 ff, § 23 ff.

V. 8. he sitteth and lieth in wait in the courts, he slayeth the innocent in secret, his eyes keep upon the poor. 1)

Jerome has it thus: Sedet insidians juxta vestibula, in occultis interficit innocentem, oculi ejus robustos circumspiciunt. Therefore I wonder from what spirit our Latin interpreter said "cum divitibus" [with the rich], since in Hebrew there is neither the preposition cum [Vulg.], nor juxta [Hieron.], nor ut, and the expression XXXXX is simply put, which means a homestead (villam) or a forecourt, as Neuchlin says. Jerome also indicates this by translating vestibula [Vorhalten]. Should this perhaps have happened because the forecourts or porches of the rich tend to be besieged by a large crowd of people? or because forecourts and porches are actually found only among the rich? Furthermore, I do not like at all that Jerome translated "the strong" instead of: "the poor".

(64) Putting aside for the moment what others have said in this place, I will present my view. It seems to me that the prophet continues with the description of the shameful understanding and the way of the wicked, which they have in teaching. For he had said in the previous verse what their teaching was and what fruits it brought, namely cursing, avarice, deceit, sadness and labor. Now in this verse he describes how they behave against the godly teachers who teach what goes against them. For a teacher must not only teach his own thing, but also refute that which is strange, which the wicked diligently seek to do and do. But since they cannot do this on good grounds and in truth (as they cannot do it in truth), they turn to the last recourse of their virtue, namely, to force and cunning, that they forbid anyone to contradict or teach otherwise; then, if anyone contradicts, they kill him for no other cause than that he has taught contrary to their prohibition; finally, that they set up everywhere people who observe such teachers, since they are the ones who teach contrary things.

by delivering the same to them, and so they extinguish the gospel of Christ, and only the doctrine of men reigns.

How beautifully I could cite an example 2) that falls into our days, if I did not fear that they would only become worse through the truth. And certainly, not to mention the Turk, if our heretical judges and interpreters of human scripture have not fulfilled or are not fulfilling this verse already for a long time, they nevertheless give a very strong prelude to the Antichrist, and make the meaning of it clear to us by their example, which I want to have said with their kind permission.

First, the Antichrist will arrogate to himself alone the right to interpret the Scriptures as the Turk began, and will force the mind of all others to submit to his own; indeed, he will not allow anyone to doubt that his voice is the voice of Christ. One must not say to him, "Why are you doing this?" even if one argues with a thousand apostles against him. And this ungodliness of his will favor very many, and especially those who are something important in this life, namely the great ones, the teachers, the clergy. For he will not take away the gospel freely and openly, but by these deceitful artifices and covertly working violence.

Therefore St. Augustine says in this passage: The first persecution of the church was done with violence by the princes of the world; the second with deceit by the heretics; the third will happen at the same time with violence and deceit, because the worldly and spiritual rulers will come together in one person against the Lord and His anointed. This is what he says: "He sitteth and lieth in wait," that is, he is a deceitful and pernicious teacher, as it is said in Ps. 1:1: "He sitteth not where the scoffers sit." For he does not teach Christ, but in the most cunning way and with all artifices deals with the fact that he alone sits, that all hear him alone, that he alone assumes mastery (magisterium) over all, that he is the arbiter of everything that happens in the church.

1) Vulgate: Lsäst in insiäis onna äivitudus in oocultis, ut intertieut innooentern, oeuli ssus in ^Luperern respioiunt.

2) Luther undoubtedly has Silvester Prierias in mind, which is also indicated by the immediately following nostri pravitati8 in^uisitores. Cf. Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, introduction p. 16 ff.

He wants to condemn and approve whatever he likes, especially what is important against or for his tyranny, because he will not care much about anything else.

(68) But this deceitful power to teach, he will fix by force and power; otherwise the deceit would not last long, if it were not fixed by force, if good men were left free to judge, to dispute, to doubt about its reputation and its doctrine. Therefore, in order that instead of the articles of faith his opinion (be it as it may) may prevail, he will freely and publicly fortify before all the world his deceitful sitting in the courts next to the porches or (as the Holy Spirit has not badly let our Latin translator err in the word) "with the rich. For why did he not mean to say "in the court," but in the majority "in the courts," or in the porches? This was done for no other reason than that in all churches, schools, universities, consistories, and in general in all places where either divine things are handled, or where God's word is delivered, or human things are dealt with, the sitting, the standing, the teaching, the commandment of this [Antichrist] is approved, strengthened, and worshipped, not only by the rude rabble, but by the mighty, the rich, the wise, and the priests. For the courts or porches certainly denote in Scripture an outward place where people can gather, which is separate from the holy of holies (adytis) and the altars and the choir of the priests, as is evident from the 2nd book of Moses [Cap. 40] and other passages.

If I could take something out of the Hebrew language, I would translate this part of the verse like this: He sits in the ambush of the courts, since for itself (absolute) is put without a closer indication and without any more precise designation, so that the sense is: The courts, which are taken with art and deceit, or prepared to execute his wiles and deceits, will be his chair, and in all things he alone will be the master, since we have said in the first Psalm [§ 10] that

The word "fitzen" means to be a master or a teacher, because through these courts he will strengthen his reputation in the most deceitful way. For who should dare to contradict all the churches, schools, and courts? since it is an exceedingly apparent ground of proof, taken from the multitude and greatness of men, and from the length of times, by which alone he will probably have enough ambush to sit and rule securely. Now if someone wants to understand by the ambush of the courts the deceitfulness of the rich (because they have courts and large possessions), he would perhaps not protect our Latin translator in an unrighteous way, who seems to speak of the wealth, splendor and pride of the churches and bishops, by which the wicked Antichrist will fortify his seat.

Secondly: "He strangles the innocent secretly", that is, every man who, according to his judgment, is heretical, rebellious, disobedient, rebellious, offensive to Christian ears, because he has confessed the truth of the Gospel, and has also been guilty of insulting the majesty and dishonoring the seat of the Antichrist. But he will kill him secretly, 1) because even the deception fortified by force is not sufficiently safe from the light of the evangelical truth, if he would allow it to be implanted in the hearts of men. Therefore, the innocent must be killed in such a way that the righteousness of his cause is not revealed, must also be overcome not by the prestige of the Word of God, but by the prestige of the deceitful chair of the courts. Just as John the Baptist in prison exemplified it by his bodily death, so the voice of the gospel, without the matter being investigated or accounted for, must be hushed in secret, and he who preaches it must be killed or even burned. For what is "killing secretly" (as some martyrs were killed, namely Gervasius and Prothasius) other than killing without cause or for a false cause, in that an uprising among the people is feared if the true facts were to come to light? For as it is said of one who has been killed secretly: One does not know where and how he perished, so the same can be said of the unjustly killed.

(71) But the Spirit says "secretly," so far as it is from the eyes of godly men, that is, from their own, 1) since the thing in which they innocently perish is unknown to them. By the way, the wicked, who is hardened in his tyranny, boasts that the matter is quite evident, because he has been contradicted. Therefore no one [that is, no godless one] dares to say that someone was killed by him secretly, but he did everything in the light of the revealed truth. About these secret things one says in German in the proverb: "Es geht zu unter dem Hütlein" [It happens under the little hat], so that one must understand the secret here, not of the body or things, but of the tricks, processes, judgments, by which not the sensual perception, but the understanding is deceived, "that one makes a nose", where outwardly a thing is pretended, and inwardly, secretly, no thing is. Whether nowadays only the Turk does such abominations, I leave to the insightful reader.

Thirdly: "His eyes are on the poor. Namely, the deceiver is so utterly fearful that he fears even the poor, even though he sits with the rich and is fortified by all the mighty, because his evil conscience knows very well the favor that truth has and its power. As soon as it is revealed it pulls the hearts of all people to itself, and leaves the deception naked and disgraced. Therefore it is not enough for the antichrist tyranny that it has fortified itself by the power of kings, princes, sages, teachers, so-called saints (sanctulorum) and the rich, it is not enough for it that it has killed the innocent, but a guard of the Philistines 2) must also be posted, and everywhere there must be laureates and guards on standby, who must watch the poor man so that he may not muckle and give new trouble to the seat of the deceitful courts.

73. And so he imitates the customs of the universities, in which it is sworn that no one should recite doctrines that are against the holy church and against some articles of men, who may be taken for the eyes of the church, but not for the ears of Christ, since they, deaf to the gospel everywhere, pay such sharp attention to what is said against the opinions and propositions of men that Christ himself, who penetrated through the closed doors, could not escape the sharpness of these eyes, so keenly attentive to what is brought forward against the opinions and statutes of men, that Christ himself, penetrating through the closed doors, could not escape the sharpness of these eyes, nay, in many things would be found to be a heretic and to have spoken against the holy see. Therefore the word respiciunt does not denote a bad look, but one that is done with close observation and care, as the watchmen in the guardhouse take care and look closely, so that the enemies do not do anything [unobserved]. Hence a watchman (speculator) is the one whom the Greeks call ἐπίσκοπος [bishop]. Ezek. 3, 17. reads, "Son of man, I have made thee a watchman over the house of Israel." The emphasis that lies in this word indicates the fearfulness of godless tyranny in this passage. No less do the words: "his eyes" and "the poor", namely, that he is directed with all care to it and with the eyes (which are capable of much before the other members) has attention to it, that danger does not break in for him from another side.

1) How this passage is to be understood follows with certainty from § 77, where Luther recapitulates what has been said here. It says there: "utrupiuut Mupsroui, ut in so vorko ant opere onin oapiant st duinnsnt, Huoü sidl iMotrn psnitusHus ooenltnrn With 6886 äarnnadile. Uixiinn sniin s§ 71^ oaaultnin sta." It follows that the reading of the original edition: icl sst, snis and in the second following sentence: oooinm u 86 and: a ss Msta is correct. It is also entirely appropriate to the context. In the editions, snis is changed to: iUorunr; the first u 86 to: ah 60; the second L 86 to: ad iUo. Only in the Wittenberg has u 86 been left in the last place <probably by mistake>. Under the N6INO is of course, as under the 86, "the godless" zn understood, because the godly would not be able to say: irr Inas apsrta vsritatis omnin usi illo Zesta sv88tz]. - The Weimar has the correct reading.

2) The expression 8tatio l>üi18tänoruii is probably due to Richt. IN, 9. 12. where what Luther translated by: "One held upon him" in the Vulgate is expressed by: Dat6ntipo8 iusiüim and iu8iüi8 prusparuti8 [there was an ambush laid^.

V. 9: He lurks in secret, like a lion in the den, lurking to catch the wretch, and he catches him when he draws him into his net.

All this is one verse in the Hebrew, what with us [in Latin] is divided into three verses. This erroneous way of speaking: Rapere pauperem ["and heal him"] is sufficiently censured by many, since it should have been said: Rapiet pauperem ["and heal him"]: Rapiet pauperem. But this verse is easy to understand from the three virtues of tyranny mentioned before, which are interpreted in the previous verse 66. 70. 72]. For he goes on to say what his eyes do while they are on the poor. Namely, just as a lion, greedy to rob and devour, lies in wait on his camp for the opportunity to see if a beast will strike him unawares and fall into his hands through his safety, so in the time of the Antichrist there will be people who not only forbid the poor to hear even a sound of the Gospel, but also watch over him in this way, but will also lie in wait for him in such a way that, if he should say or do anything unawares, which they can twist by force or trickery, and point forcibly to such a meaning as is contrary to the holy seat of that beast, they will immediately cry out after the manner of our people [the papists]: Into the fire! while the one who said it either never thought of such a meaning, or never wanted to put it forward. Yes, even if he has spoken something so carefully that he can fear no danger, it will still be the task of those people to slander what has been spoken exceedingly correctly, to catch Christ in his speech with the Jews, and to find poison in an innocent syllable, like the spider in the rose.

75 But they do not do this out of foolish advice, since they certainly know and are taught by experience that the rule of tyranny is not at all secure and happy if it only destroys those who, either convicted of a right cause or suspected by a pretended cause, can be put aside (traduci), but also, as an example and to the horror of all others, those must be plagued who have walked simply and calmly.

and feared nothing less than that they might one day fall into this trap: so that there is no one who need not fear the tyrant, even if he relies on his good conscience and is not aware of any plot against the tyrant. Thus it is said in Micah 2:8 [Vulg.], "Those who walked in evil and righteousness, you have put in distress of war."

Through these attacks it will happen that not only none of the wretched will dare to protest or even make a sound for the gospel, but such a security will be prepared for tyranny that all will necessarily accept as Christ's voice under the name of Christ what they always want to teach, set, change or change again for their opinions and inclinations. Then they will also rage in such a way for their own sake, so that their office will not be idle and they will gain too little honor among men. For if it were to perish through disuse and rust, it is to be feared that the teachers and protectors of truth would be deprived in the future life of the crown of honor due them by merit of dignity (merito condigni). So that this does not happen, they must ensure that they torture even the most innocent for the sake of sacred truth.

Now see what it means "that those lurk in secret, like a lion in a cave, to catch the wretch," namely, that with the intention of ruining him, they create an opportunity to catch the wretch, that they catch and condemn him in such a word or work, of which it was unknown to him and entirely hidden, that it would be damnable. For we have said [§ 71] that "the secret thing" in this place is that which is concealed by artifice and skill, by pretending to something, other, on account of which the wretch is accused, than is inward in truth, on account of which he could not be accused, yea, for which he ought to be commended, or, as Christ says [John 3:20.], they hate the light, and the apostle [1 Tim. 4. 2.], "They are in glibness liars." Of this more will be said in the following Psalms. But the lion's rage, which aims at the fortification of tyranny, needs these arts for its robbery.

Therefore, at the time of the Antichrist, no one will be safe in public, nor will they dare to confess Christ, just as they do not today before the heretic court. And this is perhaps what is so often foretold by visions and prophecies, that the Christians will flee into the caves of the rocks and the deserts of the forests. For who can be sure when those are in danger who do not even think of speaking against the Antichrist, and, because they may have spoken something unawares and without knowing it, are forced to deny and recant Christ, and to worship the holy treacherous throne in its courts?

Then he sufficiently indicates that the princes, kings, priests, monks and everything that has a great name will be on the side of the Antichrist, since he mentions that only the poor and oppressed will suffer. It would not be a great deception and tyranny worthy of Antichrist if he had not drawn the nobler and better part of the church into his plots. For he shall reign in Babylon and in Rome itself, and all the precious vessels, the king and the queen, and the cut ones, the royal boys, he shall lead into his captivity, as the Babylonian captivity of Israel exemplifies.

80 What follows: "He catches him when he draws him into his net" seems to be said for explanation, so that no one understands the catching of the wretch differently than it is said, that is, they will catch him in his speech, if they cannot find anything else by which they would like to prove that he has obviously spoken against the holy chair of the Antichrist. For he does not speak here of a bodily catch, of which the following verse will be about, but (as I have said) of a spiritual one, which they have prepared in secret by means of the reenactments; and these reenactments he calls a net or a rope. We could prove this quite nicely with examples, if these were not already abundant by themselves in our time.

v. 10: He crushes, and presses down, and violently pushes the poor to the ground. 1)

The confusion both in the division and in the interpretation has caused that everywhere this verse is understood of the fall of the Antichrist. But Jerome translates it thus: Et confractum subjiciet, et irruet viribus suis valenter [and he will subdue the broken one, and with all his powers will fall upon him mightily]. And our Latin translator has not translated the first part badly, because the pronouns eum and se are omitted, which are not in Hebrew, and the connective word et (although it is not in Hebrew according to the peculiarity of the language) is placed between both verba, namely thus: Humiliabit et inclinabit, namely the wretched. For the former verb means to crush, to break, to smash; the latter to bow down, to bend, to throw to the ground, as Renchlin says.

The second part reads like this in Hebrew: And he shall fall in his strength upon the poor; which the Latin interpreter has almost rendered according to the sense, because "to fall in his strength" or "to fall upon someone with all his strength" is as much as to have the upper hand and to rule (dominari); only that Johann Reuchlin thinks that instead of the "poor" in a compound word 2) is said, the assembly of the suffering and oppressed, where Jerome has placed the adverbium valenter, as he has translated above [§ 63] in a similar expression "the strong" for the poor. But he may have had another word in mind.

So the meaning is: If the Antichrist and his lurkers have drawn the wretch into their net and caught him in his speech, there is no mercy at all, and it must be a lesser sin to have denied God and His works and His word than to have attacked this chair of deceit. Here the wretch is crushed and made to nothing, here one throws oneself with all power on the oppressed people. To this frenzy of the Antichrist (however it may stand about the Turk) the satellites and flatterers of the church have long since arrived according to their power and their representation 3), since

They laugh at the sins committed against God and no longer consider them sins: so much is lacking that they should fall upon them, or that they should be careful here, that they should use even the thousandth part of their office or their powers here.

By the way, if you doubt his statutes and whether he is a mixed god and man, whether he is an earthly lord of the world, if you should also fail me in one syllable, then you will be pulled into the net and crushed, and they will fall upon you with all their might. They are not satisfied with the sword and the thunderbolts of the verdict with so many curses that you are hardly able to read through them, but they also call on the help of the worldly arm and the power of the whole world; so much is at stake to protect the tyrannical chair, so that it seems to me that the prophet has with these words: "He pushes to the ground (the poor) with violence", wanted to indicate this tyranny of ours (the papists), whether for the antichrist or in the antichrist. Although we all see that this tyranny only seeks its own with the most shameful attacks and neglects what is God's in the most despicable way, we do not dare to protest against it.

Therefore humiliabit ("he breaks") and inclinabit ("he presses down") are not understood from the person of the Antichrist, but from his tyrannical procedure against the poor, just as also the [Vulg.]: "He will fall upon them, when he will rule", indicates likewise his violence. For from this violence in falling upon someone "the giants" 1 Mos. 6, 4. have their name XXXXX, that is, the falling ones, or those who fall upon someone, because (so it is said) they were mighty in the world and famous people, that is, tyrants, who by their own power fell upon the poor and oppressed them, as also of Nimrod 1 Mos. 10, 8. f.: "He began to be a mighty (that is, a violent) lord on earth, and a mighty hunter before the Lord."

V. 11. He says in his heart: God has forgotten, he has hidden his face, he will never see it.

Again, the wicked do not say this (as some think), that they believe that God is not an avenger of evil, or that they do not care about the affairs of men, since they do everything under the name of the Lord, as Christ predicted Matt. 24:5. foretold, "Many shall come under my name," but [it is said] that they are so sure, and so utterly without fear of God, that they make themselves think that God has forgotten the poor, and stands for them against the poor, as the following verse indicates, where it is said: "Forget not the wretched," and He has not only forgotten them, but has also hidden His face from them and turned away from them, so that He will never look after them in eternity, although in truth there are exceedingly many today who do not believe that the soul is immortal and that there will be retribution in the future judgment.

This exceedingly great obstinacy and stubborn presumption of the wicked he punishes in this verse, because by it they provoke the godly to blasphemy against the spirit, as they said to Christ on the cross [Matth. 27, 43]: "If he is the Son of God, save him now, lusts for him. For they are not content with corrupting the godly, but also blaspheme and reproach them for despairing of God's help, or at least presume to do so, as is more fully described in the third Psalm [§ 16 f.]. And here is the end and the highest of what the wicked are capable of. Therefore now follows the second part of the psalm, in which the prophet prays and prophesies for the godly against the wicked, saying:

V. 12. Arise, Lord God, lift up your hand, do not forget the wretched.

88. the wicked say that you forget the wretched, but rise up and raise your power, by which you destroy what is and raise up what is not, and they may be delivered to their wickedness. We have often remembered that through this we can be taught that we should put away vengeance and leave it to God, and seek help through prayer alone, despairing of our strength.

89. I believe that it is known of this expression "to raise the hand" or increase that it stands for: to show and exercise the power, which is spoken about in the 4th Psalm, v. 7 [§ 66].

has been, and we shall have the same mode of speech more often afterward, as [Ps. 74:3. Vulg.], "Lift up thy hands upon their hope," and Isa. 49:22, "Behold, I will lift up mine hand unto the Gentiles."

I believe that just as the previous psalm, which has almost the same content, described the times of the martyrs, so this psalm describes the times until the end of the world, so that it not only deals with the Antichrist, but also with all the godless tyrants in the church after the time of the martyrs and the teachers, who raged until the end of the world. Of these the apostle 2 Tim. 3, 5, foretold that they are people who have the appearance of a godly being, but deny his power, which no one can improve or reform but he who will put an end to the wicked by the appearance of his future [2 Thess. 2, 8.]. In the meantime, the wicked will become more and more wicked until the end.

That is why I have almost certainly despaired of a general reformation of the Church. For, I beg you, with how many councils has a reformation of the church been attempted after the times of the martyrs and teachers! What has been promoted by the Council of Constance, what by the Council of Basle, to say nothing of the play of the last Council 1)? Who then is the Holy Spirit, who, where a lawful (as they boast) synod has been assembled, cares nothing for the betterment of his church, but only spoils with ceremonies all the days of the council?

Therefore, I think that this verse calling on the Lord to arise and show His power refers to the Day of Judgment, which is also confirmed by what follows. Therefore, there is no doubt, that in our time, indeed, for more than three centuries, what this psalm speaks of is going on and has been going on in full swing.

V. 13. Why should the wicked blaspheme God and say in his heart: You do not ask for it? [Vulg.: non requiret.]

93. Namely, blasphemy or mockery hurts the most, so the prophet deals with it first and foremost and accuses it. For if the afflictions are borne in good conscience toward God, they are not at all severe; but if a conscience is tormented with the thought that God is against him, then they are unbearable.

But in this verse he reproduces and rejects what the wicked had said [v. 11]: "He has hidden his face and will never see it," as he had rejected the forgetfulness of God in the previous verse. For by these spiritual verses we must admonish ourselves when blasphemy and despair in tribulations torment our conscience. For then, according to the counsel and example of this verse, we must push back and turn back the blasphemy to the one who instigates it and to his head, just as those who are well taught and experienced in these things have taught.

95. For it is indeed blasphemy to say that God forgets the poor and hides His face and does not inquire after them, since He commanded in the first commandment that one believe in Him and hope in Him, and in the second that one call upon His name, and in the third that one wait for His work 2). Why then does the wicked provoke God, ascribing to Him that He forgets the poor, contrary to the express commandment in which He makes His will known?

96. this is something trifling, that in the Hebrew it is said in the second person, "You do not ask for it" (in the Vulgate: non requiret; only that [by the Hebrew] a more ardent movement of heart is indicated thereby, and a stronger encouragement against the spirit of blasphemy, since he confidently turns to GOD, accuses the devil, and abhors him.

shuns, justifies God and His commandments, and thus seeks His benevolence, and arouses the hatred of God's adversary; not as if God needs these things in order to be moved, but we are to arm ourselves and strengthen ourselves with such art, so that we do not succumb in faith and hope.

V. 14: You see, for you see the misery and distress, it is in your hands; the poor command you, you are the helper of the fatherless. 1)

97. He says without further specification (absolute): "You see", in order to raise confidence against the blasphemy of the wicked, as if he wanted to say: Thou art seeing and an overseer of all things; thou hast not forgotten us, neither hast thou turned against us, as the wicked man imputes to us. Therefore thou also lookest, and art mindful of toil and labor (laborem et dolorem); for so accurately dost thou see that thou also dost take heed, let alone that thou shouldst hide thyself and forget.

Most people refer "toil and labor" (laborem et dolorem) to the wretched, Augustine also to God. In my opinion, it is to be referred to the wicked. For labor is here what is said above [§ 61] [v. 7. 1: "Under his tongue is labor." But instead of dolor, the Hebrew text has "raging," as Jerome also translated, and Augustine reads "wrath" in his text, which caused him to think of the weighting (labore) and wrath of GOD. Therefore, in my opinion, the prophet here calls "work" the futile and exceedingly laborious undertaking to prepare reenactments and to practice treachery, by which (as we have said) he brings about his own, but "toil" or "raging" the violence and impetuosity with which he fortifies his treacherous tyranny, as if the Spirit wanted to say: You are most attentive to both the wickedness and the violence of the ungodly; to his wickedness in words (to use Augustine's words), to his violence in rule, with which he opposes your saints.

For the false and deceitful have need of violence; indeed, falsehood is so powerless that it cannot help but rage and use violence when it begins to be revealed. For this is how the princes of darkness, after they had possessed the world with many powerful errors and falsehoods with long-lasting idolatry, flared up fiercely and began to rage against the apostles and martyrs who set out to expose this falsehood. This is what every wicked person does to protect his falsehood, as the examples of our time also show.

Therefore the Spirit encourages us so that the presumption of the wicked will not make us fainthearted, and teaches us that both the deceit and the violence of the wicked are not hidden from God, whatever artifice they use against the saints.

101 And "he looks" in such a way that it should not end with the looking, and the wicked should go unpunished, but [Vulg.] "that you deliver them into your hands. Jerome has more appropriately: that he be delivered into thy hand. For the pronoun "they" is not in the text, and he speaks of the ungodly in the singular. But: "Terrible it is to fall into the hands of the living God," as the apostle Hebr. 10, 31. speaks in thunder sounds, because there is no one who could snatch him out, as it is said in Ps. 50, 22: "Mark this, you who forget God, that I do not even snatch, and there is no more Savior." Speaking in the same way it is also said in Ps. 21, 9: "Your hand will find all your enemies." And this seems to be taken from the Law of Moses and other books of the Old Testament (instrumenti), in which we very often read that the enemies are given into the hands of the children of Israel, and again, the children of Israel into the hands of the enemies, as often as we read that vengeance is taken, or should be taken.

Therefore, also here "to be delivered into the hands of GOD" means to be punished by GOD as an avenger who punishes with eternal vengeance. From this we understand what I

1) Vulgate: Viäes, Huortiam tu ladoreru et äoloreiu eousiäerus, ut traäas eos in ruaius tua". Hdi äereliotus est pauper, orxUano tu eris ääjutor.

I have said that the prophet in this psalm speaks of those who will be seized at the end of the world in the last judgment, after their ungodliness in the whole world has become so rampant that one must despair of their correction. For those who can be corrected he does not deliver into his hands, but as is said in the 89th Psalm, v. 33. "I will punish their sin with a rod, and their iniquity with plagues." Of these he now says:

103 [Vulg.:] "On you the poor is dependent." Here Jerome translates again [XXXX, as § 63 and § 82] "the strong." Of the many words by which the sacred language names the poor (so much does it lend itself to holiness and poverty), three are set in this psalm: XXXX, which signifies a poor man par excellence, XXX, which signifies more a sufferer and afflicted one, and XXXX, which actually signifies one oppressed and suffering violence. Besides these, there is also the one in the preceding Psalm, v. 10: "And the Lord is the shelter of XX", that is, of the poor; likewise XX and XX and XXXX. The difference of all these words is perhaps not necessary, even here not at the place.

104 But the Hebrews are able to do this very well, if they pay attention to the descent. For come from crushing and breaking; XX from making small and drying up;

XX from the sorrow and sadness of the heart; XXXX from wanting or desiring, because someone lacks what he desires; from the storehouses and containers, because he has none; XX from going to ruin and getting into misery.

105 And in this Psalm especially XXXX is repeated, which Jerome translates from XXX, which signifies strength, as "the strong one". Others want it to be a compound word from the same XXX or XX, which signifies an army or assembly, and XXX,¹) which denotes sorrow and sadness, and understand, as it were, an assembly of mourners and sorrowful ones, which pleases me very well, since the prophet here actually speaks of Those who suffer violence and treachery from the wicked under the pretense of the name of the Lord. The name of the Lord is not to be resisted, and yet the thing undertaken brings great tribulation, and so they suffer in secret. This is what happened to the apostles at the Lord's Supper, who, although they did not dare to punish Judas, were martyred by his treachery, which Christ displayed. More fortunate was the situation of the martyrs and the doctrine, as they fought against the idols and the pagans and the strangers. But the Antichrist will make use of our bishops and spiritual rulers, as he has begun to do in the matters concerning heresy. Since one must obey them in all things in Christ's stead, it will be very dangerous not to obey them; again, there will be the same danger if one obeys them, since here even the elect can be led into error.

Therefore, when we hear that the poor depend on God alone, we must undoubtedly understand this to mean that the great and the rulers will both stand against them in the spiritual and temporal regiment. Since this thing pleases the people and is something great in the eyes of the great multitude, it will easily bring about that the whole world will become subservient to the Antichrist, and they will not take the proof of the truth from the Gospel, but from the fact that there are many of them and the people hold with them, as also some do today.

The same is indicated by the word: "You are the helper of the orphans. It does not matter whether we say "of the orphans" (pupillo, as the Latin translator translates later [v. 18]) or "of the orphans" (orphano). He understands one who is on earth without a father, whose father is in heaven. Thus, at the time of the Antichrist, no one among all men will protect a preacher of the Gospel, but God alone. This is very frightening.

108 For anyone can easily see that the bishops and the great ones in the churches will not be among the number of "underage" as they are nowadays in chariots, on horses and in arms, unless they are first restored to the position in which

1) Thus is to be read without doubt after tz 82. In the Baseler, the Wittenberger and the Jenaer it is found; in the Erlanger: 282; in the Weimarschen: "Oau".

But they will necessarily, for the sake of their temporal goods and the patrimony (patrimoniis) of Christ and the saints, according to their most holy rights, cling to the Antichrist against the poor and the orphans.

V. 15. Break the arm of the wicked, and seek the evil, and his wickedness shall never be found. 1)

The Latin translator has said "sinner" and "sin" instead of "the wicked" and "wickedness," as Jerome more correctly offers: Break the arm of the ungodly and the wicked; one will look for his ungodliness and not find it. In Hebrew, the division seems to be this: Break the arm of the wicked, and search for the wicked, and one will not find his wickedness; so that malignum [wickedness] must be taken as a neuter for malitia [wickedness], and the two pieces, "the arm" and "the wickedness" of the wicked must be put together (but not the wicked and the wicked [malignum]); the one is to be broken, the latter is to be sought, that is, to be demanded in judgment, so that the sense is: Destroy the power and might of Antichrist, and seek malignity, or put it on trial, that his deceitfulness and unworthiness may be revealed and condemned, of which his impiety makes use as instruments. But after his power is destroyed and his wickedness is investigated, and he is thus stripped of both his power and his lift, you will cause his wickedness also to cease completely; wickedness will be disarmed and destroyed. This is it that he says, "His ungodliness will never be found"; not that it is not, but that it is not able to speak in the same way as Deut. 32:26 says, "I will say, Where are they? I will lift up their remembrance among men," and Isa. 14:4: "How is the driver so utterly finished, and there is an end of interest!" For so of those who have perished it is also generally asked and scornfully said, Where are they? Where have they gone?

1) Vulgate: Konter" dravüinm peeetatoris et wnHnaeretnr
^eeetum illinü et non invenietui'.

Therefore one must pay attention to the words that are most appropriately shredded: The arm is broken, wickedness is sought, and both are abolished; but ungodliness remains, only that, where these weapons, power and cunning, are taken from it, it is no longer healthy, that is, it is brought to ruin with the ungodly. This sense (as I have said) is impressed upon me by the division in the Hebrew. But our Latin text can also be drawn to the same meaning in both pieces: "His sin will be searched for, but it will not be found," that is, one will mock the wicked who has been brought to ruin, and one will ask him and say: Where then is he who broke in with his power and deceived 2) with his cunning.

This verse also shows that in this psalm the work of the last judgment is sung about and invoked, because in that time the wicked will be crushed and converted, but in that time their power and wickedness itself will be destroyed. By the way, the wicked remains in his wickedness, and he will not be found, because the Lord will take him away.

112 And the prophet appropriately attaches the right statement to each individual thing: "Break the arm", "search out the evil"; because the apparent power does not need judgment and investigation, it is already judged by the breaking of which it is worthy. But the deceit and the wicked cunning must first be made manifest; the investigation of it itself is its downfall. For as soon as the cunning is recognized, it is immediately without power and already no longer a cunning, but its own disgrace. But if the power is also recognized, it does not therefore cease; nay, if it is recognized, it is strongest, therefore it must be crushed and broken; and the cunning must be disgraced in itself by being made manifest. Then it will be said to the naked, weak, and disgraced wicked: Where is now, you wicked, your wretched wickedness?

v. 16. the LORD is king forever and ever, the heathen must perish from his land. 1)

Jerome and the Hebrew text: The LORD is King forever and ever; the Gentiles have perished from his land. But it is the same sense by which we are admonished not to doubt that Christ is King forever, who makes us blessed and destroys the ungodly, however much the ungodly hope the opposite and impose the same on us. Knowing this is most necessary towards the end of the world, when everything will be arranged by the Antichrist in such a way that he will persuade the whole great multitude (as we have said enough) that whatever he does against the godly is done by command and in the name of God.

114. Therefore we are sufficiently warned, and have been abundantly told before, that we should not immediately accept everything that is promised or threatened to us under the prestige of Christ, his apostles Peter and Paul, whether it emanates from the apostolic see at Rome or from any bishop, nor immediately believe it to be true or wholesome, however much it may be strengthened by the applause of the multitude and greatness of the wise and mighty, but look solely to the gospel of Christ as judge and guide, according to the words of Paul 1 Thess. 5:21: "Test all things, and keep that which is good." For if the disciples of the apostles, when the apostles were alive, were subject to this, or fell [so far] as to lead men astray to their opinions, what should not be feared of their successors, after they are dead, and now for so many centuries faithlessness and the wisdom of the flesh have increased? Edom once fell away under King Joram, so as not to be under Judah [2 Kings 8:20], while Isaac had long before subjected it to Jacob [Gen. 27:29]; what wonder, then, if this example be fulfilled in the church, that the world should fall away from Christ?

(115) But if thou shalt be subject to any thing in this matter, thou shalt not long be accounted a Christian and a righteous man. Therefore, in the meantime, your only comfort will be the day of judgment and the faith in which you believe that your Lord is King forever, and that all the wicked will finally perish. For if you do not overcome and see it through this faith, the beautiful appearance of the present things, which is with the ungodly, will soon overthrow you by the false conscience and the vain terror of ungodliness, which accuses you of having offended the majesty of God and man.

116. "From his country." What then is "his"? For [Ps. 115:16.] "the heavens all around are the LORD's, but the earth he hath given to the children of men." The meaning and the intention can perhaps be seen from the word "his", as if he wanted to say: Ye ungodly do so upon the earth, as if ye alone were the gods and lords thereof; ye look not to God, nor to his dominion, though the earth and all things are not yours, but his, who is the King for ever and ever. Since he is king, you shall know that you will finally perish from this land of his. Thus it is said in Job 12:6: "The huts of the spoilers are full, and rage against God, though God hath delivered it into their hands." And Ezek. 29, 3.: "Behold, I will be upon thee, Pharaoh, thou king of Egypt, thou great dragon, which liest in thy waters, saying, The river is mine, and I have made it for myself" 2c.

The wicked also have their being on earth without the fear of God, as if they had made themselves and everything was theirs. He threatens them with the last judgment, that they shall perish from the land of God, which they have subjected themselves to with the most hopeless impiety. Peter also says in 2 Peter 3:7 that heaven and earth will be spared and kept for fire on the day of the condemnation of ungodly men, speaking in the same way as this verse.

2) In the original edition according to the Vulgate: reservuti; Baselxr: reservato; Erlanger: reservuri.

1) Vulgate: Vominu8 regnuditin neternuii et in SLMulum 8L66UÜ, periditis x6nt68 06 t6riA illius.

Perhaps also the word "the Gentiles" has the emphasis and contains a certain indignation of the spirit or a diminishing speech, in this way: You, who should be the people of GOD and the chosen Israel, have now degenerated to your greatest shame into Gentiles, and are now no longer the people, but the enemies of GOD, and will perish. With this way of speaking, Moses very often foretold the Jews that they would soon perish from the land they were entering if they did not keep the commandments of God [Deut. 4:2]. Therefore, by the Gentiles in the land of God must be understood those Christians who confess Christ outwardly, but in reality are Gentiles, for they deny Him with their deeds and possess His land unworthily.

V. 17. You hear the desire of the wretched, Lord; their heart is sure that your ear hears it. 1)

Jerome: You hear the desire of the wretched, O Lord; you have prepared that their heart may hear, or that your ear may hear. It is the same expression "desire" which is put in the beginning of this psalm [v. 3] [Vulg.]: "For the sinner boasts of that which is pleasing to his soul" (in desideriiis). Therefore it must be interpreted in the same way. "The preparation" (praeparationem) our Latin translation attributes to the heart of the wretched, but Jerome and the Hebrew GOtte. Yet, on both sides, the immeasurable willingness of God to hear the wretched is indicated in this way: So ready and willing art thou to hear, that even before they cry out, thou hearest the desire of their heart alone; yea, thou art more impatient of delay to hear than they are to cry out, and desirest that they cry out, that thou mayest have opportunity to hear them; so much doth thy will to hear forestall their desire to cry out, and is ready. Thus it is said in Isa. 65:24: "And it shall come to pass, before they cry, that I will answer; while they yet speak (that is, while their cry or speech is not yet ended), that I will answer them.

1) Vulgate: Ve8iäeriulu pauperuru, exauclivit vomiuu8, praeparationeru eordis eoruru auäivit au1U8 tua.

hear." [Isa. 58:9. "Then shalt thou call, and the LORD shall answer thee: when thou shalt cry, he shall say, Behold, here am I," for I am merciful, the LORD thy GOD [Jer. 3:12.]

By these words we are not only commanded to hope for an answer when we pray, but we are also provoked to pray when we are negligent, since they show us how willing God is to hear us. And although they are cold to him to whom they are not said in the right place and at the proper time (that is, to a secure and sated soul), they are at the same time highly necessary and extremely comforting to the soul of the wretched and afflicted (as he says here). For then everything that is contrary to this is predetermined by the attacks of the godless and blasphemous tyrant and is also felt in this way. Therefore, this is far beyond our reason and comprehension, and it is spoken and understood in the very loud faith of that which one does not see and can only hope for; then one must also despise everything present, as I have often said that the Psalter is a training school of faith and spirit, so that he who reads without faith reads only darkness and cold, and remains without light, without warmth. Faith, however, can only blossom in suffering, and the more severe it is, the more glorious it becomes.

V. 18: That thou mayest do right to the fatherless and to the poor, that man should no longer be ashamed on earth. 2)

Others have already criticized that the Latin interpreter used Greek idiom and said iudicare instead of: ut iudices. 3) He also calls here the one "underage" (pupillo), whom he called above [v. 14.] an "orphan", and humilis is the broken one, the XX [§ 103 f.], whom he called above in the 9. Psalm, v. 19, "the poor", but Jerome calls here "the oppressed", so that we understand the abandoned and with suffering overwhelmed people of Christ. The Hebrew text divides thus: That thou mayest do right to the fatherless and to the poor; no more shall it go forth.

2) Vulgate: luäieare Pupille ei duuili, ut non appouat ultra ruaⁱⁱüeare se üouio super terraru.

3) Erlanger: juelleet.

have (non addet ultra) (or: not eternally), that the man of the earth inspires terror (ad magnificandum). There the verbum addet or apponat seems to me to stand without closer relation (absoluto statu), in this way: Non addet, that is, nothing will be added, it will not increase, but here it will stand still and have an end, it will no longer be that man from the earth be strong and terrible.

And the words in Hebrew have something very beautiful and wonderful grace. First, it is called man, who, according to the origin of this word, is miserable, forgotten and despairing, as we said in the 8th Psalm [§ 58]. With the same is put together in a wonderful contrast and contradiction that lies in the things, that is, that he inspires terror, as if he abhors the impropriety of the thing, that the XXXX, the unhappy man, could presume something so great in this world, that he wants to be considered great, strong, terrible and glorious against the godly by tyrannical violence.

123. after that there is a beautiful play on words in the words "instill terror" [XXX] and "from the earth" [XXX], XXXXXXX XXXX XXXX, and. it includes a great contradiction that it is unseemly that the man who is XXXX about that he is born from the earth and will return to the earth, on the earth and that he is so hopeful of the earth, as if he were speaking the word of Sirach [Sir. 10:9], "Why does the poor earth and the ashes rise up?"

124) Also the word "defy" (magnificare) [XXX] is ambiguous in the Hebrew, in that it means (as Reuchlin says): to be frightened, to be afraid, to be terrified, as the strong and great tyrants are feared, and from this fear, taken passively, they are designated with the other meaning as the fearful and great, the proud and the strong, so that we could not unrhymedly translate this verse also in this way: It will no longer be that he (namely, the underage and poor) fears the man from the earth. In this sense Zacharias speaks Luc. 1, 74. f.: "That we, delivered out of the hand of our enemies, may serve him without fear all our days, in holiness and righteousness pleasing to him." And both understanding and meaning we want to summarize in one and understand the whole verse in this way: Therefore thou, O Lord, hast heard their heart, that thou mightest avenge the cause of the fatherless and afflicted, and that there might be an end at last to the tyrants themselves, the wicked men, with their hopefulness and defiance of the poor; again, the poor, delivered at last, because thou hearest them, and art their judge, henceforth shall not fear, nor be terrified, nor be oppressed by men of the earth. So you see that this psalm sets its goal from the end of the world and the day of judgment.

The eleventh Psalm. *)

V. 1. A Psalm of David to be sung.

I trust in the Lord. How then do you tell my soul to fly like a bird on your mountains?

The holy fathers understood this psalm of the heretics, and rightly so; but by heretics we must understand all.

who teach a righteousness other than the righteousness that is valid before God, such as the Jews and all the value-mongers or all those who trust in their own righteousness, of which the church is full today; especially those who persecute the heretics. For with the first word with which he begins the psalm, "I trust in the Lord," he shows the

*) In the original edition of the Erlanger and in the Baseler from here on the counting of the Psalms is according to the Vulgate, but each time it is indicated next to it, how many Psalms it is in Hebrew. E.g. here: Kalmus äechmus, Ilodruis ünüeeirnis. On the other hand, in the Wittenberg and Jena tue counting of the Vulgate has been dropped and that of the Bible has been adopted. We will do the same.

The purpose (scopum) of the psalm clearly indicates that it wants to speak of the righteousness that comes from faith, which relies on God, against the scheming teachers of works and the flattering appearance of human righteousness. Therefore, in this psalm nothing is said about persecutions, but everything about all kinds of deceit, which Paul attacks with many words in the letter to the Colossians Cap. 2 by saying among other things [v. 8]: "Take heed that no man rob you through philosophy and loose seduction after the doctrine of men, and after the statutes of the world, and not after Christ" 2c.

But he treats these seductive teachers in such a way that he presents them as incorrigible and as such who are kept only for God's judgment; and the godly can also be comforted in this matter by nothing other than the righteous judgment of God. In the meantime, according to the example of Christ [Matth. 15, 14.], they must be let go and allowed to lead the blind as the blind, and, as Paul says [2 Tim. 3, 13.], the longer the worse they become, the more they are deceived and seduced. However, this Psalm is to be referred mainly to the beginning of the Church, to which almost all the prophecies of the prophets have their reference, at which time (for Christ's sake) the greatest turmoil was aroused in the race. Therefore he says:

3. "I trust in the Lord," that is, this is my righteousness, that I believe and hope in the Lord, as it is said in Rom. 1:17, "The righteous shall live by his faith." For this is the rock upon which I have built my house. But you, who presume to teach my soul something else, by doing this or that work, in which I should put my trust, so that I may be saved, I accept you as if you told me to fly erratically, so that I had nowhere a sure and firm conscience, like a bird that leaves its nest and flies astray in the mountains, and turns here and there, and has nowhere its certain home. Thus it is said in Proverbs 27:8: "As a bird is that departeth from his nest, so is he that departeth from his place."

4 However, one does not have to think that those seductive work drivers speak in such a way, since they are in the

On the other hand, they want to consider their own behavior as the most solid and certain foundation of salvation, even more than the rock of true faith and solid righteousness. For they persuade themselves that there is nothing more certain and solid than their own works, just as Obadiah [v. 4] chastises them: "Though thou make thy nest among the stars, yet will I cast thee down from thence, saith the Lord." Same [v. 3.], "The pride of thine heart hath deceived thee, because thou dwellest in the clefts of the rock." 2c. Yes, they boast that they teach nothing but faith, hope, and love, and want it to be they alone who trust in the Lord, and contend for it. But [you will find] that in truth it is so, that if a man obeys them, instead of the well-grounded rock he finds unsteady mountains, and instead of the sure rest unsteady floods of the heart.

(5) For this is the origin of this unremitting and unceasing strife between the truthful and the deceitful, that both claim that their pretensions are well founded until the Lord himself judges, as between Esau and Jacob in the womb of Rebecca [Gen. 25:22 ff], and between the harlots before Solomon, who disputed about the dead and the living son [1 Kings 3:16 ff]. For here the decision of the church is not sufficient, as the sect of the Arians and all heretic cults have proven, until the Lord makes an end in his time, as we are comforted in this Psalm.

(6) Therefore, all those who leave Christ in place and teach in the church their poor works and the ways they have invented to live, as there are now many great fountains of this corruption, which John Tauler also mentions often and very well, do nothing but torture the consciences, always learning and never coming to the knowledge of the truth. These have only the appearance of godliness, but they deny its power; they lead captive the women who are laden with sins [2 Tim. 3, 5-7], for in fact they load them more with sins and put them in trouble than they should release and comfort them. Among these are those who teach about pardons, indulgences, the different ways to confess and countless such follies.

7 So you, says David, want to teach me your things! If I followed you, I would lose my trust in the Lord, like a fleeting bird that has lost its nest. That be far off, I will not follow. Hence the expression transmigra [XXX, it shall flee] in Hebrew denotes a casting out, a movement of fleeing and wandering, as Gen. 4:12: "Inactive and fugitive shalt thou be upon the earth." And afterwards [v. 16.], "He dwelt in the land of Nod," that is, as a fugitive. Hence the sign which the Lord made to Cain, lest he should be slain, namely, the trembling, fits these very deceivers of minds (phrenapatis), because they are never without a trembling and timid conscience, however much they do their good works; yea, after the likeness of their father, they fear to be slain by every man, at every flash of lightning they blanch, and are terrified by the rustling of a flying leaf. For "the wicked have no peace, saith the LORD," Isa. 48:22. but the wicked are like a boisterous sea, and the waves thereof overflow [Isa. 57:20. Vulg.]

(8) I would therefore translate the Hebrew thus: I trust in the Lord; how then do you say to my soul, Fly, bird of the mountain? that is, you shall be like a fleeting bird in the mountains. The adverb "like" is not in the text, because he wants to say: Be an unfaithful bird of the mountain. For it is a figurative speech. And "mountain" here actually means a multitude of mountains, such as are in deserts and forests, remote from the cultivation and intercourse of men, so that it actually indicates a soul that is fleeting, and from the nest on which it relied, cast out into the desert. For the same expression is used here as in Isa. 40:4: "What is mountainous shall become evil," since such mountainous regions are also impassable and difficult to walk on, where he sufficiently indicates that through Christ souls are led back from these mountains, that is, from the mountainous and impassable righteousness to the easy and level righteousness in faith.

9 Then, although such righteousnesses are difficult and full of bends and detours, like such paths in the mountains, they are nevertheless puffed up and hopeful, so that it was necessary to designate them by the high mountains. And so, with the same word, the prophet expressed at the same time the misery and hopefulness of them, since they boast about such a thing, in which they struggle quite miserably, while they should rather lament about it. Above we have heard that this unfortunate state of righteousness is called XXX and XXX, that is, toil and labor.

There is little concern that the Hebrew text for "bird" 1) has the general name XXXX, not the particular "sparrow" [as the Vulgate does].

v. 2: For behold, the wicked draw the bow, and put their arrows upon the sinews, to shoot the pious secretly. 2)

10 Jerome has it thus: For behold, the wicked 3) draw the bow. They put their arrow on the string to shoot secretly those who are righteous of heart. I would like to translate the middle part of the verse like this: They have aimed their arrow at the target (signum). For it seems to me that the Hebrew text speaks of those who want to shoot arrows and aim them at a predetermined target (metam), which is clear from the word "they have aimed. For I find neither "quiver" (pharetram [Vulg.]) nor "sinew" (nervum [Hier.]) actually expressed.

(11) But it is evident that the Psalm speaks of the wicked and hypocrites, of whom we have often said that they are called, walking in their own righteousness, enemies of the righteousness of God, for the sake of God and out of zeal for the truth. But he gives the reason of what has already been said, saying: I have said that the ungodly want me to become like a bird that flees in the mountains, and to leave the nest of my confidence in Christ; I have spoken rightly. For behold, while they teach in the best way, they deceive those who are righteous in heart, and destroy that which you have established. What do they do but make troubled and trembling souls?

(12) This is a very common figurative speech, of the bow and arrows, not only in the Scriptures, but also in proverbs used daily by the people, namely, that the bow is the tongue, or an orator, or the art of speaking; but the arrows are words, suggestions, and the like. Therefore, the ungodly direct their tongues and focus the words of their ungodly teaching to bring only harm and destruction, as it says in John 10:8, 10, 11: "All who came before me were thieves and murderers. A thief cometh not, but to choke and kill. But I am come that they might have life and full satisfaction." Why do you think that the evangelist, when he wrote that Christ spoke this, added this of his own [v. 6.], "But they did not hear what it was that he said to them," as because the wicked cannot understand that they are ravening wolves in sheep's clothing? That is why they certainly teach and also argue about it so persistently, because they make themselves think that they teach exceedingly right things, so that if the Lord alone did not judge here, no man could judge. That is why he does not desire any other judge for them than God, Ps. 5, 11, saying: "Blame (judica) them, God", although nowadays there are people who attach everything to the decisions of the church (that is, of a single man) 1) as if it were impossible for him to err.

(13) "To shoot the pious secretly," that is, to strangle the sheep. For since the doctrine of the wicked is practiced among the people of God, it seeks only to corrupt the godly souls who otherwise live in right and simple faith in God, as the apostle gives us an example of.

to the Galatians. "The wicked devours him who is more righteous than he", says Habakkuk Cap. 1, 13. For what a righteous heart is, has been abundantly said in the preceding Psalms, especially in the seventh 76] and in the ninth 68 f.].

14. "Secretly" (in obscuro) here is a different word [ZZZ-ZZZ] than in the previous one.

Psalms is set [v. 8.ft "He strangles the innocent secretly" [XXXXXXX]. For here be

It means "darkness", which is not produced by art or human ingenuity, but is there by nature and happens as if someone would be wounded unawares at night and in the darkness, where he has not made it dark, but the malicious adversary has made use of the darkness, just as the wolf makes use of the night to attack the sheep. Therefore, "the secret" in this passage is the ignorance and simplicity of the people, which is exposed to the harmful teachers, that they play their game with it, as the apostle says Rom. 16, 18.: "By sweet words and splendid speech they deceive the innocent hearts." For since they, without judgment, are ready to believe anything according to their simplicity, they allow everything without distinction. And this is what makes birds of the air and troubled consciences, since they hear many things, and (as the apostle warned the Hebrews before) (Heb. 13:9.) are carried about with various and strange doctrines, and, as it is said elsewhere [Eph. 4:14.], are swayed by all kinds of winds of doctrine. For these believe every spirit (that is, wind) against the counsel of the wise [1 John 4:1].

15. but he uses spiteful names, "bows" and "arrows," which are deadly instruments, to frighten and warn us against the flattery and the beautiful appearance of the teachings. For the wicked do not mean that they have bows and arrows, but feathers, chests and paws (as it is said in Ezekiel Cap. 13, 18.), for they speak what pleases people and is gentle to them. By this we are instructed that we should know that whatever it is that is taught is deadly, which is gentle to us. For it seems to be pleasant to our senses and our opinion, but in fact they are deadly arrows, as Proverbs 5:3, 4 says:

1) Cf. Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. XVIII, 438 f.

"The lips of the harlot are sweet as honey gum, and her throat is smoother than oil, but afterwards bitter as wormwood and sharp as a two-edged sword."

16 Christ's arrows, on the other hand, are sharp as we feel them, but afterwards they are sweeter than any honey, for they kill to make alive, but those make alive to kill, as it is said in Ezekiel Cap. 13:19. You profane me among my people for a handful of barley and a morsel of bread, so that you condemn to death souls who should not die, and condemn to life souls who should not live, by your lies among my people, who love to hear lies" (credenti mendaciis). What is this, "that the people believe the lies" [Vulg.], but that it is dark and the simple-minded people are exposed to the deceitfulness (ludibrio) of superstition? Therefore, as stated above [§ 8], we must understand it in such a way that the figurative speech in words also indicates to us a picture in things, that something else is going on than one sees before one's eyes. The deceptive teachings seem to be feathers and honeycomb, while they are in fact the bow and arrows of death; on the other hand, Christ's arrows are thought to be the instruments of death, while they serve life.

(17) That he says that they have drawn the bow and put the arrows on the string, or aimed at the target, shows their effort and ungodly zeal. For as Judas with his multitude was more watchful against Christ in the darkness of the night, than the apostles were for Christ, who even slept: so the pernicious teachers are exceedingly diligent to abuse the simplicity of the people to their destruction, while the right shepherds scarcely breathe and live for the people, yea, almost all of them snore; and while the people sleep, the enemy soweth tares [Matt. 13:25]. For when did one watch with so great care (unless you exclude the apostles and a few of their successors) for the people and wholesome doctrine, as the ungodly have watched for their ungodliness? For the glory and gain of this life moves these people more than those the glory and honor of the life to come. For Paul also says of his time that all seek their own [Phil. 2, 4.], how much more must it be understood that he also said this about the following time? And who is today who preaches Christ with so much care as the statutes of the apostolic see and of men? For [this does not happen] because with the teaching of Christ poverty, cross and shame are inevitable, with the deceptive teaching of men glory, goods and life.

(18) So then, if you say that their arrows are ready in the quiver, or put on the string, or aimed at the target, you must understand the same endeavor in which they strive not to teach in vain, but to hit and shoot to the mark, and to wound very many and draw them to their opinion. For they adorn their words, and color them so, they make them splendid, they stretch them, they set them, they direct them so, that it is impossible that a simple soul should not be caught by them. The examples are before my eyes, but I am silent about them. It is enough that by the word "stretch" and "prepare" and "judge" is signified the exceedingly great diligence of the ungodly teachers, with which they desire to speak as little in vain as possible to the simple, yea, if there be one that escapes them, they rush, as we have heard many in our time.

V. 3. for they overthrow the foundation; what shall the righteous do? 1)

19 Jerome: For the laws are destroyed; from this we see that this Psalm indeed understands by "arrows" the doctrines of the godless teachers, who are at all times among the people of God, as it is said in 2 Petr. 2, 1: "There were also false prophets among the people, just as there will be false teachers among you" 2c., and Paul says, Apost. 20, 29. f.: "This I know, that after my departure there shall come among you abominable wolves, which shall not spare the flock. Even from among yourselves shall arise men speaking perverse doctrines, to draw the disciples unto themselves." This and many other terrible things, which have been foretold to us with so much concern, we surely laugh at nowadays, and presume with the highest audacity to tell the miserable

1) Vulgate: Huoviuru, yua" perkeeci, destruxerunt, sustus autem, teit?

The people are not to be taught anything. False teachers also creep in among us and stand up among us; dear one, who can be sure?

The Hebrew text has actually so: Because they have overturned the pillars (positiones). But this word means the established, the ordered, the built, the erected. Therefore, as you can see, our Latin translator has not inappropriately tried to express it by the antithesis: "For what you have built, they have destroyed." Thus it is said in Malachi 1:4: "And if Edom should say: We are ruined, but we will build again the wilderness, thus saith the LORD of hosts, If they build, then will I break down." And Isa. 9:9 ff: "Let all the people of Ephraim and the inhabitants of Samaria take heed, who say with haughtiness and pride, Bricks have fallen, but we will build again with pieces; they have cut down mulberry trees, but we will put cedars in their place."

20. but we have above in the 5th Psalm

158 ff] The prophet says that this construction is understood to be the construction of doctrines, as depicted in the Tower of Babel, where the Lord is always against men, destroying what they build, and they in turn destroy what he builds. Therefore the prophet rightly says here: They tear down what you have erected and ordered, that is (as Jeremiah [Cap. 23, 36.] says): "They pervert the words of the living God", and Micah, Cap. 3, 9. f.: "Hear therefore this, ye heads of the house of Jacob, and ye princes of the house of Israel, who spurn justice, and pervert all that is upright; who build Zion with blood, and Jerusalem with iniquity." For this is what happens when we force the holy words of GOD to serve our inclinations and opinions. This is called casting a calf and idols from the ear hangings of the daughters of Israel and the gold of the LORD, as they are therefore very often punished in the prophets. If you punish them today, you must be a heretic, since only those who do this today are the church, just as they were in the time of the prophets.

But the Hebrew text says without further reference and without designation of the person: For what is laid, or, for what is laid.

(not: What you have laid down, of which I do not know what greater emphasis it has), 1) as if he wanted only that to be established and ordered which God has established and ordered, and it would be wrong to even think of anything else, so that no distinction is necessary. So also the apostle says [Eph. 1, 10]: "It was good that all things should be gathered together under one head in Christ", as if there were no other good than the divine, as we speak of the sun, because there is only one, without any sign of distinction.

21 "What should the just man accomplish?" This is what Augustine draws to Christ, since he fights with his Donatists. So does Jerome, if it is otherwise his interpretation (commentarius). In my view, I take "the righteous" generally for all who have to deal with ungodly teachers, at all times, and hold that this question happens for them; first, from an afflicted heart, in this way: Since the power of the wicked prevails over justice (as Habakkuk says [Cap. 1, 3. 4. Vulg.]), and has the upper hand over the righteous, as it generally does, there is no one among men who makes justice for him or avenges him, but he is condemned as if he were guilty and wicked. Now here it is said, "What should the righteous man do," since he can offer no resistance? His truth is not heard, therefore he is forced to present his cause to the one who judges rightly, as Peter says of Christ 1 Petr. 2, 23: For what would it profit him if he also raged? Therefore he has to wait with groaning and patience for the divine judgment, and in the meantime let the wicked rage and become worse, so that whoever is unclean will always be unclean [Revelation 22:11].

Secondly, this question can arise from such an attitude as is found in a disputant and in one who confronts another. This is a much more violent movement, out of which Paul speaks 1 Cor. 15, 29. f. 32. against the deniers of the resurrection: "What else do those do who let themselves run over the dead, if the dead do not rise? And what do we every hour in the drive? Have I, in human opinion, fought with the wild beasts at Ephesus? What good is it to me if the dead do not rise?" And in the 73rd Psalm the prophet, seeing that the sinners were so well off [v. 12. f.], says: "Behold, these are the wicked, who are blessed in the world and grow rich. Shall it then be in vain that my heart lives blamelessly, and I wash my hands in innocence?"

23 So also here. If the wicked have the upper hand like this, if there is no other judge than themselves, what has the righteous man achieved? Why has he labored in vain? Why did he not keep quiet and live without danger? Has he done everything in vain? Far be it from him! He did not work in vain. There is a judge who judges rightly, as follows. This sense pleases me, because the word "fecit" is the past tense of which means: he does, so that he includes the whole life of the godly, as if he wanted to say: Why then has the righteous been so active in vain? Then this also agrees with the following in a very puffing way, and expresses very beautifully the sorrowful sense of the righteous, from which they suffer, since justice and truth are suppressed, and they dispute about it. Although they are quite sure that the righteous will not be forsaken, they are both indignant and grieved because of the multitude of the oppressors and those who are subject to the truth, and raise a question in which they contradict, and address an exceedingly vehement address to the wicked, and, the last thing they have, take recourse to judgment and say:

V. 4. the LORD is in his holy temple, the LORD'S throne is in heaven; his eyes look upon it, his eyelids examine the children of men. 1)

This verse is divided into two [in Latin]. The Hebrew way of speaking: Dominus in coelo sedes ejus, would have been interpreted by the interpreter if he had used the pronoun Hus.

1) Vulgate: Dominos in templo sanoto suo, Dominus in ooeio seães ejus. Oculi Hus in paupersm respioiunt, xalpedrae Hus interrogant Llios Nominum.

and changed the nominative to the genitive: Domini in coelo sedes. Because one does not speak so in Latin like Ps. 68, 17: Mons, in quo beneplacitum est Deo habitare in eo, so also not: Dominus in coelo sedes ejus. It could also be this distinction: The HER 2) in heaven his (sua) chair, add: "is". It is also not in pauperem [on the poor] in Hebrew, but it is without a word to which it refers (absolute), and far more expressively, "His eyes see," so that the sense of this verse is: the righteous does not labor in vain. Even though the wicked have the upper hand in the land and in the visible dominion, I am comforted by the fact that the Lord is in his holy temple, where the wicked do not see, and that his throne is in heaven, which they do not know. And he is not alone there, but his eyes see, they are open upon all things, because all things are bare before his eyes; "the keeper of Israel sleepeth not, neither slumbereth" [Ps. 121:4.]; from thence I await my judgment. Thus we are taught to be proud and presumptuous in the Lord against those who are proud and presumptuous of men.

25 Here the question arises: What is the temple of the Lord? That he did not want to understand the physical temple of Solomon can be assumed from the fact that it did not exist at the time of David. Then he also added: "His throne is in heaven," so that we must understand another temple, which is holy, that is, separated from all worldly (profano) use; for this is called holy. I am not displeased if also in this place what was said in the 5th Psalm 98] is said, that the temple of the LORD is called any place where the people of GOD come together to hear His word. Since they are in truth the temple of GOD, they do not call the place after themselves unrighteously. Thus, "church" refers to both the people and the house.

So the meaning will be: Let them go, they are blind and leaders of the blind. They do not know the Lord, they are other people, who know him. If he is not in those unholy people, yet he is in his temple, that is, in his own, and in the place where his own are gathered. "For where two are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them" [Matt. 18:20], says the Lord. He wanted to indicate this emphasis by the adjective "holy". "But if some do not believe, what is the matter? Should their unbelief nullify God's faith? Far be it from them!" [For this reason there will not be a lack of people who trust in the Lord, because the wicked shoot many in secret, and pervert the faith of some; the sanctuary of the Lord remains, and he remains in it, as if he wanted to say the word 2 Tim. 2:19: "The firm foundation of God stands, and has this seal: The Lord knows those who are his, and he knows them: Let him who calls on the name of the Lord depart from unrighteousness."

26. the same is that which he repeats, "the throne of the Lord is in heaven"; for since his people are his holy temple (that is, set apart), his walk is in heaven [Phil. 3:20], where Christ is, and yet he himself, while yet on earth, said [John 3:13], "No man goeth up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven." Listen, the Son of Man on earth is in heaven. And what is "the throne of God," even in heaven, but a spiritual and holy creature? But a godly soul is holy and heavenly. And so in the spirit heaven and earth come together in one, and are distinguished in nothing but in faith and sight. But a more excellent holy temple and chair of God are the angels in heaven (whose comrades are the saints in a dark word [1 Cor. 13:12]).

27. but the emphasis of this saying lies mainly in the fact that it says: "His eyes see", and it is the same meaning with the words Ps. 33, 13. 14.: "The Lord looks from heaven, and sees all the children of men. From His firm throne He looks on all who dwell on the earth," and Ps. 102:20, 21:

"For the LORD looketh from his holy height, and the LORD seeth from heaven upon the earth, to hear the groaning of the captive." 2c. For these are words of faith and of the Spirit. For even the ungodly do not deny this when you say, "His eyes see," yes, they boast and preach this above all others. But they do not believe that this is said against them, since they make themselves believe that they are doing God a service by destroying the laws of God and secretly deceiving those who are righteous of heart, and it seems to them as if they were establishing the laws and teaching the erring ones the right way, and they play their game with this figurative speech, so that it must be just the opposite of a figurative speech that deals with the godly. Since they ignore everything with deaf ears, the whole thing must be brought before God's eyes, as Jeremiah says Cap. 11, 20: "But you, O LORD of hosts, you righteous judge, who test the kidneys and the hearts, let me see your vengeance on them, for I have commanded you my cause.

28) "His eyes search or examine the children of men. Now he applies in particular what he had said in general: "His eyes see," that is, they are open and see everything; then they not only see the children of men in particular, but also investigate, examine and see through them. Augustine refers these "eyelids" of God to the holy scripture, which is open in some places and closed in others, in a beautiful secret interpretation. Others interpret it differently. According to the simple letter, I like the image that is taken from men, especially the great ones, with whom it is mainly found that they make use of waving with the eyes; for those whom they honor with their favor, they look at kindly with open eyes, but those whom they detest, they meet with closed eyes and clenched eyelids, or in such a way that they direct them unfriendly upwards.

Therefore the eyelids of God are graciously opened upon the godly, but upon the wicked they are either closed or grimly turned upward. These two pieces are in the 34th Psalm, v. 16. 17., thus expressed: "The eyes of the Lord look upon the righteous, and his ears upon their crying; but the face of the Lord is over them that do evil, that he may cut off their memory from the earth. Thus the eyes of God behave differently toward the righteous than toward the wicked, and soon He will interpret Himself as searching out and seeing all the children of men, but pleasing the righteous and condemning the wicked. But this again is spoken in the spirit until it is fulfilled; it is grasped in faith alone, since the ungodly think far the opposite of themselves.

1) Only the Jena has correctly according to the Vulgate: 61seeäat, the other editions: äiseküit.

V. 5. The Lord tests the righteous; his soul hates the wicked, and those who gladly transgress).

(30) The division in the Hebrew is different, namely: The Lord tests the righteous; and the ungodly and the one who loves iniquity his soul hates; and the noun justum [the righteous] is before the verb interrogat [he tests], so that it is uncertain whether we must translate "the Lord, the righteous", or "the righteous" or "the righteous". For Jerome also concludes the first part thus: "The Lord tests the righteous"; after that he connects "the wicked" and "he who loves iniquity" with the verb "he hates", not with the verb "he tests", so that I almost assume that this part: "The Lord tests the righteous" is a sentence existing by itself, without a closer relation (absoluta sententia), and expresses this: The righteous Lord examines (that is, he is an examiner), that is, he who examines and investigates all men is not a man who lies, but the Lord himself, who judges rightly, whom no one deceives, whom no one can bribe, to whom nothing is hidden, as is said in the 7th Psalm, v. 10. Psalm, v. 10: "Let the wickedness of the wicked come to an end, and promote the righteous; for you, righteous God, test hearts and kidneys," so that "you, righteous God, test hearts and kidneys" is the same as here: "the righteous LORD tests." For the verb probat and interrogat is not different in meaning from the verb-bum "to scrutinize" (scrutandi), since it denotes such a test by which the gold is tried in the fire, examined, investigated, tested, which is by all means as much as scrutari. Since God does not judge by appearance, but tests the spirits, He opens or closes His eyelids, depending on whether the spirit of the children of men is found righteous or wicked; therefore He is rightly called a righteous examiner.

31 Therefore, in my opinion, I divide this verse according to its distinctive signs (per cola et commata) like this: The righteous Lord, he proves; and the ungodly, and him that loveth iniquity, his soul hateth; so that the sense is, The Lord is righteous, and he proves; therefore his soul hateth both the ungodly, and him that loveth to hurt, or to do iniquity. For he who is righteous, when he examines, cannot but hate the ungodly and him who loves iniquity. According to this sense this verse explains the preceding one by an amplification (auxesin), that the eyes of the Lord stand and his eyelids test the children of men, but in such a way that he tests in a righteous way, as if someone who comforts himself in exceedingly great confidence against the power of the ungodly said: Well, let him do what he will; I know that the Lord sees and examines all things, and not only examines, but examines in a righteous manner; and since he is righteous, he will not be able to love him who acts ungodly against me (meum impium), and who delights in sacrilege, but he will not be able to hate me who suffer, as Jeremiah also defies, Cap. 17, 16. 15.: "Thou knowest what I have preached, that is right in thy sight: and they say unto me, Where is the word of the LORD? Dear, let go!" This defiance and certainty of heart was also indicated above [v. 3. Vulg.] by the question, "What then hath the righteous done?"

32 "Iniquity" in this passage is the same word that we have said in the 7th Psalm, v. 17, that it means injustice, insult, injury: "And his iniquity shall fall on the top of his head", which is XXX. For he speaks of the wrong that the wicked do to the godly, shooting at those who are righteous of heart, and destroying the laws of God. In addition there is the exceedingly Evil, that they not only injure, but love to injure, as it is said in the 4th Psalm [v. 3.], "They love vain things so well, and lies so gladly." For the wicked, according to his disposition, is most anxious that he should do harm to the godly being; if he is able to do this, he rejoices that he has done it and is doing it, as it is said in Proverbs 2:1, 14: "They delight to do evil." For in this way they think they have done God a service.

33 And also this is impressive, that he does not simply say: he hates, but: "his soul hates", so that he expresses with how great and complete movement God hates it, namely with his whole life and senses; not as if God had a soul, as he also does not have eyes, but the prophet speaks figuratively, according to the words 4 Mos. 21, 5: "Our soul is disgusted with this loose food. For we see how he who feels disgust turns away with his whole movement and gesture, even with all his senses, again, as someone turns toward something when he loves it and desires it; for desire and disgust are actually attributed to the soul in Scripture. Thus it is said in Deut. 26:30, "My soul shall be disgusted with you." So also here. Although the wicked make themselves believe that they are such people whom God desires even with great desire, in truth they are those whom God rather detests and whom His soul hates.

34 Our Latin translation refers "his soul" to the wicked and the one who loves iniquity. This opinion is true, but forcibly drawn, not even common in the Scriptures, and has the nature of a human view, according to which it is said, more astutely than appropriately, that he hates the good who loves the evil (that is, is considered by his actions to love it). For no one loves evil of his own free will, provided it is evil. Now if anyone wants to follow the whole verse [in the translation] of our interpreter, the meaning will be this: The Lord, who sees all things, and whose eyelids search all the children of men in common, searches without doubt also every righteous man and every godly man.

The righteous in particular, that he may crown him as one who has been instructed; the wicked, that he may condemn him as one who is wicked, and that not through his [God's] fault, for Hos. 13:9, it says, "Israel, you bring yourself into misfortune." For he who loves iniquity hates and corrupts his soul, doing to his soul what he would not do to any of his enemies, even the most bitter.

V. 6. He will rain lightning, fire and brimstone on the wicked, and will give them a weather for their reward. 2) 35 In the Scriptures there is frequent mention of the rain and the cup, and of the rain it is well known that by it the preaching of the doctrine is understood, as Deut. 32:2: "Let my doctrine drip like the rain, and let my speech flow like the dew. Hence also the well-known word Isa. 45, 8.: "Drip, ye heavens, from above; and the clouds rain righteousness," from which the teachers of the church are called clouds and heavens everywhere in Scripture. It can also be seen that this verse is taken from Genesis 19, when the Sodomites were consumed by fire and brimstone from heaven. He gives a picture of that here, and every single word has a special emphasis.

36) "He will make it rain", by this he means the exceedingly great amount of calamity (it would have been milder if he had drizzled or wetted), so that we should understand a great amount of teachers of ungodliness, yes, that the sinners, that is, the ungodly, would hear nothing else from God's wrath but teachers of ungodliness. This happened above all to the Jews, 3) as the 81st Psalm, v. 12. f., says: "But my people do not obey my voice, and Israel does not want me. So have I left them in their heart's conceit, to walk after their counsel." For what have the wretched people of the Jews today but clouds and showers of iniquity? Such people find the heretics, such are all who tyrannize with human laws, and all who are not satisfied with the truth; these are the plagues and the evil angels who struck Egypt, which was a model of the perishing synagogue. So also Sodom was a model of the same.

(37) "Ropes" (laqueos) [it is said], namely in the plural, so that we understand errors of various kinds, by which they are caught in such a way that they seem to them to be nothing less than ropes, since the appearance of truth and godliness glitters so much. Paul also predicted [Thess. 2, 11] that it would happen in the last days that God would send powerful errors. Thus it is said in Ps. 69, 23: "Let their table become a snare before them, a retribution and a trap." For what is this, that one perverts God's word and stains it with human opinions, other than to lay snares for the souls, since one, while looking at God's truth, follows error?

38 Ignis [the fire would be better put in the accusative: Ignem et sulphur [fire and brimstone] so that it would be made dependent on the verb pluet [he will rain], as it is written that he rained fire and brimstone on Sodom. This indicates the zeal and raging of the wicked who race for their doctrines. For [Proverbs 17:12], "It is better to meet a bear whose cubs have been stolen than a fool in his folly," that is, in his wisdom, in his cords, in his errors. For these are the signs of the wrath of God, and of his eyelids, that he not only does not acknowledge the wicked, nor does he enlighten them with his eyes, but with closed eyelids he lets them go astray according to all their desires, and with burning anger when someone either resists them or does not follow them. Hence arises anger, envy, discord, and (as you can see, the apostle 1 Tim. 6, 4. 5. has interpreted this verse beautifully and says:) "they are addicted to questions and wars of words, from which arises envy, strife, blasphemy, malicious suspicion, school quarrels of such men who have broken senses and are deprived of the truth" 2c. 39. under "sulfur" have the fathers, because he stinks so badly, not badly understood the evil rumor. For it is known that "the smell" in figurative speech means the rumor, 2 Cor. 2, 15. f.: "We are a good smell of Christ; to some a smell of life unto life, to others a smell of death unto death." Hence also we are wont to say and command that it should be someone's scent or smell, when we call upon him to inquire and investigate a person's reputation or rumor. Thus the teachers and the disciples of the ungodly are not a good smell of Christ, but a stench of Satan, and a mighty stinking brimstone, which is in great abundance with them, in that the LORD rains upon them in his wrath. Thus it has come to pass in the church that there is no more shameful and disgraceful name than that of heresy and faithlessness, so that even intercourse or any kind of intercourse is subject to the heaviest suspicion, and this agrees very much with the sulfur, as far as the smell is concerned.

40 But let us look at the Hebrew text, which divides thus: He will rain upon the wicked ropes, fire and brimstone, and winds of tempest the lot of their cup, where Johann Reuchlin thinks that instead of "ropes" should be said coals. If this is true, one may assume that "rope fire" is the same as coals of fire, that is, glowing coals, as Ps. 18:14 [Vulg.] says: "hail and coals of fire," instead of: fiery coals. But he seems to treat figuratively the lightnings, the thunderbolts, and all the violence of the tempest, as we read that it happened in Egypt and Sodom. For in thunderstorms the fire of the lightnings crackles and the storm wind rushes. Then lightnings and thunderclaps have the smell of sulfur, and even their light is sulfuric, as Pliny says in the 35th book Cap. 15. Therefore I could translate without inconsistency thus: He will rain on the wicked coals of fire and sulfur, that is, fiery and sulfuric coals, since the lightning has ignited them with its sulfuric fire. For he shows the power and effect of the lightnings and thunderbolts, by which everything that is seized by them is turned into burning coals, ashes and dust. For so it is written, Ex. 9, 23. f., that in the seventh plague hail, thunderbolts, lightnings and fires went in confusion over the whole land, as we will see more extensively in the 18th Psalm. And 2 Mos. 9, 8. it is said [Vulg.] "Take your hands full of ashes from the furnace," where there is an expression related to that in this passage, which he translated "ashes," namely, such ashes as are mixed from burning coals and hot ashes.

(41) By all these things I understand nothing else than that the teachings of the wicked and the righteous are compared under one image, so that the rain falling on the godly may be taken from the rain in due season, the early rain and the late rain, by which the earth is watered in a beneficial way and made fertile so that it bears its fruit. This rain is spoken of very often in the prophets. This is the beneficial word of God, which brings justice and judgment to growth. Of this benefit Ps. 85, 13. is said: "The Lord will do us good, so that our land will give its growth." Because the wicked turn their backs on this word, yes, persecute it with its fruits, God also turns his goodness into wrath and lets his anger and displeasure go against them, and lets them be afflicted by evil angels, as Ps. 78, 49 [Vulg.] is said of the Egyptians. Namely, instead of the salutary rain, he sends lightnings, tempests and hail, by which the earth is not only not made fruitful, but is set on fire and laid waste, that is, the deadly word of ungodliness, by which arise useless babblers and seducers of souls, unfit for all good work, as the apostle says in the Epistle to Titus [Cap. 1, 10. 16.] says. For [Rom. 3, 16. f.], "In their ways is vain accident and heartache; and the way of peace they know not," Ps. 13, 3 [according to the Vulgate count].

42. for a man's word can also make nothing but a troubled, fearful, restless, erring conscience, yea, which is also useless, desolate, and unfruitful, and the more so the longer it lives among these teachers, where man, as well as the bloody liquid woman [Marc. 5, 26.], turned all his goods over to these murderous physicians, and yet bought nothing but that it became worse with him.

There is no more tangible image of ungodly and human doctrine than a thunderstorm with lightning, thunderclaps, winds and hail, and such manifestations of the wrath that is above, but in such a way that the heavens not only crackle and threaten from above, but [these plagues] also come down to the earth and strike, devastate everything and set it on fire, and make the earth unfit so that it cannot provide sustenance for man. To indicate this, he wanted to say coals of fire and sulfur, not simply: fire, because the lightning, if it only shines, lights nothing, also neither makes fire nor coals, also does not produce the smell of sulfur, but such only threatens. Therefore, for the sake of emphasis, he wanted to express by "coals, fire and sulfur" the violence of the lightning and the weather, which does damage by its effect and in fact, or the igniting, burning lightning, which makes coals, dust and ashes, which smells strongly of sulfur and devastates and destroys everything, as this is shown by the Egyptian plague.

44. the sixteenth chapter of Revelation is full of these teachings, where the seven angels (that is, bishops or teachers) blow on trumpets [Revelation 8:6], and where it is written that after this followed many terrible things in the church. See, then, what an evil omen and sad horror it is, as often as cities, countries, fields, and everything in them is set on fire and devastated by a weather from heaven, how terrible this fire is compared to our ordinary fire, then also foul-smelling with sulfur, and how it strikes our churches exceedingly often: this is certainly a great sign of how much God detests the ungodly doctrine of man in the church.

45) On the other hand, how lovely it is when the rain falls at the right time in the springtime, testifying to the grace of the reawakening weather, and that all the gifts have returned with their Lord, where everything is green, blossoming, and growing, and the earth, with sweetness, is full of life.

The two pieces of scripture are full of figurative speeches that refer to both pieces of scripture. For the Scriptures are everywhere full of figurative speeches, which refer to both pieces.

(46) But all this is done in the spirit, so that it can only be known by faith. For in this Psalm it is not described how the wicked are before men, but how they are before God in spirit and in themselves. For what is more respectable on earth than a Saul and an Absalom? Is not the land of the Sodomites like the garden of the LORD? Gen 13:10 For these are the most useful, the most fruitful, the most upright in the sight of the world, and have the sweetest smell; there is nothing here of coals, fire, brimstone, tempests, but everything green with flowers, fruits and fragrances. It says the 38th Psalm, v. 35. f. [I have seen a wicked man defiant, spreading himself out and green as the cedar of Lebanon. When one passed by, behold, he was gone; I asked for him, and he was not found.]

47. Therefore, when one turns from what it looks like before men to what it looks like before God, it becomes apparent what the wicked are and what they are not. Before GOD, all that is yours has become coals, dust, ashes, fire and brimstone. This appearance (before GOD) was modeled by Abraham in Gen. 19, 27. f., where it says: "Abraham rose up early in the morning to the place where he had stood before the LORD (see what it looks like before the LORD), and turned his face toward Sodom and Gomorrah, and all the land of the region, and looked; and behold, there arose a smoke from the land, as smoke from the furnace." Namely, this is how it is with the wicked in the eyes of the godly and in truth, while they shine most gloriously in the world. Therefore it is said that everything that grows on the dead sea has an unusual shape, is black and empty, and, as it were, crumbles to ashes. 1) What is indicated by this miracle of nature other than what is said in this verse about the wicked?

(48) On the other hand, God seems to rain upon the pious, because they are subject to all calamities through the word of the cross according to the flesh, rather ropes, burning coals, brimstone and all kinds of storms and tempests. For thus in the second Psalm [v. 3] they [the ungodly] call the word of Christ "bands" and "cords," of which they are more afraid than of the lightning and tempest, with which, in fact, instead of that (the word of Christ), they are overwhelmed and devastated by their ungodly teachers. Hosea, Cap. 8, 7. also says in reference to the same storm wind: "For they sow wind and will reap thunderstorms." and again Cap. 12, 2.: "Ephraim feeds on the wind, and runs after the east wind, and daily makes more idolatry and harm." By such words the prophets portray the vain nature of the wicked, then also the restless conscience, and their complete incapacity for good, each prophet according to his own way.

(49) "Cup," according to a very common way of speaking in Scripture, means the vessels of doctrine, that is, the words or eloquence through which the mind is poured into the soul, as through a vessel the wine is poured into the body. Thus St. Augustine says about the Manichaeian Faustus and his eloquence in his "Confessions", book 5: What good is the most skillful cupbearer, who offers me the most precious cups, to quench my thirst? And afterwards: Wisdom and foolishness are just like useful and useless food; but both kinds of food can be presented with adorned and unadorned, as with fine and coarse words. Therefore, the golden cup of Babylon, which made all the world drunk, Jer. 51:7, and the golden cup in the hand of the great whore, full of abomination and the wine of her fornication, Revelation 17:4, are mentioned everywhere by the fathers. Then also all the vessels of the tabernacle and temple represent either books or speeches containing doctrines, and under the law the chief use of the bowls was to catch, pour out and sprinkle the blood, because the doctrine of the law deals with and reveals sin. From these

1) Cf. Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. I, 851, s 80.

It is not the place to speak of secrets. Thus it says afterwards in the 16th Psalm [v. 5. Vulg.]: "The Lord is the portion of my inheritance and of my cup."

(50) But "the cup" must not only be understood to indicate a spoken or written word, but also to indicate what is meant by it. For thus Christ prayed [Matt. 26:39] that the cup might be taken from Him, by which we all understand that this was His suffering. And Jeremiah, cap. 25, 17, takes the cup of wine full of the Lord's wrath from the Lord's hand and pours it out to all nations and kings. And Isaiah says in Cap. 51, 17, that Jerusalem has drunk the cup of the Lord's wrath to the bottom and the lees.

(51) Now, if we combine both meanings into one from these and other scriptural passages, it will be seen that "cup" is nothing other than the prediction and announcement of the punishments and wrath of God. So also the cup of Christ is the wrath of God and His suffering, which was foretold in the Law and the Prophets. Micah 7:9 says, "I will bear the Lord's wrath, for I have sinned against Him," just as the apostle 1 Peter 1:11 says that the prophets testified beforehand to the sufferings that are in Christ and the glory that follows. Therefore it must be said of him that he gives the cup, who either by speaking or by writing announces the punishments, as the prophets and the apostles do everywhere. For each one must drink his cup, that is, he must bear the cross and suffering that is appointed for him in the Scriptures or with God.

52 Therefore, there are two kinds of cup: one belongs to the godly, the other to the ungodly. The cup of the godly is the carnal and temporal suffering that is appointed over them until sin is destroyed in them. When this is drunk, the soul is the more preserved and renewed, although the outward man decays day by day [2 Cor. 4:16] by this very powerful purification of the cup, until at last the soul is delivered from the body.

53. whereas the cup of the wicked is the inward and spiritual suffering, until the righteousness and godliness is destroyed. When they have drunk it, their souls are corrupted from day to day, although they flourish and prosper in great reputation and abundance according to the outward man, until they perish in soul and body at the same time, and must drink the lees of the cup for all eternity, as it is said in the 75th Psalm, v. 9. The Lord has a cup in his hand, full of strong wine, and pours out of it; but the wicked must all drink, and drink up the lees"; that is, (as Peter 1 Ep. 4:17 says), "If the judgment of God first begin at us, what end shall it be to them that believe not the gospel?" So "cup" is a word, but such a word that predetermines the suffering and cross, or the suffering predestined by the word. Thus it is said in Ps. 116:13: "I will take the healing cup (that is, the healing sufferings, which Paul [2 Cor. 1:5, 7] calls the sufferings of Christ, I will gladly bear), and preach the name of the Lord."

If we follow this sense, then in this verse the cup of the wicked will not be their doctrine, as we said above [§ 49], but the word of God, which foreshadows their desolation, fire, brimstone, storm wind. And lest all should be far apart [we shall say] that their cup is the ungodly doctrine, and all the evil which it brings about, in that it burns, devastates, troubles their souls, as [this cup is] foretold, announced and prepared by the certain predestination of God and by the word of Scripture.

55. pars [part, "reward"], according to the use of the Scriptures, does not mean a part, as the philosophers tend to take it, in order to distinguish it from a whole, but is just as much as lot, inheritance, share, because in former times the inheritance was divided among the twelve tribes. Thus it is written [Ps. 16, 5. Vulg.], "The LORD is the portion of my inheritance and of my cup," and [Ps. 142, 6.], "Thou, LORD, art my portion in the land of the living," and Jeremiah says in Lamentations Cap. 3, 24: "The LORD is my portion, saith my soul." And one must get used to this meaning of "cup" and "portion" because of the usage of the holy scripture. So the meaning is: The wicked will inherit what is predestined for them by God, namely your rain of fiery and sulfurous coals, and storm winds, that is, wickedness and the wages of wickedness, desolation and misery of the soul and eternal unrest.

V. 7: The Lord is righteous, and loveth righteousness: therefore their faces look upon that which is right (aequitatem vidit vultus ejus).

Jerome: Rectum videbit facies eorum [on the right their face will look^ (if there is not a mistake in the copy). Righteousness and piety have been abundantly spoken of in the seventh Psalm [§ 76] and in the ninth [§ 64 ff]. And here it is uncertain whether rectum is its neuter, or whether it] stands for the righteous in the masculine gender according to the figure of the synecdoche, and whether the righteous should be called "the righteous" instead of "the righteous".

(justitias) should be said. But there is little in this; for he who looks at righteousness and piety looks also at the righteous and the pious.

57 The prophet closes the psalm against the presumption of the wicked, saying: "Man judges unrighteously and praises the wicked, but it is the Lord who is not deceived by outward appearances, nor moved by the greatness and multitude of the unrighteous. He holds fast to righteousness and loves it, and his face looks upon those who are righteous in heart. Therefore, it is nothing for the wicked to be presumptuous in his sight and hope that the godly will be despised by him. His face looks at something other than the face of men, indeed, the appearance before God and the appearance before men are completely contrary to each other, "for what is high among men is an abomination in the sight of God" [Luc. 16:15].

The twelfth Psalm.

V. 1 A psalm of David to be sung on eight strings.

1. the octava or the zither of eight strings has been abundantly spoken of in the 6th Psalm.

V. 2. Help, Lord, the saints have diminished, and the faithful are few among the children of men. 1)

In this Psalm speaks the enraged love, which we call the zeal for God, as the apostle 2 Cor. 11, 2. says: "I am jealous over you with godly zeal." But he speaks against those who, among the people of God, preside over the ministry of the Word, and to the great destruction of souls teach their own instead of the Word of God, by abusing the power to teach, and by ignoring the pure and honest teaching of the falsify the divine law. David suffered such people in his time and foresaw that they would be in the time of Christ's future. Christ attacks them in Matth. 23, 13. by saying: "Woe to you, Christian scholars and Pharisees, you hypocrites, who shut the kingdom of heaven in the face of men. You do not enter, and those who want to enter you do not let enter." And Luc. 11, 52: "Woe to you scribes, because you have the key of knowledge (that is, the power to teach). You do not enter in, and you forbid those who want to enter in."

(2) From this it is evident that this psalm does not speak of heretics or persecutors, except to declare heretics those who capture the souls of men with ceremonies and good works of their own invention, while faith in God (which alone is to be taught) is not to be considered heretics.

1) Vulgate: Kalvurri ms kae, Oomins, Hnoniam äetscit sanctus, Huoniara äimimitae kirnt veritatss a tillis Uomiliuru.

is neglected. Such people are today (and there will be more of them when the world will stand longer) the jurists, the theologians, the monks and the bishops, who are corrupt in human wisdom and statutes, that is, both in what is before the eyes (speculabilibus), 1) and in their moral teaching, and lead to ruin. And not only is the prophet indignant that they are such exceedingly bad teachers, but that there are so many of them and they alone are the ones who teach, so that there is almost no one left who teaches what is right. Thus he indicates that this psalm refers to a very corrupt time, as it was in the time of Christ and is now in our time.

Therefore he begins with great vehemence and says: "Help, Lord, the saints have decreased!" as if he wanted to say with Micah, Cap. 7, 1-1: "Oh, I am like one who slackens in the vineyard, because there are no grapes to eat, and yet he would like to have the best fruit. The pious people are gone in this land, and the righteous are no longer among the people. They all lie in wait for blood; each one chases the other to destroy him; and they think they do well when they do evil. What the prince wills, the judge saith, that he may do him service again. The mighty counsel according to their will to do harm, and turn it as they will. The best of them is like a thorn, and the most upright like a hedge" 2c.

(4) With these words he not only says what this psalm means, but at the same time punishes the beautiful reputation of those who adorn this wickedness and want it to be seen as something good, because he speaks in the spirit, which must be understood in faith alone. For here it is a matter of what is said in Proverbs 20:5: "The counsel in a man's heart is as deep waters; but a man of understanding can tell what he means." Many people today are called merciful (that is, holy, or gracious people, or merciful men, which they are not after all), but who can find a man who holds faith (fidelem) (that is, who by faith and is just and merciful in truth)? Namely, the appearance reigns so completely, and so deep is this water of the council and their attitudes, that no one but the intelligent can exhaust it (that is, no one other than the truly righteous can see through them), because all others are deceived by the appearance and the crowd and the greatness. And this corruption of the great multitude torments the spirit of this prophet, so that he calls in such a way and begins without any preface or circumlocution, looking to God for the salvation of the people.

5 The Hebrew text has XXXXXX without further specification, that is, help, or give salvation, not [as the Vulgate has]: save me. But it is a much stronger expression, "Help" or "Save" than: Errette mich. So also in our German language, when one is moved by the fact that he must perish or die, one says: "Hilf, du barmherziger GOtt!" (Help, you merciful God!), where one cries out and calls out in the strongest possible way in view of the threatening danger, without any preamble. So too, when the prophet is moved by the fact that the people are perishing, he cries out without preamble and implores God in a strong prayer for help.

6 "The saints" in this passage are XXXX, which Jerome translated Ps. 4, 4. by misericos: "The Lord leads His saints whimsically", that is, those who have obtained mercy [Ps. 4, § 32] or are justified by the grace of God, who are exalted by faith, not by works and their powers, or those of any men.

7. [Vulgate:] "The truths are diminished from the children of men", that is, there are not truths among men, that is, no faith (fidelitas). The Hebrew language can say in the plural: there are not faiths (fides) among men, so also: GOD of our salvation, where we say: GOD of our salvation, and: There is no more faith among men, as one says: Nowhere is right faith (Nusquam tuta fides). Also "truth" in the plural is not in use. I say this so that no one may understand it to mean that the truths have been diminished by the sons of men, as if the sons of men had made less of the truths, as if-this is true; but the preposition "from" (a) must be interpreted by "under" or from - away (de) or out, so that the sense is like Isa. 57, 1: "The righteous perish, and there is no one who takes it to heart; and holy people are taken up, and no one pays attention to it. For the righteous are taken away from (a facie) calamity," and what we have quoted from Micah, Cap. 7, 2: "The godly people are taken away in (a facie) this land," 2c. For he wants to say that there is no longer faith among the people (faith in Hebrew coincides with the word truth), and the men who are justified by grace have ceased, but everywhere are hypocritical works saints, who by their powers, their works, their laws and their merits corrupt themselves and others under the great title and name of salvation.

1) Cf. Walch, St. Louis ed. vol. II, 954, 8 124.

The vehemence of the excitement leads him to exaggerate (hyperbolize), because at all times there are saints and believers in Christ on earth, and yet he [Vulg.] says: "The saints have ceased", it has come to an end with the righteous, with those who are pleasing to God, it is over. In such a figure of speech, everyone complains, even today, that there is no faith among men, and that everything is done fraudulently. This unfaithfulness is a testimony and a proof that the inner faithfulness has gone out; thus the tree is recognized from the fruits. For he who is faithful to God is also faithful to men; for without faith and without the grace of God it is impossible for a man not to seek what is his (that is, to be unfaithful even to men). Therefore, Micah, in the 7th chapter, after saying that the righteous are no longer among the people [v. 2], immediately adds the fruit of the evil tree, and says [v. 5]: "No one believes his neighbor, no one relies on princes; keep the door of your mouth from the one who sleeps in your arms (see, this is how he describes the wife). For the son despises the father, and the daughter sets herself against the mother, the cord is against the in-law, and a man's enemies are his own household." And even though the wicked are such people, they do not want to be anything less than that, nor to be regarded as such.

V. 3: One talks to the other about useless things, and pretends, and teaches from a divided heart. 1)

The division of the verse in Hebrew is after dolosa. Therefore the question arises, where according to the grammatical order labia dolosa belong. For if the division of our Latin text should be maintained, then not: Labia dolosa locuti sunt should have been said, but locata sunt, unless you want to say: Locuti sunt labia dolosa (in the accusative) stands figuratively for: Locuti sunt verba dolosa, namely for that which is brought forth with the lips. It could have been translated thus: They speak with false lips. I think that the ambiguity also brings the freedom that we can divide the verse into three parts by rendering the Hebrew in this way: They speak useless things; every man hath hypocritical lips against his neighbor; they speak sometimes out of one heart, sometimes out of another; that is, every teacher teaches useless things, and every man hath flattering lips against his neighbor, and they speak out of discordant (duplici) hearts.

(10) First, "they speak useless things," that is, vain things, which do not serve salvation, but which (as we have often said) are very useful to them, and which alone seem very salutary to them. For that he is not speaking here of private useless talk and gossip, but of the ministry of the word, will be clear from what follows, where he opposes the word of the Lord to these useless talkers of souls.

(11) And this word [Vulg.], "Every man against his neighbor false lips," is spoken after a manner of speech quite common in the Hebrew, as in the Song of Songs Cap. 3, 7. 8: "Around the bed of Solomon stand sixty strong men; one man, his sword on his hip," where we say, "And every man's sword is on his hip. So also here: They speak useless things, one man against his neighbor a lip of flattery, where we must say: And every man's tongue is against his neighbor.

1) Vulgate: Vana iocuti sunt, unusquisque autem proximum suum labia dolosa, in cordis sui coram locuti sunt.

is flattering, that is, each one flatters his neighbor by not telling him the word of the cross in truth; otherwise they would not be able to persuade them of useless things, if they did not speak flattering things to them, and which pleased them. For what is written here: dolosa, and Ps. 5, 10.: "They pretend" (dolose agebant), Jerome translated there: And their tongue they make smooth, that is, soft, kosend, schmeichlerisch.

12] These are the ones who prick men's ears [2 Tim. 4:3], of whom Paul predicted, according to the example of this Psalm, that not only would there be some, but that they would come in multitudes, 1) that is, that there would be many of them, so that even the saints would fall away, of which there is abundant mention in the 5th Psalm, 31 ff.] is abundantly spoken of. And yet not enough can be said about this, because the inclination of nature is so fundamentally evil, especially in these spiritual things and in what concerns God, because the carnal mind is not subject to God, nor is it able to be, as the apostle says in Romans 8:7.

13 [Vulgate] "From one heart and from another heart" (corde et corde) can be referred to the same person, so that [in Latin] he is said to speak from a double (duplici) heart who means it differently than he pretends, and I allow that it may be so taken here. But I refer it to different persons. For just as Christ, by the word of God, makes "men of one mind dwell in one house" [Ps. 68:7, Vulg.], and "brethren dwell together in one accord" [Pf. 133:1], and "the multitude of the faithful are one heart and one soul in the Lord" [Apost. 4, 32], for it is "One faith, One Lord" [Eph. 4, 5]: so on the other hand with the ungodly, because of the lack of right and united faith, it is impossible that they should be of one heart, but there must necessarily be many factions and divisions among them. For no sect has ever arisen from which others have not soon sprung up. Thus the synagogue at the time of Christ had the Pharisees, the Sadduceans and the Essaeans. The Arians produced the Eunomians, 2) and the Macedonians; the Donatists the Maximinians, and today Aristotle the Scotists, the Thomists, the Occamists. Thus the apostle Hebr. 13, 9. says: "Do not be carried away with various and strange doctrines", who elsewhere [Eph. 4, 14. 1 writes, "that they are weighed and swayed by all kinds of wind of doctrine", and [2 Tim. 3, 7.] "are always learning and can never come to the knowledge of the truth". In all these there is never one heart, though they agree in this, that they all speak useless things, and every one flatters his party, and fastens his opinions and doctrines. Therefore, I think that by the separation of the heart, this separation of the sects is to be understood, as Daniel Cap. 11, 27. describes the heart of two kings, who speak falsely with each other at one table.

14 Therefore he also speaks in the plural, so that it is not understood that he is speaking of one sect alone, while in the 10th Psalm he speaks of the Antichrist in the singular, and there is an emphasis in the words "in the heart and in the heart" (in corde et corde), because they sometimes seem to agree, namely against the truth. Thus Ps. 2:2 [Vulg.] says: "The kings of the land are rebellious, and the princes are become one against the Lord and his anointed," who were yet quite different among themselves, Pharisees, Sadducees, Romans, Gentiles and others.

(15) Samson showed this [Judges 15:4] with the foxes, whose tails he tied together, while their faces were turned in different directions. For the face of the foxes is the character of the wicked before God, and how it is known in the spirit: there they are divided into exceedingly many parties; the tail is the last end, and indicates what standing they have before the eyes of men: there they become one in the fire of persecution, to destroy the seeds of the land, that is, to lay waste the doctrine and the works of faith or of the spirit. Hosea also speaks of these Cap.

2) In the Erlanger, in the Weimarschen and in the Baseler: Limomiauo". Equally following in all Latin editions: OeeLuiktss.

1) In the Vulgate: Ooueervuiumt sidl ruar⁴istros. Luther: "They themselves will charge them teachers."

10, 2.: "Her heart is cut in pieces, now she will find her guilt", since he had said before: "The vine of Israel, as much fruit as it had, as many altars it had made", that is, it was cut in sects.

This is what prompted the prophet to exclaim that the saints had declined because there were many sects, and yet they all stood against the truth of the faith and devoured the people of God. Who can resist all of them, since hardly any of them can be resisted? This is how it is with the church today, since new sects are invented every day and the old ones have increased, so that it is divided into the smallest parts, and in the meantime the unity of love is completely neglected.

V. 4. May the Lord cut off all hypocrisy and the tongue that speaks proudly.

17) Namely, if God does not exterminate the locusts, the caterpillars and these things, as Joel 1) Cap. 1, 4. calls it, then the diligence of the saints fights in vain. And the interpreter (since he could have done it according to the Hebrew word [XXX]) would have said [instead of disperdat in the Vulgate] more appropriately: The Lord may cut out (excidat), because tongues and lips are used to be cut out. Otherwise (as Jacobus [Cap. 3, 8.] says) no man can tame the tongue. But here he wishes them a spiritual cutting out, which consists of the ungodly changing (or being removed from office) and teaching something else, namely the right wisdom of the cross.

Why was it not enough to say "hypocritical lips" (that is, smooth and flattering), but he adds "all"? Only because he has seen the multitude of divisions, he asks that not only the lips of one party, but the lips and the flatteries of all be eradicated, since all speak useless things.

19. the Latin interpreter rightly added the connective et ["and"], which is not in the Hebrew: "And the tongue that speaks proudly," which in the Hebrew is represented by two

This is understood not only of great things (as the ungodly are wont to boast), but also of the arrogance in which they are wont to contemptuously suppress godly doctrine and raise up their own with glory. This might be interpreted as a fox's tail, as it were, which is large and hairy (but has a very small thickness and little flesh), more than is fitting for the whole body, especially the head: so the ungodliness is greater in outward appearance and show than in fact. "It is a fox's tail."

(20) This animal [the fox], which is distinguished by cunning and craftiness, is not in vain taken in Scripture as a simile for the exceedingly cunning and crafty craftiness of the flesh, which in holy things and the ministry of the Word commits all the abominations foretold in Scripture.

V. 5 Those who say, "Let our tongue have the upper hand; it is our duty to speak; who is our Lord?"

(21) He explains what this magniloquent tongue is and what it speaks, namely, such a tongue that speaks most hopefully and most contemptuously against the doctrine of the godly. First of all, it says: "We want to magnify" (magnificemus), that is, we want to strengthen, fortify, make strong our doctrines, on the other hand, we want to break their bands and throw off their ropes; we want to destroy what the godly build, we want to weaken and dampen their tongue, we want to draw the peoples and the princes of the people to us. Not as if they thought they were acting against godly people, but they make themselves think that they are doing God a service by strengthening their boastful and false tongue and propagating it to many, as if it were a sincere and humble one, so that God alone must be the judge here.

Secondly, it is said: "Our lips are of us", which Jerome translates: are with us, and Augustine: are with us. I would say: "Our lips are ours", so that the emphasis would be on the last pronoun "our", so that the capital "our" would be connected with their "our".

2) Vulgate: tzulüixeruut: I'inAuauniostram raaZuiüeadimus, ladia nostra a nobls 8uM, yuis nvktsr äomiuus 68t?

1) In the Erlanger: sso. 1"; in the Basel: "Aoan", in the Weimar: "lod.,

The key of knowledge is to be understood as if they were speaking: No one hears anyone but us; We are the teachers of the nations, ours must be heard, and (as the puffed-up popes and the bulls of the popes puff up in the church) it is ours to interpret the Scriptures, it is ours to give laws, it is ours to approve and condemn every man's speeches and writings, By the power of the keys alone, so that the pronoun "our" indicates the godless in such a way that they take away from everyone the power to teach, to judge, to speak, and only usurp it and ascribe it to themselves, even if they are the most unlearned and most godless.

(23) I would also attribute this to the people of our time, if they did not lack the beautiful appearance and the fox's tail. For their ignorance and godlessness is evident to all, and there is not a hair of that tail to be seen, that is, there is no knowledge and no holiness, except that they have the name and the rabble think highly of them: yet they trust in it more than any people have done who have shone with the most respectable knowledge and the most beautiful holiness. Therefore, in our time, the church is in a much worse state than this verse says, since the godly are forbidden to speak (labia esse piorum) merely by force and tyranny, without any pretense.

(24) So they said to Christ when he was teaching, Matt. 21:23, "By what authority do you do this?" as if to say: The lips are not yours, but ours; the authority to teach is ours. So it says Apost. 5:28: "We have earnestly commanded you, 1) that ye teach not in this name." This is what the priests did to Jeremiah in Anathoth, to Isaiah in Ahaz, to Amos in Amaziah, and to all the prophets, forbidding them to speak as if they had no lips and no power to teach. Since the true prophets did not deny to them that they had power, but said that they were mistaken and taught falsely, the same ones put

1) In the editions (except the Weimar one): praeivimus, but according to the Vulgate xraeopimus should be read.

The priests could not err in the law, nor the wise men fail in counsel, nor the prophets teach falsely," Jer. 18:18.

25 This is exactly the same way they conclude today from the quantity of teachers, from the size of the audience, from the length of time, from the immutability (indefectibilitate) of Peter's faith, from the custom of the whole church (that is, of those who hear theirs). Puffed up by all these things, they say: The lips are ours and have the upper hand. With these exceedingly apparent and plausible reasons they can easily capture the minds of the people, as before ages these three things captured the people: The law is with the priests, the counsel with the wise men, the preaching with the prophets.

26. "Who is our Lord? This is what the wicked say, not as if they wanted to deny that they have God as their Lord, since they praise him only against the godly, and adorn their own with his name and blaspheme the cause of the godly, but because they do not want the godly to be preferred to them and to be heard, since they alone have arrogated to themselves the authority to teach. And this questioning has in it a very special and exceedingly pompous vehemence, by which they strongly persuade themselves and their own that they are acting rightly, and accuse the godly of a great sacrilege, in this way: Behold, we are set by God to be shepherds of the people, and have to give account for them; we alone have the power to teach and to judge what anyone has said. All the people must hear us, but we hear no one, for where the rulers (majoritas, as they call it) are, there is the power to command; but the others must necessarily obey. But this one is a new prophet; what he speaks must have been spoken from heaven [Ps. 73:9], and in setting out to instruct us, he diminishes our authority and is disrespectful to his superiors (that is how we speak today). He is not satisfied with neither hearing nor obeying us, nor is he satisfied with taking others away from us, but even wants to head and make us his disciples and rule over us completely.

27 Shall we then tolerate this? Shall we suffer this one to rule over us? Shall he give us laws and make regulations? And as the Jews said Joh. 9, 34. to the born blind man: "You teach us?" and Ps. 4, 7.: "How should this one teach us what is good?" and Gen. 37, 8. the brothers of Joseph said to him: "Should you become our king and rule over us?" With such horribly pompous and detestable pride, I say, this Moab accuses the humblest efforts of the godly for God's word of arrogance and sacrilegiousness, interpreting it that this is done in order to rule, and to diminish or suppress his power. For either one must not tell the truth at all to the great ones, and then the divine majesty is offended, or if it is told, one will bear the accusation that this was done, not to tell the truth, but to offend the majesty and to impair the power. So necessary is it that a messenger of truth should always give offense, either to God or to the great among men.

028 For them to say, Who is our lord? is the same as saying, Only desist from thy purpose to teach us, and desist from hearing or condemning what is ours, lest thou bring upon thyself the appearance that thou wilt not be both our teacher and our lord. For so Amaziah sent (Amos 7:10. f.) unto king Israel, saying, Amos maketh a tumult against thee in the house of Israel; the land cannot suffer his words. For thus saith Amos, Jeroboam shall die by the sword. "2c. See how he is accused of sedition, and that he usurped dominion, merely because he preached the truth. What would happen today if the theologians (as they should do) confessed the truth publicly?

29. However, it is also true that the wicked reject even the rule of God from themselves, although they pretend the opposite very strongly; first, because every high-minded person, and a man who is wise in the

Secondly, because they reject and defile the messengers of the Word of God, they reject at the same time God who sent them, as Christ says Matth. 10, 40: "Whoever receives you receives me, and whoever receives me receives him who sent me." And 1 Sam. 8:7. it is said, "They have not rejected thee, but me, that I should not be king over them." In this way Jeremiah Cap. 5, 12. says: "They deny the Lord and say: He is not, and so evil shall it not be unto us; sword and famine shall we not see."

(30) Thus it comes to pass that they at the same time most obstinately boast that they have God as their Lord, and at the same time with quite frightening arrogance reject Him in His servants and in His words. And so the appearance of humility in them, and the appearance of arrogance in the godly, which is very obvious, moves the foolish great multitude to hate godliness. Therefore, the prophet tells us to look at the ungodly in the spirit, for there they speak, because they hope to despise the word of the cross: "Who is our Lord?" as much as they let themselves be heard by heart in praise of God: To God alone be the glory, and: In the name of the Lord 2c.

V. 6. because the miserable are cast down, and the poor groan, I will arise, saith the LORD; I will provide a remedy, that they may teach with confidence. 1)

From this verse we have made two (in the Vulgate). Anstalt miseria would have been translated puffing vastitas, so that it referred to the first verse, where he said that the saints had fallen away and that the truth had been made little or an end, that is, that it had been laid waste, except for these remnants, for whose sighing, as he says, he wants to make himself out. And therefore it is certain that not all the saints have fallen away, and in the first verse there is an obviously exaggerated speech (hyperbole). Therefore, the prophet consoles himself with the verse

1) Vulgate: kropter miseriam inopum st Aernitum pauperum nune oxkurZam, äicit Vomiiuk; pouam m saluturi, Lüueialitor uZam L" eo.

He is sure that he will punish the arrogance that despises God's word and devastates the saints and the truth, and that he will exalt his people, as the following will show.

It has often been said that the saints of God are called poor and wretched in the Scriptures. Because of this reputation, they are exceedingly despised by the worthy, and suspected of usurping authority and magisterium over them, and are detested for sedition, disrespectfulness and disobedience (as they are wont to speak).

What this means, that the LORD rises, has been said in the 3rd Psalm, v. 8, namely, that it indicates the efficacy of salvation: "Arise, LORD, and help me, my God." So also here: "I will arise, and establish a help." And not without great emphasis is added: "saith the LORD," whereby the promise of GOD is extolled to awaken our faith and hope in such a tribulation. For in all Scripture there is nothing more precious than the promise of God. If it were not for this, there would be no place, neither for prayer, nor for works, nor for faith; indeed, not even for life, nor for any thing. For the promise of God sustains us and comforts us in all physical and spiritual distress.

Jerome says thus: Ponam in salutari auxilium eorum. I wonder what he wants to say by this, since it seems to me that the Hebrew text does not have the words auxilium eorum, and in the 10th Psalm, v. 5. [§ 48], he uses the has translated the same word [XXX] by despicit. I cannot teach anything certain here, and meanwhile will indicate my thoughts. Where we have here in Latin fiducialiter agam, in Hebrew is exactly the same expression translated by dominabitur in the 10th Psalm, v. 5. in the words: Omnium inimicorum suorum dominabitur, as we said there. Therefore, it cannot be said here in the first person: Agam fiducialiter.

34 Now let us give this half verse its two limbs. The former is this: Ponam in salute, the latter this: Loquitur ei or ad eum. The meaning of the former is be this: For this purpose I will set up (ponam), or establish, or fortify salvation, that is, I will establish a firm, lasting salvation, which even the gates of hell shall not be able to destroy, and I will save in such a way that no one henceforth shall be able to condemn, desolate, or put an end to my saints. For it is a speech in Hebrew without a closer determination (absoluta): "I will set" (ponam), that is, I will establish firmly, I will lay a firm foundation, I will be a founder. "To salvation" (in salute) means that this foundation does not consist in riches or things of the world, but in blessedness, so that those who are placed there shall be eternally blessed, and no one shall snatch them out of my hand.

35 This true opinion is almost the same as that expressed in Isaiah Cap. 28, 16: "Behold, I lay in Zion a foundation stone, a cornerstone. He that believeth shall not flinch"; only that this saying is shorter and darker. But it undoubtedly speaks of Christ, who is the firm foundation of salvation and the insurmountable rock for all who believe in him, whose name also comes from salvation, who is called here XXXX XXXX, I will put my trust in Jesus. This is contrasted with the ungodly, who will not be established, but will be driven away like the wind, not even to salvation, but to destruction and ruin, like a house built on sand. For this part of the verse is a word of promise, which comforts the miserable and terrifies the wicked, as I have said.

The meaning of the last part will be the same as the second part of the word in Isaiah: He that believeth shall not be put to shame. So also here: "He speaketh unto him," that is, he despiseth those, and speaketh confidently the word of the cross and of faith, as the apostle 2 Cor. 4, 13. introduces the 116th Psalm, v. 10: "I believe, therefore I speak; so also we believe, therefore so also we speak." For those who are saved by faith, founded on the rock of Christ, are bold to preach the word of God confidently to everyone who will believe, not being afraid of anyone, no matter how many, and not being afraid of anyone.

The powerful sects of the hypocrites, which, as Lucas Apost. 4, 8. ff. is fulfilled in the apostles. But those who do not have this faith do not dare to murmur.

Therefore, this very dark and short part of the verse must be taken as a whisper of the Spirit in David's ears, which he heard. When he sighed because of the devastation of the people and the faith, a short divine answer (oraculo) was given to him, in which it is indicated to him what means God had devised against this evil, namely this: "I will base myself on salvation; he speaks to it. 1) That is, you should know that I intend to do this against the destruction of the saints, that I will lay Christ as the foundation on which I will build my church and save it. They shall do nothing against it, nor shall they harm any believer. But I will not be satisfied with this, for it will happen that after they are saved in this way, they will dare to come out publicly and speak the word with joy, by which they will not only protect themselves, but also disturb their destroyers and convert many who had turned away.

38 And so everything can easily be brought into harmony, Fiducialiter agam in eo, that is, I will make them act confidently in the word of faith, as Lucas seems to have intentionally used this verse in the Acts of the Apostles, since he tells Acts 9, 27 that Paul acted joyfully in Damascus in the name of Jesus. 9, 27. that Paul at Damascus acted with all joy in the name of JESU, and Cap. 14, 3.: "They had their being there a long time, and taught freely (fiducialiter agentes) in the Lord," and Cap. 18, 26. it is said of Apollo: "This one began to preach freely (fiducialiter agere) in the school." It is peculiar to Lucas to praise the joyfulness in preaching the word of God, so that it is evident that he used this verse as a constant proverb.

39. the reputation of this man almost moves me to believe that this Hebrew word (of which we find in the 10th Psalm [§ 48] the statement

(In the first place, it means: to bring forward, to bring to light, to rule, to despise, and in this place, as Jerome gives it: to be a help, to consider and speak to oneself), it most properly means "to act confidently" (fiducialiter agere), which our Latin interpreter has placed, since Lucas understands nothing else by fiducialiter agere than: to preach the word confidently, that is, according to the 116th Psalm, v. 10, to believe, and therefore to speak. And this is the same, though somewhat darker and shorter: to despise, to rule, to come to, to consider, to speak, to be our help. For by what other power do we despise, rule, come to light, think, speak, have help than by the word of faith, which has been proclaimed with gladness? Therefore, just as the wicked rules over his enemies and confidently speaks his word against them, so the godly rules over his enemies and confidently speaks the word of God against them.

40 By this we are again taught that the power of the church is none other than the word of God, which is the power of God that saves all who believe in it, Rom. 1:16, and "the scepter of the power of God," Ps. 110:2. So Hosea Cap. 1, 7. says: "I will help them by the LORD their GOD (namely, who is preached by the word); but I will not help them by bow, sword, battle, horse, or horseman." Therefore, the meaning of this verse is recently that the godly are given a twofold help against the ungodly, namely faith and the word; faith, by which they themselves are saved; the word, by which they disturb the ungodly, and make much of the saints and the truth among men, whom those have disturbed. It is of faith that the prophet speaks, saying, "I will base myself on blessedness or salvation"; of the word, saying, "I will act confidently against him," or, "He speaks to him" (as it is said in the Hebrew).

41 Against whom does he speak and who speaks? Here no person is indicated, so unlimited (absoluta) and general is the utterance, as if he wanted to say: "I want to establish on salvation" or: I want to fortify by faith; and behold, by this the one who comes into the

1) The Weimar edition did not include the words: ei in the citation.

Being (hoc ipso est) who speaks. For as soon as someone believes, he also speaks immediately, as it says Apost. 2, 4: "They were filled with the Holy Spirit and began to preach."

The prophet also does not indicate the one to whom the speech is addressed, for the sake of the same generality [of the saying]. "He speaks to him" or "against him," namely, the ungodly or the ungodly desolate. And so, after faith is laid as a foundation, there is he that speaketh, and he that heareth, and there follows the gift of faith, both the speaking and the hearing; by these two there is much of mercy and truth.

But note also this, that the reasoning for salvation is the effect of God alone, but that the speaking to the ungodly is our cooperation. Therefore, God attributes this to Himself, this to man, which, however, our Latin translation also attributes to God, since it says in the first person: Fiducialiter agam. See then, how short, dark and rich in content this half verse is. But it would have been proper that the connective word "and" would have been inserted, namely in such a way: "I will base on salvation; and he speaks to him"; in order not to speak in the Hebrew way.

44 The same thought is treated in the 120th Psalm, v. 3 f. [What shall they give thee, or wherewith shall they equip thee, 1) against the false tongue, which maketh the saints and the truth to fall among men? He answers, "The sharp arrows of the mighty with the coals of junipers," that is, the words of evangelical grace with the examples of the ancient fathers, which agree with the gospel. For a scribe taught to the kingdom of heaven bears forth new and old. And Christ feeds great multitudes with the five loaves of the law of Moses, which is interpreted in the spirit, and with two fishes, that is, with the examples of the fathers, which are killed by the same spiritual law, and roasted by the fire of twofold love.

45 But let no one forget that the first thing is to be established in salvation, and only then to speak against it.

For faith and burning must be there rather than teaching and shining, if one wants to teach otherwise with fruit and joy. For without faith the word of salvation will not be taught. He says [Ps. 116, 10.]: In the time of persecution I believed, therefore I spoke.

V. 7 The speech of the Lord is pure, as silver refined in an earthen crucible, seven times.

This is to be understood as a contrast and dispute in which he holds the words of men and the words of God against each other. The words of those are vain, flattering and inconstant. But they are not purified by them, but only stained more in the spirit; by them mercy and truth fall away among men. God's words, however, are chaste, pure or pure, then also hard, but righteous, reliable and firm; by them men are purified, so that mercy and truth again become much, and vanity, falsehood and discord are destroyed.

47 This verse introduces a figurative speech of silver, which he also uses as an example, calling the speech of the Lord silver that has been tested, proven, and purified sevenfold, while in the eyes of the wicked it is indeed hardly the dross, scum, and filth of the world by which they think they are defiled and dishonored. So, on the other hand, he called their words vain, flattering, and inconstant, with which they bring mercy and truth to naught, but which seem to them to be something else altogether; on both of which ropes he spoke in the Spirit.

48 By "sayings of the Lord" he understands not only those that are written in books, but especially those that are spoken orally. Just as he said of the words of the wicked [v. 3]: "One speaks useless things to another, and hypocrites, and teaches out of a divided heart," so he does not call the Scriptures of God, but especially God's speeches "loud". For the Scripture does not harm or benefit as much as the speech, since the voice is the soul of the word. And it is not necessary that one should speak under the speeches of the

1) Instead of apxonetur in the editions should probably be read with -er Vulgata axponatur.

We do not understand the Lord to mean only that which is brought into oral speech from the Scriptures, but everything that God speaks through man, whether he be unlearned or learned, even without making use of the Scriptures, as He spoke in the apostles and still speaks in His own. Therefore, when the Lord speaks in us, these are the speeches of the Lord, but not when anyone refers to the Scriptures, for the devils and the wicked can do that too; yet God does not speak in them, nor are they speeches of God, but a foam of the speeches of God, like the dross of silver.

Therefore the means of salvation against the destroyers of the wretched and the destroyers of the saints of the earth is the word of God, which is established against the word of men. Since this is completely pure (like silver that has been purified, proven, and purified seven times), it purifies, fortifies, and proves the heart of man by making it like itself, so that it has nothing of what is its own on earth, but what is God's in heaven.

50. But the word of men, the dross and the foam of this silver, pretends to be silver by a certain lying appearance, but it is void. Then it is not only not pure, but impurity itself, since it is the impurity of silver, that is, they pretend to teach God's words, although they leave his pure, true and proper meaning in place and rather teach the foam or dross and the rest of the impurity, which, as it is impurity itself, so it does not purify anything, nor does it prove or make it reliable 1). Thus it is said in Isa. 1, 22: "Your silver has become foam, and your drink mixed with water."

(51) Let us show this by an example. If you were to teach these sayings of God: "Thou shalt not kill," "Thou shalt not commit adultery," and the like (to say nothing of human ceremonies) in such a way that you would say that someone has not killed or not committed adultery, if he has not killed or committed adultery by performing the work himself, then you would have impure, null and void, and you would not be able to say that he has not committed adultery.

1) In the original, in the Weimar and in the Basel: üäsww; in the Wittenberg and in the Jena: üä" levs, hence Greifs translates: "by faith light."

The people are taught inconstant dross instead of the solid, genuine and pure silver, since man meanwhile in spirit and will seeks death and adultery, and when this is done by others, does not bear sorrow nor punish it, but rather laughs at it and sings about it, as it is the general custom (mos), even the death (mors) of all men, since they are all bloodthirsty.

52. Again, if you teach that one who prays, fasts, or does any good work purely externally (secundum facti substantiam, as is now spoken of) serves God and has kept the holiday, you have again, with a hypocritical mouth, taught dross instead of silver, since he has done all this either with an unwilling heart or out of a desire for his own benefit, that is, without the Spirit, and therefore has not done them, but is found to be a false man, as is also the general custom or death of all men here, since they are all false, who not only do not punish these things, but boast of them as virtues, sing of them, and praise them. And by these things then the saints decrease, and the faithful become few among the children of men. For [Rom. 7, 14] "the law is spiritual." Therefore, by these useless and hypocritical lips it is not taught, but rather destroyed. Any one can perceive similar things in all other things throughout the Scriptures.

This verse follows the previous one, where the prophet had said: "And he speaks to him", in order to show who speaks and what he speaks, namely God his louder speeches. And to come to the grammar, the Hebrew does not actually say casta (chaste) [as in the Vulgate], but munda ["louder"], although in figurative speech (metaphorice) one often takes "chaste" for "louder". Nor is it necessary to think that he is speaking either of grammatical purity (of the speeches of God), although this too is not absent from the divine speeches, or of sensual or moral purity, since they often deal with shameful and shameful (puerendis) things (as it seems), 2) but of

2) Instead of traetet in the editions (only the Jena one has traetat) must be read either tEteut, because "1o-

Theological purity and purity of mind (affectuali), according to which they want to make man like themselves and purify him only from impure minds, 1) with which no one stains man more shamefully than the hypocritical teachers of human things, who teach their own righteousness and even increase and blow out the impure inclinations, so that they boast of their filth, let alone that they should be purified. For no man's heart is cleansed except by the word of God received in faith, Apost. 15:9, "He cleansed their hearts by faith," and Ps. 19:8 [Vulg.], "The law of the LORD is without change, converting souls"; Ps. 51:9, "Defile me, O LORD, with mop, that I may be clean."

54. "Tested in the fire." Our Latin translator has added the words "in the fire"; the Hebrew says only: "refined silver" or melted or proven; because this is done by fire, the interpreter has added this for clarity.

55. almost all think that probatum terrae is spoken in the Greek way, saying that it is as much as pure and clean with respect to the earth or from the earth, as one says: clean from the blood. And Jerome translates: Separate from the earth, where they treat the earth in many a secret interpretation. But I am completely blind here. That is certain, that terrae in Hebrew is the dative, which can be translated: for (ad) the earth, better than: of (a) the earth. Furthermore, Neuchlin says that baß (which our Latin interpreters translated by probatum) is the name of a small vessel in which metals are melted, to which the preposition "in" is added.

It is as if you translated this part as: silver melted in an earthen (terrae) crucible, or for the earth (ad terram), which reads: for a thing or for the use of the earth, that is, which those who are on the earth, namely men, use. If this were true, then one assumes that the prophet took the simile from the procedure of the silver workers (as it happens in general 2) with all prophets), and that he applied the secret interpretation of the same to the speeches of God. For the silver is of no use on earth if it is not first melted and refined, so that one must distinguish the silver for the earth from the silver in the pits, in the veins and passages (minerarum). For this use, however, it cannot be melted in any other way than by fire, and by fire again in any other way than in a vessel.

56 Now let us indicate the secret interpretation of these things. The speeches of God, said or written in the coarse letter and in a carnal sense about the opinion of the cross, are the silver in the veins, as Job, Cap. 28, 1. [Vulg.]: "Silver has the beginnings of its ad'ern", or it is piled up in raw mass, as David exemplified, when he prepared for Solomon everything that was necessary to build the temple [1 Chron. 29, 14. ff.]. But the people on earth have no use of this hidden treasure, as Sirach says Cap. 20, 32: "A wise man who cannot be used and a buried treasure, what use are they both?" until they are brought to light and proven, when the wicked, the heretics and the devils lay themselves against them.

But the believers are this earthen crucible, in which this treasure is carried [2 Cor. 4, 7], and it is proved, because he generally lets it go into battle, so that it may conquer, and know that wisdom is mightier than all things, Wis. 10,³) 12. Now after the word of God has been proved and found reliable in such a way through the fire, it benefits many people through the preaching of those who are proved. This is what the apostle touched on in 1 Cor. 11, 19, when he says: "There must be brethren among you," that is, fires that melt you, "so that those who are righteous (probati) (that is, the vessels in which the silver of the speeches of GOD are purified) become manifest among you" that they have become the salt of the earth and a light of the world, that is, that they shine on the earth to men who have been stirred up to the praise of GOD, and who have thus been supported and enriched by the use of this silver. This is certainly what he expresses here by "for the earth" (terrae) or "for the use of the earth".

Because the wicked detest this melting and proving of the word of God to themselves and do not want to endure the pain of the cross, they seek to please men and become useless talkers, false, deceivers, unstable, as the apostle explains in the letter to the Galatians and this psalm says. Therefore, the speech of God is not understood, nor does it bear fruit, if we are not killed and afflicted, that is, if we are not well challenged and tempted for the sake of the word, because it is not both we who suffer, but the word that suffers in us.

(59) To this sense our Latin translation can be drawn, by passing over the glosses of others, in such a way: "Proven for the earth" (probatum terrae), that is, invented faithful, pleasant, and pleasing to men on earth, who have come to know by experience its faithfulness, power, and soundness, and trust in the same, and, having lost the shameful trust in all other things, which those ungodly teach, are purified only by the very pure faith in the very pure Word. And so terrae remains quite properly the dative, as it is in both Greek and Hebrew.

60. "Prove seven times." Here one deals more thoroughly with the sevenfoldness of the gifts of the Spirit than my little mind and the meaning of the letter can suffer. I take "seven times" simply for: wholly perfect, for seven is a number denoting a whole, and I do not know whether he here refers to the purification of silver, by which it is purified, not in the crucible, but in bone ashes with an addition of lead, 1) so that it becomes wholly and completely pure.

1) This statement by Luther is erroneous. The lead is the impurity that is almost always attached to the silver, from which it is freed in the leniency process.

And how wonderfully does the wisdom of God play in the world, that the lead serves to purify the silver! namely, that the speeches of the hypocrites, since they are similar to the speeches of God, as the lead is similar to the silver, nevertheless work in the fire of persecution in such a way and at the same time suffer the effect that, as the lead disappears and the silver is purified, so in the end the right wisdom shines forth and their foolishness becomes nothing (as the apostle says 2 Tim. 3, 9.). For thus the exceedingly apparent doctrine of the ungodly, by resisting godliness, serves for the glory of right doctrine and for its own disgrace. Therefore it was not improper to attach the first purification by the crucible to the persecutors, the tyrants, the latter by the lead, to the heretics and the false brethren, who are worked with us, as the lead is worked with the silver in the same ashes and vessel, so in the same church and in the footsteps of the dead fathers and the martyrs. But the tyrants work outwardly, like the bellows on the crucible.

(62) Thus we see how the prophet takes everything from works and attributes it to faith, assuring that the words of God are pure, and at the same time sharply rebuking those who want to become pure by works. For what is the use of doing many works if you do not become pure? But purity is nowhere but in the sayings of God, and by the sayings of God no one is purified unless he believes. But no one believes unless he suffers more than he does. Therefore, the purest and most sinless life is not found in works, but in faith in the Word and in suffering.

But why does he compare silver to the speeches of God rather than gold? Gold is actually compared to love in the Scriptures; its nature in fire is different from that of silver, which we will discuss below.

V. 8. May you, Lord, preserve them and protect us from this generation forever. 2)

64. the latin translator could have better said in the optativum:., du

2) Vulgate: Oomine, servadis nos, et eustodies nos a Generatione liae in aeternuni.

You will keep, you will preserve, since it is indeed a prayer of the prophet against the generation of the saints of works. And although servare and custodire are not very different, the Hebrew text places servabis in the last part, and custodies in the first, as Jerome does. For he asks to be protected (servari) from the sex, in such a way that it may be resisted (prohibendi modo), namely, that we may be resisted from agreeing with them; and that his speeches may be preserved (custodiri), he asks in such a way that they may be protected (protegendu modo), so that they may not steal them. Instead of servabis nos [you will preserve us] in Hebrew is servabis ea ["you will preserve them"], referring to the speeches of GOD, as Jerome translates. But it may perhaps also refer to the saints, since it is masculine, servabis eos. I would not reject this either if someone wanted to understand "thou wilt preserve them (eos)" from the ungodly, that GOD preserve them and forbid that they henceforth speak useless things, and cut off the saints from among the children of men.

But we see that it is not in our power that the words of the Lord remain true and that the saints on earth do not fall away, but in God's power. You, Lord, not we men will preserve; as Christ taught [Matth. 9, 37. f.]: "The harvest is great, but few are the laborers. Therefore pray the LORD of the harvest, that he may send forth laborers into his harvest." He commanded us to pray the same in the Holy Our Father, teaching us to ask for our daily bread, that is, for the speeches of GOD. But we leave the prayer, trust in science, gifts and diligence, and live in security until we ourselves have become such people who speak useless things, and a godless generation, from which the prophet asks to be protected here.

From this it must be concluded that this psalm, although it actually refers to Christ's time like everything else, nevertheless also, because this generation will not pass away until everything happens, it extends to our time and all times. Truly for our

Since the beginning of time, the Turks, the Jews and the ceremonialists have greatly increased this race, and have trampled underfoot almost all faith and the whole word of faith. Against them we can do nothing but ask the Lord of the harvest to make Himself known, to establish salvation firmly, and to speak to them.

v. 9. for it becomes full of the ungodly everywhere, where such loose people rule among the people. 1)

The word multiplicasti is not in Hebrew. Jerome has it thus: In circuitu impii ambulans, cum exaltati fuerint vilissimi filiorum hominum. I think that this verse has not yet been pulled out of the darkness by anyone, just as little as the word that is found above [v. 7, § 59], probatum terrae. With regard to these two passages, I confess my ignorance, and do not hesitate to say the same about all others who have written about them so far.

²⁾ [First, in Hebrew there is not in circuitu, but the transitive verbum in Hiphil (terti) XXXX, which means: He has surrounded, so that one could translate in such a way: He hath surrounded the ungodly, they go thither; that is, this generation, from which thou mayest preserve us, loads itself with heaps of ungodly teachers, and people who prick their ears; to these it attaches itself, with these it joins in multitudes, and teachers and pupils alike walk in their own ways, and grow worse and worse, are deceived and cheat, as it is said in the first Psalm, v. 1: "Blessed is he that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly." Therefore, the connective word "and" must be placed between: He has surrounded the ungodly, and they go, according to the ordinary Hebrew way of speaking. "They gather with heaps, and go thither." And the sense would be clearer if the pronoun were put in front of it (as it is usually done), namely: Quae circumdedit impios et ambulabunt (which (gender) has surrounded the wicked, and they go there). Now if one wanted to say this in the neuter: It has surrounded, and the wicked go there, the same sense remains, only that then circumdedit [it has surrounded] stands alone, without a thing to which it refers (absoluto statu), and means as much as: It has caused many to surround it and adhere to it, so that now, in the same way as their teachers, the ungodly pass away in their obstinacy).

2) This paragraph is found only in the first original edition and in the first Basel reprint. In his letter to Pellican (in this volume after the 31st Psalm) and at the end of the interpretation of the 22nd Psalm, Luther says that what is said in this passage is not correct and that he wants it to be deleted.

In the second part (of the verse) our Latin interpreter said: Secundum altitudinem [tuam], 1) but the pronoun tuam is too much, and Jerome says: When they are raised. The word "height" must definitely stand here. It seems to me that XX is an active stem verb (verbum primitivum), that is, He has exalted or raised, so in my judgment it should be translated thus: As he hath exalted the worst of the children of men. For where in Latin we have multiplicasti, in Hebrew it is in the feminine gender, which means bad, rejected, frivolous people, as there are the revellers and gluttons. For in Hebrew also those who give themselves up to gluttony and feasting are called XXXXX, in the masculine gender.

(69) The meaning is this: this generation has surrounded the ungodly teachers, and at the same time they go, as they themselves have exalted and willed those who are the worst to the children of men (or among the children of men), that is, this generation gathers ungodly disciples and exalts the worst teachers. As the disciples, so are the masters, so the blind lead the blind, and both fall into the pit. If the opinion of this

Is it not nowadays fulfilled to the highest degree? For who is put at the helm of the church today as the yeast of the world? namely, such people whom the world can neither use nor enjoy, and this our ungodly ingratitude well deserves.

(70) Again, we see here that the ungodly teachers are ascribed the care of the belly, as the prophet said in the 5th Psalm, v. 10: "Their mouth is an open grave", and the apostle called the belly their god in Phil. 3, 19, while the prophet here calls them by the most ugly name, that is, slavers, who seek nothing but their food. And it seems not in vain that the one X is missing in the word XXXX and the letter X in the verb XXX, as if on both sides there was only a pretense, but the thing itself was missing, since they were in fact not exalted, and they themselves wanted to be taken for something completely different than slavers. But this we want to leave to the cabalists or rather to cheeky and idle people.

Our Latin translation can be adapted to this sense: In circuito impii ambulans, that is, many who are surrounded and environed on all sides, both the disciples and the ungodly masters, go along and persevere in their ways, because you have made many of the children of men according to your height, that is, in the place of your authority you have decreed not children of GOD, but children of men, and not such as are rare and good, but many, and those who are the worst of them. The holy fathers refer the "children of men" to the children of GOD; and "height" (altitudinem) some hold to be the secret counsel (of GOD), others the grace and mercy of GOD shown without merit of men. I do not reject their opinion, but I do not believe that it is according to the letter.

The thirteenth Psalm.

V. 1-3: To sing a psalm of David. O Lord, how long will you forget me? How long will you hide your face from me? How long shall I be troubled in my soul, and daily fear in my heart? How long shall my enemy rise up against me?

The simplicity of the expression in Hebrew, that four times the same word "how long" is repeated, is more pleasing and serves more to bring out a strong emphasis than the translation of the Latin interpreter, who loves variety, and has put in the third place [instead of usquequo] quam diu, not without great impairment of the emphasis. It seems to be a general saying in this psalm, spoken in the person of those who suffer similar things as David, that is, death and hell. This position of the heart is similar to that in the sixth Psalm, for here too he speaks [v. 4.] of death and struggles with despair, but praises the mercy of God.

2 This is also indicated by the extremely violent entrance, that he bursts forth with four struggling and sharp questions. For although in every affliction the delay is severe, in this spiritual one it is most severe, so much so that in the 6th Psalm he says [v. 8, Vulg.]: "I have grown old among all my enemies," and Ps. 32:3: "For when I would have concealed it, my bones fainted, through my daily weeping." Thus he complains four times about the excessive delay of divine help and laments that he has been abandoned, that he has been given over to oblivion, that is, that he is in despair and will never be accepted for mercy; for this is what happens to those who are in this fear of eternal death.

3 There is now an emphasis on the individual words with which he expresses that God is angry as far as the feeling and the attitude of the spirit are concerned. You do not only rely on me as if you wanted to test me and observe me, but you also forget me as one who has been destroyed and extinguished.

out of the book of life and out of your memory, who is utterly rejected, and whom you will never see; and not merely for a time, but utterly (in finem) and forever, so that there is no hope left, but I must be eternally lost with the damned. Even though I cry out and cry out to you here, behold, not only do you not hear me, but so that you do not hear, you even turn your face away from me and have become implacable.

4 Does he not depict with appropriate words this extremely bitter anguish of heart, which is felt everywhere that God has turned away, is hostile, unforgiving, implacable, eternally angry? For here hope despairs and despair hopes at the same time, and only the inexpressible groaning lives, with which the Spirit represents us [Rom. 8, 26], who floats on the waters covered with darkness, as Gen. 1, 2. says. No one understands this who has not tasted it; it does not happen with imaginations and play of thoughts, as those who play with thoughts (speculatores) can calmly do their play, but it is in the innermost feeling of the immortal life, that is, of the soul. Immortal is the one who suffers, immortal are the things that oppress us, namely sins, immortal is the final purpose for which this happens, namely God who rejects, and immortal are those who oppress us, namely the devils who accuse us before God, as Revelation 12:10 says.

5 And so this affliction is eternal and inevitable from all causes (as they say), according to the essential cause (materiali), according to the final cause (finali), according to the effecting cause (efficiente), according to the manner (formali). For the soul suffers less in the part according to which it is temporal and mortal, that is, through the flesh and sensation. But in the part according to which it is immortal, it is tormented in such a way that its cannot be consoled. I call the soul mortal and immortal to express the nature of the thing, so that someone could not catch me in my words. For the soul dies to this life, while it nevertheless lives immortally for the life to come. Thus it suffers less from men, from the world, from the flesh, than from the devils who oppress it by reproaching it with sins, death and hell; it suffers less in sensual sufferings than in the fear and terror of conscience; less because of the satisfaction for sins and the hoped-for reconciliation with God, than because of the eternal and immutable foreknowledge of God, according to which it is rejected.

(6) Therefore, let no one think that these words are ordinary afflictions: You forget, you turn away, you do not hear, you do not decide to be heard, you erase me from your memory, you will never look at me again, and even (as Job Cap. 9, 16. says: "Even if I call upon him and he hears me, I do not believe that he hears my voice," as if he wanted to say: "He appears to me to be so adamant that even though someone might assume that I am heard, I do not believe it so completely that I cannot hope that my voice is heard, let alone heard.

(7) Now, when someone feels that God is thus against him, the wretched man, left to himself, does what follows, that is to say, he anxiously tries to make himself free by trying on all sides, takes many counsels, but always remains in such a way that he does not know any counsel, as Hezekiah says in Isaiah Cap. 38, 15. [Vulg.] says: "What shall I say? Or what will he answer me, since he has done it himself?" For when a man is seized with distress, he knows not whither to turn. For when he wants to flee to God, he hears this, "You hide your face from me," and, "What will he answer me, since he has done it himself?" If he wants to flee to someone else, there is no one else who could pull him out, yes, everything pleads with God against him, and so he is driven by fear to seek much advice from all sides, and yet they cannot be found. That is why he says [v. 3, Vulg.], "How long shall I take counsel in my soul?" for it is the same expression as in the first Psalm, v. 1, "the counsel of the wicked," namely, the counsels of the heart, according to which he should keep and guide himself.

(8) No one knows what the trials of such a sorrowful soul are, except the one who suffers them. But Job gives us an excellent example in the entire ninth chapter, as he lists the glorious and wonderful works of God, and shows how the soul thinks many things in this hour that is given to it. Soon it straightens up to see what God has done to the wicked, so that it wants to comfort itself; again, since it hopes that its previous good works will be respected, it falls down again, and says [Job 9:20]: "Though I am pious, yet he makes me wrong," yes, he even says this: Even if someone were innocent before him, he could still destroy him (for this is how one feels); therefore he says [v. 22], "He kills both the pious and the wicked," as if to say, "It matters not whether you are righteous or unrighteous here; he can reject any one. And he cannot find anything here that he could set as a difference between a godly and an ungodly, since he recognizes that everything is God's, freely given.

(9) But neither the place nor my ability allow me to treat this chapter with dignity. Christ suffered the same tribulation on the cross; since he says [Math. 8, 20.] that he does not have where to lay his head; and [Ps. 142, 5.]: "I cannot escape, no one takes care of my soul", because restlessness, fear, flight, consternation prevail here.

(10) "And have sorrow in my heart daily," that is, sadness, affliction, dejection (for this is what the Hebrew says) all day long. For he fears every moment as he worries about being eternally rejected. It is precisely the fear that causes the pain that does not allow the challenged to flee. Therefore Paul expresses all this with these words, Rom. 2, 8. f.: "To them that are contentious, unkindness and wrath, tribulation and anguish upon all the souls of the People who do evil, especially to the Jews and also to the Greeks."

11. ponam consilia in anima mea [I will lay counsel in my soul] is spoken after the Hebrew manner, as: I have put my words in your mouth, and: Put this in your heart. I have put my soul in my hand. In Latin, we would say for it: Capiam consilia, to take counsel], and "in my soul", that is, with myself, because there was no one from whom I could have received counsel, since no man knows this sighing, let alone could counsel it. So, as he suffers alone, he also anxiously discusses various things alone within himself; there is no sharing of advice or of the pain he has in his heart. And it is precisely this that troubles him most, for in other, ordinary tribulations one can find people who have suffered similar things and know how to advise and comfort.

12. "How long shall my enemy rise above me?" Before he attributed this to God, who forgets him and turns away from him, does not hear him; now he attributes it to the enemy. And here the victory already begins to lean toward the challenged, and the temptation to come to an end. For it is part of the victory to recognize the enemy in this challenge and to gain the upper hand over him. For even though the enemy is elevated by God's decree, in the midst of the temptation the enemy is not before one's eyes, but God alone seems to do everything. And the enemy also strives with great zeal that the one who is challenged should not ascribe it to him, but to God alone, as was shown in the case of the crucified Christ, whom they attacked with blasphemies in such a way that it seemed as if he were hated by God. Thus he says in the 3rd Psalm, v. 3: "Many say of my soul, 'It has no help from God'."

13 He does not call the enemy by name, but speaks in general terms, but he understands the devil and his plots, because he actually reigns in this temptation. Therefore there are some who believe that Christ also suffered this temptation many times, especially in the garden, and Joh. 12, 27. f., where He said, "Now my soul is saddened. And what shall I say? Father, help me out of this hour. But this is why I have come to this hour. Father, glorify your name." These are wonderful words and certainly full of anguish. See how he also here takes counsel in his soul, which is afflicted. First, "What shall I say?" Secondly, he asks, "Help me." Again he retracts this [v. 27.], "But therefore am I come to this hour," until he said, "Father, declare thy name." Here, at last, the struggle is ended, which, no one should be surprised to learn, is wrought by the devil. For Lucas writes Cap. 4, 13. that the devil, when he had tempted him in the wilderness, departed from him for a time. From this they conclude, and not unreasonably, that he was often challenged after that. For there is no need to listen to those who want to present Christ as an insubstantial block, of whom we must believe that he, as a pure and true man, was subjected to all temptations, as he also says to his disciples [Luc. 22:28]: "It is you who have persevered with me in my temptations."

14 Therefore, after recognizing the enemy who does this, the ray of divine mercy immediately begins to shine and strengthen the soul, so that it accuses the enemy and has good confidence in God, which could not be in the midst of the whirlwind of the storm. Therefore, this is also the last part of the complaint, that the enemy rises against him.

V. 4 Look and hear me, O Lord, my God. Enlighten my eyes, so that I do not fall asleep in death.

In the section of verses that is confused in Latin, I follow the Hebrew. Behold, how different a heart is here! Since he complained before that he had prayed in vain, that God had forgotten him and had turned away and not heard him, now that he has stopped, he has gained the confidence that his prayer will be heard, as Christ taught Luc. 11, 5-8. about stopping in prayer by the example of a friend who refuses and another who stops. So also God beats for a little while the request

For if the prophet did not believe that he would be heard, he would not pray. Therefore he now comes forth almost victorious, and asks that the challenge be ended, and that he may be graciously looked upon, since he is indeed already looked upon and heard. For we do not ask that we may be looked upon sooner than he looks upon us; but [we ask] that we may also be able, through peace of heart and good confidence, to be looked upon, since, looking upon us by his obliging grace, he has caused us to ask to be looked upon and heard, so that there is not only the grace of God who has mercy on us, but also the peace of the man who knows mercy.

(16) But he opposes each one with another: he had complained of four evil things, so now he demands four good things. "Behold" refers to the word, "How long wilt thou forget," as if to say: Not only did you not see me, but you also did not think of me, but now do not remember me alone, but also come closer and look at me, so that the more frightening the evil was, the greater the good you do me. "Behold," however, according to the Scriptures, denotes the active intervention (effectum) 1) of the merciful God, as is said of the word "make up" in the preceding Psalm [v. 6, § 32], and "behold" denotes a sooner and lovelier activity (effectum) than "remember," just as it is harder when God does not remember than when He does not behold. Thus, in a beautiful and appropriate contrast, he puts the evil he has suffered together with the good he is to receive.

17) "Hear me, O Lord, my God," refers to the word: "How long hast thou hid thy face from me? You were distant and implacable, as if you wanted to do nothing but condemn me, like a severe, harsh judge. Not only did you not hear me, but you also turned away your face so that you would not hear me. But now that you have become "the Lord my God," do not turn to me alone.

me that thou hearest me, but that thou also hearest me, as if thou wouldest do nothing else but preserve me, so that instead of an angry judge I might have an exceedingly gracious God.

18. "Enlighten my eyes, lest I fall asleep in death," refers to the word: "How long shall I trouble my soul, and be afraid in my heart daily?" For when God's face is turned away from us, there immediately follows affliction, dismay, darkness in the mind, and that one knows no counsel, so that we grope, as it were, in darkness, and search on all sides for where we can escape. So when the Lord lifts up the light of his countenance upon us [Ps. 4:7], and turns his face toward us to hear us, our eyes are again enlightened, and all is full of the most fruitful counsels. For "he that walketh by day doth not stumble, because he seeth the light of this world" [John 11:9]. So we come to him and are enlightened, and our faces are not put to shame [1Kings 2:16].

(19) To this word, "How long shall mine enemy exalt himself over me?" refers what follows [v. 5], "Lest mine enemy boast that he hath become mighty over me." But here he adds, "Lest I fall asleep in death," remembering the danger. For "fall asleep" is the same expression which in the Vulgate] Ps. 4, 9. by requiescam, and by Jerome by dormiam there translated, "I lie and sleep all in peace," that is, I shall, when I have died, lie in peace with my fathers. For thus he uses the word "sleep," because he speaks in the Spirit, and the custom of Scripture so entails, not to denote bodily sleep, but death.

20. and, as I have said, in this verse is indicated the great strength of this temptation, which consists in the fact that death and hell are held forth as momentarily imminent, and that this terror oppresses with intolerable bitterness, and (as Hezekiah says Isa. 38, 10.): the gates of hell will now swallow me up into the eternal pit, and, as it is said in another place [Ps. 69, 16.]: "Let not the hole of the pit close upon me." Therefore pray that he will not fall asleep in death, that is, that he will not die and lie dead in eternal death, which he expresses more extensively in the 6th Psalm, v. 6: "For in death you are not remembered; who will thank you in hell? The opposite saying is found in Ps. 4:9: "I lie down and sleep in peace." For while the light of the face of GOD is upon him, he is joyful, and he dies in peace. But where he turns away his face and lets him labor anxiously in his soul with his counsels, he fears with pain that he will die in death, that is, in utter restlessness and eternal disgrace, as dust, seized by the whirlwind, is driven about.

1) In the Basel: EeturQ instead of: eKeetuin.

Therefore this verse is the light for this psalm, in that it clearly shows that this challenge takes place in the high things, namely faith, hope and love, where distrust, despair, hatred, blasphemy and the like abominations of hell and the damned contend in the bitterest battle with faith, hope and love. The struggle (negotium) of unchastity, anger, pride, avarice with chastity, meekness, humility, generosity, yes, the fury of bodily persecution, be it fire, famine, sword or disgrace, is nothing compared to this evil. Therefore, it must be understood here that he fears death for this reason, because in death there is no praise and remembrance of God, but hatred and blasphemy, which he detests most.

V. 5. lest my enemy boast that he has become mighty over me, and my adversaries rejoice that I lie down. 1)

(22) Since this is a verse in Hebrew, the sense becomes clearer if the connective et is inserted in the middle to indicate clearly the repetition of the same thing, in this way: Ne forte dicat inimicus meus: Potui ei, et tribulatores mei exsultent, quod motus fuerim. For the verbum: Potui ei ["I have become powerful of it or: Praevalui

1) Vulgate: "Zioat irūruieM

adversus eum [I have prevailed against him] the Latin translator rendered Ps. 129, 2. like this: Etenim non potuerunt mihi ["but they have not overpowered me"]. For this is how it is spoken in Hebrew, where we say: to have the upper hand against someone. It is the same thing, then, that the enemies boast that they have prevailed, and that the oppressors rejoice that he is defeated, which would happen in any case if he were to pass away in death. In the same sense he also speaks in the 6th Psalm, v. 9, against them: "Depart from me, all evildoers (that is, you who cause me XXX or pain), for the Lord hears my crying." And Ps. 38:17: "For I think that they will not rejoice over me. If my barrel were shaken, they would boast highly against me." There almost with the same words the same thought is expressed, as one can see.

This is the boasting and shouting of the devils, as they did through the Jews against the crucified Christ [Matth. 27, 42. f.]: If you are the Son of God, then come down from the cross. Help yourself. Deliver him, lusts for him; where the enemy rises, as he complained in the third 2) verse. That this does not happen, or does not happen eternally and irretrievably, is what he asks for here. Since this is already exceedingly burdensome when it is done by men in the victories in temporal things, which are to be regarded as child's play, this humiliation is incomparably more terrible when it is done by devils in the victories that concern eternal things. This is the extreme misfortune, whereof it is said: Woe to the vanquished! where, in addition to the misfortune and the tribulations, the reviling, rejoicing and boasting is added, which tends to hurt more than the battle itself, yes, more than death and destruction itself. By this similitude (symbolo) we are taught what will happen to the conquered when they become eternally disgraced. But how the devils can rejoice, of whom we believe that they suffer their damnation everywhere, I leave to others to explain. There are plenty of examples that they rejoice over the fall of the saints.

2) The text says: ynarto.

and even if the examples were not, the sight of this scripture is enough to make believers certain of the truth of this matter.

v. 6 But I hope that you will be so gracious; my heart rejoices that you are so willing to help. I will sing to the Lord that he is so good to me.

This is a verse in Hebrew, and the last part [in the Vulgate]: et psallam nomini Domini altissimi, is taken from the 7th Psalm, v. 18. For the Hebrew text closes the second part of the verse thus: "That he hath done so well for me," or, to render it literally: For he has rewarded me. Therefore the first part has three parts: "I hope that you are so gracious"; "my heart rejoices that you are so glad to help"; "I will sing to the Lord". These movements of the heart have been abundantly spoken of in the 5th Psalm.

25 But he seems to oppose this to the boasting of his enemies, as if to say: They boast that they have prevailed, and rejoice that I am defeated. But I boast not of my strength, but of thy mercy; I rejoice not in my victory, but in thy help, that is, in the salvation whereby thou hast made me blessed by thy mercy, who was unworthy, and deserving of something quite different; so that there is a strong emphasis on the words, "that thou art so merciful". (miseriordia tua) and "that you are so glad to help" (salutari tuo).

(26) Hereby is again inculcated what must often be inculcated because of those who know nothing of God and because of the arrogant hypocrites, namely, that there is no one who is not found to be a damned sinner before God, that also no one can stand before this rough storm (aquilonis) of the devils, however holy and full of good works he may be. For the devils immediately make these good works stink by their exceedingly powerful accusations, if one does not despair in sincere faith and hope of his own merits and worthiness, and grasps only the mercy of God, and holds that God has done them in vain.

and trusts that through it alone one attains blessedness, so that in such a way there is the opportunity to sing to the Lord alone, not to us, since he has made the unworthy blessed out of pure mercy, and our heart can rejoice in this blessedness. For if something else could serve for blessedness than the mercy of God, he would undoubtedly have stated this here as well; rather, he complained that all the counsels of his soul, among which he also spoke of his merits, had caused him nothing but pain. Mercy alone is so completely necessary, and suffers nothing beside it, for which man could hope at the same time. For that would mean "grabbing with the legs" [Ezek. 16, 25] and "limping on both sides" [1 Kings 18, 21], and after the manner of the Samaritans, honoring God and an idol at the same time. But GOtte serves no one but by faith, hanging purely and solely on His one mercy. Otherwise, not only the Lord is sung and thanks are given, but also our idol, that he had a hand in it; but let that be far away.

27 "For he has repaid" (reddidit). One need not dream here of merits worthy of merit, of merits worthy of eternal life, of merits to which the grace of God is due in equity (merita digni, condigni, congrui), as we take this word retribuere or reddere. For what is given out of mercy alone (redditur) is given to the unworthy and for nothing; for this is due singing, praise and thanksgiving. But what is recompensed for merit, without mercy, even out of the requirement of justice, praise and singing is due to him who does it, not to him who recompenses. Such godless teachers, by these their harmful teachings, extinguish the joy of the heart and the kindness of God among men, and take away His praise, as Micah Cap. 2, 9. Says: "You drive the wives of my people from their dear homes," that is, from the confident heart that rejoices in the help of God's loving mercy, "and always take from their young children my ornaments." This is certain and is also confirmed by the custom of all people, that those who rejoice in their benefactor, sing to him, bless him, who realize that they have been helped in vain. In order for us to recognize how much more this is to be done to God, and to do it, we must know 1) that what a person has lost or seemed to have lost in the temptations, he will receive again all the more abundantly afterwards, because God will give it back to him.

Therefore, the word "retribute" indicates a loss of goods rather than a gain, if one pays attention to the use of Scripture, or rather a change of things, in that God kills and makes alive, makes sinners and makes them righteous, and generally takes everything away and gives everything back. Whoever does not have this knowledge of the cross must be driven by these dreams that merits must be collected, which are balanced by rewards according to equity, dignity and worth (congruis, condignis, dignis) also with God. For also the word of the apostle [2 Tim. 4, 8.]: "Henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the LORD, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day," I would prefer to interpret it in such a way that he refers to his adversaries, rather than to his merit, in this way: Since GOD is a righteous judge,

1) In the Jena: seiendes instead of: seienänin. The Weimar one puts a period before 8eienönin.

In that day he will give me the crown for the disgrace with which the world disgraces me in this time; but he will repay it for its honor, with which it flaunts itself as an unrighteous one in this time, and will change it into shame in that day, so that he definitely indicates that one thing should be taken away and another given in its place, both out of mercy, for nothing, as the priest Joshua in Zechariah, Cap. 3, 1-5, his unclean garments are taken off, in which Satan resisted him, and he is clothed with ceremonial garments, as it says there.

29. that which is expressed in the Latin by mihi, and in the Hebrew by over me, is the same expression as above [v. 3.], "How long shall my enemy rise over me?" and Ps. 7, 9. [Vulg.], "According to my innocence over me," where we would more properly have said: [Judge me] according to my innocence benefit me (mihi), than what we have [Ps. 7, § 66], taught and accepted from Jerome, since this expression indicates only a movement toward a place, as also in the 38th Psalm, v. 17. "If my foot wavered, they would boast high against me" (super me). So also there [Ps. 7, 9.]: Judge me according to my innocence, or: Judge for me (ad me) or for my benefit (mihi), so that "judge me" must be connected with the verb "judge", not with "innocence".

The fourteenth Psalm.

V. 1. A Psalm of David, to be sung. The foolish say in their heart, There is no God. They are good for nothing and are an abomination with their nature; there is no one who does good.

I. These two verses are one in the Hebrew, and the words [in the Vulgate]: Non est usque ad unum [there is also not one] are superfluous in this place, since they stand [in the Hebrew], only once in the third verse. In Hebrew it is said: The Thor says in his heart: There is no God. Corrupt and abominable have they made their doings; since is not the one who does good. There "the Thor" stands after the figure of the synecdoche in the singular for the whole people, because it follows, "they have made" in the plural.

2 This Psalm is taken from Genesis 6:11, 12, where it is said in similar words that the earth was corrupted by the children of men, and that the Lord looked upon the children of men and their unrighteousness or wickedness, which in Hebrew is called "wickedness".

XXX [v. 11], that is, that injustice, violence, oppression have taken over.

which he expresses here [v. 4] in this way: his people will be devoured. Therefore, the course of this very history will explain this psalm quite nicely, since it describes the generation of the wicked in equal destruction either in the present, or prophesies that it will get the upper hand in the future; for this generation lasts on and on, although it rages more cruelly at times.

3. Now in this psalm the prophet does not speak of the persecution of the godly, nor of false teachers, but his purpose (scopus) is to describe the manners and life of sinners or the evil generation, and to show, that all men are sinners and wicked, who walk apart from grace, living only in pride, pleasure, robbery, deceit, murder, and similar sins, though they strive to give all these things a beautiful color, or yet neglect to take heed. And for this purpose Paul introduces this Psalm Rom. 3, 10. ff.

The first evil, namely the source of all evil, is that they know nothing of God. For whoever sins against the first commandment will not let any of the other commandments go unbroken. But since all the commandments hang on the first commandment [Matt. 22:40], and they are judged and practiced according to it, and since no other commandment is violated in a more diverse way, nor by more people, it is easy to see from this how few good people there are, and that there is not one among the children of men who does good. For though not all commit adultery, or are unchaste in works, or kill, yet all sin, one as well as another, through the same unbelief against the first commandment, and when occasion offers, they perform unchastity, kill, and do all evil. Therefore, every child of Adam is a Thor and an idolater who knows nothing of God, as it is said here.

5. But this must not be understood as if they knew nothing at all about God, since the apostle Rom. 1, 19. teaches that it is evident to all men that they know that God exists. For if knowledge of the Godhead were not indelibly imprinted on all men, idolatry would never be invented.

be. For why did they worship idols, if they did not all have the conviction that there was a Godhead? How could they have attributed the same to men and devils, and thus turn the truth of God into a lie, if they had believed that there was none? Or how could they have thought to honor those to whom they ascribed a nothingness, that is, a nowhere existing Godhead? So they recognized them, but in this they erred, that they turned the truth of God into a lie, and again the lie into the truth of God, that is, what is truly God, they attributed to man or the creature; and conversely, what is not God, but a lie, they attributed to God. This is what those have done, and still do, who do not recognize the work and word of God, blaspheme it and ascribe it to the devils, but ascribe to God what they like, both word and work, even if it is inspired by the devil. This is the most common of all evils.

For also of the people of Genesis 6 it is not written that they had no knowledge of God in such a way that they did not know anything about Him, since Noah, the preacher of righteousness, preached God to them, but it is said: "My spirit will not remain in these people forever, because they are flesh", or as the Hebrew text has it: My Spirit shall not judge, shall not contend with them, shall not have His work in them, because they will not suffer the crucifixion of the flesh, and for that reason will not accept the judgment of My Spirit. By these words, whether they were spoken by Noah or (what I rather believe) by others, he wanted to say the same thing that this psalm says, namely, he publicly punishes them for being flesh and without spirit, that is, abominable and depraved people who do no good, not even one.

7 Thus he speaks here in the spirit, despising outward appearances, searching hearts and kidneys, saying that this one denies God, not with the mouth and with outward gestures and ostentation, since he boasts that he knows God even better than the right lovers of God, but in the heart, that is, according to his innermost disposition, on whose blindness he has been able to see the truth.

In this way, the blindness of the mind soon follows, so that it can neither think nor speak of God properly, nor do right works, as is stated in the 11th Psalm [§ 4 ff.], and Paul testifies in Titus 1:16: "They say they know God, but with their works they deny it. Therefore, those alone have GOD who believe in GOD with unfeigned Faith; all others are fools and say in their hearts: There is no God.

8. the other evil, namely the stream, yes, the maw of evil, which comes out of this source of unbelief, is that all their doings (that is, everything they think, hold, speak, do, order, or do in any way) are evil and abominable, as if one would say, according to the words of Paul, Tit. 1:15: "Nothing is pure to the unclean, but both their heart and conscience are unclean". And thus in One Word he briefly pronounces the whole life of unbelievers, as Rom. 14:23: "That which is not of faith is sin." For the expression XXXXX, which is here rendered by studiis ["in its essence, as also Ps. 9, 12.: "Proclaim among men his doings" (studia), is a general word to designate by it everything that someone can undertake, plots, undertakings, words and works, so that we can understand that everything [before God] is either approved and pleasant by faith, or bad and an abomination by unbelief, whatever man is even able to do or does. For even the apostle, when he gave Titus 1:15 as the reason why nothing is pure for the unclean and their heart and conscience is unclean, gave no other reason than that they were unbelievers and for that reason an abomination and incapable of all good works [Titus 1:16].

(9) What will the people say to this, who have raised the little fief that there are morally good works and those that are neither good nor evil (neutralia)? Truly nothing else than that they imagine that the corrupt action and the abomination and the unclean and stained and the unbelief are the same thing, as not meritorious, but also not reprehensible, not sins, but also no merits. For so speak the wretched deceivers, who extinguish the fear of God, flatter men, and make the

They disparage the grace of faith. But the apostle Rom. 14, 23. resists them, even according to their own understanding, since he calls everything that does not come from faith sin. For here they themselves understand by faith the conscience, speaking very well, and no less salutary than Caiphas prophesied, only that they do not understand their very good speech, any more than he did. For if a man does or lives anything that he does not believe is pleasing to God, that is, that which is contrary to his conscience, he builds to hell, in truth, all their works and undertakings that they do contrary to their conscience, that is, that which is not of faith, or which they do not believe is pleasing to God, they build to hell; and this is absolutely true, for a Christian man must believe that he is pleasing to God in all things.

But since this passage calls us 1) to speak of faith and works, we must say something more about this, as we did in the 5th Psalm [§ 170 ff.], when we spoke of hope and suffering, and will do the same when the time comes to speak of love and good deeds.

First of all, it is certain that among the commandments of God the highest, greatest and first is the one that is written first in the holy Ten Commandments of Moses: "I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt. You shall have no other gods beside me" 2c. The actual works of this commandment, and (as they are called) the [through the soul) produced and immediate works (elicita et immediata) are to believe, hope, love, fear GOt, and that which is GOt's. These works our theologians call habits and actions produced [by the soul] (habitus et actus elicitos). Therefore, because they have fallen for the dead letter, they assign to it external works, such as praying with the lips, bending the knees, and other such ceremonies. Blinded by this theology, they cannot understand the words of the divine Scriptures, where they speak of the works of God, of faith, of the

1) Weimarsche: von instead of nos; probably a printing error.

Hope, of love, of fear. For the greater part of Scripture deals with praising the work of the Lord, that is, faith, as Is. 5:12 says: "They do not look at the work of the Lord," and Jn. 6:29: "This is the work of God, that you believe in Him whom He has sent," and Ps. 81:10: "That there be no other God among you, and that you worship no strange God." As if to say: This shall be God's work, this shall be the service of God, when you hear or believe, that is, faith is in truth a service of God and the first work of the first commandment.

11. Therefore, the one who wants to understand the Scriptures must stop the philosophical procedure of the theologians and learn to draw the little word "work of the Lord" with such great diligence to the inner things, to the actions of the soul, which those call [actus] elicitos, as those have drawn it outwardly to the (as they call it) commanded and indirect actions (actus imperatos et mediatos), or the more they are blinded, also to the works of creation, which are outwardly accomplished by God.

(12) Just as he who ignores the first commandment and keeps all the other commandments, both divine and human, does nothing, so he who does all possible good and refrains from evil, if he does not believe in God, does nothing. For just as the first commandment is the test, the measure, the guideline, the strength of all other commandments, in which, just as on one head, all members hang, live and prosper, so faith, the work of this commandment, is the head, the life and the strength of all other works, and, in fact, the general foundation (universale reale), which is one and the same in all things, so that no work is good unless faith has wrought it, nay, unless it is thoroughly mixed with and permeated by faith, as with a new leaven.

13. but it cannot be faith in any way unless it is a living and undoubted opinion by which man knows with the utmost certainty that he is pleasing to God, that in all things he has a gracious God who forgives everything he has done or done, who is favorable to him in the Good, forgive him in evil. For what kind of faith is this that is not such an opinion? The apostle proves it as such in his letter to the Hebrews, chapter 11, with many examples, and when Christ wants to perform a miracle in the Gospel, he first examines whether they believe that he can and will do it. That is why it is written in Matth. 13, 58 that he could not have done many signs in his homeland because of their unbelief, and in chapter 17, v. 20, he says that the disciples could not have cast out the devil from the moonstruck man because of their unbelief.

14 From this we can see where the word of the apostle comes from, Rom. 14:23: "What does not come from faith is sin," and Titus 1:15: "Both their mind and conscience are unclean. Why? Because they are unbelievers, since faith alone purifies the heart (Apost. 15, 9.) and fulfills all the commandments 1) of God, as Sirach Cap. 32, 27. says: "Whatever you undertake, trust in GOD with all your heart, for this is GOD's commandment kept." Note [Vulg.], "In whatever you undertake, believe," and, "Faith is keeping God's commandments." Is this not considered a new opinion among our theologians? 2)

15. So also it is said in Ecclesiastes 9:7: "Go, then, and eat your bread with gladness, and drink your wine with a good courage; for your work pleaseth God." There it is said in Heb: XXX XX

XXXXX-XX XXXXXX XXX. XX, however, can be translated differently: For as a son (or a chosen one, or a pure one) pleasing to God are thy works, or thus: For as a son pleasing to God are thy works, so that the meaning is: Be always cheerful and of good cheer, knowing that whatever you do is such before God as the doings of a beloved and chosen son before his father, as it is Mal. 3:17: "They shall be my inheritance in the day [saith the LORD of hosts] which I will make, and I will spare them, as a man spareth his own.

1) Erlanger and Weimarsche: manäati instead of: mandata in the other editions.

2) This sentence: Nonne nova nostris tNoolofis sententia? could also be translated like this: Don't our theologians have a new opinion? The meaning remains the same.

Son spares, who serves him." Then follows [Eccl. 9, 8. 9]: "Let thy garments always be white, and let not thy head lack ointment. Use life with thy wife whom thou lovest, as long as thou hast the vain life which God hath given thee under the sun, as long as thy vain life endureth; for this is thy portion in life, and in thy work which thou doest under the sun." Here, I believe, "the garments" and "the ointment," though many take this according to a not unsuitable figurative interpretation for works and merriment, are yet said in a literal sense, because in the days of merriment one is wont to use white garments, as in mourning dark and black, or sackcloth, at least the people in those lands, so that he indicates the expression of joy as well by food as by clothing, as also Christ Matth. 6, 17.: "When thou fastest, anoint thy head, and wash thy face," that is, be joyful 2c.

(16) Those, then, who pretend to be enlightened teachers of faith, and deny that it is necessary to have this faith at all times 1) and, indeed, in every work, are leading an exceedingly pernicious doctrine, inventing for us a kind of general faith which is snoring in a habit (in habitu) or rather is dead, which only temporarily produces an act of faith (eliciat). For what time do they want to attach to this action? Only the time while one is searching for it? But an exceedingly great folly has possessed them, that they have compared faith and its work with the exercise of the other virtues; namely, (ut) because we do not at all times pray, read. They believe that faith, too, is active at times and rests at times, but they do not understand that in all the diversity of works there remains one and the same faith, which believes and trusts in every work that it pleases God, or rather that God forgives and is merciful.

17 It is a mistake, then, to place faith and its work alongside other virtues.

1) Weimar's: opere instead of: tempore in the other editions.

He must be exalted above all else and, as it were, be regarded as an unceasing and universal influence, higher than all works, since through his movement and effect everything in a person is moved, effective, powerful and pleasing. So Samuel, when he spoke to Saul, 1 Sam. 10, 6. 7. did not prescribe any work for him, but said: "And the Spirit of the Lord will come upon you to prophesy with them. When these signs come to you, do whatever comes to your hand, for God is with you.

(18) Therefore, in faith all works are equal, however they may be presented to us, for faith alone is the work above all works. But where there is a difference of works, either faith is lacking, or there seems to be a difference of works in the eyes of the unintelligent. For to him who believes in God, it makes no difference whether he fasts or prays or serves his brother, for he knows that he serves God in all things, and pleases Him in the same way, whether the works be great or small, great or small, short or long. Nor does he choose any particular work, nor does he reject any, but does, as Samuel says, whatever comes under his hand. But where there is no faith, there is the exceedingly miserable task of distinguishing between works, choosing or rejecting them, because in foolish and godless delusion they believe that through this work they would be more, through that less pleasing. This godlessness, which is full of trouble, worry and sorrow, is called XXX and XXX in Hebrew, as sufficiently said above [Hs. 5, § 63; Ps. 10, § 61].

19 The ungodly folly of these people is that they want to buy the gift of God through a kind of spiritual simony. For this is how they go about it, that they want to have faith in God through their works, and after (poet) them, that they want to make themselves pleasing to God through their behavior, whereas one must first have a gracious God in faith, and only then can one do good works in the same faith, so that it is due to grace, not to the merit of our virtue, that we please God. For no one can please God by doing good works, but he does good works because he pleases God.

so that the cause of good works is faith that we please God, but not works are the cause of faith that we please God.

(20) Therefore, it is impossible that they should not trust in their works more than in God, even though they boast (as hypocrites tend to lie) that they trust in God alone. Thus, they always remain reprehensible with regard to faith, even though they constantly pretend to trust in God. And it is unbelievable how hidden, deep and great an evil this affliction of the human heart is, that it not only clothes and feeds itself with good works until it falls into an insurmountable and desperate perversity, but also wants to sell itself under the title and for the price of faith, which it nevertheless flatly contradicts, and also flatters itself with it. Against this David prays Ps. 51, 12: "Create in me, O God, a clean heart, and give me a new and certain spirit." And Ps. 19:14: "If they [the proud] rule not over me, I shall be without change, and innocent of great iniquity."

(21) If any one could see how many exceedingly beautiful glittering work-doers this shameful nature has brought to ruin, he would understand the word, Eccles. 8:10 [Vulg.]: "I saw ungodly men buried, who, while they yet lived, walked in holy places, and were praised in the city, as having done the works of the righteous." Yes, no other infirmity clings so strongly to man by nature, and none should be eradicated with greater care, than this deep-concealed (subtilis) presumption, which always endeavors to forestall God and make him incline to itself by its works. From this abomination, which is in human nature, have also flowed in the Church those ungodly teachings by which men, in order to please God and to do enough for sins, are driven to works and indulgences, leaving faith in God altogether. Yes, I believe that this very deep-rooted evil and this very beautiful glittering idol in the spirit (as the 32nd Psalm, v. 2. ["Wrong in the Spirit"] calls it) will not be eradicated, indeed, will never even be recognized.

The only way a man can be martyred is by the greater temptations of death, hell, conscience, or faith, hope, providence, and the like. Everything else rather makes it greater than it should take away the same, however great the virtues or works may be.

(22) In the same ruin are those who deny that all works done apart from faith are sins, as we have touched upon above. If you were to say to these people, whether a good work done with the intent to commit adultery, to kill, to steal, or in a riot or disobedience, is sin, they would answer without a doubt that it is sin. Why then do they ascribe so much to him who sins against the first commandment, and who does a good work in disobedience to God (that is, in unbelief), that they deny it is sin? Is not disobedience to God and unbelief as great a sin as the intention to fornicate or the neglect of chastity?

(23) But the sin of unbelief is a grievous one, and of all lies most in nature, yea, having become the very nature of which it is said [Ps. 116:11.], "All men are liars," man cannot recognize it in himself, but the sin of the flesh and of theft and of death and of human rebellion, because it takes place in his grosser part, in the senses and the body, man can easily recognize it in his finer part, namely in the soul and in the mind. But even the soul is not aware of its incomparably greater defect and of the beam in its eye; therefore it easily sees the splinter in its body, as is the manner of hypocrites, and of all who are unclean in spirit, until they are tested by the strong and spiritual dangers of death and hell, just as (that I may give the best simile) the lime is cold until it is watered. Therefore the wise man [Sirach, Cap. 10, 14.] rightly says: The beginning or the head of sin, or rather the main and highest sin is when a man falls away from God. The limbs of this head, as it were, are rebellion, dis-chastity, murder, theft and everything that can be called sins. By this, God reminds us, as it were, that we should consider, if these things are so great and abominable, how great and abominable then must be the head and the many-footed and many-headed king of these rats, unbelief itself, yes, a basilisk, because he alone by his look kills all works. What are many good works without faith but (as Christ says) a whitewashed tomb, which is full of filth and ungodliness within?

(24) There is also a widespread doctrine that a bar can be put up and taken down again. For if to commit adultery or to steal or to kill is to put up a bar, no matter how much good a man does or sets out to do, how much more is it to put up a bar if he does not believe, even though he does all good works in the meantime? For it is much more strictly commanded that we should believe in God than that we should not fornicate or not kill. Therefore, not believing, which is commanded in the first tablet, is far more serious than committing the sins forbidden in the second tablet.

(25) Therefore, just as unbelief, the source of all evil, does not allow a good work to be done, or if it is done, it defiles it and makes it inclined to all sins, so faith, the source of all good, does not allow evil to be done, or if it is done, it immediately removes it and purifies it, making it inclined to all good works. Therefore, Adam and Eve, after they had sinned through unbelief, immediately felt the evil desire as a fruit in their members. On the other hand, John 7:38 says, "He that believeth on me, as the scripture hath said, out of his body shall flow rivers of living water." And 2 Tim. 2, 19: "And let him depart from unrighteousness who calls on the name of Christ".

(26) Therefore we should hold most strongly that the first commandment is the head and the beginning of all commandments, and that the work of the same is the head and the beginning of all works, and that the moral doctrine of the Peripatetics is entirely lacking in the way, which says: By practicing righteousness, temperance, we become righteous, temperate 2c. Not so, as godless people, not so, but having become righteous and temperate, we perform righteousness and temperance. But we become righteous through faith, which believes that God is gracious to us. This he commanded us to believe, saying, "I am the LORD thy GOD; thou shalt have no other gods beside me." But as we believe, so shall it be done unto us, for this faith is not deceived, but rather he is deceived who fears or has misgivings about believing this.

27. But you will say: How is it possible that I should believe that I please God in all works, or that God is always and continually favorable to me, since I sometimes talk, drink, eat, laugh, and even sometimes joke with my neighbor, and we cheer each other up with pleasant talk? But how then, if I commit a manifest sin, and even a great fall, but that I fall into wrath, evil desire and lust? And who is so perfect a man, that he should also not lack in any word, as the apostle Jacobus [Cap. 3, 2.] says? But even you yourself teach that there is fault in every good work; can any fault please God?

(28) I answer, first, in regard to the works that intimate intercourse entails. The hypocrites, who have enclosed the works of God in their sad and narrow confines, are severe and unforgiving judges of the works which intimate intercourse brings with it in all honors, such as cheerful intercourse, perceptive or witty speeches, laughter and fine jokes. For I say nothing here of buffoonery, frolicsomeness, and shameful speeches, since even the humanly ordered way of life does not approve of these things. But since this life cannot go on without intercourse with others, you must certainly believe that it also pleases God if you address the brother with a cheerful countenance, invite him with a friendly smile, and sometimes delight in a jocular or perceptive speech.

For this is of course the "kindness" that Paul praises Gal. 5, 22. which is also called kindness or sweetness (benignitatem seu suavitatem) in dealing, of which he commands us 2 Cor. 6, 4. to prove it, saying, "But in all things let us prove ourselves servants of God, in great patience," and afterwards [v. 6.]: "in kindness (suavitate), in the Holy Spirit", where he adds "in the Holy Spirit", lest this sociability (comitas) or cheerfulness (hilaritas), as is generally the case, degenerate into levity and boisterous merrymaking and a licentiousness that takes the liberty of saying and doing anything, until they turn the fruitful kindness of the Holy Spirit into the deadly kindness of the unclean spirit. Thus we read of St. Bernard, who wanted to cheer up a brother who was exceedingly sad, and joked with him that he had tripped him up so that he had to fall, saying that it was a useless deed, but not useless (otiosum, sed non otiose). Now, even if (as is to be feared) something sinful should have crept in through ignorance, it is overcome through faith in God, through which I believe that we are so well pleasing to Him that He forgives us what has been sinned against, since He shows Himself to be so toward us as we believe about Him.

29. but of the manifest sins I say the word, Proverbs 24:16: "A righteous man falls seven times, and rises again; but the wicked sink into misery." For therein lies the difference between the righteous and the wicked, that the wicked fails to propitiate and overcome GOD by works; therefore, when he has fallen, he never rises again, because he has no other way to rise again than his works, by which, as he fancies, he can direct GOD. Since this is impossible, and he can never find peace of heart, he must necessarily despair. But the righteous man, who knows that God has not only promised him [His grace] and thus has preceded him, but has also commanded that one should believe in Him and hope in Him before all works, does not get up again for this reason, because he relies on works, nor does he remain lying down because he has fallen, but, mindful of the promise and commandment of God, he has before his eyes the mercy of God that is well-disposed toward him, of which He commanded that it alone should be before one's eyes.

when he said, "I am the LORD your God." So does David Ps. 26:3: "For thy lovingkindness is before mine eyes, and I walk in thy truth." Therefore, the righteous is upheld by the word and commandment of God, so that he does not fall with the wicked into the calamity of despair.

(30) As they rely on different, even opposite, endeavors, they come to opposite ends. The wicked strives to enter into God by works, but the righteous is eager to come out of God by faith and be born. The former sets out to overcome the justice of God by his own efforts; the latter sets out to overcome the mercy of God, which can heal all his infirmities. And here one must apply the example of a father and his son mentioned earlier. For even if the son has sinned once, he fears the father, but does not abandon his trust in the kindness of the father, and is also willing to confess his sin humbly and to suffer the chastisement of the father, as we have quoted from the prophet Malachi Cap. 3:17: "I will spare them, as a man spareth his son that serveth him." And Ps. 89, 33. f.: "I will punish their sin with a rod, and their iniquity with plagues; but I will not turn away my mercy from them, neither will I fail in my truth."

(31) I carefully and knowingly pass over the questions of the new theologians, whether faith perishes by mortal sin, and what is mortal sin, since this question is not yet at hand for those who do not know what faith or mortal sin is, and presume to rob God himself of pronouncing the decision as to how much sin faith may or may not endure. My secret is with me, says Isaiah, and: "The secret of the Lord is among those who fear him", Ps. 25, 14.

Thirdly. Of sins in good works, I admit that there is no good work by which we can please God, as the church prays, saying, "Lord, do not judge me according to my deeds; I have done nothing that can stand before you. And how-

Therefore, since we are not able to please you with what we do, you will give birth to your son 2c.

(33) And this is the glory and grace of faith, that it alone is the work pleasing to God, which makes all that is ours pleasing, and takes away all that is not pleasing. For if the other were not sin, even if it were not displeasing to God, faith would not need to represent us. Therefore, we learn from the power and necessity of faith that we must despair of all our works and fight against the judgment of God by holding out the mercy of God, as Jacobus says Cap. 2, 13 [Vulg.]: "Mercy rejoices over judgment," that is, mercy boasts against judgment, and faith in the mercy of God does more for our justification than fear of the judgment of God for the condemnation of our conscience.

(34) Therefore we always have cause to fear, since everything we do is evil and condemnable in itself. Again, through the same fear we always have the opportunity to believe, and to fight against the fear of judgment through faith in mercy, to triumph and to glory, so that the word Ps. 147, 11. stands: "The Lord is pleased with those who fear him and hope in his goodness. Thus it is written in 1 John 2:1, 2: "And if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ, who is righteous. And he is the propitiation for our sin." And the same Cap. 3, 20: "If our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things."

From all this it is clear what is to be thought of ceremonies and how far they are to be used. Since there have been many disputes about them, even among the ancient fathers, and since they are nowadays venerated to the fullest extent by many, but completely despised by others, a little must be said about them.

First of all, it is certain that in the New Testament there is only one ceremony instituted by God, namely the Sacrament of the Holy Communion.

This was done for no other purpose than that the people might come together for the word of God and for prayer, while at the same time those who had been converted and instructed by the word were to be baptized and strengthened by the reception of the holy bread. All other ceremonies have been instituted by ecclesiastical ordinances and increased in such a way that today they let the church be nothing but ceremonies, while all of God's commandments have been completely abandoned.

(37) Therefore, we must learn here not to deviate either to the right or to the left, that is, not to exalt the ceremonies too much, nor to despise them too much, but to walk along the right road and the middle way, either observing them or letting them go according to the circumstances of the time. In this, nothing can guide us more faithfully, more surely and more securely than faith and love, far more surely and more faithfully and more securely, I say, than all the dispensations, mitigations (epiikiae) and interpretations of all the popes and teachers.

38 So let it be known that it is impossible to live this life without ceremonies. For since we are in the body and in the midst of temporal things, we cannot do without differences in works, places, offices, lines, persons and other things, and as Paul says in Rom. 12:4 and 1 Cor. 12:12: "Many members and one body, but all the members have not one business." For if you were to take away all ceremonies, where would any emperors, kingdom, principality, authority, even any government exist in the world? For you could not govern even your house or your servants, nor your children, if you did not distribute times, places, offices and works and administer them with certain ceremonies; but neither could you govern yourself if you did not bind yourself to certain hours, certain duties, certain places. For even your body will not let you live in any other way, at least as far as usefulness and health are concerned. For what could you do, or how could you live, if you did not bind yourself to work, place, time, office and person?

39 Then, what are the outward works?

even according to the commandments of God and the whole Gospel, as a kind of ceremonies? What is praying, fasting, watching, working with one's hands, helping one's neighbor but ceremonies? But as the worldly ceremonies or worldly customs and the rights of worldly things or the habits, or whatever one may call them, are indeed much more necessary and are necessarily much more and various than the ceremonies of the church, yet the sacred ceremonies and the ecclesiastical customs or the rights of spiritual things (as they are called) are much more dangerous, because if one performs them, there is a tendency to put a vain trust in them, or if one has omitted them, a foolish fear (that is, on both sides, a very bad conscience).

For even faith, which is directed against God, is put in danger here by great floods, if there is not a faithful and wise servant of the Lord, who knows how to separate the precious from the insignificant. For when he begins to trust in ceremonies, or to have a distrust without the ceremonies, the faith which should have used ceremonies, like a rider of his horse, has already perished, and they alone then rule, namely, the persons who are servants, and it is written, as Eccl. 10:7, "I saw servants on grates, and princes walking as servants." There is danger, I say, that a ceremonialist will trust that he pleases God through the ceremonies, deceived by their holy appearance, and that in them is performed what belongs to God. This danger either does not exist at all in the worldly ceremonies, or is only slight and so gross that the one who wanted to blow himself out with them and be arrogant would also be censured by men for his foolish trust, or as it is called, for his self-love, since they are performed in things that belong to the world.

(41) Therefore, ceremonies in faith and love must be used so that they may be useful; without these, they must be harmful and a cause of destruction. For if all other good works outside faith are harmful, how much more so the works in love?

the ceremonies which are ordered by men! But then they are done in faith and love, if they are not done because they are necessary in themselves, nor because they are good, nor because they are commanded, but out of the freedom of the spirit, that is, if someone trusts that he will please God even in these things, which are in themselves mediocre things, by making a profit for himself through this faith from the thing that is neither profit nor harm, and a good thing from the thing that is not good.

42. He is not moved to do this by the fact that he thinks to gain much merit by it, but only by the reason that he must necessarily live in the body, which cannot do without ceremonies, even though he himself does not need them at all, since he has enough and superfluous merit through his faith alone, then also, because he must necessarily have contact with those who either need worldly ceremonies to govern the perishable nature of this world, or with holy ceremonies, as little children and weak in Christ, as it were under the disciplinarian of a bodily law, must be nurtured and cared for until they also grow in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, as Peter [2. Ep. 3, 18.] says. For he is a debtor to both according to love, that he should conform himself to the manner of those with whom he lives, yea, not only conform, but also thereby serve them, lest in their foolish confidence they despise the weak, or the worldly government, and so give them both offence, which is contrary to love.

43 Christ, Matth. 17, 27, so that he would not offend the tax collectors of the Roman authorities, commanded Peter to pay the tax, and Paul commands Titus, Cap. 3, 1. that they should be subject and obedient to the authorities, ready for all good works. Likewise Rom. 13, 1. 1 Petr. 2, 13. [Vulg.]: "Be subject to all human creatures (that is, order) for the sake of the Lord, be it to the king, as to the ruler" 2c. Not as if this were necessary for the justification of believers, whose righteousness is Christ, but so that they might serve all men in love, and by this good conduct might bring the

To provoke and entice unbelievers and the wicked to Christ means (as Titus 2:10 says) "to adorn the doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ in all things", and 1 Corinthians 10:33: "to please everyone in all things", as the apostle says that he pleases everyone in all things, not seeking what is pleasing to him, but what is pleasing to many, so that they may be saved.

44 And to come to our ceremonies, since children and young people of both sexes grow up in the church every day, who, because of the heat of their age and ignorance of things, cannot possibly lead a good life by themselves, it is necessary that both parents be their disciplinarians, and bring them up to godliness through the ceremonies laid on, so that they do not fall into ruin through idleness and licentious living. Therefore it is necessary that they themselves observe the same ceremonies for the sake of the example, and do what is superfluous and not necessary for them, but for the sake of those for whom it is necessary. Thus the apostle says in 1 Cor 9:20 that he became a Jew to the Jews and a Gentile to the Gentiles so that he might win them all, and to those who were under the law he became under the law, even though he was not under the law. So also of Christ it is said, Deut. 32:11, that he is like an eagle that stirs up his young to fly, and soars above them. For if the parents or superiors in the church leave the ceremonies altogether, or despise them, how should not a child or an inexperienced young man fret, who should be nourished by this example of milk, until he could enjoy perfect and strong food.

Therefore, those who are superior and spiritually minded in the church, who have already recognized the truth that righteousness lies in faith alone and that ceremonies are nothing, as Paul says in his letter to the Galatians Cap. 5, 6, 6, 15 [1 Cor. 7, 19]. He should be of the same mind as Christ and take on the form of a servant, not proudly despising the weak who still need the ceremonies or think that they are something, but walk with them two more miles and also let them have the mantle [Matth. 5, 40], making his freedom a servant (exi nanire), nor for any other purpose keep the ceremonies most strict, except that they may not give offense to the weak or annoy the little ones, whom they must rather precede by a good example, even in the ceremonies, until they bring them to the same knowledge.

46. and it is not valid for anyone to boast that he knows all things are neither good nor evil, and that they are mediocre and permissible, and that faith alone makes righteous, since the apostle has long since cut this off, saying, 1 Cor. 8:1: "We all have knowledge; but knowledge puffeth up, but love mendeth." And Cap. 10, 23: "I have all power, but it does not make all things good. I have all power, but it mendeth not all things." And again, v. 29: "Why should I let my freedom be judged by another's conscience?" Why does not everything pardon and amend, since everything is permitted? Because not everyone knows that I have all the power. Therefore, although my knowledge cannot be judged and condemned by the conscience of another who does not know this, it must nevertheless submit and serve that person's ignorance for a time, not even blowing itself out against him, so that the love that serves his ignorance or weak conscience may be more powerful than the puffed-up knowledge that rules over his ignorance, just as Christ died for us for a time, serving our sins and our weakness, as it says in Romans 5:6.

(47) To this end we should be moved, so that this knowledge of ours makes us sure that the works of the ceremonies will not harm us, since we have come to know that we are justified by faith, and that in Christ we have all our goods, and that we no longer need to worry about how we will be justified. Therefore we must live everything that I live henceforth for the benefit of our neighbor, as Christ has done for us, and since we are to do everything for their good, this must be done much more in the ceremonies, which are means. And so we will owe nothing to anyone but to love one another [Rom. 13:8]. And by this love it comes about that everything we do is good, and yet we do not seek to be good for the sake of the good.

To become righteous for the sake of works; that is to be a Christian in truth.

(48) That which we have said must be observed in order to nourish children and young people by the use and example of ceremonies, is equally to be said of converted sinners, who are made weak in conscience by the excessive tyranny of ecclesiastical ceremonies, which are handed down and used in such numbers that there is no end to them. Indeed, in general, the more they are children and fainthearted, the more they need that their opinion, which they have of these ceremonies, should not be annoyed, but rather should be cured gradually, by strictly fulfilling these ceremonies with them for a while by example and work, until they also grow up to the same knowledge that we have.

49. But indeed the Roman popes and ecclesiastical tyrants are worthy of all curses, who are silent about the faith in Christ, and increase their laws ad infinitum, and thus ensnare the exceedingly wretched consciences of the Christian brethren. They abuse them only to strengthen their tyranny, and, while they themselves daily observe nothing of it, to the most serious annoyance of the weak, they do not refrain from frightening the fearful souls, from subduing them, from plundering them, and from withdrawing them altogether from Christ.

(50) It is true that their laws must be tolerated by faith and love, however tyrannical and much they may be, just as the laws of the civil government, as has been said, and one must set an example to the weak in it. But the ungodly authors (conditores) of these laws themselves must be abhorred, who have no mercy on so great a multitude, as if they were appointed only to give laws, and to terrify souls with their pernicious ordinances. Thus it happens that the superiors, the bishops in the church, do not exercise any other office today than to make the consciences dismayed, confused and entangled. To us

But it is up to us to calm the disturbed consciences, to fortify the confused ones, to make the fearful ones confident, but in such a way that we do not resist their executioner-like tyranny, because they want the right, yes, the work of putting consciences into turmoil, to be kept completely unharmed. And the word is fulfilled which the wise man saith [Sir. 34, 28. Vulg.], "If one buildeth, and another breaketh, what have they but work?" For indeed the superiors, who tyrannize with the word of men, destroy that which the inferiors, the preachers of the word of GOD, build. See now, dear Peter, this is your primacy and your ecclesiastical monarchy.

51 Now let us make the decision. First of all, the little ones in Christ (that is, children, adolescents and young people) do the ceremonies; they must not be despised by the superiors in these works, but they must be supported in them by the superiors through their example, even though it is not necessary for them themselves. For their love is free in spirit, and does not trust in them when it has done them, nor would it fall into disbelief if it omitted them; but it puts itself outwardly into bondage to the body, to the service of its neighbor, that it may win them, and keep them from the sins by which they are inflamed, by good example and good government; and thus they fulfill the law of Christ. He who would take away the ceremonies from these would do nothing else than to take away the sword from the worldly power, and fill the world with adulterers, murderers, thieves, and all evil-doers. For these must be shut up by fear and the prison of the laws until Christ, as Paul teaches the Galatians [Gal 3:23].

Secondly, the little ones in the faith, even if they are old, which they do out of fear of sin and conscience, since they do not yet have this knowledge of freedom, must be instructed in the faith, and they must be made to cling to such works, which they cannot suddenly abandon, until they realize that not

They are the only ones in whom righteousness stands, but only in faith. Therefore we must be very careful not to reprove the ceremonies of these people before they are taught, as some are too reckless (confident) to do. These do very well in censuring the ceremonies and human statutes, but they do very badly in that they have no more regard for the souls who cling to them out of weakness, and no more desire to heal them and gently wriggle them out, than to censure the ceremonies.

These fools are like those who, when they see that a friend's neck is entangled in ropes, hurl themselves at the ropes in a hasty rush, and with all their impetuosity 1) tear them away, and rather suffocate the friend than help him. Rather, one should have gently and slowly untied the ropes first, and thus set the friend free. In the same way, since we cannot take away the laws of men by force, we should gradually teach the mind how to use them properly. Thus Paul says in 1 Timothy 1:8, 9 that the law is good if a person has a right use for it, namely, if he knows that no law has been given to the righteous. For since even the worst things must be for the good of the faithful, how much more must the statutes, however harmful they may be, be for the good of those who are ignorant, if they are rightly used?

(53) But there is no other right custom than faith and love, as has been said. But by this the lawgivers are not excused, just as by the fact that I am justly in need of death, dishonor, robbery and all misfortune, my death-slayer, my slanderer, my robber, my persecutor cannot be excused. Thus the ecclesiastical overlords (pontifices ecclesiastici), by their pernicious laws, are guilty of all souls, even of those who, by the right use of their laws, have worked their own best.

54. thou shalt also have no doubt, and a sure conscience, that the laws of men in the church are to be regarded as nothing else than plagues and

1) In the Erlanger, the Weimarschen and the Baseler, ao is still inserted here, which seems to us to be too much.

Let the bowls of God's wrath be as the sword of the Turks, as a plague on the body, as a famine in the land, and as you are taught to behave toward these evils, so behave toward the laws of men. For how do you behave in the face of these evils? First, you use them as a remedy for your sins by bearing this scourge of God in patience. Secondly, you use them as a preventive medicine, so that you, oppressed by these evils, do and omit many things that you would neither have done nor omitted if you had been free of them. Doubt not, then, that the laws of men have been made many, that thou mightest have a scourge; and be sure that thy shepherds have become thy masters of the stocks, by whose violence thou art oppressed and martyred, if thou be patient, thou wilt forbear and do many things, which otherwise thou wouldst never have forbear and done. "For who is there that could harm you (says St. Peter [1 Ep. 3, 13Z], if ye follow that which is good?" "The good" (boni), that is, the good thing, or the righteous being (bonitatis), or that which is good (lest the ambiguity of the expression [amphibologia] deceive anyone). But this is done by those who have the knowledge of the law and its right use, namely those who follow the good; but the small and weak do not grasp this, therefore they perish by these soul-murdering and word-producing 2) spiritual superiors.

55. thirdly, 3) do the works of the ceremonies of Moab and Ammon, and the worshippers of the calves of BethAven, and those who trust in the mountain of Samaria [1 Kings 16:24.], that is, who boast of their works and in their works, who are blind guides for the blind, not needing also instruction in the faith, such as the first [§ 51] have, before their all-sufficient wisdom and righteousness, of which they are full like Elihu [Job 32, 18. f.], as a barrel is full of Moses, which hath no vent. Of course these burst before

2) keminiverdios is without doubt a word formed by Luther himself, which we cannot prove lexically. We trace it back to keininin and verdünn Jn § 73 it occurs once more.

3) This "for the third time" refers to § 52.

Wisdom and justice this and all the other psalms punish, of which we have often said. Only these need to be punished severely, as the apostle teaches; nor do they ever desire to be taught like the second 52] but the whole world is too small for them to contain their learning. This is the nation of Behemoth, whose heart is hardened like an anvil, Job 41:15, and whose eyelids are lifted high, Proverbs 30:13.

Fourthly, these works are done by spiritual workers, of whom we have said, people in the freedom of faith and in the bondage of love, who use them only to exercise their bodies in this life, as in any other worldly craft, or to stir up and encourage the little ones and the weak by a good example, and to be careful not to give them offense until Christ takes form in them. Namely, this is the reason that Paul takes such great care, wherever he mentions the various gifts of God, that he persuades to unity, because he knows that not only various ceremonies, but also even the gifts of the Spirit fight very strongly against unity, when the cleverness of the flesh and Satan come among the children of God. From all this we conclude that it is not necessary to neither praise nor blame the ceremonies before this kind of people.

(57) But before the third kind of people, ceremonies are to be strongly rebuked and abhorred, because the wretched people trust in them. Hence come the fools who speak in their hearts: There is no God, they are good for nothing and are an abomination in all their being, so that they cannot do anything good even once. But if you do this, you will arouse the whole body of the Behemoth with all its scales against you, and they will say to you, "You are a heretic, a rebel, dishonorable, angry, because you have denied the good works and the holy statutes (canones) of the fathers and the counsels (consilia) of the church, which cannot err.

58. before the second type of people, one must praise the ceremonies moderately, and for a time long, so that her weakness does not get angry, which, although she is ready to improve herself, is not yet able to do so, nor does she grasp it. This kind is to be cherished and cultivated in a motherly bosom, to yield to it, and to praise what they praise, to do what they do, so that they, caught by this pleasing nature, believe and improve.

(59) Before the first kind, they are to be praised and demanded very much, because those people of no understanding can be moved to good and deterred from evil by fear alone, but at the same time, the truthful doctrine of faith and freedom must also be brought forward, so that their spirit may imbibe the same and they will bear fruit one day, when the body, weakened and exercised by ceremonies, has learned to submit and serve the spirit more smoothly, after the inclinations that rise and rage after the manner of youth have been cleared.

(60) And let it not be strange in our eyes that the same ceremonies are treated so differently. Is not the teaching and practice of food and drink different among intemperate people than among the weak, different among healthy and moderate people, and different again among those who fast superstitiously? With gluttons, food and drink must be rebuked, the weak must be kindly invited to it; with the superstitious, it must be praised, the healthy and moderate must be left to their free will. And just as this is a very harmful steward, who demands of all members of the household without distinction that they all eat the same excess of food, or that they all make do with meager morsels, so this is a very harmful authority of the church, which extorts from all that they should keep the same mixture of its laws with equal obedience. For it will inevitably kill a great many.

(61) From all this, a prudent Christian can determine the rule by which he should live in the ceremonies, and also help other people by counsel in this matter. First, if he is not sure that he has the third kind of people before him, he should be careful not to blame the ceremonies or judge him, whom he sees walking in the same. For who knows whether he will not walk in them out of necessity (like the first), or out of weakness (like the second), or out of freedom (like the fourth)? But if one judges one of these, is it not judging Christ? Now if the great clusters of monasteries had many people of these three kinds, their quantity would do no harm. But now only people of the third and most unfortunate kind of ceremonialists are abundant in them, who should not own a monastery or convent in the church, since they are only a burden and a nuisance for God's people. But who can remove all the wicked from the earth? We are on earth and must also deal with earthly people.

62 Now let us add one more thing and conclude. If any man think to place his confidence in the works of the ceremonies, let him be bold, and sometimes refrain from them, neither seek therein the dispensation or authority of the ecclesiastical superiors. For in these matters concerning the faith, every Christian is a pope and the church for himself, nor can anything be imposed on him, nor can he regard anything as binding, which can in any way turn out to be a danger to the faith. Now if anyone wants to consult with his neighbor in this matter, so that he may be all the more confident, on the basis of that word [Matth. 18, 19]: "Where two of you become one on earth, why it is" 2c., he will do very well.

(63) I say this because I know how obstinate is the evil of trusting in our works, and how dangerous is the superstitious adherence to human laws for the integrity of faith. See, then, how free we are through faith, and yet how serviceable we are through love, so that at the same time there is bondage to freedom, and freedom to bondage, that we owe nothing to anyone except to love one another (Rom. 13:8). Thus Christ says John 10:9: "I am the door: if any man enter in by me, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture." The entrance to Christ is faith, which sets us up in the riches of righteousness.

God's righteousness, by which we have already done God enough and are righteous, so that we do not need any works to bring us righteousness. But the outcome is love, which directs us, who are clothed with the righteousness of God, to serve our neighbor and to exercise our own body, so that we may help the neediness of others, so that they also, drawn by us, may enter with us into Christ. For just as Christ went forth from the Father and drew us near, seeking in his whole life not what was his but what was ours, so we also, having entered by faith, must go forth to draw others also, seeking nothing else but that by serving all we may make many blessed with us.

But let us return to our psalm. It is sufficiently known that nothing is pure to the unbelievers, but because they are flesh and the spirit of the Lord does not reign in them, their doings are also rotten (putrida) and entirely of the same nature as the flesh, namely, abominable, corrupt and abominable, which the same sufficiently shows not only in death, but also in life by its manifold corruption. But in Hebrew, each of these two verba [XXXXXX and XXXXXX] is an active one: "they have corrupted" and "they have made abomination (abominaverunt, if one may so 1) say) of their doings," or better in the transitive meaning of Hiphil (terti): they have made their doings corrupt and abominable, since it is the same verb as Gen. 6, 12: "All flesh has corrupted its way," that is, has made it corrupt. So that our neutralists 2) do not want to deny that the whole nature of the fools is corrupt and an abomination, he adds: "There is no one who does good," so that he teaches that there is absolutely nothing good but only evil in men.

The Lord looks down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if any are wise, and to inquire of God.

1) In the original and in the Basel: sjeut instead of: sie.

2) more neutral -- the papal theologians who teach that there are works that are neither good nor evil.

This verse speaks in the same way as Moses (aemulatione Mosi) in the first book Cap. 6. For the same says [Gen. 6, 5.]: "But when the Lord saw that the wickedness of men was great upon the earth," and again [v. 12. Vulg.]: "And when God saw that the earth was corrupt." For by the same words (aemulatione verbi) he also intends to express the same morals (aemulationem vorum), so that, just as these resemble those before the flood of sin in their morals, they are also punished in such a way by the same words, but for a different purpose. For those were corrupted by the flood of sin, but these are provoked to the knowledge of their sins, that they may be preserved by the better flood of baptism. For this is also what Paul does in the first and second chapters of the letter to the Romans, when he explains that all are sinners, Jews and Greeks, so that God may have mercy on all. Therefore, this psalm also closes with a sweet promise, as it says [v. 7, Vulg.]: "Oh, that help would come upon Israel from Zion! When the LORD shall deliver his captive people, Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad."

66. But it is said that God looks from heaven upon the children of men, against the foolishness of the fool who says that there is no God, as if to say, Not only is there a God, but he also sees, yes, he looks upon everything, that is, with his seeing he penetrates everything and extends to everything. Then, so that no one would think that those fools and those who corrupt their actions are only people in some corner, among whom there is no one who does good, he expands his statement and applies it to all in general, saying that the Lord looks from heaven, from where he sees all people on earth, and no one is hidden from him. Thus he saw in Genesis 6:12 that the whole earth was corrupt.

67 And he says: "the children of men", by which is understood the entirety of men. In these words two things are secretly implied. First, that there is One Son of Man, in whom alone all the children of men can be justified, for whose sake the Scriptures also retain this manner of speaking, that they very frequently refer to "the children of men.

Children" for "men" says, because he also is a man, but not a child of men; and all the others are both children of men and sinners, conceived and born in the sins of men. For the mouth of the Holy Spirit is very humble and kind. Since he could have called them exceedingly wicked men, he accuses them by a much milder name, that they are children of men, wherein, though in a small word, all the misery and wickedness of men is sufficiently comprehended.

Secondly, that men appear quite differently before the sight of God than before the sight of men. "Before the face of God no flesh boasts," says the apostle Rom. 3:27 [1 Cor. 1:29], beautifully indicating that this twofold appearance is understood in this verse, where it is said that the Lord from heaven, not a man from earth, has seen and judged this. For men not only do not see in one another (at least not in all things) that their doings are corrupt, but also sometimes praise them and extol them with great glory, as there are their talents, their art, their doings, and their moral virtues (morales virtutes, as they are called). But among all other things, do they not praise most highly that which is the very worst? For who does not make the distinction (gloriam) in war (that is, the shedding of human blood) an epitome of virtue among men? What are Homer, Virgil, and the rest of the poets of heroic songs but the very bloodiest and cruelest instigators, stimulators, and eulogizers of murderers, tyrants, and the most terrible enemies of human blood and sex? So that there is danger for a Christian man, when he reads their books, that he might also imbibe the inclination to this bloody glory, or, tickled by the honeyed eloquence, or rather, corrupted by the innate thirst for human blood, take pleasure in such great murder of the human race.

69. therefore, to get away from dirty poets and

1) Wittenberg and Jena: aonsxeotu instead of: prospeetn.
2) Instead of Ztoriatnr in the editions, the Vulgate reads Zlorietur.

If the children of men were unscathed in all other things, would not the desire for war alone prove with full right that they were all quite nonsensical down to the last man? Dear, how great is this fury! How great is the darkness that one can even rejoice, sing and praise the slaughter, the defeat, the blood, the murder, and the whole great heap of misfortune that war brings with it, where it would be fitting to weep all with bloody tears, especially when war is waged not by God's command, but out of nonsensical lust for dominion and possession, as the pagans did and still do, and nowadays, alas for God! even the Christians, the people of peace, the children of God, do it even more cruelly than all the pagans.

So Homer and similar people have this praise, as Horace speaks:

Post quos insignis Homerus, Tyrtæusque mares animos in Martia bella Versibus exacuit. 1)

[After these, the excellent Homer and Tyrtæus inspired the male hearts with verses to the wars sanctified to Mars]. Only a Christian should know that this raging praise of raging people is excellent in the eyes of the children of men, but in the eyes of God an exceedingly great abomination. And hence it is that this happens to the poets who are praisers of sins, as all confess that the poet's vein flows much more fully and better for them when they speak of works of Mars or Venus than when they speak of works of peace or chastity, or of any divine things. So even the spirit, of whatever kind it may be, by whose activity they warm themselves, cannot suffer peace and tranquility, and it is as if you were to compare the waters of Siloam, which are still, with the strong and many waters of the river, as Isaiah chap. 7 and chap. 8, 6. 7. does.

71 The Hebrew text also speaks here through a transitive verb: The Lord has made to look. Thereby he indicates that the LORD does not

He revealed it to the prophets, who were to announce to the children of men what they were and what they would do in the sight of God. How else could Noah have known that the earth was corrupt in the sight of God, if God had not revealed it to him? And even the Scriptures did not conceal this, since they pronounced [Gen. 6:11]: "But the earth was corrupt in the sight of the LORD." "In the sight of the Lord," it is said, because it seemed quite different in the sight of the children of men, so that in these words faith was necessary, as it is also necessary to believe Paul when he punishes all together as sinners and as those who lack the glory they should have in God [Rom. 3:23], since he speaks this from revelation.

72 At the same time, the general principle is stated here that we should not judge anyone unjustly in an unheard matter, or if he has not been convicted of it, because even the Lord Himself does not pronounce judgment on the children of men that they are not good without first looking, yes, not only looking, but also seeing and knowing. For it is said, "The Lord looketh, that he may see," as it is said in Genesis 11:5, "Then the Lord descended, that he might see the city and the tower which the children of men builded." And Cap. 18:21: "I will go down, and see whether they have done all things according to the cry that came before me, or whether it be not so that I know." For the Lord always sent messengers beforehand, who revealed to men their sins, and held out threats, as often as he wanted to do something special. Thus Jonah was sent to the Ninivites, Elijah is believed to come before the judgment, 2) and much more like that. Therefore Amos says Cap. 3, 7: "For the Lord does nothing, but reveals his secret to the prophets, his servants."

73 [The Vulgate reads:] "Whether a man be wise, or ask after God." The conjunct "or" is not in the Hebrew, and it is ill placed here. Rather, it should have been

2) Cf. Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. VII, 327 f" p21 ff.

1) Horat. [^]rs xoet., v. 401 8^.

Conjunction "and" should be put, although according to the peculiarity of the language it is not in Hebrew either, since the sense demands a connection: "Whether someone is wise, and asks about God. The Hebrew language is very rich in words that express to be wise, to know, to recognize, but I dare not teach the exact and constant difference of them.

¹⁾ [I take the liberty of stating my thoughts here: I mean that by the word used here is meant wisdom or cleverness, which is not merely acquired by revelation of contemplation (speculatione), but by the tasting (gustu) of things and by experience, as it is found in the fathers, who by the Spirit were much occupied with [God's] word and work, and "by habit have exercised senses, for the discernment of good and evil," as the apostle says in the Epistle to the Hebrews Cap. 5, 14. For the doctrine or learning of godliness is of such a nature that it can be easily spoken, written and thought by many, which is why these people are called wise among men because of the excellent gift of wisdom and knowledge they have received, as described in the first letter to the Corinthians Cap. 1, 19. ff. and Cap. 3, 18. 2), but that it cannot be understood and rightly tasted (ipso gustu sentiri) (which is actually wisdom) if it has not, through application in life, made the man who has practiced it experienced and certain and constant in all his ways, so that through this experience he can judge not only the lives of those people, but also the teaching itself, however sound it may be. These are the ones whose doctrine is not a mere word but life, not smoke but fire, not a letter but spirit, who are full of the truth.

are not of the wisdom of the spirit, but of the spirit of wisdom, as Is. 11, 2. 3) is said of Christ. But the others, however much 4) they know, belong only to the number of those whom the apostle 1 Tim. 1, 7. characterizes, since he says that they want to be masters of the Scriptures, and do not understand what they say or what they set. That is, as they say in common life, they cannot bring their doctrine to the man (applicare), since they speak into the wind. For when the occasion arises that wisdom should be applied, they are found to be nothing less than wise, and while they teach other people everything, they cannot be taught in a single word. Such people must necessarily be all the frogs, the talkers (seminiverbios), 5) who talk much and understand nothing].

Such fools, I say, the prophet seems to depict by this word, that no one among the children of men is learned or wise, as if he wanted to say: Not only those who are exceedingly unlearned before others are not wise, but also those who gossip much, like the friends of Job, Elihu, Bildad 6) (whose wisdom, compared with the unlearnedness of other people, is not to be counted), understand nothing, because they have never known this by any cost in life and experience.

74) To this meaning of the word I am moved by the fact that also in the 32nd Psalm it is written in the title: A knowledge or "an instruction (eruditio) of David", and in many other Psalms, in which the life and experience of a well-instructed person seems to speak; the experience, I say, that has not been exercised through the infirmity of nature, but through the gift of grace. But it is a speech without a closer relation (absoluta): there is no one who is wise (intelligens), for he does not add what he does not know (intelligat), whether God or other things, so that we may see that this

1) The following passage enclosed in square brackets is designated by Luther himself, both in his letter to Pellican (in this volume after the 21st Psalm) and in his postscript to the 22nd Psalm, as one that should be omitted, and is therefore found only in the first edition.

2) 1 6^{is} found instead of the indicated digits:

3) In the original: les. 6.

4) Instead of multi in the original, read multi.

5) Compare 8 54 in this psalm.

6) In all the gifts: Nalaam, which does not fit here. Instead of it, Lulckäü (as Bildad is called in the Vulgate) will undoubtedly be read.

The first thing that happens is that the unrestricted (absolutam) well-instructed is brought about by experience in life, which causes a person to be able to judge wisely in every kind of thing and teaching and to have a right opinion of God and all things. Therefore, it happens that he is able to teach other people rightly. Therefore, we could not inappropriately understand this word as punishing the unintelligent and garrulous teachers, as the following: "There is no one who asks about God" punishes the listeners or followers.

75 "He who asks for God." With this word he punishes the corruption of the mind, as with the preceding one the blindness of the understanding, because where there is not the right knowledge of God, there is also not the right love, for everyone seeks what is his, says the apostle [1 Cor. 13:5], except love, which does not seek its own. And this defect of the human heart is far too subtle for man to recognize, of which we have often said. For these two pieces, not being wise and not inquiring after GOD, include all the abominations of which in the 5th Psalm [§ 46 ff.] is said, ungodliness, wickedness, unrighteousness, speaking lies, 5) for by these things both their minds and consciences are defiled [Tit. 1, 15.].

Therefore, we must be careful that we do not take "being wise" here to mean the high thoughts (speculationes) of people who have learned to talk many, great and strange things about divine things, but [of people] who have so grasped a few things through much practice in life that they can judge about everything in all things, and, as they say, recognize the spirit (animam) of the Law. And "inquiring after God" is not to be understood in such a way that someone seeks to take hold of God with little prayers or self-discovered miserable works or any of his own undertakings and, as it is said, to do good, meritorious works for the attainment of eternal blessedness. But this means to ask for God.

not to seek one's own in all things, but to do and suffer everything for the glory of God and the benefit of one's neighbor. This is denying oneself with all that one has, becoming a servant of others, namely the highest godliness against God and men, against which no one fights more fiercely than the bloodthirsty and the false, who consider themselves to be seeking God, and yet seek themselves.

Therefore, let us not apply this word "inquire" to works, but to the attitude and desire of man, and we will see that among the children of men there is no one who inquires after God, but that all are wicked, either through obvious sins, or even worse through their hypocritical appearance. In this way Paul introduces this passage Rom. 3, 9. ff., both against the Gentiles, who are manifest sinners, and against the Jews, who are saints in shadow, by saying: "We have proved above that both Jews and Greeks are all under sin. As it is written, There is none that is righteous, neither is there any; there is none that hath understanding; there is none that asketh after God; they are all gone astray, and are all unrighteous; there is none that doeth good, neither is there any." The apostle seems to summarize and explain the meaning of the first verse by this little piece: "There is none that is righteous," which is not in this Psalm: "The foolish say in their heart, There is no God. They lie not, and are an abomination with their nature; there is none that doeth good," if he did not mean by that that there is none righteous, the same as that there is none that doeth good. And we see that he does not refer to the Scriptures literally, but only according to the sense.

Where, then, is free will? Where are the moral virtues? Where are prudence and practical knowledge, which guide men in all that can be done? They are, of course, only infirmities of nature, or rather gifts of God, which have become defiled, abominable and reprehensible through the infirmities of nature, that is, the blindness of the intellect, which recognizes nothing, and the corruption of the mind, which asks nothing of what God is.

1) Baseler, Weimarsche and Erlanger: msrntnees. Wittenberg and Jena: msuääciuiu; we take the latter.

V. 3. But they have all gone astray, and are all unfit; there is none that doeth good, not even one.

(79) Behold, how many words he overflows with, that he may draw in all men, and leave none out. First, he says, "all," then, "all together," then, "not even one. But the adverbium simul [in the Vulgate] is a Hebrew way of speaking, by which he means that a multitude is gathered together in one, as in the 122nd Psalm, v. 3: Cujus participatio ejus in id ipsum, "which are joined together," 1) that is, Jerusalem is joined together, with all that are therein. And Ps. 34:4, "Let us exalt His name with one another (in id ipsum)," that is, all gathered into One heap at once (in unum simul). Thus here: Simul inutiles sunt ["they are all together unfit"], that is, all taken in one heap (in nimm).

80) And one must pay attention to what the prophet has in mind, since he saw that among men at least some seemed to walk rightly, to keep to God, to be efficient, to do good, as the glittering saints of works, the doers of the law, who were pharisaei, that is, separated from the public house of sinners, and in a peculiar way of life and manners, which was quite unlike that of other people, were considered excellent people. Especially for the sake of these he repeats in such a way and doubles the words: "all", "all together", "not even one", so that he might blessedly draw them into sins and make them guilty, or as the apostle says [Rom. 3, 19.], "that all mouths may be stopped up, and that all the world may be guilty to God," because they have all too unhappily drawn themselves out, lest it seem as if they had part in the shameful titles, that they had gone astray, were unfit, had not done good.

He says three things: "All have gone astray," "They have become unfit," "They do not do good. The deviation refers to ungodliness or unbelief, which is the source and head of evil, whereas godliness or faith is the beginning of good, through which we come to God.

1) Compare to this translation Ps. 4, Z73, note.

approach. "For whoever wants to come to God must believe", as the apostle says, Hebr. 11, 6. And what he ascribes here to those who deviate, or retreat, or go away (discedentibus) (for it is the same word at this point as Ps. 6, 9: "Depart [discedite] from me" 2c.), he has ascribed above to the fools who speak in their hearts: There is no GOt. For "to depart from God" and "to say in his heart that there is no God" are the same thing, namely, not to believe. Thus it is said in Heb. 3:12: "Take heed, brethren, lest any man have an evil and unbelieving heart, which departeth from the living GOD."

82) And this falling away from the faith, which will occur in the church, the apostle seems to call 2 Thess. 2, 3. apostasiam, saying [Vulg.], "Unless the departure (discessio) come first," or the apostasy (that is, apostasia). I say that I understand this to mean that Paul spoke this about faith, not about falling away from the Roman kingdom, namely, since the church will be devastated by the works of men, having forsaken the Prince and Author of faith, JEsum Christ. But the apostle also lays himself out 1 Tim. 4, 1. ff.: "But the Spirit saith plainly, that in the last times some shall depart from the faith, and shall cleave unto the seducing spirits and doctrines of devils; through them which are in glibness liars, and have brandings in their consciences, and forbid to be married, and to shun the meat which God hath created, to receive with thanksgiving them that believe." These are harsh words and a sharp judgment about the tyranny of the Roman laws, which he paints beautifully with their right colors.

83. But he says that all have departed, so that he also draws in those who seem to draw closest to God, just as the apostle 2 Tim. 3:2, 5 draws in those who have the appearance of godliness but deny His power, along with the hopeful, blasphemers and others whom he predicts will be in the last annual times. Yes, it is because of these hypocrites (as I have said) that everything is said in this psalm, because those who manifestly sin are less harmful than these hypocrites, with their beautiful n appearance, who both believe themselves and persuade others to their ruin (perniciose) that nothing of what is said by the wicked and ungodly concerns them.

(84) "They are all unfit" is the same statement he made above: "They are good for nothing and are an abomination with their nature," which already refers to the customs and works of the apostates or deviants. For what should an ungodly and unbeliever do but what is useless, an abomination, corrupt and rotten in the eyes of God, even though everything seems to be useful and good in the eyes of men? Thus it says Isa. 59, 6. "Their spider's web is not fit for garments, and their knitting is not fit for covering, for their work is toil [Vulg. inutilis = useless], and in their hands is iniquity." And again he adds simul ["all together"], so that he understands both kinds of ungodly people, namely those who show the ungodliness of their heart by obvious sins, and those who clothe ungodliness with a beautiful appearance, coming in sheep's clothing, but inwardly are ravening wolves [Matth. 7, 15].

85. "There is none that doeth good, not even one." With this he punishes their sin of omission, since they not only do evil and are unbelieving, but also never do good, and are never godly, so that in this way, by asserting (affirmationem) that they do evil, and denying (negationem) that they do good, he absolutely and completely sums up all, and says that all the children of men are sinners. For that he also adds here: "Not even one," expresses here a general denial, as in the first two pieces a general assertion. Again, he does this for the sake of the hypocrites, so that they do not think that they are doing good before the obviously evil ones. He says: None of them does good, that is, none of them has faith and good works, but either obviously evil or good works only in appearance.

Therefore, when the Spirit, with such powerful words, assembles assertions and denials, and proclaims that all are altogether evil and not good, it is to be marveled at with what subtlety the neutral

The theology of Aristotle can crawl through the affirmative and negative propositions of general validity and slip away in such a way that it dares to argue against the spirit and say: Not all the works of men are evil, but some are good, although all of them are not meritorious, or neither meritorious nor incurring a debt (demeritoria). But the Scripture must be a sign that is contradicted, and a water of harlotry, by which the judges and the elect in Israel were taken away, because the children of Israel disputed.

(87) Paul explains these three things briefly, Titus 1:16: "Being abominable, and unbelieving, and unto every good work abominable." "They that are abominable" are here called unfit, slothful (putridi), and corrupt; "the unbelieving" or disobedient are here called the ungodly and the faithless people who have gone astray or gone behind; but "they that are unfit for every good work" are here said to do no good. They confess that they know God, but with their works they deny it [2 Tim. 3, 5]. In this he understands the hypocrites in the same way, as the Psalm does in this passage.

(88) Now see that the same three things are repeated in this third verse that were said in the first; but this is the difference, that in the first verse the prophet states his judgment, but in the third he confirms it by the divine judgment, which not only agrees with him, but also speaks more broadly and generally, namely, that the Lord from heaven saw the same things that he saw on earth. Therefore the apostle Rom. 3, 10. only mentions what, as the prophet says, the Lord had seen and spoken from heaven. This also served the purpose of Paul, who had set out to generally put all the works of all men under sin, so that they, humbled, would recognize that grace was necessary.

[In the Vulgate as part of the third verse:] Their mouth is an open grave; with their tongues they act deceitfully; viper poison is underneath their lips. Their mouth is full of cursing and bitterness; their feet are hastening to shed blood. In their ways is all calamity and heartache; and the way of peace they know not; there is no fear of God before their eyes.

The correct Hebrew text (hebraica veritas) does not have these three verses, 1) also it is not certain to me whether the seventy interpreters translated this Psalm in such a way from the beginning. One could believe that the apostle followed them, because at that time among the Gentiles no other translation was available than the Septuagint, which was used quite generally. To me, it is more likely that the apostle himself, out of his own spirit, from the fullness of his wisdom, brought together these words, spoken in holy enthusiasm, from the holy Scriptures and reproduced them here. Whether someone inserted them later into this psalm or whether the seventy interpreters translated them themselves is not important to me.

The first: "Their mouth is an open grave; with their tongues they pretend," is from the fifth Psalm, v. 10, as is quite clear. The following: "Viper's poison is under their lips," is from the 140th Psalm, v. 4. The third: "Their mouth is full of cursing and bitterness," is in the 10th Psalm, 2) v. 7. The fourth: "Their feet are hasty to shed blood," is in Proverbs, 1, 16. and Isa. 59, 3) 7. The fifth: "Their way is vain destruction and harm; they know not the way of peace", is Isa. 59, 7. 8. The sixth and last: "There is no fear of God before their eyes", is from the 36th Psalm, v. 2.

90. what is in the fifth and tenth 4) Psalm

1) About this passage Philippi says in his "Commentary on the Epistle of Paul to the Romans", p. 9t: "The citations contained in [Rom. 3] v. 13-18. are found in editions of the HX as the 4th verse of the 14th Psalm. But they are taken from other Old Testament passages and added to Ps. 14 from the Epistle to the Romans in the margin of the Codex Vaticanus of the CXX. In Hebrew they are found only in one codex, apparently transcribed into Hebrew by a Christian reader." Cf. below L 106.

2s Erlanger, Wittenberger and Jenaer (which otherwise have the count of our Bible): ksutmi 9.

3) In all Latin editions except the Weimar edition: Isa. 9.

4) In all editions (according to the Vulgate count): LOL0.

It does not need to be repeated here, but it only needs to be reminded and emphasized that those who are without faith, that is, the ungodly, are stained with all these vices, or that they defile themselves with them when the opportunity arises, since they lack the strength to resist any sin and are inclined to all evil, as Gen. 6:5 and 8:21 are written. Therefore, all from the first to the last are an open grave and insatiable slaves of riches, belly servants, "to whom (as Paul says Phil. 3, 19.) the belly is their god".

(91) Then they all have a false, covetous, flattering tongue; they do not teach the truth, nor do they defend it, but speak what is pleasing to the great, lest the belly and the food and the gullet perish. Although this evil is common to all, it is chiefly suffered by those who preside over the ministry of the word. This I say, lest there be any contradiction in what we have said in the 5th Psalm 125 ff.] that this verse refers to the teachers of the people, which Paul, as you can see, applies to all, and not badly, since the disciples become as the masters are, and both either perish or are preserved by the same word.

92: "Viper poison is under their lips. This goes quite actually to the teachings, may it be said of those who recite them or of those who accept them. For all are infected with poisoned doctrine who are not filled with faith. But in this little verse there is an emphatic speech. For the adder, as they say, is a kind of snake in Africa, against whose sting there is no remedy, signifying how incurable is the doctrine of ungodliness, which has ingratiated itself by a beautiful appearance, which also sufficiently proves the persistence of the heretics and the ungodly. In Hebrew, instead of poison, cup or a bottle seems to be said. By this image the meaning of the teaching is expressed exceedingly appropriately, because the vessels, as we have often said, signify the verbal word, but the liquid itself signifies the meaning of the words.

93. "Under the lips" contains the same thing

Secret as Ps. 10, 7. [Vulg.]: "Under his tongue is toil and labor", because he has another corrupt and poisonous doctrine on his tongue than under his tongue, that is, it appears lovely, right and wholesome, while in fact and truth it is very bitter, perverse and deadly.

94 "Their mouth is full of cursing and bitterness" has been interpreted in the 10th Psalm, v. 7. But since it is certain here that Paul does not use the original Hebrew text, but the Septuagint and the translation common among the Gentiles, which has "bitterness" instead of "deceit" [Ps. 10, § 53], we want to allow, yes, believe, that here "cursing and bitterness" is taken for scolding and anger, while in the 10th Psalm we have taken "cursing" for the ungodly teaching. Whether this is a simple explanation or forced, let the reader judge. But, if there is a darkness, there is no harm in holding the different opinions, so that in both places "cursing" can be taken for scolding or evil teaching. But in this place, because follows: "Their feet are hastening to shed blood," it behooves (as I have said) to be understood of words of wrath and fury.

(95) Therefore every man is a bloodthirsty man, even those who shine with the holiest splendor; indeed, these are the most vituperative of all, bitter and venomous, not still against all (for with this cover they cover their wickedness), but against those by whom they are offended or not honored, as in our time there are abundant examples at hand, which are everywhere in circulation among scholars and clergymen (sacris initiatos). This is nothing, then, if someone wants to deny that he is vituperative and bitter, if he treats some good friends most sweetly, if he hates and accuses even one, if he himself hates and accuses his adversary. For here the tree is known by its fruit, not there by the sheep's clothing.

96. "Their feet are hasty" 2c. Proverbs 1:16: "For their feet run to evil, and haste to shed blood." Almost likewise it is said Isa. 59, 7. For they are not bloody in word alone, but also in deed. For when they kill, or if they do not kill, they at least rejoice when those they hate are killed; likewise, if they do not revile themselves, they rejoice when those they hate are reviled. Since all the children of Adam are corrupted by this vice. Dearly beloved, how many then are they that perceive that they are corrupted by the same, or think that this befalleth them, when it is said, "Their feet are hastening to shed blood"? For he has not said in vain that their feet hasten to shed blood, but does not say that they are shedders of blood, so that he may make all those guilty of shedding blood who have approved, rejoiced, not hindered, not resisted, at least have not suffered, that blood has been shed or is to be shed, namely by punishing their attitude, not merely their work. Who is there, then, who could deny that he is guilty here in this common vice, which extends so far that the prophet can hardly let the righteous be blameless?

97. "In their ways is all calamity and sorrow of heart. This little verse best explains the nature of the works of the wicked, and shows once and for all what it means that they are so often called XXX and XXX. For what do the wicked do in all their works, especially in those which they call good works, but that they consume all their strength, which they put into it, in vain, and, as they say, lose oil and work, and not only lose, but also destroy, and destroy themselves, that is, that they, with the bloody woman [Marc. 5, 26], turn all their goods to the physicians, and it becomes worse and worse with them?

As an example for both types of the wicked, we want to set before our eyes this woman with the flowing blood who consumes all her goods, and the Prodigal Son [Luc. 5:13 ff.], who likewise consumes his goods, so that the latter may be an example to those who want to live a pleasant life in the bars of this world, in honors, pleasures, riches, but the latter may be an example to those who want to bring themselves to peace by their own powers and works, and make their conscience secure. Here we want to consult experience, and see if these two kinds of people are not martyrs of the devil, who go to hell with greater wretchedness, harm, desolation, anguish of heart (and suffer more) than those who are martyred over and over again with all misfortunes and sins for the sake of faith.

It is certainly the case that the more abundantly a person enjoys earthly goods, the more unhappily his soul is shattered, since his conscience constantly receives shocks. For the more he sins, the more his trust in God perishes, and the conscience worries, remorse, restlessness, fear and anxiety of the conscience increase. While outwardly it seems that everything is going well and is progressing nicely, in the meantime the strength of good confidence is sucked out of him to the marrow, and, since all strength is exhausted, he is brought to ruin in the most miserable way, so that in the end he must despair in eternity. It is the same with those who know nothing of faith and try to overcome their sins and conscience with works. The more they strive, the more miserably they are crushed, until they speak the word, Weish. 5:7 [Vulg.], "We are wearied in the way of wrong." So he rightly says, "In their ways is vain accident and heartache," or (as Jerome translated), Desolation and destruction is in their ways. So also it is said Jer. 2:37 [Vulg.], "The LORD hath destroyed thy confidence, and nothing shall prosper thee."

So there are two evils, devastation and destruction, or destruction and misfortune; the former because confidence is destroyed; when this is destroyed and devastated, everything he does or undertakes grieves more than it comforts, it makes more miserable than it helps. All this is better understood from the contrast of the opposite. For the righteous (as Ps. 1:3 is written) "is planted like a tree by the rivers of water," grows, bears fruit, blossoms and increases, "and what he does is well done. And again [Ps. 92:13], "The righteous shall flourish like a palm tree; he shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon." On the other hand, the wicked withers like the cursed fig tree.

(Matth. 21, 19.) and like a branch that is not on the vine; then it declines and perishes until it becomes dust. All this goes on in the spirit in the conscience, to such an extent that it also affects the body, and also weakens the natural powers, for, as the wise man 1) says [Proverbs 15:15], "A good courage is a daily well-being," so "the sadness of the heart kills many people, and yet serves nowhere," as the same [Sir. 30:25] says. And we also see just this, that it thus happens that the works of the wicked are generally buried with them.

100. "And the way of peace they know not." Why? Because they pursue earthly goods (rem), and, like a horse and a cattle, have not the understanding which is faith in invisible things. For sensual men seek peace in the things of this world, but the hypocrites in their counsels, pretensions, and works; both in the things which they feel and grasp. But true peace is in believing the word, and in the things which are neither felt nor apprehended, but they apprehend him that believeth, as Christ saith unto the Jews [John 8:37.], "My speech soweth not among you." For the fish do not catch, but are caught with the net. Therefore, when riches, favors, good life, honor have fallen away from sensual men, and poverty, disgrace, sickness, sorrow, contempt have befallen them, we see how restless they are. For they are troubled not only in this way by outward unrest, but also by inward. For since they have lost the trust in God that was based on their well-being, they are troubled and shattered by a miserable conscience, so that in this way they have peace neither before God, nor in themselves, nor before men.

(101) But if the hypocrites are forsaken by their works, whether in death or in danger (as it must be), and it is found that all this is their sin, they will be put to shame and disgraced.

1) In the text: KLpisntSm, the wise man, that is Sirach. But this place is in the proverbs.

They are in such consternation that nothing can comfort them. By this evidence it is also shown that they have accomplished nothing by their works except to destroy the faith of the heart, which should have been their life, their strength, their glory, their good. And not only in this way do they become disgraced, but also, when their works and their conduct are in danger before men, and are punished or slandered, they seek to agitate heaven and earth and cause trouble, because, having lost trust in God and basing themselves on their own doings, they have peace neither with God, nor in themselves, nor before men. Thus, both types of these godless people have no peace on either side, neither inwardly nor outwardly. And all the great turmoil in the world arises from the inner turmoil. For he who is inwardly tranquil does not arouse outward unrest; but he who is inwardly full of unrest cannot be tranquil outwardly either.

102. But he says not only that they do not have peace, but that they do not know the way of peace, that is, they do not know the way by which one must go to peace, namely, through the cross. For the cross, which kills all [carnal] mind and inclination, itself leads to peace. And Christ, being crucified, hid our peace with Himself in GOD, which is hidden under the cross, and is not found elsewhere. But the wicked of both kinds seek something else, only not the cross, but strive to keep their mind and inclination in their things and counsels. Therefore, it is impossible that they should know peace, let alone have it. Therefore, the way of peace is the way of the cross, and peace is not peace, as the prophets say. On the other hand, the cross is not a cross. For he has peace who does not seek peace; he has cross who flees the cross. But here, nothing else can teach but the experience of life; words do not make a difference.

103. "There is no fear of God before their eyes." It has often been said in the foregoing that this is the title of the wicked, that they live safely without fear of GOD, ent

Neither trusting in the quantity of their goods, nor in their good intention, as they were also punished in the prophets [Jer. 8:11] of old, that they said, Peace, peace, and yet were not peace. There will perhaps be an opportunity to speak of fear and peace in more detail.

It may be enough here to state this briefly, and to know that a godly man so arranges his life that in good days, and when there is peace, he fears God, being exalted by faith above all that he has both within and without. Therefore, the fear of God is before his eyes, lest in prosperity he fall into a perverse disposition and safely whore with them; but in adversity and in trouble he trust in God, being likewise exalted by faith above all that he feels both within and without. Therefore it is said of him that he knows the way of peace, which is higher than all reason [Phil. 4, 7.], in that he remains equanimous on both sides, neither hangs his heart on it when riches come to him, nor also retreats when the time of battle comes. For so it is said of them in regard to both times [Ps. 147, 11.]: "The Lord is pleased with those who fear him, who hope in his goodness."

Because the wicked do not have faith, it necessarily follows, since their hearts are attached to earthly things, that they are founded on sand, from which it follows that wherever their goods may come or fall, they themselves will also be carried away with them. Thus it happens that even while they seek peace in earthly things, they cannot find it, since the things themselves, by their nature, cannot endure.

V. 4. Will none of the wicked take notice, who devour my people, that they feed, but call not upon the LORD? 1)

This verse and the following one seem to me to prove that the three preceding ones [in the Vulgate, above § 89] are subordinated, since they contain almost the same opinion. It is not likely, however, that the same thing is connected with over-

1) Vulgate: eoZmoseent omne", well ope-ruvturqM eevoraMmeum sieut: eseava panis? Oonainuva rwn invocvsrunt.

The first part of the text is repeated in liquid words, especially in the same place.

"They will recognize" (cognoscent [in the Vulgate]) stands without closer relation instead of: Will they not at last come to the knowledge that they know and realize how much evil they do, they who, with certainty and setting aside the fear of God, even think that they do good, since they are blinded by the fact that their heart is set on earthly things, which alone they recognize. Furthermore, they believe that nothing less can be said of them than that they do not know what they are doing. We know, they say, what we do; indeed, they are at hand to become the judges and teachers of all other people.

(107) We have abundantly spoken [Ps. 5, § 55 ff.] that "evildoers", XXX XXXX, are those who do such things by which one cannot obtain peace of heart, the possession of which (as I have said) one attains only by the work of faith and godliness, but rather labor, misery, and as the preacher Solomon is wont to call it, vanity, toil, sorrow, destruction, or corruption of the spirit. For we have said that it actually means laborious work (dolorem) [Ps. 5, § 63 ff.], which is the fruit opposite to peace in all who do works without faith, whether they [the works] be good or evil in the eyes of men.

Therefore it is a word of long-suffering, or of weariness, or even of pity, when he says [Vulg.]: "Will they not recognize? How long do these wretched people want to postpone recognizing their misery and that they are nothing but perpetrators of XXX? Don't they finally want to realize that they are only wearing themselves out and becoming more and more sad on their ways, that they finally want to seek the way of peace, which is higher than all reason? At least the preceding verse thus gave this opinion [Vulg.]: "Destruction and unhappiness is in their ways, and the way of peace they know not." For the XXX or laborious work is nothing but destruction and unhappiness. Then, "that they know not the way of peace," is the same thing that he says here: will don't they finally realize that they are the perpetrators of XXX?

109 It would have been more appropriate to put the question with the simple negative, so that wnnschweise would have been said: Non cognoscent? [For norme or numquid indicate the disposition of a man who prophesies, the one in the affirmative, the other in the negative, as the grammarians teach. But if someone wanted to claim that the affirmative question word norme indicates that the wicked will finally come to knowledge, at least in death and in the last judgment, and the negative numquid that they will never come to salutary knowledge, then I have nothing against it. Perhaps the Hebrew word can be rendered by all these three question words.

110. "Those who devour my people, that they may feed." Those who devour the people, namely the tyrants, he punishes with this word. Those devour the people (says Augustine) who seek their profit from them, not judging their office by the honor of God and the blessedness of those over whom they preside. He therefore punishes the insatiable avarice and the robbery of the great, who suck the people dry with cunning and violence and all artifices, as we see today in the actions of the Roman court and the bishops, which cannot be called an example, but rather an abomination. Thus it is written in Amos 2:6, 7: "For three and four vices of Israel will I not spare them; therefore they sell the righteous for money, and the poor for a pair of shoes (that is, as it is written in the Hebrew, for money or grain). They tread the head of the poor in dung, and hinder the way of the miserable." And Micah 3, 1. ff: "Ye ought to be cheap that know right. But ye hate the good, and love the poor; ye flay off their skin, and the flesh from off their legs, and eat the flesh of my people; and when ye have flayed off their skin, ye break their legs also; and break them as into a pot, and as meat into a caldron."

We will keep silent about the artifices they have used to achieve this among the people of Israel. Certainly they do the same.

The same in the church with the pallia of the bishops, with the annals, the indulgences, the indults, 1) the privileges, the exemptions (exemptionibus), the quite impudent fair with the priestly offices, to say nothing of what is devoured by the interest, redemption and begging.

If someone were to add this up with the taxes paid to the temporal authorities, he would find that not even the third part of the people work for food and possessions and goods, and that all the rest enjoy this part; secondly, that one and the same people suffer extortion more than sixty times in every year. Thus there are many more eaters and devourers than workers, so that it is to me the greatest miracle of all miracles that men can be nourished for even one year from what the earth produces; yes, I believe that all yields are increased continuously by an invisible miracle, not unlike how Christ increased the loaves in the Gospel [Matth. 14, 17. ff].

And we have the Roman tyranny to thank for this, which has brought about nothing else with its laws than that everywhere under the appearance of religion and under the name of the church the number of idlers and gluttons is the greatest, and in the church only one thing is done, namely avarice, robbery and extortion, as it happens today. Why are we surprised that Turks or Jews are rich? Because with them one works, but with us one is eaten.

114. But we also have above in the 5th Psalm

125 ff] Said that those who do not teach the truth outright, but entangle souls by their statutes, are called in Scripture insatiable dogs, covetous, an open maw, devouring houses, belly servants, to whom the belly is their god. For since they do not feed the soul, it remains that they feed the belly alone; since they do not seek what is God's, they must seek their own, and since they do not seek what is above, they must seek what is above.

that which is on earth. But if the shepherds are like this, even if they do not teach what is God's, then, because God's word is not there, the people must also be like the priests (as Isaiah used to say [Is. 9, 16, 24, 2.]), and all seek their own (as Paul says [1 Cor. 10, 24.] until there is nothing else in the people but that one robs the other, covetousness, falsehood, violence, injustice, and, as it is said here, devouring of the people of God, until they present again the customs of the old Jewish people, Is. 56, 11.: "Every man looketh to his own way, every man misereth for himself in his own state." And Jer. 8, 10: "They are all stingy, both small and great."

(115) Nevertheless, they can praise justice and virtue, teach and act on the laws, both civil and ecclesiastical, by which justice and righteousness are considered to be administered, and also preach the doctrine of morals and the short summary of virtues and vices. For so did they also, as Jeremiah continues there and says [v. 11]: "And they comfort my people in their misfortune, that they should esteem them little, and say, Peace, peace; and yet is not peace", as we see today, how in all parishes, monasteries and foundations avarice is raging, and yet even so much good (as they think) is taught and done.

Therefore the prophet connects these two things beautifully: "They do evil", and "they devour the people", because they are stingy, and yet they seem to do good or at least, even if only to a few, to render philanthropic services (humanitatis officia, as they call it), while faith, which is the service against God, cannot exist next to stinginess, which is the service of idols. Thus wickedness blinds them, that they cannot see both, as he says, "Will they not then know it?"

Therefore this verse belongs to the lesson of avarice, yes, it is a paraphrase (periphrasis) of avarice: "to devour the people so that they feed themselves", as it must necessarily stand with all those who have no trust in God and are called children of unbelief by Paul, Col. 3,

1) About Pallien, Annaten and Jndulte compare Walch, St. Louiser Ausg., Vol. VIII, 1453 in the text and in the note.

5. 6. "Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth, fornication, uncleanness, vile concupiscence, evil desire, and covetousness, which is idolatry; for which the wrath of God cometh upon the children of unbelief."

This is the most abominable kind of unbelief, that one does not trust God so much that He can and will feed the body, which feeds the birds of the air and clothes the grass of the field so wonderfully, as Christ speaks against this abomination, Matt. 6:26 ff. For what should they believe God in spiritual things and in the greatest temptations, who do not even believe that God will feed them the stinking belly? Or how should they in death command their souls into his hands, which he should feed for eternity (if they are to live), since they do not entrust their bodies to him for an uncertain moment? Therefore it is written in Hebr. 13, 5. 6. concerning this abominable pusillanimity: "Let your walk be without stinginess; and be content with that which is. For he hath said, I will not leave thee nor forsake thee. So that we may say, The Lord is my helper; and I will not fear. What shall any man do unto me?"

(119) Not to have this vice (as I have said) is most common to pastors, who not only (if they are stingy) by their example, but also by their reputation, and then also, which is the greatest evil, by the word, do harm to those who are under them, since they teach nothing else, nor permit it to be taught, than what either increases or preserves their profit. It is not necessary to show examples of these things, since they have already become customs, even articles of faith, and he must be a heretic who punishes the avarice of the bishops and the monks, which today they call by the beautiful name of governmental power, monarchy, governorship of God on earth. So true is what Paul says [1 Tim. 6, 5.]: "Those who think that godliness is a trade", or, as he says here, "thalers of the XXX, and yet eaters of the people". Therefore also Jethro, when he wanted to give advice to Moses in Ex 18, 21, what kind of people he should put over the people, says: "But look around among all the people for honest people who fear God, who are truthful, and who are enemies of avarice; set them over a thousand, over a hundred" 2c.

120 In Hebrew it is said: The eaters of my people, they eat food, in order to explain, so that no one would think that he is talking about a spiritual eating, as our Latin translation seems to read, which says at the same time that they eat the people, like a food of the bread. Here, however, he says that they do nothing else among the people than eat bread or food, that is, they feed themselves and serve the belly with insatiable avarice. This eating they do to the detriment of the people, whose goods and chattels they devour in innumerable ways. And by devouring the people in such a way, they devour them for the purpose of eating and satisfying themselves, by giving nothing but payment for their devouring, as the raging avarice does today to Rome and the Romans.

121 "But they call not upon the Lord." Here he gives the cause and root of the ungodly nature of avarice, namely, the distrust or shameful unbelief that they do not trust in the Lord. For because faith teaches that one lives only by the word of God, it constantly calls upon the Lord in every need and depends solely on the goodness of God. Therefore, since the shepherds do not teach the faith, nor do the people know it, there is nothing left but to do XXX and be stingy, and to speak to the gold: My comfort, and to the gold nugget: My confidence, Job 31, 24. and collect the gold, in which the people put their trust, Baruch 3, 17.

Since God commanded in the first commandment that one should have no other God, that is, trust in nothing else, and call upon him alone in all needs, it is evident that avarice is a servitude of idols, which causes them not to call upon the Lord, nor to trust in him, but rather to trust in gold and call upon it. Since they are corrupted by this ungodliness, all the good they seem to do is futile, labor, unrighteousness, that is, XXX; therefore the conscience has nothing but restlessness and vain toil.

V. 5. There they fear, but God is with the generation of the righteous. 1)

The words [in the Vulgate]: "Since nothing is to be feared," are not in the Hebrew and seem to be added to make the sense clearer. But the Spirit quite appropriately and actually paints the nature and manner of the wicked. For it is impossible for a man's heart to be without fear; for if his love is right, he himself also stands right, but if it is wrong, he himself also becomes wrong. But since the wicked have lost confidence in God, and are attached to gold and their works, it is necessary that they be tormented by a sorrowful anxiety and fear of losing the gold. Furthermore, because they are not justified by faith, they must be tormented by miserable statutes and with great anguish of conscience, so that they are tormented by twofold fear: the one lest they sin, the other lest they suffer want.

This misery, as we can see, is nowadays so widespread among the bishops and all the clergy that everyone can understand this verse very clearly, without any explanation being given, if one only looks at these people. For what do they fear nowadays but that the goods of the church might be stolen, diminished, confiscated, that the inheritance of the Crucified, of St. Peter, of the Blessed Virgin and others might be endangered? How many decrees have been issued to prevent anyone from speaking against these things? With how many thunderbolts do they shrink lest they be touched? With how many indulgences, privileges, liberties have they fortified them, so that temporal goods are not temporal? With how many blessings, promises, indulgences, titles, bulls, and innumerable artifices have they acted, and do they still act, so that they may be increased, strengthened, and made eternal?

Where do all these multitudes of sorrows come from? Certainly from the fact that God does not

1) Vulgate: Ilitio trāpictaverunt tinaore, udi non erut timor, qnoniana Oominns in Mniki-ntionk bkt.

Therefore they are afraid here, and seek to fortify themselves by their own counsel and powers, so that they do not even suffer lack, the completely insolent dogs (as Isaiah [Cap. 56, 11.] says), who can never be satisfied. But since even the common sense cannot bear these crude and useless pretexts at length, and at the same time some godly and spiritually minded people do not let this wickedness go unpunished, it comes about that they always have a reason to fear and always hate the truth, just as the Jews did when they said against Christ [John 11:48], "Let us leave him so, and they will all believe in him." It is easy to understand that all the ungodly have been, still are, and will be such people, especially the great ones of the people, from the beginning of the world to the end, if we observe that man's heart must be either in what is God's, or in what is his own, and that it must have either gold instead of God, or God instead of gold.

126 The same example you can see in the other fear, namely concerning their statutes, as Isaiah [Cap. 29, 13.] says: "They fear me according to Meuschen commandment, which they teach." Dear one, with how many cords of laws are the consciences of believers entangled here? With how many heavy services, with how heavy works in clay and bricks do Pharaoh's oppressors oppress the children of Israel and make their lives sour? [Who is so afraid of the commandments of God as of the commandments of the priest? For thou canst not interpret even that thyself better than by applying to it the servitude of the children of Israel in Egypt.

In this way, the Church is full of frightened, confused and extremely anxious consciences, which the wretched Roman (Roma-nistae) tyrants daily increase by their reserved cases, exceptions, threats, ecclesiastical punishments, and a thousand such artifices, which serve to corrupt the Church of God. In addition, take the customs, orders, and ceremonies of the monasteries and convents, which are understood in a wrong sense, and, in even more so that everywhere, for the reward of unbelief and neglect of faith, the god of this world works the wrath of God in them, that they are stingy and do their works with a sad heart, restless on both cords, fearful, and as Jeremiah [Cap. 17, 18] they are broken in two, and in eternity they must be broken still more, since they will be deprived in eternal despair both of the gold and of the works which they possessed in fear and anguish of conscience.

This will happen to them because they have not called upon the Lord, for faith alone could have been the remedy for this wrath and misery. Because they lack it, they also do not have the Lord, who alone is with the generation of the righteous, that is, with those, with those, and in those who believe in him and are justified by this faith, whether a Jew or a Gentile, great or small, so that no one may boast of his person or generation, as Samuel said to Saul [1 Sam. 10, 7.]: "Do what comes under your hands, for the Lord is with you." And Paul 2 Cor. 3, 17. "Where the Spirit of the LORD is, there is liberty." For here are neither works of sm, nor care for goods, nor conscience because of statutes, but all is free, pleasant, quiet. He has the confidence that everything he does pleases God. He does everything he can for God's people and uses the statutes as he pleases, since no law is given to the righteous and he has no need of one. He is content with the Lord alone, whom he has received as an inheritance instead of all things, as it says in Psalm 142:1, v. 6: "You, Lord, are my portion in the land of the living," and Psalm 16:5: "But the Lord is my possession and my portion; you receive my inheritance."

For when it is like this, it happens that when everything leaves us and forsakes us, at the same time the trouble, the worry, the fear because of it leaves us, and the Lord Himself approaches us and receives us, and at the same time we find rest, security and freedom for our souls, as He said Matth. 11, 28-30.

says: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me: for I am gentle and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light." So the 27th Psalm, v. 10. boasts, "For my father and my mother forsake me, but the LORD receiveth me."

130] So we see also here that the righteous will live by his faith [Rom. 1, 17], since he opposes the perpetrators of the XXX, the miserly, the works saints and those who do not call upon God, with the generation of the righteous, which has the Lord, since no one can have God other than through faith. For the generation of the righteous calls upon God in all things, therefore it does not fear, is not grieved, is not stingy, does not do useless things, but is in all things the same, equanimous, it is of one mind (indifferent), as it is said in Phil. 4, 4-6: "Rejoice in the Lord always, and again I say, Rejoice. Let your joy be known to all men. The Lord is near. Do not be anxious, but in all things let your petition be made known in prayer and supplication with thanksgiving before God." See how beautifully the apostle agrees in these words with the content of these two verses, where he takes away worry, commands to call on the name of the LORD, promises that the LORD is near, and teaches that one should rejoice, not in goods, as the stingy do, but in the LORD 2c.

131 The word [Vulg.]: "They tremble with fear" is a manner of speaking peculiar to the Hebrew language, like Ps. 132, 9: And his saints will rejoice with joy, 2) and Ps. 21, 7.: "You make him glad with the joy of your countenance," to indicate that they fear without a cause, since there is nothing that frightens them, as it is said in Proverbs 28:1: "The wicked fleeth, and no man chaseth him," and Deut. 26:³) 36: "A rustling leaf shall chase them."

2) This citation, given by Luther according to memory, is erroneous. In the Vulgate is only: "xultont, not exaltation" oxnlaitinnt. Also in Hebrew there is only and Deut. 28:1) 65: "The LORD will give you a trembling heart." Therefore they are afraid of their own fear. For if poverty, which the miserly fear, or man's statutes, or any evil, by its nature, were terrifying, it would also terrify the righteous. But these things do not frighten them according to their nature, but the fault lies in their heart, just as the Lord, through the gift of faith, makes the heart glad, so that it rejoices with joy, while it sees the Lord no other way than through faith, and rejoices in no other thing than in this confidence in God.

132. But you may say: Perhaps the wicked would recognize it and do the same, if someone reminded them and taught them rightly; but now, because they do not hear this, what wonder is it, if they do not recognize it, and remain perpetrators of XXX. Miserly ones who know nothing of God and are troubled by fear everywhere? The prophet answers: It is not so; there are people who remember them, but they not only do not hear them, but ridicule them, do them all shame and persecute them, as follows:

V. 6. You desecrate the poor man's counsel, but God is his confidence.

133. he does not say: the counsel of the generation of the righteous, but "of the poor", while by both words he means the same people, because in fact the generation of the righteous and those who despise all things do not shine before men by any reputation, likewise they are of no value before those pompous people and false idols of the unrighteous and perverse generation, in the midst of which (as the apostle says) they shine as lights of the world, because they hold on to the word of life [Phil. 2, 15. 16.]. Therefore they are a righteous generation before God, but before men they are not worthy to be believed, yes, as it is said in Wis 5:3, 4, they have them for a mockery and for a scornful example. They consider their life nonsensical and their end a disgrace. But their counsel is put to shame, because it is not only a mockery.

is not received (as it should be) with the highest reverence, but is also condemned, hissed out and mocked as heretical, seditious, vexatious, sacrilegious, erroneous and blasphemous. For in this way you will also be called and received today when you punish the tyranny of the great. 2)

In Hebrew, a transitive verb is used: You have caused him to be put to shame (confundi fecistis), that is, you have caused his counsel to be put to shame, and to be regarded by you and by all as defiled with shame, just as Christ, the Truth Himself, was reckoned among the reprobates (latrones). [The poor man's nath] is counted among the wicked doctrines, which is done by ordinances, condemnations, and commandments of men, as the apostle writes of the Jews to the Thessalonians [1 Thess. 2:16], that they refused the apostles to tell the Gentiles, that they might be saved.

This is what the heretic judges (haereticae pravitatis inquisitores), the exceedingly godless suppressors of truth, are doing to their own in our time. And he has truly put an emphatic word: "You desecrate", not: You have eradicated, since also those eradicate the word of God either in themselves, who do not believe him, or, if they believe for a while, nevertheless go under the worries of this life and suffocate, as the Lord [Luc. 8, 14.] teaches about the seed that was sown among the thorns. These do not desecrate the counsel of the righteous, because they believe it to be true, holy, good, or have such a delusion. But those bloodthirsty and raging people do not eradicate him unless they have first defiled him with the worst name, that is, as I said, they condemn him to the most shameful death as a heretic, false teacher, rebel 2c.

(136) Since the Scriptures so accurately portray the customs of the wicked, one must be careful of those who are inclined to condemn what is foreign as heretical. Since Scripture so actually paints a picture of the morals of the ungodly, we must pay careful attention to those who are inclined to condemn what is foreign as heretical, especially if, by reputation and by name, they have something to say to the people. For it is actually these who, as we see, are depicted in this verse, and we need not be frightened by their frenzy, since we are well protected by this word which God has written for us, and know that those who do not know God are wont to do so, but rather let us lament for them and pray for them.

(137) And this also punishes the conduct (ingenium) of the wicked not a little, that he says, "But God is his confidence," as if to say: For no other cause do you condemn Him, but because He does not rely on the multitude and greatness of men, as you do. But now, because he is alone and relies only on the Lord, while you are surrounded by a great multitude of great and small, you confidently condemn him. For we have said above that this is the most obvious reason of the wicked, which they take from the prestige of the great and the many, then also from the length of time, again from the contempt and the small nature and the small number of those who speak the right. By this twofold larva they are so blinded that they close their ears and do not even want to hear, let alone look well at what is said. For so also the Pharisees armed themselves against Christ with the multitude and greatness of the Herodians and theirs.

Therefore also this is emphatic: "of the poor", XXX, that is, of the afflicted and humiliated, who is despised precisely because of that in the eyes of XXXXX [the Behemoth], who only look after high things.

139 But he calls it "counsel," not a word or a punishment, by which he reproaches them for their frenzy and makes their guilt more grievous. For their sin would have been less if they had rejected his punishment, but now they condemn the useful and salutary word through which their salvation is advised. But this verse is spoken in a compassionate spirit, in this way: Are you not the most wretched of men, who, trusting in the multitude and greatness of men, not only do not hear, but also blot out, yea, with imposition of the most shameful name even corrupt the word which is brought to you only for your salvation, as a godly remedy and advice? Of course, you only resent the poverty, the lowly reputation and the lowliness of the preacher, and you are not moved by the fact that even though he is not surrounded by many and great people, the Lord still supports him and is his confidence.

(140) There are indeed many among men who, considering the word about which the controversy is going on to be nothing, are driven by favor alone, sometimes here, sometimes there, where they see that the great multitude is inclined; and when they see that the thing is inclined again to the other side, they again follow the multitude. Thus many followed Christ, who afterwards, when he was crucified, were vexed, fell back again, and returned to the Jews. These are a reed that the wind weaves to and fro [Matth. 11, 7], who are good for nothing but the destruction of the truth in the time of temptation, since they strengthen the enemies of the truth by the trouble they give, to which they had previously given prestige and strength by their faithless following; but now they do more harm than they had previously done good. Of such people the 78th Psalm, v. 9, says: "Like the children of Ephraim, who, hardened, led the bow, fell away in the time of battle"; for the Lord was not their confidence, but the glory of their teacher, in whom they delighted. Thus Christ says on the cross [Ps. 88, 19.]: 1) "Thou makest my friends, and my neighbors, and my kinsmen, to put themselves far from me, because of such miseries." And again [Ps. 31:12]: "I am become a great reproach unto my neighbors, and a reproach unto my kinsmen."

v. 7 Oh that help would come to Israel from Zion, and that the Lord would deliver his captive people! Then Jacob would rejoice and Israel would be glad.

I see that this is understood by famous fathers that the Jews should eventually be converted. If this is true, then the psalm must be referred from its beginning to the time of Christ, since the synagogue was so blinded that many (namely the Sadducees) even said that there was no spirit, no angel, and no resurrection of the Flesh, as Lucas reports in the Acts of the Apostles Cap. 23, 8. and Christ Matth. 1) 22, 29. says to them: "You are mistaken and do not know the Scriptures nor the power of God" 2c. For they said so in their heart, There is no God; then they were corrupted by avarice, hypocrisy and unbelief, and were an abomination with their nature, and the counsel of poor Christ and the poor apostles they not only did not receive, but also condemned it with the highest reproach. On this opinion Paul also seems to say Rom. 3, 19. of this psalm: "We know that what the law saith, that saith it unto them which are under the law." In this sense the whole psalm is treated by St. Augustine.

Then follows, spun from the same thread, the meaning: "Oh, that help would come to Israel from Zion! (Quis dabit ex Zion salutare Israel?) As if he wanted to say: In vain is it preached unto them. It is not up to us to save them, even though we counsel them and pray diligently for them, as Paul says in Romans 10:1. This question (in the Vulgate) expresses an anxious desire and, as it were, the attitude that is found in a person who is in the process of giving birth and desires to be banished from Christ for them (as Paul says Rom. 9:3), where he wants to do everything and must finally say, hindered by an insurmountable mystery: But what do I do? Why do I bother? Who can make them blessed? For it must finally come to this, that God intends a mystery here, because: "Blindness happened to Israel in part, until the fullness of the Gentiles came in, and so all Israel would be saved; as it is written: He will come out of Zion, who will redeem and turn away the ungodly from Jacob; and this is my testament with them, when I will take away their sins", Romans 11:25-27. 11, 25-27. For this is a very difficult passage, not even clearly interpreted by Paul himself, because even the passage Is. 59, 20, which he introduces, he does not change a little, therefore I have not sufficiently understood this mystery or this hidden plan.

1) In the text: es usäera instead of: Dlattü.

143 If we now (as we have begun) understand this psalm in a general way of all people, then we do not understand it badly. For even if, according to the letter, it speaks only of the Jews, as indeed Paul enforces in the passage to the Romans just quoted, it is nevertheless true that in this passage they are an example of all the ungodly who have been in the church at one time or another, and especially in the last times, and are there now. Thus it is said in 2 Pet. 2, 6. that the Sodomites were set as an example to the ungodly who would come after; likewise also [v. 15.] that Balaam was set as an example to them; and Jude [Ep. Jude, v. 11.], even John, 1 Ep. 3, 12., set Cain as an example of those who were of the devil. Since all these things are said and done in vain, one must finally leave the matter to God's secret counsel and has nothing left but sighing, wishing but not despairing that God's mercy will come in the end, just as we also wish and hope today that the captivity of the church will be turned around.

144 Who then shall bring salvation upon Israel, and shall bring it out of Zion? No one, until the Lord Himself turns the captivity of His people, that is, of the people who are Israel according to the flesh, and who are now held in the greatest and longest and most terrible captivity, being captives both in body and in spirit; likewise, according to the example of this people, the Lord will turn the captivity of any people who are His, even though they are not Israel according to the flesh and God's people. For [Ps. 127:1], "Where the LORD buildeth not the house, they labor in vain that build it."

But he adds, "Out of Zion," to show that neither they nor any man shall have any help except that which is in Christ, which is given in Zion, and from thence spread abroad over the whole earth; and by this means Jews and Gentiles should be converted, however much they rage against him now. [Luc. 1, 37.:] "For with God no thing is impossible." And Rom. 11, 23.: "God is able to graft them in again."

146 Therefore, the raging of some Christians is condemnable (if they can be called Christians in any other way), who think that they are doing God a service by persecuting the Jews in the most hateful way, thinking everything evil about them and mocking them with pride and contempt at their unfortunate misfortune, since according to the example of this Psalm and Paul's Rom. 9, 1. one should be sad for them with all one's heart and bear sorrow and pray for them constantly. They should at least see how they hear Paul, Rom. 11, 18: "Do not boast against the branches. But if thou boast against them, know that thou bearest not the root, but the root beareth thee." And again [v. 20.], "Be not proud, but fear." But these ungodly men, who are Christians by name, do no small harm by their tyrannical behavior, both to the Christian name and to the Christian people, and are guilty of the ungodliness of the Jews, whom they repel, as it were, from Christianity by this example of cruelty, while they should attract them with all gentleness, patience, supplication and care. And the ravings of these people are also defended by a number of quite unrighteous theologians, who, with prideful presumption, say that the Jews are the servants of the Christians and belong to the emperor, while in truth they themselves are just as much Christians as in truth any man today is a Roman emperor. 1)

1) That is, nowadays, in truth, no one is Roman Emperor, but only by title.

Dear one, who would convert to our religion, even if he had the most gentle and patient mind, who would see that he is treated so cruelly and hostilely by us, and not only not Christian, but more than cattle? If hatred against Jews and heretics and Turks makes Christians, then we raging people are truly the most Christian. But if love against Christ makes Christians, then we are undoubtedly worse than the Jews, heretics and Turks, since no one loves Christ less than we do. The frenzy of these people is similar to that of the fools and children who poke out the eyes of the Jews painted on the walls, as if they wanted to come to the aid of the suffering Christ. And most preachers of the Passion do nothing else than try to make the cruelty of the Jews against Christ even greater, and to make the hearts of the faithful bitter against them, while the Gospel alone deals with it by praising the love of God and of Christ in this piece only and only and to the highest degree. But they never think of this with a single word.

Therefore, the emphasis here is on the word "the Lord," as in the third Psalm, v. 9: "With the Lord one finds help. So no one brings help, no one turns away captivity, but the Lord alone. And the movements of the heart: "He will rejoice and be glad", are in the 5th Psalm 168 ff], but we have discussed the names Jacob and Israel in the 4th Psalm [§ 75].

The fifteenth Psalm.

V. 1. A psalm of David. Lord, who will dwell in your tabernacle? Who will dwell on your holy mountain?

1. this psalm follows in better order the previous one, for as in the latter the pattern or example of the wicked is described, such as the Jews gave in the time of Christ and

Even now, this Psalm describes an example of the godly, so that it may teach us in such a way not only to turn away from evil, but also to do good, to first strip us of the old man and his doings, and then to put on the new man, who is created according to God.

2) And 1) first it must be noted that it presents the image of a godless people in and of itself (absolute) by not showing where it must be taken from or where it comes from. Therefore, it happens that an unintelligent person could attribute what is said in this psalm to moral virtues and free will, which is all a work of grace, 2) so that this psalm is one of the easiest, since it depicts the walk in justifying grace, of which it is completely silent. At the same time, however, it is incomprehensible to those who are not well fortified by the knowledge of grace, just as the preceding psalm is exceedingly clear, since it condemns the walk of the wicked and the work of original sin, of which, however, it is silent; But very obscure for those who are without knowledge of this sin, and there see only the free will, to which they attribute that it can turn the captivity and the ignorance 3) in relation to God with the other evils.

But this psalm fights especially against the reputation of the persons and against those who look at the person. It also fights against the ceremonialists. For the Jews boasted exceedingly before other peoples with the twofold reputation that they alone were the descendants of the fathers and alone had the law of God. Thus, because of the glory of their lineage, because of their wisdom and righteousness, they presumed to dwell alone in the tabernacle of God, as the Baptist said to them Luc. 3:8: "Do not presume to say, 'We have Abraham for a father. GOD is able to raise up children to Abraham from these stones.'" And Rom. 2, 23. 18.: "You boast of the law and test what is best to do" 2c.

4. from the presumption of these people wen-

NUN the prophet sets his face to the hidden prestige (conspectum) of God, before whom there is no prestige of the person. Since the prophet wants to present the truth, he accuses them, but at the same time he has pity on their blindness and says:

(5) O Lord, how do those men boast of the glory of their race, of their wisdom and righteousness, which is of the law, and admit none but themselves into thy tabernacle? For thus they judge men; but thou, before whom there is no respect of persons, judge otherwise. "For what is high among men is an abomination in the sight of God" [Luc. 16:15]. But by the tabernacle of God and the holy mountain of God he designates the church of God, not only of the Christian, but also of all the righteous, even in the synagogue, but this doubling or repetition of the tabernacle and the mountain is not in vain, for the tabernacle or tent is a dwelling place of the warriors; so that he indicates that the people of God dwell in the church in such a way that they constantly have to struggle with the sins, the world and the devils, and in this piece are not without fear and anxiety. This belongs to the killing of the old man.

6. but "abide," which in the Hebrew is also to dwell, but peacefully and quietly, as in a city and in a camp, which our Latin interpreter has translated par excellence by requiescere, signifies to have a safe and quiet conscience through faith in Christ, even in the midst of the tumult of battle. This belongs to the justification of the new man, therefore [in the Vulgate] it would have been better to put the conjunct et, instead of ant, as it is in the Hebrew.

We see, then, that here the question is not asked with regard to anyone who is in the Church of God, since in the threshing floor there is much chaff among the wheat, but only with regard to those who are in truth in the Church, to whom the Church is the tabernacle of war and the mountain of peace, who always fight in it and always triumph. Let us hear, therefore, what his answer is to this exceedingly mean question, in which all ask what a good, just, and holy man is.

1) Erlanger: Lx instead of: Lt.

2) Jenaer and Erlanger: Zratiaoperantis instead of: Zratias operantis.

3) It seems to us that iANorantiaru should be changed to iKNoruntE in the editions, depending on oonveiAonein; according to this we have translated. This agrees also with what is said in Z106 of the previous psalm. In the reading: oni tridhunt ... i^norantiam vei, they ascribe to the: free will ignorance with respect to GOD, the godless would be right in this.

V. 2: He who walks without change, and does right, and speaks the truth from the heart.

8. namely, by their fruits you shall know them, of which he puts three after the division in the Hebrew in this 1) verse. The e^hth is: "to walk without change." This is also how the 119th Psalm begins: "Blessed are those who live without change," that is, as Jac. 1, 27. says, "who keep themselves unspotted from the world."

(9) But he does not speak of carnal purity, which is kept in the garments, food, drink, members, and other righteousnesses of the flesh, whether in the Levitical priesthood or in the worldly trappings. For he speaks in the spirit of spiritual purity. Purity, however, is twofold, since Paul distinguishes between the uncleanness of the flesh and that of the spirit, and states in Titus 1:15 that both their minds and consciences are unclean, and because of this defect he announces that nothing is clean for them. This impurity is godlessness itself, a delusion, an erroneous opinion of God, namely, the scarf-eye, which makes the whole body dark, even their most apparent works, words, counsels, thoughts: such a powerful evil is this spiritual impurity. The other is the uncleanness of the flesh, unchastity and lust; although this stains the heart and will with unclean desires, it is called carnal because it comes from the evil lust of the flesh.

(10) These are contrasted with a twofold purity, of the spirit and of the flesh. The spirit is godliness itself, which Job and Baruch call wisdom, Peter and Paul faith. For so Peter says Apost. 15:9, "He purified their hearts through faith." For this makes the mind and conscience pure, and keeps right of God. Therefore the prophets mention fornication very often, because of which they punish the people of Israel, because they are stained, defiled, polluted, corrupted, become a whore, adulterous. Again, they call the people who stand in the true faith a virgin, so that chastity and defilement of the flesh are generally considered to be an image of godliness and godlessness. For so the Lord in the first and second chapter of the prophet Hosea takes the image of a woman and a man as a likeness between him and the synagogue.

11. purity of the flesh is chastity or chastity itself, which is sufficiently sung about and known, and this also works through faith, as it is said in Isa. 11:5: "Righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faith the girdle of his kidneys. This purity of the flesh is also called purity of the flesh, although it goes into the inner being and is especially in the spirit of man, because it expresses itself in things and works of the flesh, just as purity of the spirit is called purity of the spirit, although it comes out and pours itself out especially in all works, purifying the whole life, because it comes from the things and works of the spirit. Paul puts these two pieces together beautifully 1 Tim. 2, 2: "That we may lead a quiet and still life in all godliness and respectability" (castitate), Greek: εὐσεβεία κα: σεμνότητα.

by which God is served and lived honorably.

(12) So then, he is silent about faith, but he praises its fruits, since no one can walk without change except the one who believes, and "walking without change" is the same as living by faith, thus beginning at the first commandment.

(13) "And does justice" (operatur iustitiam - he does justice). Here the word righteousness stands without closer relation (absolute), without the pronoun your or my, because the righteousness that is valid before God is that (as we have said enough) by which we are righteous before Him by His grace, of which He does not speak here, but of the righteousness according to which we live among men, harming no one, giving to all what is ours, as also the apostle Tit. 2, 12. says: "Live chastely, righteously and godly in this world."

14 But note that he says, a doer of righteousness, but not, he who speaks, thinks, hears righteousness; for not the hearers, but the doers of the law shall be justified.

1) Here in the Latin still primo is added. In the Vulgate only two fruits are indicated in this second verse, the third in the following verse.

2) In the text here (probably only by mistake) ÜÜ6S is written instead of iustitia, which is also to be read according to the

But what do we owe to others? That which Christ teaches in Matt. 7:12: "Whatever you want people to do to you, you do to them," even to your enemies. Namely, we should harm no one, repay no one for evil, come to the aid of those who suffer injustice, do good to all. But this (as I have said) is spoken more against the reputation of the persons, as if he wanted to say: Not because you are a priest, not because you are a monk, not because you pray much, not because you do miracles, not because you teach well, not because you have great prestige through the title of the fathers, nor as the doer of any work, except righteousness, will you dwell on the holy mountain of God. If you do not have it, all other works will not benefit you, not even indulgences, not even the way of help (suffragia), not even the intercessions of the saints. The saying is certain: "He who walks without change and does right shall dwell in the tabernacle of the Lord."

(15) For how many people are there who build, multiply and adorn churches, monasteries, monasteries, altars, vessels, garments, who in the meantime do not even think of righteousness, even, in order to do this, trample righteousness underfoot, and finally hope forgiveness for their unrighteousness through these works. To very many who are deceived in this trade, he will speak like this on the last day: I have been hungry, I have been thirsty, I have been naked, I have been imprisoned, I have been sick, I have been a sojourner, but he will say nothing of the works that will be highly raised and regarded today. Again, it matters not whether you are a layman, poor, sick, despised, and however small; if you do right, you will be saved. This is the only thing to which one must pay attention, that he may do right, since everything else appeals and entices in vain under the appearance of godliness.

16 "And speak the truth from the heart" (in corde suo). A beautiful order: first, a person is required who is pleasing through purity, then the work through justice, and finally the word through truth. Thus God first looks at Abel, then also at his sacrifice. And

He that is mighty in works is mighty also in words; and a tree that bringeth forth his fruit in his season, and his leaf also shall never wither, lest he be of them that say, but do not.

17 Speaking the truth in his heart, Augustine thinks, is spoken by him who speaks the truth without knowing it, while he wants something else than is indicated, like Caiphas Joh. 11, 50: "It is better for us that a man die for the people. For he wanted to create the benefit that the people would not be cut off from the land, even though he knew that this would not follow, or at least could not know it. So he spoke the truth with his mouth, not in his heart, but according to the heart of John, because John understood with a true heart what the latter said with a lying heart but with a true mouth.

18 Such people are also those of whom it is said in Paul 1 Tim. 1, 7 that they do not know what they say or what they say. This is an extremely common evil, which also happened to many holy fathers, in that they sometimes distorted the holy scripture, which is the truth itself, according to their inclinations. And who can boast today that he does not have this error? For there are more than many perverters of the word of God; not that all of them knowingly lie, but that they do not sufficiently recognize their heart, which holds just the opposite of what is spoken with the mouth in completely true words, and understands neither itself nor the words of its mouth. This happens because they speak things that they have not attained through purity of faith and through the life that does right; therefore it is necessary that they have only assumptions about all things and understand nothing.

19 The same must be said of those who do not teach, but only speak in conversation. For very seldom do we speak one to another as we mean, fearing to give offense, so that I do not know whether I can exempt even one man from this sin, except Christ, just as I do not believe that there is even one who has done right, or one who has done wrong.

I know that no one has led a spotless life without any fault, except Christ alone, who alone has not committed any sin, nor has any deceit been found in his mouth. For if we were all to speak, one against the other, as we mean, with how many enemies would we be burdened? how many friendships would be severed by this sword of truth, which now seem most closely united? Therefore, as much humanity remains in us, as much lies and vanity also remains in us. Therefore, no one is without dissimulation and flattery, not even without false delusion in relation to God's word.

20 Again, as I have said, here he punishes the appearance of the person, which deceives very many, so that they also do not realize that they have this defect in themselves. So no one is open and sincere enough. And yet we do not take care to put away this evil, but in the meantime do our miserable works, in which we trust, just as if we could dwell on the holy mountain of God with this defect.

V. 3: He who does not slander with his tongue, and does not do evil to his neighbor, and does not revile his neighbor.

(21) There is no doubt that what he said, "He who walks without change and does right," signifies the whole righteousness, which he then expounds in its parts. One part is that one speaks the truth from the heart, does not flatter, does not close one's eyes, does not let go; by this injustice we sin against our friends and comrades. The other part is that one does not act falsely with his tongue, which in Hebrew means: He who does not speak in a diminutive way or play the braggart. Jerome gives it: Who is not light with his tongue. But it signifies the wrong wherewith we sin against our adversaries, in that we bear to our friends that which we have only ever heard from the enemies of the same, and interpret this most grievously, and daily scout, that we may bear similar things. From this word [XXX] Joseph called his brethren spies [XXXXXX] of Egypt, Gen. 42:9. This is truly a far-reaching and quite common vice, which is at the same time serves most powerfully to arouse dissension; then it sometimes adorns itself quite beautifully with the appearance and pretense of a counsel and a warning. It is, however, a very beautiful larva, since it pretends to be an angel of light, brags out of zeal for God, investigates, accuses the neighbor of heresy, error, ungodly life. For such a person expects a reward for having served God by killing the godly and condemning the godly teachings.

(22) So the prophet wants us to keep silent about the evil that is found in our neighbor, even if he is our enemy and deserves it for our sake [that we speak evil of him], and also to speak nothing but good of him, and only such things that serve to establish, maintain and increase harmony, because this is what we want to be done to us. Yes, we should take the utmost care not to condemn and condemn someone's word and work sacrilegiously, lest we violate the truth for which we seem to be making a special effort. Augustine writes that his mother behaved in this way with wives who were enemies of one another in the 9th book of his Confessions.

(23) Therefore, a great part of the wrong is done in this. There are many testimonies against this vice in the Scriptures, but we do not mention them, because this vice is exceedingly well known in itself, and is condemned even by the teachings of men.

(24) But there is not one man in this life who does not have this vice, so great is the misery of this life. For although there are people who do not demand that the evil deeds of their adversary be told to them, and that everything he does be interpreted in the worst way, yet they do not dislike to hear it spoken and interpreted to them in such a way, and they allow it to be said, nor do they reject it and resist the one who says it, nor do they interpret it for the best, and at least give room to suspicion. It is written that Gedaliah son of Ahikam excelled in this virtue, Jer. 40:13-16, and when he was followed by Johanan son of Kareah, and said with truth that Ishmael the son of Nethaniah was after him to slay him, he would not hear it, nor would he believe him, but said, "It is not true that thou sayest of Ishmael." And because he persisted in this godly opinion, he was killed, preferring to risk his life rather than to suspect evil of his neighbor (which was true) and believe the boaster.

(25) "And does no evil to his neighbor," that is, causes loss or harm. If this vice is taken in its entirety, no man will be entirely free from it, any more than from the preceding. For even if there are people who do not give their hand to it, they rejoice that according to retribution (nemesi), the virtue of the peripatetic, evil befalls the wicked, do not hinder this either, yes, also praise the justice of God that he gives those who have deserved it the deserved punishment, but in doing so do not see how they would not want such a thing to be desired of them by any adversary. And this law of nature has not seen the famous light of nature, Aristotle, because he has sullied his moral doctrine with this retribution and with many other vices, which he has listed as virtues.

26. But even this abomination not infrequently puts on the garb of an angel of light, so that it cannot be recognized, since the saints of God are burned and killed, and truth and righteousness are persecuted in order to do God a service, and out of zeal for truth, as nowadays the sophists and the bishops, the idols, who do not care that they would not have such things done to them. Thus you see that the prophet particularly attacks the reputation of persons, because it is mainly those who presume to dwell in the tabernacle of God who are most defiled with these vices, deceived by the appearance of good opinion (intentionis), good name and high reputation, which they have in their own eyes and before men.

27. and does not revile his neighbor, (et opprobrium non accipit adversus proximos suos). The verbum accipit [he has accepted men] would have been better translated by levavit [he has lifted up on high]. So also it is in Ps. 24:4 [Vulg.], "Who hath not accepted (non accipit, not lifted up, not exalted, not raised on high) his soul in the vain." So here: He who has not cried out, exalted, exaggerated, magnified, spread the evil name, dishonor, reproach, blasphemy against his neighbor, which enemies are wont to do against one another, but especially those against whom he speaks the most, who cover themselves (personati = verlarvt) with zeal for GOD and love of the truth, for he speaks in the spirit. For the rude reproachers soon realize that they have done evil, but those continue in the merit that is due to their zeal, and it would be heretical to say that they have not done well. Therefore it comes to them to cry out against their neighbors, to call them heretics, schismatics. Therefore, it is their duty to shout against their neighbors, to call them heretics, schismatics, to give them a thousand evil names and to spread and raise them among the people, to make them great before the great, to bear witness with their hands, with their voice and with all their strength, until they move heaven and earth, if they can, and stir up the depths of the sea.

28 But behold, the Spirit does not refrain from calling them "neighbors," even though they are enemies one against the other, calling them to peace and harmony by an exceedingly powerful word, and punishing their exceedingly great nonsense. For who should declare his neighbor, harm him, revile him, if he were not nonsensical? How should they excuse themselves for having done to the enemies what the latter deserved, and deny that they are neighbors, against the Holy Spirit, who claims that they are neighbors? But so it must happen that, forgetting the law of nature, they do what they would not have done to them.

29 Note also the beautiful order, for this whole verse is about enemies. For the first thing is to find out the evil of one's neighbor, to declare it, to accuse him, then, when he is accused, to harm him, to kill him, to burn him; finally, so that it does not appear as if they have acted or are still acting unjustly against him, to blaspheme him, to bring shame on him.

They raised him high, shouted out his transgressions, and thus showed that he had suffered the punishment he deserved. Thus they first found out false testimonies against Christ, accused him and brought charges against him, and after he had been accused and condemned, they crucified him; but they blasphemed the crucified one with the most shameful names. This is how the prophet actually, puffingly and briefly, depicted the life of the wicked.

30 On the other hand, it behooves a good man not to allow his neighbor to be insulted, to erase it, to praise the opposite of him, to protect him, and if he cannot protect him, to excuse him, or at least to suffer and have compassion, even for the enemy and the evil one; for this is what everyone wants to happen to him. Thus he will not only not harm or do evil to his neighbor, but also do good, whether he be friend or foe, according to Christ's saying Matt. 5:44; he will also not scout nor brag, but resist the braggart, shut the mouth of the ear-blower. This is great and difficult, because it must offend the mountains of Israel and the courts of Jordan itself, the highest bishops, authorities, rulers, sages and saints. For these are far more involved in these vices than the common people, and they also rage and do far more harm, because with them there is a beautiful appearance, and their power is to be feared. That is what he says:

V. 4: He who does not respect the wicked, but honors the godly; he who swears to his neighbor, and keeps it.

31 The prophet would have said, "A high priest, a king, a prophet, a prince, the elders, the scribes, the Pharisees, the bishops, and everything else that has a great name in his sight is not to be feared, if one does not have to distinguish between the persons and their faults, between the power and the abuse of power. For the names of the powers are to be feared, but their vices are to be despised; neither is it necessary, for the sake of violence, to conceal or approve of vices, nor for the sake of vices to insult or despise violence, since no violence is without from God, and it does not belong to men, but to God, Rom. 13, 1. The vices, however, are not of God, but of men. Therefore, prudence is needed here, but also great courage, so that violence does not frighten the one who despises vice, but also so that vice does not trap the one who looks up to violence in foolish humility.

32 Thus the meaning is: Though the boasters, the wicked and the blasphemers are great, and though wickedness proceeds from the great men of Babylon, who, as is seen, rule the people, yet the righteous is not frightened by their greatness; he despises them as wicked and acts confidently in defending his neighbors, though he honors them as great men and humbly yields to their authority. If the Christians had kept this verse against the great men of Rome, the church would have less evil today.

33. the Hebrew text speaks more delicately [than the Vulgate] in this place: Despised is in his eyes the despiser, namely, by indicating the whole manner of the great and proud, who by the confidence in their power and by the glittering prestige of their person want to be puffed up, to be feared by all; but they themselves want to despise all, want that everything is permitted to them, but nothing is permitted to others without their advice, as in Rome our idols say of the Germans: How many grooms we have Romans! And again: You German beast! 1) For thus the most holy shepherds of Christ's sheep feed us for the pallia [which we must buy from them] and all our goods and chattels, which the exceedingly strong robbers seize. Are they not then also handsome and sure despisers of GOD, men, and all things? But who, in turn, despises these people? The flatterers? These even make it their business to claim that one has offended the violence [ordered by God] if one only punishes their vices. In this way, they make violence, which is a service to eternal bliss, a protector of injustice and murder and a workshop of ruin.

1) Cf. Walch, old edition, vol. XVII, 1287, § 15. St. Louis edition vol. XVIII, 1008, 8 7.

34) On the other hand: "But honor the God-fearing. A beautiful juxtaposition: those are despisers of God, these are God-fearers; those he despises, these he honors. Is he not moved by their low esteem, which they have because of their poverty, their small number, their lowliness, their lack of learning, their low status, their oppression? No, but [he does] like Moses, who, as it is said in Heb. 11:27, 25, 26. "forsook Egypt, and feared not the king's wrath, and chose rather to suffer mischief with the people of God, than to have the temporal pleasure of sin; and counted the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt," just as Ahimelech did not fear Saul and his princes, but spoke confidently for poor David, 1 Sam. 22:14 ff.

(35) There is a special emphasis in the fact that the prophet reverses the movement of the heart and gives honor to the small and despised, but contempt to the great and glorious. The great and those who are despisers of the small, he not only does not honor in their wickedness, but also despises them; The little ones and those who are despised by them he does not only respect in the good that is found in them, but also honors them, while a worldly-minded heart acts quite differently, since the vices of the great are praised as virtues, or everything is interpreted very mildly, while the virtues of the little ones are accused as offenses, or everything is interpreted in the worst way, as the little fable of the fox and the lion, likewise of the wolf and the sheep 1) illustrates very well. Therefore the courageous work of a bold spirit is necessary, that one despises the honored and honors the despised. Thus Elisha said 2 Kings 3:13, 14 fearlessly to Jehoram, the king of Israel: "What have you to do with me? As surely as the LORD lives, before whom I stand, if I did not look at Jehoshaphat king of Judah, I would not look at you nor respect you."

36. "He who swears to his neighbor." Jerome translates: He swears so that he will be-clouds, and does not change it. The Hebrew word, since it is ambiguous and can mean both affliction and a friend, can be translated by affliction, but the sense of our translation pleases me better, since the psalm deals entirely with works against one's neighbor, except in the second verse, which dealt sufficiently with the works one should do on oneself to purify oneself.

(37) He touches on a common vice among men, about which everyone complains, namely, disloyalty, which comes from the root that everyone seeks his own, especially in commerce and business, without which this life cannot exist. For just as the desire for one's own advantage lies deep within, which no one recognizes enough in himself, because it is very cunning and false, so it is difficult and rare that one keeps and does not change what one has promised and sworn. Even if some keep it, they do not keep it with a willing heart, especially if something comes up that has happened in the meantime, which could result in either a profit or an opportunity for greater advantage, which at the same time causes one to regret having made the promise. But even if someone overcomes (although nature cannot do this without the grace of God), few overcome, even if the grace of God is there, either when they are forced to swear to an enemy, or when they have to keep an oath to one who has become an enemy in the meantime. Therefore, no child of Adam fulfills this commandment, and a child of God hardly fulfills it, or rather begins to fulfill it. Therefore, none of those dwells in the tabernacle of GOD, since the latter can hardly dwell in it either, and as Peter says [1 Ep. 4, 18.], the righteous will hardly be preserved.

Therefore, everyone should beware of the tasteless, even godless and heretical decrees under the title: Of Vows and of the Release from a Vow, where the Roman Pontiff, or rather some quite unlearned writer of the same, dares to declare that it is in his hands to dispense with vows and oaths and to change them, or (as some put it more mildly) to change them.

1) Cf. Walch, old edition, vol. XIV, 1371 f. and idiä. Col. 1369.

to declare which vows are or are not, by saying against the explicit text Deut. 23, 21. that he is not guilty of having violated his vow, who postponed the fulfillment of it by order of the Roman pope. He does this not as a shepherd but as a destroyer of Christ's sheep, citing as a cover for his ungodliness or as a reason for his statement what is written in Exodus 13:13 and 34:20, that the firstborn of the ass is to be killed, 1) or redeemed with a sheep. He is not satisfied with the fact that this scripture does not speak of an oath or a vow, then he also does not see that this change was not ordered by human arbitrariness but by God's command. So he twists the words of God to strengthen his tyranny, but he also defiantly boasts with the mouth that speaks great things, that he has shut the mouths of those who spoke ungodly things. With this he shows that in this piece, as if he were God in the temple of God, he is able to do the same thing of which he has read that it was in God's power, yes, he dares to dissolve what God has commanded. But if only an explanation is sought, then here it is not a power that is in place, but a knowledge that decides whether it is a vow or not. Therefore, some godly and learned man will give a better explanation than the all-capable (omnipotens) and all-willing (omnivolens) apostolic chair, which is mostly unlearned and ignorant of the Holy Scriptures.

39 Since the prophet in this passage requires the oaths taken by men as necessary for salvation, no one can break the vows or oaths taken by God. Therefore the children of Israel, Jos. 9, 9. ff., even though they had sworn to the Gibeonites and regretted it later, when the matter came to light, still kept their oath. On the other hand, King Zedekiah was severely punished by the prophets, especially by Ezekiel [Cap. 17:16], because he had not kept his oath to the king of Babylon, and was finally miserably imprisoned and blinded.

and punished [2 Kings 25:7]. This also happened to the king of Hungary in the last century, because he had broken the treaty with the Turks at the behest of the apostolic legate. But even such great examples cannot take away the sharpness of this heretical saying (mitigant), and the heretical judges like to sleep here.

40 But I believe that what he commands here about keeping an oath must also be understood at the same time about any promise. For his intention is to teach faith among men; faith, I say, not with which one believes in God, but with which we must believe one against another and keep our promise, as Rom. 3, 3. says of God's faith: "Should their unbelief nullify God's faith?" Paul says this elsewhere, 2 Tim. 2, 13, in such a way: "If we do not believe, He remains faithful," so that in this way we may be God's children, and one another's God, faithful to the one who believes us, just as God is faithful to all of us who believe in Him.

41 But the prophet stops at the oath mainly because in this kind of work faith is kept or broken in a very special way; just as chastity is taught in the prohibition of adultery, and meekness in the prohibition of killing, and much more like that. But in all these things the grace of God is praised, for it is not in human but in God's power that one should not swear falsely, as also that one should not break marriage, not kill. For he has looked upon the common life of men, which Hosea, Cap. 4, 1. f., thus describes: "There is no faithfulness, no love, no word of God in the land; but blasphemy, lying, murder, stealing and adultery have abounded, and bloodguilt comes one after another." And who will boast today that he is safe from perjury, since we are bound, one to another, by so many oaths, first by the spiritual, then also by the temporal authorities? For who else has sworn to no one but a babe in the cradle? But who has kept all oaths? Thus it comes about that the great quantity of oaths truly floods the church with

1) Weimarsche: mutanciura instead of: umetanäum.

Perjury, and the amount of laws is the cause of most sins. So there is no one who has not sworn, no one or only very few who do not repent of having sworn, or from the heart do justice to the oath. Thus, this life entangles us wretched people in sins from all sides.

(42) But here the question is raised whether a Christian may swear, since Christ teaches Matt. 5:34: "I say that you should not swear about anything. Many and great books have been written about this. Dangerously and all too slowly they give their decision, since we are all involved in oaths and caught in them, and in the common life of men the custom of swearing is so frequent that there is almost nothing that happens more often; and even today they do not agree on this. Certainly this verse indicates that it is permissible to swear, even to one's neighbor or friend, lest anyone think that one must swear only to a superior when the latter requires it. Nor does it speak merely of perjury or false swearing, by which one knowingly swears falsely, but rather of keeping the oath, which the Hebrew text expresses more clearly than our Latin interpreter, for there it says instead: Who does not deceive (non decipit [in the Vulgate]): who does not change, does not fall away, does not rebel against, that is, who does not break his word given on faith. Although Christ's words forbidding the oath are so obvious, since he says [Matth. 5, 37]. Again, it is no less evident that he himself has sworn very often, since he says so often in the Gospel, "Verily, verily, I say unto you," and Paul so often swears, who has nowhere forbidden to swear, but everywhere commanded that one should keep faith and speak the truth; I know not what to say, or whom to believe.

In the meantime, I will indicate my low opinion, which is not far from the opinion of all others. I will first of all follow the common life and mind of men, then take the words of Christ as simply as I can. All men are so minded that they condemn many vices which they themselves do not refrain from,

as the conscience of each one testifies. So they also unanimously condemn those who swear easily in ordinary speech or conversation, which is difficult to guard against, as experience testifies. Moreover, no one condemns swearing that is not done in ordinary conversation, when it is a matter of covenants, treaties, or faith, so that in this way a distinction must be made between ordinary speech, narrative, or conversation, in which something is told, recited, and various things are said, and between agreements, treaties, covenants, promises, vows of fidelity (fidem), and the like.

44 Thus Christ and Paul swear as often as they persuade to faith and make the holy covenant of faith with men. But Christ speaks of ordinary speech, therefore he says quite explicitly: "Let your speech be: yes, yes, no, no", in order to prevent frivolity in swearing, since in ordinary speech there is no need to swear. I think that Augustine was also of this opinion, since he says that the inclination to swear is forbidden. Thus the word of Christ stands firm in the simplest sense: "That which is above is of evil," so that it is not necessary to invent this as an evil, that one does not believe him, since in truth the evil is on the side of him who in ordinary speech (where there is no promise, no covenant, no vow of fidelity, and therefore no necessity) is at hand with swearing.

(45) With this opinion we shall not entangle so many consciences, since, as I have said, it expresses the life or common disposition of men, from which the doctrine of Christ, if rightly held against it, does not differ much as far as morals are concerned, and agrees with the word of Christ, if it be plainly understood; but it also fits in very well with its original source, from which Christ took his doctrine. For it is said in Deut. 19:11, 12: "Ye shall not lie, nor deal falsely, one with another. Ye shall not swear falsely by my name, and profane the name of thy God." There he speaks, as one sees, of the speech in the ordinary life and in the contact, since it deals with lies and false speeches (which are lesser sins, since they occur in ordinary conversation, than perjury and disloyalty in contracts and agreements).

46 But also this verse of the Psalm shows that he does not speak of ordinary speech, since he says: "And keep it" (non mutat, by obviously punishing faithlessness and perjury, since he has punished lying and false speech or false swearing in daily speech above [v. 2.]: "He who speaks the truth from the heart." Concerning the same swearing he says Ps. 24:4 [Vulg.], "And swear not falsely to his neighbor." Thus both opinions are certain that a Christian is absolutely commanded not to swear in any way in any matter, whether divine or human, in any speech, and yet the oath taken in any matter or contract is to be kept. Therefore, swearing is like the carnal work, which is not permitted apart from marriage, and is both required and rightly performed in marriage. Thus it is not lawful to swear where it is not a matter of contract and faith, but where it is, it is lawful and even beneficial.

V. 5 He who does not give his money usurpingly, and does not take gift over the innocent. Whoever does this will remain in good standing.

This verse does not need interpretation, but fulfillment, and Augustine says that this is not something great and only for the beginners, because the prophet started with the high and great things. The same opinion is St. Jerome and others. But if we take care that the prophet speaks in the spirit, what man is there who is not entangled in these sins? It may be that not all lend on usury, but all hate the fact that it is not permitted to lend on usury, and would turn themselves in if it were permitted, having in mind their own benefit and not that of others. Then, even if the wickedness of the old Adam is hidden here, there is no one who would not become a usurer if lack oppressed him and no other way were open to him.

48. Therefore all the verba of this psalm are: "He will dwell, he will abide, he will walk, he will do [right], he will speak, he will not slander, he will not do evil, he will not revile, he will swear, he will keep it, he will not give, he will not take, he will do," are to be understood in such a way from the works, that it may be seen that everything flows from a pure spiritual will, although the hypocrites can feign all this, or much of the like, for a time, but at the evil time they do the opposite. Otherwise this is indeed a very small work, that one does not give his money on usury, since we are commanded to do good even to the enemies and to lend to all for nothing.

49 But does not the prophet contradict Moses, who says to the children of Israel, Deut. 23:19 ff. [Vulg.]: "Thou shalt not usury thy brother, neither with money, nor with food, nor with anything that is usurious. All the stranger thou mayest usury, but unto thy brother thou shalt lend without usury all that he hath need of?" It cannot be denied that he punished the customs of his people, that, not content with usurping strangers, they usurped their brethren also. As this people was then, so it is still now the most avaricious of all, and exceedingly eager for usury. Therefore the prophets have attacked them in many ways, among them Amos, Cap. 8, 4-6. Hear this, you who oppress the poor and destroy the wretched of the land, and say, "When will the new moon 1) end, that we may sell grain, and the Sabbath, that we may sell corn, and wrestle the ephah, and increase the sekel, and counterfeit the scales, that we may sell the poor for money, and the needy for a pair of shoes (Hebrew: for grain), and chaff for grain?" Ibid Cap. 2,²) 6. f.: "You sell the righteous for money, and the poor for a pair of shoes (that is, for your grain). You tread the head of the poor in dung, and hinder the way.

1) Here all editions have: ruessis instead of: meusis. It seems to be messis in some editions of the Vulgate, so Luther remarks in the second interpretation of the prophet Amos to the words: Huando transikit mau-.

2) In text: xrimo.

of the wretched" (declinant, that is, they invert it).

(50) But not only does the prophet have to deal with this (as I said), but all movements of the heart that are directed toward usury, even the most secret ones, he plans to eradicate, so that he can put goodness in the place of usury, so that they "give gladly" (as the apostle teaches 1 Tim 6:18) and lend for free, as Christ commands Luc 6:35 and Matth 5:42.

(51) But in our time, usury has an exceedingly blissful progress, since it has become a justice and a lawful contractus through the Roman Pontiff, in that the name usury has been eliminated and a new name has been attached to it, since it is now called a contract of redemption. For this is now called by a beautiful apparent name (figura), and by this righteousness the whole world is made righteous today, especially the clergy, and this abomination reigns quite securely, after the gospel and all its righteousness with the kingdom of God has been extinguished in this way; and yet no one wants to believe, although it is said that the Antichrist is present. Secondly, this same contract serves by a new miracle to make temporal goods no longer temporal, because the interest, which is the nerve, the essence and the power of this contract, is immortal, even with idle and unfruitful money.

How devoutly we allow this gross wickedness of Satan and worship it only because the name of the Roman pope is invoked! Therefore, it seems to me that among all the miracles that God works today, the one that stands in the first place is that the world can endure and endure the incomprehensible usury of this interest. So it may be something small that one does not give his money on usury, but nowadays it is certainly something great and rare, of which I have said elsewhere abundantly.

53. "And does not take gift over the innocent." This also seems low

1) In the two sermons on usury (1519). Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. X, 824 and 856.

But this is also something rare and great today, not to mention the Jews. Here the judges sin, and those who initiate, 2) defend, cause legal proceedings, that is, the pope, the bishops, the officers, the lawyers, the tongue-thrashers in the courts, and the yeast of men, which feeds on the sins of the people, as the harlots do on the ravishment of women. In general, it is easy for someone to give good advice, to make a judgment and to pass a sentence, just by the reputation (intuitu) of the matter, but when selfishness (affectus) sets in, namely the hope of gain, favor against a friend, hatred against an enemy, contempt for the lowly, fear of the great, you will not only see what Deut. 16, 19. and 2 Mos. 23, 8. is written: "Gifts blind the wise, and pervert the things of the righteous", and Is. 1, 23.: "They all gladly take gifts, and seek after gifts", but that also all the just mentioned movements of the heart (affectus) will do the same. No one but he who has experienced it knows how flattering and formidable an evil this is.

54. Now there are those who, even out of ambition, pervert the cause of another, that they may be thought the more shrewd and learned. But what is the matter if you take no gift over the innocent, yet take honor or vengeance or favor from it? Now if the princes and the bishops kept this verse, thinkest thou that the Roman furie (curie I meant to say) would give birth to so many monsters? But just as there all abominations of shameful deeds reign in the highest degree, so also this injustice must reign there, so that Satan again obtains his seat and the temple of all idols (pantheon), from where all evil floods the whole world.

(55) But lest any part of mankind be free from this vice, it happens that very many also condemn the cause of faith and the Word of God, partly by gifts and partly by favors,

Lexicon does not.

This word offers our Latin

Envy, hatred, ambition, the desire for fame, not a few also out of fear of the great, some also out of contempt. Do not all of these do something against the innocent? Besides these, there are also some who do it out of ignorance, out of zeal for God and (as they boast) out of love for the truth. Who can free the monasteries, convents, high schools from this evil, which (let alone ignorance) also publicly confess that they would speak and do anything for the truth, if they did not fear to be deprived of their income, honors, favors or even life? What is this but that, while they do not take gifts over the innocent, they wickedly keep over the innocent that which they have rightly received? Woe to you!

Who would dare to say that the revenues, honors, dignities of all monasteries, convents, high schools have become gifts taken from the innocent because of the dreaded tyranny of one man, the pope? Already from this one piece you can see how dangerous it is to be a pope, then also how many shameful deeds in the whole world he is the author of, if he should have abused even once his power against the truth. But now, since he abuses it only for the destruction of truth, what else can we believe than that in Rome is the chair of Satan, and that the Antichrist is doing his business there, since only through the fear of him truth is extinguished in such a large area, and error and lies are established, through such easy and quick destruction of countless souls? Dear one, who should not fear to live in such great peril of these times, when souls are plunged into ruin in heaps? These are the times of which Paul foretold [2 Tim. 3:1], "Dreadful times are coming, for there will be men who think of themselves." 2c.

57 He concludes correctly: "Whoever does this will remain. Mark well:

"does". If he who says and teaches this but does not do it will not stand, where will those remain who, even though they know and think that this is true, dare not murmur? Where will those remain who, out of an incomprehensible zeal, act contrary to it? Therefore, in Hebrew the distinctive sign of this verse is set in such a way that the words: "He who does this" belong to the first part, namely, "He who does not give his money on usury, and does not take gift over the innocent by doing this; he will remain well. As if he wanted to say: Not he who knows or speaks of it. So that the last part of the verse belongs to the whole psalm, and the first shows how strange and difficult it is to live without usury, without blood money, yes, that this is not possible, unless someone is willing to give up his income, his honor and his life, and to suffer everything, even the utmost, for the truth.

(58) From this we see how false everything is that shines with a beautiful appearance and name. For today we are of the opinion that Christianity is primarily among the clergy, and behold, everyone in the whole world lives in usury and takes blood money out of fear of the Roman pope. In Rome they boast with unrestrained vehemence that the pope feeds all the sheep; and behold, he himself is the wolf that chokes all the sheep! See what the apostle said [2 Thess. 2, 11. 10.]: "Therefore God will send them strong error, that they may believe the lie; for that they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved." In the meantime, we nevertheless read the seven times (horas canonicas), offer many masses, and do and say what can be said and done without danger for us; truth and faith with the Gospel may take care of their danger themselves. What is that to us, who instead of Christians have become Romans, from believers saints of works, from evangelicals decretalists, from spiritual people ceremonialists, and in general from a free people of God the servants of the most godless people!

The sixteenth psalm

V. 1. a golden jewel (mihtham) of David.

1 This word has been treated in many ways. The old Latin Bible has, as Augustine says: Tituli inscriptio, because the same Hebrew expression also means a mark or sign, so therefore XXXX, with a sign, with a mark, or 1) with a mark (titulo). But that this refers to the sign (titulum) of the cross is probably godly, but nevertheless forced. Jerome, however, reproduces it by two expressions, by going into the derivation of the words, as it were (etymologisans): Of the humble and righteous David. Lyra makes it the name of a particularly beautiful (decentioris) song, and I like his opinion almost best of all. For Burgensis refutes Jerome's opinion in an erudite manner. Burgensis himself, however, says that by this word gold, or a golden jewel (aureum), is signified, as it is said in High. 5, 11: "His head is the finest gold." Therefore, when the letter X is put in front of it, it becomes XXXX, that is, of gold or a golden jewel, and he says that by this is signified the suffering of Christ, which is sung about in this psalm.

2) Based on all this, I would like to assume that XXXX is the name of this psalm. For this is how the name of the psalm is usually placed next to the name of any author, as: a Song of David, a Psalm of David, a Testimony of Assaph, an Instruction of David, and the like, as we have seen and will see. So here, because this is an excellent psalm, and deals with a particularly glorious object, namely Christ, the head over all, he did not want to name it with an ordinary word, but distinguish it with a very special, new and lovely one, and call it David's, as if he wanted to say: A golden jewel of David. Thus com-

Lyra and Burgensis agree on the same opinion, which they in any case drew from Hebrew sources.

But there are six Psalms in all distinguished by this title, this sixteenth, and the fifty-sixth with the four following. But those have many other things in their titles, this one as a special one before all, is simply called XXXX. For no other speaks so clearly of the suffering and resurrection of the person of Christ, therefore the apostles also use this psalm almost before all other scriptures to confirm the resurrection of Christ, as we can see in Apost. 2, 24-28. and Cap. 13, 35. where Peter says: "God raised Him up, and dissolved the pains of death, after it was impossible that He should be held by Him. For David says of him, "I have set the Lord always before me, because he is at my right hand, that I should not be moved. Therefore my heart is glad, and my tongue rejoiceth: for my flesh also shall rest in hope: for thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thy Holy One to see corruption. Thou hast made known unto me the ways of life; thou wilt fill me with joy in thy sight." "Lovely is at your right hand forever", Ps. 16, 11. 2)

4 From this, the meaning of the whole psalm is easy to understand, and it does not need our explanation, as far as the brief epitome of opinion is concerned, but rather faith and emulation, since the holy apostles have interpreted it so clearly through the Holy Spirit. Yet it is full of very dark words.

5 And in this Psalm is founded the article of faith: "Descended into hell, on the third day risen again from the dead", so that it is to be wondered at that once

1) In the Erlanger and the Weimarschen: sive; in the Baseler, Wittenberger and Jenaer: sine.

2) This last sentence, which is mentioned in all editions as part of the citation from the Acts of the Apostles, is only found in 1s. Psalm, and seems to have come by a memory mistake here into our text.

Theologians who have a great name have taken it upon themselves to deny that this article is found in the Holy Scriptures, namely after its first part: Descended into hell.

Keep me, God, for I trust in you.

This is the last part of the verse in Hebrew, because the first part consists of the title. But it is the words of Christ throughout the whole psalm. For he begins in such a way, that he must now perish, and be forsaken of all, and die, in this manner: Behold, now I die; my strength hath forsaken me, angels and men have forsaken me, yea, the devils and all men do destroy me. "I cannot escape, no one takes care of my soul" [Ps. 142, 5.], to all men I am regarded as one who is in despair and lost. Therefore thou preserve me, who alone art my sustainer, who savest the lost, quickenest the dead, exaltest the afflicted, as if to say the word [Luc. 23:46.], "Father, I commend my spirit into thy hands."

7 He does not only pray for the time of suffering that he will be preserved in this way, but confesses that in his whole life he clings to God, his sustainer, and dies daily, as Paul praises [1 Cor. 15:31]. Thus the godly always perishes and is always preserved. And this is the new life in faith and hope, which is praised in this psalm, namely the life in the cross, that is, in death, and also in this not different from the most shameful death.

8. Whoever, then, leads his life in peace, or preserves himself by his or man's strength, can he say to God, "Preserve me, God"? For he would receive the answer: What shall I preserve thee for, since thou art not yet perishing nor lost? So we should learn that we should cry out especially when we are perishing, when people cry out least of all, but rather despair.

9. "For I trust in you." Behold, trust and hope call. How should he call who did not trust? Trust itself is cited as the merit, to whom, according to equity and dignity (as we see), eternal life is due. Why does he not cite works and virtues as merits? Of course, because nothing can stand and nothing can save in this tribulation but the pure and firm faith, which is based on the mercy of God alone, which builds nothing on itself, but provides everything for itself, as Christ shows here with his exceedingly beautiful example.

(10) This attitude of heart and the emphasis on these words, "I trust" and "in you," is abundantly spoken of in Psalm 5, 169 ff. has been abundantly spoken of. For if one trusted in anything other than in GOD, it could already no longer be said, "I trust in you." And who could be presumptuous on his merits, since here the head of all, Christ, is silent about his merits, and bases himself only on faith and trust in the merciful GOD? Therefore, this position of the heart in all things and everywhere fits those with whom it stands in despair.

V. 2. I said to the Lord, "You are the Lord; I must suffer for your sake. 1)

Jerome translates the last part thus: Bene mihi non est sine te [I am not well without you]. It seems to me that rather it should have been translated like this: I have not been well with you, so that XXXX is a verb without closer relation (absolutum), which, if one might so say, could be expressed by bonavi, that is, I have been good and beautiful, so that the meaning is: Therefore I have said to the Lord that He would be to me God, from whom I would have everything, and He would have nothing from me (that is, in truth, to be God), because I have not been good to Him, for I have not done Him good. For, Rom. 11, 35. f.: "Who gave him anything before, that it should be repaid to him? For of him and through him and to him are all things." This sense was recognized by our Latin interpreter when he said: You do not need my good. And Jerome's opinion agrees in such a way that we GOTte not only nothing, but also nothing.

1) Vulgate: vixi voruluo: veus vaeus es tu, douorum meoruru ouu Inãï'es.

can give, but have all good from him, and without him have nothing good.

12. But Christ says this in praise of the cross, looking at two opposite kinds of people, one of which, that of the godly, he sees being born of him, and being prepared for him for kingdom and inheritance; but the other, that of the ungodly, he has to let go, because it resents the cross. As if to say, Behold, I die, and in the eyes of the ungodly there is nothing less clear than that I please thee, or that I shall be king and thine heir. But thus they hold themselves, because they rely on their goods and powers and merits, and do not choose thee as their God, nor think that they receive all good from thee, but rather presume to do thee good, attaching to thee what they ought to expect from thee, since for this cause thou takest away all things from me, that thou mayest show that from us nothing comes to thee, but from thee all things come to us, if we trust in thee and put ourselves into thy hand.

(13) And so the duke of the new people teaches here by his example and pronounces in which goods the new people will have abundance, namely only in divine ones, while all others will be made nothing. The Jewish and ancient people, who were accustomed to the promises of temporal abundance, did not grasp this; but nature itself also bears this very unwillingly, indeed, in no way. But meanwhile there is no one who does not babble that the Lord is his God; but when he begins to show that he alone is their good, and takes away all else, then it is found that nothing less was their opinion. For they cannot suffer the taking away of their goods, their good name, their life, their righteousness, and the things that they have, that they should cry out in faith and hope alone, "Preserve me, O GOD, for I trust in thee," and, "I have said unto the LORD, Thou art the LORD; I do thee no good." For this is what the good deed of the cross entails, which kills us and all that is ours, so that through it we become partakers of the divine nature, as 2 Petr. 1:4 says.

14. and it is in truth something exceedingly hard, indeed, hell itself, to feel that all the

Our good is with God, and that there is nothing in us by which we can earn merit for Him, please Him or favor Him, and here the godless theology of those who presume to buy God's mercy by doing as much as is in them, or to do enough for sins by their wretched works, falls away fundamentally. For they do not know that all this is done by faith alone in the mercy of God, since it is precisely these wretched works that must be erased and completely despaired of, by which they endeavored to do enough and prepare themselves for the mercy of God.

(15) And from this it is evident what is the use of the great splendor of pardons and indulgences, which has been introduced into the Church of God by the most heretical Magistri nostri 1) through their ungodly statutes, decisions, reserved cases, indulgences (induitis), permissions (concessionibus) and such exceedingly pernicious and worthless things, with which they most shamefully ensnare the souls of the whole world. What do we learn from this other than that we believe that God requires our good, and that we would not become blissful through communion with the divine nature, but that God would become blissful through communion with our nature, in that we do not set about transforming ourselves into Him by faith, so that He would be our God, but strive to transform Him into us by our works and to make Him similar to our desires, so that we would be idols for Him? As he saith in Isaiah [Cap. 46, 5], "After whom do ye form, and to whom do ye compare me?"

16 For does this not mean that I want to conform God to me when I strive for Him to conform to my opinion, inclination, sense and desire? if He does not, then I do not want to trust Him, nor suffer His hand, while we, on the other hand, should become nothing, and make Him powerful in us of His sense, desire and desire, that is, die, be condemned and be made nothing.

1) Cf. Walch, St. Louis edition, Vol. XVIII, 988 f.

17) The title of this psalm is therefore rightly: "A golden jewel", since it speaks of the highest and most important movement of the heart, and that in its highest and best way, as it was in the head of all things, Christ. For by this movement of the heart Christ's people are distinguished from those who are not His people, despising the prestige (personis) and name of all men and things (omnium), as follows:

V. 3. for the saints who are on earth and for the glorious ones; in them I have all my pleasure. 1)

18 Jerome: For the saints who are on earth and for the glorious ones; all my will [is] with them. The Hebrew text literally reads thus: For the saints who are on earth they, and the glorious ones, all my pleasure [is] with them. It should therefore have been omitted [in the Vulgate] the pronoun ejus, and in eis, which according to the Hebrew manner of speaking is wont to be added after the relative qui. And it is certain that the interpreter has put the verbum mirificavit instead of the noun, because in Hebrew it denotes glorious, great, admirable, as it is said in the 8th Psalm, "How glorious is thy name in all the earth." Then he omitted the connective et, which would have easily prevented him from making mirificavit out of magnificis.

19 So without Hebrew idiom the verse will read like this: In the saints, or with the saints that are on the earth, and the glorious ones, is all my delight; so that the meaning is, Since all are vexed with me, who are entrapped by the great prestige of things, and are enemies of the cross, I again let them go, whatever their generation or name may be, and it does not move me that they are the seed of Abraham. But I take care of those who are holy and excellent in spirit, but are despised by the world and by those people. In these I have my delight, my favor, my inheritance. These will be the people whom the Father has given me, wherever they may be on earth. They do not necessarily have to be in Jerusalem or in Zion or in Rome, but as Peter says, Apost. 10, 34. f.: "Now I know with truth that God does not look at the person, but at all people, whoever fears Him and does right, He is pleased with. This is what the Jews did not want, this is what their kindred spirits (aemuli) deny even nowadays, the Romanists who strive to bind us to Rome, and in this they have the upper hand. This opinion will reinforce the following.
